PREFACE

‘GIVE heed to . . . teaching.’ Perhaps the Church of Christ has never given sufficient heed to teaching since the earliest and happiest days. In our own day the importance of teaching, or, as we sometimes call it, expository preaching, has been pressed home through causes that are various yet never accidental; and it is probable that in the near future more heed will be given by the Church to teaching than has ever been given before.

As a contribution towards the furnishing of the Church for that great work, this DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE is published. It is a Dictionary of the Old and New Testaments, together with the Old Testament Apocrypha, according to the Authorized and Revised English Versions, and with constant reference to the original tongues. Every effort has been used to make the information it contains reasonably full, trustworthy, and accessible.

As to fulness. In a Dictionary of the Bible one expects that the words occurring in the Bible, and which do not explain themselves, will receive some explanation. The present Dictionary more nearly meets that expectation than any Dictionary that has hitherto been published. Articles have been written on the names of all Persons and Places, on the Antiquities and Archæology of the Bible, on its Ethnology, Geology, and Natural History, on Biblical Theology and Ethic, and even on the obsolete or archaic words occurring in the English Versions. The greater number of the articles are of small compass, for care has been exercised to exclude vague generalities as well as unaccepted idiosyncrasies; but there are many articles which deal with important and difficult subjects, and extend to considerable length. Such, for example, and to mention only one, is the article in the first volume on the Chronology of the New Testament.

As to trustworthiness. The names of the authors are appended to their articles, except where the article is very brief and of minor importance; and these names are the best guarantee that the work may be relied on. So far as could be ascertained, those authors were chosen for the various subjects who had made a special study of that subject, and might be able to speak with authority upon it. Then, in addition to the work of the Editor and his Assistant, every sheet has passed through the hands of the three distinguished scholars whose names are found on the title-page. These scholars are not responsible for errors of any kind, if such should be discovered in the Dictionary, but the time and care they have spent upon it may be taken as a good assurance that the work as a whole is reliable and authoritative.

As to accessibility. While all the articles have been written expressly for this work, so they have been arranged under the headings one would most naturally turn to. In a very few cases it has been found necessary to group allied subjects together. But even then, the careful system of black-lettering and cross-reference adopted, should enable the reader to find the subject wanted without delay. And so important has it seemed to the Editor that each subject should be found under its own natural title, that he has allowed a little repetition here and there (though not in identical terms) rather than distress the reader by sending him from one article to another in search of the information he desires. The Proper Names will be found under the spelling adopted in the Revised Version, and in a few very familiar instances the spelling of the Authorized Version is also given, with a cross-reference to the other. On the Proper Names generally, and particularly on the very difficult and unsettled questions of their derivation, reference may be made to the article NAMES (PROPER), which will be found in the third volume. The Hebrew, and (where it seemed to be of consequence for the identification of the name) the Greek of the Septuagint, have been given for all proper and many common names. It was found impracticable to record all the variety of spelling discovered in different manuscripts of the Septuagint; and it was considered unnecessary, in view of the great Edition now in preparation in Cambridge, and the Concordance of Proper Names about to be published at the Clarendon Press. The Abbreviations, considering the size and scope of the work, will be seen to be few and easily mastered. A list of them, together with a simple and uniform scheme of transliterating Hebrew and Arabic words, will be found on the following pages. The Maps have been specially prepared for this work by Mr. J. G. Bartholomew, F.R.G.S. The Illustrations (the drawings for which have been chiefly made in Syria by the Rev. G. M. Mackie, M.A.) are confined to subjects which cannot be easily understood without their aid.

The Editor has pleasure in recording his thanks to many friends and willing fellow-workers, including the authors of the various articles. In especial, after those whose names are given on the title-page, he desires to thank the Rev. W. SANDAY, D.D., LL.D., Lady Margaret Professor of Divinity in the University of Oxford, who has read many of the articles and given valuable assistance in other ways, and whose name might have appeared on the title-page, had not illness prevented him for some time from carrying out his intention of reading the proof-sheets as they were ready; next, his own early teacher, Dr. DONALD SHEARER, who voluntarily undertook, and has most conscientiously carried out, the verification of the passages of Scripture; also Professor MAHAFFY of Dublin, who kindly read some articles in proof; Professor RYLE of Cambridge; Professor SALMOND of Aberdeen; Principal STEWART of St. Andrews; and Principal FAIRBAIRN and Mr. J. VERNON BARTLET, M.A. of Mansfield College, Oxford.

DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE

A.—This letter is used in critical notes on the text of OT and NT to denote the Codex Alexandrinus, a MS of the Greek Bible written apparently in Egypt c. A.D. 450, placed in the library of the Patriarch of Alexandria in 1098, presented by Cyril Lucar, Patriarch of Constantinople (formerly of Alexandria), to Charles I. in 1628, and now in the British Museum. It contains the whole Bible except Gn 14¹⁴⁻¹⁷ 15^{1-5, 16-19} 16⁶⁻⁹, 1 K [1 S] 12¹⁸⁻¹⁴, Ps 49 (50)²⁰⁻⁷⁹ (80)¹¹, Mt 1¹⁻²⁵, Jn 6⁵⁰⁻⁸⁵, 2 Co 4¹³⁻¹². The Psalter is introduced by a letter of Athanasius to Marcellinus, the Hypotheses of Eusebius, and various tables; and is concluded by a collection of Canticles from OT and NT, and a Christian Morning Hymn. Rev is followed by two Epistles of Clement (wanting 1⁸⁸⁻⁹³ 2¹³⁻²⁰), both apparently still in ecclesiastical use at the time when this MS. was written. Last of all, marked as extra-canonical, came eighteen Psalms of Solomon; but this part has disappeared. Its readings in OT can be most readily ascertained from Professor Swete's edition of the LXX. Its NT text was published by Woide in 1786, by B. H. Cowper in 1860, and by E. H. Hansell in a parallel text, 1864. The whole MS was published in a photographic facsimile by the Curators of the British Museum in 1879. J. O. F. MURRAY.

Ⲁ (Aleph), the first letter in the Heb. alphabet. This symbol in crit. app. denotes the Codex Sinaiticus, a MS of the Greek Bible discovered in the monastery of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai by C. Tischendorf, 1844 and 1859. It was written towards the middle or end of the 4th cent. Four scribes at least were employed on it. The scribe who copied Tobit and Judith wrote also six cancel leaves in the NT containing Mt 16⁹⁻¹⁸ 24³⁶⁻²⁶, Mk 14⁵⁴-Lk 1⁵⁰, 1 Th 2¹⁴⁻⁵, He 4¹⁶⁻⁸, besides various headlines, titles, subscriptions, and section numbers. This scribe Tischendorf further identified with the scribe who wrote the NT in Codex B, Vaticanus (which see). The MS shows marks of revision due to various hands from the 4th cent. to the 12th cent. One of these, Ⲁ^{ca}, 7th cent., declares in a note at the end of 2 Es [Ezr-Neh] and at the end of Est, that he had compared the MS in these books with a very ancient copy transcribed by Antoninus the Confessor, and collated with Origen's Hexapla by the holy martyr Pamphilus when in prison at Caesarea. The corrections introduced by him in these books, though of an Origenic character, certainly do not embody the complete Hexaplaric text.

There seems to be no clear evidence to show either where the MS was written, or how it passed into the possession of the monks of St. Catherine. While in their possession it fell into decay, and long ago the outside sheets were cut up for book-binding purposes; and Tischendorf was convinced that the sheets he rescued in 1844 were only waiting their turn for use in the oven. It is not surprising, therefore, that the MS is now far from complete. It contains portions of Gn 23, 24 and of Nu 5, 6, 7; 1 Ch 9²⁷⁻¹⁹, 2 Es 9^{9-end} [Ezr 9⁹-Neh], Est, To, Jth, 1 Mac, 4 Mac (3 Mac perhaps lost), Is, Jer, La 1-2²⁰, Jl, Ob, Jon, Nah, Hab, Zeph, Hag, Zec, Mal, Ps, Pr, Ec, Ca, Wis, Sir, Job. The NT is complete, and is followed by the Epistle of Barnabas and part of the Shepherd of Hermas.

The text has been published in facsimile type—(1) in 1846, 'Cod. Frid.-Aug.', containing the sheets of OT secured in 1844; (2) in 1862, 'Cod. Sin.', containing, besides NT, the rest of OT, with the exception of a few verses (published in an appendix in 1867). Tischendorf also published the NT text in a handy volume in 1863. The OT readings are most easily accessible in Swete's edition of the LXX (Cambridge, 1887-95, ed. 2, 1895-8).

Ⲁ is frequently used in AV, and sometimes retained in RV, in constructions that are now obsolete. It is found both as an adj. (or indef. art.) and as a prep. 1. Ⲁ, as an adj., is a worn-down form of the Old English adj. an, 'one.' (1) In modern Eng. a is used before a consonantal sound, an before a vowel sound. In the Eng. VSS of the Bible this usage is not invariable. See AN. (2) Ⲁ is found qualifying abstract nouns without affecting their meaning: Wis 12¹⁷ 'thou art of a full power' (RV 'perfect in power'); 12¹⁹ 'to be of a good hope' (RV 'of good hope'); 2 Co 10⁸ 'having in a readiness' (RV 'being in readiness'); 2 Mac 13¹² 'commanded they should be in a readiness.' Cf. Gylforde, Pilgrimage 7: 'always in a redynesse to set forth when they woll.' On the other hand it is sometimes omitted where it is required for individualising: Sir 39¹⁷ 'at time convenient.' (3) In Lk 9²⁸ 'about an eight days (RV about eight days) after these sayings' the art. is used as in 'a good many'; so 1 Mac 4¹⁵ 'there were slain of them upon a three thousand men' (RV 'about three thousand').

2. In other expressions A is a prep., being a worn-down form of an or on, and stands for the modern 'at,' 'in,' or 'on.' 2 Ch 2¹⁸ 'three thousand and six hundred overseers to set the people a work' (RV 'awork'); 1 Co 9⁷ 'who goeth a warfare (RV 'serveth') any time at his own charges?' Jth 7² 'horsemen . . . and other men that were afoot.' Most frequently with a verbal noun in 'ing': 2 Ch 16⁶ 'wherewith Baasha was a building' (AV of 1611, later edd. 'was building,' RV 'had builded'); 1 Es 6²⁰ 'Being still a building, it is not yet fully ended'; Lk 8⁴² 'She lay a dying.' The full form an or on remained side by side with this worn-down form: Ac 13³⁶ 'David . . . fell on sleep'; Mt 4² 'He was afterward an hungered' (RV 'He afterward hungered.' 'An hungered' occurs also Mt 12¹⁻³ 25^{35, 37, 42, 44}, Mk 2²³, Lk 6³, and in all these places RV leaves it unchanged).

AARON (אֲרֹנִן, LXX 'Ααρών).—In the narratives of the Exodus, Aaron is, after Moses, the most prominent figure. Often appearing as the colleague or representative of the great leader and lawgiver, he is in particular the priest, and the head of the Israelitish priesthood. We must, however, distinguish between our different authorities in the Pent., for in the priestly narrative Aaron not unnaturally occupies a far more important place than in the earlier account of JE.

In JE, Aaron is first introduced as Moses' brother, and with the title of the Levite, in Ex 4¹⁴ J, where Jⁿ, sending Moses on his mission to the Israelites, appoints him, on account of his fluency in speech, to be the spokesman of Moses to the people (vv. 14-16). Aaron meets his brother in the mount of God; together they return to Egypt and assemble the elders of the Israelites, before whom Aaron, instructed by Moses, delivers God's message and performs the appointed signs. The people believe; but when Moses and Aaron request Pharaoh to grant the people temporary leave of absence, the king refuses to listen to them (Ex 4-6). In the account of the plagues Aaron occupies quite a subordinate place, being the silent companion of his brother. It is Moses who is sent to Pharaoh and announces the coming plagues (Ex 7^{14ff.} 8^{1ff.} 9^{1ff.} 10^{1ff.} 13^{1ff.} [J mainly]—with 10⁶ contrast 10⁶ 'he turned'). Aaron is merely called in four times along with Moses to entreat for their removal (8^{8, 25} 9²⁷ 10¹⁶). Indeed it seems probable that the mention of Aaron in these passages is due, not to the original narrative of J, but to the editor who combined J and E; for in each case Moses alone answers, and in his own name; in 8³⁰ 9³⁵ 10¹⁸ his departure alone is mentioned, while in 8¹² it is Moses alone who prays for the removal of the frogs. In the history of the wanderings the passages relating to Aaron are for the most part derived from E, where indeed Miriam is described as the sister of Aaron (15²⁰). With Hur he assists Moses in holding up the rod of God to ensure the defeat of Amalek (17^{10, 12} E), and together with the elders he is called to Jethro's sacrifice (18¹² E). At Sinai, while priests and people remain below, Aaron accompanies Moses up the mountain (19²⁴ J), together with Nadab, Abihu, and seventy elders of Israel (24^{14, 9-11}); and when Moses with Joshua alone is about to approach still nearer to God, Aaron and Hur are temporarily appointed supreme judges of the people (24^{13, 14} E). Moses' absence being prolonged, Aaron, at the people's request, makes a golden calf as a visible symbol of Jⁿ, for which he afterwards weakly excuses himself to Moses, throwing the blame upon the people (32^{1-5, 21-25}). At a later period Aaron with Miriam opposes Moses, on the ground that they also are recipients of divine revelations, Miriam being apparently regarded as the leader on this occasion, since the punishment falls upon her (Nu 12 E). Some further particulars relating to Aaron are to be learnt from Dt, in passages apparently based on the narrative of JE; namely the intercession offered by Moses on his account after the making of the golden calf (Dt 9²⁰); the choice of Levi as the priestly tribe, probably in consequence of the zeal shown by them against the idolaters (10^{8ff.}); the death of Aaron at Moserah (site unknown), and the succession of his son Eleazar to the priestly office (10^{6, 7}, the itinerary probably from E, cf. Nu 21^{12, 16, 18ff.}). The last passage is important as showing that the tradition of a hereditary priesthood in the family of Aaron was found even outside the priestly history. Comp. Jos 24³³ E, where mention is made of Phinehas, the son of Eleazar the son of Aaron.

It is, however, in the priestly tradition, where the institution of the ordinances of divine worship is described at length, that Aaron figures most prominently as the founder of the Israelitish priesthood, and becomes, indeed, with Moses the joint leader of the people. P records several details respecting Aaron's family: he is the son of Amram and Jochebed (Ex 6²⁰), and three years older than Moses (ib. 7⁷, Nu 33³⁹). His wife was Elisheba, his sons Nadab, Abihu (cf. Ex 24¹⁻⁹ E), Eleazar (cf. Jos 24³³ E), and Ithamar. See Ex 6²² etc. A slightly different representation of Aaron's first commission is given in Ex 6²⁻⁷ 13 P, from that in the parallel narrative Ex 4-6¹ JE. Here Aaron is appointed the spokesman of Moses, not to the people, but to Pharaoh (see 7¹), and it is before the king that Aaron works a wonder, turning his rod into a serpent. From this point onwards the importance assigned to Aaron in P becomes very marked. He regularly co-operates with Moses at the time of the Egypt. plagues, usually bringing these to pass by means of his rod in accordance with Moses' instructions (Ex 7^{19ff.} 8^{5ff.} 10^{1ff.}). Many commands of God are addressed to both leaders alike (Ex 9⁸⁻¹⁰ 12¹⁻⁴³, Lv 11¹ 13¹ 14³³ 15¹, Nu 2¹, cf. 13^{17, 44}); they are consulted by the people (Nu 9⁶ 15³², cf. 13³⁶), and against both of them the murmurings of the people are directed (Ex 16², Nu 14², cf. 26^{16, 41} cf. 18²⁰). All this, however, does not prevent distinct and characteristic parts being assigned to each of them. Thus the first place is given to Moses throughout. He receives the divine revelation on Mount Sinai respecting the appointment of Aaron and his sons to the priesthood (Ex 28¹⁻⁴ 29^{4ff.}), and upon the completion of the tabernacle solemnly consecrates them, and offers the appointed sacrifices (Ex 29, Lv 8. 9). Aaron, on the other hand, is specially 'the priest' (Ex 31¹⁰ 35¹⁹ 38²¹, Lv 13², Nu 18²⁶), who stays a plague by an offering of incense (Nu 16⁴⁶⁻⁴⁸); to his charge the tabernacle is committed (ib. 4^{5, 19, 27, 33}), and to him the Levites are given in exchange for the firstborn (ib. 3^{39ff.}). Aaron is distinguished from his sons, the inferior priests, by the anointing which he receives (Ex 29⁷, Lv 8¹², cf. Ex 29²⁸, Lv 4^{3, 5, 16} 6^{20, 22} 16³² 21^{10, 12}, Nu 35²⁵):—passages which speak of his sons as being also anointed probably belong to the later additions to the Priestly Code (Ex 28^a 30³⁰ 40¹⁵, Lv 7³⁶, Nu 3³). Between the family of Aaron and the rest of the Levites a sharp distinction is drawn (see esp. Nu 3. 4). In this connection it is to be noticed that in the main portion of Nu 16 Korah's companions in his rebellion are called 'princes of the congregation' (16²), i.e. not all Levites (cf. Nu 27³); their complaints are directed against the exclusive claims of the tribe of Levi, and all murmurings are finally silenced by the miraculous budding of the rod of Aaron, the representative of the house of Levi (Nu 17¹⁻¹¹). But certain additions seem to have been made to the chapter to emphasize a different point, and in these passages Korah's companions are regarded as wholly Levites, who protest against the superior claims of the house of Aaron (Nu 16^{9-11, 16-19, 36-40}). See further, PRIESTS; also AARONITES, AARON'S ROD, KORAH.

For failing to show due honour to J' at Meribah Kadesh, in the fortieth year of the wanderings, Aaron was forbidden to enter the promised land (Nu 20⁸⁻¹³). Shortly afterwards, accompanied by Moses and his own son Eleazar, Aaron ascended Mount Hor, on the border of the land of Edom, and after being solemnly stripped of his priestly garments, which were put on Eleazar, died there at the age of 123 (Nu 20²²⁻²⁹ 33³⁸, P). The site of Mount Hor is uncertain, the traditional identification with Jebel Nebi Harun, S.W. of Petra, being very doubtful (see Dillm. on Nu 20²²); the itinerary of P (Nu 33³⁰⁻³⁸) names six stages between Moseroth (Dt 10⁶ Moserah) and Mt. Hor.

In the older literature outside the Pent., the mission of Moses and Aaron in Egypt is alluded to in Jos 24⁵ E, and 1 S 12⁶⁻⁸ (a passage which has affinities with E). Micah (6⁴) names as the leaders of the people at the time of the Exodus, Moses, Aaron, and Miriam, but Aaron is not mentioned elsewhere in the prophets. H. A. WHITE.

AARONITES (בְּנֵי אַהֲרֹן 'sons of Aaron').—This phrase might, according to Sem. idiom, denote either the members of a class or guild (comp. sons of Korah, sons of Asaph, sons of the prophets), or members of a family connected by blood kinship. As used in OT it was understood in the latter sense, all the priests, at anyrate from the time of the second temple, tracing their descent from Aaron, as the head and founder of the Israelitish priesthood. The term does not occur earlier than the priestly portions of the Pent., where in certain groups of laws the epithet Aaronites is often given to the priests (see esp. Lv 1-3, and comp. 6⁹ 'Aaron and his sons'), and a sharp distinction is drawn between the Aaronite priests and the Levites who wait upon them (see esp. Nu 3¹⁰ 16⁴⁰ 18¹⁻⁷). It is doubtful whether any mention of the Aaronites or seed of Aaron was to be found in the original H (Law of Holiness), the present text of Lv 17² 21^{1, 17, 21, 24} 22^{2, 4, 18} being probably due to the R. The Chronicler divides the priests into the houses of Eleazar and Ithamar, assigning sixteen courses to the former and eight to the latter; and, probably without good authority, he connects the former with the Zadokite priests of Jerus., and the latter with the family of Eli (1 Ch 24), though the name of one of Eli's sons (cf. also 1 S 22^{7a}) would suggest a connexion between this family and Phinehas the son of Eleazar (Jos 24³³). Throughout his work the priests are frequently termed the Aaronites (sons of Aaron)—viz. 1 Ch 6^{24, 27} 15⁴ 23^{33, 32} 24^{1, 31}, 2 Ch 13^{9, 10} 26¹⁸ 29²¹ 31¹⁹ 35¹⁴, Neh 10³⁸ 12⁴⁷. In 1 Ch 12²⁷ 27¹⁷ the house or family of Aaron is placed on a level with the other tribes; and similarly in some late Psalms, by the side of the House of Israel and the House of Levi, the priestly class is described as the House of Aaron (Ps 115^{10, 12} 118³ 135¹⁹). H. A. WHITE.

AARON'S ROD.—Aaron's rod is the centre of interest in an important incident of the desert wanderings—time and place are both uncertain—as recorded by the priestly narrator (P), Nu 17¹⁻¹¹ (Heb. text 17¹⁶⁻²⁶). The passage should be studied in connexion with the more complex narrative in ch. 16, to the events of which the incident in question forms the sequel (see Driver, LOT 59 f.). In obedience to a divine command, 12 rods, representing the 12 princes of the tribes, each with the name of a prince engraved upon it, together with a 13th rod (cf. Vulg. fueruntque virgæ duodecim absque virga Aaron) to represent the tribe of Levi, but bearing the name of Aaron, were deposited by Moses before 'the testimony,' i.e. before the ark. The following morning it was found that 'the rod of Aaron for the house of Levi was budded, and put forth buds, and bloomed blossoms, and bare ripe almonds' (17⁸ RV), by which it was miraculously proved that J' had Himself selected the tribe of Levi to be the exclusive possessors of the priestly prerogatives. The standpoint of the narrator is thus different from that of a later stratum in the foregoing section, which represents a party of Levites in revolt against the exclusive priesthood of the sons of Aaron. 'Aaron's rod that budded' was ordered to be put back to its former place 'before the [ark of the] testimony' (17¹⁰) as a token to future generations of the divine choice. A later Jewish tradition, at variance with this command, and with the express statement of 1 K 8⁹, is found in He 9⁴, and in later Jewish writers, that the rod, like the pot of manna, had a place with the tables of stone within the ark.

AB.—See NAMES (PROPER), and TIME.

ABACUC.—The form in which the name of the prophet Habakkuk appears in 2 Es 1⁴⁰.

ABADDON.—This word is found in the OT only in the Wisdom Literature. When it first appears, the old view of Sheol as a place where the family, national, and social distinctions of the world above are reproduced, had been partially displaced; and in some measure the higher conception had gained acceptance, which held that in Sheol at all events moral distinctions were paramount, and that men were treated there according to their deserts. In Job 31¹² Abaddon (אַבְדֹּן) bears the general meaning of 'ruin,' 'destruction.' (But see Dillm. and Dav. in loc.) In the other instances of its occurrence, however, it is specialised, and designates the place of the lost in Sheol. Thus in Job 26⁶, Pr 15¹¹ 27²⁰ (אַבְדֹּן, in קֶרֶן אַבְדֹּן) it occurs in conjunction with 'Sheol' (שְׁאוֹל), and in Ps 88¹¹ with 'grave' (קֶבֶר). Again, in Job 28²² a further development is to be observed. In this passage it is linked with death (מָוֶת), and personified in the same way as we find שְׁמָיָא in Dn 4²³ and Hades in Rev 6⁸, and שְׁמִיָּה and קֶבֶר in the Talmud. The word is found once more in the Bible in Rev 9¹¹. In this passage it is used as the proper name of a prince of the infernal regions, and explained by the word Ἀπολλύων = 'Destroyer.' In the LXX ἀβδὼν is always rendered by ἀπώλεια, except in Job 31¹² where LXX implies a different text. The first two meanings above given are found in the Aram. and later Heb. Finally, in the latter in the 'Emek Hammelech, f. 15. 3, Abaddon becomes the lowest place of Gehenna.

ABAGTHA (אבגתא, Est 1¹⁰), one of the seven chamberlains or eunuchs sent by Ahasuerus (Xerxes) to fetch the queen, Vashti, to his banquet. The name, which is apparently Persian, is probably akin to the names Bigtha (1¹⁰) and Bigthan (2²¹). For the derivation, bagdāna = 'God's gift,' has been suggested, but cannot be regarded as certain. In the LXX the names of the chamberlains are quite different from the Hebrew.

ABANAH (אבנא, Kerê אבנא, AV Abana; AVm Amana, RVm Amanah; 2 K 5¹²). This 'river of Damascus,' the Chrysorrhoeas of the Greeks, is identified with the Barada, to whose waters Damascus owes her life. Rising in the uplands near Baalbec, it drains the hollow in the bosom of Anti-Lebanon. Ain el Barada, in the plain of Zebedāny, swells the stream, which then plunges down the deep picturesque gorge of Wady Barada. About 14 miles N.W. of Damascus, in a beautiful romantic spot in the heart of the hills, rises the mighty fountain el Fijeh (Gr. πηγὴ, a spring); a river born in a moment, which, after a brief, foaming course, joins the Barada, more than doubling its volume. It then flows along the bottom of a deep winding valley, shaded by beautiful and fruitful trees; bare, yellow rocks towering high on either hand above the green. About half the water is led captive along the eastern bank towards the city, the Beyrout road passing between the streams. Just where the precipitous cliffs advance as if to close the gorge, it escapes from the mountains, and, throwing itself out fanlike in many branches, waters the plain, supplies the city, and drains off into the northern two of the marshy lakes eastward. One branch is called Nahr Banias, a reminiscence of the ancient name.

ABARIM (הַעֲרִים).—A plural form of the word signifying 'part beyond'; and with respect to the Jordan, on the E. side of it. It is used as a proper name preceded by הַר 'mount' (Nu 27¹², Dt 32⁴⁰), and by הָרִים 'mountains' (Nu 33⁴⁷). It is also found with עַי [see IYE-ABARIM] (Nu 21¹¹ 33⁴⁴). In all these places the def. art. is used with Abarim, but in Jer 22²⁰ (RV Abarim, AV 'the passages') the def. art. is not used. For the geogr. position see NEBO. The LXX translate A. by τὸ πέραν, except in Nu 33⁴⁷, Dt 32⁴⁰ where they have τὰ (τὸ) Ἀβαρίμ (μ). For Ezk 39¹¹, and a very doubtful use of this word, see Smend, in loc.

A. T. CHAPMAN.

ABASE, ABASEMENT.—Abase is three times used in AV, and retained in RV to translate אָפַף shaphél, otherwise rendered 'bring low' or 'make low,' 'bring down' or 'bow down,' 'humble'; and once to tr. אָפַף, Is 31⁴ 'he will not be afraid of their voice, nor abase himself (= be cast down) for the noise of them.' In NT it is five times used to render ταπεινώ, changed in RV into 'humble,' except in Ph 4¹² 'I know how to be abased,' and 2 Co 11⁷ 'Commit a sin in abasing myself.' Abasement, meaning humiliation, occurs in Sir 20¹¹ 'There is an a. because of glory; and there is that lifteth up his head from a low estate.' Cf. Sir 25²³ RV 'A wicked woman is a. of heart' (AV 'abateth the courage'). Notice that 'abatement' and 'basement' (a mod. word) are distinct, both in derivation and meaning. J. HASTINGS.

ABATE.—This verb occurs only six times in AV (all in OT), and yet it translates five different Heb. words. The meaning of the Eng. word is, however, the same throughout, to lessen. 'His eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated' [Driver: 'neither had his freshness fled'] (Dt 34⁷). 'It shall be abated (RV an abatement shall be made) from thy estimation' (Lv 27¹⁸). (See ESTIMATION.) 'The waters were abated' (RV 'decreased') (Gn 8³). RV tr. still another Heb. word 'abated' in Nu 11² (AV 'was quenched'). The word is also found with the same sense in Wis 16²⁴, Sir 25²³, 1 Mac 5³ 11⁴⁹. Cf. Shakespeare—

'Abate thy rage, abate thy manly rage.'
—Henry V. III. ii. 24.

And Walton, 'Lord, abate my great affliction, or increase my patience,' Lives, iv. 288.

J. HASTINGS.

ABBA.—The transliteration (dββā) of the Aram. word for 'father'; see, for example, the Targ. of Onk. (perhaps of the 1st cent.) at Gn 19³⁴ (cf. G. Dalman, Gram. d. jüd.-paläst. Aramäisch, § 40, c. 3). It occurs three times in the NT, and always in direct address, viz. in our Lord's prayer in Gethsemane as given by St. Mark (14³⁶), and in the 'cry' of the Spirit as referred to by St. Paul (Ro 8²⁶, Gal 4⁶).

The phenomena connected with the form and use of the word have occasioned divers opinions, the merits of which our present knowledge does not always enable us to pronounce upon with positiveness. It has been held, for instance (see John Lightfoot, Horæ Hebr. ad Mc. l.c.), that when spelt with the double b and final a, the word refers to physical fatherhood; accordingly, our Lord's choice of that form is thought to indicate special closeness of relationship. But the frequent use of Abba simply as a title of honour in the Mishna and Tosefta seems to disprove this opinion (Schürer, HJP § 25, n. 30; cf. Jg 17¹⁰, 2 K 2¹², Mt 23⁹). On the other hand, it has been asserted that in Syr. the word with the double b denotes a spiritual father, with a single b the natural. But this distinction also seems not to be sustained by usage (see Payne Smith's Lexicon, s.v.). Again, it is noteworthy that the Gr. equivalent, ὁ πατήρ, is appended to the term in all three instances of its occurrence. The second Evangelist, indeed, in other cases sometimes introduces the Aram. terms used by our Lord (see 5⁴¹ 7^{11.34}); but in those cases the added Gr. translation is preceded by an explanatory phrase distinctly marking it as such. Moreover, the Apostle Paul makes the same addition of ὁ πατήρ in both instances. Had the term 'Abba,' then, become a quasi proper name? Indications are not wanting that it had already taken on a degree of conventional sacredness; servants were forbidden to use it in addressing the head of the house (Berachoth 16b, cited by Delitzsch on Rom. L.c.). It seems to have been the favourite appellation of God employed by Jesus in prayer (cf. Mt 11^{25.26} 26^{29.42}, Lk 10²¹ 22⁴² 23³⁴, Jn 11⁴¹ 12^{27.28} 17^{1.11.24.25}). This would greatly promote its use in Christian circles; and though the second word was probably added primarily by Gr.-speaking Jews in explanation of the first, usage doubtless soon gave the phrase the force of an intensified repetition and the currency of a devotional formula. Merely impassioned repetition, indeed, ordinarily adheres to the same term (as κύριε, κύριε, Mt 7²²; ἡλεῖ, ἡλεῖ, 27⁴⁶); such expressions, therefore, as ναὶ, ἀμήν, Rev 1⁷ (cf. 2 Co 1²⁰); 'Amen, So be it'; 'Hallelujah, Praise the Lord,' are closer analogues. Rabbinical examples are not wanting of similar combinations; see Schoettgen, Horæ Hebr. on Mark, l.c.

ABDIAS (2 Es 1³⁹).—Obadiah the prophet.

ABDIEL (עֲבָדֵי־אֵל 'servant of God').—Son of Guni (1 Ch 5¹⁵). See GENEALOGY.

ABDON (עֲבֵדוֹן 'servile').—1. Son of Hillel, of Pirathon in Ephraim, the last of the minor judges, Jg 12¹⁰⁻¹⁵. 2. A family of the tribe of Benjamin dwelling in Jerus., 1 Ch 8²³. 3. A Gibeonite family dwelling in Jerus., 1 Ch 8³⁰ 9³⁶. 4. A courtier of Josiah, 2 Ch 34²⁰; in 2 K 22¹² his name is Achbor.

ABDON (עֲבָדוֹן).—A Levitical city of Asher (Jos 21³⁰, 1 Ch 6⁷¹), now (v. d. Velde) 'Abdeh E. of Achzib on the hills' (SWP, vol. i. sheet iii.).

ABEL (עֲבֵל, Ἀβελ).—The second son (twin?) of Adam and Eve, by occupation a herdsman (Gn 4²), offered to God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain (He 11⁴), and out of jealousy was slain by his elder brother (Gn 4⁸. See CAIN). The current etymology (עֲבֵל breath, vanity) has been disputed by the Assyriologists, who connect the name with ablu, abal, 'son' (cf. Asurbanipal); but while this may well be the root, it does not follow that it gives the etymology in the mind of the writer. There would have been no point in naming the younger brother 'son' (Franz Delitzsch), and it is better to suppose that the proper name was here designed to suggest the idea of the short-lived or possibly the shepherd (cf. עֲבֵל). The representation of A. as a shepherd coincides with the OT tradition of the superiority of the pastoral life. The ground of the acceptance of A.'s offering (Gn 4⁴) is not its conformity to a revealed command, nor its character of blood, but the spirit of true piety which was expressed in his giving to God his best, viz. the firstlings of the flock, and of these the fattest portions. Cain's knowledge of God's acceptance of A.'s offering implies a visible sign, probably the kindling of the sacrifice by fire from heaven (cf. 1 K 18³⁸). In NT Abel appears as the first martyr (Mt 23³⁵), and as a hero of faith (He 11⁴), while his death is contrasted with that of Christ as calling, not for forgiveness, but for vengeance (cf. Westcott on He 12²⁴). The character and the fate of A. reflect the Jewish consciousness of the enduring division of mankind into the two classes of the people and the enemies of God, and of the persecutions endured by His chosen people at the hands of their enemies (cf. 1 Jn 3¹²).

ABEL (עֲבֵל), 'meadow.'—The name of various places in Pal. and Syria, situated by cultivable lands. In one passage (1 S 6¹⁸) Abel stands apparently for Eben (עֲבֵן), 'stone' (see RV, AVm, LXX, and Tar.), applying to a 'great stone' at Bethshemesh of Judah.

1. Abel-beth-maacah (AV maachah) (עֲבֵל בֵּית מַעַחָה), 'Abel of the House of Maachah' in Upper Galilee (2 S 20^{14, 15, 18}), now Abil Kamh, 'Abel of wheat,' on the plateau of the mountains a little W.

of Tell el-Kādi (Dan). It was taken by the Syrians in the 10th cent. B.C. (1 K 15²⁰, 2 Ch 16⁴), and by the Assyrians about B.C. 732 (2 K 15²⁹) (SWP, vol. i. sheet ii.).

2. Abel-cheramim (עֲבֵל כְּרָמִים), 'meadow of vineyards' (Jg 11³³), on the Moab plateau near Minnith.

3. Abel-maim (עֲבֵל מַיִם), 'meadow of waters' (2 Ch 16⁴), the same as No. 1. The mountains in this region are well watered, and the site noted for corn, as its modern name shows.

4. Abel-meholah (עֲבֵל מְהוּלָה), 'meadow of the dance,' or of the 'circle' (Jg 7²², 1 K 4¹² 19¹⁶), in the Jordan Valley near Bethshean. In the Onomasticon (s.v. Abel Maula) it is placed 10 Rom. miles from Scythopolis (Bethshean), which points to the present Ain Helweh, or 'sweet spring,' near which is a ruined mound. See SWP, vol. ii. sh. ix.

5. Abel-mizraim (עֲבֵל מִצְרַיִם), 'meadow of Egyptians' (Gn 50¹¹), or (with different points עֲבֵל מִצְרַיִם) 'mourning of Egyptians.' There is a play on the word in this passage. It was between Egypt and Hebron, yet is described as 'beyond Jordan.' It is difficult to suppose that such a route would be taken to Hebron, nor was the region beyond Jordan in Canaan. The site is unknown (see ATAD). [See Delitzsch and Dillm. in loc.; Driver, Deut. p. xlii f., and Taylor in Expos. Times (1896), vii. 407.]

6. Abel-shittim (עֲבֵל הַשִּׁטִּים), 'meadow of acacias' (Nu 33⁴⁹), in other passages Shittim only (which see). The place is described as in the plains of Moab. The Jordan plain E. of the river, opposite Jericho, is the site now called Ghōr el Seisebān, or 'valley of acacias.' The plain is well watered, and still dotted with acacias. (See SEP, vol. i.)

ABHORRING.—In Is 66²⁴ 'abhorring' means a thing that is abhorred, an abhorrence: 'They shall be an a. unto all flesh.' The same Heb. word (רָדְאוֹן) is tr. 'contempt' in Dn 12² 'Some to shame and everlasting contempt' (RVm 'abhorrence').

ABI (אָבִי, probably = '(my) father'; LXX Ἀβού) is the name of a queen-mother of the 8th cent. (2 K 18²) who is called Abijah in the parallel passage 2 Ch 29¹. The reading in Kings is the most probable. Abi was daughter of Zechariah (? cf. Is 8²), wife of Ahaz, and mother of Hezekiah.

ABIA, ABIAH.—See ABIAH.

ABI-ALBON (אֲבִי־עֲבֵלֹן, A Ἀβιελβων).—A member of 'the Thirty,' or third division of David's heroes (2 S 23³¹). In the parallel passage (1 Ch 11³²) we find 'Abiel' (אֲבִי־עֵל); this is undoubtedly right, and is supported by B ([Γαδ]αβιηλ) and Luc. ([Γαλα]αβιηλ). Klostermann has further conjectured that the final syllable 'bon' (בון) of Abi-albon is a corruption of 'Beth' (בֵּית), and belongs to the following word (הַעֲבִיבִית). Wellhausen and Budde restore Abi-baal (אֲבִי־בַעַל). See ARBATHITE.

ABIASAPH (אֲבִי־אַסָּף 'Abhi-asaph' = 'father has gathered'), Ex 6²⁴ = EBIASAPH (עֲבִי־אַסָּף 'Ebh-yasaph' = 'father has increased'), 1 Ch 6^{23, 37} 9¹⁹; cf. further 1 Ch 26¹, where Asaph occurs by error for one of the two preceding forms; see Bertheau, z.l.

The evidence for the alternative forms may be thus summarised:—

For Abiasaph—Heb. text and Targ. at Ex 6²⁴; and possibly Vulg. (Abiasaph) in all places, and LXX (Ἀβιασαφ or Ἀβιασαφ) in all places except cod. B in 1 Ch 6²³; but Vulg. and LXX are really ambiguous.

For Ebyasaph—Sam. at Ex 6²⁴; Heb. text in all passages in Chronicles. Against the middle א of Abiasaph, and therefore in favour of Ebyasaph, are the Syr. (ܐܒܝܐܫܘܫܦ), Ex

62¹, 1 Ch 6²³; אבִי־אֶתֶר, 1 Ch 6³⁷ 9¹⁹) and LXX, B
(A. Abiasaph = אבִי־אֶתֶר) in 1 Ch 6²³.

The evidence thus preponderates in favour of Ebiasaph.

Ebiasaph is the name of a division of the Korahite Levites, and is mentioned only in the genealogies of P and the Chronicler. According to 1 Ch 9¹⁹ 26¹ (in the latter passage read Ebiasaph for Asaph; see above), a section of the division acted as doorkeepers. On the difficulties which arise when Ebiasaph in the genealogies is (erroneously) regarded as an individual, see the article in Smith's DB.

ABIATHAR (אֲבִי־אֶתֶר 'father of plenty,' for אֲבִי־אֶתֶר, or 'The Great one is father' [Bähr]).—A landholder (1 K 2²⁶) of Anathoth in Benjamin, a priestly city (Jos 21¹⁸), whence also sprung the priest-prophet Jeremiah. He was son of the high priest Ahijah or Ahimelech, and is first mentioned in 1 S 22²⁰, where it is implied that he alone escaped from the massacre of the priests at Nob. According to the Heb. text of 1 S 23⁶, he joined David at Keilah, in which case 22²⁰ would be prophetic, and 23³⁻⁴ might be explained by supposing that David could inquire of the Lord by a prophet (1 S 23⁶), e.g. Gad (22⁵); but according to the LXX 'he went down with David into Keilah,' apparently from the forest of Hareth; and this seems to harmonise better with the story. David felt a special appeal to his affections in the young priest's position: 'I have occasioned the death of all the persons of thy father's house. Abide thou with me, fear not; for he that seeketh my life seeketh thy life.' The friendship thus cemented by a common danger was remembered long afterwards by Solomon when commuting A.'s death sentence into degradation: 'thou hast been afflicted in all wherein my father was afflicted.'

The adhesion of A. was of signal service to David, inasmuch as he brought with him an ephod, which, whether it were the high priestly ephod containing the Urim and Thummim (so Jerome, Qu. Heb. in loc., and Jos. Ant. vi. xiv. 6) or a sacred image, was at all events a recognised method of 'inquiring of the Lord' (1 S 14¹⁸, LXX, RVm). In this way A. was able to continue to David (1 S 23⁹ 30⁷) the services rendered before by his father (1 S 22¹⁰). Dean Stanley mentions (Jewish Ch. Lect. 36) a Jewish tradition that the power of thus inquiring of the Lord expired with A.; and possibly in virtue of this power he is mentioned as one of David's counsellors (1 Ch 27³⁴).

In David's flight from Absalom we find A. loyal, and only prevented by David's request from sharing his master's exile; and his son Jonathan, with Ahimaaz, used to convey from the priests to the king secret intelligence of Absalom's plans. It is very doubtful if the words of Solomon, 'Thou barest the ark of the Lord God before David my father' (1 K 2²⁶), refer to the attempt made by Zadok and A. to carry the ark with David on his flight (Stanley), or to the commission given by David to Zadok and A. (1 Ch 15¹¹⁻¹⁵) to superintend the carrying of the ark by the Levites from the house of Obededom to Mt. Zion (Lord A. Hervey). On both these occasions A. is not so prominent as Zadok (see esp. 2 S 15²⁴⁻²⁵, where Grätz reads, 'A. went up' for 'stood still,' cf. Jos 3¹⁷). The reference is much more general, and alludes to the custom of the ark as the symbol of J^h's presence accompanying the host to battle (see, e.g., Nu 31⁶, Jos 6⁴, 1 S 4³, 2 S 11¹¹). The attempt made by Zadok and A. was an instance of this custom, and not a new departure; and David refuses to permit it, not because it was a violation of the sanctity of the ark, but as being himself unworthy to claim the special protection of J^h. It may here be noted that a conjecture has been made, that as Zadok ministered at the tabernacle at Gibeon (1 Ch 16³⁹), so A. may have been the custodian of the ark on Mt. Zion. On the defeat of Absalom, Zadok and A. smoothed the way for the king's restoration (2 S 19¹¹). A.'s loyalty did not, however, remain proof to the end; he united with Joab in lending his influence to the abortive insurrection of Adonijah. Both priest and chief captain were possibly actuated by jealousy, the one of Zadok, and the other of Benaiah. But while Joab was executed in accordance with David's dying instructions, A.'s life was spared in consideration of his old loyalty: 'So Solomon thrust out A. from being priest unto the Lord; that he might fulfil the word of the Lord which He spake concerning the house of Eli in Shiloh' (1 K 2²⁷).

With the deposition of A. the direct high priestly line of Eleazar came to an end. It is important to emphasize this, since it has been commonly held, on the authority of Chron. and Josephus, that the high priests, from Eli to A. inclusive, were of the line of Ithamar, and that the line of Eleazar was restored in the person of Zadok. Let us examine the evidence on which this statement rests.

The Chronicler mentions as priests in David's time, 'Zadok of the sons of Eleazar, and Ahimelech of the sons of Ithamar' (1 Ch 24³⁻³¹), this Ahimelech being son of A., according to v. 6. Now 'Ahimelech, son of A.' is quite unhistorical. In 2 S 15²⁷, 1 K 1⁴², Jonathan is son and representative of A.; and, moreover, A. did not lose the office of high priest until the reign of Solomon. The mistake originated in 2 S 8¹⁷, where, by a very ancient error, 'Ahimelech, son of A.' is joint priest with Zadok. The emendation, 'A., son of Ahimelech,' found in the Syr. version, is adopted by Gesenius, Wellhausen, and Driver, and may be regarded as certain. The Chronicler not only copies the mistake (1 Ch 18¹⁶), with the obvious blunder 'Ahimelech,' but treats this Ahimelech as a real personage. It is noteworthy that Josephus in his paraphrase of 1 Ch 24 (Ant. vii. 14. 7) mentions A., not Ahimelech, and yet he accepts (viii. 1. 3, v. 10. 4) the descent of A. from Ithamar, and further distinctly asserts that during the high priesthood of Eli and his successors the descendants of Eleazar were merely private individuals. The Chronicler, on the other hand, ignores Eli and his descendants, and in 1 Ch 6³⁻¹⁵, 50-53 gives what seems intended to be a list of high priests from Aaron to the Captivity in the line of Eleazar. Those who are familiar with the peculiar tendencies of the Chronicler will not think the suggestion unreasonable, that here we have an attempt both to vindicate the unbroken succession of the high priests of his own time, and to evade what he would have considered a stumbling-block in the earlier history. Thus, if A. were the lineal successor of Eleazar, would not his deposition be a breaking on God's part of the promise to Phinehas of an everlasting priesthood? (Nu 25¹³). Yet the unbiassed reader of 1 S 2³⁰ can scarcely fail to see a plain allusion to the promise to Phinehas, and a no less plain assertion that the promise was conditional: 'I said, indeed, that thy house, and the house of thy father, should walk before Me for ever; but now the Lord saith, Be it far from Me,' etc. These words cannot refer to the general promise to Aaron's family in Ex 29⁹, for God's purpose in that respect was not altered; the Aaronic descent of Zadok being undisputed. It is interesting to observe that the Chronicler does not say that Eli's family had usurped the high priesthood, as Josephus insinuates; and, indeed, such a usurpation could not have been passed over in silence in the earlier history had it ever occurred. The Chronicler, on the other hand, provides an explanation of another stumbling-block—the dual high priesthood of Zadok and A. in David's reign—by the statement with which 1 Ch 24 opens, that 'Eleazar and Ithamar executed the priests' office.' This seems an excellent precedent for a dual priesthood, but labours under two difficulties: first, that it is quite unsupported by the Pent. and Josh., in which Eleazar alone is high priest after Aaron's death; and, secondly, that although Zadok's name always comes first when the two are mentioned together, yet A. was the chief until the reign of Solomon, when Zadok was promoted to his place (1 K 2³⁵). It is remarkable, too, that the priests who serve in Ezekiel's ideal temple are always styled 'the sons of Zadok' (40⁴⁶ 43¹⁹ 44¹⁵ 48¹¹), as if they could claim no higher antiquity.

A. is mentioned in 1 K 4⁴ as still joint priest with Zadok; but this is probably a mistake, or may refer to the beginning of Solomon's reign, just as, in 2 S 23, Asahel and Uriah are enumerated among David's mighty men. There is a difficulty connected with the mention of A. in Mk 2²⁶ RV, where Christ is made to say that David ate the shewbread 'when A. was high priest,' ἐν ἡμέραις ἀρχιερέως, B, κ, Vulg. ('sub A. principe sacerdotum'). The words are omitted by D and some Old Latin MSS, while A, C, 1, 33 insert τοῦ before ἀρχιερέως, 'in the days of A. the high priest,' i.e. in his lifetime, but not necessarily during his high priesthood.

ABIDA (אָבִידָה 'my father had knowledge').—A son of Midian (Gn 25⁴ AV Abidah, 1 Ch 1³⁵).

ABIDAN (אָבִידָן 'father is judge') is a name that occurs only in P. According to this document, Abidan, son of Gideoni, of the tribe of Benjamin, was one of the twelve 'princes' who represented their respective tribes at the census and on certain other occasions, Nu 1¹¹ 2²² 7⁶⁰, 65 10²⁴.

ABIDE.—In AV and RV 'abide' is used both transitively and intransitively. 1. As a trans. verb in two senses: (a) to await, be in store for, as Ac 20²³ 'Bonds and afflictions abide me'; cf. Ps 37⁹ (Pr. Bk.) 'They that patiently abide the Lord.' (b) To withstand, endure, as Jer 10¹⁰ 'The nations shall not be able to abide His indignation'; Mal 3⁴ 'But who may abide the day of His coming?' Cf. 'They cannot abide to hear of altering,' Pref. to AV 1611; 'Nature cannot abide that any place should be empty,' H. Smith (1593), Serm. 97. 2. As an intrans. verb in three senses: (a) to continue in the place or in the state in which one now is, as Ac 27³¹ 'Except these abide in the ship'; Jn 12²⁴ 'Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground, and die, it abideth alone'; 1 Co 7⁴⁰ 'She is happier if she so abide'; 2 Mac 7¹⁷ 'abide a while, and behold his great power.' (b) To dwell, reside, as Lk 8²⁷ 'And wore no clothes, neither abode in any house, but in the tombs'; Ps 61⁴ 'I will abide (RV 'dwell') in Thy tabernacle for ever'; Jn 8³⁵ 'And the bond-servant abideth not in the house for ever: the son abideth for ever'; Jn 15⁵ 'He that abideth in Me, and I in him.' (c) To last, endure (esp. in the face of trial, cf. 1 (b), above), as 1 Co 3¹⁴ 'If any man's work abide'; Ps 119⁹⁰ 'Thou hast established the earth, and it abideth.' Abiding, as an adj., is used by RV, He 10³⁴ 'a better possession and an a. one,' and 13¹⁴ 'an a.

city'; as a noun it is found 1 Es 8⁸¹ 'they have given us a sure a. in Jewry.' J. HASTINGS.

ABIEL (אָבִיֵּל 'father is God').—1. Son of Zeror, of the tribe of Benj., was father of Kish and Ner, and consequently grandfather of Saul and Abner, 1 S 9¹ 14⁵¹. According to 1 Ch 8³³=9³⁹ Ner was father of Kish; in this case Abiel would have been great-grandfather of Saul. But the statement in Ch is an error, very possibly due to transcriptional causes; vid. Bertheau on 1 Ch 8³³. 2. The name of one of David's 'thirty men' (2 S 23³¹)=1 Ch 11³². The form (Abi-albon) under which this man's name now appears in the Heb. text of Samuel is due to textual corruption; Wellhausen (on 2 S 23³¹) supposes the original form to have been Abibaal; but there seems no sufficient reason to doubt the form (Abiel) preserved in Chron.; cf. Driver on 2 S 23³¹.

ABIEZER (אָבִיעֶזֶר 'father is help').—1. The name of a clan (קְהֵלָה Jos 17² (P or R); אֲבִיעֶזֶר Jg 6¹⁵) belonging to the tribe of Manasseh (Jg 6¹⁵). Consequently, in genealogical descriptions of the tribal relations, Abiezer appears as a son or descendant of Manasseh, Jos 17², 1 Ch 7¹⁸, Nu 26³⁰ (P); in this last passage the name is written Iezer, אִיעֶזֶר, LXX Ἰαχιάζερ). The most distinguished member of the clan was Gideon, who describes it (cf., however, Moore [Intern. Critical Commentary] on Jg 6¹⁵) as 'the poorest in Manasseh,' Jg 6¹⁵, cf. 8². In the time of Gideon the clan was settled at Ophrah of the Abiezrites (Jg 6²⁴, cf. v. 11), which perhaps lay near Shechem. In any case it would be unsafe, from P's statement that Abiezer was a son of Gilead (Nu 26³⁰; cf. 1 Ch 7¹⁸, but cf. Jos 17²), to infer that the clan was ever settled on the E. of Jordan; cf. Dillmann on Nu 26³⁰. 2. Abiezer the Anathothite, i.e. man of Anathoth in Benjamin (1 Ch 27¹²; cf. Jer 1¹), was one of David's heroes, 2 S 23²⁷=1 Ch 11²⁸. According to 1 Ch 27¹² he was the acting military officer of David's army in the 9th month. Abiezrite is the gentilic form.

ABIGAIL and (2 S 17²⁵ RV) Abigal (Heb. generally אָבִיגַיִל, 3 times אָבִיגַיִל, once each אָבִיגַיִל, אָבִיגַיִל 'father is joy,' or, perhaps, if the 'be not original, 'has rejoiced.'—1. The discreet and beautiful wife of Nabal the Carmelite. Hearing of her husband's dismissal of David's messengers, and refusal of their request, unknown to her husband she went to meet David with provisions for him and his men, and in this way so gained David's favour that he abandoned his intended raid on Nabal. Some ten days after, Nabal died, and subsequently Abigail became David's wife: this was after David's former wife, Michal, had been given to Palti, but apparently at about the same time that he also married Ahinoam the Jezreelitess. Together with Ahinoam, Abigail shared David's life at Gath, suffered captivity (from Ziklag) by the Amalekites, and was speedily rescued; later she lived with David at Hebron, and there bore a son, —Chileab (2 S 3²) or Daniel (1 Ch 3¹) by name, —1 S 25; also 27³⁰, 18 2 S 2² 3³, 1 Ch 3⁴.

2. A sister of Zeruah—and according to 1 Ch 2¹⁸ also of David—who through her union with Ithra the Ishmaelite (see art. ITHRA) became mother of Amasa. The words in 2 S 17²⁵ (וַתֵּלֶךְ, which assert that she was a daughter of Nahash, are probably an intrusion from v. 27 (וַתֵּלֶךְ בֶּן נַחַשׁ=the son of Nahash); cf. Wellhausen, l.c.

ABIHAIL (Heb. אָבִיהַיִל 'father is might').—According to the Massora the name is read אַבְיַיִל (with ה, not ח) in 1 Ch 2²⁹ 2 Ch 11¹⁸; but this is probably the result of a pre-Massoretic transcriptional error. 1. Mentioned only in Nu 3³⁵ (P) in the phrase 'Zuriel, son of Abihail' (see ZURIEL). 2. 'Wife' of Abishur, 1 Ch 2²⁹. 3. Daughter of Eliab, son of Jesse, and consequently a niece of David's. The only passage (2 Ch 11¹⁸) where she is mentioned is slightly corrupt; but, according to the most probable emendation, Abihail was the mother of Rehoboam's wife Mahalath. According to another interpretation, Abihail was wife of Rehoboam; but this is not the natural sense of the Heb. text, and is out of harmony with the context; vv. 19, 20 imply that only one wife has been mentioned. 4. In this case the name occurs only in 1 Ch 5¹⁴ in a Gadite genealogy; this Abihail was apparently a clan resident in Gilead. 5. Father of Esther, and uncle of Mordecai (Est 2¹⁵ 9²⁹). For the curious variant of LXX, which gives the regular LXX equivalent of Abinadab, it is difficult to account.

ABIHUD (אִיְהוּד 'my father is majesty').—A Benjamite, son of Bela (1 Ch 8³). See GENEALOGY.

ABIJAH (אִיְיָה 'Jah is my father').—1. King of Judah (2 Ch 13^{20, 21}). He is called Abijam (Vulg. Abiam), 1 K 14³¹ 15^{7, 8}. Nestle explains this as equivalent to אֲבִיָּה 'father of the people'; but since Abijah is read by thirteen of Kennicott's and de Rossi's MSS, supported by the LXX Ἀβιάου, Abijam is probably a mistake. As being the eldest son of Maacah, the favourite wife of Rehoboam, his father appointed him 'to be chief, even the prince among his brethren; for he was minded to make him king' (2 Ch 11²²). His mother's name is variously given as Maacah the daughter of Abishalom (1 K 15²) (Absalom, 2 Ch 11^{20, 21}), or Micaiah the daughter of Uriel of Gibeah (2 Ch 13³). See MAACAH. He reigned about two years, from the eighteenth to the twentieth year of Jeroboam. There is probably no reign the accounts of which in Kings and Chronicles are so discrepant as that of Abijah. In Kings there is nothing related of him except that 'he walked in all the sins of his father,' and that 'there was war between Abijam and Jeroboam'; and, in the history of Asa, an incidental allusion to 'things that Abijah had dedicated' for the temple. In fact, as in the case of Jehoram (2 K 8¹⁸), he was spared by God merely on account of the divine promise to David. But in Chronicles not only is there much additional historical matter, but Abijah seems to be a great and good man, and he is made the utterer of a sort of manifesto of the theocratic principles of Judah. The desultory warfare implied in Kings becomes in Chronicles one decisive pitched battle fought in the territory of Ephraim, in which Abijah's army of 400,000 slay 500,000 out of the 800,000 marshalled by Jeroboam. The battle is preceded by an oration spoken on Mt. Zemaraim by Abijah. After strongly affirming the divine right of the Davidic line, he dwells on the previous impiety of Jeroboam's rebellion against Rehoboam when the latter 'was young and tender-hearted, and could not withstand them; and now ye think to withstand the kingdom of the Lord in the hands of the sons of David.' The gods and priests of Judah and Israel are sharply contrasted: 'Whosoever cometh to consecrate himself with a young bullock and seven rams, the same may be a priest of them that are no gods.' The ceremonial of the daily worship at Jerusalem is minutely described, and the loyalty of Judah to J^h is twice affirmed. The battle which follows reads like an echo of the heroic age of Israel. 'Jeroboam caused an ambushment to come about behind them. . . the priests sounded with the trumpets (cf. Nu 10⁹ 31⁶, Jos 6¹⁸), then the men of Judah gave a shout (cf. Jos 6²⁰); and as the men of Judah shouted, it came to pass that God smote Jeroboam and all Israel.' Three cities of Israel were taken: Bethel, Jeshanah, and Ephron. The last two are otherwise unknown, unless Ephron or Ephraim (RVm) be the same as Ephraim (2 S 13²³, Jn 11⁵⁴). Bethel must soon have been recovered by Baasha (2 Ch 16¹). After this we are told that Abijah 'waxed mighty, and took unto himself fourteen wives.' Presumably most of his thirty-eight children were born before he came to the throne. The Chronicler mentions as his authority for this reign the commentary (Midrash) of the prophet Iddo, who was also one of the biographers of Rehoboam.

2. Samuel's second son, who with his brother Joel judged at Beersheba (1 S 8³). Their corrupt administration of justice was one of the reasons alleged by the elders of Israel in justification of their demand for a king. The RV retains the spelling Abiah in 1 Ch 6²⁸.

3. A son of Jeroboam I, who died in childhood. His mother having gone disguised to the prophet Ahijah to inquire if he should recover, received the heavy tidings of the future annihilation of the house of Jeroboam, and of the immediate death of her child, 'taken away from the evil to come': 'And all Israel shall mourn for him, and bury him; for he only of Jeroboam shall come to the grave, because in him there is found some good thing toward the LORD the God of Israel in the house of Jeroboam' (1 K 14¹³).

4. 1 Ch 24¹⁰. One of the 'heads of fathers' houses' of the sons of Eleazar, who gave his name to the 8th of the 24 courses of priests, the arrangement of whom is ascribed to David (1 Ch 24³, 2 Ch 8¹⁴). To this course Zacharias, the father of John the Baptist, belonged (Lk 1⁵). It is probable that this clan, and not an individual, is indicated in the lists of priests who 'went up with Zerubbabel' (Neh 12⁴). LXX omits this and other names in Neh 12 (they are supplied by * * *), and in the list of priests who 'sealed unto the covenant' in the time of Nehemiah (10⁷) (Ἀβιά, B, *). Of the 21 names in Neh 10, 13 occur in nearly the same order in a list of 22 in ch. 12, while three others are very similar; and of the names in these two lists 9 are found in the names of David's courses. On the other hand, 'the book of the genealogy of them that came up at the first' (Neh 7, Ezr 2) mentions only four families of priests, nor do there seem to have been more in the time of Ezr (10¹⁸⁻²²).

5. A son of Becher, son of Benjamin, 1 Ch 7⁸.

6. RV retains 'Abiah,' 1 Ch 2²⁴. Wife of Hezron, eldest son of Perez, son of Judah. She was probably daughter of Machir (2²¹).

7. Wife of Ahaz, and mother of Hezekiah (2 Ch 29¹), named Abi, 2 K 18². Her father Zechariah is possibly mentioned in Is 8².

ABILENE (Ἀβιλήνη), Lk 3¹.—A tetrarchy about A. D. 26 in Syria (Jos. Ant. xviii. vi. 10, XIX. v. 1, XX. vii. 1; Wars, II. xi. 5), the cap. being at Abila on the N. slope of Hermon. The ruins of Abila surround a small village on the right bank of the river at Sāḥ Wādī Barada, 'the market of the valley of the Abana River.' The name has given rise to a local tradition (based on the Koran) that Cain here buried Abel, whose tomb is shown at a large tank cut in the rock on the top of a cliff to the south. It is also preserved in the Latin text of Lucius Verus, on the N. side of the rock-cut passage of the Rom. road W. of the town. The region of Abilene is also noticed in a Gr. text found in 1873 at Burkush on Hermon, showing that the district included the Antilebanon and Hermon, N.W. of Damascus. There is a cemetery at Abila of Rom. rock-cut tombs on the left of the stream, which here forms a cascade. They are adorned with bas-relief busts, and there are several tombstones with Gr. texts, giving the names of Lucius, Archelaus, Phedistus, Antonia, and Philander. N. of the river and E. of the town are foundations of a small Rom. temple.

ABILITY.—Both in OT and NT ability occurs in two senses, which must be distinguished. 1. It signifies material capacity, resources, wealth, as Ezr 2⁶⁹ 'They gave after their a. (Heb. 'acc. as his hand may reach') into the treasury'; Lv 27⁸ 'According to the a. of him that vowed shall the priest value him.' Cf. LXX of Lv 25^{26, 49} with Ac 11²⁹ below; and

'Out of my lean and low ability
I'll lend you something.'
—Shakespeare, T. N. iii. 4.

This is the meaning also of Ac 11²⁹ 'Then the disciples, every man according to his a., determined to send relief unto the brethren,' though the original is a verb, καθὼς εὐποροῦντο τῆς, meaning 'acc. as each prospered.' 2. It signifies personal capacity, strength of body or of mind. Thus Dn 1⁴ 'Such as had a. (ἡς) in them to stand in the king's palace'; Mt 25¹⁵ 'He gave talents . . . to every man according to his several a. (δύναμις)'. So Wis 13⁹, Sir 3³ AVm. In modern Eng. a. is almost confined to mental capacity, though one hears it locally used of physical strength. In the sense of wealth the latest example found is in Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield.

ABIMAEL (אֲבִימָאֵל, perhaps = 'father is God,' but the force of the ם is uncertain) was one of the Joktanids or (S.) Arabians (see art. JOKTAN), Gn 10²⁸ (J), 1 Ch 1²². Nothing further is known of this tribe, but it is noteworthy that another name of the same peculiar formation, viz. אַבְמַכְעֶר, has been found on the S. Arabian inscriptions; see D. H. Müller in ZDMG 1883, p. 18.

ABIMELECH (אַבִּימֶלֶךְ 'Melech [Malki or Molech] is father').—1. A king of Gerar mentioned in connexion with the history of Abraham, Gn 20¹⁻¹⁷ 21²²⁻³² (both E), and of Isaac, Gn 26^{7-11, 26-33} (both J). With all their points of difference, it appears impossible to resist the conclusion that we have in J and E two variants of the same story. In both the patriarch resorts to the same method of defence to protect himself from the same danger (20² 26⁷); in both A. is righteously indignant at the deceit practised upon him (20^{9, 17}, 26¹⁰); in both a treaty is entered into with A. (21^{22, 26}, 26²⁸); in both Phicol (21²² 26²⁶) and Beersheba (21³² 26³³) are mentioned. In all probability J has preserved the earlier form of the tradition, acc. to which Isaac, and not Abraham, was the patriarch concerned. The parallel story in Gn 12¹⁰⁻²⁰ (where Pharaoh of Egypt takes the place of A. of Gerar) is also from a Jahwistic source, but scarcely from the same pen as 26⁷⁻¹¹. If the title J¹ be adopted for the latter, we may designate the other J², whether we accept or not of Kuenen's theory that he edited a Judean recension of J.

2. A king of Gath acc. to title of Ps 34¹. Here A. is possibly a mistake for Achish (cf. 1 S 21¹²), a better known Phil. name being substituted for a less familiar one, or it may be that Abimelech is less a personal name than a title of Phil. kings like Egypt. Pharaoh (see Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v.).

3. This A. is generally reckoned one of the judges (so in Jg 10¹, but probably not by editor of 9 nor in 1 S 12¹¹). Acc. to Jg 8³¹ (R) he was a son of Gideon by a Shechemite concubine. Upon his father's death he gained over 'his mother's brethren' in Shechem, and with the aid of a hired troop of 'vain and light fellows' murdered all his 70 brothers except the youngest, Jotham, who contrived to escape. A. then ascended the throne and assumed the kingly title (9¹⁻⁹). Jotham, leaving his place of concealment, spoke at Mt. Gerizim his well-known parable (vv. 7-21), which was calculated to sow dissension amongst the Shechemites, who were partly of Can. and partly of Isr. blood. After three years both sections were weary of the rule of A., who seems to have taken up his residence elsewhere (vv. 22-25). Gaal, the leader of the Israelite faction (see, however, Moore on Jg 9²⁸), made such headway in Shechem that Zebul, the governor, an adherent of A., was obliged to feign compliance with his designs. All the while, however, he was keeping A. secretly informed of the revolutionary movement, and suggesting methods of checking it (vv. 26-33). At length A. advanced to attack the city, and Gaal was completely routed, and after his defeat expelled by Zebul (vv. 34-41). In a second day's fight A. captured Shechem and put to the sword all the inhabitants that fell into his hands. A number having taken refuge in the temple of El-berith, he burned the building over their heads (vv. 42-49). Sometime afterwards A. met his death while besieging Thebez. Being struck down by a millstone which a woman flung from the wall, he ordered his armour-bearer to kill him in order to escape the disgrace of perishing by the hand of a woman (vv. 50-57).

The above is a reasonable and in general self-consistent narrative, but there are not a few points of detail where the course of events is involved in considerable obscurity. Zebul upon any theory plays a double part, but it is not quite certain whether there was to the last a complete understanding between him and A. Kittel thinks there was, and supposes that Z. was put to death by the Shechemites after they discovered his treachery. Wellhausen, on the contrary, believes that he perished along with the Shechemites, A. having come to regard him as the real instigator of the revolt, and refusing to be propitiated by the offering of Gaal as a scape-goat. It is further doubtful whether A. himself acted in the interests of the Can. or of the Isr., but at all events Wellhausen rightly remarks that 'the one permanent fruit of his activity was that Shechem was destroyed as a Can. city and rebuilt for Israel' (cf. 1 K 12¹⁻²⁵).

The story of A. in Jg 9 is the natural sequel of the version of Gideon's hist. contained in 8⁴⁻²⁷ (note also how the sentiments of Jotham's parable agree with 8^{22, 23}, unless, indeed, these latter two verses are an 8th cent. interpolation). The narrative is one of the oldest in OT, belonging to the same type as the narratives concerning the minor judges. It is free from Deuter. touches and turns of expression, and may in its present form date from the earliest years of the monarchy. Its purpose is to show how the murder of Gideon's sons was avenged on A. and the Shechemites, who were practically his accomplices (9⁷, cf. vv. 7, 16-24). Budde attributes the preservation of the story to E, who, however, himself composed the Jotham parable. Moore considers that it is possible to disentangle two narratives, (A) vv. 22-25, 42-45, 56¹, cognate with which are vv. 1-21, (B) vv. 26-41. The first of these he would assign to E, the second to J. This scheme has the advantage of removing a good many difficulties presented by the chapter in its present form.

4. A priest, the son of Abiathar, acc. to 1 Ch 18¹⁶, where, however, the reading of MT. ABINADAB (אֲבִינָדָב 'father is generous'; LXX always Ἀμεινάδαβ (A' Αμεινάδαβ), except at 1 S 31², where B (but not A) reads Ἰωνάδαβ).—1. Owner of the house whither the ark was brought by the men of Kirjath-jearim after the catastrophe at Beth-Shemesh (1 S 7¹), whence it was subsequently removed by David, 2 S 6³⁶, 1 Ch 13⁷. During its stay here it was kept by Eleazar, son of Abinadab. 2. The second son of Jesse, specially mentioned in the narrative of 1 S 16 as not being the elect of J' for the kingdom. He accompanied his brothers Eliab and Shammah to join Saul's army against the Philistines—1 S 16⁸ 17¹², 1 Ch 2¹³. 3. A son of Saul slain in the battle of Mt. Gilboa, 1 S 31²=1 Ch 10². Otherwise mentioned only in the genealogies of Chronicles, 1 Ch 8³³ 9³⁹. But cf. art. ISHVI. 4. On Abinadab in 1 K 4¹¹ (AV, not RV), see BEN-ABINADAB.

ABINOAM (אֲבִינוֹאָם 'father is pleasantness'), the father of Barak, is mentioned both in the song (Jg 5¹²) and the prose narrative (Jg 4⁶ 12) of the campaign of Barak and Deborah against the Canaanites.

ABIRAM (אֲבִירָאָם 'my father is the Exalted One').—1. The son of Eliab, a Reubenite, who with Dathan (which see) conspired against Moses (Nu 16¹ etc., Dt 11⁶, Ps 106¹⁷). 2. The firstborn son of Hiel the Bethelite, on whom the curse fell for rebuilding Jericho (1 K 16³⁴).

ABISHAG (אֲבִישָׁג, meaning uncertain; possibly 'father has wandered').—A very beautiful young Shunammite who was brought to comfort David in his extreme old age, according to the advice of his servants, 1 K 1^{2ff.} 15. After David's death, Abishag, as his father's widow, was asked in marriage by Adonijah; the request was refused by Solomon, who appears to have seen in it a renewal of Adonijah's claim to the throne, 1 K 2¹²⁻²⁴; cf. W. R. Smith, Kinship and Marriage, p. 89 f.

ABISHAI (אֲבִישַׁי, but אֲבִישַׁי 2 S 10¹⁶, 1 Ch 2¹⁶ 11²⁰ 18¹² 19¹¹ 15 'My father is Jesse').—A. appears from 1 Ch 2¹⁶ to have been the eldest son of Zeruah, David's sister. More impetuous than the crafty Joab, but equally implacable, 'hard' (2 S 3³⁹ 19²²), the first mention of Abishai (1 S 26⁶) presents him to us as already one of the most daring and devoted of David's followers. He volunteers to go down with David to Saul's camp by night, and is only prevented by David's veneration for the king's sacred office from smiting Saul 'to the earth at one stroke.' We next find him (2 S 2¹⁸ 24) with his two brothers at that battle of Gibeon which had such fatal results, first to Asahel, and ultimately to Abner, in whose treacherous murder by Joab, Abishai shared as joint avenger of blood (2 S 3³⁰ 39). The victory in the Valley of Salt over Edom (cf. 2 K 14⁷), which is ascribed to David in 2 S 8¹³ (Syrians), and to Joab in Ps 60 title (1 K 11¹⁵ 16), is attributed to Abishai in 1 Ch 18¹². In the war that was caused by Hanun's insult to David's envoys, Joab gave Abishai command of the second division against the Ammonites, while he himself opposed the Syrians (2 S 10¹⁰ 14). Abishai's character is well brought out in the story of David's flight, when he retorts the abuse of Shimei in true Oriental style, and is impatient to slay the offender at once (2 S 16⁹⁻¹¹). Nor could Shimei's subsequent abject submission induce Abishai to forgive the man that had 'cursed the Lord's anointed' (19²¹). In the battle with Absalom, Abishai shared the command of David's army with Joab and Ittai (18² 5, 12). In 2 S 20⁶ the name Joab should probably be substituted for that of Abishai (so Jos. Ant. VII. xi. 6, the Syr. vers., Wellhausen, Thénius, and Driver), and v. 7 read as in the LXX: 'And there went out after him Abishai and Joab's men,' etc. It is natural to suppose that Abishai connived at the murder of Amasa by Joab, 2 S 20¹⁰ (so Josephus). His special exploits were, rescuing David from Ishbi-benob, 2 S 21¹⁷, and slaying three hundred men, 23¹⁸. These feats earned for him the first place 'of the three in the second rank' (1 Ch 11²¹, RVm), the other two being probably Joab and Benaiah; the first three being Jashobeam, Eleazar, and Shammah.

Abishai probably died before the rebellion of Adonijah. If he had been alive, he must have been mentioned among the leaders of either side.

ABISHUA (אֲבִישׁוּא, meaning uncertain; perhaps 'father is wealth'.—1. According to the genealogies of Chron., where alone the name occurs, son of Phinehas and father of Bukki, 1 Ch 6⁴⁴ 50, Ezr 7⁵; cf. 1 Es 8² and art. ABISUE. 2. A Benjamite; presumably the name was that of a clan, since other names in the context are certainly clan names, 1 Ch 8⁴; cf. Nu 26^{38ff.}

ABISHUR (אֲבִישׁוּר 'father is a wall').—A Jerahmeelite described as 'son' of Shammai; Abihail was his wife, and Ahban and Molid his children (1 Ch 2^{22ff.}).

ABISSEI (AV Abisei).—One of the ancestors of Ezra (2 Es 1²), called in 1 Ch 6⁴ ABISHUA, and in 1 Es 8² ABISUE.

ABISUE (LXX, B Ἀβισουα, A Ἀβισουα) 1 Es 8², AV Abisum, is identical with Abishua.

ABITAL (אֲבִיטָל 'father is dew'), wife of David, to whom, during his residence in Hebron, she bore Shephatiah, 2 S 3⁴=1 Ch 3³.

ABITUB (אֲבִיטוּב), 1 Ch 8¹¹, and ABIUD (Ἀβιούδ), Mt 1¹³. See GENEALOGY.

ABJECT, now only an adj., was formerly also a subst. and a verb. As a subst., meaning the dregs of the people, abject is found in Ps 35¹⁵ 'The abjects (אֲבִיטִים, RVm 'smiters') gathered themselves together against me.' Cf. T. Bentley (1582), 'O Almighty God: which raisest up the abjects, and exaltest the miserable from the dunghill,' Monu. Matr. iii. 328; G. Herbert, 'Servants and abjects flout me,' Temple: Sacrifice, 36.

J. HASTINGS.

ABNER, אֲבִנֵר, אֲבִנֵר 1 S 14⁵⁰, 'my father is Ner,' or 'is a lamp.' Saul's first cousin, according to 1 S 14⁵⁰ 51 (the more probable account).

but uncle according to 1 Ch 8²⁹⁻³³ 9³⁵⁻³⁹. Jos. follows Chronicles in Ant. VI. iv. 3, but Samuel in VI. vi. 6. The language used of him by David, 'Art not thou a valiant man, and who is like to thee in Israel?' (1 S 26¹⁵); 'Know ye not that there is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel?' (2 S 3³⁸), is not inconsistent with the recorded facts of Abner's life, although the one speech was uttered in a tone of banter, and the other possibly dictated by motives of policy. As captain of the host (1 S 14⁵⁰ 17⁵⁵), Abner sat next Saul at the banquet (1 S 20²⁵), and lay near him in the camp (26⁵⁻⁷). A Jewish tradition (Jerome, Qu. Heb. in loc.) states that the witch of Endor was Abner's mother. On Saul's death Abner secured for Ishbosheth the allegiance of all the tribes except Judah (2 S 2⁸⁻¹⁰). He placed the feeble king at Mahanaim, while he himself conducted the war with David west of Jordan. One of the battles—that of the pool of Gibeon—is detailed on account of its fatal results. Here we have evidence of Abner's comparative mildness of character. It is possible that the preliminary encounter of the champions of the two armies was suggested by him in order to decide the claims of the rival houses without unnecessary bloodshed. Then we have his reiterated reluctance to slay Asahel, and, finally, his protest against the unnaturalness of the war: 'Shall the sword devour for ever? . . . How long shall it be ere thou bid the people return from following their brethren?'

As the war proceeded in David's favour 'Abner made himself strong in the house of Saul' (2 S 3³). This rendering lends some plausibility to Ishbosheth's insinuation that he was aiming at the crown by a liaison with the late king's concubine (cf. 2 S 12⁸ 16²¹, 1 K 2¹³⁻²⁵). The indignation, however, with which Abner repelled the charge, and the absence of self-seeking in his subsequent conduct, support the paraphrase of AV and RVm, 'showed himself strong for (2) the house of Saul.'

Be that as it may, the accusation alienated Abner, who forthwith declared that he would accomplish J's will by making David king over all Israel. He entered at once into negotiations both with David and the elders of Israel and Benjamin. David, on his part, astutely demanded as a preliminary the restitution of Michal, who would be at once a link with the house of Saul and a living memorial of David's early prowess. Ishbosheth's shadowy authority was made use of to carry out this condition. Abner was now hospitably entertained by David at Hebron, and had scarcely departed to fulfil his engagements to David when Joab returned from a foray. Asahel's death was still unavenged; here was a plausible pretext for ridding himself of a dangerous rival; so Joab secretly recalled Abner, and with the connivance of Abishai treacherously murdered him in the gate of Hebron, a city of refuge. The enormity of this crime called forth from David a bitter curse (2 S 3²⁹) on the perpetrator, and was never forgotten by him (1 K 2³⁵⁻³²). Abner was buried in Hebron, amidst the lamentations of the nation. The king himself acted as chief mourner, and honoured the dead warrior with an elegy which pithily expresses the strange irony of fate by which the princely Abner died a death suitable to a profane and worthless man. (Heb. 'was A. to die [i.e. ought he to have died] as Nabal dieth?') The dismay caused by Abner's death (2 S 4¹) seems to prove that neither Ishbosheth nor his subjects in general had realised Abner's defection. The inevitable crisis was hastened, and by a curious chance the head of the murdered Ishbosheth was buried in Abner's grave (2 S 4¹²). We learn from the Chronicler that Abner dedicated certain spoil for the repairs of the tabernacle (1 Ch 26²⁸), and that his son Jaasiel was captain of Benjamin in David's reign (1 Ch 27²¹).

ABODE.—1. The past tense of ABIDE (which see). 2. In Jn 14²³ ('We will come unto him, and make our abode with him') a. is tr. of the same word (μωνῆ) which in Jn 14² is rendered MANSION (which see). J. HASTINGS.

ABOMINATION.—Four separate Heb. words are thus rendered in OT (sometimes with the variation abominable thing), the application of which is in many respects very different. (1) The commonest of these words is נִבְזָה, which expresses most generally the idea of something loathed (cf. the verb, Mic 3⁹), esp. on religious grounds: thus Gn 43³² 'to eat food with the Hebrews is an abomination to the Egyptians,'—a strong expression of the exclusiveness with which the Egyptians viewed foreigners, esp. such as had no regard for their religious scruples; thus, on account of their veneration for the cow (which was sacred to Isis), they would not use the knife or cooking utensil of a Greek, which might have been employed in preparing the flesh of a cow as food (Hdt. ii. 41); Gn 46³⁴ 'every shepherd is an abomination to the Egyptians,'—shepherds, viz., were ranked, it seems, with the βουκόλοι, whose occupation was deemed a degrading one, who from living with their herds in reed cottages on the marshes were called marshmen, and who are depicted on the monuments as dirty, unshaven, poorly clad, and even as dwarfs and deformed (cf. Del. ad loc.; Birch-Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. 1878, i. 288 f., ii. 444; Wiedemann, Herodotus zweites Buch, 1890, p. 371 f.; Erman, Life in Anc. Eg. p. 439); Ex 8²² (26) the Israelites are represented as unwilling to sacrifice 'the abomination of the Egyptians' in Egypt itself, with allusion, probably, to animals which the Egyptians abstained religiously from sacrificing, though they were sacrificed freely by the Hebrews, as the cow, which was sacred to Isis, the bull, unless it was pronounced by the priests to be καθαρὸς, or free from the sacred marks of Apis (Herodotus' statements on this point are not entirely borne out by the monuments, but there seems to be some foundation for them), sheep at Thebes, and goats [according to Wiedemann, an error for rams] in Mendes (Hdt. ii. 38, 41, 42, 46; cf. Birch-Wilk. ii. 460, iii. 108 f., 304 f.; Wiedemann, l.c. pp. 180-182, 183, 187 f., 196 f., 218 f.).

Two special usages may be noted: (a) the phrase Jehovah's abomination, of idolatry or practices connected with it, or of characters or acts morally displeasing to God, Dt 7²⁵ 12³¹ 17¹ 18¹² 22⁵ 23¹⁹ (18) 25¹⁵ 27¹⁵ (cf. 24⁴, Lk 16¹⁵), Pr 3³² 11²⁰ 12²² 15⁸ 9²⁵ 16⁵ 17¹⁵ 20¹⁰ 23 (comp. in a Phoen. inscription, ap. Driver, Samuel, p. xxvi, the expression 'Ash-toreth's abomination,' of the violation of a tomb); (b) esp. in the plur., of heathen or immoral practices, principally in H and Ezk, as Lv 18²² 26²⁷ 29³⁰ 20¹³, Dt 13¹⁵ (14) 17⁴ 18⁹ 12 20¹⁸, Jer 7¹⁰ 32²⁵, 1 K 14²⁴, 2 K 16³ 21²⁻¹¹, Ezk 5⁹ 11 7⁵ 4. 8. 9 8⁶ 13. 15 etc. (43 times in Ezk), rarely of an actual idol, 2 K 23¹⁵ (of Milcom), Is 44¹⁹, and perhaps Dt 32¹⁶.

(2) נִבְזָה, the technical term for stale sacrificial flesh, which has not been eaten within the prescribed time, only Lv 7¹⁸ 19⁷, Ezk 4¹⁴ (where the prophet protests that he has never partaken of it), and (plur.) Is 65⁴. For distinction this might be rendered refuse meat; the force of the allusion in Ezk 4¹⁴, Is 65⁴, in particular, is entirely lost by the rendering 'abominable thing' of AV, RV.

(3) נִבְזָה, the technical term for the flesh of prohibited animals (see article UNCLEAN), Lv 7²¹ 11¹⁰⁻¹³ 20. 23. 41. 42 (cf. the corresponding verb, v. 11. 13. 42 20²⁵); this sense of the word gives the point to Ezk 8¹⁰, Is 66¹⁷. נִבְזָה would be best represented by detestation, or detestable thing (cf. detest for the verb, Dt 7²⁰). Note that in Dt 14³ abomination is אַבְוֹנָה, not the technical רָצוֹן used in Lv 11.

(4) רָצוֹן, allied in etymology to (3), but in usage confined almost exclusively to objects connected with idolatry, and chiefly a contemptuous designation of heathen deities themselves: first in Hos 9¹⁰ 'and became detestations like that which they loved' (Baal of Peor, named just before); more frequently in writers of the age of Jer and Ezk, viz. Dt 29¹⁶ (17), Jer 4¹ 7³⁰ (= 32³⁴) 13²⁷ 16¹⁸, Ezk 5¹¹ 7²⁰ 11^{18, 21} 20⁷. s. 30 37²³, 1 K 11⁵ 'Milcom the detestation of the Ammonites,' v. 7-7, 2 K 23^{13, 18} (not of Milcom), v. 24; also Is 66³, Zec 9⁷. In AV, RV, where this word occurs beside אַבְוֹנָה (No. 1), as Ezk 5¹¹ 7²⁰ (and Ezk 37²³, even where it stands alone), it is rendered for distinction detestable thing; and either this or detestation would be the most suitable Eng. equivalent for it. ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION, THE (τὸ βδέλυγμα τῆς ἐρημώσεως), Mt 24¹⁵, Mk 13¹⁴, 'spoken of by Daniel the prophet, the appearance of which, 'standing ἐν τόπω ἁγίῳ (Mt), or δπου οὐ δεῖ (Mk), is mentioned by Christ as the signal for the flight of Christians from Judæa, at the time of the approaching destruction of Jerus. The Gr. phrase is borrowed from Dn 9²⁷ LXX βδέλυγμα τῶν ἐρημώσεων (so Theod.), 11³¹ LXX βδέλυγμα ἐρημώσεως (Theod. βδ. ἠφανισμένου), 12¹¹ LXX τὸ βδέλυγμα τῆς ἐρημώσεως (Theod. βδ. ἐρ.); cf. 8¹³ (LXX, Theod.) ἡ ἀμαρτία ἐρημώσεως. The Heb. in the first of these passages is אַבְוֹנָה אֲרָצוֹן, in the second רָצוֹן אַבְוֹנָה, in the third אַבְוֹנָה רָצוֹן, in the last אַבְוֹנָה רָצוֹן. רָצוֹן is the word explained under ABOMINATION (4), as being often the contemptuous designation of a heathen god or idol. אַבְוֹנָה and אַבְוֹנָה are, however, difficult. אַבְוֹנָה elsewhere (only Ezr 9^{3, 4}) means horrified; אַבְוֹנָה means usually desolate (as La 1^{4, 16}), though it might also (as ptc. of אַבְוֹנָה, Ezk 26¹⁶ 27³⁰ al.) mean horrified as well; in Dn, however (supposing the text to be sound), the exigencies of the sense have obliged many commentators to suppose that the Poel conjug. has a trans. force; hence RV 9²⁷ 'one that maketh desolate'; 11³¹ 'and they shall profane the sanctuary, even the fortress, and shall take away the continual burnt-offering, and they shall set up the abomination that maketh desolate'; 12¹¹ 'from the time that the continual burnt-offering shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up'; so 8¹³ אַבְוֹנָה רָצוֹן 'the transgression that maketh desolate' (the form אַבְוֹנָה might just be a ptc. Poel with the ו dropped; Ges.-K. §§ 55 R. 1, 52. 2 R. 6). In spite, however, of the uncertainty as regards אַבְוֹנָה (or אַבְוֹנָה), the general sense of 11³¹ and 12¹¹ is clear. Dn 11³¹⁻⁴⁵ deals with the history of Antiochus Epiphanes, and v. 31 refers to the desecration of the temple by the troops of Antiochus, the subsequent suspension of the daily burnt-offering and other religious services (which lasted for three years), and to the erection on 15 Chislew, B.C. 168, of a small idol-altar (βωμός) upon the Altar of burnt-offering (1 Mac 1³⁵⁻⁵⁹). 12¹¹ (like 8¹³) is another reference to the same events. It is remarkable, now, that in 1 Mac 1³⁴ the idol-altar is called by exactly the same name that is used in the Bk. of Dn—φκοδμησαν βδέλυγμα ἐρημώσεως ἐπὶ τὸ θυσιαστήριον (cf. 6⁷). Dn 9²⁷ is very difficult: but, as the reference in NT is rather to 11³¹ and 12¹¹, it need not here be further considered; LXX, Theod., however, it may be noted, have καὶ ἐπὶ τὸ ἱερόν βδέλυγμα τῶν ἐρημώσεων. Of the perplexing expression אַבְוֹנָה רָצוֹן, now, a clever and plausible explanation has been suggested by Nestle (ZATW 1884, p. 248; cf. Cheyne, Origin of the Psalter, p. 105; Bevan, Dan. p. 193), viz. that it is a contemptuous allusion to אַבְוֹנָה בַּל Baal of heaven, a title found often in Phœn. and (with אַבְוֹנָה for אַבְוֹנָה) Aram. inscriptions, and the Sem. equivalent of the Gr. Ζεὺς: according to 2 Mac 6³ Antiochus desired to make the temple a sanctuary of Ζεὺς 'Ολύμπιος,—as his coins show (Nestle, Marginalien, p. 42, who cites Babelon, Les Rois de Syrie, pp. xiv, xlviii), his patron deity,—who in the Syr. vers. of the same passage is actually called אַבְוֹנָה בַּל Baal of heaven. Upon this view, we are released from the necessity of searching for a meaning of אַבְוֹנָה in exact accordance with the context; the βωμός (with, possibly, an image connected with it) erected by the Syrians upon the Altar of burnt-offering was termed derisively by the Jews the 'desolate abomination,' the 'abomination' being the altar (and image?) of Zeus (Baal), and 'desolate' (shōmēm) being just a punning variation of 'heaven' (shāmaim). The Gr. trs. of Dn and 1 Mac, in so far as they supposed the expression to mean βδέλυγμα ἐρημώσεως, no doubt understood the idolatrous emblem to involve, by its erection, the desertion of the temple by its usual worshippers, and ultimately its actual 'desolation' (see 1 Mac 4³⁸). 11³¹ and 8¹³ (the subst. with the art., the ptc. without it), and still more (if, as is probable, the reference be to the same idolatrous emblem) 9²⁷ (the subst. plur., the ptc. sing.), are grammatically difficult; but the text in these passages is perhaps not in its original form (cf. Bevan).

As to the meaning of the expression in the prophecy of Christ, it is very difficult to speak with confidence. It would be most naturally understood (cf. Spitta, Offenb. des Joh. 493-496) of some desecrating emblem, similar in general character to the altar or image erected by Antiochus, and of which that might be regarded as the prototype: but nothing exactly corresponding to this is recorded by history; the order which Caligula issued for the erection in the temple of a statue of himself, to which divine honours were to be paid, being not enforced (Jos. Ant. XVIII. viii. 8). The three most usual explanations are—(1) the Rom. standards, to which sacrifices were offered by the Rom. soldiers in the temple, after it had been entered by Titus (Jos. BJ vi. vi. 1); (2) the desecration of the temple by the Zealots, who seized it and made it their stronghold, shortly before the city was invested by Titus (ib. iv. iii. 6-8, cf. vi. 3 end); (3) the desolation of the temple-site by the heathen, at the time of its capture by Titus (so Meyer). The term standing (which points to some concrete object) is a serious objection to the second and third of these explanations; it is some objection, though not perhaps a fatal one, to the first, that it places the signal for flight at the very last stage of the enemy's successes, when even the dwellers in Judæa (in view of whom the words are spoken) would seem no longer to need the warning. The erection of the imperial statue in the Temple was, however, only averted in the first instance by the earnest representations of the procurator Petronius and of King Agrippa I., and afterwards by Caligula's own untimely death (Schürer, HJP i. ii. 99 f.); the emperor's order caused great alarm among the Jews, who even after his death (A.D. 41) continued to fear lest one of his successors should revive and enforce it (Pfleiderer, Das Urchrist. pp. 403-407; Mommsen, Provinces, ii. 196 ff., 203 ff.); hence (as even the first explanation mentioned above leaves something to be desired) it may not be an unreasonable conjecture * that the language of the original prophecy was more general, and that, during the years of agitation and tension which preceded the final struggle of A.D. 70, it was modified so as to give more definite expression to such apprehensions; the masc.

ἐστηκότα, which in Mk 13¹⁴ is the best reading (* BL; so RV, 'standing where he ought not'), would also lend itself more readily to this explanation than to any of those previously mentioned.* The supposition (Weiss) that the army of the heathen Romans is referred to, involves an unnatural application, both of the expression 'abomination of desolation,' and of the verb 'standing.' In the parallel passage of Lk (21²⁰) the phraseology of the earlier synoptists seems to have been not only (as in so many other cases) re-cast, but also coloured by the event ('when ye see Jerus. encircled by armies, then know that her desolation hath drawn nigh'); a paraphrase such as this, however, cannot fairly be deemed an authoritative interpretation of the expression used in Mt and Mk.†

ABOUT.—As an adv. about is used in AV in the following obsolete expressions:—1. To lead about or go about = roam about, circuitously. The verb is mostly נָסַב, which simply means to 'turn': Ex 13¹⁸ 'God led the people about, through the way of the wilderness'; Jos 16⁶ 'The border went about (RV 'turned about') eastward'; 1 S 15¹² 'He set him up a place, and is gone about and passed on'; Ec 2²⁰ 'I went about (RV 'turned about,' i.e. considered my past life) to cause my heart to despair.' 2. To go about = here and there, up and down: Jer 31²² 'How long wilt thou go about (RV 'hither and thither'), O thou backsliding daughter?' 3. To go about = to seek, attempt: Jn 7¹⁹ 'Why go ye about to kill Me?' RV gives 'seek' in Jn 7^{15, 20}, Ac 21³¹, Ro 10⁶, 'assay' in Ac 24^{6, 26²¹}, and keeps 'go about' in Ac 9²³. 4. To cast about = to turn round: Jer 41¹⁴ 'So all the people . . . cast about and returned.' 5. Thereabout = about that: Lk 24⁴ 'They were much perplexed thereabout.' J. HASTINGS.

ABRAHAM.—The narrative of the patriarch Abraham is contained in Gn 11^{26-25¹⁸}, and, as it stands before us, consists of a series of consecutive stories or scenes from the patriarch's life. It makes no pretence of being a complete biography. It may be doubted whether the compiler of the Hex. had any intention of preserving all the extant traditions respecting A. His purpose seems rather to have been to select from the traditions current among the Hebrews such narratives as would best illustrate the origin of the Isr. nation, and would best set forth how the divine Providence had shielded the infancy of the chosen race, and had predestined it both to inherit the land of Can. and to be a blessing among the nations of the earth. As would be natural under the circumstances, the traditions relating to A. have special reference to sacred localities in Pal.; but unfortunately they do not afford any very precise data for determining the age in which he lived. The compiler gives us a picture of A. which he derived apparently from three groups of tradition. We will first briefly summarise the narrative, and then indicate the portions which belong to the separate sources of tradition, according to the generally accepted results of critical analysis.

Abram, Nahor, and Haran are sons of Terah. Their home is in Ur of the Chaldees (Gn 11²⁶⁻²⁸), where Haran dies. A. marries Sarai, who was his half-sister (Gn 20¹²). A. and his wife, with their nephew Lot, Haran's son, accompany Terah, who migrates from Ur of the Chaldees, and journeys to Haran, where Terah dies (Gn 11³¹⁻³², Jos 24²). Terah is said to have had Canaan in view when he set out upon his journey (Gn 11³¹). A. in Haran receives the divine command to quit his country and kindred, and accompanied by Lot enters the land of Can. He traverses the whole country; and we are told in particular of Shechem and Bethel being places at which he halted, and, as his custom was, built an altar to J' (Gn 12¹⁻⁹). Driven by a famine, A. journeys to Egypt, where, in cowardly fear for his own life, he says that Sarai is his sister, and does not acknowledge her as his wife. The princes of Egypt bring the report of Sarai's beauty to Pharaoh king of Egypt, who sends to fetch her, has her placed in his own harem, and loads A. with presents on her account. The intervention of J' alone delivers the mother of the promised race from her peril. Pharaoh learns of the wrong he is doing, through the plagues which befall his house. In great dudgeon he summons A., justly reproaches him for the deception, and dismisses him and his belongings from Egypt (12¹⁰⁻²⁰).

A. and Lot return from Egypt to the district of Bethel; but their possessions in flocks and herds have greatly increased. It proves impossible for two such large droves to keep close together. Constant disputes break out between the retainers of the two chiefs. It is evident that they must separate. A., though the elder, proposes the separation, and offers Lot the choice as to the region to which he shall go. Lot chooses the rich pasture-land of the Jordan valley, and departs. A. remains on the soil which has been promised him, and receives as a reward for his unselfishness a renewal of the divine prediction that his descendants shall inhabit it as their own (13). A. removes to Hebron (13¹⁸), and while he is encamped there war breaks out in the immediate neighbourhood. The kings of the towns in the Jordan valley rebel against Chedor-Laomer (Kudur-Lagamar), the great Elamite king. The king of Elam with his vassals, the kings of Shinar, Ellasar, and Goyyim (?), march against the rebels, defeat them in a great battle, and retire, carrying off many prisoners and rich booty from Sodom and Gomorrah. Lot is one of the captives. A. is no sooner apprised of this than he arms his 318 retainers, and summons to his aid Mamre, Eshcol, and Aner, the three chieftains of the Hebron district, with whom he is confederate. The combined force overtakes the victorious army at Dan, in the N. of Canaan, surprises them by a night attack, routs them, and recovers Lot and the other prisoners, and all the booty. On the way back A. is met in the plain of Shaveh by the king of Sodom, and Melchizedek king of Salem. Melchizedek solemnly blesses A. for his heroic deed; and the Heb. patriarch, in recognition of Melchizedek's priestly office, gives him a tenth of the spoil. On the other hand, he proudly declines the offer which the king of Sodom makes, that A. should receive the spoil for himself; he asks only for the share that would compensate his confederates, Mamre, Eshcol, and Aner, and their men (14).

A., who by reason of his childlessness cannot entertain hopes of the fulfilment of the divine promise, receives in a special vision assurance of the great future of the race that shall spring from him. By the gracious condescension of the Almighty, a covenant is made by sacrifice between the patriarch and God; and during the night, when a deep sleep has fallen upon A., he learns the future destiny of his descendants, and the vision is ratified by an outward symbol (15^{esp. 12-17}). Sarai, who has no hope of having children, persuades A. to take Hagar, her Egypt. maidservant, as a concubine. Hagar, finding herself with child, is insolent towards Sarai, who thereupon treats her so harshly that Hagar flees into the desert. She is there stopped by an angel, and sent back, comforted by the promise respecting the child that is to be born. This is Ishmael (16). But Ishmael is not the promised son. Thirteen more years elapse before God appears again to A., and again promises that his descendants will be a mighty nation. In pledge of the fulfilment of his word, he changes Abram's name to Abraham, Sarai's to Sarah, and ordains that the rite of circumcision shall be the sign of the covenant between God and the house of Abraham. The promise that Sarah shall have a son, and the command to call his name Isaac, prepare us for the long-expected consummation (17). But it is not to be yet. Another great scene intervenes, to try, as it were, the patriarch's faith, and make proof of the character of the father of the Heb. race. J', accompanied by two angels, appears in human form to A. as he sits before his tent by the oaks of Mamre. A.'s offer of hospitality is accepted; and as the three strangers partake of the meal, the one who is J' promises to A. a son by Sarah, who overhears, and laughs incredulously (18¹⁻¹⁶). The two angels proceed to Sodom and Gomorrah; J' remains with A., and discloses to him the approaching destruction of 'the cities of the plain.' A. pathetically intercedes, and obtains the assurance that if but ten righteous be found in the city it should be spared for their sake (18¹⁶⁻³³). J' leaves A.; and then ensues the description of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, the vividness of which is enhanced by the brief reference to A., who in the morning looks forth from the hill country of Hebron, where he had stood during his colloquy with J', and sees thence the reek of the smoke rising as from a furnace (19³³). Strangely out of place though it seems, we find interposed at this point the story how A. journeyed to the South-land or Negeb, and dwelt in the territory of Gerar, where Abimelech was king, and how A. once more fears for his life on account of Sarah's beauty, represents her to be his sister, and temporarily loses her, when she is taken to Abimelech's harem. As in the Egypt. story, Sarah is kept from harm by a special visitation; Abimelech is warned by God, releases Sarah, and rebukes A. (20).

* Those critics who (as Keim, Jesus of Naz. v. 237-239; cf. Holtzmann, Handkomm. i. 259 f., Einl. zum NT, p. 383 f., with the references) regard Mt 24¹⁵⁻²⁸, Mk 13¹⁴⁻²⁷, as an independent Jewish (or Jewish-Christian) apocalypse originating shortly before A.D. 70, which has been incorporated with our Lord's discourse, can, of course, adopt still more readily the same explanation; but it is difficult to think that even these verses, though particular phrases may have been modified in the course of oral transmission, are without a substantial basis in the words of Christ.

† Bousset (Der Antichrist, 1895, pp. 14, 93, 106 f., 141 f.), treating Mt 24¹⁵ ff. (= Mk 13¹⁴ ff.) as purely eschatological, supposes the reference to be to the future Antichrist, who is frequently described (on the basis of 2 Th 2⁴) as sitting in the Temple, and receiving divine honours (e.g. by Ireneus, v. 25. 1, 30. 4; see further passages in Bousset, p. 104 f.); but it may be doubted whether the view of Mt 24¹⁵ ff., upon which this explanation depends, is correct.

At length the long-promised son is born to A. of Sarah; he is circumcised the 8th day, and receives the name of Isaac (21¹⁻⁷). Sarah takes offence at the sight of Ishmael playing with Isaac; and A. is instructed by God to yield to Sarah's demand, and dismiss both Hagar and Ishmael from his tent (21⁸). A.'s prosperity and success induce Abimelech to seek alliance with the patriarch. A covenant between them is struck; the well, which Abimelech's servants had taken by force from A., is restored to him, and receives the name of Beer-Sheba. A. dwells for some time in Phil. territory, encamped in the vicinity of the well (21²²⁻³⁴).

Some years later, when Isaac has grown to be a lad, comes the last trial of A.'s faith. God orders him to sacrifice his only son upon a lofty hill, distant three days' journey from his place of encampment. He does not hesitate. All is done in perfect obedience; the knife is raised to slay Isaac, when a voice from heaven is heard. God wishes not a hair of the lad's head to suffer; He is satisfied with this proof of the patriarch's absolute trust in God, his readiness to sacrifice that which was most precious in his eyes. A ram is sacrificed in the stead of Isaac; and the holy covenant between J' and A. is ratified anew (22¹⁻¹³).

Then Sarah dies; and A., whose seed is to possess the whole land, has to purchase a burial-place. The field and cave of Machpelah at Hebron is the portion of ground which he buys with all due formality from Ephron the Hittite; and there he buries Sarah (23).

Feeling his days drawing to a close, A. causes his steward to swear not to let Isaac take to wife one of the daughters of the land, and sends him to Haran, where he finds Rebekah, and brings her back to be Isaac's wife (24).

It is strange next to read that A. takes Keturah to be his wife, and becomes the father of six sons, the patriarchs of Arabian tribes (25¹⁻⁴). But at the age of 175 he dies, and is buried in the cave of Machpelah (25⁷⁻¹¹).

The foregoing outline shows the truth of what has been remarked above, that the life of A. in the Bk of Gn is not so much a consecutive biography as a series of scenes derived from groups of Heb. tradition, and loosely strung together. How far the three main groups of patriarchal narrative—the J, E, and P—overlapped one another we cannot say, but the fact that the existing account is derived from different sources sufficiently explains some of the chief difficulties and discrepancies that strike the ordinary reader.

J.—The narrative of J opens with A. being in Haran, and migrating with Lot to Can. at the command of J'.

It mentions A.'s nomadic movements in Can., and the altars at Bethel and Shechem. It records the separation of A. and Lot, and A.'s sojourn at Hebron.

It describes A.'s journey to Egypt, and his return to the S. of Can.

It contains the promises made to A., and the covenant in ch. 15. It records the marriage with Hagar, Hagar's flight, and the birth of Ishmael.

It gives the long epic narrative of the visit of the three men to A.; A.'s intercession; and the overthrow of the cities of the plain.

It narrates the birth of Isaac, and the mission of A.'s servant to Haran.

J = 12¹⁻⁴ 6-13⁵ 7-11a 12b-18 15. 16⁴⁻¹⁴ 18. 19 (exc. v. 29) 21. (partially) 24.

E.—The narrative of E opens with A.'s wandering to and fro, with Lot, in Can. It reproduces, perhaps from some separate source, an account of the war between Chedor-Laomer and the rebel 'cities of the plain,' A.'s rescue of his nephew, and Melchizedek's blessing.

It describes the blessing pronounced upon the patriarch in ch. 15. It records A.'s sojourn at Gerar, and the peril to which Sarah was exposed at the court of Abimelech (20). It contains an account of the birth of Isaac; and the mention of the banishment of Hagar and Ishmael implies that it also included an account of Ishmael's birth. It records the alliance of A. with Abimelech at Beersheba. And, so far as A. is concerned, concludes with the story of the sacrifice of Isaac.

P.—The narrative of P is a mere skeleton outline of facts. A. is Terah's son. Terah, with A. his son and Lot his nephew, leave Ur-Casdim, and set out for Can.; they stay at Haran, where Terah dies, 205 years old. A., 75 years old, accompanied by Lot, journeys to Can. A. settles near Mamre; Lot goes E. to the Jordan valley. A. marries Hagar ten years after entering Can.; Ishmael is born in A.'s 86th year. In his 99th year God makes a covenant with him, and ordains the rite of circumcision, changing his name to Abraham, and Sarai's to Sarah. A. laughs at the idea of Sarah having a son; and the son to be born to him is to be called Isaac. In his 100th year A. has a son Isaac, who is circumcised. Sarah dies at Hebron 127 years old, and A. purchases the cave of Machpelah for a burying-place. He himself dies at the age of 175, and is buried by Isaac and Ishmael in the cave.

P = 13⁶ 11b. 12 16¹⁻³ 15. 16 17¹⁻²⁷ 19²⁹ 21^{1b} 26-5 23. 25⁷⁻¹⁷.

The combination of the three strata of tradition has only in a few instances led to apparent inconsistencies. The J narrative, which makes Haran A.'s native country (Gn 12. 24), contains no allusion to Ur-Casdim. J's narrative contains the story of A.'s cowardice in Egypt; it is E's narrative which contains the story of his cowardice at the court of Abimelech. The narratives of J and E, which speak of Sarah's beauty attracting the notice of Egyptians and Philistines, do not mention the ages of A. and Sarah. According to J, A. very prob. had died before the return of the servant with Rebekah, since אָבִי should prob. be read for אָבְרָם in 24⁶⁷; for we can hardly suppose that Isaac's mourning for his mother would have lasted for three years. The mention of A.'s marriage with Keturah in the foll. ch. is derived from a different source.

The foll. are the chief difficulties arising from the Abraham narrative:—

1. The Home of A.'s People.—From the fact that Terah is said to have lived at Ur-Casdim, and that Ur has been identified by Assyriologists with Uru, the modern Mugheir, in S. Bab., the conclusion has very commonly been drawn that A. migrated first from Chaldea. This, however, depends upon the correctness of the identification of Ur-Casdim with Uru, which has been much disputed on the grounds, (1) that the genealogy of Gn 11¹⁰ brings the Sem. race as far as Mesopotamia, from which the next movement in the direction of Can. would be to Haran; (2) that the name Casdim was applied to an Armenian tribe; and (3) that it does not appear in connexion with S. Bab. until much later (upon the whole controversy see Kittel, Hist. of Hebrews, Eng. tr. i. 180f.; Dillmann, Genesis, p. 214 f. As to the position of Ur-Casdim, see art. UR OF THE CHALDEES). The common early Heb. tradition seems to be expressed in Gn 24, according to which A.'s kindred were the dwellers in N. Mesopotamia; and it is this belief which also is reiterated in the story of Jacob. Cf. 'A Syrian (i.e. Aramaean) ready to perish was my father' (Dt 26⁵). Whether Ur-Casdim is to be placed in N. Mesopotamia or in Chaldea, the impression remains that 'J' believed A.'s home and kindred to have been in Haran.

2. The Character of the Narrative related in Gn 14.—There appears to be no reason to question the hist. probability of an Elamite campaign such as is here described. There is nothing inherently improbable in the event as has sometimes, in some quarters, been asserted. A. did not defeat the Elamite army in a pitched battle; he made a night attack, fell upon an unsuspecting foe, and recovered prisoners and baggage,—a very different exploit from the conquest of Damascus, which late legend assigned to him. The primitive invasion of Chedor-Laomer has been claimed by some Assyriologists for an approximate date of 2150 (so Hommel, Bab.-Ass. Gesch. p. 3); and the invasion of W. Asia by an Elamite will naturally be associated with the Elamite empire of that remote time. But upon what principle the events of A.'s life can be carried back to the 22nd cent. B.C. has not yet been satisfactorily explained. Biblical chronology does not suggest the interval of nearly a thousand years between A. and the Exodus.

3. The Promises made to A. are found eight times repeated, (i.) Gn 12^{2, 3} (ii.) 12⁷ (iii.) 13¹⁴ (iv.) 15 (v.) 17 (vi.) 18 (vii.) 21¹² (viii.) 22¹⁶. The promises fall under three main heads, (a) the land of Can. shall be possessed by the seed of A.; (b) the seed of A. shall become a mighty nation; (c) A. shall have a son born of Sarah, and the son is to be called Isaac. The number of times that the promise appears is due to the compilers having selected this as the most conspicuous feature in the narrative of A. in each of the sources of tradition. The seemingly strange fact, that the narrative in ch. 17 should take no notice of the mention of the same promise in ch. 15, is at once accounted for when it is seen to be an instance of the manner in which the different narratives overlap one another. The promises, contained in the different traditions, seemed to the compiler so important in view of the general purpose of his book, that, at the risk of considerable repetition, he has incorporated them all. These promises ever ranked among the religious privileges of Israel (Ro 9⁴). They proclaimed God's covenant with His people, according to which He required of them simple obedience and justice (Gn 18¹⁹); they also announced that through Israel all nations should be blessed.

4. The Sacrifice of Isaac marks the crowning event in the life of A. Obviously, it must rank as the surpassing act of the patriarch's faith in God. But a difficulty arises in some minds from the wickedness of the act which God at first commands A. to do. Even though He never intended A. eventually to execute the terrible command, still is it consistent with divine goodness and justice to issue an order, to obey which seemed to have the result of placing blind trust in a positive command above the reasonable recognition of the natural demands of love, mercy, and justice? But there are two considerations which cut the ground from beneath this objection. (1) We are tempted to assume that in the patriarchal narrative the voice of God is an audible external communication. But then, as now, God speaks in different ways, and by conscience most directly. The question put by A.'s conscience was whether his complete trust in God extended even to the readiness to surrender his only son; it was in the truest sense a word of God to A. (2) That the answer to this questioning was given in the shape of human sacrifice on a mountain top, illustrates the importance of bearing in mind the imperfect development of the moral consciousness in that remote period. Human sacrifice was frequently practised in Sem. races. If the worshippers of other Sem. deities were ready to sacrifice their firstborn to their gods, was A. to be behind Assyria, Ammon, and Moab in devotion? The moral standard of the age would not be shocked at a deed too fatally common. The ideas of mercy and justice were, in that period, low, and needed to be raised. To propitiate the Deity by child murder was regarded as the height of religious devotion. The narrative, therefore, fulfils the twofold object of giving the crowning proof of A.'s absolute faith in J^h; and further, of demonstrating the moral superiority of faith in J^h over the religious customs of other Sem. races. J^h forbade the sacrifice of the firstborn: J^h upheld the instinct implanted in human nature which shrunk in horror from the act. He taught that J^h had no pleasure in the infliction of suffering upon the innocent; that the character of J^h was raised above that of the heathen gods by higher love and truer justice.

ii. A. IN THE HISTORY OF ISRAEL. — The attempt has been made to deprive the story of A. of all hist. value, and to represent the patriarch either as a mythical personage or as the typical impersonation of the virtues of the religious Isr.; but as yet no evidence has been found to connect the name of A. with that of a tribal deity, while the endeavour to find in his story a philosophical description of abstract qualities seems to presuppose a stage of literary development to which the materials of the Hex. can make no claim, and to desiderate a literary unity which those materials emphatically contradict.

On the other hand, it cannot be denied that recollections of the nomadic age, committed to writing (in the form that has come down to us) in a post-Mosaic era, and evidently strongly coloured by the teaching of the prophets of J^h, are likely to have preserved the hist. facts of the remote past in a form in which personal details are inextricably intertwined with racial movements, and, for simplicity's sake, the destinies of a future nation are anticipated in the features of family experience.

According to this view, A. was the leader of a great nomadic movement of the Hebrews (Gn 10²¹ 14¹³), who migrated from Mesopotamia into Canaan. These Hebrews penetrated as far as Egypt (Gn 12), but for the most part established themselves in the

S. of Canaan, and in Hebron and Beersheba formed friendly relationships with the dwellers of the land (Gn 14. 21²²). The story of Lot seems to indicate that the peoples of Ammon and Moab had originally belonged to the Heb. migration which was led by A., and, having separated themselves from their comrades, occupied the territory of the Rephaim, the Emim, and the Zamzumim (Dt 2¹¹. 19-21).

Again, it is impossible to resist the conclusion that some of the references to Ishmael and the allusion to Keturah contain an Isr. picture of the relationship of the Arabian tribes and clans to the Heb. stock rather than the record of personal history. The Egyp. origin of Hagar (Gn 16¹) and of Ishmael's wife (Gn 21²¹) will then indicate that the new settlers received into their community a considerable admixture of an Egyp. element at the time when they dispersed throughout N. Arabia. The fact that 'the sons of Nahor' (Gn 22²⁰⁻²⁴), 'the sons of Ishmael' (Gn 25¹²⁻¹⁸), 'the sons of Edom' (Gn 36¹⁵⁻¹⁹), form groups of twelve, and that 'the sons of Keturah' thus form a half-group of six, is an additional sign of the probability that the record is not only that of the domestic life of a family, but also that of the political distribution of a race.

While this consideration must modify the acceptance of a uniform literal historicity for the narrative of A., it is not incompatible with the view that in A. we have the great leader of a racial movement, and one who left his mark upon his fellow-tribesmen, not only by the eminence of his superior gifts, but by the distinctive features of his religious life, the traditional features of which were the devotion to one God, the abandonment of the polytheism of his ancestors, and the adoption of circumcision as the symbol of a purer cult.

iii. A. IN THE THEOLOGY OF OT.—The scattered reminiscences of the patriarchs were collected and compiled, even more for the purpose of illustrating the fundamental principles of the Isr. revelation than with the object of retailing any exhaustive biography.

The religion of Israel dates, according to OT, from A., not from Moses. A.'s servant addresses J' as the God of his master A. (Gn 24¹²); J' is to Isaac the God of A. (Gn 26²⁴); to Jacob He is 'the God of A. and the fear of Isaac' (Gn 31⁴²). A. never speaks of J' as the God of his fathers. A. is the founder of the religion; he is the head of the family which had J' for its God. There is no designation of the God of Israel which can go farther back to the origin of the Heb. faith than the often-repeated title 'the God of A.' (cf. Ps 47⁹).

The story of A. reflects the belief in the free grace of God which chose the patriarch and brought him from a distant land, and in spite of his failures loved him and made His covenant with him. The call of A. and the promises made him thus represent the Election (ἐκλογή) of Israel. A. as the chosen servant is the prophet, the instrument of J''s purpose (Gn 20⁷). He is the friend of God (Is 41⁸, 2 Cl 20⁷. Cf. Arab. El-Khalil). God's mercies towards him are appealed to by the prophets of the Captivity (Is 51², Ezk 33²⁴) as the ground of confidence that J' would not forsake the heirs of the promises made to A.

The unique relation in which A., in Isr. theology, stood to the God of revelation is indicated by the ref. of the prophets to A. as 'the one' (see Is 51¹⁻², Ezk 33²⁴, Mal 2¹⁵). In the Bk of Sir, A. is spoken of as 'great father of a multitude of nations; and there was none found like him in glory; who kept the law of the Most High, and was taken into covenant with Him: in his flesh he established the covenant; and when he was proved he was found faithful' (44^{19, 20}). In these words are summarised the chief points upon which the later Jewish literature esp. insisted in any reference to the life and character of A. He was the founder of the race; he was credited with a perfect knowledge of the Torah; he was the institutor of circumcision; he was tried, and in virtue of his faith was declared righteous.

iv. A. IN THE THEOLOGY OF NT.—In NT, A. is referred to in a variety of ways. The words of John the Baptist in Mt 3⁹, Lk 3⁸, and of St. Paul, Ro 9⁷, rebuke the popular Jewish supposition that descent from A. carried with it any special claim upon divine favour. Our Lord speaks of A. as one with whom all the partakers of divine redemption shall be privileged to dwell (Mt 8¹¹); and as of one who is both cognisant of things on earth, and is also entrusted with the special charge over the souls of the blest (Lk 16²²). Our Lord employs the imagery of current religious belief; A. is the typical representative of 'the righteous' who have been redeemed; he is 'the father of the faithful.' Hence He says (Jn 8³⁶), 'Your father A. rejoiced to see My day; and he saw it, and was glad.' He obtained a vision of the meaning of the promises, and rejoiced in the hope of their future fulfilment. Christ was the consummation of all the aspirations of A., the father of the race. According to the Jewish tradition (Bereshith Rabba 44, Wünsche), A. saw the whole history of his descendants in the mysterious vision recorded in Gn 15^{8^{et}}. Thus he is said to have 'rejoiced with the joy of the law' (Westcott on Jn 8⁵⁶).

The subject of the faith of A. seems to have formed a stock subject of discussion in the Jewish synagogue. It is alluded to in 1 Mac 2²² 'Was not A. found faithful in temptation, and it was reckoned unto him for righteousness?' The 'locus classicus' for the subject was Gn 15⁶; and the question propounded by the Jewish teachers turned upon the nature of the faith which was counted to A. for righteousness. To Philo the whole history of A. was merely an allegory descriptive of the truly wise man whose inner nature is made one with the divine by teaching (διδασκαλία), as Isaac's by nature (φύσις), and Jacob's by discipline (δασκῆσις). In Philo's treatment of the subject, 'faith,' which frees the soul from the dominion of the senses, was 'the queen of virtues' (de Abrah. ii. p. 39); and Philo refers to Gn 15⁶ at least 10 times (see Lightfoot, Gal. p. 158, and Ryle, Philo and Holy Scripture, p. 55) for the purpose of indicating the supreme excellence of A.'s faith.

Rabbinical Judaism did not adopt the symbolical and abstract explanation which satisfied the Alex. philosopher. It regarded A. as inseparable from A.'s seed, and the faith of A. as consisting in the fulfilment of the law.

Against this Rabbinic interpretation St. Paul directs his argument in Ro 4¹⁻³ and Gal 3. Faith with the apostle is the motive power of the whole spiritual life, and he lays stress on the fact that the mention of A.'s faith precedes the institution of circumcision. The faith of the patriarch was not due to the rite; it was only ratified and confirmed by it (cf. Ro 4⁹⁻¹² and the notes of Sanday and Headlam). The same subject comes under discussion in the Ep. of St. James; and there the apostle of the circumcision safeguards, as it were, the Christian position from a perversion of the Pauline teaching. With St. James 'the faith' of A. is not so much the motive power of spiritual life as the settled belief, the genuineness of which can only be tested by action (Ja 2¹⁹, see Mayor, in loc.).

Yet another reference to A.'s faith is found in He 11⁸⁻¹¹, where the patriarch is described as having been 'enabled to work towards the fulfilment of God's counsel by his trust in the unseen' (Westcott, in loc.). The three features of the patriarch's life which the writer of the Ep. selects for the illustration of this 'faith,' are (1) self-surrender, in the departure from his home (v. 8); (2) patience, in the pilgrim's expectation of a future abiding place (vv. 9, 10); (3) influence, since his faith, affecting Sarah's faith, led to the fulfilment of the promise (vv. 11, 12).

Later Jewish teaching, dwelling on the same theme, says, 'In like manner thou findest that A. our father inherited this world and the world to come solely by the merit of faith whereby he believed on the Lord' (Mechilta on Ex 14²¹).

v. JEWISH TRADITION.—It was natural that Jewish tradition should be busy with regard to the great founder of the people of Israel. From the fact that A. received the divine call in Ur of the Chaldees, and ur in Heb. meant 'flame,' the strange story was invented of his having been cast into a fiery furnace by Nimrod. This legend appears in various forms. One of the best known is that which is recorded in the Targ. of Jonathan on Gn 11²⁸ 'And it was when Nimrod had cast A. into the furnace of fire because he would not worship his idol, and the fire had no power to burn him, that Harau's heart became doubtful, saying, If Nimrod overcome, I will be on his side; but if A. overcome, I will be on his side. And when all the people who were there saw that the fire had no power over A., they said in their hearts, Is not Haran the brother of A. full of divinations and charms, and has he not uttered spells over the fire that it should not burn his brother? Immediately there fell fire from the high heavens and consumed him; and Haran died in sight of Terah his father, where he was burned in the land of his nativity, in the furnace of fire which the Chaldeans had made for A. his brother' (Etheridge's tr.).

Another version of the story appears in Bereshith Rabba, where A. refuses to obey Nimrod's command that he should worship fire; and suggests that it would be more reasonable to worship water that quenches fire, or the clouds that give the rain, or the wind that drives the clouds; finally, he exhorts Nimrod to worship the one God. Nimrod causes A. to be thrown into a fiery furnace; but God delivers him from its flames. For other instances of the Rabbinic treatment of A.'s life, see Weber, System der Altynagog. Palästina. Theologie, Leipzig, 1880. In Pirke Aboth (v. 4) it is said, 'With ten temptations was A. our father tempted, and he withstood them all; to show how great was the love of A. our father.' For the ways in which the Rabbins reckoned up these ten temptations, see Taylor, Sayings of the Jewish Fathers, p. 94.

The facts that A. came from Haran, that he won his victory at Hobah, near Damascus (Gn 14¹⁵), and that his servant was a native of Damascus (Gn 15²), seem to have given rise to the legend that A. conquered Damascus. So Josephus relates that 'Nicolaus of Damascus,' in the 4th book of his history, says thus: 'A. reigned at Damascus, being a foreigner, who came with an army out of the land of Babylon. . . . Now the name of A. is even still famous in the country of Damascus; and they show a village named after him, The habitation of A.' (Ant. i. vii. 2). A.'s native country having been Chaldea, he was credited by the Jews with a knowledge of secret arts and magic (cf. Philo, de præm. et pæn.; Jos. Ant. i. vii.); and Josephus records the tradition that A. first introduced into Egypt the knowledge of arithmetic and astrology which he had brought with him from Chaldea (Ant. i. viii.).

For the preservation of these and other legends, see Cod. pseudepigr. Vet. Test., J. A. Fabric., tom. 1 (1722), and Beer, Leben Ab. (1859). The Testament of A. (first ed. by James, 'Texts and Studies, Camb. 1892) deserves especial mention as an apoc.

(apparently of Egypt. origin) of apocalyptic character, first mentioned by Origen, Legimus . . . justitiæ et iniquitatis angelos super Abrahami salutem et interitu discipulantes, etc. (In Lc. Hom. 35), and recently brought before the notice of students in a most interesting form by the learned editor.

vi. THE NAME 'ABRAHAM.'—The attempts to discover the etymology of this name can hardly as yet be said to have been successful. According to one very prob. explanation, Abram represents a contracted form of Abiram or Aburam, just as 'Abner' probably stands for 'Abiner' or 'Abuner'; while Abraham may have been a local, or an Aramaic, dialectical variety of pronunciation. Abiram was a fairly common name (cf. Nu 16¹⁻¹² 26⁸, 1 K 16³⁴) in Heb.; and it is said to be a recognised proper name in the Assyrian inscriptions, under the form of Abu-ramu (so Schrader and Sayce). The analogy of other proper names, like Abimelech, Abiel, Abijah, makes it exceedingly doubtful whether the name Abram can rightly bear the meanings traditionally assigned to it, 'Lofty father,' or 'the father of the lofty one.' For (1) it stands to reason that no child, however lofty its descent, would have been called 'father,' or 'the father of' a god, whether Melech, or Jah, or Ram; (2) the feminine names Abigail, Abital, show the impossibility of this explanation. Probably, therefore, the right meaning of the name is 'Ram (the lofty one) is father,' as Hiram would mean 'Ram is brother,' of the owner of the name. Even so, the origin of the longer name Abraham remains still unexplained. The derivation of the name in Gn 17⁵ is only a popular word-play, connecting the termination -raham with the Heb. רַבְּחַם 'multitude.' Halévy (Rev. Ét. Juiv. 1887, p. 177) ventured to propose that Abraham represents אֲבִירֵי הָמָּוֶה 'the chief of a multitude,' the first part of the name being derived, not from ab, 'father,' but from abir, 'chief,' and the second part from ham (root hamah), 'multitude.' For this theory there does not appear to be much probability. The deriv. of the longer name must be left uncertain, although the most likely explanation of it is to be found in the variant pron. of proper names in different localities or in different clans of the same people. Thus רַבְּחַם may be a dialectical form of רַבְּחָם; and Abraham the same in meaning as Abram, just as Abiram is the same in meaning as Abram (cf. Oxf. Heb. Lex. p. 4, and Baethgen, Beiträge zur Sem. Rel. Gesch.).

ABRAHAM, BOOK OF.—A work, consisting of 800 στίχοι, bearing this name, is found in a list of Jewish apocryphal writings, preserved from a much earlier period, in an appendix to the Chronographia Compendiaria of Nicephorus (c. 800 A.D.). This list is printed in Credner's Gesch. des Kanons, 1847, as well as in Schürer's HJP II. iii. 126. The so-called Synopsis Athanasii presents the same list, omitting, however, the number of στίχοι, which is attached to each book in the Stichometry of Nicephorus. It is likely that this is the book from which Origen quotes as to a contest between the angels of righteousness and iniquity with regard to the salvation of Abraham (In Luc. Hom. 35); and James is prob. correct in identifying this Book with the Testament of A. (Texts and Studies, ii. 2, p. 27 ff.). An Apoc. of A. is mentioned by Epiphanius as used by the Ophites.

ABRAHAM'S BOSOM.—A term used of the abode of the righteous dead, defining it as a position of blessedness in intimate association with the father of the faithful, 'the friend of God.' In Scripture it occurs only in the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus (Lk 16^{22, 23}), where it appears both in the singular (κόλπος Ἀβραάμ) and in the plural (κόλποι Ἀβραάμ). Taken from the practice of reclining at table, so that the head of the guest leant back upon the bosom of his neighbour, the place of distinction belonging to him who was seated in this way next the host, the figure expresses the ideas of nearest fellowship and highest honour. In the Rabbin. literature the phrase (חיקו של אברהם אבינו) was applied to the place reserved for the pious departed, into which they passed immediately after death, and in which they dwelt free from the woes of hell (cf. 4 Mac 13¹⁷). It was a Jewish belief that the intermediate state contained two distinct compartments—a place of relative preparatory reward for the good, and a place of relative preparatory penalty for the evil (cf. Bk of Enoch 22, 2 Es 7^{70r} etc.). Some of the Jewish books speak of certain receptacles (promptuaria) into which the souls of the faithful dead were taken (Apoc. of Bar 30², 2 Es 4^{35, 41} 7³² etc.). And in the theology of the 3rd cent. and onwards it was taught that the circumcised should not be subject to hell. It was a saying of Rabbi Levi (of the 3rd cent.), that in the world to come Abraham would sit at the entrance to hell, and suffer no circumcised Isr. to pass into it. It has been usually supposed, therefore, that in NT the phrase 'Abraham's bosom' refers to the intermed. state, and designates a division of the underworld, where the good enjoy a preliminary measure of blessedness. In this case it is identified with Paradise, the lower Paradise as dist. from the heavenly, or is taken to describe a condition of peculiar honour in the Hades-Paradise. It is uncertain, however, when this idea of two separate localities within the underworld came to prevail. It was the idea of the later and mediæval Judaism. But whether it was in circulation so early as our Lord's time is doubtful. There seems reason to believe that the older Judaism spoke only of a Garden of Eden for the righteous dead, and a Gehinnom (Gehenna, Hell) for the wicked dead, identifying the latter with Sheol. If so, 'Abraham's bosom' in the parable would not be the name for a special compartment of Hades, or for an intermed. condition of blessedness distinct from and preliminary to the final state of perfect felicity. And in the parable itself it is only the rich man that is expressly described as 'in Hades.'

ABRECH (אַבְרָחָה).—A word called out before Joseph as he passed through the land of Egypt in his official capacity of prime minister to the Pharaoh (Gn 41⁴³). Its exact signification is not a matter of agreement amongst scholars. The LXX (ἐκτίπυζεν ἐμπροσθεν αὐτοῦ κήρυξ) and the Vulg. (clamante præcone, ut omnes coram eo genu flecterent) are not literal or direct translations. The Targ. of Onk. interprets it as 'father of the king,' on the ground possibly of Gn 45⁸. Jewish scholars who have derived it from Heb. refer it to the root כָּרַח bend the knee, in the Hiph. Impv., where, for the usual כ, an א has been substituted (cf. Jer 25³). Luther regarded the case as hopeless, in saying, 'Was abrech heisse, lassen wir die Zäncker suchen bisz an den jüngsten Tag' (Ges. Thes. p. 19). Of the many proposed Egypt. (and Coptic) derivations, we need note only the following:—(1) Abrek (αβρεκ) caput inclinare (Rossi, Etymol. ægypt. p. 1, in Ges. Thes. p. 19); (2) ap-rex-u, head of the wise (Harkavy, Berl. Egypt. Zeitschr. 1869, p. 132); (3) ab-rek, rejoice thou (Cook, Speaker's Com. in loco, p. 482);

(4) āb(u)-rek, thy commandment is the object of our desire, i.e. 'we are at thy service' (Renouf, Proceedings Soc. Bib. Arch. Nov. 1888, pp. 5-10). On the other hand, several derivations are suggested from the Asiatic-Sem. side: (1) Sayce compares it with an 'Accadian' abrik, a seer, appearing also in the Sem. form, on an unpublished tablet, of abrikku (Hibbert Lectures, 1887, p. 183, n. 3); (2) Delitzsch compares the Assyr. abarakku (fem. ab(a)rakkatu), a titled personage, possibly grand vizier (Paradies, p. 225; Heb. Lang. p. 26; Proleg. p. 145; and Assyr. Wörterbuch, p. 68 f.); (3) Schrader dissents from Delitzsch (COT i. 139); (4) Halévy derives it from paraku (Rev. d. Etudes Juives, 1885, p. 304). But of all the suggested sources of this much-abused word, the Heb. and the Assyr. above mentioned seem to carry with them the least number of difficulties. (The text of Gn 41⁴³ does not indicate that there was anything more than a salute.) It is, in either event, an Egyptianised Sem. word, probably carried down into Egypt during the centuries of Hyksos rule. This opinion receives support, too, from the evidence of the Tel el-Amarna tablets that there had been for many centuries before Joseph's day free international communication between Egypt and Asia.

ABROAD.—In its modern meaning of 'in (or 'to') another country,' a. is not used in AV or RV. The nearest approach is Jn 11⁵² 'The children of God that are scattered a.' On the other hand a. is used in senses now wholly or nearly obsolete. 1. It signifies specially outside one's own dwelling, the opp. of 'at home.' Lv 18⁸ 'Whether she be born at home or born a.'; La 1²⁰ 'A. the sword bereaveth, at home there is as death'; Jg 12⁹ 'Thirty daughters he sent a., and thirty daughters he brought in from a. for his sons'; Dt 23¹⁰ 'Then shall he go a. out of the camp'; Lk 8¹⁷ 'Neither anything hid that shall not be known and come a.' (RV 'to light'); Sir 26⁸ 'A drunken woman and a gadder a.' Cf.—

'Where as he lay
So sick alway

He might not come abroad.'

—Sir T. More, A Merry Jest.

2. On the outside of anything: Lv 13¹² 'If a leprosy break out a. in the skin.' 3. In the general sense of openly, freely, widely: Mk 14⁵ 'But he went out, and began to publish it much, and to blaze a. the matter'; Ro 16¹⁹ 'For your obedience is come a. unto all men'; 5⁵ 'The love of God is shed a. in your hearts.' ABRONAH (אַבְרוֹנָה).—A station in the journeyings, occurs only Nu 33^{34, 35}, AV Ebronah.

ABSALOM (אַבְשָׁלוֹם, in 1 K 15^{2, 10} אַבְשָׁלוֹם Abishalom, 'father is peace'), the third son of David (2 S 3³, 1 Ch 3²). He first comes into prominence in connexion with the story of his sister Tamar (2 S 13). After the foul outrage done to the latter by Amnon, David's eldest son, A. determined upon revenge, but concealed his purpose for two years. At the end of this period he gave a feast at the time of sheep-shearing, and invited the king and his sons. David declined for himself, but permitted Amnon and his brothers to go. While the feast was at its height, the servants of A., upon a signal given by their master, fell upon Amnon and slew him. Having thus avenged the affront put upon his sister, A. fled to the court of his maternal grandfather, Talmai, the king of Geshur, where he remained for three years. Then Joab, perceiving that David longed for a reconciliation with his son, contrived, through the medium of 'a wise woman of Tekoah,' to procure a reversal of the virtual sentence of banishment, and A. returned to Jerus., but was not permitted to approach the presence of the king. This unnatural condition of things continued for two years, when A. applied to Joab to use his interest at court to procure a full reconciliation. David's general had, however, for some reason become less hearty in the matter, and declined even to meet A., until the latter resorted to the expedient of ordering his servants to set fire to Joab's barley field. When the owner of the field came in person to demand an explanation of this injury, he was at length persuaded to intercede with the king on behalf of his son, and his mediation proved successful. It is easy to conceive that David, by his injudicious mingling of leniency and severity, had completely forfeited the confidence of his son, and it was doubtless from this occasion onwards that A. began to hatch the plot that proved fatal to him, and which has gained for his name an unenviable immortality. He took advantage of a misunderstanding that seems to have existed between David and the men of Judah, and set himself sedulously to gain the confidence and affection of all visitors to the court. In particular, those who came to have matters of law decided were flattered by the attentions of the heir-apparent, who also was careful to drop hints that the king might do far more to expedite the administration of justice, and that if he (Absalom) were only judge, a very different state of things would be inaugurated. Thus he 'stole the hearts of the men of Israel.' He was greatly helped in the accomplishment of his scheme by the extraordinary personal charms he possessed (2 S 14²⁵⁻²⁷).

How long this preparatory stage lasted is uncertain. The forty years of 2 S 15⁷ manifestly cannot be correct, and should perhaps be read four years. When at length he judged that the time was ripe for the execution of his rebellious enterprise, A. obtained leave of absence from his father, on pretence of having to go to Hebron to pay a vow he had made during his sojourn in Geshur. His emissaries were at work throughout the whole land, preparing for a general rising, and his adherents became daily more numerous. At the very outset he gained over David's famous counsellor Ahithophel the Gilonite, who may have had reasons of his own for deserting the king (see BATHSHEBA). So alarming were the reports which reached David, that he resolved to abandon the capital and save himself and his household by flight to the eastern Jordanic territory. He was accompanied by the faithful Cherethites and Pelethites, to whom were added on this occasion a body of Gittites who had probably formed part of David's followers in the old days at Ziklag. The offer of Zadok and Abiathar to accompany him with the ark was declined, and Hushai the Archite was also directed to remain at Jerusalem and do his utmost to defeat the counsel of Ahithophel. Upon Absalom's arrival in Jerusalem, Hushai played the part of rebel so skilfully that he gained the complete confidence of the aspirant to the throne. Ahithophel first of all counselled A. to take a step which would make the breach between him and his father irreparable (2 S 16²¹⁻²³), and then advised that prompt measures should be taken to pursue and destroy David before he could rally around him any considerable number of troops. Hushai counselled delay and cautious measures, and his advice was followed, to the chagrin of Ahithophel, who, seeing that all was lost, went and set his house in order and hanged himself. The two sons of Zadok and Abiathar were despatched by Hushai with intelligence to David of what had transpired at Jerusalem. The young men were hotly pursued, and narrowly escaped capture, but evading their pursuers by stratagem reached David, who the same night with his whole company passed over

Jordan. At Mahanaim, Barzillai the Gileadite and others supplied him liberally with provisions. Ere long a sufficient number of troops was assembled to justify the king in joining battle with the forces of A., which by this time had also passed the Jordan. The decisive battle was fought in 'the wood of Ephraim.' David, yielding to the wish of his supporters that he should not expose his life by taking the field in person, arranged his army in three divisions, commanded respectively by Joab, Abishai, and Ittai the Gittite. To each of these three generals he gave the charge, 'Deal gently, for my sake, with the young man, even with Absalom.' From the very first the tide of battle set strongly against the rebel army, which lost heavily in the engagement, and still more heavily in its retreat through the forest. Absalom himself was hurried by his mule under an oak, and becoming entangled by the head in the fork of a branch, hung defenceless. In this situation he was discovered by a soldier, who at once informed Joab. The royal general, who appreciated the situation more justly than his master, unhesitatingly pierced the hapless youth to the heart. Having thus disposed of the rebel leader, Joab recalled his troops from the pursuit of the vanquished army. When news of the issue of the battle was brought to David, he forgot everything else in grief at his son's death, and exclaimed again and again, 'O my son Absalom, my son, my son Absalom! would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!' This conduct, natural enough from one point of view, might have had serious results but for the sturdy common-sense of Joab, who pointed out that the king had to think of his soldiers as well as his son. The remonstrance was sufficiently rough in its expression, yet David recognised its wisdom, and, stifling his emotion for the time, came out and thanked his troops for their gallant service in the field. A. was buried near the scene of his death, and the spot was marked by a great heap of stones. According to 2 S 14²⁷ he had three sons, and a daughter named Tamar. The latter is with much probability identified with Maacah of 1 K 15², the wife of Rehoboam (cf. 2 S 3³, 2 Ch 11²⁰). The sons must have predeceased their father, or else a different tradition is followed in 2 S 18¹⁸, where we are told that A. had no son.

The story of Absalom forms part of the section 2 S 9-20 and 1 K 1-2, which, with the exception of a few passages, comes from a single pen. Its dominating aim is to trace the progress of Solomon to the throne. Hence it has to explain how the three sons of David who seemed to have superior claims, Amnon, Absalom, and Adonijah, failed to secure the succession. The style is bright and flowing, the descriptions are graphic, and, with all the writer's evident partiality for David and Solomon, the historical character of these chapters, down even to the minutest details, is established by proofs that are amongst the strongest in the O.T.

ABSALOM IN APOCR. (Ἀβεσσάλωμος, Ἀψάλωμος A).—1. A. was the father of Mattathias, one of the captains who stood by Jonathan the Maccabee when the main part of his army fled at the beginning of a battle against the Syrians at Hazor in Northern Galilee (1 Mac 11⁷⁰=Jos. Ant. XIII. v. 7). It is perhaps the same Absalom whose son Jonathan was sent by Simon the Maccabee to secure Joppa after his brother Jonathan had been imprisoned by Tryphon (1 Mac 13¹¹=Jos. Ant. XIII. vi. 4). 2. According to 2 Mac 11¹⁷, one of two envoys sent by the Jews to Lysias when he began to treat with them for peace after his defeat at Bethsuron (Beth-zur) in 165 B.C. In 1 Mac 4³⁴ = Jos. Ant. XII. vii. 5, no mention is made of overtures for peace, but Lysias is stated to have withdrawn to Antioch for reinforcements. It is probable that the author of 2 Mac has made some confusion between the first expedition of Lysias and a second invasion two or three years later, when, after gaining a victory at Beth-zur, he made terms with the Jews in consequence of troubles in Syria.

ABUBUS (Ἀβουβος, 1 Mac 16¹¹⁻¹⁵) was the father of Ptolemy, the son-in-law of Simon the Maccabee, by whom Simon was murdered at Jericho.

ABUNDANCE.—This word is used with great freedom in AV, translating about twenty Heb. and nearly as many Gr. words. Each occurrence should be considered in relation to the orig. word. Here it is necessary only to draw attention to the obs. use of a. to signify superfluity: Mk 12⁴⁴ 'All they did cast in of their a.' (RV 'superfluity', Gr. τὸ περισσεύον, as opp. to ὑστέρησις, 'deficiency,' said of the widow; so Lk 21⁴); Ps 105³⁰ 'Their land brought forth frogs in a.' (RV 'swarmed with frogs,' Heb. פִּרְצִי; so Ex 8³, and cf. Gn 1^{20, 21} 9⁷); 2 Co 12⁷ 'through the a. of the revelations' (Gr. ὑπερβολῆ, RV 'exceeding greatness').

ABUSE, ABUSER.—1. In NT abuse is used twice (as tr. of καταχράσασθαι) when the meaning is not a. but 'use to the full' regardless of consequences (see Thayer, N.T. Lex.): 1 Co 7³¹ 'Those that use the world as not abusing it' (RV m. 'using it to the full'); 9¹⁸ 'that I a. not my power in the gospel' (RV 'so as not to use to the full my right in the gospel'). 2. In OT a. is found thrice (as tr. of בָּזָה) with a person as object. In 1 S 31⁴ and 1 Ch 10⁴ the meaning is insult or dishonour, as in Milton, Sam. Ag. i. 38—

'I, dark in light, exposed
To daily fraud, contempt, abuse, and wrong.'

But in Jg 19²⁵ it is the old sense of defile or ravish: 'They knew her, and abused her all the night.' Cf. Fordyce, Serm. to Young Women (1767): 'He that abuses you, dishonours his mother.' Hence in 1 Co 6⁹ ἀπενοκοίτης, 'one that lies with a male,' is tr^d 'abusers of themselves with mankind' (RV 'men'); and RV gives the same tr. at 1 Ti 1¹⁰.

ABYSS.—The translation (in RV, not in AV) of ἀβύσσος, a word compounded from a intensive and βυθός, Ionic form of βυθός, depth (2 Co 11²⁵), and connected (see Curtius) with βαθός, deep, and the Eng. bath; primarily and classically an adj. = very deep, or even bottomless; applied to the yawning gulfs of Tartarus (Eur. Phæn. 1605) and, metaph., to a sea of calamity (Æsch. Suppl. 470): in profane Greek used as a subst. by Diog. Laert. only (iv. 5. 27), on an epitaph, 'the black abyss of Pluto.' (Comp. Job 41²³ LXX τὸν τάραρον τῆς ἀβύσσου.) Once (perhaps twice) in LXX it is an adj. (Wis 10⁹ the bottomless deep of the Red Sea: possibly also Job 36¹⁶ metaph. = boundless): elsewhere, LXX, NT, and eccl. Gr., a subst.; in LXX the trans., with few exceptions, of têhôm, the tumultuous water-deep (some thirty times), and, once each, of mēzûlah, sea-deep (Job 41³¹), of zûlah (Is 44²⁷), the deep flood (of Euphrates) and of rahabh, spacious place (Job 36¹⁶ if subst.). Primarily in LXX it signifies (with têhôm) the waters beneath, by which the earth was at first covered (Gn 1², Ps 104⁶⁻⁹), but on which it was afterwards made to rest (Jon 2⁹; see Ps 24²), and from which its springs and rivers welled up (Gn 7¹¹ 49²⁵, Dt 8⁷; cf. Rev 9¹ φρέαρ). Not unnaturally it denoted also the upper seas and rivers connected with the subterraneous waters (Ps 107²³ 106⁹), the original notion of tumultuousness in têhôm (Ps 42⁷) being overlaid by that of depth in ἀβύσσος (Sir 24²², Jon 2⁹, Ps 36⁷). Secondarily, from the notion of subterraneousness and depth, it is the place after death, but is never in LXX the actual translation of Sheol (though this etymologically = depth, Ps 71²⁰; cf. Ps 86¹³); in this sense, apparently, it is not justifiable to eliminate altogether the connotation of raging waters. [Comp. the contrast with heaven in Gn 7¹¹ (πύλαι ἀβύσσου) with that in Ps 139⁸ (Sheol) and in Ro 10⁷ (ἀβύσσος); also Job 41²³ LXX, and Job 26^{5, 6} (ὕδατος).] The relation to Sheol, with its dull, shadowy monotony and even misery, coupled with the OT idea of Sheol as a pit dungeon (Is 24²²), and with pre-NT apocalyptic usage (Enoch 10¹³ chasm of fire; 21¹⁰ prison of the angels; 18¹¹ abyss), prepared for the NT use of the word. It occurs only twice outside Rev: in Ro 10⁷ it is simply the abode of the dead; in Lk 8³¹ it is the prison destined for evil spirits. In seven passages of Rev (chs. 9. 11. 17. 20) it is a prison in which evil powers are confined (20¹⁻³), and out of which they can at times be let loose (11⁷ 17⁸), but is not the lake of fire (20^{2, 10}); nor is Satan regarded as himself cast into this prison, but only to be so cast (20¹⁻²) for 1000 years. ACCABA (Β' Ἀκκαβά, Α Γαβά, AV Agaba), 1 Es 5³⁰.—His descendants returned among the 'temple servants' under Zerubbabel. Called Hagab (חֲגָב), Ezr 2⁴⁶; Hagaba, Neh 7⁴⁸.

ACCAD, ACCADIANS.—Accad (or Akkad), with Babel, Erech, and Calneh, was one of the chief cities in the land of Shinar. These four constituted the beginning of the kingdom of Nimrod (Gn 10¹⁰). The LXX reads Ἀρχάδ. The Bab.-Assyr. inscriptions are the source of all our information on this name. It was at first supposed that Akkadû, occurring so frequently in the inscriptions in connexion with Sumer, referred only to a district or province. But it is now known that there was a city of that name (Hilprecht, Freibrief Neb. i. col. ii. l. 50). Its form is and is read al Akkad (or 'non-Sem.' Agade), city of Accad, the name under which the city was for long centuries known. It was the residence of the first historical ruler of all Babylonia, Sargon I., whose activity dates from 3800 B.C., according to the statement of Nabonidus (555-538 B.C.), an inscription discovered in 1881 on the site of Sippar. Frequent references to two Sippars, 'Sippar of the Sun-god' and 'Sippar of Anunit,' indicate some strange fortunes in connexion with this site. The worship of Ishtar of Accad was replaced by that of Anunit of Sippar. In very early times Sippar was the chief seat of sun-worship, and Accad of Ishtar worship. Gradually there was a political absorption, and all references seem to justify the assumption that of those two cities lying close together, Sippar with its Sun-god became the more powerful, and practically absorbed Accad. The worship of Ishtar, however, did not lose its identity, but was continued under the name of Sippar of Anunit (McCurdy, Hist. Prophecy and the Monuments, § 94). It is possible, but still unproved, that the city of Accad lay opposite to Sippar on the left bank of the Euphrates. Its exact site is a matter of doubt, but it is thought to have been located near Abu-habba, about fifteen miles west of Baghdad. Delitzsch conjectures that it may have been one of the two cities which bore the name of Sepharvaim, but McCurdy locates this double city in N. Syria (§ 349). The Wolfe expedition to Babylonia in 1884-85 (cf. Report, pp. 24, 25) located it at Anbar, on the Euphrates, N.W. of the ruins of Babylon. It was probably the capital city of mât Akkadi. (Consult for greater fulness the literature named below.)

From ancient times the kings of Babylonia, and the kings of Assyria who ruled over this territory, appended to their names šar Šuméri u Akkadi, king of Sumer and Akkad. Now, what was the origin of this double title? It was probably not indicative of the two regions of Babylonia, S. and N., as kings who ruled only over S. Babylonia claimed it. It was also claimed by conquerors who had not advanced farther S. than Nippur (cf. Winckler, Untersuch. z. altorient. Ges. 65 ff.). It seems, then, that 'Sumer and Accad,' in the titles of kings, may have been no more than a claim to the ancient territory and city of Accad, with additional territory (cf. McCurdy, § 110). (For other views of the question, cf. Schrader, Keilinschriften u. Geschichtsf. p. 533 f.; Delitzsch, Paradies, p. 198; Tiele, Gesch. Babyl.-Assyriens, part i. p. 76 f.)

Upon the identification of these names with specific localities has been built up the theory of the so-called Sumerians and Accadians. To the consideration of this theory we will now turn our attention.

It is maintained by a certain school of Oriental historians and linguists, that the lower Mesopotamian valley was at an early day populated by the Accadians, who were originally related to the Sumerians. They spoke, it is said, an agglutinative language. In the midst of these peoples Sem. tribes settled down, and adopted the language and customs of their forefathers. Step by step the Sem. language gained ascendancy, and about 1200 B.C. the native tongue died out, except as a sacred and literary vehicle, in which capacity it served until a late date. It is claimed that those early non-Sem. peoples reached a high degree of civilisation, that they left many traces of their culture in their monuments of art and language, and that we can readily interpret them. This supposed prehistoric people and their language are termed among Eng. Assyriologists, 'Accadians,' among French and German 'Sumerians,' derived from the supposedly most important localities where the most ancient inscriptions are found.

On the other hand, there is a growing school which maintains that the Semites, whom we know as possessing the cuneiform characters, were the inventors of these last and the developers of Sem. culture, and that the so-called 'Sumerians' and 'Accadians' are but figments of an over-zealous scientific spirit. A few only of the points can be noticed. We find in the inscriptions of Assyria and Babylonia word-lists which give a twofold, and sometimes a threefold, explanation of cuneiform ideograms. These ideograms are found in all stages of the Bab.-Assyr. language. In these lists one column of explanations gives us regular Sem. words, and another, words somewhat unfamiliar in sound, which are supposed to be of non-Sem. origin. But careful scrutiny shows that these strange words yield to Sem. roots, and that even the most unfamiliar are simply made up of possible word-forms of the same idiom, disguised according to regular ascertainable methods. Again, what can be said of so-called bilingual or unilingual texts? In both cases we meet with an abundance of these disguised Sem. words, and of Sem. grammatical constructions and modes of thought. The evidence of the slight remains of prehistoric art in Babylon is not decisive. Again, the Sem. Babylonians never in any way speak of or allude to any such people as the supposed Sumerians or Accadians. Still, the same language was used in Babylon down to the latest period of its history, with no name, nor even a tradition, of that supposed great and influential nation whose heritage fell to the Semites. Other peoples who came into contact with the Babylonians, and who exercised considerable influence on them, e.g. the Elamites, receive frequent mention, but there is not the slightest allusion to an Accadian race. It is not impossible that new discoveries may remedy this defect, but it is certainly amazing that what is assumed to have been the most influential factor in early Bab. civilisation is entirely unmentioned. When we find that Sem. documents date from as early a period as the earliest so-called 'Accadian,' and that this hypothetical language was used alongside of the regular Sem. for nearly 3000 years, we are inclined to ask, 'What does this mean?' In an examination of the language, we find many Sem. words and values which at first sight do not admit of such an explanation. But it is a fact that the number which do admit of it is continually increasing. Out of 395 phonetic values, Prof. Delitzsch names 106 which he regards as demonstrably Sem. (Assyrische Grammatik, § 25). Prof. McCurdy adds more than 40 others, running up the list to about 150 values. It is not impossible that further investigation may greatly increase the number.

But do not the inscriptions from Telloh, which are plainly ideographic, furnish conclusive proof of the soundness of the Accadian theory? So one might expect; but we are already finding in them actual Sem. words, disguised under the forms which are found in later bilingual texts. Besides, it is found that the oldest kings of 'Ur of the Chaldees,' the founders of the first Bab. kingdom, knew how to write Sem. as well as 'Accadian' inscriptions.

[NOTE BY EDITOR.—Professor Price has been permitted to state his view of this question unreservedly. For he is himself an accomplished student of Assyriology, and he has the support of some eminent scholars (see especially McCurdy, History, Prophecy, and the Monuments, i. 87 ff.). But the Editor thinks it necessary to say that the weight of authority is undoubtedly on the other side, leading Assyriologists everywhere having come to the conclusion that the view which Professor Price combats is substantially true. The reader should, however, consult the literature which Professor Price has given below, representing both sides of the question, and the articles ASSYRIA and BABYLONIA.]

ACCEPT, ACCEPTABLE, ACCEPTATION. — 1. Besides other meanings, accept is used in the sense of 'receive with favour': Gn 47 'If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted?' Dt 33¹¹ 'Bless, Lord, his substance, and a. the work of his hands.' It is then sometimes followed by 'of': Gn 32²⁰ 'I will appease him with the present . . . per- adventure he will a. of me' (RV 'accept me'); 2 Mac 13²⁴ 'And the king accepted well of Mac- cabæus.' 'Accept' or 'accept the person' is often the translation of Heb. קָבַץ אָפָּר; 'to lift up the face,' i.e. to look favourably on: Job 42⁹ 'The Lord also accepted Job'; Pr 18⁵ 'It is not good to a. the person of the wicked.' This Heb. idiom has been tr. into Gr., and is found in the NT as πρόσωπον λαμβάνω, always in a bad sense, 'partiality,' 'respect of persons.' Lk 20²¹ 'Neither acceptest thou the person of any'; Gal 2⁶ 'God accepteth no man's person.' Then this phrase is turned into προσωπολήπτως (Ac 10³⁴ 'respector of persons'), προσωπολήπτέω (Ja 2⁹ 'have respect to persons,' RV 'of persons'), and προσωποληψία ('respect of persons' Ro 2¹¹, Eph 6⁹, Col 3²⁵, Ja 2¹), three words found nowhere but in the NT and (thence) in eccles. writers. The English 'accept the person' is derived from the eccles. Lat. acceptare personam. 2. Acceptable is used in the sense of 'favourable': Is 49⁸ 'In an a. time have I heard thee'; 61² 'To proclaim the a. year of the Lord' (i.e. the year of Jehovah's favour). 3. Acceptation=favourable reception, is found in 1 Ti 1¹⁵ 4⁹ 'worthy of all a.'

ACCEPTANCE.—Accept and cognate words are used in Scripture to denote the relation of favour and approval in which one man may stand to other men, and especially to God. Of the various phrases employed to convey the idea, those of most frequent occurrence are in OT, רָאָה 'to raise,' and רָחַץ 'to associate with, have pleasure in,' and in NT, εὐαρέστος, 'well pleasing.' The conditions of A. with God appear in OT partly as ceremonial, partly as moral and religious. Purifications and sacrifices (which see) are necessary in view of human ignorance and sin. But the sacrifices must be offered in a spirit free from greed or deceit. To enforce the moral disposition which must accompany every offering, is one of the great functions of the prophets. When the covenant has been established between God and Israel, entrance into it becomes a condition of receiving, and especially of having a joyful assurance of, the divine grace and favour. Similarly in NT, A. is set forth as only in Jesus Christ and for His sake (Eph 1⁶, 1 P 2⁵); and, as the history of the patriarchs presents us with living pictures of what is acceptable to God under the old covenant, so Jesus is Himself the Beloved Son in whom the Father is well pleased (Mt 3¹⁷ 17⁵), and the type of all that God receives and approves.

A. STEWART.

ACCESS.—This word (not found in OT) occurs in NT in Ro 5², Eph 2¹⁸ 3¹² as the rendering of προσάγωγη. The Gr. word may express either an actual 'bringing near,' or 'introduction,' or merely a 'means of access,' or 'a right to approach.' In class. Gr. the idea suggested might be that of 'introduction to the presence-chamber of a monarch.' The OT associations of the kindred verb προσάγειν seem to connect the word rather with the peculiar relation in which Isr. stood to J', and to give the term a special appropriateness in describing the admission of Gentiles into a new covenant relation with God (τὴν χάριν ταύτην, Ro 5², cf. Eph 2¹⁷), cf. Ex 19⁶ and 1 P 3¹⁸; and the approach of Christian worshippers to the Father (Eph 2¹⁸ 3¹²), cf. Lv 1² etc., Lv 4¹⁴, Mal 1¹¹, Ezk 44¹³ etc. This last idea is worked out in detail in He 10¹⁹⁻²². Our 'right to approach' or 'our introduction' is uniformly described by St. Paul (cf. Jn 14⁶) as given us by Christ.

ACCO, AV Accho (אֲכּוֹ).—This city, included in the lot of Asher (Jg 1³¹), was never taken by Israel. Known at different times as Ptolemais (1 Mac and NT), St. Jean d'Acre, Accaron, Acon, etc., the old Heb. אֲכּוֹ Accho survives in the Arab 'Akka. Josephus calls it 'a maritime city of Galilee' (BJ II. x. 2). It was important as commanding the coast road, and affording easy access to the great routes crossing the plain of Esdraelon.

From the promontory of Carmel the shore sweeps northward with a beautiful inward curve, forming the Bay of Acre, on the northern extremity of which the city stands. From Bas en-Nakurah, in the north, the mountains recede some miles from the coast, leaving a fertile plain, which is bounded on the south by the Carmel range. It is watered by the Kishon (el Makatta') and Nahr Na'amán, the ancient Belus. The plain furnishes Haifa, Nazareth, Tiberias, and Safed with half their supply of fruit and vegetables, sending also much to Beyrout.

Of the 10,000 or 12,000 inhabitants, two-thirds are Moslems, the remainder being Greek and Catholic Christians, with a few Jews and Persians. It is the seat of a provincial governor, under whom are the districts of Haifa, Nazareth, Tiberias, and Safed. The chief trade is the export of grain brought by camels from Haurán. About 1000 tons of oil from the olive groves of Galilee are also annually exported. Entered from the south by a single gate, it is defended to landward by a double rampart, to seaward by a strong wall. The ancient inner harbour has disappeared, and the outer is used only by smaller vessels, the neighbouring anchorage of Haifa being more safe and convenient for larger ships.

Few cities have had a stormier history. Allied with Sidon and Tyre in the days of Eluleus against Shalmaneser IV. (Ant. IX. xiv. 2), it was taken by Sennacherib, and given by Esarhaddon to the king of Tyre. Held in succession by Babylon and Persia (Strabo, xvi. 2. 25), on the division of Alexander's kingdom it fell to Ptolemy Soter. Its strategic value was proved in the Syro-Egypt. wars. Betrayed to Antiochus the Great (B.C. 218), it was immediately recovered by Egypt. Simon Maccabæus defeated and drove the forces of Tyre, Sidon, and Ptolemais into the city (1 Mac 5²²; Ant. XII. viii. 2). Alex. Balas took it by treachery, and there married Cleopatra, daughter of Ptolemy Philometor (Ant. XIII. ii. 1, iv. 1, 2). Demetrius Nikator gave it to Jonathan 'for the necessary expenses of the temple' (1 Mac 10³⁹). Here Jonathan was perfidiously taken by Tryphon (Ant. XIII. vi. 2). Besieged by Alexander Jannæus, relieved by Ptolemy Lathyrus (Ant. XIII. xii. 4), it was captured by Cleopatra, who gave it to the Syrian monarchy (Ant. XIII. xiii. 2). Tigranes the Armenian having taken the city, at once retired (Ant. XIII. xvi. 4; BJ I. v. 3). Falling to the Parthians (Ant. XIV. xiii. 3; BJ I. xiii. 1), it finally passed under the power of Rome, and was raised to the rank of a colony, with the title, 'Colonia Claudii Cæsaris Ptolemais.' Herod built here a gymnasium (BJ I. xxi. 11). It is last mentioned in Scripture in connexion with St. Paul's visit (Ac 21⁷).

ACCOMPLISH.—The primary meaning of a. is to bring to a successful issue. But the only examples of this in the AV are Ps 64⁶, Pr 13¹⁹, 1 Es 1¹⁷, Ac 21⁶. Sometimes a. simply means to 'do,' 'perform': 1 K 5⁹, Jth 2¹³, Is 55¹¹ 'it (God's word) shall a. that which I please.' It is occasionally used in the obsolete sense of 'to complete a period of time': Jer. 25¹² 'when seventy years are accomplished'; Is. 40³ 'her warfare is accomplished'; Job 14⁶ 'till he shall a., as an hireling, his day.' From this arises its most frequent meaning, to bring to an ideal or divine completeness, to fulfil: (a) prophecy (once only), 2 Ch 36²²; (b) God's wrath, La 4¹¹, Ezk 6¹² 7⁸ 13¹⁵ 20^{8, 21}; (c) Christ's work, Lk 9³¹ 12⁵⁰ 18³¹ 22²⁷, Jn 19²⁸. The RV has sought to reserve this meaning for the word 'fulfil,' but unsuccessfully.

ACCORD, ACCORDINGLY, ACCORDING TO.—
 1. 'Of its own accord' is used in the special sense of without human agency in Lv 25⁵ 'That which groweth of its (see ITS) own a.,' and in Ac 12¹⁰ 'which opened to them of his own a.' From the Gr. in both passages (αὐτόματος) we get our word 'automatically.' In 2 Co 8¹⁷ 'of his own a. he went unto you,' the Gr. (αὐθαίρετος) is lit. 'self-chosen,' of his own free choice. 2. In Is 59¹³ 'Acc. to their deeds, accordingly he will repay': 'acc. to' and 'accordingly' are translations of the same Heb. word, and have the same meaning. 3. In Ezk 42^{11, 12} 'acc. to' means 'corresponding to.' 4. As verbal adj. 'according' is found only in Wis 18¹⁰ 'an ill a. cry' (ἀσὺμφωνος, RV 'in discord'): cf. In Memoriam—

'That mind and soul, according well,
 May make one music.'

ACCOS ('Ακχός, 1 Mac 8¹⁷).—Eupolemus, the son of John, the son of Accos, was one of the envoys sent to Rome by Judas Maccabæus in 161 B.C. Accos represents the Heb. Hakkoz (חֲכֹז), which was the name of a priestly family (1 Ch 24¹⁰, Ezr 2⁶¹); Eupolemus, therefore, may well have been of priestly descent.

ACCOUNT.—As a subst. a. is either literally the number counted, as Ec 7²⁷ 'Counting one by one, to find out the a.:' or metaphorically 'reckoning' (Gr. λόγος, 'word'), as Ro 14¹² 'Every one of us shall give a. of himself to God.' As a verb a. is used in rare or obs. meanings. 1. To estimate, as Dt 2²⁰ 'That also was a^{ed} a land of giants'; Ro 8²⁶ 'We are a^{ed} as sheep for the slaughter'; He 11¹⁹ 'a^{ing} that God was able'; He 11²⁶ RV 'a^{ing} (AV, 'esteeming') the reproach of Christ greater riches.' Cf. 1 Mac 6⁹ 'He made a. (ἐλογίσαστο) that he should die.' Then it is sometimes followed by 'of,' as 1 K 10²¹ 'It (silver) was nothing accounted of in the days of Solomon'; 1 Co 4¹ 'Let a man so a. of us as of the ministers of Christ.' 2. To 'reckon' or 'impute,' as Gal 3⁶ 'It was a^{ed} (RV 'reckoned') to him for righteousness.' 3. To 'seem,' or 'be reputed,' as Mk 10⁴² 'they which are a^{ed} (Gr. οἱ δοκῶντες) to rule over the Gentiles'; so Lk 22²⁴. Cf. Gal 2^{2, 6} 'those of repute' (Gr. οἱ δοκῶντες).

ACCURSED.—In AV חֲרָם hêrem is tr. 'accursed' in Jos 6¹⁷ 7^{12 bis}, and 'a. thing' in Jos 6^{18 bis} 7^{1 bis}. 11. 13. 15 22²⁰, 1 Ch 27. In all these places RV gives 'devoted' or 'd. thing.' For the hêrem is not accursed from God so that we may make what secular use of it we please, but devoted to God, and not to be used by us at all. A. is also the tr. of ἀνάθεμα, anathema, in Ro 9¹ 1 Co 12³ Gal 1^{8, 9}. In these passages RV simply transliterates the Greek. See CURSE.

ACHAIA ('Αχαία), when Greece was free, was the strip of land bordering the Corinthian Gulf on the S.; but, by the Romans, the name Achaia was applied to the whole country of Greece, because the Achæan League had headed Greek resistance to Rome. Conquered and united with the province of Macedonia in B.C. 146,* Achaia was in B.C. 27 made a separate province; and Thessaly, Ætolia, Acarnania, and some part of Epirus, together with Eubœa and the western, central, and southern Cyclades, were included in it. It was governed by an official with the title Proconsul (Ac 18¹²), who was appointed by the Senate from among the ex-prætors; and not less than five years must have elapsed between his prætorship and his proconsulship. Corinth was the capital of the province, and the proconsul's ordinary residence (Ac 18¹²). As the severity of taxation was a subject of complaint, Tiberius, in A.D. 15, reunited Achaia with Macedonia and Mœsia under the administration of an imperial legatus; but in 44, Claudius made it again a senatorial and proconsular province. Either at this or some later time, Thessaly was divided from Achaia and united with Macedonia, and Epirus with Acarnania was made a separate procuratorial province (as Ptolemy III., § 13. 44-46, and § 14, describes them). On 28th November, A.D. 67, Nero at the Isthmian games declared Greece free; but within a few years Vespasian again made it a senatorial province; and, so long as the empire lasted, it was governed by a proconsul, under whom were a legatus and a quæstor. The proconsul and his legatus were regularly annual officials, and so was the quæstor always, but an imperial legatus governed for a much longer term (two ruled from A.D. 15 to 44). In ordinary Gr. usage, the term 'Hellas' corresponded approximately to the Rom. sense of Achaia; and in that way 'Ἑλλάς is mentioned in Ac 20². But there was a wider sense of the epithet 'Greek,' according to which Macedonia could be thereby designated; and thus Achaia and Macedonia together constitute the Gr. lands in Europe, and are sometimes coupled as a closely connected pair (Ac 19²¹; cf. Ro 15²⁶, 2 Co 9², 1 Th 1⁸).

* This fact, hotly disputed for a time since 1847, is now generally admitted; but A. was treated more easily than some provinces; Athens (and Delos, which see), Sicyon (which received part of the territory of Corinth), Sparta (which was free from taxation and head of the Eleutherolakones) receiving specially favourable terms: see 1 Mac 15²².

The existence of Jewish settlements and synagogues in Corinth and Athens, the two greatest cities of Achaia, is attested in Ac 17¹⁷ 18^{7, 7}; and is suggested elsewhere by the rapid foundation of new churches in Achaia (1 Co 2¹, Ac 18²⁷). The presence of Jews is proved in Sparta and Sicyon as early as B.C. 139-138 through the letters addressed to those States by the Rom. Senate, 1 Mac 15²²; and in Bœotia, Ætolia, Attica, Argos, and Corinth by a letter of Agrippa to Caligula, Philo, leg. ad Gaium, § 36 (Mang. ii. 587). Jewish inscriptions have been found at Athens, Patræ, and Ægina.

LITERATURE.—There is a good article on Achaia in Pauly-Wissowa, RE: see also Marquardt, Röm. Staatsverw. i. p. 321 f.; Mommsen, Provinces of Rom. Emp. (Röm. Gesch. v.) ch. vii.

ACHAICUS ('Αχαϊκός).—The name is Roman (see CORINTH), and appears to have been perpetuated in the family of L. Mummius, who earned it by his conquest of Corinth and Achaia, B.C. 146. The A. of 1 Co 16¹⁷ may have been a freedman or client of the Mummi. In company with Stephanas and Fortunatus he had appeared at Ephesus, and had 'refreshed the spirit' of St. Paul, and, he adds, of the Corinthians also; they thus 'supplied' something which 'was lacking' on the part of the Corinthians. This suggests that they were distinct from (1) the bearers of the Cor. letter (1 Co 7¹) to St. Paul; and from (2) οἱ Χλόης (1 Co 1¹¹), who had more recently brought back to Ephesus the disquieting news, under the fresh impression of which 1 Co was written. (See STEPHANAS, FORTUNATUS, CHLOE; CORINTHIANS, FIRST EPISTLE TO).
 A. ROBERTSON.

ACHAN (אָחָן, in 1 Ch 27 אָחִיזַב, Sept. 'Αχδρ, prob. the correct form of the name, cf. 'Valley of Achor').—A man of the tribe of Judah, son of Carmi, also called (Jos 22²⁰) son of Zerah, who was his great-grandfather. After the fall of Jericho, he coveted and took a portion of the spoil, which had been devoted to utter destruction. This sin in the devoted thing, involving the breach of a vow made by the nation as one body, brought wrath upon all Israel, and their first attack upon Ai was repulsed with the loss of thirty-six men.

Investigation was made by lot to discover who had sinned, and Achan was singled out. He made full confession of his guilt, and the stolen treasure was found hid under his tent. Instant execution followed. Not only Achan himself, but his tent, his goods, his spoil, his cattle, and his children, were taken to the valley, afterwards called the valley of Achor. There they stoned him, and all that belonged to him, afterwards consuming the whole with fire, and raising over the ashes a great heap of stones. This act of vengeance is represented as being in some measure an expiation of the crime. 'The Lord turned from the fierceness of His anger.' The supposition that his family were accessories to his crime finds no support in the narrative. The language of Jos 7²⁵ ('all Israel stoned him with stones, and they burned them with fire') has been regarded as implying that Achan alone suffered the death penalty, the plural number referring to the oxen, asses, and sheep, and that his sons and daughters were brought to the valley merely as spectators, that they might have a terrible warning. It is doubtful if the text will bear this construction, and the sweeping nature of the act of judgment recorded is rather to be explained by reference to the stage of moral development which Israel had reached at the time (Jos 7¹⁻²⁰).

R. M. BOYD.

ACHAR.—The form in 1 Ch 27, 2 Es 7³⁸ of the name ACHAN (wh. see).

ACHBOR (עֲבוֹר 'mouse' or 'jerboa').—1. An Edomite (Gn 36³⁸). 2. A courtier under Josiah, mentioned as one of the deputation sent by the king to Huldah the prophetess; son of Micaiah (2 K 22^{12, 14}), and father of Elnathan (Jer 26²² om. LXX, 26¹²). Called Abdon (2 Ch 34²⁰).

C. F. BURNEY.

ACHIACHARUS (Ἀχιαχάρους B, Ἀχιεχάρους α, אֲחִיכָרָר, אֲחִיכָרָר Aram. and Heb., אַחִיכָרָר Syr.). the nephew of Tobit, was governor under Sarchedonus = Esarhaddon (To 1²¹ etc.), or, according to the Aramaic text, 'Rab over all that was his (the king's), and Shalit over all the land of Assyria'; cf. Dn 2⁴⁸. The nearest Hebrew name is Ahilud (אֲחִילֻד), 1 Ch 8⁷.

J. T. MARSHALL.

ACHIAS.—An ancestor of Ezra (2 Es 1²), omitted in Ezr and 1 Es.

ACHIM (Ἀχιμ).—Perhaps a shortened form of Jehoiachim, an ancestor of our Lord (Mt 1¹⁴). See GENEALOGY.

ACHIOR (Ἀχιὼρ, אֲחִיאוֹר 'brother of light').—1. In LXX Nu 34²⁷ for Ahilud. 2. In Jth (5⁵ etc.), a general of the Ammonites, spokesman for the Jewish cause, and afterwards convert (ch. 14). 3. In Vulg. To 11¹⁸ by mistake. F. C. PORTER.

ACHIPHA (B Ἀχιφά, A Ἀχιφά, AV Ἀχιφά), 1 Es 5³¹.—His children were among the 'temple servants' or Nethinim who returned with Zerubabel. Called Hakupha, Ezr 2⁵¹, Neh 7⁵³.

ACHISH (אֲחִישַׁי, Ἀχισός).—The king of Gath to whom David fled for refuge after the massacre of the priests at Nob. Finding himself recognised as the slayer of Goliath, David feigned madness, and so escaped from the Phil. court (1 S 21¹⁰). (This incident belongs to one of the later documents of Samuel.) In 1 S 27² (belonging to the Judaic or earliest document) A. is called 'the son of Maoch' (possibly = 'son of Maacah,' 1 K 2³⁹), receives David with his band of 600 men, and assigns him the city of Ziklag in the S. of Judah. Despite the wishes of A., the other Phil. princes refuse to let

David take part in the final campaign against Saul. J. F. STENNING.

ACHMETHA (Ἀχμεθα, Ἐκβατανα), the cap. of Media, mentioned Ezr 6² as the place where State documents of the time of Cyrus were preserved. The Aram. form of the name employed in Ezr (LXX Ἀμαθά) closely resembles the Pehlvi 𐭠𐭎𐭕𐭎𐭕𐭎 (Bundehesh, p. 23, i. 4), derived from the Old Pers. hangmatana (Behistan Inscr. II. xiii. 8), derived by Rawlinson from ham and gam, with the meaning 'meeting-place.' This Old Pers. form, accommodated to the Greek pronunciation, gave rise to the name Agbatana or Ecbatana (To 6⁵, Jth 1²⁻⁴), and survives in the modern Hamadan (34° 8' N, 48° 3' E), the cap. of the province of Persia bearing the same name, with which the ancient cap. of Media is ordinarily identified. Hamadan lies at the foot of Mt. Elwend, 'whence it derives a copious water supply, and in a plain thickly besprinkled with vineyards, orchards, and gardens, but whose elevation is 6000 ft. above the sea; it enjoys one of the finest situations in Persia' (Curzon, Persia, i. 566). This is clearly the Ecbatana of To 6⁵, where it is represented as lying midway between Nineveh and Rhages; and also of Strabo, xi. 523, who knows of it as the summer residence of the Parthian kings; for which its elevation and consequently cool climate suited it. But the ancient cap. of the Median empire, built, according to Herodotus (i. 98, 99), by the first king Deioeces (c. 700 B.C.), 'with walls of great size and strength, rising in circles one within the other,' each wall being coloured to correspond with one of the seven planets, is to be sought, acc. to Sir H. Rawlinson (JRGS x., art. 2, and ad l.c. Herod.), not at Hamadan, but at Takht-i-Sulayman (36° 25' N, 47° 10' E) in Adherbijan, the ancient Atropatene, distinguished from Media Magna. The Armenian historian, Moses of Chorene (ii. 84, ed. Whiston), speaks of the 'second Ecbatana, the seven-walled city'; and in the very learned paper quoted, Rawlinson (1) identifies that city with the Gazaka of the Greeks and Ganzak of the Armenians; (2) identifies Ganzak with the Shiz of Mohammedan writers; and (3) localises Shiz at Takht-i-Sulayman, where a conical hill, surrounded by ruins, which enclose a lake that has attracted the observation of ancient and modern travellers, corresponds with the description of Ecbatana given by Herodotus, as well as with what that historian tells us of the character of the surrounding country (i. 110). Hamadan, which lies at the foot of a mountain, would not admit of being fortified in the way described; and, though search has been made by numerous explorers (see Polak in Mittheilungen der Wiener Geograph. Gesellschaft, 1883, art. 1), no traces have been discovered of buildings such as Herodotus mentions. The description in Jth (1¹⁻⁴), to which no historical value attaches, would seem to refer to the same city as that of Herodotus; and another record of the impression created by the strength of its fortifications is, according to Rawlinson, to be found in the account of Var in the 2nd Fargard of the Vendidad. D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

ACHOR VALLEY (עֵקֶן עֲכֹר 'valley of trouble,' Jos 7^{24, 26} 15⁷, Is 65¹⁰, Hos 2¹⁵).—In the last passage the name may perhaps not be geographical. The valley was near Jericho, but its exact position is not quite certain. It appears, however, from its connexion with the border of Judah, to be probably Wady Kelt, a deep ravine close to the site of the Jericho of the Christian era. The stream becomes a foaming torrent after rains, and, issuing into the plains, runs between steep banks south of modern Jericho to the Jordan (SWP vol. iii. sh. xviii.). C. R. CONDER.

ACHSAH (אָכְסָה 'anklet, 1 Ch 2⁴⁹ AV Achsa).—The daughter of Caleb. She was promised in marriage by her father to the man who should capture Debir or Kiriath-sepher. Othniel, the brother (nephew?) of Caleb, accomplished the feat, and obtained the promised reward. As the bride was being conducted to her home, she lighted off her ass and besought her father to add 'springs of water' to the dowry of a south land (Negeb), which he had already given her. In response he granted her 'the upper springs and the nether springs' (Jos 15¹⁶⁻¹⁹, Jg 1⁹⁻¹⁵). R. M. BOYD.

ACHSHAPH (אָכְשָׁפִי).—There were perhaps two towns in Galilee of this name. 1. Noticed with places in Upper Galilee, may be the present El-Kesáf S. of the Leontes, on the mountains of Naphtali (Jos 11¹² 20). 2. A city of Asher (Jos 19²⁵), noticed with other towns near the coast, is more probably the modern El-Yasif near Acre. This is also noticed by the Mohar, an Egypt. traveller (14th cent. A.D.) on his way down the coast. The loss of the letter caph in this name may be compared with the well-known case of Achzib (2). See SWP vol. i. sheets ii. iii., and Chabas, Voyage d'un Égyptien. C. R. CONDER.

ACHZIB (אָכְזִיב).—1. One of the 22 towns of Asher (Jos 19²⁹ B' עֲחֻזָּיִם, A' אַחְזִיב, in Jg 1³¹ B' אַחְזָאֵל, A' אַחְזַדֵּל). It is identified as Ez-Zib on the coast between Acre and Tyre, near where the level line of sand is broken by the promontory of Ras-en-Nakurah. The present village—a mere huddle of glaring huts on one of the highest eminences of the sandy sea-wall—has nothing to indicate that it was once a place of some note. It is mentioned in Jg 1³¹ among the towns and districts that Israel failed to conquer. A. was called Aksibi by the Assyr., and Eodippa by the Greeks and Romans. Josephus and Jerome refer to it. The Rabbin. writers, hedging the Land as they did the Book, marked out three districts, indicated by A., Antioch, and Mesopotamia. They inclined to the view that A. was on the outside of the first boundary line. All within was Holy Land, where bread, wine, and oil could be found ceremonially clean, and where the dates of the months and their fasts could be accurately known in time for observance.

2. Another Achzib (B' כְּעִזָּיִם, A. omits), situated in the Shephelah or 'low-land' of Judah, is mentioned along with Keilah and Mareshah in Jg 15⁴⁴, and with Mareshah and Adullam in Mic 1¹⁴. This neighbourhood suggests a possible identification with 'Ain-Kezbeh near Adullam. The name appears as Kezib (כְּזִיב, Χασβί) in Gn 38², and as Kozéba (כְּזִיבָה, Β' Σωχηθά, Α' Χωσηθα) in 1 Ch 4²². Some literary interest attaches to Mic 1¹⁴, where it is said that 'the houses of Achzib shall be a lie (Achzab) to the kings of Israel.' The resemblance seems to imply a play on the word. Occurring in a passage of vehement reproach, such derision corresponds to the spitting on the ground, which Orientals resort to when greatly excited and provoked—as an expression of uttermost nausea and contempt. G. M. MACKIE.

ACQUAINT, ACQUAINTANCE.—Acquaint as a reflexive verb, meaning to make the acquaintance of, is found in Job 22²¹, Ec 2². Cf. Shak.'s Temp. II. ii. 39: 'Misery acquaints a man with strange bedfellows.' Acquaintance is both sing. and plur., Ps 55¹³ 'But it was thou, a man mine equal, my guide, and mine a.' (RV 'my familiar friend'); Lk 23⁴⁹ 'And all his a. and the women that followed him from Galilee.' Acquainted, meaning 'to be familiar with,' occurs Ps 139³, Is 53³ 'a. with grief.' J. HASTINGS.

ACROSTIC.—A poem so composed that the initial letters of certain recurring periods (lines, distichs, etc.) follow some definite arrangement. In the OT all the recognised acrostics are alphabetical, i.e. the initials make up the Heb. alphabet. They are Pss 9-10. 25. 34. 37. 111. 112. 119. 145, Pr 31¹⁰⁻³¹, La 1. 2. 3. 4, Sir 51¹³⁻³⁰. See also Hab 1²⁻²¹. The periods assigned to each letter may consist of one line (Pss 111. 112), two (Pss 34. 145, etc.), three (La 3, etc.), or even sixteen lines (Ps 119); or the lines may vary in number, as esp. in La 1 and 2, and to some extent in the Psalms. Where the period consists of several lines, the initial letter is sometimes repeated with each line (La 3) or distich (Ps 119). In other respects the acrostics vary very much in style and subject, and, though usually late, undoubtedly belong to very different dates. Thus Pss 37 and 119 from their didactic style are evidently late, while the Jahwistic Ps 25 is comparatively early. The acrostic character of these poems often throws indirectly an interesting light on their history, showing us unmistakably the hand of the reviser, who sometimes did not scruple to disturb their alphabetical character. The most striking example of this is in Ps 9-10, originally one alphabetical psalm of usually four lines to each letter. This the reviser cut into two, in Ps 9 adding vv. 20-21 * as an appendix (comp. Ps 25²² 34²³), and omitting two or three verses after v. 5. In Ps 10 the verses represented by ב-ז were omitted to make room for the insertion of a very curious and ancient fragment in vv. 2-11. Somewhat similar, but less violent, alterations occur in Pss 25. 34 and 37. Thus in Ps 25 the insertion of א-ב by the Elohist reviser (see HEXATEUCH) in v. 2 gives א instead of ב as the initial letter. It would seem also that v. 18 has been substituted for a פ verse, or else that the latter has been omitted. The omission of the י verse in Ps 145 appears to be accidental. It is interesting to notice that when the psalms are, from their style and position in the Psalter, likely to be of late date, there is little or no interference with their alphabetical arrangement. The transposition of the letters י and פ in La 2 and 3 cannot easily be accounted for.

Bickell, Zeitsch. für Kathol. Theol. (Innsbruck) 1882, p. 326 ff., has shown that the conclusion of Sir, of which the original Heb. is now lost, was alphabetical, the letters ב-נ , vv. 21-23, being evident at once from the Syr. version. It has also been maintained that Nah 1²⁻²¹ was originally alphabetical; but if so, the text has been so altered by revision or corruption that very few traces of this remain.

Some critics claim to have discovered a name acrostic in Ps 110, the initials of 1-4, after omitting the introductory words, spelling יְהוָה ; but this coincidence can hardly be considered conclusive.

i. The ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, the fifth book in the English Canon, is unique in its character.

* The verses are numbered in this article according to the Heb. Bible.

While we have four separate narratives of the life of our Lord, and a very considerable number of letters by different apostles, it is the only history of the early Church that can make any claim to be authentic. Some writers indeed, such as Holtzmann (Handkommentar, p. 307), suggest that it is to be put on the level of other works written in the second century recording the deeds of the apostles; but such a position is quite untenable. Even if some of them, such as the Acts of Paul and Thecla, may rest on an historical basis, that is the most which can be admitted. The greater number of them, most notably the Clementine Romances, for which there was once claimed almost an equality with the Acts, are now decisively thrown to a later date. The Acts is the sole remaining historical work which deals with the beginnings of Church history; and this amongst other causes has made it a favourite mark of modern criticism.

ii. TEXT AND TRANSMISSION.—Although our authorities for the transmission of the Acts are in the main similar to those for the Gospels, they are fewer in number. Like the Gospels, it is contained in the five leading Uncials (α A B C D), in the Vulg., in the Peshitta and Harclean Syriac, in the two chief Coptic VSS, and there are quotations from it in the leading Fathers. Two sources are, however, defective. We have nothing corresponding to the Curetonian and Sinaitic Syriac, nor do we even know whether such a text existed; and the Old Latin is very inadequately represented. On the other hand, we possess one other Uncial of considerable importance, namely, the Codex Laudianus (E) of the Bodleian Library, Oxford, a bilingual MS. of the Acts only. In later Minuscules it is generally found forming one volume with the Catholic Epistles.

The inadequate representation of the Old Latin and the absence of an old Syriac text are to be regretted, owing to the fact that the particular textual phenomena which they exhibit meet us in some authorities of the Acts in a very conspicuous form, namely, what is called the Western text (by Sanday and Headlam, Romans, p. lxxi, the δ text; by Blass, Acta Apostolorum, p. 24, the β text). This is represented more or less definitely by the two bilingual MSS. D E, by the marginal readings of the Harclean Syriac, by the Old Latin so far as we can recover it (Codex Gigas, Floriacensis, and similar fragments, with the Paris MS. Latin 321, edited by M. Berger), and by Western Fathers, esp. Irenæus, Tertullian, Cyprian, Lucifer, Augustine, Vigilinus, Bede (some having a mixed text). The characteristics of this text are well known; it adds passages of considerable length, it paraphrases, it sometimes seems to correct the shorter text; and all these characteristics appear, but in a very much more marked form, in the Acts; it sometimes gives a different aspect to a passage by the variations from the shorter text, sometimes its variations give additional and apparently authentic information. The problem of the origin of this text has caused in recent years a considerable amount of discussion. Some few critics, such as Bornemann (1848), have been bold enough to consider it the original text; but that opinion has found few followers. Rendel Harris, in 1891, started a series of modern discussions by suggesting that the variations of Codex Bezae were due to Latinisation, and implied the existence of a bilingual MS. at least as early as 150 A.D. He also found signs of Montanist influence. His main theory was adequately refuted by Sanday in the Guardian (18th and 25th May 1892), who ascribed the recension suggested by the Western text to Antioch. Ramsay, in 1892 (Church in Rom. Emp. p. 151, ed. 2), found evidence of a Catholic reviser who lived in Asia before the year 150, a locality which had already been suggested by Lightfoot (Smith's *DB*² i. p. 42), while WH suggest N.W. Syria or Asia Minor (Gr. Test. ii. p. 108). Dr. Chase, in 1893, attacked the problem from another side, accepting Antioch as the locality, and finding the principal cause of the variations in retranslation from the Syriac, a position he failed to make good. Lastly, Dr. Blass has suggested that the author issued two editions, and that both forms of the text are due to himself personally, the one representing a rough draft, the other a revision: again, a theory which is hardly satisfactory (see Chase, Crit. Rev. 1894, p. 300 ff.; Blass' reply begins in Hermathena, No. xxi. p. 122).

A definite solution of the problem has not been attained, nor has it yet been attacked in a really scientific manner. A careful study of the MSS. D and E, and their relations, is necessary in order to eliminate their individual peculiarities. But in all probability the solution lies in the direction suggested by WH (p. 122 f.). If we compare the phenomena presented by the text of apocr. writings we find just the same tendency to variation, but in an even more exaggerated form. Popular literature was treated with great freedom by copyists and editors. Immediate edification or convenience was the one thing considered. During the first seventy years of their existence, i.e. up to the year A.D. 150, the books of NT were hardly treated as canonical. The text was not fixed, and the ordinary licence of paraphrases, of interpretation, of additions, of glosses, was allowed. These could be exhibited most easily in early and popular translations into other languages. It was a process which would have a tendency to continue until the book was treated as canonical, and its text looked on as something sacred. Although some whole classes of readings may be due to one definite place or time, yet for the most part they represent rather a continuous process, and it is not probable that any theory which attempts to tie all variations down to a special locality or a definite revision will now be made good.

In one point, however, WH's conclusions will require modification. It must not be forgotten that Western authorities represent ultimately an independent tradition from the Archetype. It is quite conceivable, therefore, that in any single reading, which is clearly not Western in its character, they may preserve a better tradition than the MSS whose text we should usually follow. We must, in other words, distinguish Western readings from readings in Western authorities. For example, Ἑλληνας read by A D in 11²⁰ may be correct.

iii. The LITERARY HISTORY of the Acts is similar to that of the great number of books of NT. In the last quarter of the second century, when we begin to have any great extent of Christian literature, we find it definitely cited, treated as Scripture, and assigned to St. Luke. This is the case esp. with Irenæus, who cites passages so continuous as to make it certain that he had the book before him substantially as we have it, but with many of the readings we call Western. He lays stress on the fact that there is internal evidence for the apostolic authorship, and is followed in this by the Muratorian Fragment (Iren. Adv. Hær. i. 23. 1; iii. 12. 12, 13. 3, 14. 1, 15. 1; iv. 15. 1). The book is also ascribed to St. Luke by Tertullian (De Ieiunio, 10) and Clement of Alex. (Strom. v. 12. § 83, p. 696, cf. Sanday, BL, p. 66 f.); while undoubted quotations appear in Polykrates of Ephesus (Eus. Hist. Eccl. v. 24), in the letter concerning the martyrs of Vienne and Lyons (ib. v. 1), and a possible one in Dionysius of Corinth (ib. iv. 23). By this date the work is an integral portion of the Canon in all Churches, and there are no signs of any difference of opinion. Nor is there any reason for arguing that because our knowledge of it begins suddenly, therefore the book suddenly appeared in the Canon. We have no decisive evidence earlier, because we have no books to contain that evidence. Moreover, the wide area over which our evidence extends seems to imply that the ascription to St. Luke is a genuine tradition, and not a mere critical deduction.

For an earlier period the industry of critics has collected a number of parallels, on which indeed, for the most part, no great stress can be laid; but two lines of argument enable us to take the book farther back. The unity of authorship of the Acts and St. Luke's Gospel must be admitted as axiomatic, and it is quite clear that Tatian, Justin, and Marcion were acquainted with St. Luke's Gospel. Now, the existence of St. Luke's Gospel implies the existence of the Acts, and this conclusion is supported by a number of parallels between the Acts and Justin, which would not perhaps be by themselves of great weight (Ac 1^s = Ap. i. 50, 2^{so} = Dial. 68, 7^{so} = Dial. 16, 17^{so} = Ap. ii. 10, 26^{so} = Dial. 36, 76). The use of St. Luke by Marcion clearly carries the Acts back to the early part of the second century; but we can go still earlier. Among the apostolic Fathers there are suggestions of contact with Barnabas, Hermas, and Clement on which little stress can be laid, while Papias shows himself acquainted with the persons mentioned by St. Luke; but in Ignatius and Polycarp (Ac 2^l = Pol. 1, 10^{so} = Pol. 2, 20^{so} = Pol. 2, 7^{so} = Pol. 6, 8^{so} = Pol. 12, 1^{so} = Ign. Mag. 5, 6^{so} = Ign. Phil. 11, 10^{so} = Ign. Smyn. 3) there are resemblances which, although slight, are so exact as to make the hypothesis of literary obligation almost necessary, as Holtzmann even seems to think (Einleitung,³ 1892, p. 406, 'there are still more noteworthy resemblances with Justin, Polycarp, and Ignatius'). This last evidence is of increasing importance, as not only the genuineness but also the early date of the letters of Polycarp and Ignatius is becoming daily better established, and these quotations almost compel us to throw back the writing of the Acts into the 1st cent.—this is, of course, provided we accept the literary unity. If we accept the elaborate distinction of sources (see § x.) which has become fashionable lately, no evidence at an early date is valuable except for the words quoted.

The history subsequent to the second century need not detain us. Some few heretics appear to have left the work out of the Canon, and Chrysostom complains that it was not much read in his time; but it is always with him as with all other Church writers, one of the accepted books. Its place in the Canon varies. The ordinary position is immediately after the Gospels (Evv. Act. Cath. Paul. or Evv. Act. Paul. Cath.), and this is the place it occupies in almost all Gr. MSS. from the Vatican onwards, in the Muratorian Fragment and later lists, in Syr. and Lat. MSS. The order, Evv. Paul. Act. Cath., is that of the Sin., some Minuscules, MSS of the Peshitta of the 5th and 6th cent., the Codex Fuldensis and Vulg. MSS from the 13th cent. A third order is Evv. Paul. Cath. Act., which is found in the Apostolic Canons, 85, the Bohairic and perhaps the Sahidic MSS, in Jerome's Bible and Spanish Vulg. MSS. The only point of importance in the order would be whether there was an early tradition grouping the writings of St. Luke together. There is very little evidence of this. In some cases St. Luke's was placed fourth among the Gospels, but this happened, as a rule, in authorities which do not put the Acts next; for example, the Codex Claromontanus and some Coptic authorities. There seems, however, some evidence for thinking that in Origen's time the order of the Gospels was Jn Mt Mk Lk, and that these were followed by the Acts. In the case of Irenæus, however, our oldest evidence for Asia and the West, we find the Gospel already separated from the Acts and definitely grouped with the other Gospels (Zahn, Geschichte des Neutest. Kanons, ii. 343-383).

iv. MODERN CRITICISM.—1. By far the most prevalent opinion concerning the Acts has always been, and still is, that which ascribes it to St. Luke the companion of St. Paul. This is the opinion, not only of those critics who are classed as orthodox, but of Renan, whilst it has recently been maintained with great vigour by Ramsay and Blass. It is, of course, compatible with very varying estimates of its historical authority. While Renan considers it valuable mainly as a witness to the opinions and ideas of the author's own time, Ramsay, on the other hand, claims for St. Luke a place in the very first rank of historians—i.e. amongst those who have good material, who use it well, and who write their history with a very clear insight into the true course of events. Even he, however, admits that for the earlier portion its value is dependent on the value of the sources used.

2. As soon as Baur began to develop his theory of Church history, it became apparent that it was inconsistent with the Acts; and partly arising from a comparison with the history recorded in the Galatians and for other critical reasons, but partly owing to a different à priori conception of what was the nature of the development of the early Church, an opinion has widely prevailed that the Acts presents us with a fancy picture written in the second century in the interests of the growing Catholicism of the day. This has been the view of Baur, Schwegler, Zeller (to whom we owe by far the fullest investigation on this side), Hilgenfeld, Volkmar, Hausrath, Holsten, Lipsius, Davidson, van Manen, and others. But in the extreme form in which it was held it is gradually being given up. Neither the late date nor the exaggerated view of the differences of parties in the early Church is really tenable. The unhistorical character comes, it is now said, rather from defective knowledge and insight, not from deliberate purpose, and the writer wrote as he could rather than as he would. He represents, in fact, the opinions of his day, those of 'Heathen Christianity developing into Catholicity' (Harnack, Hist. of Dogma, Eng. tr. i. 56). Moreover, few would care for a much later date than 100 A.D. 'The authorship by St. Luke would be just conceivable if some time about the year 80 were taken as the terminus ad quem' (Holtzmann, Handkomm. p. 312).

3. The school of Baur had the great merit of establishing the fact that the Acts is an artistic whole, that the writer had a clear conception of the manner in which the Church developed, and wrote with that idea always before him. In the last ten years a series of writers have attacked the question of the sources of the book (see § x.) in a manner quite inconsistent with this. They have imagined a number of writers who have gradually compiled the book by collecting and piecing together scraps of other books, and by altering or cutting out such passages in the same as seemed inconsistent with their particular opinions. This view, in anything like an extreme form, is absolutely inconsistent with the whole character of the work.

A sufficient amount has been said about the various opinions which have been held, and it will be most convenient to pursue our subsequent investigations from the point of view which we consider most probable.

v. PURPOSE AND CONTENTS.—The purpose which the writer of the Acts had before him may be gathered from his own preface, corresponding as it does with the plan and arrangement of the work. There is indeed a slight obscurity. He begins by referring to his previous book in the words τὸν μὲν πρῶτον λόγον, and very clearly sums up the contents of the work as being περὶ πάντων ὧν ἤρξατο ὁ Ἰησοῦς ποιεῖν τε καὶ διδάσκειν; but he never gives the second part of the sentence. Its purport, however, may be gathered from the following verses. The apostles were to receive the gift of the Holy Ghost and of power, and were to be witnesses of the Lord in Jerusalem and in all Judæa and Samaria, and to the uttermost parts of the earth. In other words, the subject of the book is (1) the divine credentials of the apostles as exhibited in their power, and (2) the extension of the gospel in the stages marked by the words Jerusalem, Judæa, and Samaria, the uttermost parts of the earth.

When we examine the structure of the book, we find that it almost exactly corresponds with these words. There is clear evidence of method. The writer begins with the enumeration of the names of the apostles and the members of the community. Then comes the gift of the Holy Ghost, and the immediate outburst of power. Then the preaching in Jerusalem. In this we notice that all signs of the apostolic power and all points which lead to the spread of the gospel are specially noted. An instance of the first is the story of Ananias and Sapphira; of the last, the way in which the different stages in the growth of the Church are continually emphasised (2⁴¹, 47, 4⁸). In ch. 6 there is clearly a new start. The appointment of the seven is dwelt on, both because of the immediate exhibition of power (6⁷), and because of the immense results which followed from the preaching of Stephen and the persecution which followed his death.

In 8⁴ the second stage of progress is entered upon. The word spreads to Samaria (8⁴⁻²⁵). The extension of the gospel is suggested by the story of the Ethiopian eunuch (8²⁶⁻⁴⁰). In 9¹⁻³⁰ comes Saul's conversion, an event of extreme importance for the writer's purpose. In 9³¹ is given another summary of the progress of the Church—by this time throughout all Judæa and Galilee and Samaria. A series of incidents relating to the missionary work of St. Peter now follows (9^{32-11¹⁸}), selected as containing the first definite signs of the extension of the gospel to the Gentiles, "Ἄρα καὶ τοῖς ἔθνεσιν ὁ θεὸς τὴν μετάνοιαν εἰς ζωὴν ἔδωκεν". In 11¹⁹ we reach a further stage. The word is preached in Phœnicia and Cyprus and Antioch, and the Church of Antioch is founded—the word being preached there to those who are not Jews. In 12²⁴ again the spread of the word is dwelt on. Another stage in the narrative is ended.

We get in 13¹ or 12²⁵ what is clearly intended to be a new departure. The amount of preparation shows us the importance that the author attaches to the first setting out of Paul and Barnabas together, and from this time onwards the narrative proceeds very definitely forward until the time when St. Paul reaches Rome. We may again mark stages in the narrative—13^{4-14²⁶}—commonly called the first missionary journey of St. Paul; in which we notice the emphasis laid on the exhibition of δύναμις on the part of the apostle. In 15¹⁻²⁹ comes the apostolic council; then 15^{36-21¹⁶} the further missionary enterprise of St. Paul. Here we notice how it is always the points of departure which are dwelt on, as, for example, the first preaching in Europe and in great and important towns. Then 21^{17-28¹⁶} the series of events which ultimately lead St. Paul to Rome. Here the great fulness of detail arises partly from the better knowledge of the author, partly from the important character of the events,—St. Paul preaches before rulers and kings, Lk 21¹²,—partly because they are all events which help in taking the gospel to Rome. There the author leaves St. Paul preaching, because he has then accomplished the purpose of his narrative. Rome is typical of the ends of the earth. A definite point is reached, and the narrative is definitely concluded. (For arguments in favour of the definite conclusion of the work, see Lightfoot in Smith's *DB*² i. 27, as against Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 23.)

The above sketch of the plan of the work has, at any rate, the merit of being an attempt to discover the author's purpose by an examination of his own language. The fault of other views is that they exaggerate points of minor importance. A series of writers from Schneckenburger (1841) onwards have seen in the work a book of conciliating tendency, based on the parallelism between St. Peter and St. Paul; and this view in a more or less modified form has been the prevailing one. It has, as will be suggested, this much truth, that the writer would pass over for the most part incidents of a less creditable character; he did not, however, do so, as this theory implies, because he wished to conceal anything (he gives us quite sufficient hints of the existence of difference of opinion, 15⁷, 37-21^{20¹}), but because they did not help in the aim of his work. He looks upon Christianity as a polity or society, and it is the growth of this society he depicts. The internal history is looked at in so far as it leads to external growth. The view of Pfeleiderer and some others is that the book was written from an apologetic point of view to defend Christianity against Judaism and paganism. With this object, like the later Christian apologists, the writer depicts the Roman authorities as, on the whole, favourable to Christianity, while he represents the attacks as coming from the Jews. There is no doubt that he does so; but the obvious reason for doing so was the fact that the author was narrating things as they happened, while he gives no hint that his work is intended to be apologetic. It is addressed to a believing Christian, not to any outsider.

vi. ANALYSIS.—A certain amount of discussion has taken place as to whether the Acts should be divided into two or three main parts. All such discussions are thoroughly fruitless. There are quite clearly definite stages in the narrative, and the writer is systematic. We must observe the structure, but we are at liberty to make such divisions as seem convenient—remembering that the divisions are not the writer's, but our own. The following is suggested as a convenient analysis on the lines of the previous summary. The speeches are italicised:—

vii. AUTHORSHIP AND DATE.—The following arguments enable us to fix with a considerable approach to certainty the authorship of the Acts. (1) It is quite certain that it is written by the author of the third Gospel. This is shown by the preface, which, like that of the Gospel, is addressed to Theophilus, and shows that the author claims to have written such a Gospel, and by the identity of style between the two books (the best and most recent demonstration is that of Friedrich). This fact may be taken as admitted on all sides. (2) The presence of certain portions written in the first person, seems to imply that the writer was an eye-witness of some of the events he describes, and a companion of St. Paul. In the Acts there are certain passages which are technically known as the 'we' sections, viz. 16¹⁰⁻¹⁷ 20⁵⁻¹⁸ 21¹⁻¹⁸ 27¹⁻²⁸⁶. Here the writer speaks in the first person. Moreover, these sections and also the accompanying incidents, in which the writer does not take part, but at which he was probably present, are presented with great fulness and exactness of detail, and seem to imply that the writer was an eye-witness. So far there is general agreement. But two explanations then become possible. Either the author of these sections was the author of the Acts, who changes the person when he becomes himself one of the companions of St. Paul, or these passages are one of the sources which the compiler of the work makes use of. All probability is in favour of the first view. The style of the 'we' sections is that of the author. It is perfectly true, indeed, that the author works up his sources in his own phraseology, as may be seen by a study of the third Gospel; but it is hardly possible to believe that a writer so artistic as the author of the Acts certainly is should have left these exceedingly incongruous first persons. So keenly has this been felt, that it has been suggested that the author introduced these sections in the first person to give an appearance of genuineness to his narrative—a suggestion which refutes both itself and some other theories. An examination of the scope of these sections lends itself to the same view. The first section begins at Troas (16¹⁰) and continues to Philippi (16¹⁶); the second begins at Philippi (20⁵) and continues over the whole period to the end of the book, the third person being occasionally adopted, as in 16¹⁷, when the event recorded concerns only St. Paul and some of his companions, and not the whole party, nor the author personally. The most reasonable explanation of that fact is that the writer of these sections joined the party at Troas and went to Philippi; that after an interval of some years he again joined St. Paul at Philippi, perhaps his native place, and accompanied him first to Jerusalem and then to Rome. If any other hypothesis be adopted, it is difficult to account for the exceedingly fragmentary character of the sections. On the other side, it is argued that the 'we' sections are so much more historical in their character than some of the other sections, and so much fuller in detail, that they clearly betray a different hand. But the difference is never greater than would be found in passing from the work of an eye-witness to the work of one who, although a contemporary, is not an eye-witness. It is urged, again, that the work cannot be from the hand of a contemporary because of the inexactness and incorrectness of the knowledge of apostolic times which it exhibits. But this is really begging the whole question. We have no right to argue that a book is late because it is unhistorical, unless we have objective reasons for stating that it is so, which overpower the positive evidence for the early date. The balance of probability is in favour of the author of the Acts being identical with the author of the 'we' sections, and therefore of being a companion of St. Paul, but a companion who joined the apostle somewhat late in his career, and who therefore could only have a second-hand acquaintance with earlier events.

(3) The tradition of the Church from the end of the second century is that the author was Luke, a companion of St. Paul; and this exactly corresponds with the circumstances already described. St. Luke is the only companion of St. Paul, so far as our knowledge goes, who fulfils the conditions. The Acts could not have been written by Timothy, for Timothy was a companion during an interval when the 'we' sections cease (Ac 17¹⁴); nor by Titus, for we know from Gal 2³ that he was with St. Paul earlier; nor by Silas, who was at the council (Ac 15²²). St. Luke is never mentioned in any of the earlier Epistles, but he is in the later. Corroborative evidence of the Lucan authorship has been found in the medical terms used (Col 4¹⁴, Lk 8⁴³, Ac 28⁹ etc.).

(4) The argument in favour of the Lucan authorship of both the Gospel and Acts, based on a chain of coincidences, has been put very strongly by Bp. Lightfoot. (a) Tradition gives to the Gospel the name of St. Luke, a companion of St. Paul. (b) Internal but unobtrusive evidence shows its Pauline character. It dwells particularly on the universality and freedom of the gospel; and it refers to less obvious incidents in our Lord's life mentioned by St. Paul (1 Co 11²³=Lk 22¹⁹, 1 Co 15⁵=Lk 24³⁴). (c) The Acts of the Apostles was certainly written by the same person as the Gospel. (d) An independent line of argument shows that it was written by a companion of St. Paul. (e) It, too, is Pauline in its character (so far as we are at liberty to use that word). It represents the same universality and freedom of the gospel, and the same idea of the Christian Church, but more in the concrete (see Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 124-128).

(5) The balance of argument is clearly, then, in favour of St. Luke as author of the Acts. There is, however, still room for doubt as to the time when it was written. (a) One theory places it almost immediately after the close of the narrative, and just before the outbreak of the Neronian persecution. The book, it is urged, comes to an abrupt conclusion, and the only explanation is that it is unfinished. As has been pointed out above, there is no real reason for saying the book is unfinished. The arrival of St. Paul in Rome formed a suitable conclusion, and the ending is similar in character to the ending of the Gospel. In the extreme form this argument is untenable, but it is still quite possible to hold that the narrative concluded here, because not many more events had occurred. Moreover, it might be held that the tone in relation to the empire represented the period before rather than after the Neronian persecution. The early date is still held by Blass, and the arguments against it are not very strong.

(b) The argument for a later date is generally based on Lk 21²⁰ as compared with Mt 24¹⁵, Mk 13¹⁴. It is stated that the form of the prophecy there recorded has been modified by the knowledge of what happened at the siege of Jerusalem. The Gospel therefore was written after that event, and the Acts somewhat later, under the Flavians. The criticism of Blass, however, has very considerable weight, that there is little in the prophecies recorded by St. Luke which goes much beyond the language of Dn 9²⁶; and the reason given for a late date can hardly be considered demonstrative. Neither can that of Ramsay, who thinks that the Gospel must have been written just after Titus was associated in the empire with his father, so as to explain the incorrect date of Tiberius (Lk 3¹). No arguments are certain, and the language of Lk 21²⁰ would in any case be quite compatible with a date some time before A.D. 70; but perhaps on the whole the amount of perspective contained in the book is hardly compatible with the earlier date, just as the relation of the third Gospel to the other two suggests the later date, and a period shortly after 70 is the most probable. Whether we can, as Ramsay suggests, press the πρῶτον of 1¹, and argue that a third treatise was in contemplation, is very doubtful.

The following are dates suggested by various writers, and are for the most part taken from Holtzmann:—64-70 (Hug, A. Maier, Schneckenburger, Hitzig, Grau, Nösgen, Blass), c. 80 (Ewald, Lechler, Bleek, Renan, Meyer, Weiss, Ramsay), 75-100 (Wendt, Spitta), 90 (Köstlin, Mangold), 95 (Hilgenfeld), c. 100 (Volkmar), 110-120 (Pfeiderer), Trajan and Hadrian (Schwegler, Zeller, Overbeck, Davidson, Keim, Hausrath), 125-150 (Straatman, Meijboom, van Manen).

The arguments for a later date are given most fully among recent writers by Holtzmann (Einleitung,³ 1892, p. 405) as follows:—(1) Acquaintance with the Pauline Epistles (Rom, Gal, Cor, Eph, Thess, and Heb), also with Josephus. (2) Deliberate correction of the narrative of Gal 1¹⁷⁻²⁴ in Acts 9²⁶⁻³⁰, of Gal 2¹⁻¹⁰ in 15¹⁻³³, of Gal 2¹¹ in Acts 15³⁵⁻³⁹. (3) Unhistorical account of speaking with tongues (Ac 2¹¹), of St. Paul's relations with the law, and legendary narratives such as that of the death of Agrippa, 12²³. (4) The writer is contemporary in time with the literary activity of Plutarch as shown by the parallel lives; and of Arrian and Pausanias (narratives of Journey), also of the πρωτοί of different apostles. (5) Atmosphere of the Catholic Church; parallelism of St. Peter and St. Paul; traces of the hierarchical view of the Church, and esp. the sacramental theory of laying on of hands. (6) Resemblances with the Pastoral Epistles. (7) Importance assigned to the political side of Christianity; the Roman Empire always represented as favourable to Christianity.

It is very difficult to deal with some of these objections quite seriously. Even if the use of the Pauline Epistles were proved, it is difficult to see what that has to do with the late date of the Acts. The contradictions with the Pauline Epistles are largely dependent on a priori views of Church history. Some points, as the resemblance to Plutarch, are purely fanciful. The political point of view is exactly that of St. Paul's Epistles. One point requires perhaps slightly fuller investigation; and the remaining points, so far as they are serious, will be best dealt with in an independent survey of the historical character of the work.

viii. THE RELATION OF THE ACTS TO JOSEPHUS presents to us, under the auspices of modern criticism, a curious double problem. While older critics, like Zeller, contented themselves with pointing out historical discrepancies, later critics since Keim (Gesch. Jesu, iii. 1872, 134, and Aus dem Urchristenthum, 1878, 18) have attempted to show that St. Luke made use of Josephus. The crucial passage is that concerning Theudas (Ac 5³⁶). In his speech Gamaliel is made to refer to a rebellion under a leader of that name; but according to Jos. this took place at least ten years later, under Cuspius Fadus, and long after that of Judas the Galilæan. So far the problem was simple, but it is now maintained that the mistake arose from the misapprehension of a passage of Josephus. In one paragraph he speaks about Theudas, in the next of the Sons of Judas of Galilee, and this, it is maintained, is the origin of the mistake. The two passages are quoted thus—

Jos. Ant. XX. v. 1f.
Θευδᾶς . . . πείθει τὸν πλείστον ὄχλον . . .
προφήτης γὰρ ἔλεγεν εἶναι,
κ.τ.λ.
Φᾶδος . . . ἐξέπεμψεν
ἴλην ἰππέων . . . ἐπ' αὐτούς, ἦτις . . . πολλοὺς . . .
ἀνείλεν.

πρὸς τοῦτοις δὲ καὶ οἱ παῖδες Ἰουδᾶ τοῦ Γαλιλαίου ἀπηχθήσαν τοῦ τὸν λαὸν ἀπὸ Ῥωμαίων ἀποστήσαν-τος Κυρινίου τῆς Ἰουδαίας τιμητέοντος.

Acts 5³⁶.
ἀνέστη Θεοῦδᾶς λέγων
εἶναι τινα ἑαυτὸν . . . ὃς ἀνηρέθη καὶ πάντες ὄσοι ἐπέειθοντο αὐτῷ διελύθη-σαν, κ.τ.λ.

μετὰ τοῦτον ἀνέστη
Ἰουδᾶς ὁ Γαλιλαῖος ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις τῆς ἀπογραφῆς καὶ ἀπέστησε λαὸν ὀπίσω

Now, whatever plausibility this comparison may have at first sight is very much diminished when we remember that the two passages in Jos. do not immediately follow one another, but are separated by an interval of 20 lines or more. Nor when we come to examine them do we find any close resemblance in the language. There are words common to both accounts, but they are none of them characteristic; it is not easy to describe a revolt without using the word ἀποστῆσαι in some form, while the details are different in the two accounts; the Acts give 4000 men, Jos. gives no number. This is recognised by Clemen (SK, 1895, p. 339), who is of opinion that the author of the Acts had read Jos. but forgotten him. Is this resemblance, or fancied resemblance, supported by any other passages? Keim and the author of Supernatural Religion have collected a large number of parallel passages, but they are not of a character to bring conviction. On the other hand, the argument of Zeller (Eng. tr. i. p. 232) on the discrepancy between the Acts and Jos. in the case of the death of Herod Agrippa is quite sufficient to prove independence; and this argument has been very well brought out by Schürer. Whatever the differences between the Acts and Jos. prove, they are only conceivable on the supposition of independence. Most of these do not affect our estimate of the historical character of the work; the difficulty about Theudas, even if it admits of no solution, may cast doubts on the historical character of Gamaliel's speech; it does not really affect the question of the Lucan authorship of the Acts.

ix. THE HISTORICAL VALUE OF THE ACTS.—1. A priori Objections.—In investigating the historical value of the Acts, we must first of all clear the ground by putting on one side a number of a priori objections. To say that the document is unhistorical because it narrates miraculous events, or because it contains accounts of angels, is simply to beg the question. Even if we were quite certain that such events were impossible and never occurred, we have abundant evidence for knowing that the early Christians believed in them. St. Paul claims himself to have worked what were believed both by him and his readers to be miracles (Blass, Acta Apostolorum, p. 8f.). Again, all such difficulties as arise from an a priori theory of Church history must be banished. To deny documents because they conflict with one's theories, is to argue in a vicious circle. Although there are few serious critics who now accept the Tübingen theories, yet many of their assumptions have acquired a traditional hold on the minds of writers, and consciously or unconsciously affect their arguments. Similarly, objections based on the hierarchical or sacramental tendencies of a book assume that we can find the beginning of such tendencies in the Church; which we clearly cannot do.

Much the same may be said of the supposed parallels between St. Peter and St. Paul. According to Holtzmann, the strongest argument for the critical position is the correspondence between the acts of St. Peter and the other apostles on the one side, and those of St. Paul on the other. Both begin their ministry with the healing of a lame man; both work miracles, the one with his shadow, the other with napkins. Demons flee in the name of St. Peter and in the name of St. Paul. St. Peter meets Simon Magus; St. Paul Elymas and the Ephesian magicians. Both raise the dead. Both receive divine honours. Both are supported by Pharisees in the council. St. Paul is stoned at Lystra, Stephen at Jerusalem. St. Paul is made to adopt the language of St. Peter, St. Peter of St. Paul, and so on. The value of such an argument is one which can only depend upon individual feeling. It is, of course, perfectly true that they both occupy prominent places, that they are, in fact, the writer's heroes; but that does not prove the unhistorical character. We may well refer to Plutarch's lives. Because the writer finds parallels between the lives of two men, it does not prove that his narrative is fictitious. But, further, although there are resemblances, there are very considerable differences as well, and the resemblances arise largely from the positions in which the apostles were placed. There is nothing unnatural in the points of similarity, and they are balanced by many points of difference.

Lastly, all arguments against the Lucan authorship, or the historical character of the work, drawn from the fact that the writer clearly has a definite plan and purpose, are quite beside the mark. The distinction between a history and a chronicle is just this, that a history has a plan. The writer, from personal knowledge or other sources, forms a conception of the course of events, and writes his history from that point of view. In the present case the writer wishes to illustrate and describe the steps by which the Christian Church has developed. From that point of view he selects his materials; from that point of view he describes the events and the periods which are to him important; from that point of view he emphasizes the careers of St. Stephen, of St. Peter, of St. Paul. His view may be right or may be wrong, but because a writer has a view he is not necessarily unhistorical. We hope to show that the merit of St. Luke lies in having brought out just the point of view which was important, and that, although there are points in which he is perhaps incorrect, substantially his history is true and trustworthy.

2. The Acts and St. Paul's Epistles.—A considerable portion of the narrative of the Acts is contemporary with certain of St. Paul's Epistles. Here, then, we have some opportunity of controlling the narrative, and here we have to meet a very curious combination of arguments. It is now maintained that the Acts is late, and its narrative unauthentic because of differences from St. Paul's Epistles, and then that these Epistles are its sources. To prevent these arguments conflicting, we have to suppose a deliberate falsification of the narrative of Galatians by the author of the Acts, and an extraordinary capacity on his part to conceal his obligations. The parallels quoted are very slight, but most numerous in the case of the Epistles of the captivity. Even here they have little value as implying literary obligations; but if, as we believe, St. Luke, the author of the Acts, was St. Paul's companion in captivity, and possibly acted as his amanuensis, it is natural that his phraseology should be influenced by that personal contact.

There are three passages which demand a more exact comparison.

- (a) Gal 117-24 = Ac 926-80,
 (b) Gal 21-10 = Ac 151-33,
 (c) Gal 21ff. = Ac 1533-39.

(a) If we examine the first passages we notice quite definitely certain discrepancies. The Acts contain no reference to the visit to Arabia; we should not gather from the narrative that three years had elapsed before the visit to Jerusalem; while the statement that he was unknown by face to the Churches that were in Judæa, is supposed to be inconsistent with the fact that he preached in the synagogues of Jerusalem. But how far do these discrepancies take us? It is quite clear that St. Luke selects what he requires for his purpose, and it is possible that he knew of the journey to Arabia and did not think it necessary to record it; nor, again, does he give exact indications of the time elapsed. There is no necessary inconsistency; but still the obvious impression created by the narrative is that the writer did not know of the Arabian journey, nor of the length of time which had elapsed before the Jerusalem visit, and the two narratives give a somewhat different impression. St. Paul wishes to emphasize his independence of the apostles; St. Luke wishes to show that St. Paul was received by them. But each hints at the other side. St. Paul clearly implies that he was received by them; St. Luke as clearly, that there was some hesitation about doing so, and St. Luke's language makes it plain that even if he had preached in synagogues in Jerusalem he had not preached in Judæa. The accounts are different and to all appearance independent, they represent different points of view, they supplement one another; they are not inconsistent.

(b) The same may be said in the main concerning the next narrative (Gal 21-10 = Ac 151-33). The very careful examination of Lightfoot (Galatians, p. 109) represents, on the whole, a very fair historical conclusion. No sensible person will find any discrepancy if St. Paul, giving his internal motive, states that he went by revelation, and St. Luke gives the external motive. It is quite natural that St. Luke should give the public history, St. Paul the private. What is more important to notice is the incidental testimony that each account gives to the other. We gather from St. Paul his great desire to be on good terms with the leading apostles—if he is not, he fears he will run in vain and labour in vain; we gather that they receive him in a friendly manner—they give him the right hand of fellowship; although they are looked upon by some of their followers as being antagonistic to St. Paul, St. Paul does not think so. Again, from the Acts we gather that the conclusion was not carried out without much dispute, and presumably was not acceptable to all; and we equally gather, as we would from St. Paul, that those who had caused the disturbance had claimed that they represented the opinions of the chief apostles.

It has been assumed that Ac 15 refers to the same event as Gal 21-10; but this, although commonly, is not universally accepted. Why, it is asked, does St. Paul omit all reference to the visit recorded in Ac 11³⁰? This is a genuine difficulty. It has been suggested that there has been a disarrangement in the Acts, and, owing to a confusion of sources, one of the later visits has been duplicated. The argument against this is that Barnabas is represented as the companion of St. Paul, and that he had left him at a later date. A mistake in chronology is probable, but not a mistake as to the companionship. On the other side, Ramsay (St. Paul, p. 48) identifies the visit of Gal 21-10 with that of Ac 11³⁰. He lays great stress on the difficulty involved in supposing that St. Paul omitted all reference to this journey. But the reasons given by Lightfoot—that the apostles were not in Jerusalem, and that therefore there was no need for the visit to be mentioned—are accepted by Hort (Judaistic Christianity, p. 61) as sufficient. We must refer the reader to Ramsay's own book for the discussion of the subject, but can only say that he has not succeeded in convincing us. A reasonable criticism must say that the two narratives we are considering refer to the same events; that the accounts they contain are independent and supplementary, but not contradictory (see the discussion between Sanday and Ramsay in Expositor, Feb. 1896, and foll. numbers).

(c) The third point need not detain us long. It is merely that St. Luke does not record a narrative concerning St. Peter mentioned by St. Paul. He may have been ignorant of it; he may have thought that it did not answer his purpose; he may even have thought it better to omit an incident which he felt was discreditable. What is important to notice is that the narrative in Galatians proves conclusively that the standpoint of the Acts is correct. It was quite impossible that St. Paul could accuse St. Peter of hypocrisy unless he had already adopted his view. 'It is clear from Gal 2^{11f.} that Peter then and for long before occupied in principle the standpoint of Paul' (Harnack, Hist. of Dogma, Eng. tr. vol. i. p. 90).

An examination of these narratives proves the independence of the two accounts, and each corroborates the other in various points. When we turn to the general narrative in the Acts and compare it with that which can be gathered from the Epistles, we find three characteristics—independence, broad resemblances, and subtle points of contact. All the Epistles which correspond to the same period will fit into the narrative, while the minute coincidences which have been brought out by Paley, whose argument is not out of date,—more particularly that concerning the collection for the saints,—have very substantial evidential value.

3. The Archaeological Evidence.—A great test of the accuracy of the writer in the last twelve chapters is given by the evidence from archaeology. Its strength and value are so great that we need only refer to it. The investigations of the last twenty or thirty years have tended more and more to confirm the accuracy of the writer. In almost every point where we can follow him, even in minute details, he is right. He knows that at the time when St. Paul visited Cyprus it was governed by a proconsul; this was the case only between the years B.C. 22 and some time early in the 2nd cent.; then a change was made, probably in Hadrian's reign. He knows that the magistrates of Philippi were called στρατηγοί, and were attended by lictors, but that those of Thessalonica were πολιτάρχαι. He knows that Derbe and Lystra, but not Iconium, are cities of Lycaonia. The subject has been worked out in considerable detail by Lightfoot and Ramsay, and it is sufficient to refer to them. It is enough, too, to refer here to the very complete investigations of the account of St. Paul's voyage and shipwreck made by James Smith (Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul). We need not enter into details, as they are admitted. What we must emphasize is the bearing of this evidence. It proves, in the first place, that in the latter portion of the Acts the writer had good and accurate sources of information. It is quite impossible that he should be correct in all these points unless he had good material, or was himself conversant with the events. But it also proves, however we think he acquired the information, that he was accurate in the use of his sources. It is quite inconceivable that a writer who is so accurate in a large number of small and difficult points could have, as is maintained, used Josephus, and used him with incredible inaccuracy. This evidence, on the other hand, does not prove that the writer is necessarily as trustworthy in the earlier portions of the history, where his sources of information were less good. It does suggest that he would get as accurate information as possible, and reproduce it correctly.

4. We pass backward to the transition period, which begins with the preaching of Stephen and extends to the end of the apostolic council. This is clearly the most important period in the history, and we have few means of controlling it. We have little independent evidence. What we can point to, in the first place, is the naturalness of the whole history. There were the germs of universalism in Christianity, but these needed opportunity to develop; and the whole history shows that the expansion arose from the natural reaction of events on the Christians, not from any deliberate purpose or from any one definite event. Take first the persecution. Zeller (Eng. tr. vol. i. p. 229) lays great stress on the fact that in the early chapters the Sadducees are the persecutors, in the later the Pharisees. But this inconsistency is thoroughly natural. At first the Sadducees oppose the Christians, because, being the official hierarchy responsible to the Romans for the order of the country, they fear disturbances; the Christians are merely a sect of devout and zealous Jews in favour with the Pharisees. But when once the universalist element inherent in Christianity is made apparent by the teaching of Stephen, the devout and zealous Jews are offended, the Pharisees take up the persecution, and it becomes a reality. We may notice again incidentally how it is the entrance of the freer Hellenic spirit in the person of Stephen which first brings out this universalist element. The persecution leads quite naturally to a dispersion of the Christians, more particularly of those associated with Stephen, and consequently to the spread of Christianity. In all that follows St. Peter takes the lead, a position which is quite in accordance with what we know from Galatians (see above, § ix. 2). The stages work out gradually and naturally, the pressure of faith and enthusiasm leads the preachers of Christianity onwards. First come the Samaritans, then 'devout men' who are yet not circumcised; then the preaching to Gentiles; then the growth of a definite Christian community in Antioch, i.e. a community which the outer world clearly recognised as something distinct from Judaism, and which would naturally appear first in a place removed from older associations; then the first recorded journey of St. Paul, with its unexpected and far-reaching developments, and its subtle corroborations in the Romans (10²³). Naturally enough, there gradually arises a Judaizing party in Jerusalem, and the older apostles find themselves acting as mediators between the two parties. The position which is ascribed to them by the Acts is always recognised by St. Paul, and he claims equally to be recognised by them; while both the Acts and St. Paul recognise the extreme party as claiming their authority although without entire justification (Ac 15²⁴, Gal 2¹²). The whole story as told in the Acts is natural and consistent, and gives a much more credible account of the development of Christianity than any modern one constructed on à priori ideas.

5. The Early Community in Jerusalem.—The first section of the Ac (1¹²-5⁴²) has been often treated as the least historical portion of the book. It is less true to say that it has been attacked. It is rather the case that it has been set on one side ('the idealised picture of the Jerusalem community,' Holtzmann). And the examination of it is difficult, for we have little that is definite with which to compare it. The theory, however, put forward is that this was written from the point of view of the author's own time, and from that aspect we can examine it. We know how the writer of the Clementine Homilies reproduces in the earliest days of the Church the doctrine and the organisation of his own time—he represents St. Peter as appointing bishops in every church. Now, at any rate, the writer of the Acts lived forty years later, and at a time when both the doctrine and the organisation of the Church were much more developed; yet we find absolutely no traces of this either in the speeches or in the narrative of the first five chapters.

To work this out in detail would be beyond the scope of the present article, but it may be illustrated in some points. The Christology is throughout primitive. Our Lord is called 'Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς ὁ Ναζωραῖος (2²² 3⁶ 4¹⁰), a name which occurs in the Gospels, but elsewhere only twice, when St. Paul, in the later chapters of the Acts, is referring to his earlier life. So again the next phrase that meets us is παῖς θεοῦ (3¹³, 26 4²⁷, 30), which occurs nowhere else in NT of our Lord, and elsewhere is used of Him in the Didaché, which clearly represents very early tradition. Again, we notice how very markedly Χριστὸς is not a personal name, τὸν προκεχειρισμένον ὑμῶν Χρ. Ἰησ. (3²⁰), κύριον αὐτῶν καὶ Χριστὸν ὁ θεὸς ἐποίησεν (2³⁶). One more phrase we may notice, ἀρχηγὸν (3¹⁰ 5³¹), which occurs elsewhere in Hebrews twice (2¹⁰ 12²), and nowhere else in NT. We find nowhere the expression υἱὸς θεοῦ. Whereas St. Paul 'placarded' Christ crucified (Gal 3¹), we find here, as we might expect, that St. Peter has to take towards the death of Christ a purely defensive attitude (3¹⁸). We have no reference to Christ's pre-existence. We have, in fact, a representation of what must have been, and what we have independent evidence to show was the earliest Christian teaching about Christ: — the proof that He was the Messiah, afforded by His resurrection, of which the apostles were witnesses, and by the Scriptures. Similar is the relation to the universal character of the Gospel. We are told that the Acts was written from a universalist point of view, and the statement is quite true in a sense; but we find that St. Peter's speeches are not affected by it. God raised up Jesus to give repentance to Israel (5³¹); Ye are the sons of the prophets and of the covenant (3²⁵). There are elements of universalism, but they are incidental. The promise is to Israel first (3²⁶); so (2³⁹) 'to you is the promise and to your children, and to all those that are afar off'; 3²⁵ 'in Israel all the families of the earth shall be blessed.' The standpoint of these chapters is, in fact, that of the Jewish prophets. There is the germ from which future development can come, but the development is not there. One last point we may mention in this connexion is the eschatology. It is thoroughly Jewish and primitive, 'that He may send the Christ, who hath been appointed for you, even Jesus: whom the heavens must receive until the times of the restoration of all things,' 3¹⁹, 21; the Messianic kingdom is called the καιροὶ ἀναψύξεως. There is nothing about the personal resurrection, which, of course, is a point which would not trouble the primitive community in the first years of its existence; and it is difficult to understand how a Greek writer who had seen the Neronian persecutions, and knew the needs of a later generation, could have invented this primitive idea of things.

If we pass to the organisation of the community, again, it is quite unlike the conception which we should expect from a Gentile Christian of forty or fifty years later. It is perfectly true that stress is laid on the unity of the primitive community, and it may be that this is exaggerated with a purpose; but no object could be gained by the representation which is given of its form and character. There is no trace of any later organisation, nor mention of presbyters. The Christians have, in fact, not yet been cast out of the synagogues. They are regular in their worship in the temple (Ac 2⁴⁶, Lk 24⁵³). They take part in the morning and evening sacrifices. They observe the Jewish hours of prayer. They join in the synagogue worship (6⁹ 9²). They are not only conforming Jews, they are devout (Ac 21²⁰ 22¹²). They do not yet realise that they are separate from Judaism. They are but a sect, the sect of the Ναζωραῖοι (Ac 24⁵). One more point may be noticed, the community of goods; the exact character of this it is unnecessary to discuss here. It is sufficient to point out that no reason has been suggested to explain why it should have so much emphasis laid on it, or why it should have been invented if it were not historical.

It has been said that we have little evidence for correcting this. The archaeological evidence which we found in ch. 13 f. here fails us. But we have a few indirect hints. The position of the Twelve we may gather from 1 Co 9⁵ 15⁵; of St. Peter from 1 Co 15⁵, Gal 2⁹; of St. John from Gal 2⁹; of the brethren of the Lord from 1 Co 9⁵. A certain amount of incidental evidence is given by the Ebionite traditions concerning the position of St. James; and they correspond with what is suggested by the later parts of the Acts, where we have an account of the state of affairs by one who is presumably an eye-witness.

It is clear that these early chapters give a picture of the primitive community which is quite different from what existed within the experience of the writer, and which is in itself probable. Is it then likely that this should be the result of the historical imagination of the writer, or is it not more probable that it is historical in character and based on written evidence? We have no reason to doubt that we possess an historical account of the words of the Lord; and the same witnesses who recorded these, either by tradition or in writing, would be equally likely to record the speeches and acts of the leading apostle of the infant Church.

6. The Speeches. — One more point under this heading demands investigation, namely, the speeches. Are these genuine records of speeches actually delivered, or were they written by the historian in accordance with the fashion of the day? We may notice two points, to begin with. They are all very short, too short to have been delivered as they stand, and for the most part the style in which they are written is that of the historian. They are clearly, therefore, in a sense his own compositions. But the same can also be said of a considerable number of the speeches in the Gospel. We can compare St. Luke's account in this case with that of other authorities, and we find, indeed, a slight modification side by side with general accuracy; we find the style of the author, but the matter of the authority. On the other hand, there is no reason for thinking à priori that the speeches cannot be historical. As has just been pointed out, the speeches of the leading apostles would impress themselves on the growing community, and would be remembered as the words of the Lord were remembered.

Putting aside à priori considerations, we must as far as possible examine the character of the speeches themselves; and we must first see what light St. Paul's Epistles throw on the subject. According to 1 Co 15⁴ the main subjects of St. Paul's preaching were the death and resurrection of Christ, as proved by the Scriptures and as witnessed to by the apostles, and other incidental allusions in the Epistles support this (1 Th 1¹⁰ 4¹⁴). Now, if we turn to St. Paul's speech at Pisidian Antioch addressed to the Jews (13¹⁶⁻⁴¹), we find that the writer has exactly realised what was necessary for the situation. The basis is scriptural, and the central fact clearly is, the proof of the resurrection. Just at the end we have a definitely Pauline touch introduced (v. 39). This shows that the writer clearly grasps the situation as it is hinted at by the apostle in his own letters, and as was exactly in accordance with the demands of the situation; and this is compatible either with his being a writer using a good source, and reproducing accurately a speech which he finds in that source, or with his being a companion of the apostle, who knows the apostle's preaching well, and gives a typical speech showing the general character of his argument. It is very difficult to conceive of it as a tour de force of historical imagination. And this argument becomes stronger when it is found that it is applicable to all the speeches in the book. We have already touched on those of St. Peter, and have seen how clearly they reproduce an early stage of doctrinal development. Whatever difficulties there may be in the speech of Stephen, it certainly does not bear the marks of being a rhetorical composition. The speeches of St. Paul from first to last are singularly harmonious with the situation. The transition in tone from that we have already examined to that addressed to the heathen at Iconium or to that at Athens, is most marked. When we come to the later speeches addressed to the Jews, to Felix, and to Agrippa, what we notice at once as very extraordinary is the repetition of the narrative of the conversion. Now that is comprehensible on the supposition that the narrative was repeated on two occasions, but is not so if we are dealing with rhetorical exercises. But St. Luke was, on our supposition, with St. Paul during all these events, and would therefore have accurate knowledge. These speeches then, although written in the author's style, are clearly authentic; and we may argue in the same way about the other speeches, all of which are, in different ways, suitable to the occasion on which they claim to have been delivered.

The presence of the author's hand in the speeches cannot be denied. Their literary form is due to him. He may possibly have summed up in a typical speech the characteristics of St. Paul's preaching before certain classes of hearers. Some details or illustrations may be due to him, such as the mention of Theudas in Gamaliel's speech, or that of Judas in Peter's first speech. But no theory which does not admit the possession of good evidence, and the acquaintance of the author with the events and persons that he is describing, is consistent with the phenomena of the speeches. They are too lifelike, real, varied, and adapted to their circumstances to be mere unsubstantial rhetorical exercises.

x. SOURCES OF THE ACTS.—Until recently, critics seem to have contented themselves with either vague indications of the sources of the Acts, or a complete denial of the possibility of discovering them, at any rate in the earlier portions (Weizsäcker, Holtzmann, Beyschlag, Pfeiderer, Baur, Schwegler). Recently, however, the problem has been attacked by a number of scholars, mostly of inferior rank, who do not seem to have attained any success, and whose method is not likely to lead to any substantial results. Of these, Sorof considers that Timothy, the writer of the 'we' sections, has combined a genuine writing by St. Luke and a St. Peter source. According to Feine there was an original Jerusalem Christian source, which was used in the Gospels and extended to ch. 12 of the Acts, but which knew nothing of the missionary journeys of St. Paul. The latter portion is partly due to the Redactor (R), partly to other sources. Spitta distinguishes an A source, the work of Luke, which contains about two-thirds of the Acts, and is also used in the Gospel, and a B source of Jewish-Christian origin, which runs parallel with the first through the whole of the Acts. Van Manen distinguishes a third document, which contained, however, only the 'we' sections, and these very much edited, a Paul biography, and a Peter biography. The most elaborate theory is that of C. Clemen. He distinguishes an 'Urchristliche Predigt,' an 'Erste Gemeindeggeschichte,' and 'Zweite Gemeindeggeschichte,' and Historia Helleni- storum, which has been worked into an Historia Petri; this was combined with an Historia Pauli which included the 'we' sections (Itinerarium Pauli) by a R who was free from party bias, then came a Judaizing R, and then an anti-Judaizing R. Jüngst distinguishes an A source, apparently the work of St. Luke; a B source, the work of an anti-Judaizer and a R. It may be added, that both Clemen and Jüngst consider that the original sources have been very much rearranged by the different redactors, and the true sequence of events destroyed.

A very few words are necessary concerning these theories. The statement of them is really a sufficient condemnation. There is no harmony in the results obtained; and the method is so a priori and unscientific that no result could be obtained. The unity of style of the book and its artistic completeness make any theory impossible which considers that it arose from piecing together bits of earlier writings. Somewhat more on right lines are the attempts of B. Weiss and Hilgenfeld, in the fact that they do not consider that more than one source is used in any separate passage. Weiss thinks there was one early history which contained an account of the early community, of Stephen, of Philip, of the journeys of Peter, of the council. Hilgenfeld has three sources, A Ac 1¹⁵⁻⁵² 9²¹⁻⁴³ 12¹⁻²³, B Ac 6-8⁴⁰, C 9¹⁻³⁰ 11¹⁷⁻²⁹; and both profess to be able to distinguish what is due to the source and what to the author, the method being for the most part absolutely arbitrary.

A study of St. Luke's Gospel shows us that the work is quite certainly a literary whole proceeding from one author, that this author made use of materials partly written, partly probably oral, and that he reproduced them probably largely in his own style. If we compare a section from this Gospel with the parallel one from St. Mark, which clearly represents very nearly the original source, we shall find that the difference, although one not affecting the main sense, is of a character which would make it quite impossible to arrive at one document from the other. We may notice, again, that although there is a certain uniformity of style running through the whole Gospel, yet the character of the source used seems to a certain, although undefined, extent to have modified it.

Now, in the Acts there is admittedly a certain difference in style between the earlier chapters and the later. The later, like the prologue to the Gospel and Acts and the 'we' sections, being written in a purer Greek style, the earlier being more Aramaic in character. Stated vaguely and generally, this is true, although no investigations have yet made it definite. The utmost it is at present safe to assert, is that there appears to be a difference in style in the earlier chapters, which suggests a written source.

Starting from the conclusion that the author was St. Luke, we must ascribe to him the conception of the history as a whole, and presumably, therefore, all the framework which is part of that conception, the object of the author being to mark the stages in the progress of Christianity. For the whole of the last section, from 20⁵ onwards, the author was either an eye-witness or in close contact with those who were such; as also in the section 16¹⁰⁻⁴⁰, and here we have the fullest and most detailed account. For all the remaining portions of St. Paul's journeys he could clearly have access to the very best information; and it is to be noticed here that generally, although not invariably, the information is perfectly accurate, so far as it can be tested, but not so full as in the later sections. For the stories concerning Philip in the first part of the book it is not necessary to go beyond personal information; there is no sign of great exactness of knowledge, and the incident recorded 21^b will explain how that information was acquired. For the earlier history of St. Paul a source is not required; St. Luke had heard the story told at least twice, probably much oftener, and there is just that vagueness concerning chronology which is almost invariably the characteristic of information dependent upon oral tradition. Of some other sections it is difficult to speak definitely. For the council the author would be able to supplement information gained from St. Paul by information gained in Jerus. It has been hinted that there is probably a written source behind portions of the first five chapters; we cannot define its limits in these chapters, nor say whether or no, as is possible, it included some later narratives, such as those of St. Peter (9²²-11¹⁸ and 12¹⁻²³); it probably did not include chs. 6-7. No investigations have been made which authorise us to speak more certainly than this; but it has been suggested (see Blass on 12^{12, 17}) that these chapters had some connexion with St. Mark. It is doubtful whether any certain conclusions are possible, although a more scientific and more comprehensive study of the style of the Gospel and Acts may perhaps lead to some result.

xi. CONCLUSION.—It now only remains to sum up the conclusion of what, owing to the variations of opinion, has necessarily been a somewhat controversial article.

1. The Third Gospel and the Acts of the Apostles are the work of the same person; and all tradition and argument suggest that the author was St. Luke, the companion of St. Paul.

2. He wrote the Gospel to describe as accurately as he could the life and preaching of Jesus; he wrote the Acts to describe the growth and spread of the Christian Church.

3. He had formed a clear idea in his mind of the steps and course of this growth, and arranged his work so as to bring out these points. The object he had in view would influence him in the selection of his materials and the proportional importance he would ascribe to events; but it would be taking far too artificial a view of his work not to allow some influence to various less prominent ideas, and even to the accidental cause of the existence or non-existence of information on different points. The extent to which he carried out his purpose would be in some measure dependent on his opportunities.

4. Although he had a definite aim, and constructed a history with an artistic unity, there is no reason for thinking that the history is therefore untrustworthy. He narrated events as he believed they happened, and he gives a thoroughly consistent history of the period over which it extends.

5. The exact degree of credibility and accuracy we can ascribe to him is dependent on his sources of information. From ch. 12 onwards his source was excellent; from ch. 20 onwards he was an eye-witness. For the previous period he could not in all cases attain the same degree of accuracy, yet he was personally acquainted with eye-witnesses throughout, and may very probably have had one or more written documents. In any case, his history from the very beginning shows a clear idea of historical perspective, and of the stages in the growth of the community, even if certain characteristics of the primitive Church in Jerusalem have been exaggerated.

ACUB (Β' Ἀκούφ, Α' Ἀκούμ), 1 Es 5³¹.—His sons were among the 'temple servants' who returned with Zerub. Called Bakbuk, Ezr 2⁵¹, Neh 7⁵³.

ACUD (Ἀκούδ, AV Ἄκουα), 1 Es 5³⁰.—His sons were among the 'temple servants' who returned from captivity with Zerubbabel. Called Akkub (אקב = 'cunning'), Ezr 2⁴⁸; omitted in Neh 7.

ADADAH (אדאדא), Jos 15²².—A city of Judah in the Negeb. The site may be at the ruin 'Ad'adah in the desert south-east of Beersheba.

ADAH (אדא).—1. One of the two wives of Lamech, and mother of Jabal and Jubal (Gn 4^{19, 20}). The name possibly denoted 'brightness' (cf. Arab. ghaddât), Lamech's other wife being named 'Zillah,' or 'Shadow,' 'Darkness.' These names have been cited to support the view of the mythological basis of the Genesis narrative. But the name may simply denote 'adornment' (Lenormant, Les Origines, p. 183 f.). According to Jos. (Ant. I. ii. 2) Lamech had 77 sons born to him of Adah and Zillah. 2. Daughter of Elon, a Hittite, and one of the wives of Esau (Gn 36²); mother of Eliphaz, and ancestress of Edomite tribes, Teman, Zepho, Gatam, Kenaz, Amalek. In Gn 26³⁴ (P) the daughter of Elon the Hittite, whom Esau takes to wife, is named Basemath. The names in Gn 36 have suffered in the process of redaction, and this may account for the confusion. Jos. (Ant. II. i. 2), though mentioning Esau's age, and therefore referring to Gn 26³⁴, gives Adah and Oholibamah ('Αλιβάρμη) as the names of Esau's wives. For a discussion on the name, see Baethgen's Beiträge, p. 149.

ADALIAH (אדליה, 'Jehovah has adorned').—1. A man of Bosath, the maternal grandfather of king Josiah, 2 K 22¹. 2. A Levite descended from Gershon, 1 Ch 6⁴¹, called Iddo in v.²¹. 3. A son of Shimei (in v.¹³ Shema) the Benjamite, 1 Ch 8²¹. 4. The son of Jeroham, a priest, and head of a family in Jerusalem, 1 Ch 9¹². 5. The father of Maaseiah, a captain who helped Jehoiada to overthrow the usurpation of Athaliah, and set Joash on the throne, 2 Ch 23¹. 6. One of the family of Bani, who took a strange wife during the Exile, Ezr 10²⁹. 7. Another of a different family of Bani, who had committed the same offence, Ezr 10³⁹. 8. A descendant of Judah by Pharez, Neh 11⁵. 9. A Levite of the family of Aaron; probably the same as (4), Neh 11¹².

ADALIA (אדליה, Est 9⁸), the fifth of the sons of Haman, put to death by the Jews. In the LXX the name is different, and the MSS vary between Βαρσά Β, Βαρέλ κ Α, Βαρσά.

ADAM.—i. Name.—The word אָדָם is originally a common noun, denoting either a human being, Gn 2⁶; or (rarely) a man as opposed to a woman, Gn 2²²; or mankind collectively, Gn 1²⁶. The root אָדָם is variously explained as (a) make, produce, by analogy with the Assyr. adāmu (Delitzsch, Assyr. Wörterbuch; Oxf. Heb. Lex.). Man, therefore, as adam, is one made or produced, a creature, or possibly a maker or producer; (b) to be red, a sense in which the root frequently occurs in Heb., e.g. the account of Edom in Gn 25⁵⁰, and is also found in Arab. and Eth. and (?) in Assyr. This etymology would point to the term having originated among men of a red or ruddy race. Gesenius notes in support of this view that the men on Egyp. monuments are constantly represented as red. Dillmann on Gn 1. 2 also suggests a connexion with (c) an Eth. root = pleasant, well-formed, or (d) an Arab. root = to attach oneself, and so gregarious, sociable. It has also been suggested that adam is a derivative from adamah, ground, and describes man as earth-born, γῆγενής. The statement of Gn 2⁷, that man was formed from the dust of the adamah, indicates that this connexion was in the mind of the writer, but it can hardly be the original etymology. It is significant that A., as a term for man or mankind, is by no means universal in Sem. languages. It occurs in Phœnician and Sabæan, possibly in Assyr. (so Sayce, Gram. p. 2, and according to HCM, p. 104, is the common Bab. word for man; cf. Del. Assyr. Wörterbuch). Of course the name A. has been adopted by all Sem. translations. It is possible that Edom is a dialectic variety of A.

ii. Adam as Common and Proper Noun.—The first man is necessarily the man, and in his case the generic term is equivalent to a proper name. In use, adam naturally fluctuates between a common and proper noun. Thus in P's account of the Creation, Gn 1²⁻²⁴, he describes the creation of אָדָם, mankind, in both sexes; but in his first genealogy, Gn 5¹⁻⁴, אָדָם is used as a proper name.

J gives an account of the Creation, Fall, etc., of אָדָם 'the man' (in 3²¹ אָדָם 'to the man,' should be read instead of אָדָם 'to Adam'), and in 4²⁶ uses אָדָם without the article as a proper name.

iii. The Narratives concerning Adam.—P, in Gn 1²⁻²⁴ by itself, simply describes the creation of the human species, as of the other species of living creatures, and says nothing of any particular individuals. But it is only in the case of man that the two sexes are specified, and Dillmann maintains that יָצַק יָצַק is not to be taken collectively, 'male and female,' but as 'a male and a female, i.e. the first pair.' Gn 5¹⁻³, which is possibly from a different stratum of P, shows that the individual Adam, the ancestor of the nations mentioned in OT, and especially of Israel, is in some way identified with the human species, whose creation is described in Gn 1. This identification seems to imply that the human species originally consisted of a single pair; but P does not definitely commit himself to this position. Man is created last of all things on the same (sixth) day as the beasts, but by a separate act of creation and in the image of God; he receives a special blessing, according to which he is given dominion over the earth and its inhabitants, and the vegetable creation is assigned to him, to provide him with food. While it is expressly said of the light, the heavens, earth, and seas, the vegetable world, the heavenly bodies, the birds, fish, and other animals, that God saw that they were good, this is not separately stated concerning man, but is left to be inferred from the general statement that God saw that everything He had made was very good.

In J, Gn 2^{4b-4²⁶}, while the earth is still a lifeless waste, the man is created out of the dust, and Jehovah animates him by breathing into his nostrils. He is set to take care of the garden of Eden, and is allowed to eat freely of its fruit, except the fruit of 'the tree of the knowledge of good and evil.' The animals are created as his companions and assistants; but these proving inadequate, the woman Eve is fashioned from his rib as he lies in a deep sleep. They live in childlike innocence till Eve is tempted by the Serpent, and Adam by Eve, to eat of the fruit of the tree of knowledge. Whereupon they become conscious of sin. Yet they have become like the Elohim, and might eat of the tree of life and become immortal. Hence they are cursed, and driven out of Eden. Man, henceforth, is to win his sustenance with grievous toil from soil which, for his sake, has been cursed with barrenness. The only later OT reference to Adam is at the head of the genealogies in 1 Ch; in Dt 32⁸ and Job 31²⁸ adam is a common noun.

iv. Significance of the Narratives.—In both narratives man is sharply marked off as a created being from God the Creator; and is not connected with Him by a chain of inferior gods, demi-gods, and heroes, as in the Egyp., Assyr., and Chald. dynasties, and in other mythologies. Yet man has a certain community of nature with God; he is made in His image (P), and receives his life from the breath of Jehovah (J). Similarly, man's connexion with the animals is implied by his creation on the same day, his separate status by a distinct act of creation. He is lord of all things, animate and inanimate, the crown of creation (P). So, in J, the animals are made for his benefit; and the garden, with certain limitations, is at his disposal. Woman is also secondary and subordinate to man, and the cause of his ruin, but of identical nature. The formation of a single woman for the man implies monogamy. Man is capable of immediate fellowship with God. Sin is not inherent in man, but suggested from without; it is at once followed by stern punishment, which extends not only to the human race, but to animate and inanimate nature. Compare EVE; and, specially for the Babylonian and other parallels to the Biblical narrative, COSMOGONY, EDEN. W. H. BENNETT.

ADAM IN THE NT.—Adam is twice mentioned in the NT in a merely historical fashion; in Jude v.¹⁴, where we read of 'Enoch the seventh from A.,' and in Lk 3³⁸, where the genealogy of Jesus is traced up to him, and A. himself is 'the son of God.' The extension of the genealogy beyond David or Abraham (as in Mt) is no doubt due to the universalist sympathy of the Pauline evangelist. There are two other passages in which reference is made to the OT story of the first man, with a view to regulating certain questions about the relations of men and women, esp. in public worship. The first is 1 Co 11^{9f}, the other 1 Ti 2^{13f}. The use made of A. in these passages may strike a modern reader as not very conclusive; it has the form rather than the power of what may have suggested it—the similar use of part of the OT story by Jesus to establish the true law of marriage (Mt 19^{4f}, comp. Gn 2²⁴).

Much more significant than these almost incidental references is the place occupied by A. in the theology of St. Paul (Ro 5¹²⁻²¹, 1 Co 15^{22, 45-49}). The apostle institutes a formal comparison and contrast between A. and Christ. 'As in A. all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive.' 'As by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death passed upon all men, for that all sinned': so, though the sentence is not formally completed (Ro 5¹²), righteousness entered into the world by one man, and life by righteousness. 'The first man is of the earth, earthy; the second man is of heaven. . . . And as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly.' In some sense A. and Christ answer to each other; each is the head of humanity, the one to its condemnation and death, the other to its justification and life. Yet it would be a mistake to put what St. Paul says about A. on a footing with what he says about Christ. He has experience to go upon in the case of Christ; his gospel concerning Him has a certainty and scope of its own quite independent of the harmony he finds in some points between the mode of man's redemption and that of his ruin. Of the two passages referred to above, it may be said that the one in Ro deals directly with the work of A. and of Christ, and its effects upon men; the one in 1 Co, with the nature of A. and of Christ, as related respectively to the actual and the ideal condition of man. All we are told of A. is that he sinned (παράπτωμα, Ro 5¹², implies the fall), and that his sin involved the world in death. In such a statement there is obviously a link wanting to an ethical interpretation: is it supplied in the difficult words ἐφ' ᾧ πάντες ἥμαρτον—in that all (have) sinned? That this aorist may (grammatically considered) be a collective historical aorist, summing up the aggregate evil deeds of men, is undoubted (Burton, N.T. Moods and Tenses, § 55); but to take it so, and make ἥμαρτον refer merely to the personal sins of men, is to dissolve the connexion with A. on which the apostle's argument depends. To say, again, that all men die because involved in the guilt of A.'s sin (Omnes peccarunt, Adamo peccante, Bengel), is still to leave the moral link amissing. To say that all die because of inherited depravity, which seems the only other possible suggestion, is to offer a physical rather than a moral connexion, though one which may be assented to and appropriated by the individual, and in that way become moral. It seems probable that St. Paul, although he is not explicit on the point, would have accepted this view; what he is concerned with is the solidarity or moral unity of the human race, and for this there is undoubtedly a physical basis. Heredity is the modern name for the organic connexion of the generations; and as the fact was familiar to the apostle, it is natural to suppose that he found in it the connecting link between the personal sin and doom of A. and that of his whole posterity. A., in other words, was to him not only the type, but the ancestor, of men as sinners; it is in A.—or because of A. in us—that we are lost men. But A. is a 'type of him that is to come.' This idea (see Weiss, Romans, p. 243 n.) is found also in the Rabbins (Quemadmodum homo primus fuit primus in peccato, sic Messias erit ultimus ad auferendum peccatum penitus: and again, Adamus postremus est Messias). He is a type only in the sense that alike from A. and Christ a pervasive influence should proceed, extending to the whole human race. We are what A. was and became, in virtue of our vital relation to him; we are to become what Christ was and became, in virtue of a vital relation to Him. This is the side of the subject treated in 1 Co 15. It can hardly be said to throw light on man's original state, or on the apostle's conception of it. The first A., in virtue of our connexion with whom we are what we are before we become Christians, was a living soul, psychical rather than spiritual, made of the dust of the ground—in other words, he was man as nature presents him to our experience; the last A., ὁ ἐπουράνιος, whose image we shall fully bear when this corruptible has put on incorruption, and this mortal has put on immortality, was and is life-giving spirit. It is too much to say, in face of Ro 5¹² and the whole sense of the NT, that man's mortality is here traced, not to Adam's act, but to his nature. His act is not specially in view here any more than Christ's redeeming acts, and his nature is indeed conceived as weak, and liable to temptation; but it is not less capable of immortality than of death; and it is the sin of our first father to which death as a doom is invariably referred by St. Paul.

ADAM CITY (אָדָם 'red').—In the Jordan Valley, 'far off' from Jericho, and beside Zarethan. The latter (see ZARETHAN) appears to have been near the centre of the valley (see Jos 3¹⁶), and the usual site for Adam is at the present ruined bridge (built in the 13th cent. A.D.) at the Dámieh ford, called Jisr ed-Dámieh, about half-way up the Jordan Valley. The Jordan being narrow, with high banks, might have been dammed up in this vicinity by an extensive fall of the cliff. SWP vol. ii. sh. xv.

ADAM, BOOKS OF.—Romance, with ethical intent, accumulated around all the prominent worthies of OT narrative, among both Jews and Christians; and, naturally, no one received more attention than Adam. This process of embellishing and 'improving' OT story began before NT times. The Talm. speaks of a Bk of Adam, and such legendary lore furnished suitable pabulum for Mohammedanism. The Apostolic Constitutions (vi. 16) mention an apocryphal Ἀδάμ. Epiphanius (Hær. xxvii. 8) tells of a Gnostic work, Revelations of Adam, and the Decretum Gelasii prohibits Christians from reading the two works, Penitentia Adæ and De filiabus Adæ. The Cypriote Syncellus (8th cent.) makes quotations from a Bios Ἀδάμ which closely resemble the Bk of Jubilees. The Jewish Bk of Adam is lost; but it probably furnished matter for still further elaboration in the following Christian works which still survive. 1. The Ethiopic Bk. of Adam, pub. by Dillmann, Göttingen, 1853; tr. also by Malan, London, 1882. 2. ADAMAH (אָדָמָה), Jos 19³⁶, 'red lands.'—A city of Naphtali mentioned next to Chinnereth. Probably the ruin Admah on the plateau north of Bethshean. See SWP vol. i. sh. vi.

C. R. CONDER.

ADAMANT is twice (Ezk 3⁹, Zec 7¹²) used in AV and RV as tr. of אֶמֶט shāmēr, which is elsewhere rendered either 'brier' (Is 5⁶ 7²³. 24. 25 9¹⁸ 10¹⁷ 27⁴ 32¹³) or 'diamond' (Jer 17¹). Diamond, which arose from adamant by a variety of spelling (adamant or adimant, then diamant or diamond), has displaced a. as the name of the precious stone, a. being now used rhetorically to express extreme hardness. See under art. STONES (PRECIOUS). Ἀδάμας occurs in LXX at Am 7⁷. 8^{bis} as tr. of אֶמֶט 'plummet'; this is the origin and meaning of a. in its only occurrence in Apocr., Sir 16¹⁶ AV. See PLUMMET.

J. HASTINGS.

ADAMI-NEKEB (אָדָמִי נֶקֶב), Jos 19³³, 'red lands the pass.'—A city of Naphtali. It is doubtful if the names should not be divided (see NEKEB). The site is probably at the present village Ed-Dâmich on the plateau north-east of Tabor, where the basaltic soil is reddish. The site of Nekeb (Seiyâdeh) is not far off. See SWP vol. i. sh. vi.

ADASA (Ἀδασά).—A town near Bethhoron (1 Mac 7⁴⁰. 45, Jos. Ant. XII. x. 5), now the ruin Adaseh near Gibeon. SPW vol. iii. sh. xvii.

ADBEEL (אָדְבֵּעַל), the third son of Ishmael, Gn 25¹³, 1 Ch 1²⁹, eponym of the N. Arab. tribe, which appears in cuneiform inscrip. as Idiba'il or Idibi'al, and which had its settlements S.W. of the Dead Sea (Sayce, HCM 202; Schrader, *KAT*² 148; Oxf. Heb. Lex. s. v.).

ADDAN (אָדָן, Ἀθαλαρ A, [Χαρα]θαλαρ B, 1 Es 5³⁶).—Certain of the inhabitants of this place joined the body of the returning exiles in the time of Zerubbabel, but they were unable to prove their true Isr. descent by showing to what great clan or family they belonged (Ezr 2³⁹). Probably they were not admitted to the privileges of full citizenship. The name does not appear in the later lists in Ezr 10, Neh 10. Some regard Cherub Addan as one name; v. 60 suggests that Cherub, Addan, and Immer were three villages in one district in Babylon, from which the family of Nekoda came. In Neh 7⁶¹ the name appears as ADDON.

H. A. WHITE.

ADDAR, 1 Ch 8³.—See ARD.

ADDAR, AV Adar (אָדָר), Jos 15³.—A town on the border of Judah south of Beersheba. There is a ruin east of Gaza which bears the name Adar, but this seems perhaps too far west.

ADDER.—See SERPENT.

ADDI (Ἀδδῆλ).—An ancestor of Jesus Christ, Lk 3²⁸. See GENEALOGY.

ADDICT.—'To a. oneself to,' now used only in a bad sense, was formerly neutral, and is found in a good sense in 1 Co 16¹⁵ 'they have a. themselves to the ministry of the saints' (RV 'they have set themselves to minister unto the saints'). Cf. Hist. Card. (1670): 'The greatest part of the day he addicts either to study, devotion, or other spiritual exercises.'

J. HASTINGS.

ADDO (A'Adδῶ, B'Eδδῆν).—The grandfather of the prophet Zechariah (1 Es 6¹). The name is similarly spelt in LXX of Ezr 5¹ (A'Adδῶ, B'Adῶ). See IDDO.

ADDON (אָדָן), Neh 7⁶¹. See ADDAN.

ADDUS.—1. (Ἀδδούς) 1 Es 5³⁴.—His sons were among the children of Solomon's servants who returned with Zerub.; the name does not occur in the parallel lists in Ezr 2, Neh 7. 2. See JADDUS.

ADIDA (Ἀδιδά).—A town in the Shephelah (Jos. Ant. XIII. vi. 5) fortified by Simon the Hasmonæan (1 Mac 12³⁸ 13¹³). The same as Hadid.

ADIEL (אָדִיעַל, 'ornament of God').—1. A Simeonite prince who attacked the shepherds of Gedor, 1 Ch 4^{30ff.}. 2. A priest, 1 Ch 9¹². 3. The father of Azmaveth, David's treasurer, 1 Ch 27²⁵.

ADIN (אָדִין, 'luxurious'?), Ezr 2¹⁵ 8⁶, Neh 7²⁰ 10¹⁵, 1 Es 5^{14m} 8³². The head of a Jewish family, of which some members returned with Zerub., and with Ezra.

ADINA (אָדִינָה), a Reubenite chief, one of David's mighty men, 1 Ch 11⁴².

ADINO ([Kethibh אָדִינוּ] אָדִינוּ אָדִינוּ 'Adino the Eznite,' B'Ἀδῆινωv ὁ Ἀσωναῖος, A'Ἀδῆιν ὁ Ἀσωναῖος).—The Kerē is clearly an attempt to introduce some sense into the meaningless Kethibh. The present Heb. text of 2 S 23³ must be corrupt, the true reading being preserved in the parallel passage 1 Ch 11¹¹ 'Jashobeam, the son of a Hachmonite, he lifted up his spear.' The last clause (הָיָה עִרְרָא אֶת הַיָּרֵחַ) was corrupted into אָדִינוּ אָדִינוּ אָדִינוּ, and then taken erroneously as a proper name, being treated as an alternative to the preceding 'Josheb-basshebeth, a Tahchemonite' (see JASHOBEAM). B has the addition οὗτος ἐσπάσατο τὴν ῥομφαλὴν αὐτοῦ; but this is not found in A, and is, as Wellhausen has pointed out, derived from the LXX tr. of Ch (cf. 2 S 23¹⁸, where B renders the same words by ἐξήγειρε τὸ δόρυ αὐτοῦ).

ADINU (A'Ἀδῆινος, B'Ἀδῆλιος, AV Adin), 1 Es 5¹⁴, called Adin (A'Ἀδῆιν, B'Ἀδῆιν), 1 Es 8³².—His descendants returned with Zerubbabel to the number of 454 (1 Es 5¹⁴, Ezr 2¹⁵) or 655 (Neh 7²⁰). A second party of 51 (Ezr 8⁶) or 251 (1 Es 8³²) accompanied Ezra. They are mentioned among 'the chiefs of the people' who joined Neh. in a covenant to separate themselves from the heathen (Neh 10¹⁶).

ADITHAIM (אָדִיתַיִם), Jos 15³⁶.—A town of Judah in the Shephelah. The site is unknown.

ADJURE.—The primitive meaning of a. (from late Lat. adjurare) is to put under oath. This is its meaning in Jos 6²⁶ 'And Joshua adjured them at that time, saying, Cursed be the man' (RV 'charged them with an oath'), and 1 S 14²⁴ 'Saul had a^d the people, saying, Cursed be the man.' Cf. v. 28 'thy father straitly charged the people with an oath.' But the word is also used in early writers in the sense of to charge solemnly, without the actual administration of an oath. Thus Caxton (1483): 'Raguel desired and adjured Thobie that he shold abyde with hym.' This is the meaning of a. in the other places of the Bible where it is found (1 K 22¹⁶, 2 Ch 18¹⁵, Mt 26⁶³, Mk 5⁷, Ac 19¹³). RV gives 'a.' (for AV 'charge,' Heb. כָּשַׁף) at Ca 2⁷ 3⁵, 8⁹, and at 1 Th 5²⁷ (Gr. ἐνορκίζω). Adjuration (not in AV) is found in RV at Lv 5² (אָדַר, AV 'swearing') and Pr 29²⁴ (אָדַר, AV 'cursing'). See OATH.

ADLAI (אָדַי, 'Adal), the father of Shaphat, one of David's herdsmen, 1 Ch 27²⁹.

ADMAH (אָדְמָה), 'red lands,' Gn 10¹⁹ 14^{2, 8}, Dt 29²³, Hos 11⁵.—One of the cities of the Ciccar or 'Round.' It is not noticed as overthrown in the account of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gn 19), but is included in their catastrophe in the two later passages. The site is unknown. It might be the same as the city ADAM, which see. C. R. CONDER.

ADMATHA (אָדְמָתָא, Est 1¹⁴), one of the wise men or counsellors of Ahasuerus. These seven royal advisers (cf. Ezr 7¹⁴), who were granted admission to the king's presence, and saw his face (cf. 2 K 25¹⁹), are perhaps to be compared rather with the supreme Persian judges (Herod. iii. 31) than with the representatives of the six families which took part with Darius against the pseudo-Smerdis (Herod. iii. 84). The name is possibly Persian, admāta = 'unrestrained.' In the LXX only three names are given. H. A. WHITE.

ADMINISTRATION in the general sense of service is now obsolete. But it is found 1 Co 12⁵ 'there are differences of administrations' (i.e. different kinds of Christian service, RV 'ministrations,' the Rheims NT word). In 2 Co 9¹², though the Gr. is the same (διακονία, diagonia), the meaning is not service generally, but the performance of service (RV again 'ministration' from Geneva Bible).

J. HASTINGS.

ADMIRE, ADMIRATION.—These words occur in AV as the expression of simple wonder, without including approbation. 2 Th 1¹⁰ 'When he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired (RV 'marvelled at') in all them that believe'; Jude v. 16 'having men's persons in admiration' (Gr. θαυμάζοντες πρόσωπα, RV 'showing respect of persons'); Rev 17⁶ 'When I saw her, I wondered with great a.' (RV 'with a great wonder'). Compare the version in metre of Ps 105⁵ 'Remember his marvellous works that he hath done,' is rendered—

'Think on the works that he hath done,
Which admiration breed.'

J. HASTINGS.

ADNA (אָדְנָא 'pleasure').—1. A contemporary of Ezra, who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10²⁰). 2. The head of the priestly house of Harim in the time of the high priest Joiakim, the son of Jeshua (Neh 12¹⁵). H. A. WHITE.

ADNAH.—1. (אָדְנָה) A Manassite officer of Saul who deserted to David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12²⁰). 2. (אָדְנָה) An officer in Jehoshaphat's army (2 Ch 17¹⁴). J. A. SELBIE.

ADO.—Mk 5³⁹ 'Why make ye this ado?' (RV 'Why make ye a tumult?'). The older form is at do, where 'at' is the prep. before the infin., found chiefly in northern Eng. and supposed to come from the Scandinavian. 'We have other things at do,' Towneley Mysteries, p. 181. 'At do' was contracted into 'ado,' and then looked upon as a subst. Cf. Shaks. Tam. of Shr. V. 1—

'Let's follow, to see the end of this ado.'

While throwing it out of Mk 5³⁹, the RV introduces 'ado' into Ac 20¹⁰ 'Make ye no ado (AV 'Trouble not yourselves'), for his life is in him,' though the Gr. (θορυβίζεθε) is the same in both places.

J. HASTINGS.

ADONIBEZEK (אָדוֹנִיבֶזֶק).—The name as it stands in Jg 15⁷ must mean, Bezek (an otherwise unknown deity) is my lord. The town of Bezek (which see) will then also have taken its name from that of the god. The chief of a Can. kingdom in S. Pal., he was defeated by the tribe of Judah, taken prisoner, and mutilated by having his thumbs and great toes cut off. His boast was that he had similarly treated seventy kings. The mutilation was intended, while preserving the captive as a trophy, to render him incapable of mischief. According to Plutarch (Life of Lys.), the Athenians decreed that every prisoner of war should lose his thumbs, so that while fit to row he should be unfit to handle spear. Hannibal is accused (Valer. Max. ix. 2, ext. 2) of mutilating prisoners, 'prima pedum parte succisa.' These may be slanders, but they prove how conceivable such mutilation was even then, and what was its object at all times.

ADONIJAH (אָדוֹנִיָּהוּ).—1. The name of the fourth son of David (2 S 3⁴, 1 Ch 3²). After the death of Absalom, Adonijah, who was next in order of birth, naturally regarded himself as the heir to the throne. His expectation was doubtless shared by the nation, and seems to have been for a time encouraged by his father. The situation had been altered, however, by the introduction of Bathsheba into the royal harem, and by the birth of Solomon. The influence and the ambition of this latest of David's queens rendered it certain that Adonijah would encounter a dangerous rival in his younger brother. It was probably his knowledge that intrigues against his interests were being carried on in the harem that led to the premature and ill-starred attempt of Adonijah to seize the crown before his father's death. The narrative (1 K 1 and 2) is from the same pen as the section in 2 S which contains the story of Absalom's rebellion, and is evidently the work of one who had access to trustworthy sources of information. There are several features of resemblance between the two narratives; and the two chief actors therein, Absalom and Adonijah, seem to have resembled one another in disposition and even in bodily characteristics (cf. 1 K 1^{5, 6} with 2 S 14²⁵ 15¹). At first Adonijah's enterprise seemed likely to be crowned with success. He attached to his cause such important and influential supporters as Joab the commander-in-chief, and Abiathar the priest. In company with these and many members of the royal family and the king's house, Adonijah held a great feast at En-Rogel, where the final arrangements were to be made for his coronation. But he had reckoned without his host. One whom he had not invited to the banquet was destined to checkmate the conspirators ere their plans were matured. Nathan the prophet seems to have occupied much the same position at the court of David as Isaiah afterwards held at that of Hezekiah. Seeing that not a moment was to be lost, Nathan hastened to Bathsheba, whose fears he easily awakened by pointing out the danger to which her own life and that of Solomon would be exposed if the attempt of Adonijah should succeed. Bathsheba, who seems to have already obtained from David a promise that Solomon should succeed him on the throne, immediately sought an interview with the aged king, and informed him of what was transpiring at En-Rogel; while Nathan, in accordance with a prearranged plan, came in opportunely to confirm her story. The prophet-counsellor played his part with consummate skill, notably when (1 K 1²⁷) he expressed surprise that the king, if he had sanctioned the action of Adonijah, had not taken his old friends and counsellors into his confidence. Yielding to the representations of the queen and the prophet, David renewed his oath to Bathsheba in favour of her son, and took prompt measures to secure the accession of the latter. At such a juncture the support of the royal bodyguard was all-important, and fortunately their loyalty was beyond suspicion. Their commander was ordered by David to escort the youthful Solomon, mounted upon his father's mule, to Gihon, and to have him anointed king by Zadok the priest and Nathan the prophet. This commission was executed amidst the enthusiasm of the people, who rent the air with shouts of 'God save King Solomon!' The unwonted noise reached the ears of Adonijah's guests at En-Rogel, causing astonishment, which passed into consternation when Jonathan the son of Abiathar hurried in with the news that David had chosen Solomon to succeed him. The company broke up in confusion, and Adonijah himself was so much alarmed that he fled for protection to the altar. Solomon, however, agreed to spare his life on condition of future loyalty. If Adonijah displayed no conspicuous wisdom in his attempt to seize the crown, his next act, which cost him his life, is hard to explain, except on the principle, Quem Deus vult perdere prius dementat. After the death of his father he actually requested Solomon to bestow upon him in marriage Abishag the Shunammite, the maiden who had attended upon David during his declining years. And as advocate for him in this delicate matter he chose Bathsheba! No one who is acquainted with the notions of Eastern courts can wonder at the resentment of Solomon, or that he construed this request as an act of treason. Considering the relation in which Abishag had stood to David, the people would certainly infer that Adonijah in taking her for his wife still asserted his right to the crown. (Compare the story of Abner and Ishbosheth in 2 S 3⁷, and of Absalom in 2 S 16²¹.) Speedily was sentence pronounced, 'Adonijah hath spoken this word against his own life; surely he shall be put to death this day'; and the sentence was immediately executed by the captain of the guard.

2. One of the Levites who, according to the Chronicler, was sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Ch 17⁸). 3. One of the 'chiefs of the people' who sealed the covenant (Neh 10²⁹). Same as Adonikam (Ezr 2¹³ 8¹³, Neh 7¹⁸).

ADONIRAM, ADORAM (אֲדוֹנִירָם, אֲדוֹרָם).—The latter name occurs 2 S 20²⁴, 1 K 12¹⁸, and is probably a corruption of Adoniram. The LXX supports this view, reading 'Αδωνειραμ, 2 S 20²⁴, 1 K 4^b 5¹⁴ (Heb. אֲדוֹנִירָם), 1 K 12¹⁸ (B 'Αραμ, A 'Αδωνιραμ), and in the parallel 2 Ch 10¹⁸ 'Αδωνειραμ (Heb. אֲדוֹרָם, Hadoram). A. was 'over the levy,' that is, he superintended the levies employed in the public works during the reigns of David, Solomon, and Rehoboam. He was stoned to death by the rebellious Isr. when sent to them by Rehoboam (1 K 12¹⁸).

ADONIS.—Strictly not a name but a title, אֲדוֹן 'Adōn, 'Lord,' of the god Tammuz (which see). Is 17¹⁰ RVm 'plantings of Adonis' (אֲדוֹנִים, אֲדוֹנִים) nif'ē na'amānīm, text 'pleasant plants') and the setting of 'vine slips of a stranger' (strange god), is mentioned as the result of having 'forgotten the God of thy salvation.' So Ewald, Lagarde, Cheyne. With 'plantings of Adonis,' cf. the Gr. 'Αδωνίδος κήποι, quick-growing plants reared in pots or baskets (Plato, Phædr. 276 B), and offered to Aphrodite as emblems of her lover's beauty and early death (Theocr. 15. 113).

The meaning of na'amānīm is, however, doubtful. Na'aman is probably the name of a god; cf. the name of the Syrian general (2 K 5¹), and Ar. Nu'mān, a king's name (Tebrizi's scholia to Hamāsa). The river Belus is now called Nahr Na'amān. Lagarde (Sem. i. 32) quotes Arab. name of the red anemone, Shaka'iku-n-Nu'mān, explaining as 'the wound of Adonis'; but see Wellhausen, Skizzen, iii. p. 7.

ADONI-ZEDEK (אֲדוֹנִי־צֶדֶק; 'Lord of righteousness,' AV Adoni-zedec), king of Jerusalem at the time of the invasion of Canaan by the Israelites under Joshua. After the Gibeonites had succeeded in making a league with Israel, he induced four other kings, those of Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish, and Eglon, to unite with him against the invaders. First they attacked, as traitors to the common cause, the Gibeonites, who appealed to Joshua for help. By a rapid night march from Gilgal, Joshua came unexpectedly upon the allied kings, and utterly routed them (JOSHUA, BETH-HORON). Adoni-zedek and his associates sought refuge in a cave at Makkedah, but were taken and brought before Joshua. The Heb. chiefs set their feet upon their necks in token of triumph. They were then slain, and their bodies hung up until the evening, when they were taken down and flung into the cave where they had hid themselves, the mouth of which was filled up with great stones (Jos 10¹⁻²⁷). In Jos 10²⁶ LXX reads 'Αδωνιβέζεκ, and some have identified the latter with Adonibezek of Jg 1⁵. (See Kittel, Hist. of Heb. i. 307; Budde, Richt. u. Sam. 63 f.; Wellh. Einleit. 4 [Bleek] 182.)

R. M. BOYD.

ADOPTION (υιοθεσία) is a word used by St. Paul to designate the privilege of sonship bestowed by God on His people. While Jesus Himself and the New Testament writers all speak frequently and emphatically of our blessings and duties as sons or children of God, no other of them employs this special term, which occurs in five places in the Epistles of St. Paul (Gal 4⁵, Ro 8¹⁵, 23 9⁴, Eph 1⁵). It seems to express a distinct and definite idea in that apostle's mind; and since adoption was, in Roman law, a technical term for an act that had specific legal and social effects, there is much probability that he had some reference to that in his use of the word. The Romans maintained in a very extreme way the rights of fathers over their children as practically despotic; and these did not cease when the sons came of age, or had families of their own, but while the father lived could only be terminated by certain legal proceedings, analogous to those by which slaves were sold or redeemed. The same term (mancipatio) was applied to a process of this kind, whether a man parted with his son, or his slave, or his goods. Hence a man could not be transferred from one family to another, or put into the position of a son to any Roman citizen, without a formal legal act, which was a quasi sale by his natural father, and buying out by the person who adopted him. If he was not in the power of a natural father, but independent (sui juris), as, e.g., if his father were dead, then he could only be put in the place of son to another by a solemn act of the sovereign people assembled in their religious capacity (comitia curiata). For each family had its own religious rites, and he must be freed by public authority from the obligation to fulfil those of one, and taken bound to observe those of another. That transaction was, however, properly called arrogatio, while adoptio strictly denoted the taking, by one man, of a son of another to be his son. This, though not requiring an act of legislation, had to be regularly attested by witnesses; and in old form one struck a pair of scales with a piece of copper as an emblem of the primitive process of sale. Adoption, when thus legally performed, put a man in every respect in the position of a son by birth of him who had adopted him, so that he possessed the same rights and owed the same obligations.

No such legal and complete transference of filial rights and duties seems to have existed in the law of Israel; though there may have been many cases of the informal adoption known among us, as when Mordecai took the orphan Esther, his uncle's daughter, to be his (Est 2⁷). The failure of heirs was provided for by the levirate law.

Now, since St. Paul represents the Christian's adoption as carrying with it certain definite privileges which would not be involved in such an act as Mordecai's, and since he may well have been acquainted with the Roman practice in this matter, it seems probable that he may have had it in view. (See Dr. W. E. Ball in Contemp. Rev., Aug. 1891).

The earliest instance of his use of the word is in his Epistle to the Galatians, in a passage in which several names of human relations are used to illustrate those between God and man, and where the apostle expressly says, 'I speak after the manner of men' (3¹⁵), i.e. I use a human analogy to make my argument plain. The term that he first employs after this remark is that rendered covenant, or testament (διαθήκη), here probably in the general sense of disposition, without emphasis on the peculiarities either of a covenant or of a testament. In virtue of this disposition, which was one of promise, given to Abraham and his seed, the blessing comes to all who are united to Christ by faith; for the promise, St. Paul argues, was not to the physical descendants of the patriarch as a multitude, but to a unity, the one Messiah, who was to gather all nations to Himself. According to this disposition of God, believers are sons and heirs (3^{26, 29}). But before their faith in Christ they were kept in ward under the law, which was not intended to add a condition to the covenant of promise, but to bring their latent sin to a head in transgressions (3¹⁹), so that they might not seek to be justified by works, but might accept the blessing as of God's free grace through Christ, who became a curse for us that He might redeem us from the curse of the law (3^{13, 23-24}). This seems to be clearly the general line of the argument. But the position of men under the law appears to be represented by St. Paul in two different ways, sometimes as bond-servants under the curse (3^{10, 13, 47, 8}), and sometimes as children under age (4¹⁻³). The explanation of this may be found in the consideration that St. Paul never meant to deny that Abraham, David, and other believers in OT times were really justified (see Ro 4¹⁻³); while as many as were of the works of the law were under the curse. The former were like children under age, not yet enjoying the full privileges of sonship; the latter were like bond-servants. To both alike the blessing brought by Christ in the fulness of the time is called adoption (Gal 4⁵), and this seems to indicate that St. Paul holds the sonship, of which he is speaking, to be founded on the covenant promise of God, and not on the natural relation to God of all men as such. We must not therefore lower the meaning of adoption, in his mind, to the conferring of the full privileges of sons on those who are children by birth. It is, as the whole context shows, a position bestowed by a disposition or covenant of God, and through a redemption by Christ. This probably led St. Paul to the use of the word; for the Roman adoption was effected by a legal act, which involved a quasi buying-out. He also plainly regards it as like the adoption of Roman law in this, that it gives not merely paternal care, but the complete rights of sonship, the gift of the Spirit of God's Son, and the inheritance. No doubt this legal analogy may be pressed too far; and St. Paul plainly indicates that what he means is really something far deeper; for it is founded upon a spiritual union to God's Son, which is described as 'putting on Christ' (3²⁷); so that our adoption is not a mere formal or legal act, though it may be compared to such in respect of its authoritative and abiding nature.

Some theologians of different schools (e.g. Turretin, Schleiermacher) have inferred from the connexion between redemption and adoption, in Gal 4⁵, that adoption is the positive part of the complete blessing of justification, of which redemption or forgiveness is the negative part. But this is a very precarious inference; and the two terms are so different in their meaning, that it is far more probable that St. Paul meant by adoption a blessing distinct from our having peace with God and access into His favour, which he describes in Ro 5¹ as the positive fruits of our justification. These blessings, indeed, cannot be separated in reality; they are only different aspects of the one great gift of life in Christ; but in order to understand clearly the evangelical doctrine of the NT, it is necessary to look at them separately.

The next place where St. Paul speaks about adoption is in Ro 8^{15, 23}. Here he is speaking of the believer's new walk of holiness, and he has said, 'If by the spirit ye mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live' (8¹³). In proof of this he asserts that 'as many as are led by the Spirit of God are the sons of God' (8¹⁴); and then he proves this in turn by saying, 'Ye received not the (or, a) spirit of bondage again unto fear, but ye received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father.' The line of reasoning is the same as in Galatians, but put in the inverse order. The promise of life is proved by the fact of our being sons of God; and that, again, because the spirit that He has given us is that of adoption, enabling us to address God as our Father, and so (8¹⁶) witnessing with our spirit that we are children of God. In this possibly there may be some allusion to the witnesses which were necessary to the solemn act of adoption according to Roman law and custom. Then, as in the earlier Epistle, it is stated that this adoption carries with it all the rights of true sonship, 'If children, then heirs,' etc. (8¹⁷). St. Paul next proceeds to contrast this glorious prospect with the present sufferings of the people of God. These sufferings are shared by all creation; and the deliverance is to be at the revealing of the sons of God (8¹⁹), when creation itself shall share the liberty of the glory of the sons of God (8²¹). So in 8²³ he says, 'we wait for our adoption, the redemption of our body.' It is the resurrection of life at the coming of the Lord that is undoubtedly meant; and that is called here the adoption, because it will be the full revelation of our sonship. Now are we sons of God, as St. John puts it; but the world knoweth us not, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but when it shall appear, we shall be like Him (1 Jn 3¹⁻³). Another striking parallel is to be found in our Lord's words, as recorded by St. Luke (20^{35, 36}), of those that are accounted worthy to attain to the resurrection from the dead, 'Neither can they die any more, for they are equal unto the angels, and are sons of God, being sons of the resurrection.' As salvation is sometimes spoken of as a thing perfect here and now, and sometimes as only to be completed at the last, so St. Paul speaks of adoption. It belongs to the believer really and certainly now, but perfectly only at the resurrection.

In Ro 9⁴ St. Paul mentions 'the adoption' first among the privileges of Israel, which he there enumerates. This is in accordance with the fact that the nation as a whole is called in the OT God's son, and individual members of it His children, sons and daughters. The term implies further, what is also taught in OT, that they had this relation, not through physical descent or creation, but by an act of gracious love on God's part. And in 9⁷⁻⁸, St. Paul teaches that not all the children of Abraham and Jacob are children of God, but they who are of the promise, i.e., as he put it before, they who accept the promise by faith. It is not necessary to suppose that St. Paul speaks here of another adoption, quite distinct from the Christian one; it is, indeed, an earlier and less perfect phase of it, but he regards it as essentially the same; since the gospel was preached before to Abraham, and justification, though founded on the actual redemption of Christ, was by anticipation applied to him and many others before Christ came.

The last place where St. Paul uses the term adoption is Eph 1⁵, where he says that God eternally foreordained believers unto adoption as sons through Jesus Christ unto Himself. This refers to the eternal purpose, in accordance with which God does all His works in time, and corresponds to what he had said in Ro 8²⁹, that 'whom He foreknew He also foreordained to be conformed to the image of His Son, that He might be the first-born among many brethren.' The conformity here mentioned probably includes moral likeness; but the ultimate end is stated to be that there might be many brethren of Christ, among whom He is the firstborn. Our Lord, according to St. Paul, is, in a peculiar sense, God's Son, His own proper Son, begotten before all creation (Col 1¹⁵), and the grace of adoption makes believers truly His brethren and joint-heirs with Him, though He has ever and in all things the pre-eminence as Son of God from eternity, by nature and not merely by grace.

ADORA ('Αδωρα) in Idumæa (Ant. XIII. ix. 1), noticed in 1 Mac 13²⁰. The same as Adoraim.

ADORAIM (אָדוֹרַיִם), 2 Ch 11⁹.—A city of Judah fortified by Rehoboam on the S.W. of his mountain kingdom, now Dāra, at the edge of the mountains W. of Hebron—a small village. SWP vol. iii. sheet xxi. C. R. CONDER.

ADORAM.—See ADONIRAM.

ADORATION.—Under this term may be conveniently considered certain phases of worship. The word itself does not occur either in AV or RV, but both the disposition of mind and heart, and the outward expressions of that disposition, which are alike denoted by it, receive abundant illustration. From one of the actions expressive of A.,—namely, lifting the hand to the mouth, either in order to indicate that the worshipper was dumb in the sacred presence, or, more commonly, to kiss it and then wave it towards the statue of the god,—the term itself is often supposed to be derived (admoventes oribus suis dexteram, Apul. Met. iv. 28; cf. Pliny, NH xxviii. 5; Min. Felix, Oct. ii.). This practice of kissing the hand, accompanied by certain other gestures, was, among the Romans, the special meaning of adoratio as distinguished from oratio or prayer. It was, in antiquity, expressive of the deepest respect, and is alluded to in Job 31²⁷, possibly also in 1 K 19¹⁸, Ps 2¹², Hos 13². Adorare is however a compound verb, meaning, first, 'to address,' then, 'to entreat, to supplicate,' and, finally, 'to worship.' That A. should embrace at once a range of feelings and a series of acts is explained by a very simple consideration. The most profound and most intense feelings are just those which act or gesture expresses better than words. It is only, therefore, to a limited extent that A. finds expression in language, and then only in language of the most general and least objective kind. A. is, in the first place, the attitude of the soul which is called forth by the loftiest thoughts and realisations of God. Before His perfections the soul abases itself; it seeks to get beyond earth and earthly things and to enter into His nearer presence. A. belongs thus to the mystical side of religion; it includes the awe and reverence with which the soul feels itself on holy ground. Its appropriate expressions are therefore those which convey the feeling most adequately, even though when tried by any objective standard they might be pronounced meaningless. We distinguish generally between A. and those parts of Prayer and Worship which are directed towards a special end,—from confession, supplication, thanksgiving. Hymns and Prayers of A. set forth the majesty, purity, and holiness of God, His ineffable perfections, and the soul's loving contemplation of them. The adoring heart is 'lost in wonder, love, and praise.' In the Psalms, nature in all its departments is repeatedly called upon to praise and glorify God. St. Paul, caught up even to the third heaven, knowing not whether he was in the body or apart from the body, and hearing unspeakable words, is an example of that self-abandonment of devotion which is implied in the highest form of A. Possibly a similar meaning attaches to the statement of St. John, that he was 'in the spirit' on the Lord's day. Not only are angels called upon to bless the Lord, but A. is represented as the essence of the heavenly life. In Is 6 a scene of heavenly A. is depicted; and similar scenes are set forth in the Bk of Rev (4⁸⁻¹¹ 5³⁻¹⁴ 7¹¹⁻¹²). A. is here distinguished from service, as something even more truly fundamental, even that from which the only acceptable service springs.

God is the only legitimate object of A., since in Him only perfection dwells, and He only must be the supreme object of love and reverence. His worship must be spiritual (Jn 4²³), and such worship accorded to any other is uniformly branded as idolatry. Christ is adored because 'God was in Him' (2 Co 5¹⁹), and because God 'hath highly exalted Him, and is Himself glorified when the confession is made that 'Christ is Lord' (Ph 2⁹⁻¹¹).

As regards the attitudes and acts expressive of A., these, as already stated, symbolised the feeling experienced, and varied therefore with the kinds and degrees of emotion indicated. Humility was naturally expressed by prostration, kneeling, or simply bending head or body; submission and reverence, by the folded hands and downcast eyes; wonder and awe, by the uplifted hands with palms turned outwards; invocation and supplication, by hands and arms outstretched; dependence and entreaty, by clasped hands or meeting palms. Among the Hebrews, standing was the more usual attitude in public prayer, as it is among the Jews to this day; it indicates, perhaps, more a consciousness of the presence of other men and less self-abandonment than kneeling (cf. the Parable of the Pharisee and the Publican), which therefore was more appropriate to private devotion. Solomon, it is true, knelt at the dedication of the temple (1 K 8⁵⁴, 2 Ch 6¹³). Ezra (Ez 9⁵) and Daniel (Dn 6¹⁰) likewise fell upon their knees; and St. Paul knelt in prayer with the elders of Ephesus. In all these instances, however, the idea conveyed is rather that the spectators were overlooking or assisting at an act of private devotion, than that they were taking part in public or common prayer. In one instance (2 S 7¹⁸=1 Ch 17¹⁶) we read of sitting as an attitude of prayer; but this probably is a form of kneeling, the body being thrown back so as to rest upon the heels, as in other cases (1 K 18⁴²) it was thrown forward until the head was placed between the knees. To fall at the feet of a person (προσκύνησις) was an act of extreme reverence, generally accompanying supplication (1 S 25²⁴, 2 K 4³⁷, Est 8³, Mt 28⁹, Mk 5²², Lk 8⁴¹, Jn 11³²). Prostration before a human patron or benefactor was an Oriental, not a Roman, custom, and hence St. Peter declined to receive it from Cornelius, in whom it indicated a misapprehension as to the quality of the apostle. Of hands lifted to heaven we read in Is 1⁵, 1 Ti 2⁸. The consecration of love was denoted, as we have seen, by the kiss. Moses and Joshua were commanded to remove their sandals (Ex 3⁵, Jos 5¹⁵), because the presence of God made holy the ground on which they stood. In all these instances it is easy to discern how the outward act expressed, and, in expressing, tended to intensify in the heart of the worshipper the feeling with which it was associated.

ADORNING (mod. adornment) occurs in 1 P 3³ 'Whose a. let it not be that outward a. of plaiting the hair.' The latest use of a. as a subst. is in H. More's Seven Ch. (1669): 'Her prankings and adornings' (Oxf. Dict.).

ADRAMMELECH (אֲדַרְמֶלֶךְ).—1. A. and Anammelech, the gods of Sepharvaim to whom the colonists, brought to Samaria from Sepharvaim, burnt their children in the fire (2 K 17³¹). Adrammelech has been identified with a deity frequently mentioned in Assyrian records whose name is written ideographically AN. BAR. and AN. NIN. IB. This name has been conjecturally read 'Adar'; and if this conjecture be right, 'Adar' may be identified with 'Adrammelech' (i.e. 'Adar-prince' or 'Adar-molech'). 'Adar' is a name of Accadian origin, signifying 'Father of decision' (or judgment). 'Adar' was active in sending the waters of the Deluge. (Cf. Schrader, *KAT*², on 2 K 17³¹).

2. (2 K 19¹⁷, Is 37³⁶) mentioned with Sharezer as one of the murderers of Sennacherib. In Is (l.c.) and in all the versions of Kings (l.c.) the two murderers are described as the sons of Sennacherib, but the Kethibh of Kings omits 'his sons.' A Babylonian chronicle, referring to the murder, says simply, 'On the twentieth of the month Tebet, Sennacherib, king of Assyria, was killed by his son (sing.) in an insurrection.' (See E. Schrader, Keilinschriftliche Bibliothek, vol. ii. p. 281, and C. H. W. Johns in Expository Times, vol. vii. p. 238 f., and p. 360.

ADRAMYTTIUM (Ἀδραμύττιον) was an ancient city of the country Mysia, in the Rom. province Asia, with a harbour, at the top of the gulf Sinus Adramyttenus. The population and the name were moved some distance inland during the Middle Ages to a site which is now called Edremid. It must have been a city of great importance when Pergamos was the capital of the kings of Asia; and hence, when Asia became a Rom. province, Adramyttium was selected as the metropolis of the N.W. district of Asia, where the assizes (conventus) of that whole district were held. Its ships made trading voyages along the coasts of Asia and as far as Syria (Ac 27²); and a kind of ointment exported from the city was highly esteemed (Pliny, NH xiii. 2. 5). Its importance as a trading centre is shown by its being one of the cities where cistophori, the great commercial coinage of the east, were struck between 133 and 67 B.C. It suffered greatly during the Mithridatic wars, and rather declined in importance; but, even as late as the 3rd cent., under Caracalla, it still ranked sufficiently high to strike alliance coins with Ephesus (implying certain reciprocal rights in respect of religious festivals and games).

ADRIA (Ac 27⁷, RV Sea of Adria).—The sea 'amidst' which the ship carrying St. Paul was driven during fourteen days, before it stranded on Melita. After passing Crete, the voyagers encountered a violent 'north-easter' (RV Euraquilo), before which they drifted, and running under the island of Claudia (RV Cauda, now Gozo), they were afraid of being carried towards the quicksands (RV Syrtis) dreaded by the mariner on the African coast; but eventually, on the fourteenth day, descried land, where they ran the ship aground on an island called Melita. The sea which they traversed is termed ὁ Ἀδρίας. Three questions arise—(1) as to the form, (2) as to the origin, and (3) as to the range or connotation, of the word.

1. WH prefer the aspirated form Ἀδρίας; but while both forms occur in ancient writers (see the variations in Pauly-Wiss. RE s.v.), our choice must depend on the probable derivation of the name.

2. There were two towns of similar name—Atria or Hadria, in Picenum (now Atri), an inland town having no relation to the Adriatic (except indirectly through its port of Matrinum), and Atria, a town of early commercial importance near the mouth of the Po, with which the name is associated by such authorities as Livy (v. 33), Strabo (v. 1), and Pliny (HN iii. 120). This town, still called Adria, is described by Livy and others as a Tuscan settlement, but by Justin (xx. 1. 9) as of Gr. origin; and its early relations with Greece are (as Mommsen, in CIL v. 1. p. 220, points out) yet more certainly attested by painted vases of Gr. style found in no small number there, but not elsewhere in that district of Italy. The Picentine town was in imperial times called Hadria, and earlier coins belonging to it are inscribed HAT., while in inscriptions from the town on the Po the first letter is represented by A, not by H, and Mommsen, for that reason, has latterly preferred the form Atria.

3. As Adrias was early used in the sense, to which Adriatic has again been confined, of the branch of the sea between Italy and Illyria, it was not unnatural so to understand it in Ac 27, esp. as an island off its Illyrian shore, Melita (now Meleda), might have been the scene of the shipwreck. Bryant (Diss. on the wind Euroclydon), Macknight, and others adopted this view, which some, on their authority, have accepted, although Scaliger had pronounced it ridiculous and hardly worth refuting. Its chief champion is W. Falconer, whose Dissertation on St. Paul's Voyage, published in 1817, was reissued in 1870 by the writer's nephew, Judge Falconer, with copious additional notes controverting (though with little real success) the arguments of Mr. Smith of Jordanhill, in support of the tradition which regards Malta as the scene of shipwreck, and takes Adrias in the wider sense of the waters between Crete and Sicily (Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, 1848). The history of the strangely varying usage is well indicated by Partsch in Pauly-Wiss. s.v., and by Müller in his ed. of Strabo, pp. 328, 335, 338. At first the name strictly belonged to the inner portion adjoining the mouths of the Po and the coast of the Veneti, while the lower or south portion was known as the Ionian Sea. But these names soon became interchangeable, or, if a distinction was drawn, it was that of two basins—the inner as far as Mount Garganus being more strictly 'the Adrias,' the outer the Ionian Sea. Strabo expressly recognises this distinction, but indicates that Adrias had now become the name for the whole (ii. 123, vii. 187). But while Adrias comes thus to include the Ionian Sea, the latter term in its turn obtained an extension to the sea lying between the west coasts of Greece and Sicily, which is called by Strabo the Sicilian, and was also termed the Ausonian Sea (ii. 123), and the name Adrias now received a corresponding, but even greater, extension. A very clear light is thrown on the range or connotation of 'the Adrias,' as used in Acts, by the statements of Ptolemy, who flourished (not 'immediately,' as Smith has said (p. 127), but) sixty or seventy years after St. Luke (he was alive 160 A.D.), and who presents an usage which must be presumed to have been not only existent, but current and generally accepted for some considerable time, in order to find a place in such a work. Ptolemy places the Adriatic to the east of Sicily (iii. 4), to the south of Achaia (iii. 14), to the west and south of the Peloponnesus (iii. 16), and to the west of Crete (iii. 15), thus giving to it precisely the extent which Strabo assigns to the Sicilian Sea. We meet the same wider range in earlier as well as later writers. The only argument of weight adduced by Judge Falconer in opposition to the case thus established, is that elsewhere (iv. 3) Ptolemy places Melita (Malta) in the African Sea, which bounds Sicily on the south. But it is too much to construe this as though Ptolemy 'distinctly and unequivocally excluded the island from all seas but that of Africa.' The alleged 'exclusion' is a mere inference by Falconer from the 'inclusion'; not at all necessary where Melita, lying between the two seas called African and Sicilian, might easily be associated with either. At any rate, the main question concerns not the mere geographical assignation of Melita as such, but the meaning to be attached to 'the Adrias,' as the sea which the vessel traversed on its voyage. And here most commentators agree in holding that, in accordance with the current usage of the time when St. Luke wrote, the word is applied to the whole expanse of waters between Crete and Sicily.

ADRIEL (אֲדְרִיֵּל).—Son of Barzillai, a native of Abel-meholah in the Jordan Valley, about 10 miles S. of Bethshean. He married Merab, the eldest daughter of Saul, who should have been given to David as the slayer of Goliath (1 S 18¹⁹). Michal (2 S 21⁸) is a mistake for Merab.

ADULLAM (אֲדוּלָאִם), now 'Īd-el-mā' 'Feast of water,' or 'Īd-el-mīyeh' 'Feast of the hundred'

(see Clermont-Ganneau and Conder in PEF Mem. iii. 361-67; Conder, Tent Work, p. 276 f.; Smith, Geogr. p. 229), in the valley of Elah, is frequently referred to in the OT. It was a city of the Canaanites (Gn 38¹), in the district allotted to the tribe of Judah after the conquest (Jos 12¹⁵). It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch 11⁷), and is mentioned later on by Micah (1¹⁵). After the Captivity it was re-peopled by the Jews (Neh 11³⁰), and continued to be a place of importance under the Maccabees (2 Mac 12³⁸).

The Cave of Adullam, famous through its association with the early history of David, has usually been supposed to have had no connexion with the city of that name, and has been located by tradition, as well as by many travellers, in the Wady Khareitun, about six miles south-east of Bethlehem. The most recent authorities, however, are strongly of opinion that an entirely suitable site for it can be found in the vicinity of the city, and that there is no reason for separating the two. Half-way between Shochoh and Keilah, and 10 miles north-west of Hebron, some caves have been found, the position of which suits all we are told about David's stronghold, and which are at once central and defensible. It may be regarded as practically settled that the Cave of Adullam was not far from where David had his encounter with Goliath.

Adullamite (אֲדוּלָאִםִּי, 'native of Adullam') is applied to Hirah, the friend of Judah (Gn 38¹). At the time of the conquest Adullam was a royal city, and if it was so in Hirah's time, he was probably king. W. MUIR.

ADULTERY.—See CRIMES, and MARRIAGE.

ADUMMIM, THE ASCENT OF (אֲדֻמִּים אֲשֶׁר בְּיַם הַיַּרְדֵּן), Jos 15⁷ 18¹⁷, forming part of the eastern boundary between Judah and Benjamin, is the steep pass in which the road ascends from Jericho to Jerusalem. Its name, Tal'at ed-Dumm, is still the same—'the ascent of blood' or 'red,' and is most probably due to the red marl which is so distinctive a feature of the pass. In this pass, notorious for robberies and murders, is the traditional 'inn' of Lk 10³⁴, and near by the Chastel Rouge or Citerne Rouge, built by the crusaders for protection of pilgrims from Jerusalem to the Jordan. A. HENDERSON.

ADVANTAGE.—This is one of our numerous misspelt Eng. words. It comes from avant, 'before,' with the suffix age. Hence it has no connexion with Lat. prep. ad (though the misspelling is found as early as 1523), and the meaning is not simple profit, but superiority. In this sense it is found in Ro 3¹ 'What a. then hath the Jew?' and 2 Co 2¹, to which RV adds 2 Co 7² 12^{17, 18}. In Job 35³, Jude v. 16 'a.' should be 'profit.' And so the verb 'to advantage,' now obsolete, which is found in Lk 9²⁵, 1 Co 15³² 'what advantageth it me?' is rightly turned into 'profit' in RV.

ADVENT.—See PAROUSIA.

ADVENTURE, now obs. as a verb, is found Dt 28⁵⁶ 'The tender and delicate woman among you which would not a. (intrans. = venture) to set the sole of her foot upon the ground for delicateness and tenderness'; Jg 9¹⁷ 'For my father fought for you, and a^d (transit. = risked) his life'; Ac 19²¹ 'desiring him that he would not a. himself (δοῦνα εἰσέρω, 'give himself') into the theatre.' Cf. Shaks. Two G. of Ver. III. i. 120—

'Leander would adventure it'; and for the intrans. use Rom. and Jul. V. iii. 11—

'I am almost afraid to stand alone
Here in the churchyard; yet I will adventure.'

'At all adventure' occurs Wis 2^e 'we are born at all a.' (ἀπορχεδίως, RV 'by mere chance') and 'at all adventures,' Lv 26²¹ m (רָק, in the usual phrase עַתְּ קָרָה לְךָ). Cf. T. Wilson (1553): 'which showte (shoot) . . . at all adventures hittle missie.'

J. HASTINGS.

ADVERSARY.—Besides the general sense of opponent, a. occurs with the special meaning of an opponent at law (ἀντιδικος), Lk 12⁵⁸ 'When thou goest with thine adversary to the magistrate'; Mt 5²⁵ Lk 18³. In the foll. passages it is used as the tr. of Heb. שָׂטָן Sātān, Nu 22²², 1 S 29⁴, 2 S 19²², 1 K 5⁴ 11¹⁴, 23, 25. Cf. 1 P 5⁸ 'your a. (Gr. ἀντιδικος) 'the devil.' See SATAN.

ADVERTISE, 'to give notice,' 'inform,' Nu 24⁴ 'I will a. thee what this people shall do to thy people in the latter days'; and Ru 4⁴ 'I thought to a. thee' (RV 'disclose it unto thee'). In the last passage the Heb. is 'uncover the ear' (עָרַב אָזְנוֹ). See EAR. Advertisement, in the sense of precept, admonition, occurs in the heading of Sir 20.

J. HASTINGS.

ADVICE, ADVISE, ADVISEMENT.—'To take advice' in mod. Eng. is to consult with another and receive his opinion. But in Jg 19³⁰ and 2 Ch 25¹⁷ 'to take a.' means to consult with oneself and give an opinion; Jg 19³⁰ 'consider of it, take a. (RV 'take counsel') and speak.' So Shaks. 2 Henry VI. II. ii. 67—

'And that's not suddenly to be perform'd;
But with advice, and silent secrecy.'

Advise in the sense, not of giving advice to another, but of deliberating with oneself, is found twice, 2 S 24¹³ 'now a. (RV 'advise thee') and see what answer I shall return to him that sent me,' and 1 Ch 21¹² (RV 'consider'). 'Well advised' in Pr 13¹⁰, 'but with the well advised is wisdom,' means not those who have accepted good advice, but those who are cautious or deliberate. Cf. Bacon, Essays, 'Let him be . . . advised in his answers.' Advisement, now obs., occurs 1 Ch 12¹⁹ 'the lords of the Philistines, upon a. (i.e. after deliberation) sent him away'; 2 Mac 14²⁰ 'When they had taken long a. thereupon' (RV 'when these proposals had been long considered').

AEDIAS (B Ἀηδίας, A -δι-), 1 Es 9²⁷.—One of those who agreed to put away their 'strange' wives. The corresponding name in Ezr 10²⁶ is Elijah (עִלְיָא, Halia). The form in 1 Es is a corruption of the Gr. (HAIΔ read as ΔHAIΔ), and has no Heb. equivalent.

H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

ENEAS (Αἰνέας) is the name of a paralytic at Lydda who was cured by Peter (Ac 9^{33, 34}). We find the name used of a Jew in Jos. Ant. XIV. x. 22.

A. C. HEADLAM.

ENON (Αἰνών, 'springs') is mentioned only in Jn 3²³ as near to Salem (which see). As the name 'springs' is common, its locality must be fixed by that of Salem. Eusebius and Jerome place Enon 8 miles south of Scythopolis, now Beisan; and the name Salim is said to attach to a mound some 6 or 7 miles south of Beisan, while three-quarters of a mile south of it are seven springs. 'Rivulets also wind about in all directions. . . I have found few places in Palestine of which one could so truly say, "Here is much water"' (Van de Velde, ii. p. 345, etc.). The chief difficulty in the acceptance of this identification is the naming of Salem (Jn 3²³) as a well-known town, suggesting the well-known Salim, east of Shechem. Conder has pointed out 'Ainūn, bearing the name, situated in the Wady Fār'ah. 'Here was once a large village, now completely overthrown. A great number of rock-cut cisterns are observed on the site' (Survey Memoirs, ii. p. 234). A little to the south of 'Ainūn is a succession of springs with flat meadows on either side, where great crowds might gather by the bank of the copious perennial stream shaded by oleanders. Here were 'many waters' (Jn 3²³ RVm). It is accessible by roads from all quarters, and is situated by one of the main roads from Jerus. to Galilee, the road passing Jacob's Well (Jn 4⁶) which our Lord may have taken to meet the Baptist in view of threatened misunderstandings and jealousies of his disciples. For a full description, see Conder's Tent Work, ii. pp. 57, 58. The distance is about 7 miles from Salim, which has been made an objection to this identification; but there is no nearer town of importance by which to describe its situation.

A. HENDERSON.

ESORA (Αἰσώρα), Jth 4⁴ (AV Esora).—A Samaritan town noticed with Bethhoron, Jericho, and Salem (Salim). Possibly Asireh, N.E. of Shechem (SWP vol. ii. sh. xi.). C. R. CONDER.

AFFECT, AFFECTION.—In its literal sense of 'to act upon,' affect occurs once, La 3⁵¹ 'mine eye affecteth mine heart.' In Sir 13¹¹ the meaning is to aspire, 'Affect not to be made equal unto him in talk.' Besides these, observe Gal 4^{17, 18}, where the meaning is to have affection for, be fond of. Gal 4¹⁷ 'They zealously a. you, but not well (Gr. ζηλοῦσιν ὑμᾶς οὐ καλῶς, RV 'They zealously seek you in no good way'); yea, they would exclude you, that ye might a. them' (RV 'seek them'). Cf. Bingham, Xenoph. 'Alwaies soure and cruell, so that Souldiers affected him as children doe their Schoolemaster.' Besides these, a. occurs only Ac 14² 'made them evil a^{ed}' (κακάω); 2 Mac 4²¹ 'not well a^{ed}' (ἀλλότριος), RV 'ill a^{ed}'; 13²⁸ 'well a^{ed}' (εὐμενής). Affection in old Eng. is any bent or disposition of the mind, good or bad, as Col 3² 'set your a. (Gr. φρονεῖτε, RV 'set your mind') on things above.' Hence, to tr. πάθος and the like, some adj. is added, as Col 3⁵ 'inordinate a.' (Gr. πάθος, RV 'passion'); Ro 1³¹ 'without natural a.' (Gr. ἄσπογγος). But in the plu. affections means passions, as Gal 5²⁴ 'the flesh with the a. (Gr. πάθημα, RV 'passions') and lusts'; Ro 1²⁸ 'God gave them up unto vile a.' (Gr. πᾶθη ἀτιμίας, RV 'vile passions'). Cf. the difference between 'passion' and 'passions.' RV gives 'affections' in a good (i.e. the mod.) sense at 2 Co 6¹² (AV 'bowels,' which see). Affectioned is found in the neutral sense of 'disposed' in Ro 12¹⁰ 'kindly a. (Gr. φιλόστοργοι, RV 'tenderly a.') one to another.' Cf. Fuller, Abel Red. 'He (Luther) was very lovingly affectioned towards his children.' J. HASTINGS.

AFFINITY.—In 1 K 3¹ 'Solomon made a. with Pharaoh'; 2 Ch 18¹ 'Jehoshaphat . . . joined a. with Ahab'; and Ezr 9¹⁴ 'Should we . . . join in a. with the people of these abominations?' a. has the special sense of relationship by marriage, being distinguished from consanguinity or relationship by blood. Cf. Selden, Laws of Eng. (1649), 'Many that by a. and consanguinity were become Englishmen.' See MARRIAGE.

J. HASTINGS.

AFFLICTION is now used only passively; the state of being afflicted, misery. So Ex 3⁷ 'I have surely seen the a. of my people,' and elsewhere. But it is also in the Bible used actively, as 1 K 22²⁷ 'feed him with bread of a. and with water of a., until I come in peace' (i.e. bread and water that will afflict him). Cf. More, 'Let him . . . purge the spirit by the a. of the flesh.' J. HASTINGS.

AFFRAY.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS.

AFORE and its compounds.—Afore=before, is used as prep. Is 18^s 'afore the harvest'; as adj. 2 Es 5³¹ 'the night a.'; and as adv. Ro 1² 'which he had promised afore.' Aforehand as adv.=beforehand, in anticipation, occurs Mk 14⁸ 'She is come a. to anoint my body'; and Jth 7¹. Afore-promised is now found 2 Co 9⁵ RV 'your a. bounty' (προεπηγγεμένως). Aforesaid occurs only 2 Mac 4²³ 14⁸. Aforetime=formerly, as Dn 6¹⁰ '(Daniel) prayed . . . as he did a.' Aforetime is happily introduced by RV at Dt 2^{10, 12, 20}, Jos 4¹⁸, 1 Ch 4⁴⁰, Jn 9⁸ Ro 3²⁵ Eph 2²⁻¹¹, Col 3⁷, Tit 3⁸, Philem v.¹¹, 1 P 3⁸, for various AV expressions, generally as tr. of אָזְמַן or אָזְמַן. The a in these words is a worn-down form of the old Eng. prep. an or on. See A. J. HASTINGS.

AFTER, AFTERWARD ('After, originally a compar. of af, Lat. ab, Gr. ἀπό, Skr. āpa, with compar. suffix -ter, like -ther in "either," etc.=farther off.—MURRAY) is found in AV and RV in all the modern usages as adv., prep., and conj., both of place and of time. The only examples demanding attention are: 1. some passages where after means 'according to,' as in Gn 1²⁶ 'And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness'; esp. the following (where Gr. is κατά), Ro 2⁵ 'after thy hardness and impenitent heart'; 1 Co 7⁴⁰ 'after my judgment'; 2 Co 11¹⁷ 'That which I speak, I speak it not after the Lord'; Eph 4²⁴ 'The new man, which after God is created in righteousness'; 2 P 3³ 'Scoffers, walking after their own lusts'; Gal 4²⁸ 'he who was of the bondwoman was born after the flesh'; Tit 1¹ 'the acknowledging of the truth which is after (RV 'according to') godliness'; and He 4¹¹ (where Gr. is ἐν) 'lest any man fall after (RVm 'into') the same example of unbelief.' 2. Where after means 'in proportion to': Ps 28⁴ 'give them after the work of their hands'; Ps 90¹⁵ (Pr. Bk.) 'Comfort us again now after the time that Thou hast plagued us.' So Ps 51¹ (Pr. Bk.). Cf. Litany, 'Deal not with us after our sins,' and Wyclif's tr. of Mt 16²⁷ 'He schal yelde to every man after his works.' 3. Where after is used for afterwards, as 1 K 17¹³ 'Make me thereof a little cake first, and bring it unto me, and after (RV 'afterward') make for thee and for thy son.' So He 11⁸, 2 P 2⁶.

Afterward is the older form; when the AV was made, 'afterwards' was coming into use. Skeat says he has not been able to find it much earlier than Shakespeare's time (but Oxf. Dict. gives one 1300, and one 1375). AV (Camb. ed.) has afterward 66 times, afterwards 13 times. J. HASTINGS.

AGABUS (Ἀγαβος, of uncertain derivation; probably from either אָבִי 'a locust,' Ezr 2⁴⁶, or אָבִי 'to love'), a Christian prophet living at Jerusalem, Ac 11²⁷⁻³⁰ 21^{10, 11}. Though the prophets were not essentially predictors of the future, the case of Agabus shows that their functions sometimes included the actual prediction of coming events. At Antioch, A.D. 44, A. foretold a famine 'over all the world' in the days of Claudius. Only local famines are known in this reign, though some were so severe as necessarily to affect indirectly the entire empire (Suet. Claud. xviii.; Tac. Ann. xii. 43; Euseb. Chron. Arm., ed. Schöne, ii. 252 et al.). Both Suetonius and Eusebius date a famine in the fourth year of Claudius, A.D. 45; and since Judæa as well as Greece suffered, it is probably this to which Agabus referred. Josephus speaks of its severity, and of means taken for its relief (Ant. III. xv. 3, xx. ii. 6 and v. 2). The other prophecy of Agabus (A.D. 59) followed the OT method of symbolism, and has a close parallel in Jn 21¹⁸. He foretold to St. Paul his imprisonment in Jerusalem, but did not thereby divert him from the journey. Nothing more is known concerning Agabus, though there are traditions that he was one of the seventy disciples of Christ, and that he suffered martyrdom at Antioch.

AGAG (אַגַּג, Nu 24⁷ אַגַּג 'violent (?)' Assy. agāgu, 'displeasure').—A king of the Amalekites, conquered by Saul and, contrary to the divine command, saved alive, but put to death by Samuel (1 S 15). From the way in which the name is used by Balaam (Nu 24⁷), it seems not to have been the name of any one individual prince, but, like Pharaoh among the Egyptians, and (possibly) Abimelech among the Philistines, a designation or title borne by all the kings,—perhaps by the king of that nation which stood at the head of the confederacy. Kneucker and others, without any reasonable ground, insist upon taking it as a personal name, and make its use by the writer of Nu 24⁷ a reminiscence of the story from Saul's time. J. MACPHERSON.

AGAGITE (אַגַּגִּי).—A term of reproach used to designate Haman, the enemy of the Jews at the Persian court of Ahasuerus (Est 3¹⁻¹⁰ 8^{3, 5} 9²⁴). In Josephus' version of the story (Ant. XI. vi. 5), Haman is described as 'by birth an Amalekite.' In Est 3¹ instead of Agagite the LXX reads Βουγαίον, and in 9²⁴ ὁ Μακεδών, while in the other passages simply the name Haman occurs. Thus in the LXX the word Agagite does not occur. Some have argued (e.g. Bertheau in Comm.) that the designation was used to indicate to a Hebrew what 'Macedonian' would to a Greek, and that it meant Amalekite in the sense of a contemptible, hateful person, but not as implying that Haman had any genealogical connexion with Amalek. The promotion of a foreigner to such a position in the empire as Haman occupied, even under the regime of the most despotic monarchs, must have been quite an exceptional occurrence. Apart from any other indication of Haman's foreign extraction, it is scarcely safe to base an assumption of such a kind on the possible meaning of a mere appellative. Others (e.g. v. Orelli in Herzog) think that the connexion of this adjective with the proper name Agag is extremely doubtful.

AGAIN.—The proper meaning of again, 'a second time,' is well seen in Rev 19³ 'And a. (Gr. δεύτερον, RV 'a second time') they said, Alleluia'; Jn 9²⁴ 'Then a. called they (RV 'so they called a second time, Gr. ἐκ δευτέρου) the man that was blind'; Ac 11⁹ 'But the voice answered me a. (Gr. ἐκ δευτέρου, RV 'a second time') from heaven'; Ph 4¹⁶ 'ye sent once and again' (Gr. δὲς, twice, as in Lk 18¹² 'I fast twice in the week'). But the oldest meaning of a. is 'in the opposite direction' (now generally expressed by 'back'), and of this there are some interesting examples in the Bible: Jg 3¹⁸ 'He himself turned a. (RV 'back') from the quarries'; Lk 10³⁵ 'when I come a. (RV 'back again') I will repay thee'; Pr 2¹⁹ 'None that go unto her return a.'; 2 S 22²⁸ '(I) turned not a. until I had consumed them'; Lk 6³⁵ 'I lend, hoping for nothing a.' (RV 'never despairing'); Gn 24⁶ 'Must I needs bring thy son a. unto the land from whence thou camest?'; Mt 11⁴ 'go and show John a. (=go back and show John) those things which ye do hear'; Ro 9²⁰ AVm 'who art thou that answerest again?' Cf. Ps 19⁶ (Pr. Bk.) 'It (the sun) goeth forth from the uttermost part of the heaven, and runneth almost unto the end of it a.'; and AGAINST.—1. In its primitive meaning of 'opposite to' against is rarely found alone, usually 'over a.' as Dt 1¹ 'in the plain over a. the Red Sea'; but we find Gn 15¹⁰ 'and laid each piece one a. another' (RV 'each half over a. the other'); 1 Ch 25⁸ 'They cast lots, ward a. ward'; Ezk 3⁸ 'I have made thy face strong a. their faces'; esp. Nu 25⁴ 'Take all the heads (RV 'chiefs') of the people, and hang them up before the Lord a. the sun' (RV 'unto the Lord before the sun'); and 1 S 25²⁰ 'David and his men came down a. her' (i.e. opposite her, so as to meet her). 2. From the meaning 'opposite to' of place, easily arises 'opposite to' of time, of which we have an example in Ro 2⁵ 'treasurest up unto thyself wrath a. (Gr. év, RV 'in') the day of wrath'; 1 Mac 5²⁷. Cf. Spenser, Prothalamion—

'Against the Brydale day, which is not long.'

3. In this sense a. is found as a conjunction in three places, Gn 43²⁶ 'they made ready the present a. Joseph came at noon'; Ex 7¹⁵, 2 K 16¹⁴.

AGE, AGED, OLD AGE.—Respect towards the aged as such, apart from any special claims of kinship, wealth, or public office, has always been a characteristic feature in Oriental life. In modern Syria and Egypt it has a foremost place among social duties, taking rank with the regard paid to the neighbour and the guest. Any failure to show this respect on the part of the young is severely frowned down as unseemly and unnatural. In Israel the general custom was strengthened by the command in the law of Moses, 'Thou shalt rise up before the hoary head' (Lv 19³²). This beautiful bond between youth and age may be described as a threefold cord of wisdom, authority, and affection.

1. Wisdom.—Where there is a scarcity of written record, personal experience becomes the one book of wisdom. As it is put by the Arab proverb, 'He that is older than you by a day is wiser than you by a year.' There is a similar emphasis on the value of experience when they say, 'Consult the patient, not the physician.' Hence the diffidence and respectful waiting of the youth Elihu, 'Days should speak, and multitude of years should teach wisdom' (Job 32⁷). Similarly the taunt of Eliphaz, 'Art thou the first man that was born?' (Job 15⁷), and his claim, 'With us are the grey-headed and very aged men' (Job 15¹⁰). Thus also Moses, though possessed of the learning of the Egyptians, receives helpful advice from Jethro; and later on, the tragedy of the divided kingdom in the days of Rehoboam turns upon the difference of opinion between the old and young advisers of the king.

2. Authority.—It was natural that the voice of experience and wisdom should also be the voice of authority. It was the tide-mark of Job's prosperity that the aged rose up before him. From the dignity conferred on the father as lord of the house and head of the family, the title soon passed into one of public office. The old men became the 'elders' of Israel and of the Christian Church. Similarly among the Arabs, the family of the ruling sheikh (old man) bore the title of sheikhs from their youth—an extension of the orig. meaning that is seen also in the corresp.

ecclesiastical term. When the Lord sought to set forth the high meaning of discipleship with regard to enmity, slander, immorality, and murder, He at once reached a point that seemed beyond the ideal when He alluded to the law revered by age and authority, and declared that even it must be vitalised and transfigured (Mt 5²¹⁻²³).

3. Mutual Affection.—The teaching of the Bible on age appeals as much to the heart as to the head, and many affectionate interests are made to cluster around the relationship of old and young. In the language of endearment, 'the beauty of old men is the grey head' (Pr 20²⁹), and 'The hoary head is a crown of glory' (Pr 16³¹). The presence of the aged in a community is regarded as a sign of peace and goodwill, just as the rarity of old age and of natural death indicates a state of blood-feud and party strife (Job 22¹⁶). John, who in youth came to Christ with a petition of selfishness, lives to say in his old age, 'Greater joy have I none than this, to hear of my children walking in the truth' (3 Jn v. 4). The women of Bethlehem in their rejoicing over the child of Boaz and Ruth, bring the expression of their joy to her who would feel it most, and say, 'There is a son born to Naomi' (Ru 4¹⁷). In the same spirit the aged apostle, in his appeal to Philemon on behalf of Onesimus, gives a predominance to love over law, saying, 'I rather beseech, being such an one as Paul the aged' (Philem v. 9). The last and softest fold of this affectionate relationship is the feebleness of age, and its claim upon the protection of the strong. It was the absence of this that made Moses stand apart and unique. Barzillai is too old for new friendships and fresh surroundings. The limit is set at three-score and ten, and excess of that is increase of sorrow. Jacob's retrospect is over days 'few and evil.' There are days in which there is no pleasure. Along with the recognition of long life as a mark of divine favour, the apostle can say, 'To die is gain.' Lastly, when heart and flesh fail, the prayer is made to the Almighty, 'When I am old, forsake me not' (Ps 71¹⁸).

Along with this devotion to the old and reverence for the past, the Bible keeps a large space for the fact of reaction against routine, and the superseding of the provincial and preparatory. Elihu occupies it when he says with the intensity of epigram, 'There is a spirit in man, and the breath of the Almighty giveth them understanding. It is not the great that are wise, nor the aged that understand judgment' (Job 32⁷⁻⁹). Cf. 'A new commandment I give unto you' (Jn 13³⁴). The old existed for the young, not the young for the old. As the wisdom of the man of years grew into the teaching of the historical past, it was discovered that the new was really the old, and that the latest born might be the most mature. The very reverence for the wisdom of the past set the limitation to its authority. The well-worn garment had to be protected against the loud predominance of the new patch. The old bottles were once new. Hence along with the exhortation to seek the 'old paths' we have the announcement that 'old things are passed away.' Further, in the Via Dolorosa of the centuries along which the Word of God walked with the questionings and sorrows of men, as the light forced the darkness into self-consciousness, and the kingdom of God came nearer, it could not but happen that the august form would sometimes appear to block the way, and dispute the passage of the truth for which it existed. The appeal to the Burning Bush is always for some newer name than the God of the fathers. Hence in the course of revelation, as the purpose of divine grace grows luminous, the infinite spirit chafes against the limited form, and a distaste is provoked towards regimental wisdom and macadamized morality.

The refreshment of the brook makes men think of the fountainhead. Hence in Israel the akedia of Ecclesiastes on account of the omnipresent past; and in heathenism the inscription of religious despair, 'To the unknown god,' and the unrest that urged philosophy to 'some new thing' (Ac 17²¹).

The Bible witnesses throughout to this vital relationship between the new and the old; for its last scene is a repetition of the first—the new creature stepping into the new heavens and new earth, and in the eternal service behind the veil new notes are heard in the song of Moses and the Lamb. As long as the power of vision remains limited, it is essential to the sublime that something of blue haze and boundlessness should lie on the horizon both of life and landscape.

AGEE (אגעי).—The father of Shammah, one of 'the Three' (2 S 23¹¹). We should prob. read 'the Hararite' here in conformity with v.⁸³ and 1 Ch 11³⁴, the Jonathan of v.³³ (as emended) being the grandson of Agee. Wellhausen, however, prefers the reading 'Shage' (1 Ch 11³⁴) to 'Shammah' of 2 S 23³³, and would restore 'Shage' here for 'Agee'; on this view, Jonathan (v.³³) would be the brother of Shammah.

AGONE.—1 S 30¹³ 'Three days agone I fell sick.' This is the earlier form of the past part, of the verb agan or agon, 'to pass by,' or 'go on.' Only the part. is found after 1300, and after Caxton's day this longer form gradually gave place to ago. Chaucer (Troilus, ii. 410) says—

'Of this world the feyth is all agon.'

J. HASTINGS.

AGONY.—In the sense of great trouble or distress, agony is used in 2 Mac 3¹⁴ 'There was no small a. throughout the whole city' (cf. 3¹⁶, 2¹). In Canonical Scripture the word is found only in Lk 22⁴⁴ of our Lord's Agony in the Garden. And there it seems to have been introduced by Wyclif directly from the Vulg. agonia, just as the Lat. of the Vulg. was a transliteration of the Gr. ἀγωνία (on which see Field, Otium Norv. iii., ad loc.). Tindale (1534), Cranmer (1539), the Geneva (1557), the Rheims (1582), the AV (1611), and the RV (1881) all have 'an agony' here; Wyclif himself has simply 'agony.'

AGREE TO.—In the sense of 'assent to,' with a person as object, a. is found in Ac 5⁴⁰ 'To him they a.' ἐπέσθησαν αὐτῷ. In Mk 14⁷⁰ it is used in the obsolete sense of 'agree with' or 'correspond with,' 'Thou art a Galilean, and thy speech agreeth thereto' (ἀμολάσει, TR; RV following edd. omits the clause).

AGRICULTURE.—Agriculture, which in its wider sense embraces horticulture, forestry, and the pastoral industry, is here restricted to the art of arable farming—including not only ploughing, hoeing, etc., but reaping and threshing. As the savage phase has been followed by the pastoral, so the pastoral has been followed by the A¹, in the history of the progressive peoples. The first important advance upon the primitive stage took the form of the domestication of wild animals, and this, by bringing man into closer and more deliberate contact with the soil, contained the promise of further progress. The domestication of wild plants naturally succeeded, and the neolithic man is known, not only to have reared cattle, goats, and swine, but to have cultivated wheat, barley, and millet, which he ground with millstones and converted into bread or pap.

While the Aryans were still virtually in the pastoral stage, the A¹ art was being actively developed in Egypt and Assyria. In the Nile Valley nature bountifully paved the way. The inundations of the Nile create an admirable bed for the seed by reducing the irrigated soil to a 'smooth black paste,' and the monuments exhibit the people as improving from the earliest times their great natural advantages. The early traditions of the Hebrews, on the other hand, were essentially nomadic. The association of Cain with A. (Gn 4) implies a disparagement of the calling. Abraham is represented as a pure nomad. And although, as is indicated in the histories of Isaac (Gn 26¹²) and Jacob, the beginnings of A. would naturally have a place in the primitive period, it is only after the conquest of Can. that the Jews take rank as an A¹ people; and even then the tribes of the trans-Jordanic plateau, whose territory was unsuitable for tillage, continued to depend on cattle-rearing.

The agrarian legislation of the Pent. in reference to the settlement of Can. doubtless embodies some ancient laws and customs regulating the tenure of the soil, although other enactments must be regarded as of later origin, or even as the unfulfilled aspirations of the exilic age. To the last class probably belong the institution of the sabbatical year (Ex 23¹¹, Lv 25⁴), the produce of which, or its 'volunteer' crop, was reserved for the poor, the stranger, and cattle; and that of the year of jubilee (Lv 25³⁹), in which the dispossessed heir resumed possession of his ancestral acres. Among the enactments of a greater antiquity and validity may be mentioned the law against the removal of landmarks (Dt 19¹⁴), which was made urgent by the fact that the arable lands, unlike the vineyards, were not divided by hedges (Is 5⁵).

The climate of Pal., owing to the removal of forests, must now be much less humid than in early times. The summer is rainless and warm, the winter and early spring are rainy and colder. During the dry season the heat, esp. in the low country, is excessive, and rapidly burns up all minor vegetation; while any surface-water, as from springs, is evident in the spots of unwonted verdure which it induces on the parched landscape. In autumn the cisterns are nearly empty, and the ground has become very hard. The husbandman must consequently wait for the rains before he can start ploughing. The rainy season begins about the end of Oct., and is divided into three periods—early rains (הַיָּרֵד), which prepare the land for the reception of the seed, heavy winter rains (בְּרֵשֶׁת), saturating the ground and filling the cisterns, and late rains (אֶרְבֵּי), falling in spring and giving the crops the necessary moisture. Snow is often seen on the higher lands in winter, and hail is not infrequent. The coldest month is February, the warmest August.

The soil of Pal. varies widely in texture and appearance. In the higher regions it is formed mostly from cretaceous limestone or decomposing basalt rocks; in the maritime plain and the Jordan Valley there are more recent formations. Like the sedentary soils, where of sufficient depth, the alluvial deposits are naturally fertile; and under the intensive and careful cultivation of ancient times the fertility was proverbial (cf. Ex 3⁸⁻¹⁷, Jer 11⁶, Tacitus, Hist. lib. v. c. 6). The lessened productiveness of modern times is due in part to the diminished rainfall, but mainly to political and social changes. The high farming of antiquity took several forms. Low walls, built along hill-slopes to prevent 'soil-washing,' gave rise to flat terraces. Various methods of irrigation were practised (Gn 21⁰, Pr 21¹, Is 30²⁵ 32^{2, 20}). Canals conveyed the water from the natural sources to the fields, or water-wheels might be used.

Other A^{al} improvements were the removal of stones from the fields, and the utilisation of the ash residue of stubble and weeds. Ordinary dung, made in dunghills by treading in straw (Is 25¹⁰), was also in common use (2 K 9³⁷). A bare fallow would be occasionally allowed to raise the temporary fertility of the soil.

The number of Crops under cultivation was large. The most important was wheat (חֶמֶד). The supply exceeded the requirements of the country, and it was possible to export it in considerable quantities (Ezk 27¹⁷). Second in importance was barley (שֵׁבֶרֶת), which was extensively used as food (Ru 3¹⁵), esp. by the poorer classes. Spelt (שֵׁבֶרֶת) was frequently grown on the borders of fields. Millet (חֵיִל), beans (בִּיָּבֵן), and lentils (עֲרִשְׁתִּים) were cultivated and used as food (Ezk 4³, 2 S 17²⁸). Flax (שֵׁשֶׁת) was grown (Ex 9³¹), and probably also cotton (קִרְפָּס).

Among the statutory regulations relating to the crops, the most noteworthy are:—the prohibition against sowing a field with mixed seed (Lv 19¹⁹), a regulation implying considerable botanical knowledge; the provision for damages in case of pasturing a beast in a neighbour's field (Ex 22⁵); permission to the wayfarer to pluck from the standing corn enough to satisfy hunger (Dt 23²⁵); reservation for the stranger and the poor of the corners of the field (Lv 19⁹), and other provisions dictated by humanity (Dt 24¹⁹).

The A. of Pal. has not advanced or changed in any important particular since OT times. In consequence we can, apart from Biblical notices, largely reconstruct the A^{al} picture of the past from the Syrian conditions of to-day. An additional source of information has of recent years been opened up in the Egyp. hieroglyphics, and esp. in the representations of A^{al} operations found in the Egyp. tombs; and in order the better to bind together this material, we shall now follow the process of cultivation of one of the common cereal crops from seed-time to harvest, giving some account of the implements employed and of the dangers incident to the growing crops. The year of the agriculturist was well filled up—from the middle of Oct. to the middle of Apr. with ploughing, sowing, harrowing, weeding; from the middle of Apr. onward with reaping, carrying, threshing, and storing the grain. The interval between threshing and sowing was occupied with the vineyard produce. It appears that the seed was sometimes sown without any previous cultivation, and afterwards ploughed in or otherwise covered, while at other times the seed was scattered on ploughed land, and covered by a rude harrow or by cross-ploughing. The former method was common in Egypt, where the grain, deposited on moist ground, might be covered by dragging bushes over it, and afterwards trodden down by domestic animals (cf. Is 32²⁰). Where cultivation preceded sowing, various implements were used. From the Egyp. monuments it is possible to trace the evolution of the Plough—the starting-point being a forked branch used as a hoe, which was afterwards improved into a kind of mattock, and finally was enlarged and modified so as to be drawn by oxen. The plough was drawn by two oxen, and the draught was sometimes from the shoulders, sometimes from the forehead, or even from the horns. In some cases men with hoes may have pulverised the surface after the plough, as in Egypt. (See Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians, 2nd series, vol. i. woodcut 422.) The old Heb. plough was of very simple construction, consisting of a wooden ground-work (1 K 19²¹) with iron wearing parts (Is 2⁴, cf. 1 S 13²⁰). It had one stilt to guide it (Lk 9²²), leaving the other hand free to use the ox-goad (קֶרֶן).

OX-GOAD.

The plough was drawn by oxen, i.e. the ox-kind, for the Jews did not mutilate their animals (Am 6¹²), or by asses (Is 30²⁴), but not by an ox and ass together (Dt 22¹⁰). On thin soil a mattock was sometimes necessary (1 S 13²⁰). The unit of square measure was the area ploughed in a day by a yoke of oxen (עֲרֵב).

The season of Sowing was not one of joy (Ps 126⁶), owing to the uncertainty of the weather (Mic 6¹⁵, Pr 20⁴), and the toilsomeness of the work in a hard and rocky soil. A start was made with the pulse crops, barley followed a fortnight later, and wheat after another month. Usually the sower scattered the seed broadcast out of a basket, but by careful farmers the wheat was placed in the furrows in rows (Is 28²⁵). The summer or spring grain was sown between the end of Jan. and the end of Feb. In a season of excessive drought the late-sown seed rotted under the clods (Jl 1¹⁷); in a wet season the early-sown grain grew rank and lodged, and the husbandman was accordingly counselled to make sure of a crop by attending to both (Ec 11⁶).

Between sowing and reaping, the crops were exposed to several dangers. Of these the chief were the easterly winds prevalent in Mar. and Apr. (Gn 41⁶), hailstorms (Hag 2¹⁷), the irruption of weeds—esp. mustard, thistles, tares, and thorns (Jer 12¹³), the depredations of crows and sparrows (Mt 13⁴), of fungoid diseases, esp. mildew (Dt 28²²), and of injurious insects, esp. the palmer-worm, the canker-worm, the caterpillar, and the locust. These names do not, as has been suggested, refer to the different stages in the life history of the locust (Pachytylus migratorius), but the first three are probably specific names for groups of pests. The crops were also in danger from the inroads of cattle (Ex 22⁵), and as harvest approached, from fire (Jg 15⁴).

The commencement of Harvest naturally varied, not only with the season, but according to elevation, exposure, etc. On the average it began with barley (2 S 21⁹)—in the neighbourhood of Jericho about the middle of Apr., in the coast plains ten days later, and in the high-lying districts as much as a month later. Wheat was a fortnight later in ripening, and the barley and wheat harvest lasted about seven weeks (Dt 16⁹). The harvest was the occasion of festivities which in the later legislation were brought into close connexion with the religious history of the people. The crops were cut, as in Egypt, with the sickle. (See Wilkinson, op. cit. woodcuts 426 and 436.)

Little value was put upon the Straw, which was cut about a foot below the ears (Job 24²⁴). The reaper left the grain in handfuls behind him (Jer 9²²), and the binder tied it into sheaves (Gn 37⁷), which, however, were not set up as shocks. The Egyptians usually cut the straw quite close under the ears, while some crops, such as dhurah, were simply plucked up by the roots. The method of pulling the corn was probably also practised in Pal. when the crops were light (Is 17³). In OT there are apparently two kinds of Sickle referred to—קַיִל and קַיִל־עֵשׂ. The wooden sickle, toothed with floor, and, according to one system, cattle—four or five harnessed together—were driven round and round, until a more or less complete detachment of the grain was effected (Hos 10¹⁴). To facilitate the process, the straw was repeatedly turned over by a fork with two or more prongs. A well-known picture gives a representation of this system as anciently practised in Egypt, noteworthy being the fact that the oxen are unmuzzled (cf. Dt 25⁴).

The group further shows how the oxen were yoked together that they might walk round more regularly. (See Wilkinson, op. cit.) Of the threshing-machine two kinds were, and still are, employed in Palestine.

THRESHING-MACHINE.

One (קַיִל or קַיִל־עֵשׂ) consisted of an oblong board, whose under side was rough with notches, nails, and sharp stone chips, and which, being weighted down flints, supposed by Prof. Flinders Petrie to be an imitation of the jawbone of an ox, was used in Syria as well as in Egypt.

The reapers were the owners and their families, along with hired labourers (Mt 9³⁸), the latter of whom probably followed the harvest from the plains to the mountains. The workers quenched their thirst from vessels taken to the harvest-field (Ru 2⁹), and ate bread steeped in vinegar (2¹⁴), and parched corn (Lv 23¹⁴), the latter prepared by being roasted and then rubbed in the hand.

The Threshing usually took place in the fields, a custom made possible by the rainless weather of harvest. The Threshing-floor (קַיִל) consisted of a round open space, probably of a permanent character, and preferably on an eminence where it was exposed to the free sweep of air currents. For bringing in the sheaves, carts were employed in old times (Am 2¹³). Threshing was performed in various ways. Small quantities of produce, also pulse-crops and cummin, were beaten out with a stick (Ru 2¹⁷). In dealing with large quantities of grain, the sheaves were spread out over the by stones and by the driver, not only shelled out the corn, but lacerated the straw (Is 41¹⁵, Job 41³⁰).

THRESHING-WAGGON.

The other kind of machine was the threshing-wagon, קַיִל־עֵשׂ (Is 28^{27, 28}), now seldom seen in Pal., but still common in Egypt. It consisted of a low-built, four-cornered wagon frame, inside which were attached two or three parallel revolving cylinders or rollers. Each of the rollers was armed with three or four sharpened iron discs. There was a seat for the driver, and it was drawn by oxen yoked to a pole.

After the threshing came the work of Winnowing (Job 21¹⁸, Ps 35⁵). The mixture left by the previous operation, consisting of corn, chaff, and broken straw, was turned about and shaken with a wooden fork (Is 30²⁴), and advantage was taken of the winds to separate the grain from the lighter material. This often necessitated night work, as the winds usually blew from late in the afternoon till before sunrise.

FORK, FAN, AND YOKE.

At the later stage of the winnowing process the fork was less needed than the fan (מְנִיָּה), a kind of shovel; or the grain might be scooped up, as shown in some Egypt. representations, by two pieces of wood. The chaff, after being separated, was burned (Mt 3¹²), or left to be scattered by the winds (Ps 1⁴). From the heavier impurities the corn was cleansed by sieves (מְסִיבָה)—an operation specially necessary in view of the mode of threshing, after which it was collected into large heaps. To prevent thieving, the owner might sleep by the threshing-floor (Ru 3⁷) until the removal of the grain, on waggons or otherwise, to the barns or granaries (Lk 12¹⁸). It was often stored in pits (Jer 41⁹), the openings of which were carefully covered up to protect them from robbers and vermin. The straw remaining from the threshing was used for cattle fodder (Is 65²⁵).

AGUR (אגור; LXX paraphrases arbitrarily; Vulg. congregans).—Mentioned only in Pr 30¹. The name of an otherwise unknown Heb. sage, son of Jakeh. The word has been understood from very early times as a pseudonym, used symbolically. So Jerome, following the Rabbis of his time. In this case it might be interpreted as akin to the Syriac āqārō = 'hireling' (of wisdom), or derived from Heb. אגור, and understood as 'collector' (of proverbs). Cf. form אגור; in Ps 91³, Pr 6⁹. The description of Agur in Pr 30¹ is not easy to understand. With the Massoretic pointing, the verse may be literally rendered, 'The words of Agur, son of Jakeh, the prophecy; the oracle of the man to Ithiel, to Ithiel and Ucal.' This sounds impossible. The conjunction of the words massa (=prophecy) and ne'um (=oracle) is unprecedented; the use of the article with massa is inexplicable; and the words which follow have no prophetic character. Consequently Massa has been understood as the name of a country (so Del.; and see RVm Jakeh of Massa); cf. Gn 25¹⁴. Similarly, Lemuel would be understood to be king of Massa, Pr 31¹. Cheyne (Job and Solomon) and Strack (Kurzgef. Komm.) render massa as 'prophecy.' Both the country and the age of this unknown philosopher are purely conjectural. He may have been one of the 'men of Hezekiah,' Pr 25¹. His name is probably to be associated, as compiler rather than author, with the gnomic utterances in Pr 30²⁻³¹; 31¹⁰⁻³¹ forming a separate section. The chief monograph on the subject is Mühlau, De Prov. Aguri et Lem. origine (1869), and a full discussion of the subject is to be found in Delitzsch's Comm. in loco.

AH, AHA.—1. 'Ah' is used to express grief (esp. in face of coming doom), except in Ps 35²⁵ 'Ah (RV 'Aha'), so would we have it,' where it expresses the exultation of an enemy, and Mk 15²⁹ 'Ah (RV 'Ha!'), thou that destroyest the temple,' where it expresses mocking. The RV has introduced 'Ah!' into Lk 4³⁴ for 'Let us alone' of AV (Gr. 'Ea, which may be either the imperat. of the verb ēdō to let alone or an independent interjection, formed from the sound). Aha (a combination of a, the oldest form of 'ah,' and ha) expresses malicious satisfaction, except in Is 44¹⁶, where it denotes intense satisfaction, but without malice, 'Aha, I am warm; I feel the fire.'

J. HASTINGS.

AHAB (אחאב, 'Aḫadab, Assy. A-ha-ab-bu) signifies 'father's brother.' (Cf. analogous uses of the same element אב 'brother' in Syr. proper names.) The meaning of the compound is probably 'one who closely resembles his father.' The father in this case was Omri, the founder of the dynasty, and from him the son inherited the military traditions and prowess which characterised his reign. A. married Jezebel (יזבבל), daughter of Ethbaal, king of Tyre (the Ithobalos, priest of Astarte mentioned by Menander, quoted by Jos. c. Apion, i. 18). This was part of the policy of close alliance with Phœnicia, begun by Solomon, and cemented by Omri. This bond of union was designated by Amos (1⁹) a 'covenant of brethren.' It was undoubtedly founded on reciprocal commercial interest which subsisted for centuries, the corn, oil, and other agricultural products of Canaan being exchanged for other commercial products of the great mercantile ports of Phœnicia (cf. Ac 12²⁰).

Whatever commercial advantages might accrue, Israel's national religion was destined to suffer. A temple and altar to Baal were erected in Samaria as well as an Asherah-pole. To supersede Israel's national deity, J', by the Tyrian Baal, seemed an easy task. To a superficial observer the difference between the worship of Ephraim and that of Samaria might appear trifling. Both Baal and J' were worshipped with similar sacrificial accompaniments. Moreover, northern Israel had for centuries been exposed to all the influences which their more highly civilised Can. neighbours had introduced (Jg 2^{12, 13}), and even the very name Baal, 'Lord,' was current in their speech as an appellation of J'

(Hos 2^{16, 17} *). Yet there was one deep distinction which marked off the J" of Mosaism from the Baal of the Canaanites. The religion of Mosaism was pure of sensual taint. The conjunction of Asherah with J" in the days of Josiah (2 K 23⁷) was a corrupt practice due to foreign innovation. So also were the debasing accompaniments of worship referred to in Am 2⁷. And the licentious cult of Baal and Ashtoreth, established by the influence of A.'s Phoen. wife, would certainly have its temple attendants, probably Tyrian Kedeshim and Kedeshôth. These features of worship, however, had become perilously familiar to N. Israel, owing to their close contact with Can. neighbours. Accordingly, as we can readily infer from the language of Elijah in 1 K 19, national feeling was not deeply or permanently roused even by the influence of his stirring personality and by the occurrence of a prolonged drought of more than two years' duration (1 K 17¹ 18¹), which, according to Menander of Ephesus, extended to Phœnicia.† In all probability, the military despotism wielded by the house of Omri, in alliance with a powerful northern State, was able to subdue any smouldering embers of discontent. But an act of cruel injustice awakened the dormant spirit of the people. Like many Oriental monarchs, A. displayed a taste for architecture, which Tyrian influence stimulated and fostered. He built a palace for himself, adorned with woodwork (probably cedar) and inlaid ivory, in Jezreel (1 K 21¹ 22²⁹). To this he desired to attach a suitable domain, and for the purpose endeavoured to acquire, by purchase or exchange, the vineyard of one of the wealthier inhabitants, Naboth. But Naboth was unwilling to part with an ancestral inheritance. What A. could not accomplish by legal means, he was induced by the promptings of Jezebel to compass by fraud and judicial murder. This act aroused popular hatred, and the sense of outraged social order found expression in the denunciation of doom pronounced by Elijah (1 K 21¹²⁻²⁴) against the king and his unscrupulous queen (see NABOTH and ELIJAH). The incident is instructive to the student of Heb. religion, as it illustrates the contrast in the attitude of Phoen. as compared with Heb. religion towards social morality. In the words of W. R. Smith, 'the religion of J" put morality on a far sounder basis than any other religion did, because the righteousness of J" as a God who enforced the known laws of morality was conceived as absolute' (Prophets of Isr. 73).

It is more than doubtful whether A. really comprehended the religious issues. He regarded Elijah as a mischievous fanatic, 'a troubler of Israel' bent on wrecking the imperial schemes of aggrandisement based on alliance with Phœnicia at the expense of Syria. Elijah, like many another since his day, earned the title of unpatriotic, because he placed righteousness and religion before the exigencies of political statecraft.

The military career of A. exhibits him as a warrior of considerable prowess. Respecting his wars with Syria we have only the brief record in 1 K 20-22. In 1 K 20 we are plunged in medias res. Samaria has been for some time closely invested by the Syrian army under Benhadad, or more probably Hadadezer (Dadidri), if we follow the Assy. annals (Stade). Of the defeats sustained by Israel prior to this siege we have no information. Benhadad (Hadadezer) made an insolent demand of the Isr. king, in the desperate extremity of the latter, that Syrian envoys should search the royal palace and the houses of A.'s servants. This was refused by A. with the unanimous approval of his people and their elders. To the arrogant menace of the Syrian, the king of Isr. replied in the proverbial phrase, 'Let not him who girds on the armour boast as he who puts it off.' Benhadad at once ordered the engines of war (LXX 'lines of circumvallation') to be placed against the city. But beyond this he took no further precaution, and resigned himself with careless ease to voluptuous carousal with his nobility and feudatory kings. Meanwhile A. mustered his army of 7000 men, officered by 232 territorial commanders, and attacked the Syrians with crushing effect (1 K 20¹⁵⁻²¹), inflicting a total overthrow. In the following spring the Syrian monarch again took the field with a well-appointed army of overwhelming superiority. The Syrians attributed their previous defeat to the fact that the God of Isr. was a God of the hills (where cavalry and chariots could not so well operate *). If they could draw the forces of A. into the valley near Aphek, all would be well. But the battle that followed utterly falsified their expectations. The Syrians were put to utter rout, and saved themselves by precipitate flight to Aphek. Benhadad and his followers went as suppliants to A., who judged it politic to receive them with friendliness. A treaty was concluded, in which the Syrian king conceded to Isr. special quarters (streets) in Damascus,† a privilege which corresponded with a similar right which Omri was compelled to concede to Syria in his own capital, Samaria.

* Wellhausen's rejection of Hos 2¹⁶ (18 Heb.) is characteristic of his high a priori method.

† This took place during the reign of Ethbaal (Ithobaloe), and lasted, according to Menander, one year. Of Phœnicia this may have been true.

With the defective Biblical records before us, it is not easy to explain the complaisant attitude of A. in the hour of his victory. But the key to the solution of the mystery is given to us in the Assy. annals. From these we learn that about this time a new disturbing factor was beginning to appear in W. Asian politics. Ever since the time of Saul the arena of Pal. foreign politics had been circumscribed within the region of the Hittite, Syrian, and Can. borders, and the interference of Egypt had only been occasional. Since the days of Tiglath-pileser I. (c. B.C. 1100) the military power of Assyria had been dormant. But during the time of Omri there were vivid signs that Assyria was at length awakening from its century long slumber, under the energetic rule of Aššur-nazir-pal. During the reign of his successor Shalmaneser (Sulmānu-āšaridu) II., who reigned from 860-825, it began to press more heavily on the lands near the Mediter. border, and to extend its boundaries towards the Hittite States. About the year 857 the power of this monarch threatened seriously the Pal. region. The king of Syria would be among the first to feel apprehension. The immediate effect of Shalmaneser's advance was to put an end, at least for a time, to the wars between Syria and Ahab. And in the negotiations described in 1 K 20^{30, 32} it is pretty certain that the advance of the Assy. power from the N.E. formed a subject of conversation between the two kings, and that Benhadad was glad, even upon disadvantageous terms, to get rid of a burdensome and exhausting war, in order that all his forces might be reserved to confront the formidable Assy. foe. The attack was delivered in the year B.C. 854, when the battle of Karkar was fought. A considerable number of States, including Israel, but not including Judah, Edom, or Moab,‡ had united with Hadadezer

* We know that the Israelites also possessed chariots in considerable number, from the express statement of the monolith inscription of Shalmaneser II. lines 91, 92. Cf. 1 K 22.

† Ewald (Ges. d. V. Isr. iii. 488 n.) translates the Heb. by 'places of abode' (comparing the Arab. maḥattab), i.e. permanent ambassadorial residence. But this explanation is very far-fetched. LXX renders ἰσίδους, 'streets.' For other interpretations see Thienius, ad loc.

‡ In the case of Moab, the reason adduced by Prof. Sayce is probably the right one. Moab sent no contingent, because that State was then in revolt against Israel (HCM p. 393).

(=Dadidri=Benhadad) to resist the Assyrians. The account of the whole campaign may be read in the monolith inscription quoted in Schrader's *COT*² i. 183 ff. In lines 91, 92 we read that A., king of Israel, sent a contingent of 2000 chariots and 10,000 men. The total defeat of the allied kings, though probably obtained with heavy loss to the Assyrians, sufficed to break up the alliance. A. now followed the short-sighted policy of isolation in presence of the formidable Assyrian power—a policy which in the following century Ephraim and Judah in turn pursued with baleful results. The consequence was a renewal of the wars between Syria and Israel, which had been for some years suspended. We may infer from the scriptural account that A. took the initiative by endeavouring to recover Ramoth-gilead from Syria. Probably the allied kings of Isr. and Jud. endeavoured to profit by the weakness of Syria after the overwhelming defeat sustained by the latter in the battle of Karkar. In 1 K 22 we have a vivid portrayal of the dramatic scene between Micaiah, son of Imlah, and the prophets who prophesied in favour of immediate war with Syria (see MICAIAH). For Micaiah the result was imprisonment as the penalty for his outspoken deliverance of the divine message. Undeterred by the gravity of his prophecy, A. and Jehoshaphat went forth at the head of their respective forces to battle. But A. resolved to secure his person against the Syrian archers by appearing in his chariot divested of the ordinary insignia of royalty. This precaution, however, did not avail him against the chance arrow of a Bowman, which penetrated between the joints of his breastplate. The king of Isr. slowly bled to death, and died about sunset. His body was conveyed to Samaria, where he was buried.

In the foregoing account of the Syrian wars of A. we have adopted the sequence of events recommended by Schrader (*COT*² i. 189 ff., who gives the Assyrian text and tr.), Ed. Meyer (Gesch. des Alterthums, i. 393), and recently by Sayce (HCM 320, 392), which places the battle of Karkar near the close of A.'s life. On the other hand, Wellhausen (art. 'Israel' in Encycl. Brit.) places the battle of Karkar and the alliance with (or, as he deems it, vassalage*) to Syria in the times that precede the Syrian wars of A.'s reign. But this view imposes great difficulties on the chronology of the period. From the Assyrian Canon of Rulers, compiled with great care and precision, and also from the Assyrian Annals, we obtain the following fixed dates:

Tribute of Jehu, 'son of Omri' 842 "

Now, if we place the battle of Karkar before the Syrian wars of A.'s reign, his death cannot be placed earlier than B.C. 847. Accordingly, in place of the 14 years assigned by Scripture to the reigns of Ahaziah and Jehoram we can only allow a maximum of five years! On the other hand, by adopting the sequence which we have advocated, the difficulties are considerably reduced. A.'s death may then be placed in the year B.C. 853. Kamphausen, in his valuable treatise on the Chronology of the Heb. Kings (p. 80), suggests that A.'s name has been confused with that of his successor Jehoram in the Assyrian Annals; and Kittel, in his Hist. of the Hebrews (Germ. ed. ii. 233), seems disposed to accept this view. But against this proceeding we must emphatically protest. Biblical science will never make sure progress if we reject or modify archaeological evidence in the interests of a chronological theory. The theory must be conformed to the evidence, not vice versa. (On the subject of Heb. chronology see the writer's remarks in Schrader's *COT*² ii. 320-324, and also in C. H. H. Wright's Bible Readers' Manual.)

That A.'s rule was firm though despotic, and maintained the military traditions inaugurated by Omri, is indicated by the Moabite Stone, which informs us (lines 7, 8) that Omri and his son ruled over the land of Mehaba (conquered by the former) for 40 years. It was not till the concluding part of A.'s reign, when he was occupied with his Syrian wars, that Moab rose in insurrection. The historian must not fail to take due note of the

* The large contingent (2000 chariots and 10,000 men) furnished by A., according to the Assyrian records, renders the theory of 'vassalage' extremely improbable.

Judaic tendency of the narrative in 1 K 18-22, which paints the life of A. in sombre hues. When more than a century had passed after the destruction of his posterity, it is worthy of remark that the Ephraimite prophet Hosea (1⁴) expresses a strong condemnation of Jehu's deeds of blood. In Mic 6¹⁸, on the other hand, we see clearly reflected the Judaic estimate of Omri's dynasty, which dominates the account in 1 K 18-22.

AHAB (אָחָב, אָחָב).—Son of Kolaiah, a false prophet contemp. with Jer. He is said to have been 'roasted in the fire' by the king of Bab. (Jer 29^{21, 22}).

AHARAH (אָחָרָה).—A son of Benj. (1 Ch 8¹); perhaps a corruption of אָחָרָה (Nu 26³⁸). See AHIRAM.

AHARHEL (אָחָרְהֵל).—A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4⁸). LXX ἀδελφὸς Ρηχαδβ implies a reading אָחָרְהֵל = brother of Rechab.

AHASBAI (אָחָסְבַּי).—Father of Eliphelet (2 S 23³⁴), and a member of the family of Maacah, settled at Beth-Maacah (20¹⁴), or a native of the Syrian kingdom of Maacah (10^{6, 8}). In the parallel passage (1 Ch 11^{35, 36}) we find two names, אֲחִיזָכְרִי, Ur, Hopher; both passages probably represent corruptions of the real name.

AHASUERUS (אָחָשְׁוֵרֻשׁ).—A name which appears on Pers. inscriptions as Khsajársá, and in Aram. without a prosthetic, as אַחַשְׁוֵרֻשׁ (Schrader, *COT*² ii. 63). The monarch who bears this name in Ezr 4⁶ was formerly reckoned by Ewald and others to be the Cambyses of profane history who succeeded Cyrus. It is generally recognised, however, by modern critics that he must be identified with Xerxes (485-465), who is beyond all question the Ahasuerus of the Bk of Est. See XERXES. The A. of Dn 9¹, the father of Darius the Mede, is a personage whose identity is as difficult to establish as the existence of 'Darius the Mede' is problematical. (Cf. Driver LOT 515 n.; Sayce HCM 543.)

AHAVA (אָחָוָה).—The name of a town or district in Babylonia (Ezr 8¹⁵, cf. 31), and of a stream in the neighbourhood (v. 21, cf. 31). On the banks of this stream Ezra encamped for three days at the beginning of his journey to Jerusalem. He was thus able to review his large company, and to make good the absence of Levites by sending a deputation to the chief of the settlement at Casiphia. Before commencing the march, Ezra instituted a solemn fast, and then took measures for the safe custody of the treasures and rich gifts which were in his possession. Ewald conjectured that the river Ahava or Peleg-Ahava was the same as the Pallacopas, a stream to the S. of Babylon. Rawlinson identifies it with the Is (see Herod. i. 179), a river flowing by a town of the same name, now called Hit, which is about eight days' journey from Babylon. It seems, however, more prob. that Ezra made his rendezvous near to Babylon itself; in that case we may suppose that the Ahava was one of the numerous canals of the Euphrates in the neighbourhood of the city (cf. Ryle, and Berth.-Rys. ad loc.). In 1 Es 8^{41, 61} the river is called Theras (Θεράς).

AHAZ (אָחָז 'he hath grasped,' LXX Ἀχάζ, Jos. Ἀχάζης, NT Ἀχάζ [WH Ἀχάς]).—Son and successor of Jotham king of Judah. His name is probably an abbreviated form of Jeho-ahaz (יְהוֹאֲחָז), since it appears on the Assyrian inscriptions as Ia-u-ḫa-zi. The date of his accession has been fixed at 735 B.C. His age at this time is given as twenty (2 K 16²); but this is barely reconcilable with the other chronological data, which allow sixteen years to his reign, and state the age of his son Hezekiah at his accession as twenty-five, since it would make Ahaz a father at the age of eleven. The difficulty is increased if we suppose that the son passed through the fire by Ahaz was his firstborn; and if, with several authorities, we allow only eight years to his reign, it is quite insuperable. There can be little doubt that the figures need correction. For twenty there is a slightly supported various reading, twenty-five, and this may be right. It is possible that the age of Hezekiah should be reduced, since Ahaz seems from Is 3¹² to have been still youthful at the beginning of his reign. The date of his death is probably 715 B.C., though many place it 728-727 B.C. (see CHRONOLOGY OF OT).

Quite early in his reign, Rezin king of Syria, and Pekah king of Israel, formed a coalition with the object of forcing Judah into an alliance against Assyria. According to our oldest authorities they met with little success, though the Syrians wrested the port of Elath from Judah, and Isaiah bade the king have no fear of 'these two tails of smoking firebrands.' To confirm the wisdom of his counsel, he invited him to ask any sign from God. Ahaz was too panic-stricken to listen to cool reason, and, under the pretext that he would not tempt God, refused the proffered sign, whereupon the prophet gave him the sign of Immanuel. The king called in the aid of the king of Assyria, Tiglath-pileser, who gladly accepted such an opportunity, and relieved Ahaz of his foes. But the relief was purchased dearly. Judah could form no alliance with a great empire like Assyria; it could only become tributary to it, even if the tribute was disguised under the name of a present. And tribute meant oppression of the poorer classes, which was already one of the most glaring of Judah's sins. Further, it was of vital importance that the nation should keep free from entanglement in the politics of large empires, since otherwise it lost its independence, and made even internal reform—which was the most pressing necessity—more difficult. The policy of A. illustrates the besetting weakness of the politicians of Judah, and was shortsighted and disastrous. If Isaiah's advice had been followed, A. would have secured the same result without its disadvantages, since in her own interests Assyria would have been compelled to vanquish the coalition, while Judah would have retained her independence.

We next find A. at Damascus, where he rendered homage to Tiglath-pileser. While there he saw an altar which pleased him, and sent the pattern of it to the priest Urijah, with instructions to build one like it. On his return he offered on his new altar, and ordered it to be used for the sacrifices, while the old brazen altar was used for the king to 'inquire by.' W. R. Smith has carefully discussed this innovation, and reached the result that it 'lay in the erection of a permanent altar-hearth, and in the introduction of the rule that in ordinary cases this new altar should serve for the blood ritual as well as for the fire ritual' (*ES*² 485-9). The importance of this consists in the fact that the alteration seems to have been a permanent one. For the other changes introduced by A., see 2 K 16^{17, 18}.

In character A. was weak yet obstinate, frivolous and something of a dilettante, as we gather from his interest in his new altar, and from the association of his name with a dial or step-clock (see DIAL). He was also superstitious, and probably a polytheist. While no blame need attach—in the pre-Deuteronomic period—to his worship at numerous local sanctuaries, and while he was evidently a very zealous worshipper of J^h, yet the fact that he passed his son through the fire reveals the dark superstition to which he was a slave. And the terrible picture of the condition of Judah, painted in Is 2-5 and other prophecies of this time, is clear as to the idolatry, drunkenness, luxury, oppression, perversion of justice, grasping avarice, and shamelessness that poisoned the national life.

So far the account has been drawn entirely from 2 Kings and Isaiah, since they are our only trustworthy sources. In 2 Chron. the narrative has been thoroughly worked over. The history of the Syro-Ephraimitish invasion is told quite differently. There is indeed no hint of a coalition, the two armies act independently. The Syrians carry away a large number of captives, and Pekah slays 120,000 in one day and carries away 200,000 captives, who, however, are sent back at the advice of a prophet. The invasions have no political motive assigned, they are a punishment for the king's sin, while the figures are altogether incredible. Tiglath-pileser is called in, not to crush the coalition, but to help him against the Philistines and Edomites. He did not help him, however, but apparently came against him, and was bought off with tribute. The religious apostasy of A. comes out in much darker colours, and the account is really in conflict with the older. He burns his children, and not his son merely, in the fire; closes the temple and destroys its vessels, though we know that he took great interest in its services; and worships the gods of Damascus because of the success of the Syrians in war, though when A. visited Damascus their power had been utterly broken. Of all this the older history says nothing, and it is impossible to reconcile these later additions with the earlier narrative, and they are so characteristic of the chronicler's method of re-writing history, that any attempt to do so would be superfluous.

A. S. PEAKE.

AHAZIAH (אֲחַזְיָהוּ or אֲחַזְיָה 'J^h hath grasped').—1. King of Israel, son of Ahab. He is said to have reigned two years; but as he came to the throne in the 17th year of Jehoshaphat (1 K 22⁵¹), and his brother Jehoram succeeded him in Jehoshaphat's 18th year (2 K 3¹), the duration of his reign would not much exceed a year. The chronological statement in 2 K 1¹⁷, which would imply a reign of nearly ten years, is probably an interpolation (Grätz, etc.); it is not found in B, and is misplaced in A. The Moabite Stone dates the revolt of Mesha as taking place after 'half the days of Omri's son'; but the Bible account (2 K 1^{1 3⁶}) is more probable, which makes it a consequence of the death of Ahab, who was a comparatively powerful monarch. In any case we do not read of any effort to suppress this rising until the reign of Jehoram. It is possible that Ahaziah was engaged in preparations for war when the accident occurred which resulted in his death. He seems to have inherited from his mother her devotion to Baal, for in his extremity he sent to inquire at the oracle of Baalzebub, the special Baal worshipped at Ekron. The story of his fatal mission belongs rather to the history of Elijah. It is sufficient here to note that his thrice repeated summons of the prophet is characteristic of the son of Ahab and Jezebel; suggestive as it is of the callousness of his father, and the obstinacy of his mother. See JEHOSEPHAT for the maritime alliance between Ahaziah and that monarch.

2. Ahaziah, king of Judah, youngest son of Jehoram. He was made king by 'the inhabitants of Jerusalem' (cf. 2 K 23³⁰), because all his elder brothers had been carried off in an incursion of Philistines and Arabians (2 Ch 21^{17 22¹}). His name is variously given as Jehoahaz (2 Ch 21^{17 25²³}) and Azariah (22²⁶). The latter is probably a blunder, Ahaziah being read by some Heb. MSS, LXX, Pesh., Vulg.; and Jehoahaz is merely a transposition of Ahaziah (cf. Jehoniah=Jehoiachin). LXX has Ahaziah in 21¹⁷, and omits the name in 25²³. The other versions, except Vulg., also ignore the change. He began to reign in the 11th (2 K 9²⁹) or 12th (2 K 8²⁵) year of Joram of Israel, being then 22 years old, and reigned one year (2 K 8²⁶). The reading 'forty and two' in 2 Ch 22² is absurd, since his father was 40 years old at his death. Pesh. here has '22' and LXX '20.' The evil influence which Athaliah, the queen mother, had exercised over her husband continued unchecked in the reign of her son (2 K 8²⁷, 2 Ch 22^{3, 4}); yet in 2 K 12¹⁸ we read of 'hallowed things' which he had dedicated apparently to Jⁿ.

There is an irreconcilable discrepancy between Kings and Chron. as to the death of A. Joram of Israel having renewed the attack on Ramoth-gilead in which Ahab had failed, was joined by his nephew A. The town was captured (2 K 9¹⁴), but Joram received wounds which compelled him to return to Jezreel. It is implied that A. also returned to Jerusalem, for he 'went down' to see Joram at Jezreel (cf. 1 K 22²) (Ewald evades the difficulty by reading in 2 K 8²⁸ 'now Joram went,' etc., omitting 'with,' which is adopted in 2 Ch 22⁶). According to Kings, on seeing Joram's fate, A., pursued by Jehu, fled by the way of the garden house' (or 'Beth-haggan,' Stade, etc.), was mortally wounded 'at the ascent of Gur,' and died on reaching Megiddo. His body was carried to Jerusalem, and 'buried with his fathers in the city of David.' Meanwhile the 'brethren of Ahaziah,' ignorant of the revolution in Jezreel, had followed him from Jerusalem to visit Joram's children; they were met by Jehu on the road between Jezreel and Samaria, and were slain. This seems a consistent story; but when the Chronicler came to deal with it he found two stumbling-blocks. First, he has previously informed us that A. had no brethren living; therefore 'the brethren of Ahaziah' become in his record 'the princes of Judah, and the sons of the brethren of Ahaziah' attending their master in Samaria or Jezreel; secondly, Kings implies that A., an idolater, was buried in the royal sepulchres. Now the Chronicler always carefully excludes idolaters (e.g. Jehoram, Joash, Amaziah, Ahaz) from 'the sepulchres of the kings,' and therefore he makes A., who was hiding in Samaria, be killed and buried there; that he is buried at all being for the sake of his good father Jehoshaphat. Enough has been said to show that here, as elsewhere, the Chronicler, if more edifying, is not so reliable as the earlier writer.

AHBAN (אֲחָבָן 'brother of an intelligent one').—A Judahite, son of Abishur (1 Ch 2²⁰).

AHER (אֲהֵר 'another').—A Benjamite (1 Ch 7¹²), perhaps identical with Ahiram of Nu 26³⁸.

AHI (אֲחִי 'brother'; * by many considered to have the same meaning as AHIJAH, wh. see) occurs in MT, and consequently in AV and RV, twice: (1) a Gadite (1 Ch 5¹²); (2) an Asherite (1 Ch 7³⁴). But the reading is in neither case free from doubt; in 1 Ch 5¹² the Syr. omits the name, thus making vv. 14, 15 an uninterrupted genealogy of Abihail; but the LXX, which gives Ζαβουχάμ ('Αχιβούζ, A) υἱοῦ Ἀβδὲλ for אֲחִי בֶן אֲבִיחַי, must have had something very like אֲחִי before them. The other VSS treat אֲחִי as an appellative. In 1 Ch 7³⁴ for אֲחִי הַגָּדִי, LXX, B has Ἀχιουα, A Ἀχιουα Ὀργα. Probably in the original continuous Heb. text some compound name in אֲחִי was read (? אֲחִי),

G. B. GRAY.

AHIAH.—See AHIJAH.

AHIAM (אֲחִיָּאָם, meaning doubtful, according to some, 'mother's brother').—One of David's heroes. He was son of Sharar (2 S 23³³), or Sacar (1 Ch 11³⁵), the Hararite.

G. B. GRAY.

AHIAN (אֲחִיָּאָן 'fraternal,' B Ἰααίμ, A Ἀελύ; these forms, together with the divergent text of the Syr., render the exact form of the original name uncertain).—Ahian was a Manassite, and is described as 'son of Shemida' (1 Ch 7¹⁹); but the name is scarcely that of an individual; note in the context Abiezer and Shechem, and cf. Nu 26^{31f}.

G. B. GRAY.

AHIEZER (אֲחִיעֶזֶר, 'brother is help').—1. Son of Ammishaddai, one of the tribal princes who represented Dan at the census and on certain other occasions (Nu 1¹² 2²⁵ 7^{66, 71} 10²⁵ (P)). 2. The chief of the Benjamite archers who joined David while he was in hiding at Ziklag (1 Ch 12¹⁻³).

G. B. GRAY.

AHIHUD (אֲחִיהוּד 'brother is majesty.' In the form אֲחִיהוּד (1 Ch 8⁹) the second ה is probably an error for ה).—1. Acc. to P, Ahihud the son of Shelomi was the prince (אֲשָׁר) of the tribe of Asher, who, with similar representatives of the other tribes (on W. of Jordan), was appointed by Moses, at the divine command, to divide Canaan into hereditary portions (Nu 34²⁷ (P)). 2. A Benjamite. Probably the passage 1 Ch 8^{9, 7}, the text of which is somewhat corrupt, means that Ehud begat Ahihud, and that Ahihud and his 'brother' Uzza were ancestors of the inhabitants of Geba.

G. B. GRAY.

AHIJAH (אֲחִיהָא or אֲחִיהָי 'brother of Jⁿ').—1. High priest in the reign of Saul, and usually identified with Ahimelech (Josephus 'Abimelech') of 1 S 21. 22 (so Ewald Hist. of Isr. ii. p. 415, n. 3, 'since Melech, King, may be applied also to God'). He accompanied Saul's army as possessor of the ephod oracle (1 S 14³); but when an occasion arose for its use, Saul, with his usual precipitate self-reliance, interrupted the priest while in the very act of consultation (vv. 18, 19). This temerity seems to be afterwards tacitly reproved by Ahijah (v. 36): 'Let us draw near hither unto God.' The LXX reading in v. 18 'Bring hither the ephod,' etc., is followed by Jos. (Ant. vi. vi. 3: 'He bade the high priest λαβόντα τὴν ἀρχιερατικὴν στολήν προφητεύειν'), and accepted by most moderns. The phrase, 'bring hither,' seems appropriated to the ephod (1 S 23⁹ 30⁷); and when the oracle is again consulted (14⁴¹), the LXX δὸς δῆλους . . . δὸς οὐβήρησ, Vulg. 'da ostensionem . . . da sanctitatem,' appears to point to the Urim and Thummim which were attached to the ephod. On the other hand, the ark seems to be used as an oracle in Jg 20²⁷, 1 Ch 13³, and it often accompanied the host to battle. Aq., Sym., and Vulg. follow the Received text.

We next read of this high priest, when David, fleeing from Saul, comes to inquire of the Lord by his means (1 S 22¹⁰), as he had often done before (22¹⁵). The tabernacle appears to have been transferred to Nob from Shiloh when the latter was desolated (Ps 78⁶⁰, Jer 7^{12, 14} 26^{6, 9}), probably just after the death of Eli (to whom 'the priest—Shiloh,' 1 S 14³, refers). Ahimelech's alarm at the appearance of so great a man (22¹⁴) unattended, was allayed by David's plausible explanation; and he actually gave the fugitive the shewbread of the priests, and the sword of Goliath, which had been suspended as a votive offering. Unfortunately there was a witness of the priest's well-meant zeal, Doeg the Edomite, who was performing some vow. Not long after, David's worst anticipations (22²²) were realised. Ahimelech, with the eighty-five (LXX, 305; Josephus, 385) priests of 'his father's house,' was charged with conspiracy by Saul, and, notwithstanding his amazed protestations of innocence, condemned to instant death. Doeg, who did not share the traditional reverence felt by the king's guard for the priests of J¹, carried out the bloody order with the unnatural cruelty of his race. Abiathar alone escaped. The judgment on Eli's house was being consummated.

2. The Shilonite, of Shiloh (1 K 14²), is the prophet of the rise and fall of Jeroboam I. In 1 K 11²⁹ we find the young ruler thinking out his plans of rebellion in a lonely walk, when he is met by Ahijah, who comes to consecrate and control his ambitious designs. The prophet (LXX, RV) had, doubtless by divine command (cf. Is 20³, Jer 13¹), clad himself with a new garment. This he rends in twelve pieces, and giving ten of them to Jeroboam promises him the reversion, on Solomon's death, of the kingdom over ten tribes, and, conditionally, 'a sure house' like that of David, repeating at the same time the divine judgment which had been already (vv. 9-13 D²) revealed to Solomon, probably through Ahijah himself. Years pass by; Jeroboam has realised his ambition, but not the ideal set before him by the prophet. His eldest son falls sick. The king bethinks him of the true seer now [60 years] old and blind; but, fearing lest his defection might elicit an adverse answer, he sends his wife [Ano] disguised as a poor woman, with a poor woman's offering ['loaves, two cakes for his children, grapes, and a jar of honey']. A divine revelation, however, has already unmasked the deception. Ahijah [sends his lad to meet her and bring her in, treats her gifts with scorn] anticipates her with the 'heavy tidings' of the extirpation of Jeroboam's house, the dispersion of Israel, and, bitterest of all, the death of her child ['Thy maidens will come forth to meet thee, and will say to thee, The child is dead . . . and they will lament for the child, saying, "Ah Lord!" . . . and the wailing came to meet her']. The second Greek account, from which the details in brackets are derived, is found in B after 12²⁴, and places this event before Jeroboam's accession—an impossible place,—introduces Ahijah as a new character (2 K 14²), and also ascribes to Shemaiah a symbolical prophecy similar to that of Ahijah, but spoken at Shechem before the rejection of Rehoboam. 14¹⁻²⁰ is omitted in B, but found in A, etc., supplied, according to Field, from Aquila. These facts and the want of connexion in 11²⁶⁻⁴⁰ lead W. R. Smith to conclude that 'both parts of the story of Ahijah are a fluctuating uncertain element in the text' (OTJC² 119). Ewald also says that 14^{9, 15, 16} are later additions (Hist. of Isr. iv. p. 29, n 3). Jos. (Ant. VIII. xi. 1) gives the verses in a different order.

Ahijah was one of the historians of Solomon's reign according to 2 Ch 9²⁹.

3. 1 K 4³, one of two brothers, Solomon's scribes or secretaries. Their father Shisha (Seraiah, 2 S 8¹⁷; Sheva, 2 S 20²⁵; Shavsha, 1 Ch 18¹⁶) held the same post under David. 4. Father of king Baasha, 1 K 15^{27, 28, 29, 30}, 2 K 9⁹. 5. 1 Ch 2²⁵ (LXX ἀδελφὸς αὐτοῦ), youngest son of Jerahmeel, or his first wife, if we read with Bertheau, 'of or from Ahijah,' ρ having dropped out. See next verse. 6. 1 Ch 8⁷, one of the 'heads of fathers' houses' of Geba, a son of Ehud, for which read 'Abihud,' v. 3 (Pesh., Grätz), or 'Ahoah' (v. 4). In the beginning of the verse read 'namely' for 'and.' The text is very obscure. See Q.P.B. 7. 1 Ch 11³⁶, the Pelonite, one of David's mighty men; but Kennicott, etc., read instead 'Eliam—Gilonite,' from 2 S 23²⁴. 8. 1 Ch 26²⁰. (In David's time) 'of the Levites, Ahijah was over the treasuries.' LXX, followed by Bertheau, etc., reads, 'the Levites, their brethren (i.e. the sons of Ladan, v. 21), were over,' etc. 9. Neh 10²⁶ (RV Ahiah), one of 'the chiefs of the people' who sealed to the covenant under Nehemiah.

N. J. D. WHITE.

AHIKAM (אֲחִיקָם 'my brother has arisen').—Son of Shaphan, a courtier under Josiah, mentioned as one of the deputation sent by the king to Huldah the prophetess (2 K 22^{12, 14}, 2 Ch 34²⁰), and later as using his influence to protect Jeremiah from the violence of the populace during the reign of Jehoiakim (Jer 26²⁴). He was father of Gedaliah, the governor of the land of Judah appointed by Nebuchadnezzar (2 K 25²² al.).

C. F. BURNEY.

AHILUD (אֲחִילֻד, perhaps a contraction of אֲחִילֻד 'child's brother').—1. (2 S 8¹⁶ 20²⁴, 1 K 4³, 1 Ch 18¹⁵).—Father of Jehoshaphat, the chronicler under David and Solomon. 2. (1 K 4¹²) Father of Baana, one of Solomon's twelve commissariat officers.

C. F. BURNEY.

AHIMAAZ (אֲחִימָאז 'my brother is wrath').—1. Son of Zadok. He was a remarkably swift runner, whose style was well known (2 S 18²⁷), and as such he played an important part on the occasion of Absalom's rebellion. As had been arranged by David (2 S 15^{27, 28, 35, 36}), he and Jonathan, son of Abiathar, 'stayed by En-rogel, and a maidservant used to go and tell them,' from the priests, the plans of Absalom which had been divulged by Hushai, 'and they went and told King David.' This must have occurred more than once (2 S 17¹⁷). Details of their last and most critical adventure are given (17¹⁸⁻²¹), when, aided by a woman's craft, they succeeded in conveying the news that saved David's life. After the battle, Ahimaaaz offered his services as messenger of victory; but Joab, fearing that the odium of being the first to tell of Absalom's death might injure the young man's prospects, refused, out of kindness, to allow him to run, and entrusted the duty to the Cushite courier. Ahimaaaz, however, saw a way out of the difficulty; Joab yielded reluctantly to his importunity, and Ahimaaaz 'ran by the way of the Plain' (the floor of the Jordan valley, Gn 13¹⁰ etc.); and by superior swiftness, and also, as is implied, by taking an easier route, 'overran the Cushite.' He did not belie David's description: 'He is a good man, and cometh with good tidings,' for by an adroit suppressio veri he achieved his purpose, and left to the Cushite the ungrateful office of breaking the king's heart. We read nothing more of Ahimaaaz after this. It does not appear that he was ever high priest, since Azariah his son (1 Ch 6^{8, 9}) seems to have succeeded Zadok (1 K 4³). 2. (1 S 14⁵⁰) Father of Ahinoam, Saul's wife. 3. (1 K 4¹⁵) One of Solomon's twelve commissariat officers. He had the district of Naphtali as the field of his operations. Since he alone of the twelve has no father mentioned, it has been conjectured that he may possibly be the son of Zadok; but he surely would have succeeded his father in the high priesthood. Ahimaaaz married Basemath, one of Solomon's daughters. Another of these officers made a similar alliance, which indicates that they held a high rank.

AHIMAN (אֲחִימָן; on the form, see Moore as cited below).—1. The sons of Anak or Anakites (see ANAK) are frequently mentioned, chiefly in D; but the special names Ahiman, Sheshai, and Talmai occur only in JE (Nu 13²², Jos 15¹⁴) and Jg 1¹⁰, cf. v. 20. According to these passages, Ahiman, Sheshai, and Talmai were 'sons' or 'children of Anak' (עַנָּקִים בְּנֵי הָעַרְיָה: for the latter, cf. עַרְיָה הָרִבִּי 2 S 21^{16, 18}), whose father was Arba (Jos 15¹³, perhaps P). But, as a matter of fact, neither Anak (=long-necked) nor Arba (=four: with Kiriath-arba cf. Beer-sheba) are personal names (see Moore, Judges 1²⁰). There is therefore no reason to doubt what the context of the above-cited passages suggests, viz. that Ahiman, Sheshai, and Talmai are the names, not of individuals, but of clans.

A., then, was a clan resident in Hebron (the more familiar name of Kiriath-arba) at the time of the Heb. conquest, and driven thence by Caleb. The clan may have been of Aramaic origin, since the names of Sheshai and Talmai are of an Aram. type, and the name Ahiman has analogy in Aram. as well as Heb. See further, Driver, Deut. p. 23 f.; Moore, Judges, p. 24 f.

2. The name of a family or division of door-keepers, 1 Ch 9¹⁷. This name is absent, not only from the briefer list in Neh 11¹⁹, but also from the longer list in Ezr 10²⁴ (=1 Es 5²⁸). It is possible, therefore, that the name (אֲחִימֵלֵךְ) in Chron. is simply due to dittography from the following word אֲחִימֵן (=their brethren); if this be so, it may have been facilitated by association with the Anakites (see No. 1), the preceding name in Chron.—Talmon—closely resembling in sound the Anakite Talmai. But the genuineness of the name is defended by Bertheau; cf. the four names in v. 17 and the four divisions suggested by vv. 24-26. G. B. GRAY.

AHIMELECH (אֲחִימֵלֵךְ 'brother of Melek (Molech)').—1. The son of Ahitub, and grandson of Phinehas. He either succeeded his brother Ahijah in the priesthood, or was the same person under another name (1 S 14^{3, 18}). On the supposition that they are identical, the main facts regarding him (1 S 21¹⁻⁹ 22⁹⁻¹⁰) are given under AHIJAH; see also DOEG. In 2 S 8¹⁷ and 1 Ch 24⁶ it is generally supposed that the names of Abiathar and Ahimelech have been transposed by a copyist, so that we need not reckon another Ahimelech, grandson of the first. 2. A Hittite, who joined David when a fugitive, and became one of his captains (1 S 26⁹).

R. M. BOYD.

AHIMOTH (אֲחִימוֹת, apparently 'brother is death').—Mentioned only in the genealogy of 1 Ch 6²⁵ (Heb. v¹⁰), where he appears as son of Elkanah and brother of Amasai. For a discussion of the text and purpose of the genealogy, see Bertheau; cf. also MAHATH (v. 26). G. B. GRAY.

AHINADAB (אֲחִינָדָב 'brother is generous').—Son of Iddo, one of the 12 officers appointed by Solomon for the victualling of the royal household. He was stationed at Mahanaim (1 K 4¹⁴).

G. B. GRAY.

AHINOAM (אֲחִינוֹאֵם 'brother is pleasantness').—1. Daughter of Ahimaaz and the wife of Saul (1 S 14⁵⁰). 2. Ahinoam the Jezreelitess was one of the two women—Abigail being the other—whom David married after Michal had been taken from him. A. and Abigail were both with David while he sojourned with Achish at Gath, and were subsequently at Ziklag; from the latter city they were carried off by the Amalekites, but rescued by David and his men (1 S 30¹⁸). After Saul's death A. and Abigail went up to Hebron with David, and there A. gave birth to David's firstborn, Amnon (1 S 25⁴³ 27³ 30⁵, 2 S 2² 3², 1 Ch 3¹). G. B. GRAY.

AHIO (אֲחִיו)—1. Appears to be the name of a son of Abinadab (No. 1), and brother of Uzzah who drove the cart on which the ark was placed when removed from Abinadab's house (2 S 6⁸, 4, 1 Ch 13⁷). In all three cases the LXX renders the word of ἀδελφοὶ αὐτοῦ, which merely involves a different pronunciation of the same consonants—אֲחִי; this may be right, but on the whole a proper name seems more probable in the context. 2. (LXX ἀδελφός (A ἀδελφοὶ) αὐτοῦ, 1 Ch 8³¹; ἀδελφός (A ἀδελφοί, 1 Ch 9²⁷)) A son of Jeiel, and brother of Kish, the father of Saul. 3. Another Ahio is mentioned in the genealogy of Benjamin (1 Ch 8¹⁴). Here also the LXX has ἀδελφός (A ἀδελφοὶ) αὐτοῦ, and in this case is probably right. Cf. Bertheau, in loco.

G. B. GRAY.

AHIRA (אֲחִירָא).—Son of Enan, one of the 12 tribal princes who represented Naphtali at the census and on certain other occasions (Nu 1⁵ 2²⁹ 7⁷³. 33 10²⁷ (P)).

AHIRAM, AHIRAMITES (אֲחִירָאם 'brother is exalted').—The eponym of a Benj. family—the Ahiramites, Nu 26³⁵ (P). The name A. occurs in the corrupt forms אֲחִירָא (see EHI) in Gn 46²¹ (P), and אֲחִירָאם (see AHARAH) in 1 Ch 8¹; in defence of the originality of the form Ahiram, see Gray, Stud. in Heb. Proper Names, p. 35. G. B. GRAY.

AHISAMACH (אֲחִישַׁמַּח 'brother has supported').—A Danite, father of Oholiab (AV Aholiab), Ex 31⁶ 35³⁴ 38²³ (P).

AHISHAHAR (אֲחִישָׁהָר (pausal form) 'brother is dawn') is described in the Benjamite genealogies as one of the 'sons of Bilhan,' 1 Ch 7¹⁰. See under BILHAN.

AHISHAR (אֲחִישָׁר 'my brother has sung').—Superintendent of Solomon's household (1 K 4⁹).

AHITHOPHEL (אֲחִיתוֹפֵל 'my brother is folly'—Oxf. Heb. Lex.), was a native of Giloh, a town in the south-western part of the highlands of Judæa, identified uncertainly with a village three miles north-west of Halhul. He was a very influential counsellor of David, his reputation for political sagacity being unrivalled; but he was destitute of principle, a man of craft rather than of character (2 S 15¹²⁻¹⁷, 1 Ch 27³³). He joined the rebellion of Absalom, possibly through ambition, possibly out of sympathy with the resentment of his tribe of Judah at the decline of its tribal pre-eminence. It is supposed by some that he was also the grandfather of Bathsheba (cf. 2 S 23³⁴ with 11³); but the identification of her father with the son of A. is open to question, though certainly possible. The policy he advised was that Absalom should take possession of his father's harem, thus showing that no pardon could be expected from David, and that he should proceed at once in pursuit of his father. When Hushai's counsel of delay prevailed, A. recognised the necessary failure of the enterprise, withdrew to Giloh, and hanged himself (2 S 17²³). There is no other case of deliberate suicide, except in war, mentioned in the OT, and the parallel in the NT is the case of Judas. Allusions to A. have been found in Ps 41⁹ 55¹²⁻¹⁴ 59¹¹ and elsewhere; but these must not be treated as designed, and no inference can be drawn from them as to the authorship of the psalms. The Talmud and Midrashim occasionally refer to him. In the latter he is classed with Balaam as an instance of the ruin which overtakes wisdom that is not the gift of Heaven; and in the former (Baba bathra 1. 7) the great lesson of his life is said to be, 'Be not in strife with the house of David, and break off from none of its rule.' R. W. MOSS.

AHITOB (B Ἀχιτωβ, A Ἀχιτ-, AV Achitob), 1 Es 8².—An ancestor of Ezra, son of Amarias and father of Sadduk [Ahitub].

H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

AHITUB (אִיתוּב 'brother is goodness').—1. Son of Phinehas and grandson of Eli, the father of Ahimelech or Ahijah the priest who was put to death by Saul (1 S 14³ 22⁹ 20). 2. Acc. to 2 S 8¹⁷ (= 1 Ch 18¹⁶) the father, acc. to 1 Ch 9¹¹ Neh 11¹¹ the grandfather, of Zadok the priest who was contemporary with David and Solomon. It is very doubtful, however, whether this A. does not owe his existence to a copyist's error. The text of 2 S 8¹⁷ should probably run בְּיָמָיו בְּיָמָיו בְּיָמָיו בְּיָמָיו: 'And Zadok and Abiathar the son of Ahimelech, the son of Ahitub' (so Wellhausen, Budde, Kittel, Driver). 3. Still more exposed to suspicion is the existence of another A., father of another Zadok (1 Ch 6¹¹ 12, 1 Es 8², 2 Es 1¹). 4. An ancestor of Judith, Jth 8¹, AV Acitho.

J. A. SELBIE.

AHLAB (אִלְחָב), Jg 1³¹.—A city of Asher. The site is supposed to be that of the later Gush Halab or Gischala (Jos. Life, 10; Wars, XI. xxi. 1), now El-Tish in Upper Galilee; but this is, of course, uncertain. See Neubauer, Géog. Tal. s.v. Gushhalab; and Reland, Pal. Illustr. p. 817.

C. R. CONDER.

AHLAI (אִלַּי 'O that!') cf. Ps 119⁷.—1. The daughter (?) of Sheshan (1 Ch 2³¹, cf. v. 34). 2. The father of Zabab, one of David's mighty men (1 Ch 11⁴¹).

AHOAH (אִהוּא).—Son of Bela, a Benjamite (1 Ch 8⁴ = 7⁷). See AHIJAH (6). The patronymic Ahohite occurs in 2 S 23⁹.

AHUMAI (אִחְמַי).—A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4²).

AHUZZAM (אִחְזָם 'possessor,' AV Ahuzam).—A man of Judah (1 Ch 4⁹).

AHUZZATH (אִחְזָת 'possession').—'The friend' of Abimelech, the Philistine of Gerar, mentioned on the occasion when the latter made a league with Isaac at Beersheba (Gn 26²⁶). The position of 'king's friend' may possibly have been an official one, and the title a technical one (cf. 1 K 4⁹, 1 Ch 27³⁸). The rendering of the LXX gives a different conception, that of 'pronubus' or friend of the bridegroom (ὄρχος δὲ νυμφαγωγὸς αὐτοῦ). For the fem. termination -ath, cf. the Phil. name 'Goliath' (see Driver's note on 1 S 17⁴) and the Arabian name 'Genubath' (1 K 11²⁰).

AHZAI (אִחְזַי 'J' hath grasped,' AV Ahasal).—A priest, Neh 11¹³ = Jahzerah, 1 Ch 9¹².

AI (אֵי), Jos 7²⁻³ 8¹⁻²⁹ 10¹⁻² 12⁹, Ezr 2²⁸, Neh 7³² (Jer 49³, a clerical error for AR), called Hai in Gn 12⁹ 13³ AV; and Aija (אֵיָא 'Ayyā) in Neh 11³¹. In Is (10²⁸) Aiath (אֵיָת).—The name means 'heap,' and it is not enumerated as an inhabited place after the conquest until about B.C. 700, but seems to have been inhabited after the Captivity. The situation is defined as east of Bethel, beside Beth Aven, with valleys to the north and west (Jos 8¹¹ 12). The site which agrees with these conditions is found at Haiyān, immediately south of a conspicuous stone mound called Et-Tell, 'the mound.' There is a deep ravine to the north, an open valley to the west, and a flat plain to S. and E. This site is 2½ miles S.E. of Bethel, and on the road thence to the Jordan Valley. It is evidently the site of an ancient town, with rock-cut tombs. See SWP vol. ii. sh. xiv. Some MSS read Aija for Gaza (i.e. אֵיָא 'Ayyā) in 1 Ch 7²⁸, which appears to be the correct rendering.

C. R. CONDER.

AIAH (אֵיָא).—1. Son of Zibeon (Gn 36²⁴ (AV Ajah), 1 Ch 1⁴⁰). 2. Father of Rizpah, Saul's concubine (2 S 3⁷ 21⁸ 10, 11).

AIATH, Is 10²⁸; AIJA, Neh 11³¹.—See AI.

AIJALON (אֵיָלון), AV Ajalon, Jos 10¹³ 19¹², 2 Ch 28¹⁸; Aijalon, Jos 21²⁴, Jg 1³⁵ 12¹², 1 S 14³¹, 1 Ch 6⁶⁹ 8¹³, 2 Ch 11¹⁰ (in Jg 12¹³ a place of the name is noticed in Zebulun, otherwise unknown).—This town in Dan was in the Shephelah, beneath the ascent of Bethhoron. It is the modern village of Yalo. The name appears to mean 'place of the deer.' The town is clearly noticed in a letter from the king of Jerusalem, in the Tel el-Amarna correspondence, as Aialuna. It was known to the Jews in the 4th cent. A.D. (Onomasticon, s.v. Aialon) as less than 2 Roman miles from Emmaus-Nicopolis, on the road to Jerusalem. This agrees with the situation of Yalo and 'Amwās. See SWP vol. iii. sheet xvii.

AIJELETH HASH-SHAHAR, Ps 22 (title).—See PSALMS.

AIM.—To 'aim at,' in the sense of 'conjecture,' 'make guesses at,' occurs Wis 13⁹ 'For if they were able to know so much that they could aim at (σροχάζουαι, RV 'explore') the world.' Cf. H. Smith (1593), 'No marvel if he did aim that his death was near at hand.'

J. HASTINGS.

AIN (אֵין, usually spelled 'Ayin, and represented in transliteration by 'i) is the sixteenth letter of the Heb. ALPHABET (wh. see), and so is used to introduce the sixteenth part of Ps 119. See PSALMS.

AIN (אֵין 'an eye, or spring').—1. On the northern boundary of Israel, as given Nu 34¹¹. It lay west (S.W.?) of Riblah. It is almost impossible now to describe the boundary there given. Riblah has been identified with the village still bearing that name, 20 miles south-west of Hums (Emesa) and Zedad, with Sadād some 30 miles east of Riblah; other points are unknown. Robinson, following Thomson, places Ain at 'Ain el-'Asy, the main fountain of the Orontes, about 15 miles south-west of Riblah (Researches (1852), p. 538). Conder identifies this with Hazor-Enan (Heth and Moab, p. 7 ff.). A description of this fountain of the Orontes will be found in the passages referred to. On the whole question, see under PALESTINE, and other places named with Ain in Nu 34⁷⁻¹¹; also A. B. Davidson's Ezekiel, pp. 351, 352.

2. Jos 15²² 19⁷ and 1 Ch 4³². Here Ain and Rimmon should apparently be read as one name, Ain-Rimmon = En-Rimmon, which see.

A. HENDERSON.

AIR (אֵיר, ἀήρ, οὐρανός) is the first of the three divisions—'the heaven above,' 'the earth beneath,' and 'the water under the earth.' Its usual sense is the atmosphere resting upon the earth, with special terms for the highest heavens and for air in motion, as wind, breath, etc. As the locality of air is above the earth, so its language is that of the supernatural. As the emblem of the insubstantial, and the antithesis of 'flesh and blood' (Eph 6¹²), it is regarded as the dwelling-place of powers which, though under God, are over man.

Satan is described as 'the prince of the power of the air' (Eph 2²), and the war of the Lord is there lifted out of all tribal provincialism, and declared to be a world-wide conflict between elemental good and evil. For safety and success in this battle 'the whole armour of God' is needed. In Dt 32¹⁷ the heathen gods are called Shedhim, the term by which modern Jews denote the malignant spirits that are considered to infest the air. The fear of offending them makes the uneducated Jewish woman say,

'By your leave'! when throwing out water from her door-step; and the dread of their congregated power makes the Jews walk quickly in the funeral procession. The same superstition passed into the Christian Church with regard to the efficacy of the passing bell. The Jews in the synagogue-worship, when repeating the solemn watchword of Israel, 'Hear, O Israel, the Lord thy God is one Lord,' prolong the pronunciation of the word יְהוָה 'one,' as a protection against the hostility of the air-powers. See DEMON. G. M. MACKIE.

AKAN (אָקאַן).—A descendant of Esau (Gn 36²⁷). The name appears in 1 Ch 1⁴² as Jakan.

AKATAN (אַקאַטאַן, AV Acatan), 1 Es 8⁸⁸.—Father of Joannes, who returned with Ezra, called Hakatan, Ezr 8¹².

AKELDAMA (Ac 1¹⁹ WH 'Ἀκελδαμάχ, TR 'Ἀκελδαμά, AV Aceldama).—The popular name of 'the field of blood,' bought with the money paid to and returned by the traitor, Mt 27³⁻¹⁰. The language of Ac 1¹⁸ seems also to imply that it was so named as the scene of his suicide. It is not impossible that a spot so defiled would be eagerly sold and bought in the circumstances described. Such a place must have always been needed (Jer 26²³), and at the time this 'field' was purchased, owing to the multitude of 'strangers' dwelling in and visiting Jerusalem, there may have been urgent need for a larger place of burial, and a difficulty of procuring land for such a purpose. The place had been previously known as 'the potter's field,' and seems to be identified with 'the potter's house' of Jer 18² 19², which was in the valley of the son of Hinnom, the scene in earlier times of Molech-worship, and subsequently defiled as a place of burial (Jer 7³⁰⁻³², 2 K 23¹⁰). The traditional site is still known as Hak-ed-Dumm (in the 12th cent. called Chaudemar, a manifest corruption of the original). It is situated half-way up the hill, to the south of the Pool of Siloam, on a level spot. 'It is now a partly ruined building, 78 ft. long outside and 57 ft. wide, erected over rock-cut caves and a deep trench.' Originally there had been tombs cut in a natural cave, which forms the inner or southern part; and though these have been broken up to enlarge the space, six 'loculi' remain on the western side and two on the eastern. A deep trench has been cut in front of the original rock-tombs, 30 ft. deep, 21 ft. wide, and 63 ft. long. The wall built on the outer edge of the trench is about 30 ft. high. A stone roof thrown over the trench joins the hill face (PEFSt, 1892, p. 283 ff.). Apparently there was a cliff here with a natural cave in the face of it. This may have been used, as caves frequently are, as a potter's workshop. But the name of the gate, 'Harsith,' Jer 19² 'the gate of potsherd,' would rather indicate that the site of the potter's workshop was close by the gate, and not across a valley from it; his work would also require a supply of water to be at hand; nor can the Valley of Hinnom be said to be conclusively identified. According to Eusebius, Akeldama was on the north of the city; Jerome (by a slip or of design) places it on the south. From the seventh century (Arculph) it has been pointed out on the presently accepted site. Krafft (Top. Jer. p. 193) says he saw clay dug at Hak-ed-Dumm; but Schick denies that potter's clay is found there, and says that only a kind of chalk used to mix with clay is got higher up the hill; but even if it were, clay is not used where it is found, but where facilities for its use are greatest. The ownership of the spot has been more valued in later times than when purchased by the chief priests. In the 12th cent. the Latins got it from the Syrians, in the 16th cent. it was in the possession of the Armenians, in the 17th cent. of the Greeks, and it passed again to the Armenians, who at the close of that century paid a rent for it to the Turks. More strange is the virtue attached to its soil of quickly consuming dead bodies, because of which, notwithstanding its history, 270 shiploads are said to have been taken to form the Campo Santo at Rome, and seven shiploads to Pisa for a like purpose. Schick calculates the accumulation in it of bones and small stones at 10 to 15 ft. deep. A. HENDERSON.

AKKUB (אַקקוב).—1. A son of Elioenai (1 Ch 3²⁴). 2. A Levite, one of the porters at the E. gate of the temple, the eponym of a family that returned from the Exile (1 Ch 9⁷, Ezr 2⁴², Neh 7⁴⁵ 11¹⁹ 12²²), called in 1 Es 5²⁸ Dacubi. 3. The name of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2⁴²), called in 1 Es 5³⁰ Acud. 4. A Levite who helped to expound the law (Neh 8⁷). LXX omits. Called in 1 Es 9⁴⁸ Jacobus. J. A. SELBIE.

AKRABBIM (אַקראַבִּים, Nu 34⁴, Jg 1⁸⁶). Less correctly Acrabbim Jos 15³ AV, 'The Scorpion Pass.'—The name given to an ascent on the south side of the Dead Sea, a very barren region. See DEAD SEA. C. R. CONDER.

AKRABATTINE (Ἀκραβαττινή) in Idumæa (1 Mac 5³, AV Arabattine).—The region near Akrabbim.

ALABASTER. See BOX, MINERALS.

ALAMOTH, Ps 46 (title), 1 Ch 15²⁰.—See PSALMS.

ALBEIT.—Albeit is a contraction for 'all be it,' and means 'al(l) though it be.' Properly it should be, and sometimes is, followed by 'that'; but when regarded as a single word (=although), 'that' is omitted. It occurs only in Ezk 13⁷ 'a. I have not spoken,' and Philem¹⁹ 'a. I do not say to thee' (RV 'that I say not unto thee'); but is more free. in Apocr., Wis 11⁹ Sus^{10.53} 1 Mac 12⁹ 15³⁵ 2 Mac 4²⁷. J. HASTINGS.

ALCIMUS (אַלקימוס, 'God sets up,' greised into Ἀλκιμος, 'valiant,' and abbreviated into Ἰκιμ; whence Ἰάκιμος, Jos. Ant. XII. ix. 5, and Ἰάκιμος, ib. XX. x. 3) was the son (Baba bathra i. 33), or more probably the sister's son (Midrash rabba 65 et al.), of Jose ben-Joeser, the famous pupil of Antigonus of Socho. He was a native of Zeruboth, of Aaronic descent, but a leader of the Syrian and Hellenizing party. By Antiochus Eupator he was nominated to the high priesthood (B.C. 162), but was unable to exercise its functions on account of the influence in Jerus. of Judas Maccabæus. Retiring to Antioch, he gathered around him 'the lawless and ungodly men of Israel' (1 Mac 7⁵), by which is probably meant such members of the Hellenizing party as had been driven from Jerus. by the successes of Judas. As soon as Demetrius Soter had established himself at Antioch, the party of A. charged Judas with treason, and secured the king's favour for themselves. Demetrius was persuaded to renominate A. to the high priesthood, and to send an army under Bacchides, governor of Mesopotamia, with orders to install A. and to punish the Maccabees. The march of Bacchides does not appear to have been opposed; and at Jerus. it was found that many of the Hasidim were ready to support A., ostensibly because of his priestly descent, but really perhaps because of their suspicion of the dynastic designs of Judas. Sixty of their leaders, amongst whom is said (Midrash rabba) to have been Jose ben-Joeser himself, were, however, soon after put to death together, by the order of the joint representatives of the Syrian king; and on the part of Bacchides further cruelties followed. The effect was to reduce the people to a condition of sullen submission; and Bacchides returned to Antioch, leaving a sufficient force to maintain A. in his priestly and vice-regal dignity. For a very short time the support of the Syrian troops enabled him to carry out his Hellenizing policy. But a reaction soon took place in favour of the party of Judas, who forsook the retirement in which he had remained during the presence of Bacchides in the country, and made himself master of all the outlying districts. A. went in person to the king, and by means of large presents secured the despatch of a second force under Nicanor, who was appointed to the governorship of Judæa. Nicanor at first formed an alliance, and apparently an intimate friendship, with Judas. But A., displeased at the neglect to install him in his office, returned again to Demetrius, who sent strict orders to Nicanor to seize Judas and bring him at once to Antioch. Judas managed to escape from an attempt to overcome him by treachery; and the two armies met at Adasa, near Bethoron, on the 13th of Adar (March, B.C. 161). Nicanor fell in the battle, and the Syrian army was almost annihilated. Another army was collected by Demetrius, and sent into Judæa under the command of Bacchides. Judas was defeated and slain at the battle of Eleasa, and Bacchides proceeded to occupy Jerus. This time Bacchides remained in the country, and effectually protected A., who was at last able to discharge without hindrance his high priestly duties. His chief object appears to have been to abolish the separation of Jew from Greek. With that view he commanded the destruction of 'the wall of the inner court of the sanctuary,' and also of 'the works of the prophets.' The former has been identified with the Soreg, or low wooden breastwork before the steps leading between the courts; but the allusion seems to be rather to the wall itself, marking the limits beyond which Gentiles and the unclean were not allowed to pass. This was one of the separatist characteristics of the temple, ascribed in tradition sometimes to Haggai and Zechariah, sometimes to the members of the Great Synagogue. But before the destruction was completed, A. died (B.C. 160) of paralysis. Pss 74. 79. 80 have been interpreted as reflecting the sentiments of pious Jews during his priesthood. But the best authority for the period is 1 Mac 7⁵⁻²⁰ 9¹⁻⁵⁷, though cautious use may be made also of 2 Mac 14¹⁻²⁷, and Jos. Ant. XII. ix. 5, XII. x.

ALEMA (ἐν Ἀλάμοις A, Ἀλέμοις B), 1 Mac 5²⁶.—A city in Gilead. The site is unknown.

ALEMETH (אַלְמֶת).—1. A son of Becher the Benjaminite (1 Ch 7⁸, AV Alameth). 2. A descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8³⁶ 9⁴²).

ALEPH (א).—First letter of Heb. Alphabet. See ALPHABET, PSALMS, and A.

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος).—The name occurs five times in NT, and apparently belongs to as many distinct persons.

1. Mk 15²¹. A son of SIMON of Cyrene, and brother of RUFUS (see these names). A. and Rufus are evidently expected to be familiar names to the readers. Very possibly they were Christian Jews.

2. Ac 4⁶. 'Annas the high priest was there, and Caiaphas, and John, and Alexander, and as many as were of the kindred of the high priest' (RV). Of this A. nothing further is known. The suggestion of Baronius, Pearson, and Lightfoot, that he was the well-known Alabarch (on this title see Schürer, HJP II. ii. 230) of Alexandria and brother of Philo (Jos. Ant. XVIII. viii. 1, cf. XIX. v. 1), 'scarcely needs serious discussion' (Edersheim). Philo was of high and wealthy birth (Jos. xx. v. 2), but Jerome's statement (de Viris Illustr. xi.) that he was 'de genere sacerdotum' is unsupported by any evidence.

3. Ac 19³². 'And some of the multitude instructed A., the Jews putting him forward. And A. beckoned with the hand, and would have made a defence unto the people. But when they perceived that he was a Jew' . . . etc. etc. (RVm). The Jews were a natural and usual object of the religious animosity (cf. ἱερόσυλοι v. 37, and Ro 2²²), which on this occasion they had done nothing to provoke. A. is put forward by his co-religionists to clear them of complicity with St. Paul, but the enraged mob will give no Jew a hearing. The absence of any τις suggests (cf. v. 9) that A. was well known at Ephesus; he may even have been one of the ἐργάται or τεχνῖται of v. 25, and thus identifiable with No. 5; but this, although it is stated (by Ewald, apud Nösgen, in loc.) that Jews were sometimes engaged in forbidden trades, lacks evidence.

4. 1 Ti 1^{19, 20}. Mentioned with HYMENÆUS (cf. 2 Ti 2¹⁷) as one of the unconscientious teachers who had 'made shipwreck concerning the faith.' St. Paul 'delivered them unto Satan' (cf. 1 Co 5⁵, and see SATAN). There is no strong reason to identify this A. with No. 5.

5. 2 Ti 4¹⁴. This A. (1) was a smith (χαλκεύς). The word originally meant a worker in copper; but as other metals came to be more commonly worked, it became applicable (Lid. and S. s. v.) to workers in any metal, esp. iron (Gn 4²² LXX, see also TRADES). This makes possible, but by no means proves, the identity of A. with No. 3, if the latter could be shown to be one of the craftsmen of Demetrius. (2) A. had 'done' (ἐπέδειξεν) St. Paul many evils; in particular he had greatly withstood (ἄνανδρέστην, cf. Ac 13⁸) his words. (3) Timothy is cautioned against a like experience. This last point locates A. with Timothy at Ephesus, and makes it probable that (2) also refers to something that had taken place when St. Paul was last there (1 Ti 1¹⁸). If (2) refers to heretical teaching, our present A. might be identified with No. 4. But (2) is equally compatible with Jewish hostility; and if so, we might combine (1) and (2) with the object of identifying him with No. 3. In any case No. 5 is the only possible link between 3 and 4. For specimens of the many possible conjectures on the whole subject, see the comm. in loc. and Holtzmann, Pastoralbriefe, p. 255 sq. If, with many critics, we regard the Epistles to Timothy as non-Pauline, we might follow the last-named writer in regarding Ac 19³² as the basis of the notice in 2 Ti; but in reality the two passages have nothing in common except the name; the malicious personal antagonism which is so prominent here is unhinted at there.

A. ROBERTSON.

ALEXANDER III. (Ἀλέξανδρος, 'defender of men'), known as the Great, was the son of Philip II., king of Macedonia, and of Olympias, a Molossian princess, and was born at Pella, B.C. 356. He succeeded his father in B.C. 336, and two years later set out on his eastern expedition. The battles of the Granicus (B.C. 334) and of Issus (B.C. 333) made him master of S.W. Asia. Egypt was next subdued, and Alexandria founded in B.C. 331. The discontent of his army thwarted his designs upon India, and in B.C. 323 he died at Babylon.

For Alexander's connexion with the Jews, the principal authority is Jos. Ant. IX. viii. 3-6. The story runs that, whilst he was besieging Tyre, A. sent orders to the Jews to transfer their allegiance to him, and to supply him with provisions and auxiliaries. The high priest refused on the ground of his oath of fidelity to Darius. A. destroyed Tyre, took Gaza (B.C. 332) after a two months' siege (Diodor. xvii. 8; Arrian, ii. 26, 27), and marched against Jerus. The high priest Jaddua (Neh 12¹¹), or Simon the Just (Yoma 69), was taught in a dream what to do, and led out the priests and the people to meet him. At Sapha (הַסָּפָה 'he watched'; known also as Scopus, Jos. Wars, v. ii. 3, an eminence near Jerus. whence city and temple were all visible) the priest and the king met. A. bowed before the divine name on the priest's tiara, and to the protestations of Parmenio replied that in a dream at Dium he had seen such a figure as Jaddua's, and had been promised success and guidance on the way. Escorted by the priests, he entered Jerus., sacrificed in the temple under the direction of the high priest, and, when shown the Book of Dan., interpreted of himself such passages as 8²¹ and 11³. Before leaving the city he guaranteed to the Jews in all his dominions protection in the usages of their fathers, and immunity from taxation in their sabbatical years. How much of this story is legendary, it is impossible to decide. It is found in the Talmud as well as in Josephus. The silence of the classical historians (Arrian, Curtius, Plutarch, and the Epitomists) is inconclusive, as they are generally silent concerning matters relating to the Jews. The position and the suspected attitude of Jerus. make a visit on the part of A. probable in view of his contemplated expedition against Egypt. And though imagination has clearly been at work with the details of the narrative, the balance of probability is in favour of its substantial historicity.

By A. Palestine was included in the province of Coele-Syria, which extended from Lebanon to Egypt. The governor was Andromachus, who chose as his residence the town of Samaria, because of its central position, and possibly also of the amenities of the neighbourhood. Against him the Samaritans rose in revolt, prompted by jealousy of the privileged Jews, by resentment at the establishment amongst them of the seat of government, or by the opportunity afforded by the absence in Egypt of such of their compatriots as were most favourably disposed towards A. (Jos. Ant. xi. viii. 6). Setting fire to the house of Andromachus, they burnt him alive. The news reached A. just after he had received the submission of Egypt; and, hastening back, he put to death the leaders of the revolt (Curt. iv. 8. 10), and removed the rest of the people from their city, planting a colony of Macedonians in their stead. From that time Shechem, at the foot of Mt. Gerizim, became the religious centre of the Samaritans. Coins of A. have been found coined at Ashkelon and Acco (Ptolemais), and also, if Müller's identifications are correct, at Cæsarea, Scythopolis, and Rabbah (Müller, Numismatique d'Alexandre, 303-309); but it cannot be inferred with confidence that these towns were made by him sub-capitals of districts, as such coins were issued by the Diadochoi long after the death of A. Not only were large numbers of the Samaritans settled by him in the Thebais (Jos. Ant. xi. viii. 6), and of Jews in Alexandria (ib. xix. v. 2; Apion. ii. 4) and in the Egyp. villages (see the evidence of papyri in Mahaffy, Ptolemies, 86, n.), but many of the latter appear to have willingly enrolled themselves in his army. When he was rebuilding the temple of Bel in Babylon, his soldiers were ordered to assist in removing the rubbish. The Jews are said to have refused on the grounds that any dealing with idolatry was forbidden them, and that their Scriptures predicted the permanency of the destruction of the temple of Bel. They were threatened and punished in vain. Appealing to A., they were exempted from the task, in virtue of the original stipulation that they 'should continue under the laws of their fathers.' The incident again is of doubtful authenticity; but it is in agreement with all the traditions of the kindly attitude of A. towards the Jews.

In the Biblical books A. is expressly mentioned only in 1 Mac 1¹⁻⁷ 6², though several passages in Dan. are frequently interpreted as alluding to him.

LITERATURE.—The sources of A.'s history are examined in Freeman, Hist. Essays, 2nd ser. Ess. 5, to which add Pauly, R.E. art. 'Alexander,' and Mahaffy, Ptolemies, where in § 56 evidence is adduced in favour of the novel suggestion, that A.'s friendship to the Jews was due to his desire to use them as a kind of intelligence department to his army. For the rabbinical traditions see Derenbourg, Hist. de la Pal. i. 41 ff.; Hamburger, R.E. ii. 44-47; Droysen, Gesch. Alex. des Grossen (Hamburg, 1837), and Gesch. des Hellenismus (Gotha, 1877) are of special value.

ALEXANDER BALAS was either a natural son of Antiochus Epiphanes (Jos. Ant. xiii. ii. 1; Liv. Epit. 50; Strabo, xiii.), or a lad of Smyrna who claimed such descent (Justin, xxxv. 1; Appian, Syr. 67). In the latter (more likely) case, Balas was his proper name, and its etymology is unknown; in the former case the name may be connected with the Aram. אֲלַי 'lord.' He also assumed his reputed father's title of Epiphanes (1 Mac 10¹). He was set up as a pretender to the throne of Demetrius Soter, whose despotism had alienated his subjects and offended his neighbours, by the three allied kings, Ptolemy Philometor of Egypt, Attalus II. of Pergamum, and Ariarathes V. of Cappadocia. The Romans also supported his claims (Polybius, xxxiii. 14. 16), in accordance with their policy of promoting civil strife within kingdoms that might become formidable. He secured the help of Jonathan (B.C. 153) by nominating him high priest, and after some reverses defeated Demetrius, who fell in the battle. Balas thereupon married Cleopatra, daughter of Ptolemy Philometor (for a fuller account of whose relations with Balas see Mahaffy, Emp. of Ptolemies, §§ 208-212), and appointed (B.C. 150) Jonathan with special honours (Jos. Ant. xiii. iv. 2) σπαρτηγός and μεριδάρχης, military and civil governor of the province, although Syrian commandants were retained in several of the principal fortresses. His kingdom now established, Balas proved himself an incapable ruler, negligent of State affairs, and given up to self-indulgence (Müller, Fragm. Hist. Græc. ii. præf. xvi, n. 19; Liv. Epit. 50; Justin, xxxv. 2). Demetrius Nicator, son of Dem. Soter, invaded the country in B.C. 147, and was supported by Apollonius, governor of Coele-Syria. But Jonathan defeated and slew Apollonius, and was rewarded on the part of Balas by the gift of Ekron. Balas, however, was deserted by his own soldiers and by the people of Antioch. Ptolemy, his father-in-law, entered Syria on the plea that Balas was plotting against him, and took up the cause of Demetrius, to whom he transferred his daughter Cleopatra in marriage. Balas hastened from Cilicia, where he had been trying to quell a revolt, but was defeated by Ptolemy. He was either slain (B.C. 146) in the battle (Euseb. Chron. Arm. i. 349), or he fled to Abæ, in Arabia, where he was assassinated (Müller, l.c.; 1 Mac 11¹⁷). The relation of the Jews to Balas, and the consistency of their alliance, appear in 1 Mac 10⁴⁷, RV 'They were well pleased with Alexander, because he was the first that spake words of peace unto them, and they were confederate with him always.' His necessities and his unconcern made Judæa almost autonomous.

ALEXANDRIA (ἡ Ἀλεξάνδρεια), the Hellenic capital of Egypt, was founded by Alexander the Great, B.C. 332. Under the early Ptolemies it rose to importance, and became the emporium of the commerce of the East and of the West. Oblong in shape and rounded at the extremities,—Strabo compared it to the chlamys or cloak of the Macedonian cavalry,—it occupied the narrow strip of land which lay between the sea and the Lake Mareotis. An artificial mole connected it with the island of Pharos, and on either side of the mole were commodious harbours which received the ships of Europe and Asia. The Lake Mareotis, which was joined by a canal to the Canopic mouth of the Nile, brought to it the commerce of the East. The beauty of the city was proverbial. One-third of its extent was occupied with royal palaces and open public grounds; and it had a system of wide regular streets with noble colonnades. Its population, which amounted to about 800,000 souls in its flourishing period, consisted chiefly of Egyptians, Greeks, and Jews, who occupied separate quarters. The Regio Judæorum, which lay in the north-eastern portion of the city, was surrounded by walls. A special governor, called the Alabarch, presided over it, and the Jews were permitted to live according to their own laws. The Jews—the mercenary race as they were called—were not popular with their fellow-citizens, but they were protected by the rulers, Greek and Roman, who recognised the value of their services to the commercial prosperity of the city. When A. became part of the Roman Empire, B.C. 30, and a granary of Rome, the important corn trade with Italy fell into the hands of Jewish merchants.

The Lagidæ were munificent patrons of learning, and it was their ambition to make their capital a place of intellectual renown. They collected within its walls the largest library of antiquity, part of which was housed in the temple of Serapis in the Egyptian quarter, and another part in the museum which was situated in the Bruchium or Greek quarter. To the museum was attached a staff of professors, who were salaried by the State. It had a banqueting-hall in which the professors dined, corridors for peripatetic lectures, and a theatre for public disputations. The chief subjects of study were grammar, rhetoric, mathematics, astronomy, medicine, and geography. The school of philosophical thought which ultimately arose was eclectic, a patchwork of earlier systems, and it closed its career by dethroning philosophy in favour of religious tradition.

For the student of Christian theology, A. occupies an important place in the history of religious development as the cradle of a school of thought in which the earliest attempt was made to bring the teaching of the OT into relation with Hellenic ideas. It was in A. that the Heb. Scriptures were first translated into Greek. This translation, although it afterwards became 'the first apostle to the nations,' was not made with a missionary purpose, being intended to afford a knowledge of the law to the numerous Jews who had grown up in ignorance of the Heb. language. But having opened up their treasures to the curious Greeks, it became necessary for the Jews to explain and to defend them. It was the claim of the Jew that the Scriptures are the sole source of a true knowledge of God and of human duty; but when he became familiar with Greek literature, it was impossible to deny that there also were found noble doctrines and excellent counsels. The Alexandrian Jew offered an Apologia for his exclusive claim, which was repeated by the Christian Fathers, lived through the entire Middle Ages, and almost to our own time. Plato and Pythagoras, he said, and even Homer, borrowed all their wisdom from the OT Scriptures. Aristobulus, a Jewish courtier, who lived about the middle of the second century B.C., writes: 'Plato took our legislation as his model, and it is certain that he knew the whole of it; the same is true of Pythagoras.' In order to gain venerated authority for this assertion, the Jews composed verses in the name of the mystic poets of antiquity, in praise of Moses and of Judaism. In his commentary on the Pentateuch, Aristobulus introduces Orpheus, and makes him say that he cannot reveal the God whom clouds conceal; that the water-born Moses alone of mortals received knowledge from on high on two tables. Another writer of Egypt who was a contemporary of Aristobulus, the author of the third of the Sibylline Books, introduces the Sibyl of Cumæ, who speaks of the Jews as a nation appointed by God to be the guide of all mortals; and she offers the coming Messianic salvation to all nations if they will turn from their idols to serve the living God.

Having thus established to their own satisfaction that Gentile wisdom comes from the Scriptures, the Jews next proceeded to place it there by the help of the magic wand of allegorical interpretation. Thus interpreted, the narratives of Scripture easily yielded up Platonic and Stoic dogmas. The Jewish Alexandrian philosophy, which began with Aristobulus and culminated in Philo, was an elaborate attempt to clothe Greek philosophical ideas in Scripture language, and thus to confer upon them the authority of divine revelation. It was to Platonism and Stoicism that the Jewish scholars most naturally turned; for in the lofty monotheism of the former, and in the moral earnestness of the latter, they seemed to hear echoes of Isaiah and Solomon. It was through the influence of Platonic and Stoic conceptions that the Sophia and the Logos assumed such importance in the Jewish Alexandrian philosophy. In the Heb. Scriptures they had been personified, but they were now hypostatized, and became intermediaries between the creature and the Most High God.

The Jewish philosophy of A., which was not confined to A., but spread through the whole of the Greek-speaking Diaspora, exercised a certain influence upon the Greeks, who were drawn towards Judaism by its accent of certainty about God, which was always wanting even in the loftiest theology of their own philosophers. Its main influence, however, lay in its Hellenizing of the Jews, who were enabled to appropriate Hellenic views of life without conscious apostasy from Judaism. The extent of the influence of Jewish Alexandrian philosophy on the writers of the NT has been variously estimated. There are striking similarities between the terminology and sometimes between the thoughts of St. Paul and of the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews and those of Philo. But the similarities are probably due to their common knowledge of the current teaching of the Greek-speaking synagogue. On the other hand, the direct practical spirit of the NT writers offers a strong contrast to the dreamy intellectualism of Philo's allegories.

The name of the city of Alexandria does not occur in the NT. Mention is made of a synagogue of the Alexandrians in Jerusalem (Ac 6⁹). Apollos is described as an 'Alexandrian by race' (Ac 18²⁴). St. Paul sailed on two occasions in Alexandrian ships, which probably belonged to the corn trade (Ac 27⁸ 28¹¹).

It is remarkable that neither St. Paul nor his companions visited A., in some respects the most promising missionary field in the world. As regards St. Paul, to hazard a conjecture, he may have been deterred by what occurred in Corinth (1 Co 1¹²), where Apollos followed him, and by his preaching produced an unhappy division without intending it. St. Paul may have felt that his simple presentation of Christ crucified would be unwelcome among hearers accustomed to the word of wisdom in trope and allegory. If we were to accept the view of those critics who hold that Apollos wrote the Epistle to the Hebrews to the Jewish Christians of A., it would be easy to explain St. Paul's conduct, as it would have been contrary to his custom to visit a Church which a fellow-labourer had already made his own (2 Co 10¹⁶).

According to Eusebius (H. E. ii. 16), St. Mark was the first who was sent to Egypt, where he preached the gospel which he had written, and established churches in A. 'The multitude of believers,' he adds, 'both men and women, lived lives of the most extreme and philosophical asceticism.' The statement of Eusebius about St. Mark, which he introduces with the formula 'they say,' and connects with fanciful legends, has clearly no authority. His description, however, of the character of the early Alexandrian Church is probably correct. During the second and third centuries of our era Alexandria was the intellectual capital of Christendom. In the Alexandrian heretics Basilides and Valentinus, and in the Church Fathers Clement and Origen, we observe how the spirit of Jewish Alexandrian philosophy passed into Christianity. ALGUM TREES, ALMUG TREES (אֲלֻמִּים 'almuggim, 2 Ch 2⁹ 9^{10, 11}; אֲלֻמִּים 'almuggim, 1 K 10^{11, 12}, LXX. ξύλα πεύκινα; Vulg. ligna thyina, ligna pinea).—Celsius (Hierobot. i. 173) states that some doubted the identity of the algum and the almug. This doubt, however, is not justified by the transposition of the letters in the two names. Such transposition is extremely common in Heb. proper names (e.g. Rehum, רִחֻם, Neh 12², is called in v. 15 of the same chapter Horim, חֲרִים). We are told that algum trees were brought from Ophir (2 Ch 9¹⁰). Almug trees were also brought from Ophir (1 K 10¹¹). These passages are perfectly parallel, and plainly refer to the same tree.

But, in 2 Ch 2⁹, Solomon instructs Hiram to send 'cedar trees, fir trees, and algum trees (AVm almuggim) out of Lebanon.' Did the term algum in Lebanon signify one tree and in Ophir another? This is possible. Cedar, in Eng., is applied to various species of Cupressus, Abies, Juniperus, and Larix, as well as to Cedrus Libani. Fir, in Eng., is applied to several species of Abies, and the Scotch fir is Pinus sylvestris, L. Spruce is used in Europe for Abies excelsa, L., and in the United States for three species of Abies: A. Canadensis, Mich., A. alba, Mich., and A. nigra, Poir. Instances of this might easily be multiplied. If we accept this supposition, the passage is amply explained. But it affords no clue to the name of the tree growing in Lebanon. If, on the other hand, the tree which Solomon requested Hiram to send was the same as that brought from Ophir, was Lebanon a station for it? This is also possible. We do not know where Ophir was, nor what the tree was. It would be quite rash to say that it could not grow in both localities. The cedar, mentioned in the same clause, grows in Lebanon, Amanus, Taurus, the Himalayas, and the Atlas. It is also uncertain what fir is alluded to in the passage. There are firs in Lebanon, and also in some, at least, of the localities proposed for Ophir. It is possible that the unknown tree had a range which included Lebanon and Ophir.

The conditions for any candidate for the algum or almug tree, imported from Ophir, are—(1) that it should be a wood of sufficient value to make its importation from so distant a country as Ophir, be it Arabia, India, or the East Coast of Africa, profitable; (2) that it should be suitable for מִסְפָּת terraces (m. highways or stairs, more properly a staircase, 2 Ch 9¹¹), and מְדָבָר pillars (m. a prop or rails, more properly balustrade, 1 K 10¹²), and for harps and psalteries. Fifteen different candidates have been proposed, among them thyine wood, deodar, fir, bukm (Cæsalpina Sappan). The majority of scholars, following the opinion of certain Rabbis, incline to the red sandal wood (Pterocarpus Santalina, L.), a native of Coromandel and Ceylon. There is not, however, a particle of direct evidence in its favour. Against it is the fact that it occurs now in commerce only in small billets, unsuitable for staircases, balustrades, or even the construction of harps and psalteries. It is, however, possible that larger sticks might have been cut in ancient times.

In the uncertainty which must ever remain as to the identity of the tree intended, and with the probability that a considerable number of trees which grew in Lebanon are now extinct there owing to denudation of forests, and the possibility that the Lebanon algum may have been a different tree with the same name, it is needless to suggest an interpolation of the passage 'out of Lebanon' (2 Ch 2⁹).

ALIEN.—See FOREIGNER.

ALL.—There are few words in the Eng. Bible the precise meaning of which is so often missed as the word 'all.' The foll. examples need special attention. 1. When joined to a pers. pron. all usually follows the pron. in mod. usage, in early Eng. it often precedes it. Is 53⁶ 'All we like sheep have gone astray'; but Is 64⁶ 'We all do fade as a leaf.' 2. All stands for 'all people' in 1 Ti 4¹⁰ 'that thy profiting may appear to all.' 3. Following the Gr. (πᾶς), all is used with a freedom which is denied to it in mod. Eng. In He 7⁷, 'without all contradiction,' all=any whatever. Cf. Shaks. Macbeth, III. ii. 11—

'Things without all remedy
Should be without regard.'

In Col 1¹⁰ 'unto all pleasing' is a literal tr. of the Gr., and means 'in order to please (God) in every way.' Similarly all is used for 'every' in Dt 22² 'In like manner shalt thou do . . . with all (RV 'every') lost thing of thy brother's'; Rev 18² 'all manner of vessels of ivory,' and even without the word 'manner' in the same verse, 'all thyne wood.' 4. All means 'altogether' in 1 K 14¹⁰ 'till it be all gone'; Nah 3¹ 'Woe to the bloody city! it is all full of lies.' Cf. Caxton (1483) 'The lady wente oute of her wytte and was al demonyak.' This is the meaning of 'all' in 'All hail,' Mt 28⁹, literally, 'be altogether whole, or in health.' 5. All appears in some interesting phrases. All along: 1 S 28²⁰ 'Then Saul fell straightway all along on the earth' (RV 'his full length upon the earth'); Jer 41⁶ 'weeping all along as he went,' i.e. throughout the whole way he went; cf. 'I knew that all along,' i.e. throughout the whole time. All in all: 1 Co 15²⁸ 'that God may be all in all' (Gr. πάντα ἐν πάντων, all things in all [persons and] things). Cf. Sir 43²⁷ 'He (God) is all' (τὸ πᾶν ἐστὶν αὐτός). Different is Shaks. (Ham. I. ii. 198)

'Take him for all in all,
I shall not look upon his like again.'

where all in all is 'altogether.' All one: 1 Co 11⁵ 'that is even all one (RV 'one and the same thing') as if she were shaven'; Job 9²² RV 'It is all one' (Heb. כִּשְׁמֵת), i.e. it is a matter of indifference. All the whole occurs in Ps 96¹ Pr. Bk. 'Sing unto the LORD, all the whole earth' (AV and RV 'all the earth'). This redundancy is found in various forms in old Eng., as 'the whole all,' 'the all whole,' 'all and whole.' For all: Jn 21¹¹ 'for all (=notwithstanding) there were so many.' Cf. Tindale's tr. of Ac 16³⁷ 'for all that we are Romans.' Once for all: He 10¹⁰ (Gr. ἐφάπαξ); this is the only occurrence in AV, and it gives for all in ital.; but RV, which omits the italics here, gives the same tr. of this adv. in He 7²⁷ 9¹², Jude³, and in marg. of Ro 6¹⁰. In 1 Co 15⁶ it is tr. 'at once' in both VSS. All to brake: Jg 9⁵⁸ 'And a certain woman cast a piece of a millstone upon Abimelech's head, and all to brake (RV 'and brake') his skull.' This is the most interesting of those phrases in which the word 'all' is found. The meaning is not, 'and all in order to break his skull'; the verb is in the past tense. The 'to' is not the sign of the infin., it goes with the verb, like the Ger. zer, to signify asunder, or in pieces. So we find to-burst, to-cut, to-rend, to-ribe, etc. 'All' was prefixed to this emphatic verb to give it greater emphasis. Hence 'all to-brake' means 'altogether broke in pieces.' Cf. Tindale's tr. of Mt 7⁹ 'lest they tread them under their feet, and the other turn again, and all to rent you.' Sir T. More says (Works, 1557, p. 1224) 'She fel in hand with hym . . . and all to rated him.'

ALLAMMELECH (אֲלַמְלֵךְ).—Perhaps 'King's oak,' a town of Asher probably near Acco (Jos 19²⁸). The site is not known.

ALLAR (B' אַלְלָר, A' אַלָר, AV Aalar), 1 Es 5³⁶.—One of the leaders of those Jews who could not show their pedigree as Isr. at the return from captivity under Zerubbabel. The name seems to correspond to Immer in Ezr 2³⁸, Neh 7⁶¹, one of the places from which these Jews returned. In 1 Es Cherub, Addan, and Immer appear as 'Charaathalan leading them and Allar.'

H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

ALLAY, not found in AV, is introduced by RV into Ec 10⁴ 'yielding allayeth (AV 'pacifieth') great offences.' The meaning seems to be that a spirit of conciliation puts an end to offences more completely than a strong arm. Cf. Shaks. 2 Henry VII. IV. i. 60, 'allay this thy abortive pride.'

J. HASTINGS.

ALLEG occurs but twice, Wis 18²² 'a^{1ns} (ὀπομνήσας, RV, 'bringing to remembrance') the oaths and covenants made with the fathers'; and Ac 17³ 'Opening and a^{1ns} that Christ must needs have suffered, where it has the old meaning of adducing proofs (παραιθέμενος), like Lat. allegare, not the mod. sense of asserting. Allegiance, not in AV, is given in RV at 1 Ch 12²⁹ as tr. of כִּרְפָּק 'Kept their a. to (AV 'Kept the ward of') the house of Saul.'

J. HASTINGS.

ALLEGORY.—i. HISTORY OF THE WORD.—The substantive ἀλληγορία, with its verb ἀλληγορέω, is derived from ἄλλο, something else, and ἀγορεύω, I speak; and is defined by Heraclitus (Heraclides?)—probably of the first century A.D.—as follows: ἄλλα μὲν ἀγορεύων τρόπος ἕτερα δὲ ὅν λέγει σημαίνων ἐπωνύμιως ἀλληγορία καλεῖται; 'The mode of speech which says other things (than the mere letter) and hints at different things from what it expresses, is called appropriately allegory' (c. 5). Neither substantive nor verb is found in the LXX; and the verb alone, and that only once (Gal 4²⁴), occurs in the NT. The word, whether substantive or verb, appears to be altogether late Greek. Plutarch (flourished 80-120 A.D.) tells us (De Aud. Poet. 19

E) that it was the equivalent in his day for the more old-fashioned ὑπόνοια, the deeper sense (or the figure expressing it), which was a special feature in the Stoic philosophy, with its θεραπεία (treatment, manipulation); and Cicero had not long before introduced ἀλληγορία, in its Greek form, in two or three passages in his works (e.g. Orator 27; Ad Attic. ii. 20); while Philo had freely used substantive and verb early in the first century; and the verb is used in Josephus (Ant. Procem. 4) of some of the writings of Moses.

ii. DISTINCTIVE MEANING.—The provinces of allegory, type, symbol, parable, fable, metaphor, analogy, mystery, may all trench upon one another; but each has its speciality, and the same thing can only receive the different names as it is viewed from the different points. Allegory differs essentially from type in that it is not a premonition of future development, and that there is no necessary historical and real correspondence in the main idea of the original to the new application of it: from symbol, in that it is not a lower grade naturally shadowing forth a higher; from parable, in that it is not a picture of a single compact truth, but a transparency through which the different details are seen as different truths, and in that it is not necessarily ethical in its aim; from fable, in that its lessons are not confined to the sphere of practical worldly prudence; from metaphor, in that its interpretation is not immediate and obvious, but has to be sought out through the medium of verbal or phenomenal parallels; from analogy, because it is not addressed to the reason so much as to the imagination; and from mystery, in that it does not await a new order of things to be specially manifested and truly discerned. All these tropes may indeed be classed under the allegorical or the figurative, so far as they all point to a sense different from that contained in the mere letter. But, conventionally and in practice, allegory has a sphere of its own. In the non-specific sense, it has to do with the general relations of life in its external resemblances, one thing being mirrored in another according to outward appearance, so that the appearance of the one can serve as the figure of the other. In other words, the thing put before the eye or ear represents, not itself, but something else in some way like it. Thus the fish was early used as an allegory of Christ; it was not, strictly speaking, a symbol, or a type, or a parable, or any of the figures above compared. The resemblance was both far-fetched and outward, being evolved from the several letters of the word ἰχθῦς as the initials of Ἰησοῦς, Χριστός, Θεοῦ, Τίος, Σωτήρ. Of allegory proper, more or less elaborated, we have within the bounds of the sacred books very little. In the OT may be instanced the allegory of the Vine in the 80th Psalm, and in the NT those of the Door, the Shepherd (Jn 10), and the Vine (Jn 15). In the more confined, the technical and historical sense, it denoted, especially for Alexandrian Greeks and Jews, the system of interpretation by which the most ancient Greek literature, in the one case, and the OT writings (and subsequently the NT), in the other, were assigned their value in proportion as they meant, not what they said, but something else, and could be made the clothing of cosmological, philosophical, moral, or religious ideas. This leads us to the third and final division.

iii. ALLEGORICAL INTERPRETATION.—The tendency to allegorize has its foundations in human nature. Constantly and unconsciously we read into the creations of other men, as, for example, into a painting or a poem, our own thoughts, conceptions, and emotions, and are scarcely to be persuaded that they were not the original thoughts, conceptions, and emotions of the creator. Or, again, when any literature has so deeply inwrought itself into the hearts and lives of a people as to have become a sacred and inseparable constituent of their nature, and when time has nevertheless so far changed the current of thought as to make that literature apparently inconsistent with the new idea, or inadequate to express it,—then the choice for the people lies between a ruinous breach with what is, by this time, part and parcel of themselves, and, on the other hand, forcing the old language to be a vehicle for the new thought. Hence the tendency to allegory, which is indigenous to human nature, becomes, in the absence of historical criticism, also inevitable, except to the indifferent iconoclast, if such there be. Allegory proved the safety-valve for Greek, Jew, and Christian. During and, perhaps, owing to the intellectual movement of the fifth century B.C.,—in spite of the severe critical deprecation of Plato, whose mind was set on higher things,—Homer, the ‘Bible of the Greeks,’ was saved for the educated by allegory; with the stories he told of the gods, if he was not allegorical, he was impious, or they were immoral. Hence, from Anaxagoras onwards, the actions of the Homeric gods and heroes are allegories of the forces of nature; and, in Heraclitus (first century A.D.), the ‘story of Ares and Aphrodite and Hephaestus is a picture of iron subdued by fire, and restored to its original hardness by Poseidon, that is, by water.’ Or else they are the movements of mental powers and moral virtues; and so, in Cornutus (also first cent. A.D.), when Odysseus filled his ears that he might be deaf to the song of the Sirens, it is an allegory of the righteous filling their senses and powers of mind with divine words and actions that the passions and pleasures which tempt all men on the sea of life might knock at their doors in vain (Hatch, Hibbert Lectures, 1888, pp. 62, 64).

But allegorizing was Jewish as well as Greek, and Palestinian as well as Hellenistic. Both sections of Jews used allegory for apologetic purposes, but not with identical aims. The Pal. Jews allegorized the OT, finding a hidden sense in sentences, words, letters, and (in the centuries after Christ) even vowel-points, in order to satisfy their consciences for the non-observance of laws that had become impracticable, or to justify traditional and often trivial increment, or to defend God against apparent inconsistency, or the writers or historical characters against impiety or immorality; or, generally, for homiletical purposes. Thus Akiba (first and second centuries A.D.) claimed to have saved by allegory the Song of Songs from rejection. Allegory was a considerable element in the Pal. Haggada (or interpretation), and there were definite canons regulating its use. The Hellenistic Jews, whose metropolis of culture was Alexandria, and who, in the neighbourhood of NT times, constituted the majority of Jews, directed their apologetic towards educated Greeks, for philosophical purposes, and allegorized the OT to prove that their sacred books were neither barbarous nor immoral nor impious, that their religion had the same rationale as Greek philosophy, and that Moses had been the teacher, or, at all events, the anticipator, of Pythagoras, Plato, Aristotle, and the Stoics. The Hellenistic thinkers desired to be Greek philosophers without ceasing to be Jewish religionists. Thus the Alexandrian Aristobulus (second cent. B.C.), reputed to be the earliest known Hellenistic allegorizer, in his commentary on the Pent. addressed to Ptolemy Philometor, sought (as Clement of Alexandria says) to ‘bring Peripatetic philosophy out of Moses and the Prophets.’ But the representative Alexandrian allegorizer was Philo (early in first century A.D.): he reduced allegory to a system of his own, with canons similar to those of the Pal. Haggadists, but freely used, and adapted to philosophical ends by means of the Platonic doctrine of ideas. Professing to retain the literal sense as carrying in itself moral teaching, he nevertheless made the allegorical so transcendently significant (as the soul in the body) that both literal and moral were continually overwhelmed: before the writer’s determination to extract the allegorical at all costs and in any sense that at the time suited his mood, the facts often disappeared, the narrative was turned upside down, and, in the handling of the characters of OT story, the unities were entirely ignored. So, when it is said that Jacob took a stone for his pillow, what he did, as the archetype of a self-disciplining soul, was to put one of the incorporeal intelligences of that holy ground close to his mind; and, under the pretext of going to sleep, he, in reality, found repose in the intelligence which he had chosen that on it he might lay the burden of his life. Again, Joseph is made, in one aspect, the type of the sensual mind, and, in another, of a conqueror victorious over pleasure.

We find the Alexandrian method employed upon the OT as early as the Book of Wisdom and its allegorical interpretation of the manna in the Pent. (16^{20a}), and of the high priest’s robe as the image of the whole world (18³⁴).

The early Christians therefore found this current and acknowledged method of interpretation to their hand in the arguments they drew from the OT against the unbelieving Jews; and, in particular, St. Paul and the Paulinists, in their efforts to turn the law itself against the law-worshipping Judaizers. But not till post-apostolic times, culminating in the times of Clement of Alexandria and Origen, does the allegorical method show itself in any luxuriance. The method of Jesus and the speakers and writers in NT is typical rather than allegorical, and Palestinian rather than Alexandrian; and, in any case, is self-restrained and free from the characteristic extravagance of rabbi and philosopher. St. Paul, in his application of the method to the command as to oxen threshing (1 Co 9^{9a}), to the rock (1 Co 10⁴), and to the veil of Moses (2 Co 3^{13a}), is both Palestinian and Alexandrian in disregarding the original drift of the passages and incidents, treating it as nothing (1 Co 9¹⁰) in comparison with the typico-allegorical interpretation; but he is Pal. in being homiletical in his aim and not philosophical, and in having persons and events in his perspective rather than abstract truth. In Gal 4^{21ff} he openly affirms that Hagar and Sarah, Ishmael and Isaac, εστιν ἀλληγορούμενα, i.e. are (1) spoken or written of in the Scriptures allegorically, or (2) interpreted allegorically (with his approval) in his own day; and, in treating them (somewhat after Philo’s manner upon the same subject) as representing two different covenants, one of the present and the other of the future Jerusalem, he approximates to the Alexandrian philosophical practice of allegorizing concrete things, persons, and events into abstract ideas: but only approximates; for not only is he clearly historical and typical in his basis, and homiletical in his aim, but, if συστοιχεί refers (as some think) to the numerical value of the letters according to the Rabbinic Gematria, he is, even here, Palestinian rather than Alexandrian in his method of interpretation. In the Ep. to the Hebrews the influence of Philo and Alexandria comes out more definitely. The writer is an ‘idealist whose heaven is the home of all transcendental realities, whose earth is full of their symbols, and these are most abundant where earth is most sacred—in the temple (or tabernacle) and worship of his people.’ He is Alexandrian in his frequent contrasts between the invisible (11¹), imperishable (8⁸ 9²³ 12²⁸), archetypal world (8²), and the visible (11³), perishable (12²⁷) world of appearance (11³), the imperfect copy (ὑπόδειγμα) of the former (9²³ 8⁵); or, again, between Judaism as the shadow (σκία) and Christianity as the nearest earthly approximation (εἰκὼν) to the heavenly substance (τὰ ἐρουπάνια) (8⁵ 10¹); and the allegory of Melchizedek, based not on the historical personage so much as on the nature of the two passing allusions to him, combined with the significance of the great silence elsewhere in the OT as to his birth and descent, as well as of the two names Melchizedek and Salem,—all these together being made the foundation of a logical construction of the person and work of Christ as an embodiment of the preconceived idea,—can hardly be considered without regard to Philo's treatment of Melchizedek as an allegory of his apparently impersonal Logos. And yet, with the expression in the 110th Psalm before us, 'Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek,' we must allow Dr. Westcott a certain margin of justification when he maintains that the treatment of Melchizedek is typical rather than allegorical; though he appears to be too sweeping when he affirms, 'There is no allegory in this epistle.' ALLEMETH (אַלְמֶת), AV Almeth, 1 Ch 6⁶⁰; Almon (אַלְמוֹן), Jos 21¹⁸.—A Levitical city of Benjamin. It is noticed with Anathoth, and is the present Almit on the hills N. of Anathoth. SWP vol. iii. sheet xvii. C. R. CONDER.

ALLIANCE.—The attitude of the Israelites to foreign nations varied greatly at different periods in their history. In early times alliances were entered into and treaties concluded without the slightest scruple. Even intermixture with alien races was so far from being tabooed, that it was one of the principal means by which the land west of the Jordan was secured. Thus we are told that Judah married and had children by the daughter of a Canaanite (Gn 38²), the tradition embodying the history of the clan in a personal narrative. Again, the condemnation of Simeon and Levi (Gn 34³⁰) is evidently due to the violation of a treaty previously entered into with Shechem (cf. the story of the Gibeonites, Jos 9², 2 S 21¹).

For the earliest period, then, it may be held that treaties with Canaanitish clans were frequent and general. On the other hand, they played an important part in the internal history of the Hebrews. Israel was by no means at first so homogeneous as is often supposed: the tribes, practically independent of each other, were gradually knit together by circumstances. Common dangers led to common action on the part of two or more of them: the leaders conferred together, or the chief of the strongest clan, or of the one most immediately threatened, assumed the headship, and the way was prepared for a close confederation. The times of the Judges furnish ample evidence of this, and the monarchy had no other foundation. A very curious alliance, and one that proves both the looseness of the Heb. confederacy and the readiness with which relations were entered into with foreigners, is that between David and Achish, king of Gath (1 S 27²). Under it, David was prepared to fight, on behalf of the traditional enemies of his race, against the Benjamite kingdom of Saul. That he did not, was apparently due solely to the suspicions of his fidelity entertained by the lords of the Philistines.

When the monarchy became settled and comparatively powerful under Solomon, treaties with foreigners, in the stricter sense, became frequent. Solomon himself formed an alliance with Hiram, king of Tyre (1 K 5), and it is most probable that some of his marriages, and especially that with the daughter of Pharaoh, cemented a political union. The frequency with which rebels and outlaws sought a refuge in Egypt made such a union desirable. On the other hand, the memorials of the capture of Jerus. by Shishak of Egypt disprove the conjecture that his attack on Rehoboam was made in support of Jeroboam. After the secession of the ten tribes, Israel and Judah both sought foreign assistance against each other. Asa, on being attacked by Baasha, bribed Benhadad of Syria to dissolve the alliance he had previously formed with Israel, and to join him in his war with that country. It was not until the reigns of Jehoshaphat and Ahab that the two countries found themselves in accord, and fought side by side against the heathen. Their union was, of course, purely political: it had nothing to do with religious or sentimental considerations. Ahab could also form, or maintain, an alliance with the king of Phœnicia, and build an altar to Baal as the guardian and avenger of the treaty (1 K 16³¹). With the entrance of the Assyrians on the scene, a new series of alliances is begun. Jehu's tribute to Shalmaneser was that of a vassal rather than an ally, and Menahem seems to have bribed Tiglath-pileser to aid him against his own subjects (2 K 15¹⁹). At this point, however, the prophets begin to inveigh against these alliances (cf. especially Hos 8⁹, Is 30²⁵), and the national exclusiveness is finally perfected by Ezra and his school. J. MILLAR.

ALLON.—1. (Β ἄλλον, Α ἄδων, AV Allom), 1 Es 5³⁴.—His descendants are the last named among the children of Solomon's servants who returned with Zerubbabel. He may be the same as Ami (אֲמִי 'Hmel), the last named in the parallel list in Ezr 2⁶⁷, or Amon (אֲמוֹן 'Hmelu), Neh 7⁶⁸; but the eight preceding names in 1 Es have no parallels in the canonical books, so that the identification is doubtful. Fritzsche conjectures ἰσὶ ἀλλων, meaning 'etc.' 2. A Simeonite prince, 1 Ch 4³⁷. H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

ALLOW.—Two distinct Lat. words, allaudare, to praise, approve, and allocare, to place (the latter through the French alouer), assumed in Eng. the same form 'allow.' Consequently in the five occurrences of this word in AV there are two distinct meanings. 1. To approve: Ro 7¹⁵ 'For that which I do, I a. not' (Gr. γινώσκω, hence RV 'know not'); Ro 14²² 'Happy is he that condemneth not himself in that thing which he ath' (RV 'approveth'); 1 Th 2⁴; and Lk 11⁴⁸ 'Ye a. the deeds (RV 'consent unto the works') of your fathers.' Cf. Ps 11⁵ Pr. Bk. 'The Lord ath (AV and RV 'trieth') the righteous.' 2. To place before one so as to see and admit it, to acknowledge, accept: Ac 24¹⁵ 'Which they themselves also a.' (Gr. προσδέχομαι, RV 'look for,' m. 'accept'). Allowable (not in AV or RV) is found in Pref. of AV='worthy of approval.' Allowance is also in Pref. AV=approval, and has been introduced by RV at Jer 52³⁴ in the mod. sense of 'portion' (AV 'diet'). Cf. 1 Es 1⁷.

AL MODAD (אֶל מוֹדָד), the first-named son of Joktan, Gn 10²⁶, 1 Ch 1²⁰. The context seems to imply that some tribe or district of S. Arabia is meant, but the name has not hitherto been identified with certainty. The first element has been variously explained as the Arab. article (this is perhaps intended by the Massoretic punctuation; so Dillmann on Gn 10²⁶), as the Sem. El ('God'; so Halévy), and as the Arab. al ('family'; so Glaser, Skizze, ii. 425). The second element seems clearly to be a derivative of the verb wadd (to love), of the same stem as the name Wadd, a god of the Minæans and other Arabian races. As a word that can be read Maudad is applied in inscriptions to the Gebanites in their relation to the kings of Ma'in, Glaser suggests that the name should be rendered 'the family to whom the office of Maudad,' i.e. some priesthood of Wadd, 'was assigned,' and that the tribe should be identified with the Gebanites, whom he places in the S.W. corner of Arabia. Others have supposed the word to be corrupt, and have corrected it Al-Murad, the well-known name of a tribe of Yemen.

ALMON.—See ALLEMETH.

ALMON-DIBLATHAIM (אֶל מוֹדָד בְּלַחַיִם, Nu 33^{46, 47}).—A station in the journeyings, prob. identical with Beth-diblathaim, Jer 48³². The meaning of the word Diblathaim is a double cake of figs; its application to a town may indicate the appearance of the place or neighbourhood. Conder suggests 'two discs' with reference to some altar-stone or dolmen (cf. Heth and Moab, p. 262).

ALMOND (אֶמְּ שָׁהֶד). Shâkéd is, like many names of plants, used for both the plant and its fruit. Thus in Ec 12⁹ and Jer 1¹¹, the reference is to the tree, while in Gn 43¹¹, Ex 25^{33, 34} 37^{19, 20}, Nu 17⁸, the reference is to the fruit. The Arab. name for the almond is lauz. The same word occurs once in OT (Gn 30²⁷), where it is wrongly translated in AV Hazel. The Heb. equivalent, אֶמְּ, is undoubtedly another name for the almond, probably the more ancient one.

The almond, Amygdalus communis, L., belongs to the order Rosaceæ, tribe Amygdaleæ, and is a tree with an oblong or spherical comus, from fifteen to thirty feet high. The branches are somewhat straggling, especially in the wild state. The leaves are lanceolate, serrate, acute, three to four inches long, and most of them fall during the winter. About midwinter the bare tree is suddenly covered with blossoms, an inch to an inch and a half broad. Although the petals are pale pink toward their base, they are usually whitish toward their tips, and the general effect of an almond tree in blossom is white. As there are no leaves on the tree when the blossoms come out, the whole tree appears a mass of white, and the effect of a large number of them, interspersed among the dark-green foliage and golden fruit of the lemon and orange, and the feathery tops of the palms, is to give an indescribable charm to the January and February landscapes in the orchards of the large cities of Pal. and Syria. Soon after blossoming, the delicate petals begin to fall in soft, snowy showers on the ground under and around the trees, and their place is taken by the young fruit; and, at the same time, the young leaves begin to open, and the tree is covered with foliage in March. The young fruit consists of an oblong, flattened, downy pod, which often attains a length of two and a half to three inches, and a thickness of two-thirds of an inch. This pod is called in Arab. kur'aun-el-lauz, and just before ripening it has a crisp, cucumber-like consistence, and a pleasant acid taste, which are greatly liked by the people. It is hawked about the streets during the months of April and May, and eaten with great relish, especially by children. At this stage the shell of the nut is yet soft, and the kernel juicy, with a slight smack of peach-stone flavour. Very soon, however, the succulent flesh of the outer envelope loses its juice, and dries around the hardening shell, to which it forms a shrunken, leathery envelope. The kernel acquires firmness, and in early summer the nut is ripe. It is then from an inch to an inch and a half long. Almonds are, and always have been, a favourite luxury of the Orientals (Gn 43¹¹). They make a delicious confection of the hulled kernels, by beating them into a paste with sugar in a mortar. This paste, moulded into various shapes, is called hariset-el-lauz. The half kernels are spread over several sorts of blancmange, called mahallibiyeh, and nashawiyeh, and mughli. Almonds are also sugared as with us.

There are several species of wild almond in Pal. and Syria. (1) The wild state of Amygdalus communis, L., a stunted tree, with smaller blossoms and pods, and small bitter nuts. Some of the varieties of this have leaves less than an inch long. (2) A. Orientalis, Ait., a shrub with spinescent branches, small silvery leaves, and bitter nuts, three-quarters of an inch long. (3) A. lycioides, Spach, a shrub with intricate, stiff, spiny branches, linear-lanceolate, green leaves, and a bitter nut half an inch long. (4) A. spartioides, Spach, a shrub with few linear-lanceolate leaves, and bitter nuts, a little over half an inch long. All of these share more or less the peculiarities of flowering and fruiting which belong to the cultivated almond.

The Heb. word for almond signifies the 'waker,' in allusion to its being the first tree to wake to life in the winter. The word also contains the signification of 'watching' and 'hastening.' In Jer 1¹¹ the word for 'almond tree' is shâkéd, and the word for 'I will hasten' (v. 12), shôkéd, from the same root. The almond was the emblem of the divine forwardness in bringing God's promises to pass. A similar instance in the name of another rosaceous plant is the apricot, which was named from præcocia (early) on account of its blossoms appearing early in the spring, and its fruit ripening earlier than its congener the peach (Pliny, xv. 11).

The usual interpretation of Ec 12⁹ 'the almond tree shall flourish,' is that the old man's hair shall turn white like the almond tree. To this Gesenius objects, that the blossom of the almond is pink, not white. He prefers to translate the word for flourish by spurn or reject, making the old man reject the almond because he has no teeth to eat it. But this objection has no force. The pink colour of the almond blossom is very light, usually mainly at the base of the petals, and fades as they open, and the general effect of the tree as seen at a distance is snowy-white. The state of the teeth has already been alluded to (v. 3), 'and the grinders cease because they are few,' and 'the sound of the grinding is low.' We may therefore retain the beautiful imagery which brings to mind the silver hair of the aged, and draw from the snowy blossom the promise of the coming fruit.

ALMSGIVING.—i. The History of the Word.—This is interesting and instructive. The Gr. word ἐλεημοσύνη, from which alms is derived, is one of those words which owe their origin to the use of the Gr. language by Jews imbued with the religious and ethical ideas of OT. The LXX (including the Apocr.) supplies the greatest variety of examples of the senses given to it. In some passages it appears impossible to distinguish its meaning from that of ἐλεος; but ἐλεημοσύνη, as derived from the adj. ἐλεήμων, which describes a merciful man, who is himself as it were a concrete example of mercy, properly denotes the exhibition of the quality, rather than the inward feeling. It is used of God both in the sing. (Is 1²⁷ 28¹⁷, Sir 17²⁹, Bar 4²²) and in plur. [Ps 103 (Sept 102)⁶, To 3²]. A deep sense that God's goodness had been and would be proved in deeds, is specially characteristic of revealed religion; and the need for expressing this may, in part at least, have been the motive for coining the unclassical term which we are considering. It is used of men, also, to signify (1) the showing of kindness, the practice of works of mercy (Gn 47²⁹, Pr 19²² 20²³ 21²¹, Sir 7¹⁰ etc.); and (2) particular works of mercy (Pr 3⁸, Dn 4²⁴ [Eng. 4²⁷], Sir 35² [Sept. 32¹], To 1³.¹⁶ etc.). By the time at least that the books of Sir and To were written, it had come to be a quite specific description of deeds of compassion to the poor. The importance which this class of actions had acquired for religious minds is thus marked by the adoption of a special word to denote them. The LXX, however, does not supply any clear instance of the transference of the word to the actual gifts bestowed.

The LXX employs it as an equivalent not only for ἔλεος (mercy), but sometimes for words denoting righteousness, צדקה, צדקה, צדקה (Dn 4²⁴). The thought may suggest itself that we have here signs of a tendency to regard A., after the manner of the Talm., as the chief and most typical of the works whereby that righteousness may be acquired which makes man acceptable with God. But this is more than doubtful. It occurs several times where righteousness is predicated of God (Is 1²⁷ 28¹⁷ 59¹⁶). In one or more of the following passages, where words for righteousness are tr. in LXX by ἐλεημοσύνη, a human quality may be in view (Ps 33 [Sept. 32]⁵, Dt 6²⁵ 24¹³, Ps 24 [Sept. 23]⁵). But in each case a different interpretation, at least of the LXX, is possible. The conception of righteousness in OT is a large one, and not wholly definite. Under one aspect it wears almost the character of mercy. And it may have been from a more or less clear consciousness of this that the renderings just referred to were adopted. Neither in the Apocr. nor in the LXX of the canon. books do there appear to be examples of the use of δικαιοσύνη for 'almsgiving,' though it is true that ἐλεημοσύνη and δικαιοσύνη are coupled at To 2¹⁴ 12⁸.⁹ in a manner which shows a strong association of ideas between them. We have, however, an indication of this Rabbinic usage in the best supported reading of Mt 6⁴.

In NT the word is used in Mt and Lk and in Ac, but always in the sense either of A. or of alms—the actual gift (for the latter see Ac 3².²).

The Lat. Fathers, from Tertullian and Cyprian onwards, and the Old Lat. and Vulg. VSS employ the word eleemosyna, transliterated from the Gr.; only, however, in those cases where they had no exact or convenient Lat. equivalent. From Lat. eccles. usage come the various derivatives in the languages of modern Europe (Eng. alms, Fr. aumône, Germ. Almosen, Ital. limosina).

ii. Jewish Teaching.—Some consideration of this is necessary, if we would rightly appreciate the teaching of NT on the subject. Evidence of the importance which A. had acquired for religious minds among the Jews of the 2nd or 3rd cent. B.C. has already come before us in the fact that a special name was assigned to this class of actions. They had become one of the common and acknowledged observances of the religious life, a matter to be attended to by the religious man in the same regular and careful manner as prayer and fasting, with which we find A. joined (see To 12⁸, Sir 7¹⁰, and cf. the conduct of the earnest proselyte Cornelius, Ac 10².⁴). It is regarded as a specially efficacious means of making atonement for sin (Sir 3¹⁴.³⁰ 16¹⁴), and obtaining divine protection from calamity (Sir 29¹² 40²⁴, To 14¹⁰.¹¹); the merit thereof is an unfailing possession (Sir 40¹⁷); the religious reputation to be won thereby is held out as an inducement to the practice of it (Sir 31 [LXX 34]¹¹).

Such features in the estimate of A. are, if possible, still more marked in the Talm., where תקנת, righteousness, is a recognised name for A. The performance of works of mercy is set forth as a means whereby man may be accounted righteous in the sight of God, like the fulfilment of the commandments of the Law. It is even more meritorious than the latter, because it is not exactly prescribed, but left, as to its extent and amount at least, to the individual. It must not, however, be supposed that all the Rabbinic teaching on A. tends to self-righteousness. It has a better side. The superiority of those deeds of kindness in which personal sympathy is shown, and which involve the taking of trouble, over the mere bestowal of gifts, is clearly insisted on, and there are sayings which strikingly enjoin consideration for the self-respect of the recipients of bounty. (See F. Weber, System d. altsynagogalen Palästinischen Theologie, p. 273f., and A. Wünsche, Neue Beitr. z. Erläut. d. Evang. aus Talmud u. Midrasch, on Mt 6¹⁻⁴, Lk 11⁴¹ 12³⁸.)

iii. The Teaching of the NT.—In the Sermon on the Mount (as recorded in Mt), our Lord, after setting forth His New Law as a true fulfilment of the Ancient Law (5¹⁷⁻⁴⁸), proceeds to treat of certain chief religious observances from a similar point of view (6¹⁻¹⁸); and, in full accordance with the Jewish thought of the time, that one which He takes first is A. It may seem strange that He does not more directly correct the erroneous notions of merit and justification which had already become associated, in more or less definite form, with such works; and that He speaks of a divine reward for them without adding any warning against misunderstanding. He contents Himself with requiring purity of motive, indifference to and even avoidance of human praise, and self-forgetfulness. But, in truth, if we learn to test the quality of the motive for, and the manner of performing, each deed, with reference only to the judgment which God will pronounce upon it, that temper of mind, that faith and humility and sense of personal failure and sin, which alone are consistent with the principles of the gospel, will be secured. Another very significant saying of our Lord on A. is given Lk 11⁴¹. He there enjoins it as the true means of purifying material objects for our use; it is a counterpart to the ceremonial washings of the Pharisees. Lk 12³³ is the only other passage in the Gospels where the word ἐλεημοσύνη is used. But liberality in giving is frequently inculcated or commended (Mt 5⁴² 19²¹, Mk 10²¹, Lk 6³⁰.³⁸ 14¹³ 16⁹ 18²²). In the Acts the Jewish use of the term is illustrated; it does not occur there in any Christian precept. But that feature of the life of the Christian community at Jerus. in the first days, as there pictured, which has been called communism, is more properly an example of abounding charity.

In Christendom during many centuries the duty of A. (primarily, no doubt, from a desire of obeying the commands of Christ) received great, and sometimes exaggerated, attention. The danger now is rather that, through fear of the ill-effects of indiscriminate A., the disposition to give and the habit of doing so should be discouraged. A practice, however, enjoined as this one is, must permanently hold a high place in the Christian rule of life. It is the function of modern economic and social knowledge only to make its exercise more wise and beneficial.

ALMUG.—See ALGUM.

ALOES, LIGN-ALOES (אֶלְיָן 'ahālim, מִלְּחָן 'ahāloth).—The word Aloes is used four times in the OT and once in the NT. In Nu 24⁶ the Heb. word is אֶלְיָן, the LXX σκρηαί, and the AV Lign-Aloes=Lignum Aloes. In Ps 45⁸ the Heb. is מִלְּחָן, the LXX στακτή, and the AV Aloes. In Pr 7¹⁷ the Heb. is אֶלְיָן, the LXX τὸν δὲ ὄκρον, and the AV Aloes. In Ca 4¹⁴ the Heb. is מִלְּחָן, the LXX ἀλώθ, and the AV Aloes (RV agrees with AV in all).

It is clear that in the passages in Nu and Pr the LXX has followed a different reading from the MT, and has arbitrarily translated the same word stacte in the Ps and aloth (aloe) in Ca. In face of the practical identity of the words 'ahālim and 'ahāloth, it is fair to reject the various capricious renderings of the LXX, and assume that the word has the same meaning in all the four OT passages. In the last three of these passages, and in the NT (Jn 19³⁹), the reference is plainly to the aromatic.

Celsius (Hierobot. i. 135) argues that this substance is the Aquilaria Agallocha, the Lignum Aloes or Aloes Wood of commerce. This wood was well known to the ancients, and is described under its Arab. name 'ūd in considerable detail by Avicenna (ii. 231), in brief as follows: 'Wood and woody roots are brought from China and India and Arabia; and some of it is dotted and blackish; and it is aromatic, styptic, and slightly bitter; and it is covered with a leathery bark. The best variety is from Mandalay, and comes from the interior of India. The next best is that which is called Indian, which comes from the mountains; and it has this advantage over the Mandalay variety, that it does not breed maggots. Some persons do not distinguish between the Mandalay and the better kinds of Indian. Among the good kinds of 'ūd are the Samandury, which comes from China on the borders of India, and the komary from India, and the kākilly, and the kadmury, and of inferior species the Hillyay and the Mabīṭay, and the Lawāfy and the Rabṭāfy. To sum up, the best 'ūd is that which sinks in water, and that which floats is bad. It is said that the trunks and roots of the 'ūd are buried until the woody fibre decays, leaving only the aromatic substance.' Avicenna follows this description with a detailed account of the medicinal and other properties of the aloes wood. He alludes to the wood also under the heading Aghālūji, which is undoubtedly the ἀγάλλοχον of the Greeks, and the Agallochum of the Romans. The substance is now known to the Arabs by the names 'ūd-es-ṣalīb, 'ūd-en-nadd, 'ūd-el-bakhūr, and el-'ūd-el-komāri.

The order Aquilariaceæ supplies several trees, which produce commercial aloes wood. The most noted of these is Aquilaria Agallocha, Roxb., a native of Northern India, which grows to a height of 120 ft. Aquilaria secundaria, of China, produces some of the varieties alluded to by Avicenna. It is a well-known fact that the fragrance of the wood of the species of Aquilaria is developed by decay, a process which is hastened by burying the wood, as above alluded to by Avicenna. While we have no positive proof that the aloes wood is the aromatic intended by the Heb. original, there is no good reason why it should not be. The similarity of 'ahāloth to ἀγάλλοχον is sufficient to establish a strong probability in its favour, and in the absence of any other probable candidate it may be received with a fair measure of confidence.

It must be understood that the above-mentioned plant has no connexion philologically or botanically with Excæcaria agallocha, D.C., of the order of Euphorbiaceæ, an acrid, poisonous, non-aromatic plant. Nor has it anything to do with the officinal Aloes, of the order Liliaceæ, a plant not alluded to in the Bible.

There remains the difficulty of the passage in Nu 24⁶ 'as gardens by the river's side, as the trees of lign-aloes (אֶלְיָן) which the Lord hath planted, and as cedar trees (צִדְדִּים) beside the waters.' The LXX has rendered the word σκρηαί as if written אֶלְיָן, which means tents; but besides the irregularity and inconsistency of the LXX in the translation of the word in the other passages in the OT, it would be strange that, in a triple parallelism of the intensive and climacteric order, beginning with gardens and ending with the prince of trees, the royal cedar, the word tents, instead of a kind of trees, should be interjected. We may dismiss this as wholly improbable.

We have also to remember that the same names may be used for more than one object in nature. This is pointed out in detail in our article on the Algum. In the Eng. name Aloe, for the plant now under consideration, and for the officinal Aloes, we have an instance of two very different plants, of widely diverse properties, bearing the same name. It is then quite possible that the tree of Numbers might be totally different from the aromatic substance of the other passages. In Eng. the labiate genus Melissa is called balm. Impatiens is called balsam. Populus balsamifera, L., var. candicans, is called balm of Gilead, a very different plant from the balm of Gilead of Scripture, and the word balm is applied to many diverse substances. There is nothing, however, to prevent the supposition that the tree of Numbers is that which produced the substance of the other passages. It is true that the tree is one of tropical Arabia, India, or China. But Balaam's prophecy was uttered in full view of the tropical valley of the Jordan, where the climate would have made it quite possible to cultivate these trees. There is nothing to forbid the idea that this and other trees not now known in Pal. were cultivated in the then wealthy and populous Jordan Valley. At least twenty-five distinctly tropical wild plants are indigenous in this valley. In describing his bride, Solomon compares her with a garden in which were pomegranates, camphire (henna), spikenard, saffron, calamus, cinnamon, with all kinds of frankincense, myrrh, and all the chief spices (Ca 4^{13, 14}). Balaam might have looked over such a plantation when he made his tristich.

On the other hand, it is not necessary to assume that he saw the trees to which he alludes, or that either he or the Israelites were familiar with them. In the climax he mentions the cedar, doubtless the cedar of Lebanon. It is unlikely that he had ever seen one. It is certain that the Israelites had not. But it was a well-known tree, and suitable for the comparison. The allusion to the 'cedar trees beside the waters' shows that the picture is ideal and poetical, as cedars grow in dry places on the lofty mountain sides, and never by water-courses. The aloes tree might have been equally well known by reputation, although unfamiliar both to Balaam and the Israelites personally. It is quite certain that the spice trade was very active through the Syrian and Arabian deserts in ancient times, and the spices and aromatics therefore far more familiar to the people of the border lands of Pal. and Syria than now. So that whether the plants of Nu 24⁶ and Ca 4^{13, 14} were cultivated or not, they were well known, and comparisons based on them well understood.

ALOFT is found only in 1 Es 8⁹² 'and now is all Israel a.'; RVm 'exalted,' with a ref. to Dt 28¹³ 'thou shalt be above (same Gr. word in LXX ἐπάνω) only, and thou shalt not be beneath.'

J. HASTINGS.

ALONG.—In Jg 7¹² we read 'all the children of the east, lay a. in the valley like grasshoppers (RV "locusts") for multitude,' and in v.¹⁵ 'the tent lay a.' The same verb (=to fall) is used in Heb., and the Eng. phrase was prob. intended to have the same meaning in both phrases, andlang (Ger. entlang), at length, all the length. Cf. Jth 13².

J. HASTINGS.

ALPHA AND OMEGA.—This phrase is found in Rev 1⁸ 21⁶ 22¹³. In the first passage it is used of God the Father, in the other two of the Son. In the TR it wrongly appears in Rev 1¹. This phrase calls for treatment in two respects: (1) as to its form, (2) as to its meaning.

1. That the form of the phrase was familiar, or, at all events, easily intelligible from the outset, is clear from later Heb. analogies. But before we touch on these it is worth observing that a kindred idiom is found in contemporary Latin literature. Thus in Martial v. 26 we find:

Quod alpha dixi, Codre, pænulatorum
Te nuper, aliqua cum jocularer in charta;
Si forte bilem movit hic tibi versus,
Dicas licebit beta me togatorum.

Cf. also ii. 57, and Theodoret, HE iv. 8, ἡμεῖς μὲν ἐρησάμεθα τῷ ἄλφα μέχρι τοῦ ω. Amongst the later Jews the whole extent of a thing was often expressed by the first and last letters of the alphabet. Thus (Schoettgen, Hor. Heb. in loc.) אָ was a name of the Shechinah, because it embraced all the letters. Acc. to the Jalkut Rub. fol. 17. 4 Adam transgressed the whole law אָ אָ from aleph to tau: acc. to fol. 48. 4 Abraham observed the whole law from aleph to tau; and, fol. 128. 3, when God blesses Israel He does it from aleph to tau (i.e. the initial and closing letters of Lv 26³⁻¹³, in which the blessings on Israel are pronounced), but when He curses Israel He does so from vav to mem (see Lv 26¹⁴⁻⁴⁵). We may therefore reasonably infer that the title 'Alpha and Omega' is a Gr. rendering of a corresponding Heb. expression.

2. The thought conveyed in this title is essentially that of Is 44⁶, אָנִי אֶהְיֶה רִאשׁוֹן וְאֲחֵר אֲנִי 'I am the first and I am the last' (cf. 41⁴ 43²⁰). The phrase thus signifies 'the Eternal One.' It is thus expounded by Aretas (see Cramer's Catenæ Græcæ in NT on Rev 1⁸: Ἄλφα διὰ τὸ ἀρχὴν εἶναι, ὅτι καὶ τὸ ἄλφα ἀρχὴ τῶν ἐν γράμματι στοιχείων ὦ διὰ τὸ τέλος τῶν αὐτῶν. ἀρχὴν δὲ καὶ τέλος τίς οὐκ ἂν ἐννοήσοι τὸ πρῶτος σημαίνεσθαι καὶ τὸ ἔσχατος; διὰ τοῦ πρῶτος δέ, τὸ ἀναρχος ἐννοεῖται, ὡς καὶ διὰ τοῦ ἔσχατου τὸ ἀτελεύτητος. In Tertullian, Monog. 5, there is the following interesting exposition: Sic et duas Græciæ litteras, summam et ultimam, sibi induit dominus, initii et finis concurrentium in se figuras, uti, quemadmodum A ad Ω usque volvitur et rursus Ω ad A replicatur, ita ostenderet in se esse et initii decursum ad finem et finis recursum ad initium, ut omnis dispositio in eum desinens ad quem coepta est, per sermonem scilicet dei qui caro factus est, proinde desinat quemadmodum et coepit.

Cf. also Cyprian, Testim. ii. 1, 6, 22; iii. 100; Paulinus of Nola, Carm. 19. 645; 30. 89; Prudentius, Cathem. ix. 10-12.

Corde natus ex Parentis, ante mundi exordium
Alpha et Ω cognominatus, Ipse fons et clausula Omnium quæ sunt fuerunt quæque post futura sunt.

Although in Rev 1⁸ this title is used of God the Father, it seems to be confined to the Son in Patristic and subsequent literature.

R. H. CHARLES.

ALPHABET is a word derived from alpha and beta, the names of the first two letters in Greek, in which they are meaningless, being adaptations of the corresponding Sem. letter-names aleph, an ox, and beth, a house. This etymology discloses much of the history of the A., which originated among a Sem. people, by whom it was transmitted to the Greeks and by them to the Romans, whose A., with a few trifling modifications, we still use.

It is now known that all the alphabets in the world, some 200 in number, are descended from a primitive Sem. A., usually styled the Phœn. A., or the A. of Israel.

The universal belief, or possibly the tradition of the ancient world, as reported by Plato, Tacitus, Plutarch, and other writers, was that the Phœnicians had obtained the A. from Egypt. This seemed so probable that after the hieroglyphic writing had been recovered and deciphered, repeated attempts were made to show how the transmission might have been effected. This, however, proved to be no easy task. At the time of the Heb. Exodus, the hieroglyphic picture-writing was already a venerable system of vast antiquity. Existing inscriptions make it possible to trace it back to the time of the 2nd dynasty, some 6000 years ago, when it already appears in great perfection, arguing a prolonged period of antecedent development. Setting aside a multitude of ideographic picture-signs, there are about 400 pictorial phonograms, of which 45 had emerged out of the syllabic stage, and had attained a sort of alphabetic character; that is, they either denoted vowels, or were capable of being associated with more than one vowel sound. Of these, 25 were in more universal use than the rest, and it was mainly out of these, as we shall see, that the letters of the A. were developed.

To a French Egyptologist, Emanuel de Rougé, belongs the honour of having discovered the probable method by which the Sem. A. was evolved out of the Egyp. writing. De Rougé pointed out that the immediate prototypes of the Phœn. letters were not to be found, as had been supposed, in the pictorial Hieroglyphs of the monuments, or in the well-known cursive Hieratic of the Middle Empire, but in an older and more deformed Hieratic script which prevailed in the time of the Early Empire, — a form of writing so ancient that it had already fallen into disuse before the Heb. Exodus. This obscure and difficult script is chiefly known to us from a single MS., now in the National Library at Paris. It goes by the name of the Papyrus Prisse, having been presented to the Library by M. Prisse d'Avennes, who obtained it at Thebes, where it was found in a tomb as old as the 11th dynasty. It is therefore older by many centuries than the time of Moses, older than the invasion of the Shepherd kings, and older probably than the date usually assigned to Abraham.

Forty-five of the Egyp. Hieroglyphics had acquired, as we have seen, a semi-alphabetic character, and De Rougé contended that the Hieratic representatives of 21 of the most suitable of these Hieroglyphs were selected, and employed by some Sem. people as the prototypes of the A. they constructed, only one of the 22 letters being due to a non-Egyptian source. These Hieratic characters, traced from the Papyrus Prisse, are given in col. 2 of the table, and the corresponding Hieroglyphs, which face the other way, will be found in col. 1.

The oldest Sem. forms with which we are acquainted are shown in col. 3. In comparing them with their assumed Hieratic prototypes it must be remembered that they are not contemporary forms, but are separated by at least ten, or more probably by twelve centuries, a period during which considerable differences of form must almost necessarily have arisen, in addition to which the Hieratic forms are cursive, freely traced on papyrus with a brush, while the Sem. letters are lapidary types, engraved with a chisel upon stone or bronze, which would entail differences of form similar to those which exist between our printed capitals A, B, E and the script forms a, b, e of our modern handwriting. This alone would account for the alterations in the shapes of such letters as daleth, heth, resh, or mem, the change from a cursive to a lapidary type causing the characters to become more regular in size and inclination, bold curves being simplified, closed ovals becoming triangles or squares, and the curved sweeping tails becoming straight and rigid lines.

For 21 of the 22 letters of the Sem. alphabet De Rougé has found a prob. Hieratic prototype, in 18 cases taking the normal Egyp. equivalent of the Sem. sound, and in 3 instances only, aleph, beth, and zayin, having recourse to a less usual homophone. In one case he fails. The peculiar guttural breathing denoted by the Sem. letter ayin did not exist in Egyp. speech. For this letter no Egyp. prototype has been discovered, and it is supposed that it was an invention of the Semites, the symbol \bigcirc being regarded, as the name suggests, as the picture of an 'eye.' (See No. 16, col. 3.)

How, when, or by whom the Sem. A. was thus evolved from the Egyp. Hieratic it is impossible to say with precision. The possible limits of date are believed to lie between the 23rd and the 17th centuries B.C. It seems probable that the development was effected by some Sem. people who were in commercial intercourse with the Egyptians,—possibly, it has been conjectured, the Semites of S. Arabia, possibly the Hyksos, if these Shepherd kings were Semites, and not, as is now supposed, of Mongolian race, hardly the Hebrews, who seem to be excluded by the limits of date, but most probably a Phœn. trading colony settled on the shores of Lake Menzaleh in the Delta. On the Egyp. monuments they are called Fenekh (Phœnicians), and also Char or Chal, a name used to designate the coast tribes of Syria. The native land of the Char was called Kaft, whence part of the Delta was called Caphtor, or the 'greater Kaft.' If the A. arose in Caphtor it would easily spread to Phœnicia, and then to the kindred and neighbouring races.

The art of writing must, however, have been known to the Hebrews at an early period of their history. Hiram, we are told, wrote a letter to Solomon, and David wrote a letter to Joab. From the lists of the kings and dukes of Edom, preserved in Gn 36 and 1 Ch 1, we gather that the Edomites, at the time when their capital was taken by Joab in the reign of David, possessed state annals, going back to a remote period. The list of the encampments of the Israelites in the Desert, given in Nu 33, cannot have been handed down by oral tradition; while it is the only incorporated document in the Pent. which we are expressly told was written down by Moses, and its geogr. correctness has been curiously confirmed by recent researches. The census of the congregation preserved in Nu 1-4 and 26 is also manifestly a very ancient written record which has been incorporated in the text. All these documents were presumably written in the primitive Sem. A. But the discoveries of the last few years have led scholars to believe that non-alphabetic writing of another kind was used in Pal. long before the Exodus, as early as the reign of Khu-n-Aten, the recent excavations at Lachish and the discoveries at Tel el-Amarna proving that the governors of the Syrian cities corresponded with the Egyp. kings in a cursive form of the Babylonian cuneiform.

The oldest known forms of the Sem. letters are shown in col. 3 of the table, where their names and their approximate phonetic values may also be found.

Thirteen may be represented by letters in our own Alphabet. These are beth, gimel, daleth, he, zayin, kaph, lamed, mem, nun, samekh, pe, resh, and tau, which correspond to our letters b, g, d, h, z, k, l, m, n, s, p, r, and t. The other nine letters represent sounds which we do not exactly possess. Of these, two are called 'linguals,' or 'emphatics,' namely, teth, a gutturalised t, which is called the emphatic dental, and zade, a gutturalised s, called the emphatic sibilant. The letter koph was not our g, but a k formed farther back in the throat, and here represented by k. There are also four 'faucal breaths,' 'aleph, he, heth, and 'ayin, of which 'aleph, the lightest, was a slightly explosive consonant, heard in English after the word No! when uttered abruptly, and nearly equivalent to the spiritus lenis of the Greeks; 'ayin was a sound of the same kind, but harder than 'aleph, approaching a g rolled in the throat; heth, called the 'fricative faucal,' was a continuous guttural, resembling the ch in the Scotch loch; and he was a fainter sound of the same kind, approaching our h. The primitive sound of shin was probably that of our sh, but was subject to dialectic variation. Yod and vau were semi-consonants, or rather consonantal vowels, usually equivalent to y and v, but passing readily into i and u.

None of the Sem. A.s have possessed symbols for the true vowels, which are now denoted, not by letters, but by diacritical points, a notation essentially non-alphabetic, and not of any great antiquity. The vowels in non-Semitic A.s, such as Greek, Zend, Armenian, Georgian, Sanskrit, and Mongolian, have been developed out of characters representing the Sem. breaths and semi-consonants. Thus the Gr. alpha, whence our A, was obtained from 'aleph, the spiritus lenis; epsilon, whence our E, is from he, an aspirate; eta and our H from heth, the fricative faucal; iota and our I and J from yod, a semi-consonant; omicron and omega, and our O, from 'ayin, the spiritus asper; while upsilon and our U, V, W, Y, and F, came from vau, a semi-consonant.

Besides the absence of symbols for the vowels, most of the Sem. scripts, Heb., Syr., and Arab., agree in being written from right to left, the direction following the example of the prototype, the Hieratic of the Papyrus Prisse, whereas in the non-Sem. scripts the direction has mostly been changed. The Sem. A.s have also adhered to the primitive 22 letters, none of which have fallen into disuse, any additional notation required being effected by diacritical points, whereas in other scripts new forms have been evolved by differentiation, as in the case of our own letters V, U, W, Y, and F, which are all differentiated forms of the same symbol.

The pictorial character of the Hieroglyphs had disappeared in the Hieratic of the Papyrus Prisse, and hence it is no matter for surprise to find that the Egyp. symbols were renamed by the Semites, on the acrologic principle, by words significant in Sem. speech, the new names being due to a resemblance, real or fanciful, between the form assumed by the letter and some object whose name began with the letter in question, as in our nursery picture-books, in which O is an orange, S a swan, and B a butterfly. Thus the first symbol was no longer ahom, the 'eagle,' as in Egyp., but became 'aleph, the 'ox,' from the resemblance to the front view of the head and horns of that animal; and the 13th, instead of being mulak, the 'owl,' became mem, the 'waters,' what had been the ears and beak of the owl coming to resemble the undulations of waves (see col. 2 and 3). The Sem. names are sometimes more easily explained by the Egyp. forms of the Papyrus Prisse than by those in the oldest Sem. inscriptions. The Sem. names are usually interpreted as follows: aleph means an 'ox'; beth signifies a 'house'; and gimel, a 'camel,' the Hieratic form resembling a recumbent camel, with the head, neck, body, tail, and saddle, of which only the head and neck are preserved in the oldest Sem. letter; daleth means a 'door,' not a house door, but the curtain forming the entrance to an Eastern tent; he signifies a 'window'; vau is a nail, peg, or hook for hanging things on; zayin probably denotes 'weapons'; heth, a fence or 'palisade'; teth, from a root meaning curvature, is supposed to have been a picture of a coiled snake; yod is the 'hand'; kaph the 'palm' of the hand, or the bent hand; lamed is an 'ox-goat'; mem, the 'waters'; nun, a 'fish'; samekh is probably a prop or support; ayin is the 'eye'; pe, the 'mouth'; zade is probably a 'javelin,' or perhaps a hook; koph is usually supposed to mean a 'knot'; resh is the 'head'; shin, the 'teeth'; tau, a 'cross,' or sign for marking beasts. It will be noticed that six of these names, gimel, he, yod, nun, pe, and samekh, must be very ancient, being most easily explained by reference to the Hieratic forms.

The early history of the A. has to be reconstructed from inscriptions, many of which have only been discovered in recent years. Among the monuments of the older stage of the Phœn. A. the great inscription of Mesha, king of Moab, ranks first in importance. In 1868 Mr. Klein, of the C. M. S., visited the site of Dibon, the ancient capital of the kingdom of Moab. Here he was shown a block of basalt, with an inscription in 34 lines of writing. The interest excited by this discovery, and the rival efforts of the European consuls to secure the treasure, unfortunately aroused the jealousy of the Arabs, by whom the stone was broken into fragments, some forty of which have been recovered, enough to lay the foundation of early Sem. palæography. In this inscription, which must be referred to the middle of the 9th cent. B.C., Mesha, in language closely akin to Bibl. Hebrew, gives an account of the wars between Israel and Moab, narrating more esp. those events in his own reign which took place after the death of Ahab in 853 B.C. The year 850 B.C. has been generally accepted by scholars as an approximate date for the record. Somewhat earlier, though of less historical importance, are some inscribed fragments of bronze vessels, obtained from Cyprus in 1876, which proved to be portions of two bowls containing dedications to Baal Lebanon. They must have been carried off to Cyprus as a part of the spoils from a temple on Lebanon. The writing on one of the bowls proves on palæographical grounds to be nearly of the same date as the Moabite inscription, while that on the other bowl exhibits more archaic forms of several letters, and may probably be older by a century, belonging to the close of the 10th or the beginning of the 11th cent. B.C. It is from these bowls, supplemented by the evidence of the Moabite Stone, that the A. in col. 3 has been constructed.

It is called the Israelitic A. in order to avoid confusion with a much later A., which, having been first known to scholars, usurped the name of the Heb. A. It cannot be too carefully remembered that at successive periods in their history the Hebrews employed two A.s, identical in all essential particulars, but wholly unlike in the external appearance of the letters. From the earliest period of which we possess any knowledge, down to the captivity in Babylon, this Phœn. A., of which the oldest monuments are the Moabite

Stone and the Baal Lebanon bowls, must also have been the contemporary A. of the Hebrews. This was ingeniously proved by Gesenius, long before these monuments were discovered. He contended that the earlier books of the OT could not have been written, as was formerly supposed, in what is now known as the Heb. A., since many obvious corruptions in the text could only have arisen from the errors of copyists, who confounded letters which are much alike in the old Phœn., but are quite dissimilar in the square Hebrew. For example, in the list of David's mighty men, recorded in 2 S 23²⁹, we have the name Heleb, which in the parallel passage in 1 Ch 11³⁰ appears as Heled. One of these readings is obviously corrupt, and the corruption can only be due to the original record having been written in the older or Phœn. A., in which the letters beth and daleth differ so slightly as often to be hardly distinguishable, whereas in the later or square Heb. A. the letters כ and ד are unmistakably distinct. Hence, he argued, the record must be prior to the Captivity, when, according to the Rabbinic tradition, the new A. was introduced. When Gesenius wrote, the evidence as to the nature of the older Heb. A. was scanty in the extreme, being limited to a few engraved gems in the Phœn. A., supposed to be Heb. because of their bearing names apparently Jewish. Now, however, all doubts have been set at rest by the accidental discovery in 1880 of the famous Siloam inscription, engraved in a recess of the tunnel which pierces the ridge of Ophel, and brings water from the Pool of the Virgin to the Pool of Siloam. The inscription which records the construction of the tunnel is in six lines of writing, manifestly later in date than the Moabite inscription, though of the same type. On palæographical grounds it has been assigned to the reign of Manasseh, B.C. 685-641, though it is possible that it may be as early as the reign of Hezekiah, and may refer to the conduit constructed by him at the end of the 8th cent., as recorded in 2 K 20²⁰ and 2 Ch 32³⁰. This A. is of special interest, as in it most of the writings of the Jewish prophets must have been composed. This older A. lingered long, being employed on the coins of the Maccabees and on those of the Hasmonæan princes. It survives as the sacred script of the few Samaritan families at Nablûs, who still worship in their temple on Mt. Gerizim, and keep the Passover with the ancient rites. With this exception, the old Phœn. A., the parent of all existing A.s, has become extinct.

This earliest type of the Sem. A. gradually passes into another, somewhat more cursive, which goes by the name of the Sidonian, its chief representative being the great inscription on the magnificent basalt sarcophagus of Eshmunazar, king of Sidon, now in the Louvre, which is assigned to the end of the 5th cent. B.C. Out of this Sidonian type was evolved the Aramæan A., which was destined to replace the Phœn. after the decadence of the Phœn. power. The great trade route from the Red Sea and Egypt to Babylon passed through Damascus, Hamath, and Carchemish, and the trade fell into the hands of the Aramæans, the people of N. Syria. Hence, on the political decline of the Phœn. cities, the Aramæan language and A. became the medium of commercial intercourse throughout W. Asia. At Nineveh in the 7th cent. B.C., and at Babylon in the 6th, the Sidonian type begins to be replaced by the Aramæan, whose continuous development may be traced from the 5th to the 1st cent. B.C., first on the coins struck by Persian satraps of Asia Minor, and then by the aid of mortuary inscriptions and papyri from Egypt, which carry on the record after the conquests of Alexander had put an end to the Persian satrapies. An inspection of col. 4 in the table will show that the chief characteristics of the Aramæan A.—due evidently to the free use of the reed pen and papyrus—are a progressive opening of the closed loops of the letters beth, daleth, teth, ayin, koph, and resh; while he, vau, zayin, heth, and tau tend to lose their distinctive bars. At the same time the script continually becomes more cursive in character, the tails of the letters curving more and more to the left, while the introduction of ligatures led to a distinction between the final and the medial or initial forms of certain letters. These changes, while they made writing easier and more rapid, at the same time made it less legible.

On the return of the Jews from the Bab. exile, the ancient A. of Israel, though retained on the Maccabæan coins, and possibly in copies of the law, was gradually abandoned for the more cursive but far inferior Aramæan, which had become the mercantile script of the W. provinces of Persia. A Jewish tradition, preserved in the Talm., attributed this change to Ezra; but there can be no doubt that both scripts were for a time employed concurrently—the Aramæan by the mercantile classes and the returning exiles, and the older A. by those who, like the Samaritans, had been left behind in the land.

The older Phœn. style had fortunately been transmitted to the Greeks before the Aramæan deformation had taken place. Consequently the Rom. A. which we have inherited, being a Western form of the Greek A., has retained in such letters as B, D, O, Q, R, E, F, H those loops and bars whose disappearance in the Heb., Syr., Arab., and other A.s descended from the Aramæan, has contributed to make them so illegible. Our own capitals are, in fact, much nearer to the primitive Phœn. or Isr. A. than any of the existing Sem. A.s, and it is to this retention of the archaic forms that they owe their excellence and general superiority. The closed loop of D and R and the upper loop of B reproduce the closed triangles of the earlier Sem. script, which were lost by the Aramæan deformation, and are consequently much superior to the formless shapes ד ר ב which we have in modern Hebrew.

When the Seleucid empire had come to a close, the Aramæan broke up into national scripts, the A. of Eastern Syria developing at Bozra, Petra, and the Hauran into the Nabataean, which was the parent of Arabic, while the Aramæan of N. Syria developed at Edessa into Syriac, and that of S. Syria, at Jerus. and Bab., into what is called Hebrew. The early form of square Heb. used at Jerus. in the time of our Lord, with which He must Himself have been familiar, and in which probably the roll was written which He read in the synagogue (Lk 4¹⁷), is given in col. 5 of the table. This A. has been obtained from monuments of the Herodian period found in Galilee or at Jerus., all of which must be anterior to the siege by Titus. These inscriptions are chiefly from tombs; but one of them, of special interest, is a fragment of one of the notices, enjoining silence and reverent behaviour, set up, as we learn from Josephus, when the temple was rebuilt by Herod.

The materials for the history of the Heb. A. during the period of the dispersion, from the 1st cent. to the 10th, when it practically assumed its present form, have been gathered from regions curiously remote. Some are from the Jewish Catacombs at Rome, many from the Crimea, others from the Jewish cemeteries at Vienne, Arles, and Narbonne in Gaul, at Tortosa in Spain, Venosa in Italy, from Prag, Aden, Tifis, and Derbend, and, not least in importance, the writing on some cabalistic bowls found at Babylon, dating from the 4th to the 7th cent. A.D. (see col. 6). The earliest existing codex, the A. of which is given in col. 7, dates from the beginning of the 10th cent., when the letters had practically assumed their modern forms though not their modern aspect, the useless ornamental apices in our printed books (col. 8) being due to the schools of Heb. caligraphy which arose in the 12th cent. The square Heb. of our printed Bibles is thus one of the most modern of existing A.s, and was not, as was formerly believed, the most ancient of all. The forms of these letters are thus neither legible nor venerable. Their adoption was almost a matter of accident. There were two styles, the Spanish and the German, and the latter was used in the Münster printed Bible, the types being imitated from those in MSS. then in fashion. The result is that our eyes are fatigued with the fantastic and vicious caligraphy of the 14th cent., a period when the odious black letter was developed out of the beautiful Caroline minuscule, to which in our printed books we have now fortunately reverted. So in Heb. it would have been much better to have reverted to the far superior forms of earlier times, such, for instance, as those in use in the 8th cent. The earlier forms are better, because the letters are free from useless ornamental flourishes which are so trying to the eyes of students and compositors, and are more legible and more distinct. As in the case of our own vicious black letter, some characters are assimilated so as to be difficult to distinguish—in particular ב beth , כ kaph ; נ nun , ג gimel ; ד daleth , ר resh ; ך kaph final , ן nun final ; ו vau , ז zayin ; or of ם samekh , and מ mem final ; while ה ה and ח ח stand for h, h, and t.

Six of the Heb. letters gradually acquired an alternative softer aspirated sound, and the harder primitive sounds are now denoted by an internal point (Dagesh lene) ב ג ד כ פ ט , representing the sounds b, g, d, k, p, t, the same forms without the Dagesh, or with a superscript line called Raphe, standing for bh, gh, dh, kh, ph, th. The letter shin also split up into two sounds, distinguished by diacritical points, שׁ approaching the sound of our s, and שׂ that of our sh.

The vowel points are late and of little authority. The Greek transliterations of Heb. names in the Sept. and in Josephus suffice to prove that there were no vowel points in the copies of the Heb. Scriptures then in use, and as late as the time of St. Jerome the Heb. vocalisation was only known by oral teaching. The Heb. points were suggested by those which had been introduced into Syriac in the 5th and 6th cent. A.D. They merely represent the traditional pronunciation used in the synagogues of Tiberias in the 7th cent. A.D. (See art. LANGUAGE OF OT.) ISAAC TAYLOR.

ALPHÆUS, Ἀλφαῖος (Westcott and Hort, Introd. § 408, assuming that the name is a transliteration of the Aramaic אֶפְיָא, write it with the rough breathing, Ἀλφαῖος), occurs four times in the Gospels and once in Acts. As thus used it is the name of two different men.

1. The father of the Apostle Matthew or Levi (Mk 2¹⁴), not elsewhere named or otherwise known.

2. All the other references are evidently to another man (Mt 10², Mk 3¹⁸, Lk 6¹⁵, Ac 1¹³), who is represented as father of James the apostle, second of that name in the list.

A considerable controversy has long been carried on as to whether this A. may be identified with the Cleopas of Jn 19²⁵ and the Cleopas of Lk 24¹³. This question has been of special interest as involved in the discussion regarding James and the Brethren of the Lord (wh. see). Ewald boldly assumes that the Cleopas of John and the Cleopas of Luke are one, but maintains that the identification with Alphæus is an unreasonable confounding of a purely Greek with a purely Hebrew name (Hist. of Israel, vi. 305, note 4). Meyer affirms the identity of the Clopas of John with the Aramaic ܩܠܦܳܣ , the Alphæus of the Synoptics. And Alford (on Mt 10³) regards the two Greek names as simply two different ways of expressing the Hebrew name קלפא . It seems better to distinguish the Cleopas of Luke from the Clopas of John. It is quite evident that Cleopas is simply a shortened form of Cleopater (Κλεόπατρος), like Antipas for Antipater. Lightfoot, indeed, while admitting this, still favours the identification of the two names. On the other hand, Clopas may with the highest probability be regarded as a simple transliteration of the Aramaic Halphai. Clopas (as in the Greek text and RV, not Cleopas as in the AV) is represented in Jn 19²⁵ as the husband of one of the Marys who stood beside the cross. If we assume that four women are there referred to, there is no indication of any relationship between the wife of Clopas and the mother of Jesus. The synoptic passages, however, all mention among the women at the cross this same Mary as the mother of James. There is no reason for supposing that this James, son of Mary, is any other than James the son of Alphæus. But the assumption that Clopas was husband of Mary and brother of Joseph, and the usual assumption that Mary was the sister of our Lord's mother, are equally groundless, and have no support whatever from any statement in our Gospels. There seems no reason for supposing that James the little and James the brother of the Lord are one and the same person. Eusebius, indeed, mentions, on the authority of Hegesippus, that Symeon, who succeeded James in the bishopric of Jerusalem, was son of Clopas the brother of Joseph; but Symeon is evidently regarded, not as a brother, but only as a relative, probably a cousin, of his predecessor James.

ALTAR.—i. ALTAR is the invariable rendering in the OT of קִרְיָה * (Aram. ܩܪܝܳܗ Ezr 7¹⁷), and in the NT of θυσιαστήριον . In AV it also occurs as the rendering of תִּרְחָל (Ezk 43^{15a}), RV 'upper a.', and of תִּרְחָלִים (Ezk 43^{15b, 16} — Kethib אִרְחָלִים , RV 'a. hearth.' In the NT βωμῆς is found once (Ac 17²²) in the sense of a heathen a. This distinction is very clearly brought out in 1 Mac 1⁵⁹ 'they did sacrifice upon the idol altar (ἐπι τῶν βωμῶν) which was upon the altar of God (τ. θυσιαστήριον).' Similarly the Vulg. and early Lat. Fathers avoid the use of ara, preferring altaria and altare. Another designation is met with, viz. לִבְנֵי , prop. 'table,' Ezk 41²² 44¹⁶, Mal 1^{7, 12}. It would also seem that the appellation בִּמְצָה , prop. 'high place,' may in some cases be used to express 'a.' as Jer 7³¹ (LXX $\text{τῶν βωμῶν τοῦ Τάφου}$), 2 K 23⁸ (but here text is doubtful), etc. לְבֵנִים Is 65³ is wrongly rendered in AV 'a' of brick'; RV 'upon the bricks.' In one or two places in the OT קִרְיָה of the present MT seems an alteration from an original בִּמְצָה . So clearly Gn 33²⁰, and most probably 2 K 12¹⁰. On the other hand, בִּמְצָה should perhaps be restored in 2 K 10²⁶ (Stade in ZATW. v. pp. 278, 289 f.).

ii. ALTARS IN PREHISTORIC TIMES.—According to the primitive conceptions of the nomad Semites, the presence of a deity was implied in every spot that attracted them by its water or shade, and in every imposing landmark that guided them in their wanderings. Every well and grove, every mountain and rock, had its presiding deity. The humble offering of the worshipper could be cast into the well, exposed upon the rock, or hung upon the sacred tree. It was thus brought into immediate contact with the numen therein residing. A great step in advance was taken when it was conceived that the deity could not only reside in such objects of nature's own creation as those above specified, but could be persuaded 'to come and take for his embodiment a structure set up for him by the worshipper' (W. R. Smith, Rel. Sem. p. 189). The consideration of this all-important advance belongs elsewhere; it is sufficient to note here that recent researches, esp. those of Wellhausen and W. R. Smith, have abundantly proved that the heathen Semite regarded the stone or cairn which he had himself erected, as a dwelling-place of a deity, a Beth-el בֵּית־אֱלֹהִים , cf. Gn 28¹⁸; for the significance of this passage, see PILLAR), a name which passed, through the Phoenicians as intermediaries, to the Greeks (βαρυάλιον) and Romans (batulus). Such a stone was termed by the Arabs, in the days before Islam, nusb (pl. ansāb), a word identical in origin and signification with the Heb. בִּמְצָה (AV 'pillar'). Beside it the victim was slaughtered; the blood was either poured over the stone, or with part of it the stone was smeared, while the rest was poured out at its base, the essential idea in this primitive rite being that in this way the blood was brought into immediate contact with the deity who, for the time being, had taken up his abode in the stone.

Now there can be no doubt that the same primitive ideas were shared by the ancestors of the Hebrews. Among them, too, the nusb or mazzeba must have been the prototype of the sacrificial a. 'The rude Arabian usage is the primitive type out of which all the elaborate a. ceremonies of the more cultivated Semites grew' (Rel. of Sem. 1st ed. p. 184. See also SACRIFICE). Even in hist. times we find among the Hebrews a survival of the primitive ritual above described. In the narrative of the battle of Michmash, Saul is shocked at the unseemly haste of his warriors in eating flesh 'with the blood,' and orders a great stone to be brought at which the beasts might be duly slain and their blood poured out at the extemporised altar.

The next important step, the advance from the a. as a sacred stone to receive the blood of the victim to the a. as a hearth on which the flesh of the victim was burned in whole or in part, belongs to the history of SACRIFICE (which see, and cf. Smith, Rel. Sem. p. 358 ff.).

If the above is a correct account of the evolution of the a. among the western Semites, the differentiation of pillar and a. must, as regards the inhabitants of Pal., have taken place in the prehistoric period. This seems the obvious conclusion from the existence, even at the present day, of immense numbers of megalithic monuments, the so-called menhirs and dolmens. These characteristic remains of antiquity, so numerous in Moab and in the W. Hauran, must undoubtedly have played an important part in the religious rites of those who reared them, and whom, for the present, we may assume to have been of a Sem. stock. The 'cup-hollows' on the table-stone of the dolmens, connected in many cases by a network of channels, must have been destined to receive the blood of the victim.*

iii. PRE-DEUTERONOMIC ALTARS.—A very marked distinction, as is well known, exists between the attitude to sacrifice of the prophetic and priestly narratives respectively in our present Pent. The latter (P) limits sacrifice to the great central a.,† while the former (JE) relates numerous instances of sacrifice being offered and a^s erected from the earliest times, and in many different places. Noah is represented as building an a. on quitting the ark (Gn 8²⁰); Abraham erected several, viz. at Shechem (12⁷), Bethel (12⁸), Hebron (13¹⁸), and on a special occasion in 'the land of Moriah' (22²). Isaac (26²⁵) and Jacob (35⁷) do likewise. Even Moses, according to this source, erects an altar at Rephidim (Ex 17¹⁵), and another, accompanied by twelve pillars (קַמָּוֹת), at Horeb (24⁴). JE therefore clearly knows nothing in its narrative parts of the exclusive legitimacy of a central a. With this position the law-code which it contains, the so-called Book of the Covenant (see Driver, LOT 23 ff.), is in complete accord. In the locus classicus (Ex 20²⁴) a plurality of a^s is clearly sanctioned: 'in every place (RV) where I record My name, I will come unto thee, and I will bless thee.' And the same holds good throughout the history of the Hebrews until the time of Josiah. Again and again do we find a^s built, up and down the country, either by the recognised religious leaders themselves, or with their express sanction. Thus, to mention but a few, Joshua builds an a. on Mt. Ebal (Jos 8³⁰) in accordance with the injunction of Moses himself (Dt 27⁶), Gideon at Ophrah (Jg 6²⁴), and Samuel at Ramah (1 S 7¹⁷). Saul, we have already seen, extemporised an a. at Michmash, which the historian informs us was the first that Saul built, implying that this monarch had the merit of erecting several. David erected an a., by express divine command, 'in the threshing-floor of Araunah the Jebusite' (2 S 24^{18, 25}). Elijah, too, complains of the destruction of the altars of Jⁿ as an act of sacrilege (1 K 19^{10, 14}), and had, but a little before, repaired, with his own hand, the a. of the Lord upon Mt. Carmel. These examples are sufficient to show that in pre-Deut. Israel a plurality of a^s was regarded as a matter of course, there being not the slightest hint of disapproval on the part of the narrators, or of any idea in the minds of the actors in the history that they were guilty of the violation of any divine command.

* See Conder's report on the dolmen-fields of Moab in P.E.F. Qu. St. 1882, p. 75 ff.; also in Heth and Moab, chs. vii. and viii.; Syr. Stone Lore, pp. 42, 43, 70. Another rich field has been described by Schumacher, The Jaulan, p. 123 ff.; Across Jordan, p. 82 ff. Cf. Perrot and Chipiez, Hist. de l'Art dans l'Antiquité, iv. p. 375 ff.

† The difficult section (Jos 22^{10, 34}) seems best explained as an endeavour to reduce a narrative originally written from the standpoint of JE to an apparent harmony with the fundamental postulate of P.

From the oldest hist. records of the Hebrews, therefore, it is evident that local sanctuaries abounded throughout the country (see HIGH PLACE, and esp. 1 Sam. passim), the most essential feature of which was undoubtedly the a. on which sacrifice was offered to the national God, Jⁿ. Of the form of these pre-Deut. altars we have no precise information. No doubt, as wealth and culture increased, the a^s, esp. at Bethel and the other great sanctuaries, would become more and more elaborate; but in more primitive times they were simple in the extreme. A heap of earth, either by itself (2 K 5¹⁷) or with a casing of turf (see Dillmann on Ex 20²⁴), a few stones piled upon each other, are all that was required. Simplicity is the dominant note of the law in the fundamental passage, Ex 20²⁴. It is there enjoined, moreover, that no tool shall be lifted to hew or dress the stone (cf. Dt 27⁵, Jos 8³¹, 1 Mac 4⁴⁷). In this many modern investigators have seen a survival of the primitive idea, already explained, of a numen inhabiting the altar-stone, who would be driven out or perhaps injured by the process of dressing (Nowack, Archäol. ii. 17; Benzinger, Archäol. 379). Another injunction, that the worshipper (for the command is not addressed to the priests) should not ascend by steps (loc. cit.), is also a plea for simplicity. The a. must not be of such a height as to prevent the worshipper standing on the ground from manipulating his offering.* The evasion of the injunction by a sloping ascent was an afterthought.

* Cf. the early narrative 1 K 22⁶ ff. where Joab is represented as grasping the horns of the a. (see below, v.), and at the same time standing by the side of the a. Also 2 K 5¹⁷ 'two mules' burden.'

To what extent the still existing dolmens (see above) may have been used as a^s in this period it is impossible to say. In the older narratives, however, there are not a few instances of the earlier usage of a single stone (1 S 6¹⁴—v.¹⁵ is a later insertion—14³³) or of the native rock as an a. (Jg 6²⁰ and esp. 13^{19, 20} where עֲזָבָה v.¹⁹ is identified with עֲזָבָה v.²⁰). The site of David's a., we can scarcely doubt, was the Sakhrah rock, now enclosed in the so-called mosque of Omar. The 'stone Zoheleth which is by En-Rogel' was also an ancient altar-stone (1 K 1⁹). Solomon, finally, at the dedication of the temple, is said to have converted the 'middle of the court' into a huge a. (1 K 8⁶⁴). For Solomon's brazen a., see TEMPLE.* This a. was removed by Ahaz (2 K 16¹⁰⁻¹⁶) to make way for the stone a. (note עֲזָבָה v.¹¹) which he caused to be built after the model of the great a. of Damascus (עֲזָבָה, cf. v.¹⁰ in RV). Ahaz a., rather than the brazen a. of Solomon, was in its turn the model for the a. of Ezekiel (cf. 43¹³⁻¹⁷).

Of the other a^s made by Ahaz we know nothing, nor of those set up by later kings (2 K 23¹² loc. cit.). As to the a. to Baal which Ahab erected in Samaria (1 K 16²³), we may assume that it resembled the a^s erected by his Phoen. neighbours to the same deity (cf. Perrot et Chipiez, Hist. de l'Art dans l'Antiq. iii. fig. 192 and passim).

iv. POST-DEUTERONOMIC ALTARS.—The sanctuaries and a^s, sanctioned, as we have seen, by the oldest law-code, ceased to be legitimate on the adoption of the code of Deut. (Dt 12 ff.). The centralisation of the cultus, which was the chief aim of the Deut. legislation, seems to have been attempted under Hezekiah (2 K 18²²), but it must be admitted that the complete abandonment of the local bāmōth was never in fact accomplished until after the discipline of the Exile (1 K 22⁴³, 2 K 15³⁵). In theory, however, the a^s, whether 'upon the hills and under every green tree,' or at places which had been seats of worship since the conquest, were no longer legitimate; for sacrifice, as now for the first time officially distinguished from slaughter (Dt 12¹⁵), could only be offered with acceptance on the a. of the central sanctuary at Jerusalem. It is not impossible that, as Conder has suggested (see ref. above), it is to the reforming zeal of Josiah that we owe the fact that but a single dolmen has been met with in S. Pal. (cf. Cheyne, Jeremiah, p. 60). The history of the a., therefore, from this time forward is merged in the history of the temple. It must suffice here to note that, as soon as practicable, the returned exiles built the a. on its former site (Ezr 3²), which a. continued in use until its desecration by Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Mac 1⁵⁴). Having by this act of sacrilege been rendered unfit for further use, it was taken down and another built in its stead (1 Mac 4⁴⁴ ff.). The a. of Herod's temple was the last built on Jewish soil. According to Jos. (Wars, v. 6) it was built, in harmony with the ancient prescription, of unhewn stones. One other a. meets us in the history of the Jews; this is the a. erected by Onias IV. in his temple at Leontopolis in Egypt (Jos. Wars, vii. x. 3; Ant. xiii. iii. 31), founding on a mistaken interpretation of Is 19¹⁹.

The a. of burnt-offering and the a. of incense, which play so important a part in the ritual legislation of the Priests' Code (P), will be discussed in detail in the article TABERNACLE. See also TEMPLE.

v. THE ALTAR AS ASYLUM.—An important function of the a. among the Hebrews remains to be

* W. R. Smith's view, that 'it is very doubtful whether there was in the first temple any other brazen a. than the two brazen pillars, Jachin and Boaz,' is not supported by sufficient evidence. It is, besides, difficult to see why only one of the two pillars should have had, on this theory, the functions of an a. assigned to it (Rel. Sem. i. pp. 358-359, and Note L, 466 ff.).

noticed. The earliest legislation presupposes and confirms the sanctity of the a. as an asylum. The right of asylum, however, is there limited to cases of accidental homicide (Ex 21^{13, 14}). This use of the a., which is not confined to the Sem. peoples, is also a survival of the primitive idea of the a. as the temporary abode of a deity. In clasping the a., the fugitive was placing himself under the immediate protection of the deity in question. In this connexion, as well as in regard to an important part of the fully developed a. ritual (cf. Lv 4^{7ff.}), the horns of the a. are esteemed the most sacred part of the whole. It is difficult, however, to see how these could have formed part of the more ancient a. as prescribed in the Book of the Covenant (see above); yet their presence is amply attested in later times (cf. Am 3¹⁴, Jer 17¹, and the incidents recorded in 1 K 1^{90f. 223}). The origin and primary significance of the horns are still obscure. Most recent writers seek to trace a connexion between them and the worship of J' in the form of a young bull (Kuenen, Rél. of Isr. i. 326; Stade, Benzinger, Nowack). In any case they are not to be regarded as mere appendages, but as an integral part of the a. (see Dillmann on Ex 27²). The view that they were originally projections to which the victims were bound, has no better support than the corrupt passage, Ps 118²⁷ (for which see Comm.). The comparison of the 'horns' of the Heb. with those of the Greek a. (εὐκέρας βωύς) seems misleading, since the latter rather resembled the volutes of the Ionic capital (cf. art. ara in Daremberg et Saglio, Dictionnaire etc., figs. 410, 418, 422). The famous stele of Teima, on the other hand, shows the 'horns' rising from the corners of the a., and curved like those of an ox (see Perrot et Chipiez, op. cit. tome iv. p. 392, Eng. tr. [see below] vol. i. p. 304).

LITERATURE.—Of the earlier literature the standard work is John Spencer's De legibus Heb. ritualibus, etc. 1685. Of the modern works the most important are the works on Hebrew antiquities by De Wette, Ewald (Eng. tr. 1876), Nowack (Hebräische Archäologie, 1894, Band II. Sacralalterthümer, § 73 ff.), and Benzinger (Heb. Archäologie, 1894, § 52, Die altisrael. Heiligthümer, etc.), and the more general treatises of Wellhausen (Skizzen und Vorarbeiten, III., Reise arab. Heidenthums, 1837), and, in particular, W. R. Smith's Religion of the Semites, 1889 (2nd ed. 1895). The student should also consult the standard work of Perrot and Chipiez, Histoire de l'Art dans l'Antiquité, tome III. Phénicie, iv. Judée, etc. (Eng. tr. Hist. of Art in Phœnicia, 2 vols. 1885, Hist. of A. in Judea etc., 2 vols. 1890).

AL-TASHHETH (תַּשְׁחֶתֶת), AV Al-taschith, Pss 57. 58. 59. 65 (titles). See PSALMS.

ALTOGETHER is now only an adv., but was at first an adj., being simply a stronger 'all.' As an adj. it is found in Ps 39⁵ 'Verily every man at his best state is a. vanity'; Is 10⁸ 'Are not my princes a. (RV 'all of them') kings,' and perhaps Nu 16¹². Of its use as an adv. noticeable examples are Jer 30¹¹, where 'I will not leave thee a. unpunished' is given in RV 'I will in no wise leave thee unpunished'; Ac 26²⁹, where 'both almost and a.' is in RV 'whether with little or with much' after the Gr.; and 1 Co 5¹⁰, where 'not a.' (Gr. οὐ πάρος) is taken by commentators in two directly opp. senses, either 'not wholly,' or 'not at all'; RV gives the first in text, the second in marg.

ALUSH (אַלֻשׁ).—A station in the journeyings, occurs only Nu 33^{13, 14}. (See SINAL.)

ALVAN (אַלְוָן).—Son of Shobal, a Horite (Gn 36²³). The name appears in 1 Ch 1⁴⁰ as Alian (אַלְוָן). It is clearly the same as Alvah (אַלְוָה) in Gn 36⁴⁰, which appears in 1 Ch 1⁵¹ as Aliah (אַלְיָה), one of the 'dukes' of Edom. Knobel compares the name with that of a Bedawin clan Alawin, said by Burckhardt to be dwelling north of the Gulf of Akabah. See Dillm. in loc. H. E. RYLE.

ALWAY, ALWAYS.—Alway (i.e. 'all the way') is originally the accus. of duration, 'all the time'; while always is the genit. of occurrence, 'at all times.' And although by 1611 this distinction was vanishing, there are some undoubted instances in AV. Cf. Mt 28²⁰ 'Lo, I am with you alway,' with Ro 1⁹ 'I make mention of you always in my prayers.' RV gives alway for always at Ac 24¹⁶, 2 Th 1³; and always for alway at Col 4⁶ apparently capriciously, for these changes obliterate the distinction noticed above. When the distinction was lost, always drove alway out of use.

AMAD (אַמָּד), Jos 19²⁶ only.—A city of Asher. The site is doubtful; there are several ruins called Amád in this region.

AMADATHUS, Ad. Est 12⁶ 16^{10, 17}. See HAMMEDATHA.

AMAIN only in 2 Mac 12²³ 'the enemies . . . fled a.' (so RV, Gr. εἰς φυχὴν ὄρμησαν). The meaning is 'at once, precipitately.'

AMAL (אַמָּל).—A descendant of Asher, 1 Ch 7³⁵. See GENEALOGY.

AMALEK, AMALEKITES (אַמְלֵק, אֲמֵלֵקִים).—A nomadic Arabian tribe, occupying the wide desert region between Sinai on the south and the southern borders of Palestine on the north. This district corresponds to what is now called the wilderness of Et-Tih. The Amalekites are represented as perpetually at feud with the Israelites, though such closely connected tribes as the Kenites and Kenizites appear from the first as friendly, and ultimately as peaceful settlers in the midst of the possessions of Israel.

References to the Amalekites appear very early in the OT history. In the account of the campaigns of Chedorlaomer of Elam and his confederates in Gn 14, 'the country of the Amalekites' near Kadesh is described as the scene of one of those desolating wars. Hengstenberg, followed by Kurtz, maintains that this does not imply that the Amalekites were in existence in the days of Abraham, but only that this country, lying between Kadesh and the land of the Amorites, afterwards known as 'the fields of the Amalekites,' was at that early period overrun and destroyed by Chedorlaomer. Had there been no other hints of the extreme antiquity of the Amalekites, this explanation might perhaps be accepted. But we find again in the chant of Balaam (Nu 24²⁰) that Amalek is described as 'the first of the nations,' which seems almost certainly to mean a primitive people to be reckoned among the very oldest of the nations. Most recent scholars are agreed in assigning to the Amalekites a high antiquity. This is the conclusion to which such passages as those referred to would naturally lead. The only reason why an attempt should be made to put any other interpretation upon these words is the idea that, in Gn 36¹², the descent of the Amalekites is traced from Amalek, the grandson of Esau, and their origin thus brought down to a later period than that of Abraham. It is exceedingly hazardous to build any argument of this sort on an occasional statement in a genealogical table reproduced from some unknown source, seeing that it is impossible to determine what the point of view of the original compiler may have been. In many cases such genealogical lists seem intended to set forth simply certain interrelations of tribes, so that, though terms indicating personal and family relationships are used, the names do not always belong to persons historically real. All that we need understand by this introduction of an Amalek, son of Eliphaz by a concubine, is that Timna the Horite, the concubine referred to, represents the importation or incorporation of a foreign and inferior, probably a servile, element into the pure Edomite stock, the Horites being one of the tribes forming that federation, embracing the Amalekites, conquered by Chedor-laomer.

The region in which the Amalekites first appear in history, near Kadesh, lies just about a day's journey south of Hebron, on the undulating slopes and plain at the foot of the mountains held by the Amorites. It may be supposed that a branch of the tribe had settled there, or had begun to engage in agricultural pursuits. When driven forth from their possessions by the conqueror, they no doubt returned to their old wandering modes of life, and rejoined their brethren who moved about through the wide extent of the great desert.

The first meeting of the Israelites and the Amalekites took place in the southern part of the Sinaitic peninsula. At Rephidim, a broad plain to the north-west of Mount Sinai, the Amalekites came out against the Israelites, and a battle ensued which lasted throughout the whole day. Joshua commanded in the fight, and Moses on the hill top held up his rod in the sight of the people as the sign from God that they would conquer by His might (Ex 17⁸⁻¹⁶). The Amalekites had at this time acted in a peculiarly bitter and exasperating manner towards the Israelites, harassing them on their rear, and cutting off the weak and the weary (Dt 25¹⁷⁻¹⁹). In consequence, the Amalekites, to a greater extent than any of the other Can. and neighbouring tribes, were placed under the ban, so that J' Himself, as well as His people, is represented as solemnly swearing eternal feud against them.

The defeat of the Amalekites evidently put the fear of the Israelites upon the robber nomad tribes of the desert for a time, so that they were unmolested during their advance to Sinai, and during their year's encampment there, as well as during their subsequent march northward to the southern border of Palestine at Kadesh. It was the intention of the Israelites to enter Palestine from the south, and so from this point, just outside of the southern boundary of Palestine, spies were sent to examine the land, and to bring back a report as to whether an entrance from that point was possible, and if so, how best the invading forces might conduct the campaign. These spies on their return reported that the Amalekites dwelt in the land of the south in the valley, i.e. in the southern portions of the region afterwards occupied by Judah and Simeon (Nu 13²⁹ 14²⁵), in the neighbourhood of the lowland Canaanites and the highland Hittites, Jebusites, and Amorites. The Amalekites are represented as the leaders of the confederate Canaanites who resisted the entrance of the Israelites into the south of Palestine (Nu 14⁴⁵⁻⁴⁶). They were evidently at that time of considerable importance, and must have been for a long period in possession of those territories only a little way north of the district in which we find their ancestors, or, at least, a branch of the same great nation, settled in the days of Abraham.

The bitter opposition shown by the Amalekites to the Israelites at Sinai and in Southern Palestine was distinguished from that of the other tribes by this, that they were really at the head of the confederated clans already in possession of the land, and the struggle between them and the invaders was to determine the whole future of the rivals, the success of the one necessarily meaning the utter destruction of the other. 'It was the hatred,' says Ewald (History of Israel, i. 250), 'of two rivals disputing a splendid prize which the one had previously possessed and still partially possessed, and the other was trying to get for himself by ousting him.' The bitterness must have been intensified by the secession to the ranks of Israel of such branches or families of the Amalekite stem as the Kenites and Kenizzites. These two families, with Jethro and Caleb respectively at their head, were the ancient allies of Israel, and ultimately settlers in the land. The defeat of the Israelites may have secured for the Amalekites and their immediate neighbours peace and prosperity throughout a whole generation. When they were again attacked it was by a people already in possession of the northern regions, now pressing southward. How far they were interfered with by Judah and Simeon is not recorded, but it would appear that even after the Israelitish occupation of the country the Amalekites in considerable numbers maintained possession of the plateau and hilly regions in the extreme south.

In the time of the Judges, however, we meet with the Amalekites in the company of the Midianites, as nomad tribes roaming about among their old desert haunts, and pursuing their old tactics of harassing peaceful agriculturists. When the crops sown by the Israelites were ripening, the Amalekite marauders descended and reaped the harvest, so that the unfortunate inhabitants were impoverished and discouraged (Jg 6⁵). They, along with the Ammonites, were allies of the Moabites in their conflict with Israel, and no doubt suffered in the defeat of the Moabites at the hand of Ehud (Jg 3¹³).

During this same period, it would seem that a branch of the Amalekite tribe had secured a settlement in Mount Ephraim. Pirathon, the residence of the judge Abdon, some 15 miles south-west of Shechem, bore the name of 'the Mount of the Amalekites,' or had in it a hill so called (Jg 12⁵). The settlers who had thus given their name to the hill belonged in all probability to a branch of the Amalekites, who, about the time that some of their brethren settled in the south of Palestine, in what was afterward assigned to Judah, pressed farther to the north, and secured possessions among other Canaanite tribes in the very centre of the land. This is more likely than the suggestion of Bertheau, that these Amalekites of Ephraim were remnants of those expelled by the men of Judah from their southern settlements in the days of Joshua. They had evidently been some considerable time in possession before localities came to be popularly known by their name. This view is further confirmed by the words of Deborah in her song (Jg 5⁴), 'out of Ephraim came they down whose root is in (not against, as in AV) Amalek.' The land of Ephraim was the territory once possessed by the Amalekites.

In the early years of his reign, Saul was commissioned to carry on a war of extermination against the Amalekites and their king Agag (1 S 15). This was intended to be the execution of the sentence passed upon them in the days of Moses (Ex 17¹⁶, Nu 24²⁰, Dt 25¹⁷⁻¹⁹). No living thing belonging to the Amalekites was to be spared. This great battle was evidently fought in the south of Judah, as the pursuit is described as extending from Havilah in Arabia, far to the east, to Shur in the west of the desert on the border of Egypt. When worsted in battle they evidently passed over the southern boundary of Palestine, and betook themselves to their ancestral haunts in the wild desert. During the period of their residence as a settled people in Southern Judah, they had a capital city, Ir-Amalek, 'the city of Amalek' (1 S 15⁵). Robber bands of the yet unsubdued nomad Amalekites of the desert, during the time of David's stay among the Philistines, sacked Ziklag, in the territory of Simeon, outside of the southern boundary of Judah (1 S 30). These were overtaken by David, and only 400 young men on swift camels succeeded in making their escape. The reference to the Amalekites in 2 S 8¹², in the list of spoils dedicated to God by David, is probably to this same incident. From this time onward the Amalekites seem to have been regarded as no longer formidable; and even as raiders from the desert we find no further trace of them. The last mention of them in the OT occurs in 1 Ch 4³, in the days of Hezekiah. There it is said that 'the remnant of the Amalekites that escaped,' and who had continued till that day in Mount Seir, were smitten by 500 of the Simeonites, who took possession of their land. That the Amalekites are not mentioned in Gn 10 is regarded by Dillmann as proof that before the time of the writer they had sunk into insignificance.

Outside of the OT we have no reliable accounts of the Amalekites. In the works of the Arabian historians very extensive and detailed reports are given of the progress and achievements of the Amalekites; but these, as Nöldeke has convincingly shown, are credible only in so far as they are based on the statements of the historical books of our own canonical Scriptures.

AMAN.—1. (Ἀμάν A) Is mentioned in Tobit's dying words as the persecutor of Achiacharus, To 14¹⁰. Cod. B, however, has Ἀδάμ; ἢ Ναδάβ; Itala, Nabad; Syr. Ahab. Possibly the allusion is to Haman and Mordecai. 2. Est 12⁶ 16¹⁰⁻¹⁷. See HAMAN. J. T. MARSHALL.

AMANA (אָמָנָה), Ca 4⁸. Probably the mountains near the river Abana or Amana, being connected with Hermon and Lebanon; or else Mount Amanus in the north of Syria.

AMARIAH (אֲמָרְיָהוּ, אֲמָרְיָהוּ 'J' hath promised').—1. 2 Ch 19¹¹, high priest in the reign of Jehoshaphat, appointed by him chief justice 'in all matters of the Lord,' as Zebadiah, 'the ruler of the house of Judah,' was 'in all the king's matters.' (Is this a precedent for the joint rule in later times of Zerubbabel and Joshua?) 2, 3. In a genealogy in 1 Ch 6³⁻¹⁵, 60-52, Ezr 7¹⁻⁵, beginning with Aaron and ending with Jehozadak at the Captivity, which seems as much intended to be a list of the high priests as 1 Ch 3¹⁰⁻¹⁴ is of the kings of Judah, and which appears to be the basis of Josephus' very corrupt lists (Ant. VIII. i. 3, x. viii. 6), the name A. occurs twice—(a) 1 Ch 6⁷, 52 grandfather of Zadok, and therefore a younger contemporary of Eli. Of this man we have no other record; see ABIATHAR. (β) 1 Ch 6¹¹, Ezr 7³, 1 Es 8², 2 Es 1² (Amarias in Apoc.), son to the Azariah who is said to have ministered in Solomon's temple. If, as is probable, this remark applies to the previous Azariah, then this Amariah may be the same as No. 1. But great uncertainty hangs over these lists. In Ezr 7¹⁻⁵ six names are omitted, perhaps by homoioteleuton; in the full list important names (e.g. Jehoiada, Zechariah, the Azariahs contemporary with Uzziah and Hezekiah respectively, Urijah) are omitted; the succession 'Amariah, Ahitub, Zadok' occurs twice; only three high priests are given between Amariah under Jehoshaphat, and Hilkiah under Josiah. 4. A priest clan, fourth in the list of 22 in Neh 12 (v. 2), who 'went up with Zerubbabel' 'in the days of Jeshua,' and in the list of 21 (v. 13), 'in the days of Joiakim,' and fifth in the list of those who sealed to the covenant under Nehemiah (Neh 10³). This clan is probably identical with that of 'Immer,' the sixteenth course in David's time (1 Ch 24¹⁴), and one of the four families of priests mentioned in 'the book of the genealogy of them which came up at the first' (Ezr 2³⁷ Neh 7⁴⁰, Meruth 1 Es 5²⁴, Α'εμμηροῦθ), and in the time of Ezra (Ezr 10²⁰); see ABIJAH, No. 4. 5. 1 Ch 23¹⁹ 24²³, a Kohathite Levite in David's time. 6. 2 Ch 31¹⁵, a Levite in Hezekiah's time, one of the six assistants to Kore, 'the porter at the east gate, who was over the freewill offerings of God.' 7. Ezr 10⁴², a man of Judah of the sons of Bani (1 Ch 9⁴), one of those who 'had taken strange wives.' 8. Neh 11⁴, a man of Judah, ancestor to Áthaiah, who was one of those 'that willingly offered themselves to dwell in Jerus.' 9. Zeph 1¹, great-grandfather of the prophet, son to Hezekiah, perhaps the king.

AMARIAS (Α'Αμαρίας, Β'Αμαρθελας), 1 Es 8².—An ancestor of Ezra in the line of high priests, father of Ahitub. Called Amariah, Ezr 7³.

AMASA (אַמָּסָי, 'burden' or 'burden bearer').—1. The son of Ithra an Ishmaelite, and of Abigail the sister of king David. The first mention of him is in connexion with the rebellion of Absalom (2 S 17²⁵), who made him leader of his army. Joab, at the head of the king's troops, completely routed him in the forest of Ephraim (2 S 18⁶⁻⁸). David not only pardoned him, but gave him the command of the army in place of Joab (2 S 19¹³). When he came to lead the royal forces against Sheba and his rebel host, he was treacherously slain by Joab at 'the great stone of Gibeon' (2 S 20⁹⁻¹²). 2. An Ephraimite who opposed the bringing into Samaria of the Jewish prisoners, whom Pekah, king of Israel, had taken in his campaign against Ahaz (2 Ch 28¹²). R. M. BOYD.

AMASAI (אַמָּסָי).—1. A Kohathite, 1 Ch 6²⁵⁻³³, the eponym of a family, 2 Ch 29¹². 2. One of the priests who blew trumpets on the occasion of David's bringing the ark to Jerus., 1 Ch 15²⁴. 3. One of David's officers at Ziklag, 1 Ch 12¹⁸, possibly to be identified with Amasa, No. 1.

AMASHSAI (אַמָּשָׂאִי, perhaps a combination of the reading אַמָּשָׂאִי, אַמָּשָׂאִי).—AV Amashai, Neh 11¹³. A priest of the family of Immer.

AMASIAH (אַמָּשָׂאִי).—One of Jehoshaphat's commanders, 2 Ch 17¹⁶.

AMAZED.—Amaze has a much wider range of meaning in old Eng. than in modern. In conformity with its derivation (a-maze) it expresses confusion or perplexity, the result of the unexpected; but this may give rise to a variety of emotions. 1. FEAR: Jg 20⁴¹ 'When the men of Israel turned again, the men of Benjamin were a.' 2. AWE: Mk 10⁸² 'And they were in the way going up to Jerus.; and Jesus went before them, and they were a.; and as they followed they were afraid.' 3. EXCITED WONDER: Lk 5²⁶ 'they were all a.' (Gr. ἐκστασις ἔλαβεν ἅπαντας; RV 'amazement took hold on all'). 4. DEPRESSION: Mk 14³⁸ '(Jesus) began to be sore a., and to be very heavy.' Amazement occurs twice in AV, the expression in Ac 3¹⁰ of great joy; in 1 P 3⁶ of great fear.

AMAZIAH (אִמְזִיָּה, אִמְזִיָּה).—1. The name of a king of Judah who succeeded his father Jehoash upon the assassination of the latter (c. 800. B.C.). The chief interest of his reign centres in his wars with Edom and with Israel (2 K 14, 2 Ch 25). In the first of these campaigns, Edom, which had revolted from Judah during the reign of Jehoram, the son of Jehoshaphat, suffered a severe defeat in the Valley of Salt, and the capital Sela or Petra fell into the hands of the enemy (2 K 14⁷). Elated by this success, Amaziah challenged to a conflict his neighbour Jehoash, the grandson of Jehu. This powerful monarch showed no anxiety to try conclusions with his presumptuous rival, to whom he addressed the well-known parable of the thistle and the cedar (vv. 8-10). Amaziah, however, stung by the moral of this parable, refused to listen to the well-meant advice, and rushed blindly upon his fate. At the battle of Beth-shemesh the forces of Judah were utterly routed, and the king himself taken prisoner. Jehoash followed up his victory by capturing Jerusalem, partially destroying its walls, pillaging the temple and the palace, and carrying back hostages to Samaria (vv. 11-14). How long Amaziah survived this humiliating defeat, it is not easy to decide. The statement (2 K 14²⁷) that he outlived Jehoash fifteen years can hardly be correct, and there seem to be sufficient reasons for considerably reducing the number of years (twenty-nine) assigned to his reign by the chronological system adopted in the Books of Kings. His reign appears to have synchronised almost exactly with that of Jehoash, as that of his successor did with the reign of Jeroboam II. There is not a little plausibility in the conjecture of Wellhausen, that the conspiracy which issued in the murder of Amaziah at Lachish had its origin in the popular dissatisfaction with his wanton attack upon Israel which cost Judah so dear. The death of Amaziah should probably be dated c. 780 B.C., the year when there is reason to believe his son Azariah or Uzziah ascended the throne.

Besides the strictly historical details which he borrows from 2 Kings, the Chronicler adds certain particulars, the purpose of whose insertion is evident (2 Ch 25^{6a, 14-16}). (On these additions see Graf Die geschichtlichen Bücher des A.T. p. 157 ff., and Driver, LOT, p. 494.)

2. The priest of Jeroboam II. who opposed and attempted to silence the prophet Amos when the latter delivered his message at the sanctuary of Bethel (Am 7¹⁰⁻¹⁷. See AMOS). 3. A man of the tribe of Simeon (1 Ch 4³⁴). 4. A descendant of Merari (1 Ch 6⁴⁵).

AMBASSADOR.—Three Heb. words are sometimes tr. 'ambassador' in RV of OT: 1. מַלְאָכִים, a general term for messenger, used for (a) messengers of private men (2 K 5¹⁰); (b) messengers of God=angels (see ANGEL); (c) messengers of kings or rulers=ambassadors (2 K 19⁹, 2 Ch 35²¹), though sometimes tr. 'messengers' in RV (Dt 2²⁸, Nu 20¹⁴). 2. מַלְאָךְ, apparently a synonym of 1 (Pr 13¹⁷; cf. 25¹³), hence=herald or messenger from court (Is 18² 57⁹), and metaphorically an 'ambassador' of J" (Jer 49¹⁴; cf. Ob v.). In Jos 9⁴ the reading of RVm is to be preferred. 3. מַלְאָךְ, properly an interpreter, and so used in Gn 42²³; cf. Job 33²³ (?); hence tr^d in Is 43³⁷ (in theocratic sense) 'interpreters' RV text, 'ambassadors' marg.; in 2 Ch 32²¹ 'ambassadors' text, 'interpreters' marg.

Ambassadors were not permanent officials, but were chosen from attendants at court for special occasions (see 2 K 19⁹). Their evil treatment was regarded then as now as a grave insult to king and people (2 S 10⁴⁻⁶). In the Apoc. the general term ἀγγελος, 'messenger,' is often used even in dealings with courts (Jth 1¹¹ 3¹, 1 Mac 14⁴ 7¹⁰), but during the Maccabæan period, when embassies were frequently sent, the ordinary Gr. words for 'ambassadors' are employed: πρεσβευτής (1 Mac 13²¹ 14^{21, 22}), πρεσβεύς (1 Mac 9⁷⁰ 11⁹ 13¹⁴), and πρεσβύται (2 Mac 11³⁴). The word πρεσβεία, 'ambassage' (RV Apoc.), occurs in 2 Mac 4¹. In NT (Lk 14³², 2 Co 5²⁰, Eph 6²⁰) the use is metaphorical. G. W. THATCHER.

AMBASSAGE, mod. embassy; in AV only Lk 14³², but RV adds Lk 19¹⁴ (AV 'message') where the same Gr. word (πρεσβεία) is used. The meaning is not a message sent by ambassadors, but the ambassadors themselves. In 1 Mac 14²³ the meaning is 'message' (Gr. λόγου, RV 'words'). J. HASTINGS.

AMBER.—See MINERALS.

AMBUSH, from in (which becomes im before b, whence am) and boscus, a bush, wood, thicket, is used in various shades of meaning. 1. The abstract state of lying in wait in order to attack an enemy secretly. Jos 8¹² ('Joshua) set them to lie in a. between Bethel and Ai.' 2. The place where the a. is set, or the position thus assumed. Jos 8⁷ 'Ye shall rise up from the a.'; 1 Mac 9⁴⁰ RV 'And they rose up against them from their a.' 3. The men that form the a. Jos 8¹⁹ 'the a. arose quickly out of their place'; Jer 51¹² 'prepare the ambushes' (m. 'liers in wait'). The mod. military term is ambuscade. Ambushment, meaning a body of troops disposed in ambush, is used in 2 Ch 13^{13 bis}; also ambushments in 2 Ch 20²² (RV 'liers in wait'; but RV gives ambushment in Jos 8⁹ for 'lie in ambush,' and in Jg 9³⁵ for 'lying in wait'). J. HASTINGS.

AMEN.—This word found its way bodily from the Heb. (אָמֵן) into the Hellenistic idiom through the LXX, and strengthened its hold later on by its more copious use in the version of Symmachus. It is derived from אָמַן he propped, in Niphal (reflexive) he was firm. So the adverb אָמֵן, firmly, came to be used, like our surely, for confirmation, in various ways.

(1) It is used for the purpose of adopting as one's own what has just been said (this answering sense being apparently the orig. one, Nu 5²²)='so is it,' or 'so shall it be,' rather than the less comprehensive 'so be it,' though 'so be it' is occasionally the prominent meaning (Jer 28⁶). The word is limited to the religious atmosphere, being, on human lips, an expression of faith that God holds the thing true, or will or can make it true. Thus after the 'oath of cursing,' recited in Nu 5²², there is added, both in the orig. Hebrew and in the Greek of Sym., 'The woman shall say, Amen, Amen,' the word being doubled for emphasis; where the LXX, however, has the inadequate γένοιτο, γένοιτο, so be it, as is the case in nineteen out of the twenty-three passages where the Heb. word occurs in this connexion: of the rest, three have ἀμήν, and the fourth ἀληθῶς. It is put also into the mouth of the people at the end of each curse uttered on Mount Ebal (Dt 27). At the close, likewise, of public prayers, thanksgivings, benedictions, or doxologies the people used to say Amen (Neh 8⁸, Amen, Amen); not, apparently, however in the services of the temple, where the response was different (Edersheim, Temple Service, p. 127), but certainly in the services of the synagogue (Ps 41¹³, e.g., and Schürer, HJP II. ii. 78, 82). That this custom passed over from the synagogue to the Christian assemblies we gather from 1 Co 14¹⁶, where St. Paul speaks of τὸ ἀμήν, the (customary) amen uttered by the listeners at the close of the extempore thanksgiving.

(2) It is used in confirmation of one's own prayers, thanksgivings, benedictions, doxologies. Before

NT the word occurs only at the end of a private prayer in To 8⁸, and at the end of a personal ascription in the last verses of 3 and 4 Mac. The personal doxological or ascriptional usage is much more frequent in NT (e.g. Ro 1²⁵ 9⁵), and, outside St. Paul and the Apoc., it is the only NT usage. In St. Paul's Epistles the word sometimes concludes a prayer for, or a benediction upon, his readers; but, except in Ro 15³³ and Gal 6¹⁸, it is a later addition. Sometimes, as in Rev 7¹², it is apparently introductory to a doxology, but is, in reality, confirmatory of a previous doxology. So also in Rev 22²⁰ it is a believing acceptance of the previous divine affirmation.

(3a) It is used once at the close of an affirmation of one's own, to confirm it solemnly in faith: Rev 1⁷, where it is the trustful climax of the more limited vat, yea (the bare personal confirmation): 'Yea, verily [He shall so come].' (3b) The use of Amen to introduce one's own words and clothe them with solemn affirmation may be called an idiom of Christ: it is a use confined entirely to Him in sacred literature. But the practice of the evangelists in this matter is not uniform. The Synoptists give invariably ἀμήν λέγω, the Fourth Gospel as invariably ἀμήν ἀμήν λέγω. Again, Matthew is richest in the phrase, using it thirty times; Mark less rich, using it thirteen times; Luke least so, using it only six times; elsewhere he gives narrower substitutes (ἀληθῶς thrice, ἐπ' ἀληθείας once, vat once), or more usually the simple λέγω. The signal difference in Luke may be due partly to the non-Hebraic stamp of his readers. The double amen of introduction in John has its parallel elsewhere in the double amen of conclusion, instances of which have already been cited. But the invariableness of the doubling, as opposed to the invariableness of the single amen in the Synoptists, can be put down only to an idiosyncrasy of the writer, though he need not be unhistorical in all or even in many of his instances; for it is worthy of notice that all the sayings in question are peculiar to John except 13²¹ (|| Mt Lk) and 38 (|| all Synopt., but Lk λέγω only). See Hogg in JQR Oct. 1896.

But Christ's uniqueness in using it as a word of introduction runs parallel with the uniqueness of its connotation when He does use it. (a) It is never the expression of His own (accepting or expectant) faith; it is rather an expression calling for faith: this view is supported by the invariable accompaniment λέγω ὑμῖν. 'He makes good the word, not the word Him' (Cremer, Wörterbuch, 8th ed. pp. 145, 146). (β) Consequently, in His mouth, it has generally to do with His own person, either (a) as Messiah, or (b) as demanding faith in His Messiahship in spite of outward appearances and mistaken views: it points not merely to intellectual or eventual verity, but to the fact that either the thing is true in Him or He will make it or keep it true. So it is the amen of fulfilment in Him or by Him, or the amen of paradox, or both (cf. Mt 5¹⁸ 16²⁸ 21³¹ 26¹³, and other passages cited in Cremer). It is intelligible, therefore, how the evangelists preferred to leave ἀμήν untranslated; for Luke's occasional ἀληθῶς, like LXX γένοιτο, is but a partial equivalent for what Christ meant by the word. See Nestle in Expos. Times, viii. (1897) 190.

(4) In close relation to Christ's usage, so understood, is the use of amen as a name or description of Christ and of God: of Christ, Rev 3¹⁴, 'the Amen, the faithful and true witness' (cf. 2 Co 1²⁰, where the yea, the promise, is in Christ, and the Amen, the ratification, is through Him); of God, Is 65¹⁶ (twice), 'the God of the amen,' i.e. of faithfulness and truth (if the Heb. adverbial points be correct: see Cheyne on the passage); LXX (inadequately): τὸν θεὸν τὸν ἀληθινόν (cf. ἀληθινός and ἀμήν, Rev 3¹⁴).

AMMIDIOI (Β' Ἀμμίδιοι, A, Ἀμμίδαιοι; in Swete's text with the hard, but in Fritzsche's with the soft breathing; AV Ammidoi).—Of the three parallel lists (Ezr 2=Neh 7=1 Es 5) which give the families which returned with Zerubbabel from captivity, that in 1 Es (5²⁰) alone mentions the Ammidoi. It has been suggested that they are the men of Humtah (Jos 15²⁴ חֲמַתָּה, A Χαμματά). It may be questioned whether either the Chadiasai or Ammidoi were mentioned in the original Heb. lists, for it is to be noticed that in the case of these alone is the gentile form used; otherwise throughout the list we have equivalent expressions of the Heb. . . . כְּבִי . . . שְׂרָא, e.g. vioi φόρος (v.⁹), ol ἐκ Βερολιώ.

AMMIEL (אִמִּיֵּל 'kinsman is God').—1. Son of Gemalli, and spy of the tribe of Dan (Nu 13¹² P). 2. Father of Maahir (see art.), 2 S 9⁴, 17²⁷. 3. According to the Chronicler, the sixth son of Obed-edom, who with his family constituted one of the courses of doorkeepers in the time of David; to them was allotted charge of the S. gate (of the temple) and the storehouse (1 Ch 26, esp. vv. 5, 15). Presumably, therefore, Ammiel was the name of a division of the doorkeepers in the time of the Chronicler—c. B.C. 300. Cf. Driver, LOT 500 f.; Graf, *Die Geschichte. Büch. d. The Kethibh, followed by RV, reads עֲשִׂירִי—the closely similar letters ט and ר replacing ה and ג. Between the two readings it is difficult to decide; for while the Kerē is better supported, the Kethibh, as a name occurring nowhere else in OT, is the harder reading. 5. —1. According to the genealogy in Ruth, which gives David's ancestry, Amminadab was son of Ram and father of Nahshon (Ru 4^{19c}. = 1 Ch 2¹⁰, Mt 1⁴); as father of Nahshon he is also mentioned in Nu 1⁷ 2³ 7¹² 10¹⁴ (P). Through his daughter Elishaba he became father-in-law of Aaron, Ex 6²³ (P). 2. According to 1 Ch 6²² A. was son of Kohath and father of Korah; but in other statements about Kohath's children (e.g. Ex 6¹⁸, Nu 3¹, 1 Ch 6²) A. is not mentioned; moreover, elsewhere Izhar appears as son of Kohath and father of Korah (Ex 6^{18, 21}, 1 Ch 6¹⁸). There can be little doubt, therefore, that A. has accidentally replaced Izhar in 1 Ch 6²²; this may have arisen in compiling the list from a fuller list of the Kohathites which mentioned the connexion of A. (No. 1) with them. 3. According to the Chronicler (1 Ch 15^{10, 11}) another A. was chief of a Levitical house in the days of David; he is described as a son of Uzziel, who was one of the sons of Kohath (1 Ch 6²).

AMMINADIB (עֲמִינָדִיב) occurs in AV and RVm of a very obscure passage, Ca 6¹² 'my soul made me like the chariots of Amminadib.' RV and AVm do not regard the term as a pr. name, but render 'my soul set me on (RV among) the chariots of my willing (RV princely) people.' In Kautzsch's tr. of OT the passage is omitted from the text, and is rendered in a footnote, 'Mein Verlangen [ver-] setzte mich auf die Wagen meines Volkes, eines Edlen,' with the remark that it is quite unintelligible in its present context. The great variety of interpretation and exegesis of the words will be found exhibited in Reuss' AT, v. 391 ff.; cf. Hitzig, *d. AMMON, AMMONITES (עַמִּי אַמּוֹן, אַמּוֹנִי; in the inscriptions, Bit-Amman).—A people occupying territory east of the Jordan, between the Arnon on the south and the Jabbok on the north. The land lying farther to the south, separated from them by the Arnon, was the possession of the Moabites. Before the arrival of the Israelites at the plains of Moab, the Ammonites had been driven back from the Jordan banks by an Amorite tribe from the west under Sihon. These Amorites established a kingdom, carved out of the Ammonite territories, with Heshbon as their capital. In this way a strip of land along the eastern bank of the river, varying in breadth from 20 to 30 miles, ceased to be regarded as belonging to the Ammonites, and was assigned to the transjordanic tribes of Reuben and Gad. The original territories of the Ammonites, extending from the Arnon to the Jabbok, and reaching to the eastern bank of the Jordan, had in earlier years been held by a giant race called Zamzumim (Dt 2¹⁹⁻²¹), to whom it seems that Og, king of Bashan, also belonged (Dt 3¹¹).

As to the origin of the children of Ammon, an account is given in Gn 19³⁸, which has been interpreted by some as genuinely historical, and by others as a reminiscence of a certain family relationship, coloured by bitter hostility and national hatred. The latter position is maintained by such distinguished and moderate exegetes as Dillmann and Bertheau; but by them the myth is regarded as historically justified, and indeed suggested, by the lustful character and irregular habits of the Ammonites. On the other hand, Delitzsch pertinently asks how such an origin can be assigned to the narrative, seeing that their supposed descent from Lot is made the one ground for exceptional treatment of the Ammonites and Moabites (Dt 2^{9, 19}). The story of their origin certainly does not afford occasion for contemptuous or hostile treatment. This can be accounted for only by their unbrotherly conduct towards Israel, which caused such delay and hardship on the eve of the entrance into the promised land (Dt 23⁴). It appears to Delitzsch that the lewdness and moral corruption which characterized their later history resulted from their tainted origin, rather than suggested the story of that origin as given in our Scriptures. In any case, we must regard this notice as indicating a close relationship between the Ammonites and the Israelites. That such a family connexion really did subsist between the two nations is confirmed by the fact that almost all the names of Moabite and Ammonite persons and places that have come down to us are easily understood by the use of a Hebrew lexicon. From this circumstance Kautzsch quite fairly concludes that these nations cannot be reckoned among the Arab tribes, but must have a place given them among the races allied to the Hebrews.

The name by which they were first known was 'children of Ammon.' Only in the literature of very late ages do we find the name Ammon used as the designation of the people (Ps 83⁷). In this very late, probably Maccabæan, psalm* (the only place in OT outside the Pent. in which Lot's name is found), a list is given of ten tribes confederated in open and violent opposition to Israel at the re-dedication of the temple, in which the names of Ammon and Moab occur. It is then said of all these confederates that 'they have holpen the children of Lot.' This latter designation is no doubt intended to apply to the Ammonites and Moabites. The meaning of the name Benê-Ammi, literally 'sons of my people,' points to derivation from parents both of whom were of one race.

The statement in Nu 21²⁴, that 'the border of the children of Ammon was strong,' † coming after a description of the destruction of the Amorites by the Israelites as reaching to that border, is understood by Kautzsch and others as indicating the reason why the Israelites did not carry their conquests farther east, and as therefore opposed to Dt 2⁹, which makes Israel avoid conflict with the Ammonites in consequence of a divine command. The earlier passage, however, may be read as giving the reason why Sihon and his Amorites had not pushed their conquests beyond this strip of land, with the possession of which they had rested satisfied. The Ammonites had retreated before the Amorites within the natural fortresses of their inland mountain region. But though they had thus under compulsion abandoned the fruitful Jordan Valley, the Ammonites never ceased to look upon the whole sweep of country down to the river banks as rightfully theirs. Some 300 years after the conquest of the land by the Isr., the king of the Ammonites made the unreasonable claim that they should restore to him the country that had been taken so long before, not from his forefathers, but from their Amorite conquerors (Jg 11¹³). This the Israelites, under the brave Gileadite chief Jephthah, refused to do, inflicting upon the Ammonites and their allies a most humiliating and crushing defeat.* Previous to this, for eighteen years, the Ammonites had harassed those who occupied the coveted district; and so successful had they been in this that they were encouraged to venture across the Jordan, and there held in terror the warlike tribes of Judah, Benjamin, and Ephraim. While this is reported primarily and mainly to show the depth to which the Israelites had sunk, it also affords proof of the prowess and military importance of the Ammonites.

When we next hear of them, in the early years of king Saul, the children of Ammon form a powerful nation under a capable ruler, king Nahash. One of the first distinctions in battle gained by Saul was his defeat of Nahash and the Ammonites, and the deliverance of the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead, to whose city they had laid siege (1 S 11). The LXX text here reads that this conflict took place about a month after Saul had ascended the throne. During the earlier part of the reign of David, hostilities between Israel and Ammon ceased, because in the time of his trouble, Nahash, either this same monarch or perhaps his successor, 'showed kindness to David' (2 S 10²). On the death of David's friend, messengers were sent to condole with his son Hanun, who, suspecting that they were spies, treated them infamously, so that David was obliged to enter upon a war to wipe out the insult that had been put upon his ambassadors. The senseless conduct of the Ammonite monarch evidently awakened among the Israelites all the old bitterness, so that in the hour of victory David and his men lost all control of themselves, and inflicted upon the vanquished children of Ammon the most cruel and revolting barbarities (2 S 12²⁸⁻³¹). Their capital, Rabbath-Ammon, was taken by Joab, David's commander-in-chief, though he gave the honour to the king. This city (in Maccabæan times known by the name of Philadelphia), one of the cities of the Decapolis, lay about 20 miles east of the Jordan, just outside the eastern border of the territory of Gad, at the southern spring of the Jabbok.

After the division of the kingdom, the country that had been taken from the Ammonites naturally fell with the rest of the transjordanic territory to the nation of the ten tribes. The Ammonites, however, soon took advantage of the weakness of the divided kingdom to assert again their independence. They also joined eagerly with the Assyrians in their attack on Gilead, obtaining increase of territory as the reward of their service; and subsequently, when Tiglath-pileser defeated the Reubenites and Gadites, the Ammonites seem to have been allowed to reoccupy parts, at least, of their old territory on the banks of the Jordan (2 K 15²⁹, 1 Ch 5²⁶). The cruelty which they practised in the war against

* Acc. to some modern critics, however, Jg 11¹²⁻²³ is a late interpolation (Moore, Judges, p. 283).

Gilead as allies of the Syrians is described as having been committed with the object of getting their borders enlarged; and for this, and for their malignant exultation over Israel's fall, they are denounced by the prophets (Am 1¹³, Zeph 2⁸⁻⁹, Jer 49¹⁻⁷, Ezk 21²⁸⁻³²). We have a detailed account (2 Ch 20) of hostilities between the Ammonites, at the head of a powerful confederacy, and the southern kingdom of Judah under Jehoshaphat. Great preparations had been made for this campaign, which was intended to be decisive; but suspicions of treachery among the allies turned the arms of the panic-stricken hosts against one another in a great slaughter, so that the children of Judah did not require to draw a sword.

After nearly 150 years we again find the Ammonites at war with Judah (2 Ch 27⁵), when they were thoroughly beaten by Jotham, and laid under a heavy tribute. During the years in which Judah was tottering on the verge of overthrow, the Ammonites appear among the vassal tribes used by Babylon to harass and plunder those that had revolted from her sway (2 K 24²). After the overthrow of Judah, Baalis, the king of the Ammonites, entertaining still the old unconquerable enmity towards the Jews, sent Ishmael, a man remotely connected with the royal family of Judah, who had been resident in the country of Ammon, to murder the popular and successful governor Gedaliah, under whom the Jewish colony, consisting of those who remained in the land of Judah, had begun to prosper (2 K 25²²⁻²⁶, Jer 40¹⁴). In the days of Nehemiah, the Ammonites were active in their opposition to the Jews, maliciously endeavouring to hinder the building of the walls of the city and the restoration of the temple (Neh 4). Three hundred years later, in the time of Judas Maccabæus, the Ammonites joined the Syrians against the Jews. The Jewish leader went through Gilead and inflicted a crushing defeat upon the Ammonites and their confederates under their commander Timotheus (1 Mac 5⁶). The Ammonites are referred to by Justin Martyr, about the middle of the second Christian cent., as even then a numerous people; but not more than a century later Origen speaks vaguely of them, as of Moabites and Edomites, classing them all with the Arab tribes; and with this doubtful allusion they pass altogether out of history.

The Ammonites seem to have been notorious among the nations for their cruelty. Their religion was a genuine reflection of this infamous national characteristic. Their chief deity was Molech or Milcom (1 K 11⁷, 33).

AMNON (אֲמֹנִי). — 1. Eldest son of David by Ahinoam the Jezreelitess. Heddishonoured his half-sister Tamar, and was, on that account, slain by her brother Absalom (2 S 3² 13¹⁴). In 2 S 13²⁰ he is called Aminon (אִימֹנִי), supposed by many (on the analogy of Arabic) to be a diminutive form, purposely used by Absalom to express contempt; possibly it is only a clerical error. 2. Son of Shimon (1 Ch 4²⁰).

AMOK (אֲמוֹק 'deep'). — A priestly family in the time of Zerubbabel and of Joiakim, Neh 12⁷. See GENEALOGY.

AMON (אֲמוֹן, אֲמֹן 'a skilled, or master workman,' Pr 8³⁰ RV). — 1. One of the kings of Judah, son and successor of Manasseh. Two parallel accounts of his reign are given in 2 K 21¹⁸⁻²⁶ and 2 Ch 33²⁰⁻²⁸.

His name occurs in the genealogical list of the house of David, 1 Ch 3⁴, and in that of the ancestry of our Lord, Mt 1¹⁰. It is also mentioned in connexion with his son Josiah in Jer 1² 25³, Zeph 1¹.

A. came to the throne at the age of twenty-two, and his reign lasted two years (641-639 B.C.). It has been supposed that his name may have had some connexion with the Egypt. divinity Amon (see THEBES), and may thus be an illustration of the extent of his father's heathen sympathies. There is, however, no other evidence that in his cultivation of foreign forms of worship Manasseh was definitely influenced by Egypt, and the name A. may quite well be Hebrew.

All that we know of A. is that during his short reign he repeated all the idolatrous practices of his father's earlier years. He had been unaffected by Manasseh's tardy repentance and futile attempts at reform, and when he came into power he gave full scope to the heathen proclivities with which his youthful training had imbued him. The state of matters under A. may be inferred partly from the fact that 'he walked in all the way that his father walked in, and served the idols that his father served, and worshipped them' (2 K 21²¹), partly from the evils that were found rampant at the time of Josiah's reformation (2 K 23⁴⁻¹⁴, 2 Ch 34²⁻⁵), and partly from the description which the prophets Zephaniah and Jeremiah give of the religious condition of Judah in the beginning of Josiah's reign (Zeph 1⁴⁻⁶ 8-9 31-5, Jer 2-6). An Asherah stood in the house of the Lord; incense was burned to Baal; the sun, moon, and stars were worshipped; idolatrous priests were maintained; and the name of Malcam was held as sacred as that of J'. Perhaps even human sacrifice was not discontinued. Idolatry in religion was accompanied by lawless luxury, and by the corruption of morals in every part of society. The rulers were violent, the judges rapacious, the prophets treacherous, and the priests profane.

A. was slain by conspirators, and was buried in the new burial-place in the garden of Uzza, where his father also lay. He was not the victim of a popular revolt, but of a palace intrigue; for the people slew his murderers, and set his son Josiah on the throne. It is possible that the plot against A. may have been connected with some attempt at religious reform, like the revolt of Jehu against Jehoram of Israel. If this was so, the attempt was a failure, and the popular reaction in favour of idolatry was strong enough to delay the revival of J''s worship for nearly twenty years. But the record is so meagre that this must remain mere matter of conjecture.

LITERATURE.—For the last point, see Kittel, Hist. of Heb. ii. 373 f. There is a reading by one of the hands in the Alex. MS of the LXX which gives twelve years instead of two as the length of A.'s reign. This has been defended as authentic by George, Duke of Manchester (The Times of Daniel, London, 1845), on grounds of prophetic chronology, in which he is partly supported by Ebrard (SK, 1847, iii. 652 ff.). For the other side, see Thenius, Die Bücher der Könige, in loc., and the note in Ewald (Geschichte, B. 3. S. 715; Eng. tr. iv. 206).

2. A governor of Samaria in the days of Ahab, mentioned in 1 K 22²⁸ (יִזְבָּע) and 2 Ch 18²⁸ (יִזְבָּע). The prophet Micaiah was given into his custody when Ahab set out with Jehoshaphat on his fatal attempt against Ramoth-gilead. The LXX has some singular variations on this name. In 1 K he appears as Σεμῆρ τὸν βασιλέα τῆς πόλεως (or acc. to another reading Ἀμμῶν τὸν ἀρχοντα). In 2 Ch he is Ἐμῆρ (also Σεμῆρ) ἀρχοντα. Josephus calls him Ἀχάμων. (See ZATW, 1885, S. 173 ff.) 3. 'The children of Amon' (יִזְבָּע) are mentioned in Neh 7⁵⁹ among 'the children of Solomon's servants,' in the list of those who returned from the Bab. Exile with Zerubbabel and Jeshua. In the parallel list in Ezr (2³⁷) the name appears as Ami (יָמִי). 4. Amon (god). See THEBES.

JAMES PATRICK.

AMORITES (אֲמֹרִיט 'the Amorite').—The name has been supposed to signify 'mountaineer'; but the two Heb. words 'emer and 'amir, by which the signification is supported, mean 'summit' and 'tower,' not 'mountain.' In the Bab. and Assy. texts, as well as in the Tel el-Amarna tablets, the name is written Amurrá, 'the Amorite,' the country being Amurri; the Egypt. form is Amur, 'Amorite,' Syria and Pal. were known to the Semites of Babylonia as 'the land of the Amorite' as far back as the time of Sargon of Akkad (B.C. 3800), and the Sumerian name Martu (which has been connected with that of the Phoen. city Marathus and mountain Brathy) is probably a modification of Amurrá. According to an early Bab. geographical list (WAI ii. 50. 50), Sanir (the Senir of Dt 3⁹) was a synonym of Subartum or northern Syria. In Sumerian times 'the land of the Amorites' was also known as Tidnim or Tidanu.

In the age of the Tel el-Amarna tablets (B.C. 1400) and of the Nineteenth Egypt. Dynasty (B.C. 1300) 'the land of the Amorites' denoted the inland region immediately to the north of the Pal. of later days. In many passages of the OT, however, the Amorites appear as the predominant population of Canaan, and accordingly (as in the cuneiform inscriptions) give their name to the inhabitants of the whole country (see 2 S 21², Am 2⁹⁻¹⁰). The Hivites of Gn 34², Jos 9⁷ 11¹⁹ are Amorites in Gn 48²², 2 S 21²; the Jebusites of Jos 15⁶⁸ 18²⁸, Jg 1²¹ 19¹¹, 2 S 5⁶ 24¹⁸ are Amorites in Jos 10⁶⁻⁶ (cf. Ezk 16²); and the Hittites of Hebron in Gn 23 take the place of the Amorites of Mamre in Gn 14¹³. Strictly speaking, however, according to Nu 13²⁹, while the Amalekites, or Bedawin, dwell in the desert to the south, and the Canaanites in the coastlands of Phoenicia and the valley of the Jordan, 'the Hittites and the Jebusites and the Amorites dwell in the mountains.'

Amorite kingdoms also existed to the south and east of Palestine. In early days we hear of Amorites to the south-west of the Dead Sea (Gn 14⁷, cf. Dt 17⁴⁴), but at the time of the Exodus their two chief kingdoms were those of Sihon and Og, on the eastern side of the Jordan (Dt 31⁴, Jos 2¹⁰). Og ruled in Bashan, Sihon more to the south, where he had driven the Moabites from the fertile lands between the Jabbok and the Arnon (Nu 21¹³⁻²⁸). The overthrow of Sihon and Og, and the occupation of their territories, were among the first achievements of the Israelitish invaders of Canaan (Nu 21²¹⁻³⁵). A fragment of an Amorite song of triumph over the conquered Moabites is given in Nu 21²⁷⁻³⁰, where it is turned against the conquerors themselves.

Whether the Amorite kingdoms were the result of conquest, or whether the Amorites represented the original population of the country east of the Jordan, we do not know. A still more difficult problem is the relation between the Amorites and Hittites in southern Palestine. That the two peoples were interlocked there, we know from the statement of Ezk (16³) in regard to the double parentage (Amorite and Hittite) of Jerusalem. In the north, in 'the land of the Amorites' of the cuneiform and Egypt. inscriptions, the interlocking was due to Hittite conquest. Before the reign of Tahutmes III. of the Eighteenth Egypt. Dynasty (B.C. 1504-1449), the Amorite stronghold of Kadesh on the Orontes had been captured by the Hittites, and had become their southern capital. The Hittites, however, were intruders from the north.

On the Egypt. monuments the Amorites are depicted as a tall race, with fair skins, light (also black) hair, and blue eyes (Tomkins, Jrl. of the Anthropological Institute, xviii. 3, p. 224). They thus resembled the Libyans (the Berbers of to-day), and belonged to the white race. The same type, with profiles resembling those of the Amorites on the Egypt. monuments, is still met with in Pal., especially in the extreme south. The tall stature of the Amorites impressed the Israelites (Nu 13^{23, 33}, Dt 2^{10, 11} 9², if the Anakim are to be regarded as Amorites). Amorites from time to time settled in Egypt, and became naturalised subjects of the Pharaoh. Thus, in the reign of Tahutmes III., the sword-bearer of the king and his brother, a priest, were sons of an 'Amorite' and his wife Karuna.

In the age of the Tel el-Amarna correspondence, the Egypt. governor of the 'land of the Amorites' was Abd-Asherah (written Abd-Asirti and Abd-Asratu), who, with his son Ezer (Aziru), made successful war against Rib-hadad, the governor of Phœnicia, eventually driving him from his cities of Zemar and Gebal. Aziru seems to have been assisted by the forces of Babylon and Aram-naharaim (Mitanni). In some of his despatches to the Pharaoh he describes the Hittites as advancing southward, and as having captured Tunip and other Egypt. towns in northern Syria. The kingdoms of Og and (probably) Sihon did not as yet exist, 'the field of Bashan' (Ziri-Basana) being under the Egypt. governor Artama-Samas. One of the letters is from the king to the governor of 'the city of the Amorites,' and orders certain Amorite rebels to be sent in chains to the Pharaoh, whose names are Sarru, Tuya, Lëya, Yisyari (or Pisyari), the son-in-law of Manya, Dásarti, Palama, and Nimmakhê. About a century and a half later, Merenptah, the son and successor of Ramses II., built a town in the land of the Amorites (Anast. iii. Rev. 5), and one of the chief officials at his court was Ben-Mazana, the son of Yupa'a or Yau 'the great,' from Ziri-Basana. But we do not know whether Bashan was at the time under Amorite rule.

I. THE PROPHET.—This is the name of the prophet whose book in our Bibles* occupies the third place amongst the Minor Prophets.† The Gr. and Lat. Fathers, being for the most part unacquainted with Heb., frequently confounded his name with the quite different one of Isaiah's father, Amoz. Our prophet has no namesake in

* The same order is observed in our editions of the Heb. Bible, but in the LXX Amos follows Hosea. The same is the case in the Syriac Lives of the Prophets. Greg. Naz. says—

Μία μὲν εἰς τὴν ἑσπέρην οἱ δάδεναι.
Ἰσαΐα, καὶ ἀμώζ, καὶ υἱαρχίας ὁ πρῶτος.

† The name has been very variously explained. Jerome, in his preface to Joel, understands it as meaning one who bears a load, but in the preface to Amos he makes it equivalent to the people that is torn asunder. Eusebius gives the alternatives strong, faithful, tearing the people asunder. A Rabbinical tradition asserts that 'the prophet was called Amos because he was heavy (= Heb. amas) of tongue,' and represents the Lord as saying, 'I sent Amos, and they called him stammerer.' The Rabbis ascribed the same physical infirmity to Moses, Isaiah, and Jeremiah. Gesenius (Thes. 1044) was disposed to seek an Egypt. etymology, comparing such familiar Egypt. forms as Amosis, Amasis. But the most probable view is that which traces it to the verb amas (= to bear), and looks on it as meaning burden-bearer or burdened. The attempt at explanation is carried too far when it is suggested that the name was imposed by the child's parents because of the heavy load of poverty which he was doomed to carry.

the OT.* It is almost certain that he was a Judæan by birth: Am 1¹ is not absolutely decisive, but taken in conjunction with 7¹² it seems to prove that he was a citizen of the southern kingdom. The attempts which have been made to prove his northern origin from the spelling of certain words (4¹⁰ 5¹¹ 6^{8, 10} 8³) must be pronounced failures. He owned a small flock of a peculiar breed of sheep, ugly and short-footed, but valuable for their excellent wool [cf. 2 K 3⁴, the only other passage where the word noked (Am 1¹) occurs]. These he pastured in the neighbourhood of Tekoa, in the wilderness of Judah. (See TEKOA.) Part of his livelihood was derived from the lightly-esteemed fruit of a few sycamore trees (7¹⁴). His own account of himself (7^{14, 15}) gives us the impression that, though poor, he was independent, and able, when occasion demanded, to leave his flock for a while. This is more probable than the supposition that he brought his sheep with him from Tekoa to Bethel. It is extremely likely that his father had followed the same occupation, for in the East avocations are hereditary. The omission of the father's name in the superscription of the prophecy would seem to indicate that he did not belong to a distinguished family (contrast Is 1¹, Jer 1¹, Ezk 1³, Hos 1¹, Joel 1¹ etc.). A worthless Jewish tradition makes the wise woman of Tekoa (2 S 14) to have been his grandmother.

In his day it was still common for those who appeared as prophets to come forth from circles where the practices and influences cherished were of such a nature as to prepare men for this high office. But he was doing his ordinary work when the impulse came which brought him to Bethel, the ecclesiastical capital of the N. kingdom, there to denounce the sins of Israel. God called him, without any intermediary (7¹⁵; cf. Gal 1¹), and the call came with a constraining force which left no choice but to follow (3⁸). External events, no doubt, had their influence. It is impossible to read the book without feeling how deeply A. had been impressed by the westward movement of the Assyr. colossus, and we may reasonably believe that the campaigns prosecuted in this direction by Salmanassar III. (783-773 B.C.), or by Assur-danil (773-755 B.C.), had excited his alarm. The note of time 1¹, 'two years before the earthquake,' does not afford much help in dating his mission. Zec 14⁵ assigns this earthquake to the reign of Uzziah of Judah; and Jerome, on Am 1¹, makes bold to identify it with the one which Josephus (Ant. IX. x. 4) asserts to have occurred as a punishment of Uzziah's sacrilege: 'quando iram Domini non solum pœna ejus, qui sacrilegus fuit, sed et terræ motus ostendit, quem Hebræi tunc accidisse commemorant.' Am 1¹ fixes the prophet's activity in the period when Jeroboam II. of Israel was contemporaneous with Uzziah. This period extended from 775 to 750 B.C. The tone of the prophecy leaves little doubt that, when it was delivered, the bulk of Jeroboam's splendid achievements had already been wrought. The ministry of Amos should therefore be dated about 760 B.C. An attempt has recently been made, on the ground of internal evidence, to bring it down a quarter of a century, and date it about 734. This, however, would require us to set aside Am 7¹⁰⁻¹⁷, a section which bears every mark of verisimilitude.

Bethel was the principal scene of his preaching, perhaps the only one. When he had delivered several addresses there, Amaziah, the chief priest of the royal sanctuary, sent a message to the king, who does not seem to have been present, accusing the preacher of treason, and at the same time ordered the latter to quit the realm. Evidently there was some reason to fear that the oppressed poor might be stirred up to revolt against their lords and masters. The threats of coming judgment would disturb many hearers. The denunciation of cruelty and injustice would awake many echoes. Yet the priest's language evinces all the contempt which a highly-placed official feels towards an interfering nobody, a fellow who, as he thinks, gains a precarious livelihood by prophesying. Jeroboam does not seem to have paid much heed. In the Bab. Talm. Pesachim, fol. 87b, it is said: 'How is it proved that Jeroboam did not receive the accusation brought against Amos? . . . The king answered [in reply to Amaziah], God forbid that that righteous man should have said this; and if he hath said it, what can I do to him? The Shechinah hath said it to him.' The conversation is fictitious; but Amos doubtless withdrew unmolested, after disclaiming any official and permanent standing as a prophet, predicting Amaziah's utter destruction because of his impious hindrance of the divine word (7¹⁴⁻¹⁷), and completing the delivery of his own message to Israel (8. 9). On reaching home he doubtless put into writing the substance of his speeches, and the roll thus written is the earliest book of prophecy that has come down to us.

Concerning his subsequent fortunes we are entirely in the dark. A late Christian tradition, originating probably in the 6th century of our era, affirms that Amaziah, the priest of Bethel, struck him frequently, and treacherously abused him, and finally Amaziah's son killed him, striking him on the forehead with a club, because he had rebuked him for the apostasy of worshipping the two golden calves. The prophet survived long enough to reach his own land [another version adds, 'at the end of two days'], and was buried with his fathers. It is much more likely that he reached Tekoa in peace, resumed his shepherd life, and eventually was gathered to his fathers. Jerome and Eusebius affirm that his sepulchre was still shown at Tekoa in their days. When Maundrell was in the neighbourhood in 1737 he was told that the tomb was in the village on the mountain. The Roman Church places Amos amongst the martyrs, and commemorates him on the 31st March, the Gr. Church on the 15th June. Amongst the Jews his freedom of speech gave offence even after his death, for the Koh. Rab. blames Amos, Jeremiah, and Ecclesiastes for their fault-finding, and states that this is the reason why the superscriptions to their books run, 'The words of Amos,' etc., and not, 'The words of God.'

II. THE PROPHECY.

1. The Authenticity of the writing which bears his name has never been seriously questioned. As to its integrity there is good ground for thinking that the following passages are later additions: 1¹⁻² 2¹ 5 4¹³ 5⁸ 9 6² 9⁸ 8¹⁵. Emendations of the Masoretic text have been suggested for the under-mentioned passages, and most of them merit careful consideration: 1¹⁴ 1¹⁵ 2¹³ 3⁵ 9. 11. 12. 14 4¹ 2. 3 5⁶ 9. 11. 12. 16. 26 6² 8. 10. 12 7¹ 2. 4. 14. 17 8⁶ 9⁶ 10. 11.

2. The Contents may be summarised thus:—Chs. 1 and 2: THE INTRODUCTION, which touches on the sins, first of the neighbouring nations and then of Israel, and announces their imminent punishment. Chs. 3-6: THE FIRST MAIN DIVISION OF THE BOOK; 3-4³ A Minatory Discourse, addressed chiefly to the ruling classes; 4¹⁻¹³ A Continuation of the same Speech, now directed to the people in general, detailing the judgments by which God had sought to bring them back to Himself, and sharply pointing out that a more decisive stroke was at hand; 5: A Second Address, in which are contained lamentations, reproofs, exhortations to true religion as opposed to false, threats of ruin and captivity; 6: A Woe upon the Luxurious, the Self-Confident, and the Proud. Chs. 7-9: THE SECOND MAIN DIVISION OF THE BOOK; 7¹⁻⁹ Three Visions; 10-17 The Narrative of the Expulsion of Amos; 8¹⁻² A Fourth Vision, the rest of the chapter being occupied with denunciations of the extortionate traders, the self-indulgent rich, the superstitious pilgrims; 9: The Concluding Vision: The Inevitable Punishment of Wrong-doers: The Messianic Future.

3. The distinguishing characteristics of this prophet's Theology are quite unmistakable:—

(1) His Idea of God.—Amos was an uncompromising monotheist. There is not a verse in his writings that admits the existence of other deities. But his conviction of the divine unity was not the result of philosophic thought and argument. It was an immediate certainty springing out of his deep sense of J''s righteousness, nearness, greatness. So near and so mighty did He seem that there was no room for other gods, and hence there is no discussion of their claims. J'' is all-powerful in Heaven and Sheol, on Carmel and in the depths of the sea, in Caphtor and Kir, and Edom and Tyre. His might is shown in the control of human history (chs. 1 and 2, passim; 5²¹ 6¹⁴ 9⁷), and esp. in His guidance of the fortunes of Israel. Every movement of the national life, spiritual and external, has been under His hand (2⁹⁻¹¹). In all the affairs of men there is no such thing as chance; it is His purposes that are constantly being wrought out: calamity, as well as prosperity, comes from Him (3³⁻⁸). This implies His dominion over Nature, the completeness of which comes out in such sections as 4⁶⁻¹⁰, where every natural calamity and scourge, dearth, drought, mildew, locust, pestilence, is traced to the direct exercise of His will. It scarcely need be added that the personality of God was clear to the prophet's mind. Hence it is that he does not shrink from anthropomorphism: J'' steps forth against the house of Jeroboam like an armed warrior (7⁹); in pity for His people He changes His purposes (7³ etc.).

(2) The relation between J'' and Israel.—In common with all his countrymen, Amos believed that J'' was in a peculiar sense their God, and they His people. But they regarded the bond as a natural and indissoluble one, like that which was conceived to exist between other nations and their deities, so that, provided they paid His dues in the form of sacrifices, He was bound in honour, and for His own sake, to protect and bless them. The prophet, on the contrary, insisted that the relation was a moral one, not merely dissoluble, but certain to be dissolved if they fell below His standard of moral requirements. It is in the insistence on this, and in the statement of these moral requirements, that the splendid originality of Amos is most clearly evinced. Ceremonial worship has no intrinsic value (5²¹⁻²³): the only genuine service of God consists in justice and righteousness (5²⁴); when immorality and oppression are practised by His worshippers, God shrinks from contact with them as from a defilement: inhumanity and unbrotherliness, nay even the failure to respect the sentiments of others (1³⁻²⁴), are hateful to Him when heathens are guilty of them, and much more so when Israel is (3²). As to the illegitimate methods of worshipping the Lord, he has but little to say; 3¹⁴ 4¹ 8¹⁴ show the scorn with which he regarded them. But it is the spirit, not the method, which finds in him so stern an antagonist. His main contention is that ritual, as a substitute for the social virtues, is an abomination. True religion consists in doing good and abstaining from harm. As in the Epistle of St. James, ethical considerations are paramount. Righteousness is the keynote of the prophecy. The word Love does not occur. This bent was due primarily to his apprehension of the divine character. God, to him, was the God of Righteousness rather than of Love. Not, of course, that the sense of the Divine Love is absent; ch. 7¹⁻⁶ is a picture of the placableness which yields to the prophet's intercession, even at the moment when the stroke of punishment is falling. But in this particular Amos stands far below Hosea. The circumstances of the time helped to fix his view. Jeroboam's victories had brought wealth and power to the upper classes, but had left the poor worse off than of old. The basest advantage was taken of this; the wicked meanness of the powerful provoked Amos to contempt (2⁶). Without being what is now called a socialist—for, indeed, he was in no respect a theorist—he felt deeply the rottenness of the social state; the dignity of man was being trampled on; the prevalent luxury was founded on oppression, and was sapping the life of those who practised it. He attacks this luxury unsparingly (6¹⁻⁶); even the custom of reclining at meals, recently introduced from the farther East, is twice rebuked (3² 6⁴). The peasant, as well as the prophet, may be felt here.

(3) The Coming Judgment.—The Book of Amos is the earliest writing in which the term 'The Day of J'' is used. Most probably it was current on the people's lips. They imagined that when the Lord arose in judgment it would be, not only for the establishment of His rule over the whole world, but also to their great benefit; all their sufferings would come to a perpetual end; dominion as large as David's would be restored to Israel. Amos saw that this 'Day' threatened to be one of judgment on Israel itself (5¹⁸⁻²⁰), and its coming appeared so inevitable that he speaks of it as already present. Unlike his predecessors, he looks on the result as totally destructive of the commonwealth (2¹⁴⁻¹⁶ 3¹²⁻¹⁵ 4² 3. 12 5²⁷ 6 passim, 7⁸ 9¹⁻⁴ 7). Repentance would have averted this (4), but the opportunity has passed. The great world-power which will serve as God's instrument is doubtless Assyria, but the prophet stops short of the mention of its name (5²⁷ 6¹⁴). Perhaps he was aware of the weakness under which the Eastern colossus then laboured, but believed that it would stand firmly on its feet again.

(4) The Messianic picture in 9⁸⁻¹⁵.—One of the weightiest reasons for regarding this as a later addition is its incongruousness with the Visions of Judgment which have preceded. It shows us the land entirely purged of the sinners, the rich officials who had abused their power. The Davidic kingdom is restored, no stress, however, being laid on the person or character of the prince at its head. The ancient bounds of the empire are re-established, foreigners, especially the hated Edomites, being reduced anew to subjection. The Israelite exiles have been brought home, and have rebuilt the waste cities. Agriculture and vine-growing flourish to a miraculous degree on a soil of immensely increased fertility. Israel has reached an earthly paradise, and will never be dispossessed.

This is a picture which would have commended itself to the men who heard Amos, as his genuine predictions did not. One point there is in common: everything is human and earthly, there is no trace of expectation of a future life.

In so early a writer as Amos it is surprising to meet with so few signs of sympathy with the modes of thought and expression which were afterwards abandoned by the higher religion of the OT. At 7⁷ he appears to share in the common idea that other lands are unclean to an Israelite. At 9⁸ he adopts the widespread myth of a dangerous serpent inhabiting the sea, the creature, perhaps, which the dwellers on the Mediterranean coast-lands conceived of as swallowing, each evening, the setting sun. At 5⁸ (a disputed passage) there is probably a mythical idea involved in the mention of the constellation of 'The Fool.' (See art. ORION.) At 6¹⁰ (another disputed passage) the superstitious dread of pronouncing the divine name amidst inauspicious surroundings is referred to without reproof.

4. There was a time when Jerome's verdict on the Style of Amos, imperitus sermone, sed non scientia, was generally acquiesced in. Now, however, it is seen that the Christian Father was prejudiced by his Jewish teacher, and that the prophet was as little deficient in style as in knowledge. In point of fact, he is very little inferior to the best OT writers. His language is clear and vigorous; his sentences are well rounded. His imagery, mainly drawn, as was to be expected, from rural life (threshing-sledges, waggon, harvests, grasshoppers, cattle, birds, lions, fishing), is vivid and telling. He knows how to use the refrain (4), and the poetic lament (5²); he is skilful in working up to a climax. Two or three solecisms in spelling may well be set down to transcribers. An Eastern shepherd is not necessarily uncultivated, though his culture be not derived from books. This shepherd's outlook was a wide one (1. 2. 9⁷); his apprehension of the meaning of events uncommonly clear; his knowledge born of reflection and the touch of the Divine Spirit.

The boldness of his style was an expression of the boldness of the man and his thoughts. It required no small courage for a Judean to enter Israelite territory for the express purpose of interfering in the religious and social life of the nation, denouncing everything as corrupt, threatening swift and utter ruin. Nor is that all. No speaker ever ran counter to the most cherished convictions of his auditors more daringly than the prophet who told them that the destinies of other nations are as really guided by God as those of His chosen people; 9⁷ is almost a contradiction of 3². His courage was derived from his conviction of the reality and dignity of his mission. When the Lord God hath spoken, the man who hears Him cannot but prophesy. And whoever else may fail to hear, the prophet does not; he is of the Privy Council (3⁷⁻⁸, cf. Gn 18¹⁷). That is the starting-point of Hebrew prophecy.

AMOZ (אָמֹז), father of the prophet Isaiah (2 K 19², Is 1¹, etc.), to be carefully distinguished from Amos (אִמּוֹשׁ) the prophet. See AMOS (p. 85^b n.)

AMPHIPOLIS (Ἀμφίπολις). — Amphipolis, mentioned in Ac 17¹ as a stage in St. Paul's mission-journey from Philippi to Thessalonica, was a city of Macedonia. It was situated on the eastern bank of the river Strymon, about 3 miles from the sea, closer to which lay its seaport Eion. The river, on leaving Lake Cercinitis, winds in a semi-circle round the base of a terraced hill, on which the town was built, protected by the river on three sides, and by a wall along the landward chord of the arc. It was, as Thucydides (iv. 102) says, conspicuous (περιφανής) toward sea and land; and this is probably the import of its name, 'the all-around (visible) city' (Classen, in loc., who suggests the parallel of Umbstadt in Upper Hesse). Its importance, already marked by its earlier name 'Nine Ways' (Ἐννέα ὁδοί), made its possession keenly contested, alike on military and mercantile grounds. The Athenians founded a colony under Hagnon in B.C. 437, which presented a history of chequered fortunes and varied interest, in its surrender to Brasidas, the fight under its walls between Brasidas and Cleon in which both fell, its refusal to submit again to the mother-city, its repeated attempts to assert its independence, till it passed into the possession of the Macedonians under Perdiccas and Philip, and eventually into that of the Romans. By these A. was constituted a free city, and made the capital of the first of the four districts into which, in B.C. 167, they divided the province (Liv. xlv. 18. 29). The Via Egnatia passed through it. It was called in the Middle Ages Popolia (Tafel, Thessal. p. 498 f.), and is now represented by a village called Neochori, in Turkish Jenikoei (see plan in Leake, N.G. ii. 191). Zoilus, the carping critic of Homer, was a native, and wrote a history of it in three books (Suidas, s.v.).

WILLIAM P. DICKSON.

AMPLIATUS (Ἀμπλιᾶτος, RV correctly with * A B F G, Vulg. Boh. Orig., for TR Ἀμπλιᾶς, DELP, AV Amplias, the abbrev. form). — A Christian greeted by St. Paul (Ro 16⁸) as the 'beloved in the Lord.' It is a very common Roman slave name. (Lightfoot, Philippians, p. 172; CIL vi. 4899, 5154, etc.)

Some further interest attaches to the name. It occurs in one of the earliest chambers of the Catacomb of St. Domitilla, inscribed in large, bold letters over a cell belonging to the end of the 1st or beginning of the 2nd cent. A later inscription in the same chamber also contains the same name. The simplicity of the earliest inscription suggests a slave, and the prominence assigned to the name suggests that it belonged to some prominent member of the early Roman Church, perhaps a member of the household of Domitilla.

AMRAM. — (אֲמֵרָם 'the people is exalted'). 1. A Levite, son of Kohath and grandson of Levi (Nu 3¹⁷⁻¹⁹, 1 Ch 6^{2. 3. 18}). He married Jochebed his father's sister, by whom he begat Aaron and Moses (Ex 6¹⁸⁻²⁰) and Miriam (Nu 26⁵⁹, 1 Ch 6³). 2. A son of Bani who had contracted a marriage with a 'strange woman' in the time of Ezra (Ezr 10³⁴).

Amramites, The (אֲמֵרָמִי). — A branch of the Kohathite family of the tribe of Levi. The name occurs in the account of the census taken by Moses (Nu 3²⁷), and again in the Chronicler's account of the organisation of the Levites in the time of David (1 Ch 26²³).

W. C. ALLEN.

AMRAPHEL (אֲמֵרָפֶל), mentioned as 'king of Shinar' (Gn 14¹). Schrader, who suggested that the name was a corruption for 'Amraphi' (אֲמֵרָפִי), was the first to identify this king with Khammurabi, the 6th king in the 1st Dynasty of Babylon. The cuneiform inscriptions inform us that Khammurabi was king of Babylon and N. Babylonia; that he rebelled against the supremacy of Elam; that he overthrew his rival Eri-aku, king of Larsa; and, after conquering Sumer and Accad, was the first to make a united kingdom of Babylonia. He reigned 55 years. Winckler gives the date of his reign as 2264-2210: Sayce (Patr. Pal. p. 12) gives 2320 as the date of his uniting Babylonia. But the chron. is uncertain. The name is given by Hommel as Chammurapaltu (Gesch. d. Morgenlandes, p. 58), and it has sometimes been transcribed as Chammu-ragas. Mr. Pinches considers Amraphel to be a Sem. name = Amar-apla = Amar-pal ('I see a son'), or Amra-apla = Amrapal ('see a son').

It is clear that the identification is not free from difficulty, so far as the Biblical account is concerned. (1) The date of Khammurabi, according to the reckoning of Winckler and Sayce, etc., is 400 years earlier than the cent. to which Gn 14 is generally ascribed. (2) A. is described as 'king of Shinar'; and Shinar has generally been identified with Shumer, the S. part of Babylonia. Khammurabi, while subject to the suzerainty of Elam, was king of Babylon and N. Babylonia, but not of Shumer or S. Babylonia. This difficulty has been met by the assumption that Shinar is to be understood to denote in Gn all Chaldaea, of which Babylon was the capital. No great exactitude in geog. terms can be expected. Shinar (Sangar), in the inscriptions, seems to be situated in Mesopotamia. Possibly Heb. tradition confused the Shinar of Mesopotamia with the Shumer of S. Babylonia.

It seems best at present to suspend judgment upon this much disputed identification. The results of Assyriological research in illustration of Gn 14 are still much disputed.

Jos. (Ant. i. ix.) transcribes the name as Ἀμαραφίδης, although the LXX has Ἀμαρράφελ.

H. E. RYLE.

AMULETS (אֲמוּלִּים Is 3³⁰, AV ear-rings). — 1. Origin. The connexion with lahash, to mutter as a snake-charmer (Ps 58⁵), points to something that has had whispered or chanted over it words of power and protection. Cf. Heb. hartom, magician, and its connexion with heret, the graving-pen of the learned writer, and the Arab. 'talisman' similarly associated with the tailasan or long robe of the sacred dervish. The same idea of power through secret lore and sanctity is exemplified at the present day in Jerus., where crucifixes, pictures of the Virgin, and rosaries are laid on the pavement at the door of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre so as to give them this holy value in the market.

2. Meaning. The central meaning of the a. is something that faith may clasp as a prophylactic against known and unknown dangers. It assumes a connexion between holiness and healing, between piety and prosperity, the first being appreciated for the sake of the second. It is a testimony to the sense of sin, for it is only that which is wanting in holiness that requires to be covered or protected. Hence the Arab. proverb says, 'The eye of the sun needs no veil.' Its light is pure, and therefore no protection is required.

The a. unites the protector and the protected; what lays a duty on divine power lays on human weakness a corresponding devotion. Fulness of consecration makes fulness of claim. Hence to the Oriental mind familiar with this amulet faith, the words seem very natural, 'Be strong in the Lord, and in the power of His might,' 'Perfect love casteth out fear.' 'I can do all things in Him that strengtheneth me.' Thus the a. has a true word of power, for it teaches, 'When I am devoted, I am endued.' By a similar vehicle the apostle reaches the experience which says, 'When I am weak, then am I strong.'

3. Classification. This corresponds with the dangers and the points of contact. There is an a. for the heart (illustr. 1) worn almost universally in the East. It is a locket suspended over the breast, and consists sometimes of a small metal case of

With this may be classed the neck-amulet. See CRESCENT. Similarly, there were a^s for the nose and mouth for the dangers by inhalation; for the ear and the temptations of hearing; for the eye and what meets its vision (illustr. 3, 7, 8). And so the veil for the head and face, and the sheet enveloping the whole figure of the Oriental woman, now the formalities of modesty, were doubtless once full of superstitious meaning. See VEIL. Amulet articles among the Jews are chiefly the fringes of large and small tallith: the mezuza; the paper with Ps 121 and certain Abracadabra formulae, which the Rabbi puts in the room where there is an infant less than eight days old; and the phyllacteries of the brow and arm. See PHYLACTERY. Amulets are also used for the protection, not only of animals such as camels and horses, but even for newly-built houses, such protection usually taking the form of a roughly-drawn human hand in black or red, or of a cactus plant or aloe hung AMZI (אמזי).—1. A Merarite, 1 Ch 6⁴⁶. 2. A priest in the second temple, Neh 11¹². See GENEALOGY.

AN.—1. An, called the indef. article, is the old Eng. form of the num. adj. one. As early as 1150 the n is found dropped before a consonant, and at the date of the AV the usage had become general to employ a before a consonantal sound (including u and eu pronounced yw), and an before a vowel sound (including silent h). Some hesitation is found when the art. precedes a word beginning with wh. Thus we find 'an whole' in Nu 10² (ed. of 1611), but 'a whole' in Nu 11³⁰; 'an whore' in Pr 23²⁷ (ed. 1611), 2 Es 16⁴⁹ (ed. 1611), but 'a whore' elsewhere. Again, the ed. of 1611 gives 'such an one' in Job 14³, Sir 6¹⁴ 10⁹ 20¹⁵, 2 Mac 6²⁷; but 'such a one' in Gn 41³⁸, Ru 4¹, Ps 50²¹ 68²¹, Sir 26²⁸, 1 Co 5^{5.11}, 2 Co 10¹¹ 12^{2.5}, Gal 6¹, Philem⁹. Later edd. give 'such an one' in all these passages.

More varied is the usage when the art. precedes h. In the ed. of 1611 (the later edd. have made many changes) we find 'a habitation,' Jer 33¹², but 'an hab.' in Ex 15², Is 22¹⁶ 34¹³ and other five places; 'a hair' in 1 K 1³², Lk 21¹⁸, but 'an hair' in Dn 3²⁷, Mk 21¹⁸, Ac 27³⁴; 'a hairy,' Gn 27¹¹, but 'an hairy,' Gn 25²⁵, 2 K 1⁸; 'a hammer,' Jer 23²⁹, but 'an hammer,' Jg 4²¹; and so with many other words. The explanation of this inconsistency probably is, not that the usage for a or an was not fixed, but that there was no fixed pronunciation of h. On the whole, an is found more frequently than a before words beginning with h.

2. In 'an hungered' ('a hungered' is not found in AV 1611), which occurs Mt 4² 12¹. 3 25^{35.37.42.44}, Mk 2²⁵, Lk 6³, the an is not the indef. art., but the prep. an or on. See A³.

ANAB (אנאב 'grapes').—A city of Judah in the Negeb hills (Jos 11²¹ 15⁵⁰), inhabited first by the Anakim. Now the ruin Anab near Debir. It is noticed as still a village in the 4th cent. A.D. (Onomasticon, s.v. Anab). SWP vol. iii. sh. xxiv.

ANAEL (אנאל, but אנאל Syr. and Heb., and אנאל Aram.) was brother of Tobit and father of Achiacharus, To 1²¹.

ANAH (אנח).—1. A daughter of Zibeon, and mother of Oholibamah, one of Esau's wives, Gn 36^{2.14.18.25} (R). The mention of a daughter in this genealogical list has been used to prove that kinship amongst the Horites was traced through women (W. R. Smith in Journal of Philology, ix. p. 50). As is pointed out, however, in RVn, some ancient authorities (including LXX. Sam. Pesh.) read son instead of daughter, which would identify this A. with 2. a son of Zibeon, Gn 36²⁴ (R), 1 Ch 14^{40.41}. 3. A Horite 'duke,' brother of Zibeon, Gn 36^{20.29} (R), 1 Ch 1³⁸. If we take A. as an eponym rather than a personal name, and think of relationships between clans rather than individuals, it is quite possible to reduce the above three references to one. This can be done all the more readily by adopting with Kautzsch in Gn 36² the reading אֲנַח 'the Horite' as in v. 20 instead of MT אֲנַח 'the Hivite.' In regard to No. 2 the note is appended, 'This is A. who found the hot springs (AV the mules) in the wilderness, as he fed the asses of Zibeon his father' (Gn 36²⁴). For the Heb. אֲנַח which is a δπ. λεγ., LXX offers the unintelligible ἄνῃς ἄνῃς, Sam. has אֲנַח 'the Emim' (an aboriginal race of giants mentioned in Gn 14⁵, Dt 2^{10.11}), and is followed by Onk. and Pseud.-Jon. It was simply the context that gave rise to the conjecture accepted by Luther and AV that the word means mules. The Vulg. trn. (aguas calidas) prob. is correct (so Kautzsch, 'die heißen Quellen'), and 'the hot springs' may possibly be identified with Callirrhōē to the E. of the Dead Sea. The chief difficulty in accepting this interpretation is that no root for the word can be discovered which would suit such a meaning (Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v.; cf. Dillmann and Delitzsch on Genesis, l.c.).

ANAHARATH (אנחארת), Jos 19¹⁸, mentioned with Shion ('Ayan Sh'atn) and Rabbith (Raba) on the east side of the Plain of Esdraelon in Issachar. It is the modern en-Na'urah of Jezreel in the Valley of Jezreel. SWP vol. ii. sheet ix.

ANANIAH (אנניא 'J' hath answered').—1. A Levite Neh 8⁴, called Ananias 1 Es 9⁴⁸. 2. One of those who sealed the covenant Neh 10²².

ANAK, ANAKIM (אנאק, אנאקים, Ἐνάκ-ιμ).—It is often said that Anak is the name of the person from whom the Anakim were regarded as having their descent. But the name Anak occurs without the article only in the descriptive phrase 'sons of Anak' Dt 9², Nu 13³³ 'And there we saw the Nephilim, the sons of Anak of the Nephilim.' If we have any account of a person called A., this is the account; and he is said to be one of the ancient Nephilim or demigods. (See NEPHILIM). But probably here, as in all the other places (Jos 15^{13.14} 21¹¹, Jg 1²⁰, Nu 13^{22.28}), we have a descriptive phrase for a race of men, rather than the name of an ancestor. In these other places the article is used. We have 'the Anak,' or 'the Anok,' the word being used collectively, and denoting the race, just as does the plural Anakim. If a progenitor for this race is mentioned, he is Arba (which see), and not Anak.

The Anakim were of the giant race (Nu 13^{32.38}, Dt 1²⁸ 2^{10.11.12.20.21} 9^{1.2}). They had their seat notably at Hebron, but also farther N., and near the Mediter. coast (Jos 14¹²⁻¹⁵ 11^{21.22}). They seem to have been, however, rather a race of men than an independent people or group of peoples. Politically, they were Amorite or Perizzite or Philistine, as the case might be. The wars in which Joshua and Caleb conquered them were not separate from their wars against the Can. peoples. Presumably the Anakim were relatively unimportant, were subordinate to the Amorite, and were for that very reason the more formidable as fighters against a common enemy. For additional particulars see GIANT and REPHAIM.
W. J. BEECHER.

ANAMIM.—The Anamim (אנמיים, Ἐνεμιεῖται, Anemietai) are stated in the ethnographical list Gn 10¹³, 1 Ch 1¹¹, to have been descendants, or a tribe, of Mizraim, i.e. Egypt. They have not yet been identified. The attempts to discover this people in one or other of the races represented on the Egypt. monuments have been based on some more or less striking similarity in the name. Ebers identifies them with the Aamu or Naamu (Anamaima), i.e. cowherds, who are included among the tribes ruled by the Pharaohs 15th or 14th cent. B.C. They occupy the second place in the procession (after the Rutu or Lutu), and are represented as reddish men of Sem. type, as is shown by the head of the man who represents them in the grave of Seti I. They immigrated into Egypt before the Hyksos from Asia. Their capital was on the Bucolic arm of the Nile, and, in addition to being cattle rearers, they were importers of Asiatic products to Egypt (see Riehm, HWB).
J. MILLAR.

ANAMMELECH (אָנאַמעלעך).—A god worshipped along with Adramelech with rites like those of Molech by the foreign settlers brought by the Assyrians to Samaria (2 K 17³¹, cf. v. 24). The worshippers are said to have come from Sepharvaim=Sabara'in, a Syrian city destroyed by Shalmaneser (Bab. Chronicle, col. i. line 28, in Winckler, Keilinschr. Textbuch. Cf. Halévy, ZA, ii. 401, 402). Winckler (AT Untersuchungen, p. 97 ff.), doubting that Syrians would be settled in Samaria, a district so near their own land, takes Sepharvaim as a false reading, or false editorial correction, introduced from 2 K 18³⁴, for Sipar (Sippar), the well-known city of Northern Babylonia.

The first part of the word Anammelech contains perhaps the name of the Bab. god of the sky, or of a third of the sky, Anu. The whole name is taken by Schrader (*KAT*², 1883, p. 284) to mean 'Anu is prince,' but the meaning is doubtful. Possibly the writer of Kings meant by the name to identify the Bab. Anu with the Ammonite Molech—Anu-Molech. W. E. BARNES.

ANAN (אַנאַן, cf. Sabeian אַנאַן).—1. One of those who sealed the covenant, Neh 10²⁶. 2. 1 Es 5³⁰=Hanani, Ezr 2⁴⁶, Neh 7⁴⁰.

ANANI (אַנאַני=אַנאַני).—A son of Elioenai, 1 Ch 3²⁴.

ANANIAH (אַנאַניאַה 'J' hath covered'), Neh 3²².—The father of Maaseiah, and grandfather of Azariah, who took part in rebuilding the walls of Jerus. He was probably a priest. Cf. v. 22.

ANANIAH (אַנאַניאַה Neh 11³²).—A town inhabited by Benjamites after the Captivity. According to Robinson, the present Beit Hanina, a village 2 miles N. of Jerusalem. The position near Nob and Anathoth, and east of Gibeon, renders this identification probable. See ELON; and SWP vol. iii. sh. xiv. C. R. CONDER.

ANANIAS.—A 'disciple' who lived in Damascus, and to whom the Lord appeared in a vision, bidding him go and baptize Saul of Tarsus. Saul had been prepared for his coming by a vision. A. hesitated at first, knowing Saul's reputation as a persecutor; but, being encouraged by the Lord, went and laid his hands upon Saul, who received his sight, arose, and was baptized. Such is the account in Ac 9¹⁰⁻¹⁸. In St. Paul's speech to the multitude at Jerus. (Ac 22¹²⁻¹⁶) we are told that A. was a man 'devout according to the law' and one 'to whom witness was borne by all the Jews that dwelt' at Damascus; and some further words of his to St. Paul are given in which he speaks of Christ as 'the Just One.' He is not mentioned in St. Paul's speech to Agrippa.

The traditions about him are not of a primitive kind. In Pseudo-Dorotheus' list of the 72 disciples (and also in the Hippolytean list) he occurs fifth in order, after Thaddæus and before Stephen, and is represented as Bishop of Damascus. In the Bk of the Bee by Solomon of Basra (1222), (c. xlix. ed. Wallis Budge), A. is numbered among the seventy. He was the disciple of the Baptist, and taught in Damascus and Arbél. He was slain by Pôl, the general of the army of Aretas, and was laid in the church which he built at Arbél. The Gr. Meneæ (Oct. 1) say that he did many cures in Damascus and Eleutheropolis (being bishop of the former place), and was tormented with scourging and burning by Lucian the Prefect (Rom. Mart. Licinius), and was finally cast out of the city and stoned. The Basilian Menology adds that he was ordained by Peter and Andrew, and gives a picture of him being stoned by two men. The Abyssinian Calendar commemorates him on the 6th of Tekemt. In the Rom. Martyrology he occurs on Jan. 25; in the Armenian on Oct. 15.

The full Gr. acts of his martyrdom have never been printed, but the Bollandists, under Jan. 25, give a Lat. VS of them, in which the scene of his preaching is said to have been Bethagoure or Betagabra, near Eleutheropolis. He is likely to have been among the personal disciples of the Lord, and has a better claim to stand in the list of the seventy disciples than most of those who appear in the work of Pseudo-Dorotheus.

ANANIAS ('Ananias=Heb. אַנַּנְיָאָ 'J' hath been gracious').—1. A son of Emmer (1 Es 9²¹)=Hanani of Ezr 10²⁶. 2. A son of Bebai (1 Es 9²⁹)=Hananiah of Ezr 10²⁸. 3. One of those who stood at Ezra's right hand at the reading of the law (1 Es 9⁴⁸)=Anaiiah of Neh 8⁴. 4. A Levite (1 Es 9⁴⁸)=Hanani of Neh 8⁷. 5. The name which the angel Raphael gave as that of his father, when he introduced himself to Tobit under the assumed name of Azarias (To 5^{12, 13}). 6. An ancestor of Judith (Jth 8¹). 7. The husband of Sapphira. He fell down dead at the rebuke of St. Peter, and the same fate, three hours afterwards, befell his wife (Ac 5¹⁴). The intention of this narrative is sometimes misunderstood as regards both the offence of these persons and the cause of their death. It is quite a mistake to suppose that a rigid system of communism was enforced in the Jerusalem Church, and that A. and Sapphira by 'keeping back part of the price' violated a rule they had pledged themselves to obey. St. Peter's words suffice to refute this notion: 'Whiles it remained, did it not remain thine own? and after it was sold, was it not in thy power?' But it was inexcusable hypocrisy to retain part of the price and pretend to surrender the whole. 'They wished to serve two masters, but to appear to serve only one' (Meyer). As to the fact of their sudden death, even Baur and Weizsäcker admit that a genuine tradition underlies the narrative. As to its cause, whatever this may have been from a secondary point of view, there can be no doubt that in Acts it is traced to the deliberate will and intention of St. Peter. (Note esp. v. 9 and cf. the parallel case of St. Paul and Elymas in Ac 13¹¹.)

8. See preceding article. 9. The high priest before whom St. Paul was brought by Claudius Lysias (Ac 23¹⁴), and whose outrageous conduct upon this occasion provoked the apostle to apply to him the contemptuous epithet of 'whited wall.' The same A. shortly afterwards appeared at Cæsarea amongst St. Paul's accusers before Felix (Ac 24¹⁴). He was the son of Nedebeus, and held the high priesthood from c. 47-59 A.D. He owed his appointment to the office to Herod of Chalcis. During his administration there were bitter quarrels between the Jews and the Samaritans, and these seemed on one occasion likely to lead to his deposition. On account of a massacre of some Galileans by the Samaritans, the latter had been attacked and many of their villages plundered by the Jews. A. was accused of complicity in these acts of violence, and was sent by Quadratus, the governor of Syria, to stand his trial at Rome. Powerful influence was at work at the imperial court on the side both of the Samaritans and the Jews; but, thanks to the efforts of the younger Agrippa, Claudius gave his decision in favour of the high priest, and A. returned to discharge the functions of an office which he disgraced by his rapacity and violence. It was no uncommon thing for him to send his servants to the threshing-floors to take the tithes by force, while he defrauded the inferior priests of their dues, and left some of them to die of starvation. His own end was a miserable one. His sympathies had always been with the Romans, and he had thus incurred the hatred of the nationalist party. When the great rebellion broke out which ended in the siege and destruction of Jerus., A. concealed himself, but was discovered, and murdered by the fanatical populace.

ANATH (אנא), the father of Shamgar, Jg 3³¹ 5⁶. 'Anát is the name of a goddess worshipped in Pal., cf. Jg 1³³, Jos 15⁵⁹, Is 10³⁰; it is found on Egyptian monuments from the 18th dynasty.

ANATHEMA. See ACCURSED.

ANATHOTH (אנאֶתוֹת).—1. A town in Benjamin assigned to the Levites (Jos 21¹⁸, 1 Ch 6⁶⁰), named from (possibly plural of) 'Anáth or 'Anát, a Chaldean deity worshipped among the Canaanites (Sayce, Hibbert Lect. pp. 187–189; Vogüé, Mel. 41 ff.), now called 'Anáta. It is situated 2½ miles north-east of Jerusalem over the shoulder of Scopas. There are still twelve or fifteen houses on the spot, and the remains of what was apparently a handsome church. From its commanding position it has a fine view northward and also eastward over the broken hills of the wilderness, stretching down towards the north end of the Salt Sea. It was the home of Abiathar, 1 K 2²⁶; of Abiezer, one of David's thirty captains, 2 S 23²⁷; of Jehu, one of his mighty men, 1 Ch 12²³, and of Jeremiah the prophet, Jer 1¹. It was recaptured after the Exile (Ezr 2²³, Neh 7²⁷, 1 Es 5¹⁸). A quarry at 'Anáta still supplies building stone to Jerusalem. The vision of the dreary wilderness to the east, and the scorching of its dry winds which Jeremiah was familiar with in his native town, have imprinted themselves on his prophecies. To one standing upon Scopas, Anathoth is lying at his feet, Is 10³⁰.

2. A personal name—(a) the son of Becher a Benjamite, 1 Ch 7⁸. Possibly this and Alemeth following are names of towns in which sons of Becher dwelt. (b) Neh 10¹⁹, possibly stands for 'men of Anathoth' (7²⁷).

Anathothite (אֲנַתוֹתִי) is the uniform designation in RV of an inhabitant of Anathoth. AV offers such variants as Anetothite, Anethothite, Antothite.

ANCHOR.—See SHIP.

ANCIENT has now a narrow range of usage. In AV it is freely applied to men, as Ezk 9⁶ 'then they began at the a. men'; Ezr 3¹² 'many of the priests and Levites . . . a. (RV 'old') men.' Cf. Luttrell (1704), 'Sir Samuel Astry (being very ancient) has resigned his place of clerk'; and Penn, Life (1718), 'This A.M.C. aforesaid, is an Ancient Maid.' Following the Heb. (and LXX) a. is used as a subst., as Is 3² 'the judge and the prophet and the prudent and the a.'; but esp. in the plur., as Ps 119¹⁰⁰ 'I understand more than the a.' (RV 'aged'). In these places 'the ancients' are mostly a definite class, the Elders of Israel, or of some tribe or city. See ELDER IN OT.

Wright (*Word Book*² p. 36) points out that 'the ancient' is used for the plur. in the Pref. of 1611; it is probable that in Job 12¹² we have an instance of the same: 'With the ancient (RV 'with aged men') is wisdom'; while Sir 39¹ is unmistakable, 'seek out the wisdom of all the ancient' (πᾶντων ἀρχαίων, RV 'ancients').

J. HASTINGS.

ANCIENT OF DAYS (אֲדָמִי קָדֵם).—A common Syriac expression, used three times of the Divine Being in Daniel (7⁹, 13, 22), at first without the article (wrongly inserted by AV in v.⁹), and meaning simply 'old,' 'aged,' (see RV). The expression has no reference to the eternity of God, and does not bear upon the question of the date of the book, as if it carried a contrast to the New Divinities introduced by Antiochus Epiphanes. It is a representation natural to the fearless anthropomorphism of the Bible, which never hesitates to attribute to the Deity the form and features of man. The object is to convey the impression of a venerable and majestic aspect.

אָדָמִי, ancient, is properly an Aram. word: in Heb. it occurs once only, in the late passage 1 Ch 4²².

A. S. AGLLEN.

ANCLE (Ezk 47³) and ancle-bones (Ac 37).—This is the spelling of AV after Coverdale and Tindale. Camb. Bible and RV spell ankle. In old Eng. the spelling is indifferent. Shaks. has even anckle. Besides the above, RV gives 'ankle chains' in Nu 31⁵⁰ (AV 'chains'), and in Is 3²⁰ (AV 'ornaments of the legs').

J. HASTINGS.

AND is used in AV both as a copulative and as a conditional conjunction. 1. As a copul. conj., the Oxf. Dict. points out the use of and to express the consequence, as Gn 1³ 'God said, Let there be light; and there was light'; Lk 7⁸ 'I say unto one, Go, and he goeth'; Mt 8³ 'Speak the word only, and my servant shall be healed'; Lk 10²⁸ 'This do, and thou shalt live.' Cf. Scottish Paraphrases 35³—

'My broken body thus I give

For you, for all; take, eat, and live.

Thus and is often more than a mere copula. It even has an adversative force in 'he answered and said, I go, sir: and went not' (Mt 21³⁰). 2. In middle Eng. and was used conditionally (= if), a usage which Skeat and others believe to have been borrowed from Iceland. Cf. Bacon, Essays, 'It is the nature of extreme self-lovers, as they will set an house on fire, and it were but to roast their egges.' Of this use of and Wright points to Gn 44³⁰, Nu 5³⁰ as examples. When and meant if, it was often spelt an, and was often strengthened by adding if. Hence we find and, an, an if, and if, all = if. In AV we have Mt 24⁴⁸ (Lk 12⁴⁵) 'But and if (RV 'But if') that evil servant shall say in his heart'; Lk 20⁶ 'But and if (RV 'But if') we say'; 1 Co 7²⁸ 'But and if (RV 'But if') thou marry'; 1 P 3¹⁴ 'But and if (so RV) ye suffer.' Except 1 P 3¹⁴ (ἀλλ' ἐν καί), the Gr. is always ἐάν δέ.

J. HASTINGS.

ANDREW.—The first-called apostle, brother of Simon Peter; their father's name was Jonas or John, and their native city was Bethsaida of Galilee. Their mother's name is traditionally Joanna.

NAME.—The name Andreas (Ἀνδρέας) is Greek. It is usually believed to occur first in Herodotus (vi. 126), where it is the name of the great-grandfather of Cleisthenes of Sicyon. It occurs also in Dio Cassius (lxviii. 32), in the form Ἀνδρέλας, as the name of a rebel Jew in Crete in Trajan's reign. There are other instances of the name, but it is not very common.

REFERENCES TO HIM IN NT.—In the Synoptists the call of Peter and A. while they were fishing is narrated by Mt 4¹⁸⁻²² and Mk 1¹⁶⁻²⁰. It took place at the Sea of Galilee. The narrative in no way implies that this was their first meeting with the Lord. The name of A. next occurs in Mk 1²⁹, where Jesus enters the house of Simon and A. and hears the mother-in-law of Peter. Next in the list of the Twelve, where Mt and Lk place him after Peter and before James and John, while Mk's order is Peter, James and John, Andrew. In Mk 13⁸ he is coupled with Peter, James, and John in the question put to our Lord about the time of the End. His name does not elsewhere occur in the Synoptists. In St. John's Gospel he is much more prominent. In ch. 1 A. is a disciple of John the Baptist. He hears the words, 'Behold the Lamb of God,' follows Christ, and spends a day with Him. He then brings his brother Peter to Christ, and may probably have had to do also with the call of Philip, who was of the same city. In ch. 6 it is A. who volunteers information about the lad with the loaves and fishes, on the occasion of the feeding of the five thousand. In ch. 12 the Greeks who desire to see Jesus apply to Philip; Philip tells A.; and the two tell Jesus. In Ac 1 A. occurs for the last time, in the list of the apostles, following James and John, and preceding Philip (as in St. Mark).

SUBSEQUENT TRADITIONS.—In the 2nd cent. A. was the hero of one of the romances attributed to Leucius, a Docetic writer. We have a fairly comprehensive abridgment of this book in the Miracula Andrae of Gregory of Tours, besides some episodes and fragments of the original Gr., in part yet unedited. The fullest discussion of the literature is in Lipsius, Apokryphen Apostelgeschichten (i. 543-622); see also Bonnet's ed. of some late Gr. Encomia, based on the Leucian Acts, in Analecta Bollandiana (xiii., and separately).

Briefly summarised, the literature consists of:—

(1) Acta Andrae et Matthaei (or Matthiae), ed. by Tischendorf, Act. Apost. Apocr. Matthew or Matthias is a captive in the land of the Anthropophagi. Christ sends A. to rescue him; and then assumes the guise of a seaman and takes A. and his disciples (who seem to be Alexander and Rufus) to the country in question. Matthew is rescued, and A. is tormented by the savage natives for several days. He then causes a flood to overwhelm the city; the result is a general conversion. The most interesting part of the story is perhaps the account of a miracle done by our Lord, which A. narrates during the voyage. We have this legend in Ethiopic, Syriac, and Anglo-Saxon: the last-named is a poetical version by Cynewulf, the Northumbrian poet, preserved in the famous Vercelli Codex.

(2) Acta Petri et Andrae, ed. Tischendorf in Apocalypses Apocryphae. Imperfect in Gr.; extant (as Acts of St. Jude) in Ethiopic, and complete in Old Slavonic. It contains a realisation of our Lord's saying about the camel passing through a needle's eye. It is exceedingly doubtful whether this belonged to the original Leucian novel.

(3) Miracula Andrae, by Gregory of Tours, ed. Bonnet, in the 2nd vol. of Gregory's works in the Monumenta Germaniae Historica. This must be coupled with the Gr. Encomia, which cover much the same ground.

The scene of A.'s preaching is laid in the land of the Anthropophagi (Myrrmidonia), then in Amasea, Sinope, Nicæa, Nicomedia, Byzantium, Thrace, Macedonia, and Patrae in Achaia, where the martyrdom takes place.

The traditions of the martyrdom at Patrae are fairly constant. A. is crucified by the pro-consul Aegeas or Aegeates, because by his preaching he has induced the pro-consul's wife Maximilla to leave her husband. Until recently the best authority for the martyrdom was taken to be a certain Epistle of the priests and deacons of Achaia, first published by Woog in 1749, and then by Tischendorf. However, M. Max Bonnet has proved in an article in the Byzantinische Zeitschrift (1894) that this is a tr. from Lat. into Gr. The nearest approach which we as yet possess to the Gr. original is in the Miracula and Encomia, coupled with some quotations made by Augustine and others.

So much for our knowledge of the Leucian Acts.

We possess Acts of A. in Coptic (fragmentary) and Ethiopic, some of which couple this apostle with Bartholomew and with Paul. The Acts of A. and Bartholomew seem to be modelled on those of A. and Matthew. Those of A. and Paul, which are incomplete, and exist only in Coptic, give an account of Paul's descent into Hades by way of the sea, of his return, and of how a Scarabæus (δίζαυρον) was employed by the two apostles to obtain entrance for them into a city which the Jews had shut against them. The Egyp. Acts of A. assign crucifixion and stoning as the manner of his death.

Other traditions may be mentioned. Origen (ap. Eus. HE iii. 1) makes A. preach among the Scythians, that is, on the Black Sea; cf. the Leucian Acts. At Sinope an image of A., said to have been made in his lifetime, was long preserved; and also the seat where he taught, which was of white marble. He was regarded as the apostle of Byzantium, where he ordained Stachys as first bishop.

Lipsius believes that the legend of the preaching in Achaia arose from a confusion between the Tauric branch of the Achæans on the E. shore of the Black Sea, and the Achæans in the N. of the Peloponnese.

A. appears as the author of a gospel condemned in the so-called Gelasian Decree. No trace of it is to be found elsewhere. There are references to him in the Clementine Recognitions (i. 56, where he answers the Sadducees; ii. 62 sqq.). He appears as legislator in the Ἔρησι καὶ κανόνεσσι, and in the Apostolic Constitutions. He also figures in the Acts of Polyxena and Xanthippe. His relics were rediscovered in Justinian's time at Constantinople; and remained there until 1210, when Cardinal Peter of Capua brought them to Amalfi. They are said to have been brought from Patrae to Constantinople in 357 or 358 by Artemius. His cross, or part of it, is in St. Peter's at Rome, enclosed in one of the four great piers of the dome.

The appropriation of the decussate or saltire cross to St. Andrew is of very late date. In the 13th cent. (e.g. in a statue at Amiens) he commonly holds the upright cross.

Documents relating to the translation of the arm of St. Andrew into Scotland by St. Regulus (who is variously placed, in the 4th, 5th, and 9th cent.) may be seen in the Bollandists under Oct. 17.

His festival in the Lat. and Gr. Churches is on Nov. 30; it occurs in the Lat. Martyrium, and in the Kalendar of Carthage.

ANDRONICUS (Ἀνδρόνικος).—A Christian greeted by St. Paul in Ro 16⁷ together with Junias. They are described as being (1) 'kinsmen of St. Paul,' probably implying 'fellow-countrymen.' The word is used in this sense in Ro 9⁹. It would be unlikely that so many as are mentioned in this chapter (vv. 7-11-21) should be kinsmen in a more literal sense. (2) They are called by St. Paul his 'fellow-prisoners.' They may have shared with the apostle some unrecorded imprisonment (cf. 2 Co 11²³, Clem. Rom. ad Cor. v.), or, like him, been imprisoned for Christ's sake. It is unlikely that the term is used in a metaphorical sense. (3) They were 'distinguished among the apostles,' a phrase which probably means that they were distinguished members of the apostolic body, the word APOSTLE (which see) being used in its wider sense. (4) They were Christians before St. Paul, so that they belonged to the earliest days of the Christian community. The name is Greek, and like most others in this chapter was borne by members of the imperial household (CIL vi. 5325, 5326, 11,626). It would have been common in the East. (See the Commentaries, ad loc. For later traditions, which add nothing historical, see Acta Sanctorum, May, iv. 4.)

A. C. HEADLAM.

ANEM (אנעם), 1 Ch 6⁷³ only.—A town of Issachar, noticed with Ramoth. It appears to answer to Engannim (which see) in the parallel list (Jos 21²⁹), but might perhaps represent the village of Anên on the hills west of the plain of Esdraclon. This place, which is well watered—whence perhaps its name, 'two springs'—is the Anea of the fourth century A.D. (Onomasticon, s.v. Aniel and Bethana), which had good baths, lying 15 Roman miles from Cæsarea. Eusebius, however, identifies this site with Aner. SWP vol. ii. sheet viii.

C. R. CONDER.

ANER (אנר, LXX Ἀνῶν, Sam. אנר).—One of the three Amorite chieftains, the other two being Mamre and Eshcol, who were bound, in virtue of their 'covenant' with Abraham, to render him assistance, when he was sojourning at Hebron (Gn 14^{13, 24}). As Mamre is an old name for Hebron (Gn 23²) and Eshcol is the name of a valley not far from Hebron (Nu 13²³), it is natural to suppose that Aner also was the name of a locality which gave its name to a clan. Dillmann (in loc.) compares Néir, which is the name of a range of hills in the vicinity.

H. E. RYLE.

ANER (אנר), 1 Ch 6⁷⁰ only.—A town of Manasseh, west of Jordan (not noticed in the parallel passage Jos 21²⁰). The site is doubtful. Possibly Ellâr, north-west of Shechem. SWP vol. ii. sh. xi.

C. R. CONDER.

ANGEL (אַנְגֵּל mal'āk, Sept. ἄγγελος and otherwise).—i. The word is frequently used of men in the sense of 'messenger,' especially in the plur. Gn 32³, Nu 21²¹, Dt 2²⁶, Jos 6¹⁷. In the sense of 'angel' the term is chiefly used in the sing. in earlier writings, but plur. Gn 19^{1, 15} (J), and 'angels of God,' Gn 28¹² 32¹ (E). In later books, particularly the poetical, the plur. occurs oftener, Job 4¹⁸, Ps 78⁴⁹ 91¹¹ 103²⁰ 104⁴ 148², and in such books as Zec and Dn plurality is implied. So in Job 1⁶ 2¹; in Gn 32² they are a 'camp' or host, and in Dt 33² 'myriads'; cf. Ps 68¹⁷. In the writing P (Priests' Code) no mention is made of angels. Like the existence of God, the existence of angels is presupposed in OT, not asserted. They are not said to have been created, rather they are alluded to as existing prior to the creation of the earth, Job 38⁷ (Gn 1²⁶?, cf. 3²² 11⁷). When they appear, it is in human form: they are called 'men,' Gn 18², 16, 22, 32², Jos 5¹³, Ezk 9², 3, 11, Dn 3²⁵ 10¹⁶, 18; the 'man Gabriel,' Dn 9²¹ (cf. Lk 24⁴, Ac 1¹⁰), and apart from the seraphim (Is 6²) are nowhere in OT represented as winged (Rev 8¹³ 14⁶), though Philo so describes them (πτεροφύοισι). In NT they are called 'spirits' (He 1¹⁴), but not so in OT, where even God is not yet called spirit (Jn 4²⁴). To Mohammed the angel Gabriel was the 'holy spirit.' When they appear they speak, walk, touch men (1 K 19⁵), take hold of them by the hand (Gn 19¹⁰), and also eat with them (Gn 18⁸, though, on the other hand, cf. Jg 6²⁰ 13¹⁸). The statement Ps 78²⁵ that 'men did eat the food of angels' (lit. the mighty, Ps 103²⁰, Jl 3¹¹), a statement repeated in Wis 16²⁰, 2 Es 1¹⁹, can hardly be more than poetical colouring of the fact that the manna came down from heaven, as the parallelism both in Ps 78²⁴ and Wis. shows; cf. Jg 9¹³, Ps 104¹⁵.

ii. In a number of passages, e.g. Gn 16⁷⁻¹⁴ 22¹¹, 14, 15, Ex 3², Jg 2¹, 4, 5²³ 6¹¹⁻²⁴ 13², mention is made of 'the angel of Jehovah,' AV the 'LORD' (J); and in others, e.g. Gn 21¹⁷⁻¹⁹ 31¹¹⁻¹³, of 'the angel of God' (E). Similar passages are Gn 18, 32²⁴⁻³⁰ compared with Hos 12⁴, Gn 48¹⁵, 16. According to the general grammatical rule the rendering 'an angel of the Lord' is inaccurate, though some instances may be doubtful; so 'the angel of God' necessarily Gn 31¹¹, and even 21¹⁷, cf. v. 19. The angel of the Lord appears in human form, Gn 18, or in a flame of fire, Ex 3², or speaks to men out of heaven in a dream, Gn 31¹¹, 13. It has been disputed whether 'the angel of the Lord' be one of the angels or Jⁿ Himself in self-manifestation. The manner in which he speaks leaves little room to doubt that the latter view is the right one; the angel of the Lord is a theophany, a self-manifestation of God. In Gn 31¹¹, 13 the angel of God says, 'I am the God of Bethel'; in Ex 3², the angel of the Lord says, 'I am the God of thy father' . . . 'and Moses was afraid to look upon God'; cf. Jg 13²². In Gn 16¹⁰ the angel of the Lord says to Hagar, 'I will greatly multiply thy seed,' and 21¹⁸ 'the angel of God called to Hagar out of heaven . . . lift up the lad; for I will make him a great nation.' The angel identifies himself with God, and claims to exercise all the prerogatives of God. Those also to whom the angel appears identify him with God: Gn 16¹³ Hagar 'called the name of Jⁿ' that had spoken to her, thou art a God that seest' (all-seeing); Gn 18 the angel is called 'the Lord'; Jg 6¹¹ it is said 'the angel of the Lord came,' but in vv. 14, 16 he is called directly 'the Lord'; Jg 13²² Manoah says, 'We shall surely die, for we have seen God.' And to name but one other passage, Gn 48¹⁵, 16, Jacob says, 'The God before whom my fathers did walk, the God who hath fed me all my life long, the angel which hath redeemed me from all evil, bless the lads.' On the other hand, the angel of the Lord distinguishes between himself and the Lord, just as the Lord distinguishes between Himself and the angel. The latter says to Hagar, Gn 16¹¹ 'Jⁿ hath heard thy affliction'; cf. Gn 22¹⁵. Nu 22²¹ 'The Lord opened the eyes of Balaam, and he saw the angel of the Lord'; and in Mal 3¹ the 'angel of the covenant' is different from Jⁿ, and yet he is Jⁿ who cometh to His temple. So, on the other hand, the Lord says, Ex 23²⁰, 23 'I send an angel before thee,' and 'Mine angel shall go before thee' (Ex 32³⁴ 33²). But how these last passages are to be interpreted appears from Ex 33¹⁴, 15 (14¹⁹) 'My face (I myself) shall go with thee' . . . 'if thy face (thou thyself) go not with us, carry us not up hence.' The 'angel of His face' (presence) is not an angel who sees His face or stands before it, but one in whom His face (presence) is reflected and seen; cf. Ex 23²¹ 'My name (fulness of revealed Being, Is 30²⁷) is in him.' The Sept. rendering of Is 63⁹ 'not an ambassador' (reading נַי), 'nor an angel, but Himself (Heb. His face) saved them,' is scarcely the meaning of the original. The mere manifestation of Jⁿ creates a distinction between it and Jⁿ, though the identity remains. The form of manifestation is, so to speak, something unreal (Dt 4¹², 15), a condescension for the purpose of assuring those to whom it is granted that Jⁿ in His fulness is present with them. As the manifestation called the angel of the Lord occurred chiefly in redemptive history, older theologians regarded it as an adumbration or premonition of the incarnation of the second Person. This idea was just in so far as the angel of the Lord was a manifestation of Jⁿ on the earth in human form, and in so far as such temporary manifestations might seem the prelude to a permanent redemptive self-revelation in this form (Mal 3¹⁻²); but it was to go beyond the OT, or at any rate beyond the understanding of OT writers, to found on the manifestation distinctions in the Godhead. The only distinction implied is that between Jⁿ, and Jⁿ in manifestation. The angel of the Lord so fully represented or expressed Jⁿ that men had the assurance that when he spoke or acted among them Jⁿ was speaking or acting.

iii. As 'messengers' (mal'akim) sent to men, angels usually appear singly, but in Gn 19 two visit Lot; Gn 28¹² 'the angels of God' ascend and descend upon the ladder, and Gn 32¹ 'the angels of God' meet Jacob, who says, 'this is God's host' (lit. camp); and he called the name of the place Mahanaim 'two camps, or as RVm plur., companies). In Job 1⁶ 2¹ the 'sons of God' who present themselves to report upon their ministrations are numerous. Sometimes the plur. is used indefinitely, as Ps 78⁴⁹ 'evil angels,' 91¹¹ 'He shall give His angels charge over thee,' Job 33²² 'the destroyers'; cf. 2 S 24¹⁶, 17. Angels do not usually, at least in early writings, mediate the phenomena of the physical world, they operate in the moral and redemptive sphere; but the angel of the Lord smites with pestilence, 2 S 24; and with death, 2 K 19³⁵; and Satan, on special permission of God, sets the lightning and whirlwind in motion against Job, and smites him with sore boils, 1¹⁶, 19, 27. It is perhaps rather a poetical and realistic conception of the special providence of God, though with reminiscences of early history, when it is said that the angel of the Lord encamps round about those that fear him, Ps 34⁷, and thrusts down their enemies, Ps 35⁵, 6, and that the angels bear up in their hands the righteous, Ps 91¹¹, cf. Nu 20¹⁶. More literal is the statement that they interpret to the individual the meaning of God's afflictive providences in his life, Job 33²³; and so Job 5¹ the idea is hazarded that they might interest themselves in the afflictions of men and hear an appeal from them, or perhaps intercede or mediate in their behalf. In Ezk and Zec the angels interpret divine visions given to men; but see under § v. Passages referring to the intervention of angels are such as these: 2 S 24¹⁶, 1 K 19⁵, 7, 2 K 1¹⁵ 19³⁵, Ezk 9². In some of these cases it may be difficult to decide whether the angelic manifestation be not the angel of the Lord. The passages 1 S 29⁹, 2 S 14¹⁷, 20 19²⁷ are also somewhat obscure. The first passage, where Achish says that David is good in his sight, might be rendered 'as an angel of God,' that is, probably in valour (Zec 12⁸), wisdom (2 S 14¹⁷⁻²⁰), and moral rectitude; in the others the natural rendering is 'as the angel of God.' The art., however, in comparisons often designates the class, while our idiom uses the indef. art. 'an angel,' or the plur. 'the angels' of God. The point in the comparison is the penetration and wisdom of the angel, and reference might be to some such ideal being as is spoken of Job 15⁷⁻⁸. If allusion were to the historical 'angel of the Lord,' the original features of the phenomenon would have somewhat faded and the conception been generalised.

iv. It belongs less to the sphere of redemptive history than to the conception of the majesty of J' the King (Is 6³), when God is represented as surrounded by a court in heaven, by multitudes of ministers that do His pleasure, and armies that execute His commands. He has a 'council' (רעוה) Ps 89⁷, cf. the four and twenty elders, Rev 4¹; a 'congregation' (קהלה) Ps 82¹, קהלה Ps 89⁵ surrounds Him, 'hosts' who are His ministers (Is 6², 1 K 22¹⁹, Ps 103^{20, 21} 148²). These superhuman beings are called 'sons of Elohim' (Job 1⁶ 2¹, cf. Dn 3²⁵), or 'sons of Elim,' Ps 29¹⁻⁹ 89⁶, but possibly simply 'Elohim,' Ps 8⁵ 97⁹, and 'Elim,' Ex 15¹¹. The rendering 'sons of God' is possible, and Ps 82⁶ 'sons of the Most High,' if said of angels, would be in favour of it; but, on the other hand, the word Elim (עלם) seems nowhere an honorary plur. applicable to a single being, but always denotes strict plurality. The probability, therefore, is that the right rendering is not 'sons of God,' but 'sons of the Elohim,' 'sons of the Elim,' that is, members of the class of beings called Elohim and Elim, just as 'sons of the prophets' means members of the prophetic order or guilds (cf. sing. Dn 3²⁵). The names Elohim and El are prehistoric, and their etymology is quite unknown; they are also the names for 'God,' and these beings around God's throne are no doubt conceived of in contrast with men as sharing in an inferior way something of divine majesty. They are also called 'Holy Ones' (קדושים), though the term 'holy,' originally at least, did not describe moral character, but merely expressed close relation to God. Cf. Dt 33², Zec 14⁵, Ps 89⁷, Job 5¹, and often. The OT assumes the existence of these beings, and the belief goes back beyond the historic period. Interesting attempts have been made to explain the origin of the idea. It has been suggested that these beings, subordinate to J' and His servants, are the gods of the nations now degraded and reduced to a secondary place by the increasing prevalence of the monotheistic conception in Israel (Kosters, ThT, 1876). There is little or nothing in OT to support this theory. Israel probably speculated little on the gods of the nations, except of those, such as Egypt and Babylon, with whom they came into contact; and though J' be greater than all gods (Ex 18¹¹), He nowhere regards them as His ministers, but manifests the strongest hostility to them, e.g. those of Egypt Ex 12¹², Is 19¹, Ezk 30¹³, of Babylon Is 21⁹ 46¹⁻², and generally Zeph 2¹¹. The monotheism of Israel did not subordinate the gods to J' as His ministers, but rather denied their existence, and described them as vanities (nonentities), Ps 96^{4, 5}, Jer 10^{5, 11}. The fact that J' is compared or contrasted with the sons of Elohim in heaven, Ps 89⁶⁻⁸, and also with the Elohim or gods of the nations, Ps 86⁸ 96^{4, 5} 97⁹, is certainly remarkable, but scarcely sufficient to establish the identity of the two; and if in later times the idea finds expression that God had subjected the nations to the rule of angels, while the rule of Israel was reserved for Himself (Dt 32^{5, 9} in Sept., Sir 17¹⁷, Dn 10^{13, 20} 12¹, cf. Dt 4¹⁹ 29²⁸, Is 24²¹), this is hardly an old idea that the angels were the gods of the nations re-appearing in an inverted form, but a new idea suggested to Israel by its own religious superiority to the nations, and perhaps its way of explaining heathenism. Another view goes back to what was presumably the oldest phase of Semitic religion for an explanation. Men, conscious of being under the influence of a multitude of external forces, peopled the world with spirits, whose place of abode they thought to be great stones, umbrageous trees, fountains, and the like. Gradually these varied spirits came to be regarded as possessing a certain unity of will and action, and by a further concentration they became the servants of one supreme will, and formed the host of heaven. Such speculations regarding possible processes of thought among the family out of which Israel sprang, in periods which precede the dawn of history, are not without interest; they lie, however, outside OT, which, as has been said, assumes the existence of J''s heavenly retinue. The God of Israel is above all things a living God, who influences the affairs of the world and men, and rules them. If He uses agents, they are supplied by the 'ministers' that surround Him. This is true (though denied by Kosters) even in the oldest period of the literature, Gn 28 and 32, Jos 5¹³ and Is 6, where one of the seraphim ministers purification and forgiveness to the prophet; and the same appears in the scene depicted in 1 K 22¹⁹. The idea is even more common in the later literature: Ps 103^{20, 21}. J''s hosts are also ministers who do His pleasure, Ps 148². In Job 1⁶ 2¹ it is the sons of the Elohim who present themselves to report upon the condition of the earth and men; in 33²³ the interpreting angel is one among a thousand (5¹), and 4¹⁸ his 'servants' are also his 'angels' (messengers). Naturally, however, as the idea of ministering hosts belongs to the conception of J' as sovereign, some of the breadth with which the idea is expressed may be due to the poetical religious imagination, as when God's warriors are represented as mighty in strength, Ps 103²⁰; as 'heroes' with whom He descends to do battle with the nations, Jl 3¹¹, Zec 14⁵; as myriads of chariots, Ps 68¹⁷; and as chariots and horsemen of fire, 2 K 6^{16, 17}, Is 66¹⁵, Dt 33², Dn 7¹⁰. (On the other hand, Hab 3⁸, God's chariots and horses are the storm clouds.) In particular, these hosts accompany J' in His self-revelation for judgment and salvation, Dt 33², Zec 14⁵, Jl 3¹¹, and in NT this trait is transferred to the parousia of Christ (Mt 25³¹). It is less certain whether the divine name J' (God) of hosts be connected with these angelic hosts; it is, at any rate, a title correlative, expressing the majesty and omnipotence of J' (Sept. often παντοκράτωρ). Finally, to men's eyes the myriads of stars, clothed in light and moving across the heavens, seemed animated, and there was a tendency to identify them with the angelic host—an identification made easier by the belief that man's life was greatly under the influence of the stars (Job 38³³). In Job 38⁷ the morning stars are identical with the sons of the Elohim. Cf. Jg 5²⁰, Is 14¹² 24²¹ 40²⁶, and on 'host of heaven' 2 K 17¹⁶ 21⁵, Jer 19¹³, Zeph 1⁵. The idea that the stars are angels receives large development in the Book of Enoch, e.g. 18¹³⁻¹⁶, and even Rev 9¹⁻¹¹ a star and the angel of the abyss are identified.

v. About the time of the Exile and after the Return a manner of thinking appears which, though from the phraseology used it might seem a development in angelology, is really rather a movement in the direction of hypostatizing the Spirit of God. In the older period, as that of the Judges, J' rules His people through His Spirit, which inspires the leaders who judge and save Israel. And in the older prophets the Spirit operates within the prophet, who is enabled to conceive J's purposes and operations in thought and express them in language. But in Ezk 40 seq. 'a man' accompanies the prophet and explains to him his vision. This 'man' is the prophetic spirit objectivised. Even before this time, in Micah's vision, 1 K 22²¹, 'the spirit' who comes forth is the spirit of prophecy personified. The process is carried a step further in Zec: not only is the prophetic spirit hypostatized as 'the angel that spake with me' (1¹⁸, 19²⁸), but the operations of J' among the nations are personified as horsemen and chariots. That which in the older prophets was an inward spirit and thoughts, has become an 'angel,' and symbolical agencies which the 'angel' interprets. But that much of this at least is more religious symbolism than strict angelology appears from the visions in 1¹⁸ 5¹⁻⁵. It is, however, the Spirit of God—not only as spirit of prophecy, but in general, as God in operation, controlling the destinies of the nations and of His people—that is chiefly symbolised in Zec. This is most broadly seen in ch. 4, which is strangely misread when the seven lamps are supposed to represent the light shed by God's people, their spiritual life. The seven lamps are the seven eyes of the Lord (4¹⁰), and the seven eyes are the seven spirits (the manifold spirit) of God. To be compared is Rev 1⁴, where the salutation comes from God and Christ and the seven spirits; Rev 4⁵ 'there were seven lamps of fire burning before the throne, which are the seven spirits of God'; and Rev 5⁶ 'a lamb having seven eyes, which are the seven spirits of God sent forth into all the earth.' Zec 4 is an expansion of 3⁹, and its purpose is to symbolise that Spirit of God which goes out over all the earth, controls the history of the nations in the interest of His people, and secures the completion of the temple, which the Lord shall enter and abide in, when He removes the iniquity of the land in one day (3⁹)—not by might nor by power, but by My Spirit (4⁶). The two olive trees, 'sons of oil' (cf. Is 5¹ a hill, the son of oil = an 'oily' hill), stand beside the Lord of the whole earth, i.e. in heaven, cf. 6⁸, and cannot be Joshua and Zerubabel. Whether the duality of the trees expresses some idea in the prophet's mind obscure to us, or whether it be merely part of the symmetry of the symbol, may remain undecided. Other writings of this period give prominence to the Spirit of God, Jl 2²⁸, and show a tendency to hypostatise it, Is 63¹⁰, 11 48¹⁶, Gn 1², Ezk 2² 8³, Ps 139⁷. The 'angel of the Lord' in Zec. has the same double aspect as elsewhere, and as the angel of the covenant in Mal, cf. 1¹¹ with 3¹⁻⁴.

vi. Two further developments complete what is said in OT of angels—(1) a moral distinction appears among the angels; and (2) a distinction of rank. The first distinction is not carried far, and the second naturally follows from the idea of an army or host. In the earliest period angels seem morally neutral, they are so much the messengers of God and the medium of His relation to the world that their own character does not come into question. They have always something of the meaning of an impersonal phenomenon, Jehovah's operations or providence made visible and sensible. Of course the angel of the Lord being Jehovah's 'face,' and embodying His 'name,' exhibits also His moral nature, Ex 23²⁰⁻²². But 'evil' angels are angels who execute judgment, Ps 78⁴⁹, Job 33²². The spirit from God who troubled Saul is called 'evil' merely from the effects which he produces, 1 S 16¹⁴. In 1 K 22 even the personified spirit of prophecy becomes 'a lying spirit,' just as elsewhere J' Himself deceives the prophets, Ezk 14⁹. In writings of the age of the Captivity, and later, however, a being appears called the Satan (opposer, accuser), one of the sons of the Elohim, who displays hostility to the saints and people of God, Job 1⁶ 2¹, Zec 3. Even in these books he has as yet little personal reality. He is a voice 'bringing sin to remembrance' before God. The scene Zec 3 is greatly symbolical. The evil conscience of the people and their fear, suggested by their miserable condition, that their sins still lay on them, and that God's favour had not yet returned to them, are symbolised by the accusing Satan; while the angel of the Lord is God's own voice assuring them of His gracious favour. There is perhaps an advance on the idea of Satan in Job, though even there he finds no place in the dénouement of the drama. In two ways, perhaps, the conception of evil angels became clearer: first, it was natural that the accusing angel should take on something of the nature of his office, and appear as the enemy of the saints and of Israel. This step seems already taken in Job. And, secondly, there was always a greater disinclination to ascribe moral evil in men to God. In no part of OT is God represented as the primary author of evil thoughts or actions in men; if He instigate them to evil, it is in punishment or aggravation of evil they have already committed. But at a later time the instigation to evil freely ascribed in earlier times to God (1 S 26¹⁹, 1 K 22²⁰) is attributed to Satan, cf. 2 S 24¹ with 1 Ch 21¹. Further development hardly appears in OT. The 'serpent' of Gn 3 is identified with Satan in Wis 2²⁴ and in NT. In Dt 32¹⁷, Ps 106³⁷ mention is made of 'demons' (שֵׁרִיטִים), which, however, appear to be the false gods to which children were sacrificed, 1 Co 10²⁰. In Assy. shidu is the name given to the inferior deities represented by the bull-colossus. Popular imagination peopled the desert with demons, Is 13²¹ 34¹⁴, among which was a night-spectre, Lilith; and to the same category possibly belongs Azazel (AV scapegoat), to whom the live goat was consigned on the Day of Atonement (cf. Zec 5¹¹), Lv 16⁸, 10, 26 (Enoch 10⁴), although this is by no means certain. These demons, however, do not belong to the angelic host, and lie outside the moral world. Relatively to God, the angels, though the purest beings, are imperfect, Job 4¹⁸ 15¹⁸ 25⁶.

In Dn 10¹³, 20, 21 the various countries have their guardian or patron angels, Michael being the prince of Israel (Jude 9, Rev 12⁷); later theology reckoned seventy of these angels (Dt 32⁸, Gn 46²⁷). And in Is 24 the universal wickedness of the world appears laid at the door of its rulers, whether angelic or human, and the judgment of God falls on 'the host of the high ones on high, and the kings of the earth upon the earth' (vv. 21, 22); and many interpret Ps 58. 82 of the same angelic rulers. Apart from the idea suggested in § iv., several things led to this conception of patron and ruling angels. First, there was a tendency towards removing God far from any immediate contact with the earth and men, and to introduce intermediaries between them who mediated His rule. In Dn He no longer speaks to men directly, but only by the intervention of angels, who even interpret His written word to men (9²⁰ seq.). And, secondly, there was a tendency to personify abstract conceptions such as the 'spirit' of a nation, and a further tendency to locate these personified forces in the supersensible world, from whence they ruled the destinies of men. The issues of the conflicts of the kingdoms of Persia, Greece, and Judah with one another on earth are all determined by the relations of their 'princes' in heaven; and this idea is a ruling one in the Apoc. It belongs to a different class of conceptions when conflicts are referred to between God and other powerful beings. Such beings are 'the Sea,' 'Rahab,' 'Tannin' or the Dragon, the 'Serpent,' 'Leviathan,' etc., comp. Is 51⁹, 10, Ps 89¹⁰⁻¹⁵, Job 9¹³ 26¹², 12 (Ps

Ranks among the angels appear in Dn, and there for the first time some of them receive names. In OT and NT only two are named—Michael, prince of Israel (10^{13, 21} 12¹, Jude 9, Rev 12⁷), and Gabriel (Dn 8¹⁶ 9²¹, Lk 1^{19, 26}). Michael is named 'the archangel,' Jude 9, and 1 Th 4¹⁶ 'the arch.' is spoken of, though not named. Seven such angelic princes are spoken of, To 12¹⁵ 'I am Raphael, one of the seven holy angels'; in Enoch and 2 Es 5²⁰ Uriel is named as fourth. The number seven already appears in Ezk 9², and there is no necessity to refer it to Pers. influence. In Bab. writings, grades among the celestial beings are referred to (Schrader, Höllenfahrt der Istar, pp. 102, 103), one class of whom Lenormant calls archanges célestes. According to Jewish tradition the names of the angels came from Babylon.

vii. There is little advance over Daniel in the angelology of the Apocrypha. Raphael accompanies Tobias as a guide. As one of the seven holy angels he 'presents the prayers of the saints' (To 12¹⁵, cf. Rev 8⁴), and says, 'I did bring the memorial of your prayer before the Holy One' (12¹²). A 'good' angel is spoken of, To 5²¹, 2 Mac 11⁶. Raphael binds the demon Asmodeus, To 8³, and the sentence of judgment on those who bring false accusations against the innocent is received and executed by the angel of God (Sus 55, 59); the angels are 'blessed,' and are called on to praise God, 'Let all Thy angels and Thine elect bless Thee' (To 8¹⁵); and the sins of men cannot be hidden before God and His angels (2 Es 16⁶⁶). Neither is there in principle any great development in NT. (1) The angels form an innumerable host, Lk 2^{9, 13}, Mt 26⁵³, He 12²², Rev 5¹¹; they are the armies of heaven, Rev 12⁷ 19¹¹⁻¹⁴. (2) They are beings glorious in appearance, Lk 2⁹, Mt 28³, Ac 12⁷, and in rank are 'glories,' Jude 8. (3) They minister to the saints, He 1¹⁴, Mt 2¹³ 4¹¹, Lk 22⁴³, Ac 5¹⁹ 8³⁶ 12⁷; they are the medium of revelation, Rev 1¹ 22¹⁶, and carry the saints into paradise, Lk 16²², cf. 2 K 2¹¹. (4) As in OT theophany God was surrounded by angels, so they accompany the Son of Man at His parousia, Mt 16²⁷ 25³¹, 1 Th 4¹⁶, 2 Th 1⁷ (Mt 13^{41, 49} 24³¹). In two or three points there seems an advance over OT. (a) The angels are spirits, He 1¹⁴. (b) Satan is no longer isolated, but has a retinue of angels, Mt 25⁴¹, Rev 12⁷. (c) Ranks in the angelic host are more distinctly suggested, Col 2¹⁰, Eph 3¹⁰ (1 Co 15²⁴, Eph 1²¹). (d) In the Apoc. angels are associated with cosmic or elemental forces, as fire and water, which they direct or into which they are changed, Rev 14¹⁸ 16⁵, cf. Ps 104⁴. Christians are made along with Christ better than the angels, whom they shall judge, He 2⁵, 1 Co 6². Angel worship is condemned, Col 2¹⁸, Rev 19¹⁰ 22^{8, 9}, cf. Dt 6¹³, Mt 4¹⁰. The second Nicene Council decreed that latreia ought not to be offered to angels, but allowed δουλεία. The sense in which the Sadducees denied angels and spirits (Ac 23⁸) is not quite clear. The Sadducees received the written Scriptures, but disallowed the oral developments upheld by the Pharisees and scribes; and it is possible that they repudiated only that more modern luxuriant angelology current in their day, without questioning the ancient angelophanies. The great historical and ritual writing P contains no reference to angels: the Torah contained the revelation of God's whole will, and expressed all His relations to the world and men: special intervention of God was not now needed. And this may have been the position of the Sadducees. On the other hand, from the Sadducean inclination to freethinking, inherited from the pre-Maccabean Gr. period, it is possible that they interpreted the angelophanies of the written Scriptures received by them in a rationalistic way as personified natural forces.

A. B. DAVIDSON.

ANGELS OF THE SEVEN CHURCHES.—If these angels are men, they cannot be less than bishops ruling their several churches. In favour of this we have—(1) Mal 2⁷ 3¹, where the words may be used of men; (2) the גביר צור, who, however, was not an officer of the synagogue, but one of the congregation called up for the occasion to pronounce the prayer; (3) the settled character of episcopacy in Asia in the time of Ignatius. Against it are—(1) ἀγγελος, never used of men in NT, except Lk 9⁵², Ja 2²⁵ of ordinary messengers; (2) the figurative character of the Apoc. generally, and of this part in particular. There are seven angels for seven churches; and from the Saviour walking in a figurative tabernacle each of them receives a letter in figurative form, and full of figurative promises and threats. Whatever be said of the 'Nicolaitans,' 'that woman Jezebel' (2²⁰) can hardly be other than figurative. Even if the allusion is to a living prophetess, its form is figurative; esp. if we read τῆς γυναῖκά σου—thy wife Jezebel; (3) the relation of the angels to the churches is one of close identification in praise and blame, to an extent for which no human ruler can be responsible; (4) settled monarchical government of churches in Asia can hardly date back to the Neronian persecution, or even to Domitian's.

The imagery is suggested by the later Jewish belief in angels as guardians of nations (e.g. Dn 12¹) and of men (Ac 12¹⁵), like the genii of paganism. As, however, this belief is nowhere definitely confirmed by Scripture, the angels are best regarded as personifications of their churches.

ANGER, as a verb, occurs Ps 106³² 'They a^{ed} him also (וַיִּקְצֹפוּ) at the waters of strife,' and Ro 10¹⁹ 'by a foolish nation I will a. (παροργιῶ) you.' And twice in Apoc.: Sir 3¹⁶ 'And he that ath (RV 'provoketh') his mother is cursed of God'; 19²¹ 'he ath him that nourisheth him'; to which RV adds Wis 5²² 'The water of the sea shall be a^{ed} (AV 'rage') against them.'

J. HASTINGS.

ANGER (WRATH) OF GOD.—Anthropopathically described in OT by terms derived from the physical manifestations of human anger, אף, קֶחַךְ, חַרֹן, עֲבָרָה, עֲקָרָה, etc.; in NT by the terms ὀργή, θυμὸς, anger or wrath may be defined generally as an energy of the divine nature called forth by the presence of daring or presumptuous transgression, and expressing the reaction of the divine holiness against it in the punishment or destruction of the transgressor. It is the 'zeal' (זֵאֵל) of God for the maintenance of His holiness and honour, and of the ends of His righteousness and love, when these are threatened by the ingratitude, rebellion, and wilful disobedience or temerity of the creature. In this light it appears both in the OT (passim) and in the NT (Mt 3⁷, Jn 3³⁶, Ro 1¹⁸, Eph 5⁶, Rev 19¹⁵ etc.), and is uniformly represented as something very terrible in its effects. It is spoken of as 'kindled' by the sins and provocations of men (Ex 4¹⁴, Nu 11¹⁻¹⁰, Dt 29²⁷, 2 S 6⁷, Is 5²⁵ etc.), as 'poured out' on men (Ps 79⁶, Is 42²⁶, Jer 44⁶ etc.); its 'fierceness' is dwelt upon by psalmists and prophets (Ps 78⁴⁹ 88¹⁶, Is 13⁹, Jer 25^{37, 38} etc.); it burns down to the lowest Sheol (Dt 32²²). Similarly, in NT, God is represented as 'a consuming fire' (He 12²⁹; cf. Mt 3¹² 13⁴², 2 Th 1⁸ 2⁹). At the same time, this a. is not pictured, as in heathen religions, as the mere outburst of capricious passion, but always appears in union with the idea of the divine holiness (that principle, as Martensen says, 'which guards the eternal distinction between Creator and creature, between God and man, in the union effected between them, and preserves the divine dignity and majesty from being infringed on,' and which on its positive side is in God the inflexible determination to uphold at all costs the interests of righteousness and truth); and as directed to the maintenance of the moral order in the world, and specially to the upholding of the covenant relation with Israel, an aspect of it which manifests its close alliance with righteousness and love. As in the human sphere, so in the divine, the keenest provocation to a. is that which lies in wounded or frustrated love, or in injury done to the objects of love (Nu 32^{14, 15}, 2 K 17¹³⁻¹⁸, Ezk 23, Am 3², Ps 7¹¹ etc.). A. in God has thus always an ethical connotation, and manifests itself in subserviency to ends of righteousness and mercy, by which also its measure or limit is prescribed (Jer 10²⁴). In its action in providence, it uses as its instruments the agencies of nature, as well as the passions and ambitious designs of men (cf. Is 10⁵ 'O Assyrian, the rod of mine a.'), and afflicts the disobedient and rebellious with the calamities of war, famine, pestilence, and with evils generally (Dt 23¹⁵⁻⁶⁸, Am 4⁶⁻¹² etc. See analysis in Ritschl, Recht. und Ver. ii. p. 125).

So far, accordingly, as the Biblical representations are concerned, the divine a. or wrath is not to be weakened down, or explained away, as is the fashion among theologians (e.g. Origen, Augustine, Turretin), into a mere 'anthropomorphism,' or general expression for God's aversion to sin, and His determination to punish it; but is rather to be regarded as a very real and awful affection of the divine nature, fitted to awaken fear in the minds of men (Ps 2^{11, 12}, He 10³¹). When we look to the historical development of this doctrine in Scripture, we find nothing to modify materially the representations just given. No real distinction can be predicated between the earlier and later descriptions of the divine wrath in OT, except that, as Ritschl points out (Recht. und Ver. ii. p. 127), they tend in the prophets to become more eschatological (see DAY OF THE LORD; cf. Ro 2⁵, Rev 6¹⁷). This, however, is not to be understood as if the divine wrath were not also manifested continuously through history in the punishment of those whose evil-doing calls it forth (Ps 7¹¹). The later representations in the Scripture are every whit as strongly conceived as those of an earlier date. When H. Schultz speaks of 'the impression of the terrible God of the Semites' in the earlier ages, and says, 'the ancient Hebrews, too, tremble before a mysterious wrath of God' (O.T. Theology, ii. p. 175, Eng. tr.), he strangely forgets that the passages he cites are, on his own hypothesis, from the very latest parts of the Pent. (Lv 10⁶, Nu 1³⁸ 18⁵; cf. Ex 12¹² 30¹², Nu 8¹⁹—all from P). The Book of Genesis, remarkably enough, has no mention of the wrath of God, though its equivalent is there in repeated manifestations of God's judgment on sin (expulsion from Eden, cursing of the ground, flaming sword, the Flood, Sodom and Gomorrah, etc.). Ritschl's view of the Biblical development has features of its own. He rightly conceives of wrath as connected with the divine holiness, but would interpret the latter attribute as expressing originally only the notion of God as the exalted, powerful, unapproachable One, to draw near to whom would mean instant destruction for the creature; and sees the peculiar manifestation of wrath, accordingly, under OT conditions, in a sudden, unexpected, and violent destruction of the life of those who had violated the obligations of the covenant (Recht. und Ver. ii. pp. 93, 125, 135, 136). We can only urge in reply that there is no stage in the OT revelation in which the ideas of transcendence over the world, and of moral perfection, are not already united in the conception of holiness. The instances which most readily suggest an outburst of destructive energy apart from moral considerations, are those in which individuals or companies are smitten for what may seem very slight faults, or acts of inadvertence (e.g. 1 S 4^{10, 20}, 2 S 2⁷). But even in these instances a careful examination will show that it is the moral sanctity of the divine character which is the ground of the special awfulness with which it is invested.

When, finally, we pass from the OT to the NT, we find that the notion of God's wrath is not essentially altered, though the revelation of love and grace which now fills the vision places it comparatively in the background. The Marcionite view, which would represent the contrast between the God of the OT and the God of the NT as that between a wrathful avenging Deity and a loving Father who is incapable of anger, is, on the face of it, incorrect. The pitying, fatherly character of God is not absent from OT (Ex 34⁶⁻⁷, Ps 103¹³), but, even there, is rather the primary basis of God's self-revelation, to which the manifestation of wrath and judgment is subordinate. He is 'slow to a.' (Ps 103⁹ et al.), and 'fury (w.) is not in' Him (Is 27⁴). On the other hand, the fatherly love of God in NT does not exclude the aspect of Him as 'Judge' (1 P 1¹⁷), and 'a consuming fire' (He 12²⁹), whose wrath is a terrible reality, from which Christ alone can save us (Jn 3³⁶, Ro 1¹⁰⁻¹⁸ 5⁸, 1 Th 1¹⁰ etc.). In this connexion Ritschl labours hard to show that 'wrath' in NT has (as in OT prophets) uniformly an eschatological reference, and does not apply to the present condition. He goes even further, and challenges its right to a place in the Christian system at all. 'The notion of the affection of wrath in God,' he says, 'has no religious worth for Christians, but is an unfixed and formless theologoumenon' (Recht. und Ver. ii. p. 154). It is no doubt true that the eschatological aspect of wrath is prominent in NT; and that for the reason already given the wrath of God throughout recedes into the background, and becomes, as it were, an attribute in reserve (Ro 2⁵, 3²⁵); but many indications warn us that it is only in reserve, and is still there in its unchanged character, and rests with its heavy weight upon the disobedient (Jn 3³⁶, Eph 2^{2, 3}); nay, that in a most real sense its effects are manifest in the terrible retributions for sin exacted from men even here (Mt 23^{35, 36}, Ro 1²¹⁻³², Ac 5¹⁻¹¹ etc.). And if the objection is urged, as it will be by many, that the attribution of wrath or anger to God (otherwise than as the reflection of the sinner's distrustful thoughts regarding Him) is an unworthy mode of conception, and derogates from the divine perfection, it may at least with equal justice be replied that a Ruler of the universe who was incapable of being moved with an intense moral indignation at sin, and of putting forth, when occasion required, a destroying energy against it, would be lacking in an essential element of moral perfection; nor would either the righteousness or the mercy of such a Being have any longer a substantive value.

ANIM (אָנִים), Jos 15⁵⁰ only.—A town of Judah, in the mountains near Eshtemoh. It seems probable that it is the present double ruin of Ghuwein, west of Eshtemoh. The Heb. and Arab. guttural letters are equivalent. In the 4th cent. A.D. (Onomasticon, s.v. Anab and Astemœ) Anea or Anem is noticed as a large town near Eshtemoh; and there were two places so called. It is identified (s.v. Anim) with the town now in question. All the inhabitants were then Christians. See SWP vol. iii. sheet xxiv. C. R. CONDER.

ANISE (ἀνῆθον, anethum).—There can be no reasonable doubt that ἀνῆθον is the classical name of Anethum graveolens, L., which is translated in EV (Mt 23²³) anise. There is the direct evidence of Rabbi Eliezer (Tract. Maaseroth, c. iv. 5) that the seeds, leaves, and the stem of dill are 'subject to tithe.' Dill is in the Talm. shabath. It is known in Arab. by the cognate name shibith, and is much cultivated in Pal. and Syria. The seeds of it are used in cookery as a condiment, esp. with beans and other seeds of the pulse kind, and their flavour is greatly liked by the natives of Egypt, Pal., Syria, and the East generally. It is also used by the natives as a carminative. Avicenna speaks thus of its virtues (ii. 258): 'calmant for griping, carminative diminishes swelling, and its infusion is beneficial as a wash to indolent ulcers. Its oil is useful in joint affections and neuralgias, and also as a hypnotic. Its juice calms pain in the ear. Eaten for a long time it injures the sight. The plant and its seed are galactogogues, but are esp. useful in over-distension of the stomach and flatulency. Its oil is also beneficial in hæmorrhoids.'

Dill is an annual or biennial herb, of the order Umbelliferae, with a stem one to three feet high, much dissected leaves, small yellow flowers, and flattened oval fruits about one-fifth of an inch long, of a brownish colour, with a lighter-coloured wing-like border, and a pungent, aromatic odour and taste. It is found wild in cornfields in central and southern Europe and Egypt, perhaps escaped from cultivation. It has been cultivated from remote antiquity.

The opinion of the translators of AV, in favour of anise (Pimpinella anisum, L.), is hardly to be weighed against the direct evidence above adduced for the identity of dill with ἀνῆθον. RV gives dill in the margin. G. E. POST.

ANNA ('Avva, the same name as the Heb. אַנָּה Hannah, from a root meaning 'grace').—1. The wife of Tobit: 'I took to wife A. of the seed of our own family' (To 1^{9st}). See TOBIT. 2. A prophetess, the daughter of Phanuel, of the tribe of Asher (Lk 2³⁶⁻³⁸). This genealogical notice makes it clear that, though Asher was not one of the ten tribes which returned to Palestine after the Babylonian Captivity, individual members of the tribe had done so; and further, that Anna belonged to a family of sufficient distinction to have preserved its genealogy. In the same connexion it is interesting to notice that the tribe of Asher alone is celebrated in tradition for the beauty of its women, and their fitness to be wedded to the high priest or king (for authorities, see Edersheim, Jesus the Messiah, vol. i. p. 200). Of Anna's personal history all that we know is contained in the brief statement of St. Luke. She had been married for seven years, and at the time spoken of was not merely, as the AV suggests, eighty-four years old, but, according to the more correct rendering of the RV, 'had been a widow even for fourscore and four years'; so that, supposing her to have been married at fourteen, she would now be about a hundred and five. Throughout her long widowhood she had 'departed not from the temple,' not in the sense of actually living there—for that would have been impossible, most of all for a woman—but as taking part in all the temple services, 'worshipping, with fastings and supplications night and day.' It was thus that she sought to give expression to the longing which was filling her heart for the coming of the promised Messiah, and at length her faith and patience were rewarded. In the child Jesus she was allowed to see the fulfilment of God's promise to His ancient people, and henceforth was able to announce to all like-minded with herself the 'redemption,' as distinguished from the political deliverance of Jerusalem. ANNAS ('Avvas, אָנָּס 'merciful,' Josephus 'Ανανος).

—1. Son of Seth, appointed high priest A.D. 6 or 7 by the legate Quirinius, and deposed A.D. 15 by the procurator Valerius Gratus (Jos. Ant. XVIII. ii. 1, 2). He thus lost office, but not power. 'They say that this elder Ananus was most fortunate; for he had five sons, and it happened that they all held the office of high priest to God, and he had himself enjoyed that dignity a long time formerly, which had never happened to any other of our high priests' (Jos. Ant. XX. ix. 1). We learn also from St. John (18¹³) that Joseph Caiaphas, high priest A.D. 18-36, was his son-in-law. The immense wealth of these Sadducean aristocrats was, in part at least, derived from 'the booths of the sons of Annas,' which monopolised the sale of all kinds of materials for sacrifice. These booths, according to Edersheim (Life and Times of the Messiah, iii. 5), occupied part of the temple court; Dérenbourg (Essai sur l'histoire, etc., de la Palestine, p. 465 sqq.) with more probability identifies them with four booths on the Mount of Olives, a branch establishment of which might have been beneath the temple porches. It was the sons of Annas who made God's house 'a den of robbers'; and the Talmudic curse, 'Woe to the house of Annas! woe to their serpent-like hissings!' (or whisperings) (Pes. 57a), almost re-echoes the Saviour's denunciations. Josephus, too (Ant. XX. ix. 2-4), gives a vivid picture of the insolent rapacity and violence of the younger Ananus. Moreover, 'forty years before the destruction of the temple the Sanhedrin banished itself from the chamber of hewn stone (סוּדָּן נֶחֱבֵל), and established itself in the booths' (סוּדָּן) (Dérenbourg, p. 465), subsequently moving 'from the booths to Jerusalem' (Rosh ha-Sh. 31a), perhaps when the booths were destroyed, three years before the destruction of the temple, in the same year in which the younger Ananus was murdered. Such and so powerful was the faction of which Annas was the head. The NT consistently reflects this state of things. Jesus, when arrested, is brought to Annas first (Jn 18¹³). He takes the leading part in the trial of the apostles (Ac 4⁶). That Annas is styled 'the high priest' (Ac 4⁸, and probably Jn 18^{19, 22}) is not remarkable, since it is quite in accordance with the usage of Josephus, who applies the title, not only to the actual holder of the office, but also to all his living predecessors (Vit. 38; BJ II. xii. 6; IV. iii. 7, 9, 10; IV. iv. 3). And in both Josephus and NT the more influential members of those families from which high priests were chosen are all called ἀρχιερείς. But the phrase 'ἐπὶ ἀρχιερείῳ Ἄννα καὶ Καϊάφα, in the high priesthood of A. and C.' (Lk 3²), seems unparalleled. Ewald (H.I. vol. vi. p. 430, n. 3) conjectures that it is due to the fact that when the author wrote, 'they had become memorable in this association through the history of Christ's death.' The chief interest in Annas centres in the notice of him in Jn 18, which is complementary to the narrative of St. Luke, and corrects an apparent mistake made by St. Matthew and St. Mark. The first two evangelists obscurely indicate two stages in the trial of Jesus (Mt 26³⁷ 27¹, Mk 14⁵³ 15¹), but they transfer the events of the morning meeting of the Sanhedrin to the previous night. St. Luke avoids this apparent mistake, and leaves room (22⁶⁴) for such an informal inquiry as that of Annas really was.

When we bear in mind the predominant influence of the man, and the unscrupulousness of the whole proceeding, it seems unnecessary to suppose that Annas was either deputy (sagan) of the high priest (Lightfoot, Temple Service, v. 1) or president (נֹסֵב) of the Sanhedrin (Baronius, Annals, followed by Selden, de Success. Pontif. i. 12) or chief examining judge, דִּין גִּבֵּי אֵם (Ewald, H.I. vol. vi. p. 430).

The interview of Jesus with Annas is described

Jn 18¹⁹⁻²³. It could have only one issue. Jesus was sent as a condemned prisoner for a more formal trial before Caiaphas and the Sanhedrin, as described by the Synoptists, but merely implied by St. John. (This is obscured in the Received text of v. 24, and still more in the AV, which renders the aorist as a pluperfect; ὄν is read by BC* LX 1. 33.) We have seen that the Sanhedrin at this time met in the headquarters of the Annas faction, so that it may have been when passing through the court from the apartments of Annas to the council chamber that 'the Lord turned, and looked upon Peter,' Lk 22⁶¹ (Westcott on Jn 18²⁵). 2. 1 Es 9²², see HARIM. ANOINTING.—1. The application of unguents to the skin and hair as an act of the toilet is an ancient custom; the oldest prescription extant is for this purpose, and professes to date from about B.C. 4200. Among the Jews a. was a daily practice (Mt 6¹⁷), the oil being applied to exposed parts (Ps 104¹⁵), soothing the skin burnt by the sun. The effects of oil are more enduring than those of water, hence a. was practised after bathing (Ru 3⁸, Ezk 16⁹). It was a mark of luxury to use specially scented oils (Am 6⁶), such as those Hezekiah kept in his treasure-house (2 K 20¹³). As a. was a sign of joy (Pr 27⁹), it was discontinued during the time of mourning (Dn 10³); so Joab instructed the woman of Tekoa to appear un-anointed before David (2 S 14²). On the death of Bathsheba's child, David anointed himself to show that his mourning had ended (2 S 12²⁰). The cessation of a. was to be a mark of God's displeasure if Israel proved rebellious (Dt 28⁴⁰, Mic 6¹⁵), and the restoration of the custom was to be a sign of God's returning favour (Is 61³). Anointing is used as a symbol of prosperity in Ps 92¹⁰, Ec 9⁸.

2. Before paying visits of ceremony the head was anointed; so Naomi bade Ruth anoint herself before visiting Boaz (3³). Oil of myrrh was used for this purpose in the harem of Alasuerus (Est 2¹²). On monuments in Egypt the host is seen anointing his guest on his arrival; and the same must have been customary in Pal., as Simon's failure of hospitality in this respect is commented upon by our Lord (Lk 7⁴⁶). This custom is referred to in Ps 23⁶. The Isr. showed their goodwill to the captives of Judah by anointing them before sending them back at the command of Oded (2 Ch 28¹⁵). Mary's anointing of our Lord was according to this custom.

3. Before battle, shields were oiled, that their surfaces might be slippery and shining (Is 21⁵, 2 S 1²¹ RV). This practice is referred to several times by classical authors, and is in use to this day among some African tribes.

4. As a remedial agent a. was in use among the Jews in pre-Christian times; it was practised by the apostles (Mk 6¹³), recommended by St. James (5¹⁴), mentioned in the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10³⁴), and used as a type of God's forgiving grace healing the sin-sick soul (Is 1⁶, Ezk 16⁹, Rev 3¹⁹). In post-apost. times the oil was supposed to owe its virtue to its consecration by prayer, which might be done by any Christian; thus Proculus anointed Severus, and healed him (Tertull. ad Scap. iv.). By the 3rd cent. consecration of the oil could only be done by the bishop (Innocent, Decentio, viii.); although any Christian might apply the holy oil, and the oil from the church lamps was often taken for this purpose (Chrysostom in Mt 32). Oil was also consecrated by being taken from the tombs of martyrs (ib. Homil. in Martyr. iii.). By the 5th cent. the priest alone could anoint (Labbe & Cossart, Concilia, ix. 419, § 10). This a. was intended as a means of cure even as late as the days of Bede (in Marci, i. c. 24). The a. of the dying was a heretical practice of the Marcionites (Irenæus, i. 21. 5) and the Heracleonites (Epiphanius, adv. Hæc. xxxvi. 2) for purposes of exorcism. Theodoret says that the Archontici also use oil and water, but apparently in a different way (επιβάλλουσι, see Hæc. Fab. Compend. i. 11). In the Rom. Church by the 12th cent. the idea of healing had become obsolete, and the a. was restricted to the dying (Council of Florence, 1439) and applied before the Viaticum (1st Council of Mainz, Can. xxvi.). It is called extreme unction by Hugo de St. Victore (Summa Sententiar. vi. 15), and its place as one of the seven sacraments of the Rom. Church was decided by the Council of Trent. Calvin calls it histrionica hypocrisis (Inst. vi. 19, § 18).

The ceremonial of anointing the leper when cleansed was not remedial, but a sign of reconsecration. In Scripture the application of any soft material, as moistened clay, to a blind man's eyes, is called anointing (Jn 9⁶).

5. As in Egypt, the application of ointments and spices to the dead body was customary in Pal. (Mk 16¹, Lk 23⁵⁶, Jn 19⁴⁰); but they were only externally applied, and did not prevent decomposition (Jn 11³⁹). In later times the a. of the dead with holy oil is recommended (Dionys. Areopag. de Eccles. Hierarch. vii. § 8).

6. Holy things were by a. dedicated to God even in ancient times. Thus Jacob consecrated the stones at Bethel (Gn 28¹³, 35¹⁴); and God recognised the action (31¹³). In Greece, Egypt, and other countries dedication by oil was practised, and is continued in the Rom. and Gr. rituals for the consecration of churches. The tabernacle and its furniture were thus consecrated (Ex 30²⁶ 40¹⁰, Lv 8¹¹), and the altar of burnt-offering was reconsecrated after the sin-offering (Ex 29³⁶). Some periodic hostia honoraria were anointed with oil (Lv 2¹ etc.); but no oil was to be poured on the sin-offering (Lv 5¹¹, Nu 5¹⁶). It is not said that the temple was consecrated by a., but there was holy oil in the priests' charge at the time (1 K 1³⁹), as there was in the days of the second temple (1 Ch 9²⁹).

7. Priests were set apart by a. In the case of Aaron, and probably all high priests, this was done twice: first by pouring the holy oil on his head after his robing, but before the sacrifice of consecration (Lv 8¹², Ps 133²); and next by sprinkling after the sacrifice (Lv 8³⁰). The ordinary priests were only sprinkled with oil after the application of the blood of the sacrifice. Hence the high priest is called the anointed priest (Lv 4³, 5 and 6²²). The holy oil for this purpose was made of olive oil, cinnamon, cassia, flowing myrrh, and the root of the sweet cane (Acorus Calamus). It was to be used only for these ceremonials, and its unauthorised compounding was strictly forbidden (Ex 30³⁸). In Egypt there were nine sacred oils for ceremonial use. A. in the ordination of presbyters and deacons came into use in the 8th cent., but was not practised in the early Church.

8. Of designation to kingship by a. we have examples in Saul (1 S 10¹) and David (1 S 16¹³). This act was accompanied by the gift of the Spirit; so, when David was anointed, the Spirit descended on him, and departed from Saul; and Hazael was anointed over Syria by God's command (1 K 19¹⁵). Kings thus designated were called the Lord's anointed. David thus speaks of Saul (1 S 26¹¹) and of himself (Ps 2²). This passage is used by the apostles as prophetic of Christ (Ac 4²⁶).

9. By a. kings were installed in office. David was again anointed when made king of Judah, and a third time when made king of united Israel (2 S 2⁴ 5⁵). Solomon was anointed in David's lifetime, and he refers to the a. in his dedication prayer. It is not said that those who succeeded by right of primogeniture were anointed; but when the succession was disputed, Jehoiada anointed Joash (2 K 11¹²). Jehoahaz the younger son of Josiah was anointed (2 K 23³⁰) in place of his elder brother Jehoiakim (see 23³¹, 36). Kings of other lands were anointed. This was early known to the Israelites, as we learn from Jotham's parable (Jg 9⁸). The kings of Egypt were anointed, and the a. is said to have been done by the gods (Dümichen, Hist. Inschrift, i. 12); hence they are called the 'anointed of the gods.' The king of Tyre is also called the 'anointed' (Ezk 28¹⁴). Jehu was anointed as beginning a new dynasty (2 K 9¹²). Zedekiah is referred to as anointed (La 4²⁰). British kings were anointed in pre-Saxon days (Gildas, de excidio Brit. i. 19), as were the Christianised Saxons; but the first mention of a. at coronation elsewhere in Europe is in A.D. 636 in the Acts of the 6th Council of Toledo. Charlemagne, A.D. 800, was the first emperor anointed (by Pope Leo III.). A. is now a part of the ceremonial of coronation in most Christian kingdoms.

10. A. is used metaphorically to mean setting apart to the prophetic office; so Elijah is told to anoint Elisha. This does not appear to have been literally done (1 K 19¹⁶). In Ps 105¹⁵ the words anointed and prophets are used as synonyms. The Servant of the Lord calls himself anointed to preach (Is 61¹), and Christ tells the people of Nazareth that this prophecy is fulfilled in Him (Lk 4¹⁸).

11. Similarly in a metaphorical sense any one chosen of God is called an anointed one; thus the patriarchs are called God's Messiahs (Ps 105¹⁵), and Israel as a nation (Ps 84⁹, Hab 3¹³, Ps 89³⁸, 51), being promised deliverance on this account (Is 10²⁷, 1 S 2¹⁰). Cyrus is also called a Messiah (Is 45¹). The name Christ is the Gr. equivalent of the Heb. Messiah = 'anointed.' The anointing of Ps 45⁷ is taken in He 1⁹ as prophetic of the Saviour's anointing.

In this sense, as a chosen people, believers are said to be God's anointed (2 Co 1²¹, 1 Jn 2²⁰, 27), the unction being the gift of the Holy Spirit. In post-apost. times these words gave rise to the practice of anointing with oil at baptism. This was done by way of exorcism before the washing in the E. Church in the days of Cyril (Catech. Mystag. ii. D), as it seems from St. Augustine to have been the practice in Africa (see Tr. 44 in Joannis, § 2, referring to anointing the blind man's eyes before the washing). But Tertullian puts the a. after the washing (De resurr. Carnis, § viii.), as does Optatus, who says that Christ was anointed by the dove after baptism (de Schism. Donat. iv. 76). Upon these texts, quoted above, coupled with the 'sealing' mentioned in Eph 1¹³ 4³⁰ and 2 Co 1²², the post-apostolic Church based the ceremony of confirmation, in connexion with which in the W. Church another anointing became customary in the 5th cent.

ANSWER.—1. As a subst. a. is used in the sense of apology or defence (Gr. ἀπολογία) in 1 Co 9³ 'mine a. (RV 'my defence') to them that do examine me'; 2 Ti 4¹⁶ 'At my first a. (RV 'defence') no man stood by me'; 1 P 3¹⁵ 'Ready always to give an a. (RV 'give a.') to every man.' Compare the use of a. as a verb in Ac 24¹⁰ 'I do the more cheerfully a. for myself' (RV 'I do cheerfully make my defence'), Ac 25¹⁶ 26^{1,2}, Lk 12¹¹ 21¹⁴. 2. In Ro 11⁴ 'what saith the a. of God unto him?' a. means oracle or divine response (Gr. χρηματισμός, the only occurrence of the word in NT, but it is found in 2 Mac 2⁴ χρηματισμοῦ γερηθέντος, 'being warned of God' AV and RV; see Sanday and Headlam, Romans, pp. 173, 313). 3. In 1 P 3²¹ 'the a. of a good conscience toward God,' a. is prob. intended to mean defence, as above; but the Gr. is not ἀπολογία but ἐπερώτημα, and in what precise sense the apostle uses that word is disputed; RV gives 'interrogation,' with two alternatives in the marg. 'inquiry' and 'appeal.' See Thayer, N.T. Lex. s.v. 4. As a verb a. is often used when no question has been asked. The most striking instance is Ac 5⁸, where St. Peter 'answers' Sapphira, not only before she had opened her mouth, but by asking her a question. 5. In Gal 4²⁵ 'For this Agar is Mt. Sinai in Arabia, and a^{sth} to Jerus.,' a^{sth} to = corresponds with (Gr. συντοιχεῖ—lit. 'belongs to the same row or column with'). Answerable occurs in AV only Ex 38¹⁸ 'a. to the hangings of the court,' i.e. 'corresponding to'; but RV adds Ezk 40¹⁸ 'a. unto (AV 'over against') the length of the gates,' 45⁷ 48^{18, 18bis}. Cf Bunyan, Holy War (Clar. Press ed. p. 92), 'This famous town of Mansoul had five Gates, in at which to come, out at which to go; and these were made likewise answerable to the Walls.'

ANT (אַנְתִּי nēmālāh, μύρμηξ, formica). The ant is mentioned only twice in the Bible. Once (Pr 6⁶) with reference to the industry of this insect, and again (Pr 30²⁵) with reference to its wisdom and foresight. There has never been any dispute as to the industry of the ant. Sir John Lubbock (Ants, Bees, and Wasps, p. 27) says, 'They work all day, and in warm weather, if need be, at night too. I once watched an ant from six in the morning, and she worked without intermission till a quarter to ten at night. I had put her to a saucer containing larvæ, and in this time she had carried off no less than 187 to their nests. I had another ant, which I employed in my experiments under continuous observation several days. When I started for London in the morning, and again when I went to bed at night, I used to put her into a small bottle, but the moment she was let out she began to work again. On one occasion I was away from home for a week. On my return I took her out of the bottle, placing her on a little heap of larvæ, about three feet from her nest. Under these circumstances I certainly did not expect her to return. However, though she had been six days in confinement, the brave little creature immediately picked up a larva, carried it to her nest, and after half an hour's rest returned for another.'

With reference to the wisdom and foresight of the ant there has been much discussion. Although not expressly stated that the 'meat' which the ant 'prepares' in the summer is for winter use, it is generally agreed that such is the meaning of the passage. The Greeks, Romans, Arabian naturalists, and Jewish rabbis confirm this opinion. Yet many naturalists and commentators have disputed this fact, and say that the writer adopted a popular error, and that the ant does not store the seeds which it takes in such quantities to its nest as food, but only as a lining to its burrows, or for some other unknown reason. They argue from two considerations—(1) that the ant is carnivorous, and has no use for the seeds which it accumulates in its nest; (2) that the ant hibernates, and therefore does not need food in winter. Both of these propositions are partially true and partially false. All ants eat flesh greedily, but they are all passionately fond of many things besides. Sir John Lubbock has shown that ants derive a very important part of their sustenance from the sweet juice secreted by aphides, a product hardly to be called animal food more than honey. In the words of Linnæus, 'the aphid is the cow of ants.' Other kinds of insects are utilised in the same manner. Many ants keep flocks and herds of aphides. The aphides retain the secretion until the ants are ready to receive it, and the ants stroke and caress them with their antennæ, until they emit the sweet excretion. The ants collect the eggs and larvæ of these aphides, store them with their own during the long winter sleep, that they may be hatched in the spring, and supply them again with their favourite food. Here then, says Lubbock, 'our ants may not perhaps lay up food for the winter, but they do more, for they keep during six months the eggs which will enable them to procure food during the following summer—a case of prudence unexampled in the animal kingdom.' But it is also true that ants eat many articles of purely vegetable food. Those of Palestine and Syria certainly eat all kinds of cake, sweetmeats, more or less fruit, bread, meal, and seeds. In the neighbourhood of every threshing-floor and granary, and of stables, there are always immense numbers of ants, which abstract surprising quantities of grain, and store them in their nests. They often carry the grains many feet or yards away, along well-beaten roads, which cross each other in every direction from the heaps of grain. Similar facts have been observed in the warmer parts of Europe and in India. The Mishna lays down rules in regard to the ownership of grain so stored. Maimonides has discussed the question as to whether it belongs to the owners of the land or to gleaners, deciding in favour of the latter. The ants, however, differ from him, and are of opinion that the store belongs to themselves. I am assured by native peasants, well qualified to know, that the ants eat the grain during the season of non-production. After the first rains, the ants bring out their larvæ and the stored grains to be sunned. Indian ants do the same. Many of these grains are more or less gnawed, or the edible parts entirely consumed. It was the opinion of Aldrovandus and others of the ancients, confirmed by the French Academy (Addison's Guardian, 156, 157) and of N. Pluche (Nature displ. i. 128), that the ants systematically bit off the head of the grain to prevent its germination. I think it unnecessary to ascribe to the ants so much intelligence as would be implied in this extraordinary measure, but it is no way improbable that the head would be the first part attacked, as it is the softest portion of the grain, and the most accessible, being uncovered by the silicious envelope, as well as the sweetest morsel of the whole. Lubbock tells us of a Texan ant that clears disks, 10 or 12 feet in diameter, round the entrance to its nest, to allow certain grains known as ant-rice, and no others, to grow there.

Thus the ants 'are exceeding wise.' Many of their nests also are marvels of construction, some composed of galleries and chambers underground, some built in the form of mounds or huts above the surface. These are grouped in towns, connected by surface roads, sometimes arched over at places, and by underground tunnels. No less than 584 species of insects are found in association with ants, serving them in various ways, some obvious, others not clear. But that they are tolerated by the ants for reasons known to themselves is shown by the fact that ants will immediately attack and drive out or kill any living creatures which they do not like. Many of the insects furnish some form of food, as in the case of the aphides. Others rid the ants of parasites. Others seem to be congenial to them for reasons yet to be studied.

In addition to these insects, not of their own family, ants make slaves of other ants. This is not done by the capture of adult prisoners, but by raids organised for the purpose of stealing the eggs, larvæ, and pupæ from the nests of other species. These infant captives are taken to the nests of their abductors, and raised as slaves. These slaves do all or most of the domestic work of their masters, who reserve themselves for the noble art of war.

Ants also have accurate methods of division of labour. To the younger ones are assigned some of the lighter tasks, while the older ones engage in the more serious and laborious work. In some cases individuals are appointed to collect honey and store it in large sacs in their bodies, to be distributed to their idle masters, who do not trouble themselves to leave their nests.

Lubbock thus sums up the evidence that ants 'are exceeding wise': 'The anthropoid apes no doubt approach nearer to man in bodily structure than do other animals, but when we consider the habits of ants, their social organisation, their large communities and elaborate habitations, their roadways, their possession of domestic animals, and even, in some cases, of slaves, it must be admitted that they have a fair claim to rank next to man in the scale of intelligence.' ANTIOCH (Ἀντιόχεια).—In Syria, under the Seleucids, there appear to have been at least five places which at one time or another enjoyed this title: Hippos on the hills above the E. shore of the Lake of Galilee ('A. ἡ πρὸς Ἰππω), Gadara (cf. Stephanus, De Urbibus; Reland, Pal. 774), Gerasa in E. Gilead ('A. ἡ πρὸς τῷ Χρυσοπόδῳ), all of them in the Decapolis, and perhaps also Acco or Ptolemais (Head, Hist. Num. 677); but the Antioch in Syria was A. on the Orontes, distinguished as 'A. ἡ πρὸς, or ἐπι, Δάφνης, and entitled μητρόπολις (ib. 656).

Under an Eastern people like the Arabs, the natural capital of Syria is Damascus, on the borders of the Arabian desert. But when the Greeks poured into the land after Alexander, it was inevitable that they should establish the centre of their government nearer the Mediterranean and Asia Minor. Accordingly, when the Seleucid Empire was founded, Seleucus Nikator (Jos. c. Apion, ii. 4) selected a site 120 stadia from the sea (Strabo, xvi.), where the Orontes, now El-Asi, and the great roads from the Euphrates and Coele-Syria break the long Syrian range and debouch upon the coast. The projected Euphrates-Levant railway is to pass by the same way. The valley is tolerably wide, and both fair and fertile. The city was built partly on an island in the river, but mostly on the N. bank of the latter, and up the slopes of Mt. Silpius. By the time of Antiochus Epiphanes (175 B.C.) it consisted of four quarters (τετράπολις, Strabo), divided by the long columned street which was a feature of every Greek city in Syria, and by a second which cut this obliquely. Temples and other large public buildings were erected from time to time by the Seleucids and their Roman successors. Daphne was a neighbouring grove sacred to Apollo (Jos. Ant. xvii. ii. 1; Pliny, HN v. 18; 2 Mac 4²³). Under the Seleucids the city developed a mixed populace, essentially fickle and turbulent, who frequently rose against their rulers. There were Jews in Antioch from the time of its foundation, for Seleucus Nikator gave them the rights of citizenship (Jos. Ant. xii. iii. 1). Many others must have fled or been carried captive to A. during the Maccabæan period (ib. xii. xiii. passim). The Antiochenes expelled Alexander Balas, and offered the crown to Ptolemy Philometor, who, however, persuaded them to receive Demetrius Nikator (ib. xiii. iv. 7; but cf. 1 Mac 11^{38ff.}). They besieged the latter in his palace; but with the help of Jonathan Maccabæus and 3000 Jews he regained the city, yet soon after was obliged to yield it to Alexander's son Antiochus and his general Tryphon (Ant. xiii. v. 3; 1 Mac 11^{38ff.}). Under the Seleucids A. remained till B.C. 83, when it was taken by Tigranes of Armenia. When Pompey overthrew the latter, he made A. a free city, and it became the seat of the Prefect, and capital of the Rom. province of Syria. M. Antonius ordered the citizens to release all the Jews whom they had enslaved, and restore to them their possessions (Ant. xiv. xii. 6). When Pompey fell, A. sided with Cæsar, and after Actium with Augustus. Both of the latter, as well as Herod the Great (Ant. xvi. v. 3) and Tiberius, embellished the town with theatres, baths, and streets. The harbour of A. was Seleucia. The population was very vigorous. They revolted several times against Rome; and after the disastrous earthquakes of A.D. 37 and subsequent years they quickly restored the town. Art and literature were cultivated so as to draw the praise of Cicero; but with the energy and brilliance of this people there was ever mixed a notorious insolence and scurrility. A large number of Romans settled in A., and the Jewish community speedily grew in numbers and in influence with the rest of the inhabitants (Jos. BJ ii. xviii. 5), who protected them in the first Jewish revolt against Rome, but afterwards displayed a bitter hate against them (ib. vii. v. 2).

It was when A. was filled with these rich and varied elements of life—Josephus calls her the third city of the Empire, next to Rome and Alexandria (BJ III. ii. 4)—that she entered the history of Christianity. Antiochean Jews and proselyte Greeks must have come under the influence of the apostles' ministry in Jerus. Nicolas 'a proselyte of A.' was one of the seven deacons (Ac 6⁵). Upon the persecution that arose about Stephen, the disciples were scattered as far north as A. (Ac 11^{19a}), and among them some men of Cyprus and Cyrene, who began to preach to Greeks (many ancient authorities give 'Grecian Jews,' but surely Greeks are meant,—for otherwise the distinction made between the Cypriotes and Cyrenians and the other preachers in 11²⁰ is meaningless). To them at A. the Church at Jerus. sent Barnabas, who, after seeing the situation, went and fetched Paul thither from Tarsus. For a year they worked together in the church, teaching; 'and the disciples were called Christians first in A.' The wit of the place was always famous for giving names. Prophets arrived from Jerus. predicting a famine; and when this came to pass, the Church of A. proved once more the vigour of the population from which it was drawn, by sending supplies to Jerus. by the hands of Barnabas and Saul (ib. 27-30). These returned to A., and after their ministry 'in the church' they were sent forth by the port of Seleucia to Cyprus on Paul's first great missionary journey (13¹); and from this to A. they returned, with their report of faith among the Gentiles (14^{26b}). When Jews came down to teach the necessity of circumcision for the latter, the Church at A. sent Barnabas and Paul to Jerus. to claim for them freedom from the law (15^{1a}); and a deputation from Jerus. returned with the two ambassadors (15^{22a}). After ministering for a time in A., Paul and Barnabas set forth on their second journey by the Cilician gates (Ramsay) to Lystra (15³⁰); Paul returned (18²²); and A. was the starting-point of his third journey (ib. 23), which also was taken into Asia Minor, by the Syrian and Cilician gates, one great line of the advancement of Christianity westward. A. was not only the first Gentile Church, but may be called the mother of all the rest. This pre-eminence she continued to enjoy; for it was probably her missionary originality, rather than the tradition which made Peter her bishop for two years (cf. Gal 2¹¹), that gave her Patriarch precedence of those of Rome, Constantinople, Jerus., and Alexandria. A. was the birthplace of Ammianus Marcellinus, John Chrysostom, and Evagrius. As long as she remained part of an empire with its centre in Europe, A. continued the virtual capital of Syria. When the Arabs came, she, the city of the Levant, yielded to the city of the Desert; and though with the Crusaders she became once more the pivot of the West in its bearing on Syria, and the centre of the Principality of A. (from Taurus to Nahr-el-Kebir), she fell away again when they left, and gave up to Damascus even her Christian Patriarch. Now Antaki (Turkish), or Antakiyeh (Arab.), she is a meagre town of 6000 inhabitants. Besides the ruins of Justinian's wall there are no ancient remains of importance.

ANTIOCH IN PISIDIA (Ἀντιόχεια Πισιδία, more correctly rendered 'Pisidian Antioch') is defined by Strabo (pp. 569, 557, 577) as a city of Phrygia towards or near Pisidia. It was probably one of the sixteen Antiochs founded by Seleucus Nikator (301-280; Appian, Syr. 57), and named after his father. The inhabitants claimed to be colonists from Magnesia on the Mæander; but traditions claiming Greek origin for Phrygian cities were fashionable and untrustworthy. In 190 B.C. it was declared free by the Romans; and its history is unknown until in 39 B.C. it was made by Antony part of the kingdom of Amyntas (as we learn from Appian, Civ. v. 75, cf. Strabo, p. 569); on whose death in 25 it passed into Rom. hands as part of the province GALATIA. At some time earlier than 6 B.C. (CIL iii. 6974) Augustus made it a colonia with Latin rights (Digest, 50. 15. 8, 10) with the name Cæsareia Antiocheia, the administrative centre of the southern half of the province, and the military centre of a series of coloniae (Lystra, Parlais, Cremna, Comama, Olbasa) founded to defend the province against the unruly and dangerous Pisidians in the fastnesses of the Taurus mountains. The region or district to which Antioch belonged is called Phrygia by Strabo (and also in Ac 16⁸ 18²³, according to the South-Galatian theory, held by some scholars, disputed by others), Pisidian Phrygia by Ptolemy v., 5. 4, Pisidia by Ptolemy v., 4. 11, and by later authorities, showing that gradually that part of Phrygia, which was included in the province Galatia and separated from the great mass of Phrygia (which was part of the province Asia), was merged in Pisidia. Thus the name Antioch towards Pisidia (Strabo, A.D. 19), or Pisidian Antioch (to distinguish it from Antioch on the Mæander or Carian Antioch), gave place to the name Antioch of Pisidia (Ptolemy v., 4. 11, and some MSS. of Ac 13⁴). The influence of the preaching of Paul and Barnabas in Antioch radiated over the whole region connected politically with the city (Ac 13⁴⁹). Antioch (as Arundel discovered) is situated about 2 miles E. from Yalowatch on the skirts of the long ridge called Sultan-Dagh, in a strong situation, about 3600 ft. above sea-level, overlooking a large and fertile plain, which stretches away S.E. to the Limnai (Egerdir Lake), and is drained by the river Anthios. The ruins, which are impressive and of great extent, have never as yet been carefully examined. Antioch was a great seat of the worship of Men Askaënos; but the large estates and numerous temple-slaves ruled by the priests were confiscated by the Romans. Jewish colonists were always favoured by the Seleucid kings, who found them good and trusty supporters; many thousands of Jews were settled in the cities of Phrygia (Jos. Ant. XII. iii. f.; Cicero, pro Flacco, 28. 66-8); and a synagogue at Antioch is mentioned Ac 13¹⁴. The influence ascribed to the ladies of Antioch (Ac 13⁵⁰) is characteristic of Phrygia and Asia Minor generally, where women enjoyed great consideration, and often held office in the cities (see Paris, Quatenus feminae res publicas attigerint, 1891).

ANTIOCHIANS (Ἀντιοχείς, 2 Mac 4⁹, 19).—The efforts of Antiochus Epiphanes to spread Gr. culture and Gr. customs throughout his dominions were diligently furthered by a section of the Jews.

The leader of this Hellenizing party, Jason, brother of the high priest Onias III., offered a large sum of money to Antiochus to induce the king to transfer the high priesthood to himself, and along with certain other favours to allow the inhabitants of Jerusalem 'to be enrolled as Antiochians,' that is, to grant them the titles and privileges of citizens of Antioch. What was the precise nature of the desired privileges we do not know. Antiochus acceded to the proposal of Jason, and shortly afterwards a party of 'Antiochians' from Jerusalem was sent by him as a sacred deputation, to convey a contribution of money for the festival of Heracles at Tyre.

ANTIOCHIS (Ἀντιόχis, 2 Mac 4³⁰), a concubine of Antiochus Epiphanes, who, in accordance with an old Oriental custom, assigned to her for her maintenance the revenues of the two Cilician cities, Tarsus and Mallus. This grant gave rise to disturbances among the inhabitants of the two cities, but we are not told what means were taken by Antiochus to allay their discontent.

ANTIOCHUS (Ἀντίοχος, 1 Mac 12¹⁶ 14²²; cf. Jos. Ant. XIII. v. 8), the father of Numenius, who was one of the envoys sent (c. 144 B.C.) by Jonathan the Maccabee to renew the covenant made by Judas with the Romans, and to enter into friendly relations with the Spartans.

ANTIOCHUS I. (Ἀντίοχος, 'the opposer'), surnamed Soter, 'deliverer,' was born B.C. 324, son of Seleucus Nikator and of Apama, a princess of Sogdiana. He succeeded his father (B.C. 280) on the throne of Syria, but during the nineteen years of his reign was concerned chiefly with the prosecution of his claims to the throne of Macedonia, with the maintenance of his empire against Kelts and eastern revolts, and with the repression of the Gauls who had settled in Asia Minor. He was slain by one of the latter in battle (B.C. 261). The possession of Coele-Syria was a matter of dispute between him and Ptolemy Philadelphus (1st Syrian War), but it remained under the sovereignty of the latter, and the S. districts do not appear to have been invaded by Antiochus.

R. W. Moss.

ANTIOCHUS II. (surnamed Theos, 'a god') succeeded his father, A. I., as king of Syria in B.C. 261. His kingdom was invaded soon after his accession by the generals of Ptolemy Philadelphus (2nd Syrian War), who occupied several of the principal towns on the coast of Asia Minor. Peace was concluded (B.C. 250), probably on condition that A. should put away his wife Laodice, marry Berenice, daughter of Ptolemy, and transfer the succession to her issue (Athen. ii. 45). In a short time either Laodice was recalled, or A. endeavoured to reconcile her; but, in mistrust or revenge for the insult passed upon her, she plotted against A., caused him (B.C. 246) to be poisoned and Berenice's infant to be put to death, and secured the throne for her son Seleucus (App. Syr. 65; Justin, xxvii. 1; Val. Max. ix. 14. 1). There are strong evidences that A. conferred upon several cities of Asia Minor a democratic constitution and the rights of autonomy. His surname was given him by the Milesians in gratitude for his victory over their tyrant Timarchus (App. Syr. 65). The Jews in these cities, and notably in Ephesus, shared in these rights of citizenship; and this was the case, both in the arrangement of cities rebuilt during the Hellenic age, and in the reorganisation of older cities effected chiefly by A. II. See Arrian, i. 17. 10 and 18. 2; Jos. Ant. XII. iii. 2; Apion. ii. 4; Dittenberger, Sylloge Inscript. Græc. nn. 166, 171. Dn 11⁶ is traditionally interpreted of Anti-ochus (Jerome, ad Dan. 11⁶), but the latter part of the verse is almost hopelessly corrupt.

ANTIOCHUS III. ('the Great') was the son of Seleucus Kallinicus (B.C. 246-226), and succeeded to the throne of Syria on the death of his brother, Seleucus Keraunus (B.C. 223). Immediately after his accession he made war upon Egypt; and in two successive campaigns he led his army as far as Dora, a few miles to the N. of Casarea. A truce suspended hostilities for a time (Polyb. v. 60; Justin, xxx. 1, 2), during which he put down Molo's rebellion in Media. In B.C. 218 he again drove the Egyp. forces southwards, and himself wintered at Ptolemais; but the next year he was completely defeated at Raphia (Polyb. v. 51-87; Strabo, xvi. 759), near Gaza, and left Ptolemy Philopator in undisputed possession of Coele-Syria and Phœnicia. The following years he spent in warfare against Achæus, whom he took in B.C. 214, and in Parthia and Bactria, where his successes gained for him his surname. But on Ptolemy's death, in B.C. 204, he formed an alliance with Philip of Macedon for the partition of Egypt between the two powers (Liv. xxxi. 14). In Judæa he found a party among the Jews alienated from Egypt, and with their help he extended his kingdom to the Sinaitic peninsula. But an invasion of his dominions by Attalus, king of Pergamus, checked his further progress; and in his absence Scopas, an Egyp. general, overran Judæa, and recovered the lost territories. A. hastened to oppose him, and at Paneas (Ἰλάνειον, a grotto of Pan, which gave its name to the district), near the source of the Jordan, gained a decisive victory (B.C. 198), which made him again master of all Pal. (Polyb. xvi. 18, xxviii. 1; Liv. xxx. 19; Jos. Ant. XII. iii. 3). Judæa was thus finally connected with the Seleucid dynasty. Syrian στρατηγοί, or military governors, were appointed; and regular taxes were imposed, and leased to contractors in the several towns. A. further guaranteed the inviolability of the temple, and provided by ample grants for the performance of its services (Jos. Ant. XII. iii. 4). With a view to pacify Lydia and Phrygia, he sent there 2000 Jewish families from Mesopotamia with grants of land and immunity from taxation. The intervention of the Romans prevented any further expedition against Egypt: and a treaty was made by which Ptolemy Epiphanes took in marriage A.'s daughter Cleopatra, who was promised as her dower the three provinces of Coele-Syria, Phœnicia, and Pal. (Polyb. xxviii. 17; App. Syr. 5; Liv. xxxv. 13; Jos. Ant. XII. iv. 1). The transfer of the provinces themselves appears not to have taken place, though the queen for a time shared in their revenue. Judæa was probably occupied by Syrian and Egyp. garrisons side by side; and the people were subjected to a twofold tyranny. A. retained the nominal sovereignty; but in B.C. 196 he left Pal. in order to conduct an expedition against Asia Minor (Liv. xxxiii. 19), and became involved in a long war with Rome. He was finally defeated in the battle of Magnesia (B.C. 190), and three years later was killed in an insurrection at Elymais. Dn 11¹⁰⁻¹⁹ is traditionally interpreted of him, and he is mentioned in 1 Mac 1¹⁰ 8⁶⁻⁸. The statements in the latter passage should be compared with App. Syr. 36 and Liv. xxxvii. 44, 56.

ANTIOCHUS IV. EPIPHANES (Ἐπιφανής, 'illustrious'; also named ἐπιμανής, 'madman,' Polyb. xxvi. 10; νικηφόρος, 'victorious,' and θεός, on coins and in Jos. Ant. XII. v. 5), second son of A. the Great, was for 14 years a hostage at Rome, and, after expelling Heliodorus, succeeded his own brother Seleucus Philopator in B.C. 175. His policy was to spread Greek culture (Tac. Hist. v. 8) through his dominions, and so knit the various peoples into a compact and single-purposed unity. Soon after his accession he was called upon to settle a dispute at Jerus. between the high priest Onias III. and his brother Jason, the leader of the Hellenizing party. Onias was driven from Jerus. (2 Mac 4⁴⁻⁶); and Jason secured the high priesthood by the payment to the king of a large sum of money and the promise thoroughly to Hellenize the city (2 Mac 4⁹⁻¹⁶, 1 Mac 1¹⁰⁻¹⁵; Jos. Ant. XII. v. 1). A. soon after visited the city in person, and was received with every mark of honour (2 Mac 4²²). In B.C. 171 Jason was himself supplanted by Menelaus, who offered larger bribes; but the next year he was encouraged by a rumour of the king's death in Egypt to besiege Jerus. (2 Mac 5⁵). The tidings reached A. as he was in the midst of his second prosperous campaign in Egypt, and at once, 'in a furious mind,' he marched against Jerus. The city was taken, many thousands of the people were massacred, and the temple was robbed of its treasures (1 Mac 1²⁰⁻²⁴, 2 Mac 5¹¹⁻²¹; Jos. Ant. XII. v. 3; Aptom. ii. 7). Philip, a Phrygian of specially barbarous temper (2 Mac 5²²), was left behind as governor of Jerus., and A. proceeded with the spoils of the temple to Antioch.

In B.C. 168 A. set out on his last expedition against Egypt, and was approaching Alexandria to besiege it when he received from the Romans peremptory orders to refrain from making war upon the Ptolemies (App. Syr. 66; Liv. xlv. 12; Polyb. xxix. 11; Justin, xxxiv. 3). Reluctantly he withdrew from Egypt, and vented his rage upon Jerus. (see Dn 11³⁰). Apollonius, one of the chief officers of revenue, was detached with an army of 22,000 men, with instructions to exterminate the Jewish people and to colonize the city with Greeks (2 Mac 5²⁴, 1 Mac 1³⁴⁻³⁸). Availing himself of the Sabbath law, Apollonius chose that day for entrance into Jerus., and met with no effective resistance. The men were killed, except a few who took refuge with Judas Maccabæus in flight, and the women and children sold into slavery. The city was set on fire, its walls thrown down, and their materials used to fortify anew the old city of David, which thenceforth uninterruptedly for 26 years was occupied by a Syrian garrison. Menelaus still remained high priest, but it is difficult to understand what his duties were, as the daily sacrifices are said to have ceased in the month of Sivan (June).

A decree was then promulgated by A. throughout his kingdom that in religion, law, and custom 'all should be one people' (1 Mac 1⁴¹; Polyb. xxxviii. 18). In Judæa alone the edict seems to have met with serious opposition. Accordingly the observance of the Sabbath, circumcision, and abstinence from unclean food were specifically forbidden under the penalty of death. Upon the altar of burnt-offering a smaller altar was built, and on the 25th of Chislew (Dec. 168) sacrifice was offered upon it to the Olympic Zeus (1 Mac 1⁵⁴, 2 Mac 6²; Jos. Ant. XII. v. 4; see Dn 11³¹). The phrase in Dn, אֲנִי וְעַמִּי יִשְׂרָאֵל, may have other reference, and is not without linguistic difficulty; but its oldest interpretation, in the LXX, is βδέλυγμα ἐρημώσεως, which exactly agrees with the expression in 1 Mac 1⁵⁴). The courts, too, of the temple were polluted by indecent orgies. At the same time the worship of Zeus Xenios was instituted in the Sam. temple on Mt. Gerizim. The festivals of Bacchus were introduced into the various towns, and the Jews compelled to take part in them (2 Mac 6⁷). A monthly search was made (1 Mac 1⁵⁸); and the possession of a copy of the book of the law was punishable by death. Similar measures were taken in all the cities frequented by the Jews in the Syrian kingdom, and even in Egypt (2 Mac 6⁸⁻⁹). The effect upon the better Jews was to arouse a spirit of heroism, which showed itself at first only in an inflexible refusal to renounce Judaism. 'They chose to die . . . and they died' (1 Mac 1⁶⁸); and 2 Mac 6¹¹⁻⁷⁴² records with licence certain instances which are further elaborated in 4 Mac, and of which Philo makes use in Quod omnis prob. lib. § 13 (Mang. ii. 459). Open resistance occurred first at Modin (Μωδέτιν or Μωδέειν), a mountain village E. of Lydda and N.W. of Jerus. When the king's commissioner came to see that the edict was obeyed, Mattathias, the head of the priestly Hasmonæan family, refused compliance, killed the officer, and fled to the hills (1 Mac 2¹⁵⁻²⁸; Jos. Ant. XII. vi. 2: a tradition ascribes the first rising to an outrage attempted upon a Jewish bride). His example was imitated by many others (1 Mac 2²⁹); but a great slaughter of them took place through their refusal to defend themselves on a Sabbath (1 Mac 2³²⁻³⁸). Mattathias persuaded his followers that the law of the Sabbath did not override the right of defence, and was joined by many of the Asidæans (Ἀσιδαῖοι, אַסִּידִים ḤASIDIM). His bands traversed the country, harassing the Syrians with a guerilla warfare, everywhere destroying the symbols of idolatry (1 Mac 2⁴⁶⁻⁴⁸).

Towards the end of B.C. 167 Mattathias died, and was succeeded in the military chieftainship of his party by his son Judas Maccabæus (wh. see). After pursuing for a time with invariable success his father's practice of cutting off small companies of the enemy by surprises, Judas found his followers strong and expert enough to be trusted in larger enterprises. In turn he routed an army of Syrians and Samaritans under the command of Apollonius, and a greater host at Bethhoron under Seron, the general of Cœle-Syria (1 Mac 3¹⁰⁻²⁴; Jos. Ant. XII. vii. 1). When news of the revolt of Judæa reached A., he himself was obliged to set out upon an expedition into Parthia and Armenia, where insurrection was spreading and the taxes were withheld (Tac. Hist. v. 8; App. Syr. 45; Müller, Fragm. ii. 10). But he left Lysias behind, as regent and guardian of his son, with orders to depopulate Judæa (1 Mac 3³²⁻³⁶; Jos. Ant. XII. vii. 2). Lysias at once despatched a large body of troops under the command of Ptolemy, Nicanor, and Gorgias; and with them came merchants to purchase the expected Jewish slaves (1 Mac 3³⁸⁻⁴¹). At Emmaus (Ἐμμαοῦ, the modern Amwās), Judas inflicted so signal a defeat upon Gorgias that the Syrian troops fled out of the country (1 Mac 4²²). In B.C. 165 Lysias in person led a still larger army against Judas, but was completely defeated at Bethzur (1 Mac 4²⁸⁻³⁵; Jos. Ant. XII. vii. 5). Judas regained possession of the entire country except the citadel in Jerus., and on the 25th of Chislew the daily sacrifices were restored (1 Mac 4⁵², 2 Mac 10⁶; Jos. Ant. XII. vii. 6 and 7; Middoth, i. 6; Megillath Taanith, §§ 17, 20, 23). Meanwhile A. had been baffled in an attempt to plunder in Elymais (1 Mac 6¹) the temple of Nanaia ('the desire of women,' Dn 11³², identified with Artemis, Polyb. xxxi. 11; with Aphrodite, App. Syr. 60; or more probably with Adonis or Tammuz). He retired to Babylon, and thence to Tabæ in Persia, where he became mad and died (B.C. 164).

LITERATURE.—Liv. xli.-xlv.; Polyb. xxvi.-xxx.; App. Syr. 45, 66; Justin, xxiv. 3, are the principal classical authorities. Dn 11²¹⁻⁴⁵ is generally interpreted of A. iv. (Jerome, ad Dan. c. 11), and he is supposed to have been in the thought of the writer of Rev 13⁵. The Megillath Antiochus is legendary, post-Talmudic in date, and of little worth as history. Dérenbourg, Hist. 59-63, extracts from Megillath Taanith, which, with 1 and 2 Mac and Jos. Ant. XII. v., is the only Jewish source of value.

ANTIOCHUS V. (Ἐπὶφάνης, 'born of a noble father') succeeded his father, A. Epiphanes, in

B.C. 164, at the age of 9 (App. Syr. 46, 66) or of 11 (Euseb. Chron. Arm. i. 348) years. Epiph. had appointed his foster-brother (2 Mac 9²⁹) Philip as his son's guardian (1 Mac 6^{15, 63}; Jos. Ant. XII. ix. 2); but Lysias, the governor of the provinces from the Euphrates to Egypt, assumed that function (1 Mac 3²²). In B.C. 163 Lysias and A. led an expedition to the relief of Jerus., which was being besieged by Judas Maccab. (1 Mac 6¹⁸⁻³⁰; Jos. Ant. XII. ix. 3). The armies met at Bethzacharias, some 9 miles to the N. of Bethsura (Bethzur), where Judas was defeated (Jos. Ant. XII. ix. 4; Wars, I. i. 5; 1 Mac 6⁴⁷). [2 Mac 13^{16, 17}, on the other hand, represents Judas as victorious, but is clearly unhistorical.] A. took Bethsura, and proceeded to lay siege to Jerus. Within the city scarcity of food was soon felt, as the year was a Sabbatical one (1 Mac 6³³); and news that Philip was approaching Antioch was received by the besiegers. Peace was made on the condition that the Jews should be left undisturbed in their national customs (1 Mac 6⁵⁹, 2 Mac 13²³); but A. violated this condition by destroying the city fortifications and imprisoning the high priest (1 Mac 6⁶²; Jos. Ant. XII. ix. 7). Philip was conquered with ease at Antioch; but in B.C. 162 A. himself was betrayed into the hands of his cousin, Demetrius Soter, and put to death (1 Mac 7⁴, 2 Mac 14²; Jos. Ant. XII. x. 1; App. Syr. 47; Polyb. xxxi. 19; Liv. Epit. 46).

ANTIOCHUS VI. (surnamed Ἐπιφανὴς Διδόντος on coins, but θεός in Jos. Ant. XIII. vii. 1) was a son of Alexander Balas (App. Syr. 68) and Cleopatra. In B.C. 145, while still a child, he was brought from Arabia, where he had remained with his father's captor, and set up by Diodotus (Tryphon, wh. see) as a claimant to the throne of Syria, then held by Demetrius Nikator. Tryphon secured the support of the Syrian generals, and of Jonathan (wh. see), who was appointed to the civil and ecclesiastical, Simon to the military, headship of Pal.; and A. was acknowledged as king by the greater part of Syria. The success of Jonathan in subduing the whole country from Tyre and Damascus to Egypt aroused the jealousy or the fear of Tryphon, who, by stratagem, imprisoned and afterwards put him to death (B.C. 143). The next year (or possibly later; see Jos. Ant. XIII. vii. 1; 1 Mac 13³¹; App. Syr. 67, 68; Justin, xxxvi. 1; but the evidence of coins is in favour of the earlier date) Tryphon procured the assassination of A. by surgeons (Liv. Epit. 55), and assumed the crown of S. Syria in his stead.

ANTIOCHUS VII. (surnamed Σιδῆρης, from the place of his education, Side in Pamphylia, Euseb. Chron. Arm. i. 349; also εὐσεβῆς in Jos. Ant. XIII. viii. 2; and εὐσεβῆρης on coins) was the second son of Demetrius Soter. In B.C. 138 he expelled Tryphon, and without further opposition obtained the throne of Syria. At first he confirmed to Simon immunities granted by former kings, and added the right of coining money (1 Mac 15²⁻⁹); but afterwards demanded the surrender of the principal fortresses (1 Mac 15²⁸⁻³¹). Simon refused to give them up, and defeated the king's officer Cendebæus (1 Mac 16¹⁻¹⁰; Jos. Ant. XIII. vii. 3). In B.C. 135 A. in person led an army into Judæa, and besieged Jerus. The siege lasted for many months, in the course of which A. sent sacrifices into the city at the Feast of Tabernacles (Jos. Ant. XIII. viii. 2), but allowed no provisions to pass his lines. Peace was at length made on terms which restored the Syrian supremacy (Jos. Ant. XIII. viii. 3), without unduly provoking the intervention of Rome (ib. XIII. ix. 2). In B.C. 129 Hyrcanus (wh. see) accompanied A. in an expedition against the Parthians, but the next year the king fell in battle with Arsaces VII.

ANTIPAS (Antipater).—See under HEROD.

ANTIPAS (Ἀντίπας).—Only mentioned in Rev 2¹³, in the Epistle to the Church of Pergamum, in the following terms: 'I know where thou dwellest, where the throne of Satan is; and thou holdest my name, and didst not deny my faith, even (or) and in the days of Antipas (nominative), my witness, (my) faithful one, who was slain among you, where Satan dwelleth.' Some authorities insert év als ('in which') after the word 'days'; and two versions take the word Antipas as a verb, ἀντίπας ('thou didst contradict'); but there is no probability that this is correct. WH think it not unlikely that Ἀντίπα in the gen. should be read.

Various allegorical interpretations of the name are current, one making A. the withstander of all, and identifying him with Timothy; another descending as low as Antipas=Antipapa. But the name must in all likelihood be that of a real man, and is probably a shortened form of Antipater.

Antipas does not occur in the lists of the 70 disciples (Pseud.-Dorotheus, Solomon of Basra), but Andreas and Arethas, the commentators on the Apocalypse, speak of having read the acts of his martyrdom. These are to be found in the Acta Sanctorum, April 11 (April, tom. ii. pp. 2, 4, and 967). They are rhetorical and late in their present form, and give no particulars of the saint's life. They represent him as being cast into a heated brazen bull in the temple of Artemis, by order of a nameless governor during Domitian's persecution. He was apparently Bishop of Pergamum. According to one form of his Acts (quoted by the Bollandists from a Synaxarion), he prayed that those suffering from toothache might be relieved at his tomb. The bull in which he suffered was shown at Constantinople (Cedrenus, 586, ed. Par.). In the Ethiopic calendar his day is the 16th of Miyazia.

ANTIPATER (Ἀντίπατρος).—A., son of Jason, was one of two ambassadors sent by Jonathan to the Romans and to the Spartans to renew 'the friendship and the confederacy' (1 Mac 12¹⁶ 14²²).

J. A. SELBIE.
ANTIPATRIS (Ἀντίπατρος), Ac 23³¹.—A city at the foot of the Judean hills, on the road from Jerusalem to Caesarea: founded by Herod the Great. The various notices of its position, in relation to places near, are fully explained by placing this city at the large ruined mound above the source of the Aujah River, north-east of Jaffa. This site is now called Rûs el 'Ain, 'the spring-head'; the Greek name having, as is usual in Palestine, been lost. The ruins include the shell of a large mediæval castle, which is probably that called Mirabel in the 12th cent. For a full discussion of this question, see SWP vol. ii. sheet xiii. Josephus has been wrongly supposed to place Antipatris at Caphar Saba, farther north (Ant. XIII. xv. 1, XVI. v. 2; Wars, I. xxi. 9).

ANUB (אַנּוּב).—A man of Judah (1 Ch 4⁸). See GENEALOGY.

ANVIL (אַנּוּב, a stroke, blow).—The word occurs with this meaning only in Is 41⁷. The anvil of the East is a boot-shaped piece of metal inserted in a section of oak or walnut log. Larger or smaller, it is used by tinsmiths, shoemakers, silversmiths, and blacksmiths. The description of the metal worker in Is 41^{6, 7} is one that might have been taken from the Arab workshop of the present day. As the Oriental artisan has only a few simple tools at his command, his work lacks the precision and uniformity attained in the West by elaborate machinery. Hence vivacious comment during the process of manufacture, and a feeling of triumph at times when the article turns out according to sample. The act of welding on the anvil, to which the prophet alludes, is esp. a moment of noisy enthusiasm and mutual encouragement between the smith and his fellow-workman on the other side of the anvil. They then call out to each other to strike more rapidly and vigorously, before the metal cools, crying 'shidd! shidd!' the Arabic equivalent of Isaiah's 'hazak!' 'be of good courage!' Then the term applied to the soldering—'tob'! Arab. 'tayyib'! that is, 'good'!—is at once a call to cease from further hammering, and a declaration that the work is satisfactory.

G. M. MACKIE.

ANY.—1. Being probably composed of an one, and dim, ending y (old Eng. ig), 'any' means 'one at all,' 'one of whatever kind.' Of this orig. meaning good examples are Ps 4⁶ 'Who will show us any good?' 2 P 3⁸ 'not willing that any should perish.' 2. Any is not now used in the sing. without 'one,' 'more,' or the like, but we find Jer 23²⁴ 'Can any hide himself in secret places that I shall not see him?' Ezk 7¹³ 'neither shall any strengthen himself'; so Zec 13³, Jn 2²⁵ etc. 3. Any thing as an adverb='at all,' 'in any respect,' is found 2 Ch 9²⁰ 'it (silver) was not any thing (RV 'was nothing') accounted of'; Gal 5⁶ 'neither circumcision availeth any thing' (RV 'anything'); Nu 17¹³ 'Whosoever cometh any thing near unto the tabernacle of the Lord shall die' (RV 'Every one that cometh near, that cometh near unto the tab. of the Lord, dieth'); and even (Ac 25⁸) 'neither . . . have I offended any thing at all' (RV 'have I sinned at all'). 4. Any ways—in any respect, mod. 'anywise,' occurs Lv 20⁴ 'if the people of the land do any ways hide their eyes from the man'; Nu 30¹⁵ 'if he shall any ways make them void' (RV 'if he shall make them null and void'); 2 Ch 32¹³. Cf. Pr. Bk. 'All those who are any ways afflicted.'

J. HASTINGS.

APACE.—'Apace' meant first of all 'at a foot pace,' i.e. slowly. But before 1611 it had acquired the opp. meaning, 'at a quick pace,' and in that sense only is it used in AV. It occurs 2 S 18²⁵ 'And he came a.' (עָרַץ עָרַץ); Ps 68¹² 'Kings of armies did flee a.' (יָרָחוּ יָרָחוּ); RV 'flee, they flee'; Jer 46⁵ 'their mighty ones . . . are fled a.' Also in Ps 58⁶, Pr. Bk. (and RV, v. 7) 'like water that runneth a.'; and Sir 43¹³ 'He maketh the snow to fall a.' (κατέπευσε χιόνα). Cf. Ps in Metre 92⁷—

'When those that lewd and wicked are spring quickly up like grass, And workers of iniquity do flourish all apace.'

'Gallop apace, you fiery-footed steeds.
Shaks. Rom. and Jul. iii. 2. 1.

'Small weeds have grace, great weeds do grow apace.'
Rich. III. ii. 4. 13.
J. HASTINGS.

APAME (Ἀπάμη).—Daughter of Bartacus, and concubine of Darius I. (1 Es 4²⁰).

APES (אָפִים, kôphîm, πίθηκοι, simiae).—Animals of the simian type, imported by the merchant navy of Solomon (1 K 10²², 2 Ch 9²¹). There is no reason to believe that any one kind, or even family, of apes is intended. Many kinds were known to the ancients, and the ships of Asia and Africa constantly brought them, as they do now, various species of apes and monkeys. Aristotle divides the simians into three groups—the κῆβοι, the πίθηκοι, and the κυροκέφαλοι. But it is clear that the translators of the LXX did not understand κῆβοι to be the equivalent of kôphîm, for they have translated the latter πίθηκοι. As a naturalist, Solomon would no doubt have wished specimens of as many kinds as possible of so curious an animal as the ape, and, regis ad exemplar, it would have been fashionable among his courtiers to possess these grotesque mimics of humanity. Hence the steady market for apes as well as peacocks and ivory.

G. E. POST.

APELLES (Ἀπελλῆς).—The name of a Christian greeted by St. Paul in Ro 16¹⁰, and described as the 'approved in Christ.' It was the name borne by a distinguished tragic actor, and by members of the household. Most commentators quote also Hor. Sat. i. 5. 100, Credat Iudæus Appella, non ego. See Lightfoot, Philippians, p. 172; Sanday and Headlam, Romans, p. 425. For later traditions, which are valueless, see Acta Sanct., April, iii. 4.

APHÆREMA (Ἀφαιρεμα), 1 Mac 11³⁴.—A district taken from Samaria and added to Judæa by Demetrius Soter (Ant. XIII. iv. 9), probably that round the city Ephraim.
C. R. CONDER.

APHARSACHITES.—See next article.

APHARSATHCHITES (אֶפְרַתִּים Ezr 4⁹, probably the same as the Apharsachites, * אֶפְרַתִּים Ezr 5⁶ 6⁹).—A colony of the Assyrians in Samaria; an eastern people subject to the Assyrians. Ewald (H.I. iv. 1878, p. 216) identifies them with the Παρθρακηνοί (Herod. i. 101), a tribe of the Medes, dwelling on the borderland between Media and Persia.
J. MACPHERSON.

APHARSITES (אֶפְרַתִּים Ezr 4⁹).—One of the nations transported to Samaria by the Assyrians. Otherwise unknown. By many (e.g. Ewald, H.I. iv. 216) supposed to be Persians; אֶפְרַתִּים with the prosthetic א in the Heb. form. Others have conjecturally identified them with the Parrhasians of E. Media.
J. MACPHERSON.

APHEK (אֶפֶק 'a fortress').—This was the name of at least four places in Palestine.

1. A city whose king was slain by Joshua (Jos 12¹⁸), where we should read with the LXX, 'the king of Apek in Sharon.' This is probably the city mentioned in 1 S 4¹. The Israelites were at Ebenezer, between Mizpeh and Shen. With common consent Mizpeh is located at Nebv Samuil, but Shen is unknown, so Ebenezer and Apek still await identification. Kakom, in the plain of Sharon, a strong position commanding the main entrance to Samaria, would suit admirably, but no echo of the ancient name has been heard in the district.

2. A city in the territory of Asher (Jos 13⁴ 19³⁰) from which the Canaanites were never expelled (Jg 1³¹—where it is written אֶפֶק). Apparently in the vicinity of Achzib, its position is uncertain. A possible identification is 'Afka on the Adonis, Nahr Ibrahim, but this seems to be too far north.

3. A spot, generally supposed to be in the plain of Esdraelon, whence the Philistines advanced to the battle of Gilboa (1 S 29¹). Wellhausen and W. R. Smith give reasons for thinking this identical with 1; and G. A. Smith now agrees (PEFSt, 1895, 252). If the identity is established, the Philistines assembled in Sharon, and approached Jezreel by way of Dothan. If, however, they moved from Shunem to Apek, against Saul, the place must be sought in some 'fortress' westward of Jezreel; the fountain near which Israel was encamped being most likely Ain Jalûd, at the N. base of Gilboa. Fukû'a, on the mountain itself, is hardly possible.

4. The scene of Benhadad's disastrous defeat (1 K 20²⁶, 30). This place was in the mishôr, מִישׁוֹר, the table-land east of the Jordan, and is probably identical with Fil, on the lip of the valley eastward

* Koster thinks that Apharsachites of Ezr 5⁶ 6⁹ is an official title which the author of 4⁹ has mistaken for the name of a tribe or country (Herstel v. Isr. 66 f.).

of Kal'at el-Hushn, overlooking the Sea of Galilee. Fik is just the Heb. word without the initial aleph; but occasionally one hears the natives call it 'Afik, when the ancient name appears entire. From the edge of the valley eastward stretches the plain, mishôr, of Jaulân, where the great battle was fought. Here the Syrians again suffered defeat at the hands of Joash (2 K 13¹⁷⁻²⁵).

APHEKAH (אֶפְקָא).—A city not yet clearly identified. It may have been in the mountains of Judah (Jos 15⁶³), but is probably the same place as Aphek I. W. EWING.

APHERRA (Ἀφερρά), 1 Es 5³⁴.—His descendants were among the 'sons of Solomon's servants' who returned with Zerubbabel. This name, with the five preceding and two succeeding names, has no equivalent in the parallel lists of Ezr and Neh.

H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

APHIAH (אֶפְיָא).—One of Saul's ancestors (1 S 9¹).

APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE.—No attempt to study Christianity in its origins can dispense with a knowledge of this literature. If we wish to reconstruct the world of ideas and aspirations which filled the heart of an earnest Jew at the beginning of the Christian era, it is to this literature that we must have recourse for materials. Although in its higher aspects Christianity infinitely transcends the Judaism that preceded it, yet in others it is a genuine historical development from such Judaism. Christianity came forth from the bosom of Pharisaic Judaism, and in Apocalyptic literature this form of Judaism found its essential utterance. The value, therefore, of such literature is obvious. From such writings, further, we see how the great Pharisaic movement arose; how it in its turn had been a transformation and a development of movements already at work in the prophetic period. Thus Jewish Apocalypses not only supply a history of religious beliefs in the two pre-Christian centuries, but they also fill up the otherwise unavoidable gap in the history of Jewish thought, and constitute the living link between the prophetic teachings and ideals of the OT and their fulfilment in Christianity.

Apocalyptic took the place of Prophecy. The Psalmist exclaims with grief: 'We see not our signs: there is no more any prophet: neither is there among us any that knoweth how long' (Ps 74⁹).

But the immediate successor of Prophecy was not Apocalyptic, but Scribism. The task of the scribes was to study the law and apply it to the altered circumstances of the time. As a result of their study and teaching, Israel was firmly established in its adhesion to the law. But Scribism could not satisfy the aspirations of the nation. In one aspect we might describe it as an unproductive age of criticism following a productive age of prophetic genius. Its chief task was to study, discriminate, and systematise the products of past spiritual genius. For ever engaged in distinguishing and criticising, it acquired the habits of caution and fear as it lost those of courage and love. Its maxims were mainly negative. Its highest service was, not to inspire and lead into new paths of duty and goodness, but to confine every enthusiasm and new spiritual force within the narrow limits of a traditional routine, and to close every avenue of danger with a flaming sword and the unvarying prohibition: 'Thou shalt not.'

But Scribism had another side. In times of oppression especially, its efforts were directed to finding an answer for hearts that were asking in their anguish when God would visit and redeem His people. By ignoring the fact that the prophetic accounts of an ideal future for Israel could not be literally fulfilled after the fall of the ancient State, they easily found materials in the mass of unfulfilled prophecy on which to build their hopes anew. By symbolising what was literal and literalising what was figurative, by various rearrangements and readjustments of the resulting products, they were able to depict the future in a certain chronological sequence, and arrive at this desired consummation. By such means Scribism in some measure kept alive the hopes of the nation.

It was to this side of Scribism that Apocalyptic was naturally related, although at the same time it was to a certain extent a revolt against the other and chief pursuit of Scribism. The higher ideals and larger outlook of Apocalyptic failed in due course to find room within the narrow limits of Scribism; and whereas the anxious scrupulosities of the latter were incompatible with anything but the feeblest inspiration and vigour, the former attested beyond doubt the reappearance of spiritual genius in the field of thought and action.

Our conception of Apocalyptic will become clearer by observing wherein it agrees with, and wherein it differs from, OT prophecy.

1. Prophecy and Apocalyptic agree in this—(1) That they both claim to be a communication through the Divine Spirit of the character and will and purposes of God, and of the laws and nature of His kingdom. This, it is needless to add, man could not attain to by himself.

(2) But Prophecy and Apocalyptic were related, not only in their primary postulate, but, at least in the case of the later prophets, in similarity of materials and method. Thus the eschatological element which later attained its full growth in the writings of Daniel, Enoch, Noah, etc., had already strongly asserted itself in the later prophets, such as Is 24-27, Joel, Zec 12-14. Not only the beginnings, therefore, but a well-defined type of this literature had already established itself in OT prophecy.

2. But Prophecy and Apocalyptic differ in the following respects:—

(1) Prophecy still believes that this world is God's world, and that in this world His goodness and truth will yet be justified. Hence the prophet addresses himself chiefly to the present and its concerns, and when he addresses himself to the future his prophecy springs naturally from the present, and the future which he depicts is regarded as in organic connexion with it. The Apocalyptic writer, on the other hand, almost wholly despairs of the present; his main interests are supra-mundane. He cherishes no hope of arousing his contemporaries to faith and duty by direct and personal appeals; for though God spoke in the past, 'there is no more any prophet.' This pessimism and want of faith in the present, alike in the leaders and the led, limited and defined the form in which the religious ardour of the former should manifest itself. They prescribed, in fact, as a necessity of the age and as a condition of successful effort, the adoption of pseudonymous authorship. And thus it is that the Apocalyptic writer approaches his countrymen with a work which claims to be the production of some great

Thus far two characteristics of Apocalyptic have emerged—the transference of interest from the present to the future, from the mundane to the supra-mundane, and the adoption of pseudonymous authorship.

(2) Another feature of Apocalyptic as distinguished from Prophecy was imposed upon it by the necessities of the time, i.e. its indefinitely wider view of the world's history. Thus, whereas ancient Prophecy had to deal with temporary reverses at the hands of some heathen power, Apocalyptic arose at a time when Israel had been subject for centuries to the sway of one or another of the great world-powers. Hence, in order to harmonise such difficulties with God's righteousness, it had to take account of the role of such empires in the counsels of God; to recount the sway and downfall of each in turn, till, finally, the lordship of the world passed into the hands of Israel, or the final judgment arrived. The chief part of these events belonged, it is true, to the past; but the Apocalyptic writer represented them as still in the future, arranged under certain artificial categories of time, and as definitely determined from the beginning in the counsels of God, and revealed by Him to His servants the prophets. Determinism thus became a leading characteristic of Jewish Apocalyptic; and accordingly its conception of history, as distinguished from that of Prophecy, was mechanical rather than organic.

(3) Again, Prophecy and Apocalyptic differ in the harsher treatment dealt out to the heathen in the final judgments. Israel's repeated oppressions have at last affected the judgment and insight of its writers. The iron has entered into their soul. No virtue or goodness can belong to their heathen oppressors, and nothing but eternal destruction can await the enemies of Israel in the time to come. The ruthless cruelty they had experienced, inspired them with a like ruthlessness towards the faithless nation and the faithless individual; and expressions descriptive of the future lot of such, which in prophetic writings had been limited in their scope to the present life, or were merely poetical exaggerations, were accepted by Apocalyptic writers as true of the future, and often intensified because insufficient to satisfy their merciless hatred. Thus it was in this period that the doctrine of the future and eternal damnation of the wicked was definitely formulated, and came to possess an unquestioned authority. It is true that in later times, as we discover from the Talmud, the severity of this dogma was considerably moderated, but only in favour of Israelites. No single mitigation of the awful horrors foretold as awaiting the wicked was extended to the hapless Gentile.

The foregoing will make the object of Apocalyptic easy of comprehension. This object, in short, was to solve the difficulties connected with a belief in God's righteousness, and the suffering condition of His servants on earth. The righteousness of God postulated the temporal prosperity of the righteous, and this postulate was accepted and enforced by the law. But the expectations of material wellbeing which had thus been authenticated and fostered, had in the centuries immediately preceding been falsified, and thus a grave contradiction had emerged between the old prophetic ideals and the actual experience of the nation, between the promises of God and the bondage and persecution they had daily to endure at the hands of their pagan oppressors. The difficulties thus arising from this conflict between promise and experience may be shortly resolved into two, which concern respectively the position of the righteous as a community and the position of the righteous man as an individual. The OT prophets had concerned themselves chiefly with the former, and pointed in the main to the restoration or 'resurrection' of Israel as a nation, and to Israel's ultimate possession of the earth as a reward of her righteousness. But, later, with the growing claims of the individual, and the acknowledgment of these in the religious and intellectual life, the latter problem pressed itself irresistibly on the notice of religious thinkers, and made it impossible for any conception of the divine rule and righteousness to gain acceptance which did not render adequate satisfaction to the claims of the righteous individual. Thus, in order to justify the righteousness of God, there was postulated the resurrection, not only of the righteous nation, but also of the righteous individual. Apocalyptic, therefore, strove to show that, alike in respect of the nation and of the individual, the righteousness of God would be fully vindicated; and, in order to justify its contention, it sketched in outline the history of the world and of mankind, the origin of evil and its course, and the consummation of all things. Thus, in fact, it presented a Semitic philosophy of religion. The righteous as a nation should yet possess the earth either in an eternal or in a temporary Messianic kingdom, and the destiny of the righteous individual should be finally determined according to his works. For though amid the world's disorders he might perish untimely, he would not fail to attain through the resurrection the recompense that was his due, in the Messianic kingdom, or in heaven itself. The conceptions as to the risen life, its duration and character, vary with each writer.

The chief Apocalyptic writings which will be treated of in this Dictionary are—

1. Apocalypse of Baruch, a composite work written 50-90 A.D. in Palestine, if not in Jerus., by four Pharisees. Preserved only in Syriac.

2. Ethiopic Book of Enoch, written originally in Heb. by at least five Hasid authors, 200-64 B.C., in Palestine. Preserved in Ethiopic and partly in Greek and Latin.

3. Slavonic Book of Enoch, or The Book of the Secrets of Enoch, written by an Alexandrian Jew about the beginning of the Christian era. Preserved only in Slavonic.

4. Ascension of Isaiah, a composite work written, 1-100 A.D., by Jewish and Christian authors. Preserved in Ethiopic and partly in Latin.

5. Book of Jubilees, written originally in Hebrew by a Pal. Jew, probably 40-10 B.C. Preserved in Ethiopic, and partially in Hebrew, Syriac, Greek, and Latin.

6. Assumption of Moses, written in Palestine, probably in Heb. or Aram., 14-30 A.D., by a Pharisee. Preserved only in Latin.

7. Testaments of the XII. Patriarchs, a composite work written originally in Hebrew by two Jewish authors belonging to the legalistic and apocalyptic sides of Pharisaism, 130 B.C.-10 A.D., and interpolated by a succession of Christian writers down to the fourth century A.D. Preserved in the ancient Greek and Armenian versions.

8. Psalms of Solomon, written originally in Heb. by a Pharisee (or Pharisees), 70-40 B.C.

9. Sibylline Oracles, written in Greek hexameters by Jewish and Christian authors, 180 B.C.-350 A.D.

Both the collection, and the use of the word Apocrypha as its title, are distinctively Protestant, though having roots in the history of the OT Canon. The collection consists of the excess of the Lat. Vulg. over the Heb. OT; and this excess is due to the Gr. LXX, from which the old Lat. VS was made. The difference between the Prot. and the Rom. Cath. OT goes back, then, to a difference between Pal. and Alex. Jews. The matter is complicated, however, by the fact that the Vulg. was revised after the Heb. by Jerome, and that the extant MSS of the LXX differ much in contents and order. For clearness and for reference in the later discussion, the following tables are given. They represent the official Vulg. (ed. 1592); the two chief MSS of LXX; the Canon of Cyril, as a representative of the view of the E. Church; and the Hebrew. The books of our A. are printed in italics, other uncan. books, not in the A., in capitals.

these, 1 and 2 Es are not in Luther's Bible, and 2 Es is not in the LXX. On the other hand, 3 and 4 Mac are commonly present in the LXX, but are not found in the Vulg. and A. The same is true of Ps 151. Further, the many more or less significant variations of LXX from Heb. OT, in text and order, do not appear in this comparison, for, owing to Jerome, the Vulg. follows the Heb. in the can. books, the LXX only in the case of books not extant in Heb. The A., then, can be said only in a general way to represent the difference between the Heb. and the Gr. OT. The books of the A. are treated in this Dictionary individually under their titles. Under the heading Apocrypha two matters require consideration: the history of the use of the word 'Apocrypha' in reference to books; and the history and significance of the collection now so called.* With these the present article will deal in the following order:—

- i. The word Apocrypha.
 1. The Hidden Books of Judaism.
 2. The words genuzim and hizonim.
 3. The Hidden Books of Christianity, and the word Apocrypha.

i. THE WORD 'APOCRYPHA.'—The word ἀπόκρυφος, meaning 'hidden,' was no doubt at first applied to books in quite a literal sense, as the designation, whether by those who hid them or by those from whom they were hidden, of books kept from the public. The hiding of a book was easy when copies were few. It might be done upon two opposite grounds. An exclusive sect might hide its sacred books in order to keep from outsiders the secret laws or wisdom which they contained; or the religious authorities of a community might hide books judged by them to be useless or harmful. The two grounds might indeed approach each other in the case of books judged unfit for public use, not because of the error, but because of the depth and difficulty of their contents. Indeed, a book judged wholly erroneous and harmful we should expect the authorities to destroy rather than to hide. A certain value, or at least a certain doubt, should naturally be attached to books hidden in this sense, while their peculiar value is the reason for their being hidden in the former—which is, in all probability, the more original sense of the Greek word.

From the place of secret books in Judaism and in Christianity we may therefore hope to gain a knowledge of the original sense and use of the word; and we shall find its first and proper application to be, not to the books of our A., but to the (chiefly apocryphal) literature commonly designated Pseudepigrapha.

1. THE HIDDEN BOOKS OF JUDAISM.—Esoteric doctrines and books do not belong properly to the Isr. religion. Their home is in heathenism, from which, however, they gained a foothold from time to time in Judaism. The occult lore connected with sorcery and magic lurked beneath the surface of old Israel's religious life, but was condemned by law and prophets (Dt 18^{10c}, Lv 19²¹, Is 8¹⁹ 19³ etc.). No priestly religion, indeed, can be without a partly esoteric priestly tradition respecting rites, their form, and perhaps their meaning. But it was a characteristic of Judaism that it was based upon a priestly law made public and openly adopted by the people (Neh 8-10). Yet Judaism did not escape from the charm which mystery exerts over the human mind. It was esp. in the after-developments of OT wisdom literature under Hellenic influence, on the one side, and of OT prophetic literature, under Pers. and Bab. influence, on the other, that the idea of the superior religious value of hidden things, mysteriously disclosed to the favoured few, took possession of the Jewish mind. Even Jesus, son of Sirach, the Palestinian, finds it the chief task of the wise man to discover the 'apocrypha,' the hidden things, of wisdom and of God (14²⁹ 39⁵⁻⁷), and thinks that the hidden things of the world are greater than the manifest (43³²). 'Apocrypha' was for him a word of honour (yet see 3²¹⁻²⁵ and 24²⁸⁻³⁴). But it was esp. in Hel. circles that the love of hidden things was cultivated. Philo presents the results of his deepest study and reflexion, and of his highest insight, in the form of an exposition of the Pent., making of this a hidden book, which only the initiated could understand.

There was, however, another way in which the love of hidden things and reverence for antiquity could be adjusted. Instead of hidden meanings in openly published books, it was possible to think of private teachings, by the side of the public, committed by patriarch or prophet to the few, and handed on to the present in a secret tradition, or a hidden book. This was the procedure of those Pal. Jews who were interested in the secrets of the future, and in prophecy. The beginnings of the production of hidden books along this line can be easily traced. If a prophet committed the record of openly spoken predictions to the keeping of his disciples, to await the time of their fulfilment (Is 8¹⁶), it would not be strange if he should give them fuller knowledge for which the public was not prepared. The Bk of Dan. is represented as having been 'shut up and sealed' by its author, until, long after its writing, the time came for its publication (Dn 12⁴⁻⁹). This may well be called 'the fundamental passage for the conception of apocrypha.'* Daniel appears as the publication of a book hitherto hidden. The justification of the claim lies in the revelation of the mysteries of Israel's future which it contains, and in the mysterious manner in which the revelation is made in visions, through angels. It is indeed, in part, an interpretation of the hidden sense of Jer 25¹¹ 29¹⁰ (Dn 9), but the interpretation is given by an angel. The way was prepared for Daniel by the later prophets, in whom the vision of hidden things plays an increasingly important part. Ezekiel's vision (ch. 1) became the favourite and fruitful study of Jews who loved mysteries. Zec contains similar material. But the chief development of apocryphal literature followed Daniel. Great numbers of books were put forth during the cent. before and the cent. after Christ, in the name of patriarchs or prophets, as books that had been hidden. They contain esp. disclosures of the mysteries of the spirit world, of the future of Israel, and of the abode and fortunes of the dead. In one of these books the tradition is related that Ezra was inspired to dictate to his scribes the sacred books that had been burned at the destruction of Jerus. 'In forty days they wrote ninety-four books. And when the forty days were ended, the Most High spoke, saying: The earlier books that thou hast written, publish openly, and let the worthy and the unworthy read them; but the last seventy thou shalt keep, that thou mayest deliver them to the wise of thy people; for in them is the spring of understanding and the fountain of wisdom and the stream of knowledge' (2 Es 14⁴⁴⁻⁴⁷). In the 70 esoteric books, valued more highly by the writer than the 24 books of open scripture, we have the original conception of apocrypha. The character of these books may be accurately known from those that have survived, e.g. Enoch, Assumption of Moses (in part), the Apoc. of Baruch, and 2 Es† itself. Their material is largely foreign to Isr. traditions, and was commonly felt to be so. Yet traditional it must, in the nature of the case, have been, and only in a very limited degree the free invention of the writers. That its source is, in an important measure, to be found in the Bab. and Pers. religions, is highly probable.

If we ask in what circles of Judaism these books, or the writings or traditions that lie behind them, were current, various lines of evidence point toward the obscure sect of the Essenes. They possessed a secret lore and hidden books, and took oath to disclose none of their doctrines to others, and 'to preserve equally both the books of their sect and the names of the angels' (Jos. BJ II. viii. 7). In regard to the contents of their secret books we are not left wholly in the dark. Jos. says that the Essenes derived from the study of 'the writings of the ancients' (can.?) a knowledge of the healing properties of plants and stones (§ 6), and that by reading 'the holy books' they were able to foretell future things (§ 12). He also ascribes to them an elaborate doctrine of the pre-existence of souls, and of the lot of good and bad souls after death (§ 11). When, therefore, we find in books like Enoch, the Assumptio Mosis, and 4 Ezr, disclosures of the secrets of nature and of history, lists of angels, descriptions of heaven and hell, and of the experiences of the soul after death, beside other Essenic marks, such as the praise of asceticism and the unfavourable estimate of the second temple, the opinion seems not unfounded that 'their secret literature was perhaps in no small degree made use of in the Pseudepigrapha, and has through them been indirectly handed down to us' (Wellhausen). To attribute the apocryphal literature exclusively to Essenism, however, as Jewish scholars wish to do, is without historical justification. It is true that a relationship of Essenism with Zoroastrianism is probable (Lightfoot, Colossians; Cheyne, Expository Times, ii. 202-8, 248-53; Bampton Lect. pp. 417-21, 445-49); and Zoroastrianism treasured secret books, some of which certain Christian Gnostics claimed to possess. It is probable also that the foreign (heathen) character of these books was felt by many, since Judaism never gave these books official sanction; and no apocalypse after Dn was preserved in Hebrew. Nevertheless, the foreign elements here dominant reach far back into OT literature; and, on the other hand, Essenism was much more closely related to Pharisaism than to Zoroastrianism, being, in the first place, 'only Pharisaism in the superlative' (Schürer). If the Essenes are to be understood historically as simply more consistent protestants against the high-priesthood of the Maccabean princes than the Pharisees,—carrying their protest to the point of refusing all participation in the temple service,—then in the Hasidæans of 1 Mac 2³² 7^{12a}, we have the roots of both Pharisaism and Essenism, and the Book of Dn would stand near the beginning of each. The Messianic hope is the genuinely Jewish element in the apocalypses. That this had a far larger place in the mind of the Pharisee during the two centuries preceding the destruction of Jerus. than it had after that event,—and esp. after Akiba's death,—is evident to all but Jewish scholars, who are apt to judge of the whole post-exilic period by the Talmud. The apocryphal literature in question was, then, in all probability valued and cultivated by Pharisees, certainly by some circles of Pharisees, as well as by Essenes. Indeed, in spite of its rejection by rabbinical Judaism, germs of it survived, and afterwards came to new life, in the late Jewish Kabbala, or secret philosophy (12th cent.).

* Zahn, Gesch. d. NT Kanons, i. 135, cf. 124 f., who, however, does not put this observation to its natural use.

† Notice the different applications given to the titles, 1 and 2 Es, in LXX, Vulg. and Eng. A. Still other confusions appear in certain MSS. Misunderstanding would be avoided by calling 1 Es [= Vulg. 3 Es; LXX 1 Es] Greek Ezra, and 2 Es [= Vulg. 4 Es] the Apocalypse of Ezra (i.e. properly ch. 3-14), or 4 Ezr.

It is a striking fact that while official Judaism rejected these hidden books, and declared for the exclusive recognition of the 24 books of the Canon, it yet proceeded to claim for itself the possession of an oral law which Moses delivered to Joshua when he gave the Pent. openly to Israel, and which passed on through the hands of the elders, the prophets, the men of the Great Synagogue, to an unbroken succession of scribes (Pirke Aboth), until it came to writing in the Mishna, and then in the Talmud. By the theory of a secret tradition the scribes sought to give their law the authority of Moses, and yet account for its late appearance.

2. THE WORDS 'GENUZIM' AND 'HIZONIM.'—The designation of these hidden books in Heb. we do not know. A Heb. synonym for ἀπόκρυφοι is סתומים; but this word and the verb סתם are used in the Talm., not of the secret books just described, but usually of a hiding, by the authorities, of books judged unfit for public use. A possible exception is the reported 'hiding' by Hezekiah of a book of medical lore, in order that the sick might call rather upon God (Mishna Pesach iv. 9). But it was commonly used with reference to some book of the Canon. Thus a worn-out roll of a sacred scripture was 'hidden,' perhaps because, though unfitted for use in the synagogue, it was yet sacred and not to be destroyed (Mishna Sabb. ix. 6; Sanh. x. 6). But the word was commonly used in reference to the question whether some book should be withdrawn from the class of sacred Scriptures. Thus there were Rabbis who wished to 'hide' Pr, because of its contradictions; Ca, because of its secular character; Ec, because of its heresies. But the objections were in every instance met. The case of Est was more serious, and it is not improbable that it was put in the class of genuzim for a time among certain circles, though we have only the evidence of some Christian lists of the Canon, which claim (or seem) to follow the instructions of Jews (esp. Melito. See below).

If there existed at any time a class of books called genuzim, the Talmudic use of the word would lead us to expect that it would contain the books nearest to the Canon in authority or common esteem: books which once stood within the circle of sacred writings, or made a fair claim to stand there; in other words, books like the antilegomena of early Christian use. If there were such a class, Sir and 1 Mac, if not To and Jth, should stand in it; but the word is never applied to these books in extant writings. This is not, indeed, a proof that it was not so used; and the testimony of Origen suggests that it was. He says that the Jews had hidden Sus and other books from the people, while Jth and To, they had told him, they did not possess even among their hidden books, or apocrypha (Ep. ad Afric.).

For writings that stood wholly outside of the circle of sacred books, esp. for the books of heretics such as the Samaritans, the Sadducees, and Christians (ספרים חיצונים), the Rabbis had another name, hizonim (ספרים חיצונים), lit. 'external' or 'outside' books. The danger to Judaism of the reading of these books led Akiba, who had himself been attracted by them, to prohibit their use. 'Whoever reads in the sepharim hizonim has no part in the world to come. Books, on the other hand, like Sir and other such, which were composed after the age of the prophets had been closed, may be read just as one reads a letter.* Sir, then, and other such books, are not hizonim in Akiba's view, the correctness of which is evident from the free use of Sir by Rabbis in Pal. for a century and a half after Akiba, and in Babylon still later. But it appears that the maintenance of a middle class of books between sacred and profane involved dangers, and it was finally decided that 'he who reads a verse which is not out of the 24 books of sacred scripture, his offence is as if he had read in the sepharim hizonim' (Midr. r. Num. § 14, and at Koheleth 12¹², cf. Jer. Sabb. 16). It is possible that this practical transfer of books like Sir into the class of hizonim may have obscured the evidence of their having once been in the class of genuzim.

3. THE HIDDEN BOOKS OF CHRISTIANITY AND THE WORD 'APOCRYPHA.'—Christianity was at its beginning, even less than Judaism, a religion of mysteries, to be hidden by the few from the many. Christ's words in Lk 10²¹, Mt 11²⁵ ('hidden' from the wise, revealed to babes), were a direct contradiction of esoteric religion. If there are apocrypha, hidden things, they are to be made known (Mk 4²², Lk 8¹⁷, cf. Mt 13³⁵).

In Christ the hidden wisdom of God had become manifest, and the mysteries of the coming of His kingdom were disclosed by its realisation. Yet this faith gained a slow and hard victory. In two ways the love of mysteries and of the books that contained them was fostered.

* For this rendering by Graetz of a corrupt text (Sanh. x. 1, and the Bab. and Jer. Talm.), see Buhl, Canon and Text of OT, p. 8; and cf. Hamburger, Real-Encyc. ii. 68 ff. The Jer. Talm. gives Sirach as an illustration of the hizonim.

(a) The Christian religion made its start in the Jewish world in close connexion with the Messianic ideas as they had been developed, esp. in the apocalypses, from Dn onwards. Jewish Christians clung to the Jewish apocalyptic literature, modifying indeed its references to the person of the Messiah, making room for His earthly life and death, but feeling the less need of radical changes because the proper fulfilment of the Messianic hopes was connected, not with the first, but with the second coming of Christ. This led, naturally, less to the production of new Christian revelations than to the keeping and Christian editing of the old. Jewish patriarchs and prophets were in this way made to testify to the truth, and to forecast the future, of Christianity. Thus the Book of Enoch and the Apoc. of Ezra were used as authentic revelations by many Church Fathers. Jewish apocalypses of Abraham, Moses, Elijah, Is, Jer, Baruch, and others in great numbers, in part extant, but chiefly known to us only by name, were treasured by early Christianity.

Even when apocalypses in the names of Christian apostles were put forth, their material was of necessity largely traditional and Jewish in origin.

These books, then, Jewish and Christian, are the earliest apocrypha of Christianity (cf. the lists below). They are books usually put forth as having been hidden (the pseudepigraphic form), and always contain accounts of hidden things miraculously disclosed. In the latter sense even the Apoc. of St. John is called 'a¹' by Gregory of Nyssa (Or. de Ordin. ii. 44) and by Epiphanius (Hæc. 51). The cultivation of such 'hidden' books by no means belonged at first to heretical sects, but was characteristic of early Christianity in general. It was opposed chiefly by those who fell under Gr. influence; but among them another sort of mystery took the place of the Jewish apocalyptic, namely, the Gr. gnosis.

(b) As Jewish Christians made Christianity less the fulfilment than the reaffirmation of Jewish hopes, so Hel. Christians made it less the solution of the mystery of existence than a new, supreme mystery. Christ was made the central figure—in one case in Jewish eschatology, in the other in Greek cosmology.

St. Paul's language in 1 Co 1 and 2 discloses the existence in Corinth of those who valued a hidden wisdom more than his gospel of the crucified Christ. And later, at Colossæ, St. Paul urges, against an essentially Gnostic tendency, as the word of God, 'the mystery which hath been hidden from the ages and from the generations, but now hath been manifested to his saints' (1²⁶). The mystery of God is 'Christ, in whom are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge hidden' (ἀπρόκρυφτοι, 2³). The special Colossian gnosis, with its worship of angels, its asceticism, its visions, and its secret doctrines, reminds us of Essenism. The strongest influence on the development of a secret Christian gnosis came, however, from Alexandria: Gnosticism being indeed 'nothing but a Christian Hellenism' (Harnack).

As the Jewish Apocalypse furnished one way of connecting the new faith with the old, Hel. allegorical interpretation supplied another ready means of finding Christ and Christianity in the OT; thus making of it, as Philo did, a hidden book. But the allegorical method was capable of a further use. The Gr. Christian was less concerned to find Christianity in the OT than to find Gr. philosophy in Christianity. It was not an unnatural effort, after St. Paul, and in apparent connexion with him, to set the OT wholly aside, and to apply allegory to the person and history of Christ. Gnosticism, indeed, based and pushed its claims on the ground of apostolic authority, and, with its rejection of the OT, it was even the first to feel the need of new authoritative scriptures. But it established its position (1) by requiring an allegorical interpretation of the commonly received apostolic writings, making them books of hidden import; (2) by claiming to possess, besides the open apostolic writings, a secret apostolic tradition (Basilides and Valentinus claim to derive their secret gnosis from pupils of St. Paul; the Ophites, from a pupil of St. James, etc.); (3) by the production of great numbers of books, chiefly gospels and acts of the various apostles;* (4) by the claim (like that of Hel. Judaism) to immediate prophetic inspiration, so that prophets and apocalypses played in some Gnostic communities an important part, though few traces of Gnostic apocalypses remain.

Hel. Gnosticism stands as the extreme contrast to the Jewish apocalyptic tendency. It renounced the OT on which the Apocalypse rests, and rejected the coming of Christ, the resurrection, and the earthly kingdom, in which the Apoc. centres. Yet both make of Christianity a mystery, and claim for the books that unfold the mystery especial sanctity. From these two sources came multitudes of a¹ books into Christian use. They were called A. by those who valued them, for the word contained no necessary disparagement, but described the character of the books; and they were by no means condemned at the outset as heretical. The Book of Enoch is directly cited by Jude (vv. 14-15), who also uses the Assumption of Moses (v. 9). From such books may have come other citations and references which are not found in known books (see Origen's view below). The Book of Enoch was used as a genuine and sacred book by the Ep. Barnabas, Irenæus, Tertullian, and Clement of Alex. Tertullian says, indeed, that it was not received by some Christians. He, however, defends its reception (i.e. among the books of sacred Scripture) by appealing to Jude; and explains its absence from the Heb. scriptures by saying that the Jews rejected it, as they did other books, because it spoke of Christ,—an explanation not, indeed, wholly unhistorical.

Clement of Alex. uses Ass. Mos. and 4 Ezr, and also many other prophetic A. unknown to us. He was a warm defender of the value of secret traditions, and used not only Jewish, and even heathen, but Christian secret books. He believed in a secret tradition entrusted by Christ to His disciples, and valued it highly (Strom. i. 11. 13. 14; v. 60-4). Some of these traditions were preserved in secret books, among which he cites certain a¹ gospels and acts. Though he knows that heretics make a bad use of such books (Strom. iii. 29), yet his view of A. as a whole is extremely favourable. Origen is more discriminating. He finds a use for A. in NT interpretation. In 1 Co 2⁹, 2 Ti 3⁸, He 11³⁷, Mt 23^{35, 37} 27⁹ he finds references to a¹ books, and says that 'not all A. current in the name of holy men are to be received on account of the Jews, since they perhaps invented some for the destruction of our true Scriptures and the confirmation of false doctrines; but not all are to be rejected, since some pertain to the demonstration of our Scriptures' (Comment. on Mt 23³⁵). Origen seems, however, to have been influenced in his use of the word by the Jewish genuzim, for in his Epist. ad Afric. he speaks of Sus as made a¹ by Jewish authorities, though the Christian Church did not so regard it. Jth and To, he says, the Jews do not possess even among their A.

* See Lipsius in Smith and Wace, Dict. of Christian Biog., arts. 'Gospels' and 'Acts of Apostles.'

These books are not 'secret' in the proper sense, and can be called A. only in the sense of being withdrawn from publicity, and so from canonicity.

The defence of A. proper became more and more a mark of heresy. Even Origen in Prol. in Cant. argues for their exclusion, because of the corrupt traditions, contrary to true faith, which they contain. They were long current in Gr., but found no permanent place in the LXX, though the Oriental VSS received some of them, and one became current in Lat., though Vulg. did not give it recognition (4 Ezr).

Philaster of Brescia (on Heresies, c. 383-391 A.D.) condemns the 'heresy which accepts only A., i.e. secrets of prophets and apostles, not can. scriptures'; but he would allow A. to be read 'for the sake of manners by the perfect,' not in the church, and not by all.

Priscillianus (tract iii.) argues, from the generally accepted account of the restoration of the can. books by Ezra in 4 Ezr 14, for the value of the 70 secret books also, including 4 Ezr itself. Epiphanius also justifies by the same reference the use of various a¹ books, which he thinks were translated by the Seventy in addition to the canonical.

The conviction, however, gradually prevailed that the cultivation of secret books was dangerous, both because of the errors they contained and because of the sectarianism they fostered. There could be no Catholic Church so long as sects could claim to possess either new revelations or a secret apostolic tradition.

Secret doctrines and books were cut off by the two principles, that valid inspiration was limited to the apostolic age, and that only the books generally received in the churches were genuinely apostolic. No doubt a sense of the unchristian character of the books in question worked, together with the growing conviction that their possession was unchristian, to bring about their condemnation. The gradually prevailing Catholic principle (quod ubique, quod semper, quod ab omnibus) would give to the very word apocryphus the meanings: false, spurious, heretical.

The principle that only what the churches generally receive is apostolic is found in the Muratorian Fragment (2nd cent.). Irenaeus stands early in the line of this growing Catholicism. He opposes the theory, which Clem. Alex. defends, of the existence and value of secret traditions (ii. 27. 2, iii. 2, 1, 3, 1, 14, 2, 15, 1), and condemns the 'countless multitude of a¹ and spurious writings' which the Marcosians, appealing to Dn 12³, claim to possess, but which they really fabricate for themselves. Hegeesippus also speaks of 'the so-called A.' (i.e. so called by the heretics themselves), and says that 'some of them were written in his own time by certain heretics' (Eus. HE iv. 22. 8). Tertullian charges the heretics with adding to Scripture 'secrets of A., blasphemous fables' (Resur. Carnis 63); and writes a vigorous polemic against the Gnostic claim to possess a secret tradition (praescr. 22-27). He applies the word apocryphus to an apoc. which he regards as spurious (Shepherd), but not to Enoch, which he (as well as Irenaeus) regards as genuine (de pudic. 10, de anima, 2). Cyril of Jerus., in his Catechetics (iv. 33-6, ab. 348 A.D.), uses the word of all Jewish books except the 22 which are openly read in the churches. Cyril's insistence that the A., i.e. the books not read in the churches, are not to be read even in private, is evidently aimed against the distinction of three classes of books—those read in church, those read privately, and those wholly rejected. This distinction is as old as the Muratorian Fragment, which puts the Shepherd in such a middle class. It is implied by Origen, in his discrimination among A. It is definitely formulated by Athanasius, who, in his 39th Easter Letter (367 A.D.), gives the name A. only to the third class of books written by heretics as pleased their fancy, and put forth as old, to lead astray the simple. Athanasius gives no list of these A., but later lists teach us the current understanding of the word.

The Chronography of Nicephorus (patriarch of Constantinople 806-815), in a revised form which originated in Jerus. about 850, contains a stichometric list of Biblical books which has inner marks of a much earlier date (Zahn, 'perhaps before 500'). It contains (1) the can. books of OT and of NT; (2) the antilegomena of OT and of NT; (3) A. of OT and of NT. Under the last heading the following list is given:—Apocrypha of OT: (1) Enoch, (2) Patriarchs, (3) Prayer of Joseph, (4) Testament of Moses, (5) Assumption of Moses, (6) Abram, (7) Eldad and Modad, (8) Elijah, the prophet, (9) Zephaniah, the prophet, (10) Zachariah, father of John, (11) Pseudepigrapha of Baruch, Habakkuk, Ezekiel, and Daniel. Apocrypha of NT: (1) Itinerary of Paul, (2) Itin. of Peter, (3) Itin. of John, (4) Itin. of Thomas, (5) Gospel according to Thomas, (6) Teaching of the Apostles, (7, 8) Clement's [two Epistles], (9) [Epistles] of Ignatius of Polycarp, and of Hermas.

Of the A. of OT, Nos. 1, 2, 4, 5, are, in whole or in part, extant; Nos. 3, 7, 8, 9 are cited as genuine 'by Origen or some still older Church Father.' They are all Jewish apocalypses, i.e. A. in the earliest sense, but the word now carries an adverse judgment. This list is repeated in the so-called Synopsis of Athanasius. Similar, but in some degree independent, is the summary of A. in the anonymous 'List of sixty' can. books, which may represent the views of the Eastern Church in the 7th cent. After the can. books follows the intermediate class of 'those outside of the sixty'; and then 'apocrypha' as follows:—(1) Adam, (2) Enoch, (3) Lamech, (4) Patriarchs, (5) Prayer of Joseph (6) Eldad and Modad, (7) Testament of Moses, (8) Assumption of Moses, (9) Psalms of Solomon, (10) Apoc. of Elijah, (11) Vision of Isaiah, (12) Apoc. of Zeph- aniah, (13) Apoc. of Zachariah, (14) Apoc. of Ezra, (15) History of James, (16) Apoc. of Peter, (17) Itinerary and Teachings of the Apostles, (18) Epistle of Barnabas, (19) Acts of Paul, (20) Apoc. of Paul, (21) Didascalia of Clement, (22) Didascalia of Ignatius, (23) Didascalia of Polycarp, (24) Gospel acc. to Barnabas, (25) Gospel acc. to Matthew.

With reference to these lists, it is to be noticed that they contain in general just those books, Jewish and Christian, which were put forth in the first place as A. in the proper sense. Not the application but the interpretation of the word is changed, in accordance with a changed estimate of the books. Once valued by some as even super-can., they are now set apart not only from the Canon, but from the class of books that are good for private reading. Nevertheless, they still stand in a recognised class by themselves under the old title Apocrypha, and are distinct not only from secular or heathen books, but from later heretical literature. The great part they played in early Church history has so much recognition.

The Latin Church was further removed from the traditional use of the word, and it is not strange that we find there various novelties in its application. The greatest extension of its use is found in the Decretum Gelasii, which presents a list of Bibl. books that may be regarded as that of the Rom. Synod of 382, under Damasus. After lists of OT and NT, and a list of patristic works approved by the Church, follows, under the heading Notitia librorum apocryphorum qui non recipiuntur, a list of some 60 titles. Only NT A. are given, and to these are added (perhaps in later revisions of the work) a miscellaneous collection of books condemned by the Church, including even the works of Eusebius, Tertullian, Clement of Alex., etc., to each of which, as to the earlier list, the adjective apocryphus is added.

Almost equally novel in Christian usage is Jerome's extension of the word in the opposite direction to cover the books of our A., though this rests upon Heb. usage, as we know it from Origen. 'Quidquid extra hos [the 22 books of Heb. Can.] est, inter ἀπόκρυφα esse ponendum' (Prologus Galeatus). Jerome, in practice, however, gives to our A. an intermediate position (see below), in substantial harmony with Rufinus, who attempted to introduce the Eastern threefold division into the West, and gave the name apocrypha to the third class.

The Western Church, however, did not adopt the threefold division. Against Jerome's theory, it included the second division in the first. Neither did it extend the word apocrypha to heretical books in general, but retained practically its original application. Another Western novelty, however, maintained itself through the middle ages, namely, the interpretation of the word apocryphus as meaning obscurity of origin or authorship. According to Augustine, the A. were so called 'because their obscure origin was not clear to the Fathers' (de Civ. Dei, xv. 23), and he opposes this explanation to the idea of heretics, that they 'are to be held in a certain secret authority' (c. Faust, xi. 2). This brought confusion, for the word had come to mean practically non-can., but obscurity of origin was not a corresponding conception. So, during the middle ages, it was variously modified by extending the idea of obscurity or uncertainty from the authorship to the truth of a book, or to its reception by common consent of the Church. Jth., a¹ in the sense that its author is unknown, was received (can.) because its truth is evident (Hugo de St. Caro, 1240). Job, a¹ in the same sense, is in the Canon because not uncertainly confirmed by the authority of the Church (Hugo de St. Victore, d. 1141).

The usage of Protestantism is prepared by Carlstadt in his De canonicis scripturis, 1520. He reviews the opinions of Augustine and Jerome, and sides with the latter in respect both to the interpretation of the word and its application to our A. Not uncertainty of authorship, but simply non-canonicity, is the meaning of the word apocry- phal. He applies the word to the books of our A. as an adjective, not as a title. Through Protestant edd. of the Bible, beginning with Luther, the word came, by a natural misunderstanding, to be regarded as the title of this particular collection, and the word 'pseudepigrapha' was used of the A. proper, which neither Jerome, Carlstadt, nor Luther thought of depriving of their old name.

On the other hand, the name 'Apocrypha,' to which a bad sense adhered, contributed to a gradually diminishing regard for the books now so called.

Conclusions.—(1) The word apocryphal was used before the Reformation quite consistently of a certain class of books, namely, the Jewish and Jewish-Christian Apocalypses, which we call Pseudepigrapha, and the Apocrypha of the NT, still so called, made up largely of the books of Gnostic and other sects. These are properly secret or hidden books in their formal claim and in their contents, if not originally in their actual use.

(2) Jewish Rabbis applied a synonymous word, genuzim, to books 'hidden,' i.e. withdrawn and withheld from public (synagogue) use by the Jewish authorities, and so made uncanonical. This 'hiding' (the verb is used more often than the adjective) might happen to books in no sense of hidden origin or meaning. Through Origen and Jerome, the Jewish word seems to have had some influence upon the Christian.

(3) The Catholic Church, however, did not first make books apocrypha by excluding them from the Canon (the verb is not used), but it decided that the A. already existing under that name were not to be regarded as sacred scriptures, since publicity and universality were marks of genuineness and truth. The secret books of sects were, as such, spurious and false.

(4) It was therefore easy to forget that A. was the original name of these books, and to regard it as expressing the judgment of the Church concerning them. Those books were hidden which belonged to sects, which lacked common, open usage by the Church. Apocrypha meant, not received by the Church. But since books which the Church received were thereby proved apostolic, a non-apostolic and obscure origin was a mark of A.

(5) Protestantism went over to the Jewish usage, applying the word to the books withdrawn by it from the commonly accepted Canon, though this no longer meant withdrawn from public reading and common use, but only from full authority for doctrine. Protestants thus came to apply the word to books used with the canon in church service, not disapproved but recommended as good and useful, not secret or hidden in origin, meaning, or use. The evil name, however, helped to lower the first estimate of the books.

ii. THE APOCRYPHA IN JUDAISM.—1. ORIGIN OF THE COLLECTION.—In order to understand the origin and historical significance of the collection of books which we call the A., it is necessary to survey the work of the Jewish scribe, for in the scribe the literary history of Judaism centres.

(a) The Work of the Jewish Scribes.—This can, in a general way, be divided into (A) the collecting and editing of the sacred books, (B) the production of new books. The transition between the two was made by the tr. or paraphrasing, and the interpretation of the sacred books. More particularly, (A) the scribes collected and edited (1) the Law; (2) the Prophets, 'former' and 'latter'; (3) the rest of the religious literature of the nation, the so-called Hagiographa. (B 1) In connexion with this 3rd Canon, which contains some independent work of the scribes, the production of other books of similar character was encouraged (e.g. the A.); (2) with the Maccabæan crisis came a revival of prophecy, and the production of books interpreting and imitating those of the 2nd Canon (apocalypses, or apocrypha proper); (3) the interpretation of the 1st Canon, the Law, always a chief task of the scribes, was especially stimulated after the destruction of Jerus., and resulted in the Mishna and Talmud.

The synagogue was the centre of the scribe's literary activity; and the centre of the synagogue service was the Law. The religious instruction of the people in the religion of the law was his aim. His collection of other sacred books was for the sake of their public reading in the synagogue service, in exposition and enforcement of the Law. Such public reading was the mark and meaning of canonicity. The translations (Targumim) and commentaries (Midrashim) that accompanied the reading were for the same end, the religious teaching of the community, and were free and oral before they were fixed in writing.

The order of the independent work of the scribes sketched above (B) reverses the order of their work as editors (A). This sequence is not to be overpressed. The editing of the scribes involved, especially at first, independent work, in the way of comment as well as selection and arrangement; on the other hand, their independent writing was always based on tradition. Perhaps in the case of none of the books of the scribes have we original works in the proper sense. The stories of haggadists and the visions of seers are revisions and elaborations of traditional material. Further, the three lines of independent work outlined existed side by side, and the order given is only that of the first prevalence of each kind of work. Gr. influence favoured the first, the Maccabæan reaction the second, and the fall of the nation the third. Of the products of the first kind, some gained admission into the 3rd Canon (Hagiographa), and so became the common property of Pal. and Alex. Judaism and Christianity. But as they were especially congenial to Jews who fell most under Gr. influence, some of them were preserved, others contributed, by Alex. Jews. So far as they gained a place in the Gr. Bible, these, too, passed over to Christianity (the A.). Products of the 2nd class we have considered under i. 1. Writings of the first and second kinds are called by Jews Haggada, while the third, the elaboration and definition of the Law, is called Halacha. The A., then, are to be viewed in close connexion, on the one side, with the Hagiographa, and, on the other, with later developments of the Jewish Haggada.

(b) The Apocrypha in relation to the Hagiographa.—That the three divisions of the Jewish Canon (compare the list at the beginning of this article) represent three successive collections, widely separated in time, and that they stood originally, in the Jewish view, in a decreasing order of authority and importance, are ascertained facts in the history of OT Canon. The Hagiographa is, then, a relatively late collection of books on the whole late in origin, and, according to the Jewish view, inferior in authority to Law and Prophets. The order of books composing it is variously given, and the limits of the collection were open to dispute long after the Law and Prophets were closed. In regard to Ca, Ec, and Est, there were still differences of opinion up to the time of Akiba (c. 110-135 A.D.).

The Bk of Ps owes its place here to the fact that its use was in the temple, not in the synagogue. Apart from Ps and La, the Hagiographa consists of (1) history, in continuation of that told in Kings (Ezr-Neh); (2) history retold with a view to instruction (Ch)*; (3) stories, based on history or tradition, told to illustrate religious truth (Ru, Est, Ca (?), Dn). In Job the transition is made from story to (4) ethical and philosophical books (Pr, Ec).

Under similar headings fall the contents of the A. (1) History proper is found in 1 Mac. (2) History and story are retold with edifying embellishments. 1 Es is made up of extracts from 2 Ch (35, 36), Ezr, and Neh, with an additional story of the wisdom of Zorobabel (3-5⁹). This Midrash perhaps preceded the literal tr. of Ch, Ezr, Neh, into Greek. Such an Haggadic addition to history was Pr. Man (suggested by 2 Ch 33^{12, 13}). Est appears in the LXX only in the form of a midrash, in which, among other things, are supplied the letter referred to in 3¹³, prayers of Mordecai and Esther at 4¹⁷, the decree mentioned in 8¹². Dn is similarly enlarged by a prayer and song at 3²³, and the new stories of Daniel's wisdom, Sus and Bel. Even the late Maccabean history is treated in the Haggadic way in 2 Mac, an epitome of a larger work by Jason of Cyrene, which adorns the history with legendary elements to make of it a sermon on the Pharisaic religion. 3 and 4 Mac are found usually in the LXX, though not in the A. 3 Mac is a poor example of moralising under the form of history; and 4 Mac makes an incident in the Maccabean story the text for a philosophical treatise on the lordship of the religious reason over the passions. (3) Of new stories the A. contains two famous examples, To and Jth; Tobit teaching the reward for the individual of a faithful life of Pharisaic righteousness; Judith connecting a patriotism like Esther's with regard for a ceremonially correct life. (4) Direct moral and religious instruction ('ethical Haggada') is represented by Sir and Wis, the one a Pal. continuation, the other a Hel. development of the earlier wisdom books. As in the Hagiographa one book, Dn, makes the transition from story to prophecy, so in the A., Bar and the Ep. of Jeremy are prophetic in character. It is not, however, with prophecy nor with law, but with history and story, that both Hagiographa and A. have chiefly to do (cf. the use made of Dn by Hellenists [LXX] and by later Palestinians [Enoch, etc.]). The line between history and story is in both an uncertain one, as history, too, is told for religious, not for scientific purposes. With stories and with proverbial sayings the Jewish Rabbis long continued to occupy themselves. The value of these forms of religious instruction no one will question in view of the gospels. As to the relative worth of their use in the Hagiographa and the A., a fair judgment, apart from doctrinal considerations, will strongly justify the choice of the Palestinians, taking the two collections as wholes. A relation between them is, however, not to be denied, and is grounded in their history.

(c) Palestinian and Hellenistic Elements in the Apocrypha.—The ast books of the LXX were in part translations of Pal. (Heb.) books, in part original writings of Greek Jews; but it is not possible to draw the line between the two with security. As the LXX was recognised as a tr., one would expect that translations would more readily find their way into it. Yet the Hel. scribes were busy writers, especially in the lines which the A. follows (history, story, wisdom). Sir contains its own testimony that it was written in Heb. and tr. by the writer's grandson into Greek. 1 Mac was undoubtedly a Heb. book, and Jerome (if not Origen) knew it in the original. Jth and To, Jerome knew in 'Chaldee,' and a Heb. original is almost certain. The Ad. Est may be Heb., or at least similar additions may have arisen in Pal. in connexion with the yearly celebration of Purim. Pr. Man may have been Heb., and even 1 Es, if it preceded the LXX 2 Es [Ezr-Neh], may have had a Heb. precursor. Of the Ad. Dn, Sus turns on a Gr. play on words. Wis and 2, 3, and 4 Mac were certainly Greek.

2. USE OF THE APOCRYPHA AND ITS RELATION TO THE CANON.—(a) In Hellenistic Judaism.—The ast books are found in all MSS of the LXX, scattered among the books of the Heb. Canon without discrimination. These MSS are, indeed, all of Christian origin, and some of them even contain Christian songs; but, apart from these, they undoubtedly represent the OT which was current among the Gr. Jews and used in Gr. synagogues in the apostolic and early post-apostolic age. The additions to the Heb. Canon are not only of Jewish origin, but are, as a whole, books which would interest Gr. Jews, but would not specially interest Christians, since the prophetic element in them is conspicuously small. The addition of these books by Christians would be inexplicable. The preservation of this longer OT by Christians only, is naturally explained by the fact that soon after 70 A.D. Hel. Judaism in the distinct sense ceased to exist, giving place either to rabbinical Judaism or to Christianity; so that the earlier difference regarding the limits of sacred Scriptures between Pal. and Alex. Jews survived only as a difference between Jews and Christians.

We must not, however, conclude that the A. had been in the strict sense canonized by Alex. Judaism. Their place among Scriptures is rather due, in part, to the supreme dignity of the Law; in part to the broad view of inspiration current among Hellenists. In a more exclusive way than in later Pal. Judaism, the Pent. was to Alexandrians the sacred Scripture, the Canon by pre-eminence. It was such to Philo. In this respect the Alexandrians perhaps remained at the standpoint of the earlier Palestinians of the 3rd and 2nd centuries B.C. When Alex. Judaism was founded, the Law was the Canon of Judaism. The work of the 70 concerned it alone (Aristeas). The tr. of the other books into Greek in Egypt went on, in part, side by side with the formation of the 2nd and 3rd Canons in Pal. That the succeeding translators disregarded the Pal. distinction of Prophets and Hagiographa, and arranged the books, after the Law, topically, though in no fixed order, indicates their different view of these books. The relatively freer tr. points in the same direction; and this freedom passes over by natural degrees into the incorporation of explanatory and illustrative additions of less or greater extent. For this procedure the Pal. translators of OT into Aram. (Targumim) had perhaps already set the example. That, finally, Sir and Wis should be put in connexion with the Solomonic books, making, with Ps and Job, a volume of poetry, or that, in connexion with Est, Jth and To should be inserted, cannot seem strange. This was made easier by the Hel. view of inspiration. While Palestinians inclined to limit inspiration to the age of the prophets, long ended, the Alexandrians regarded the divine spirit as still active, and viewed as inspiration the experience of the thinker and writer in moments of special clearness of insight and exaltation of feeling.

Against the evidence that the LXX contained ast books, Philo's silence is inconclusive. Philo's text is the Pent. It is true that he cites none of the A., but in the prophetic Canon he passes by Ezk and all the minor prophets except Hos and Zec; and of the Hagiographa, except Ps, he makes almost no use, citing Pr twice, Job and Ch once, and Dn and the five Megilloth not at all.

(b) In Palestinian Judaism.—Here, too, the Law, long the only Canon, remained supreme. The Jewish scribes regarded the prophets as those who gave an authoritative interpretation of the Law, handing on the Mosaic tradition from the elders to the scribes. The Law has always had the chief place in the synagogue service, the prophets an important secondary place, the Hagiographa a place altogether subordinate. For a long time these different collections could not be written on the same roll. As they did not form one volume, it was the easier to keep them distinct in use and estimation. The books of the 2nd and 3rd Canons were, however, according to the Jewish view, inspired, and this in the end distinguished them from all later books. Jos (c. Ap. i. 8) says that the prophets 'learned the earliest and most ancient events by inspiration of God, and wrote down the events of their own times plainly, as they occurred.' 'But from Artaxerxes [Est] to our times all events have indeed been written down; but these late books are not deemed worthy of the same credit, because the exact succession of the prophets was wanting.' By the use of the formal principle that with Malachi prophecy ceased (cf. Mal 4⁵⁻⁶, Zec 13³, 1 Mac 4¹⁶ 9²⁷ 14⁴¹), though they could use the test only uncritically, the scribes drew the line between Hagiographa and A., or justified the line already drawn by the popular religious sense. All the Hagiographa could be regarded as meeting this test,* but Sir and 1 Mac, which were the most valued books of the A., could not.

It is true that Jesus Sirach himself does not share this (later) view of inspiration. He may represent the earlier Pal. standpoint, from which Alexandrianism took its start. For him the Law is supreme. It is the embodied Wisdom of God (24²³). In some sense his knowledge is all derived from it (39¹⁻⁸ 24³⁰). On the other hand, between the prophets and the high priest of his own time he makes no sharp distinction (44-49); and for himself he claims an inspiration like that of the prophet (cf. 39^{off.} with 48²⁴, and see 1¹⁰ 24³¹ 32 51^{13ff.}).

The step from Sir to the Hellenistic Wis is not great. Here, too, the Law is the supreme revelation (e.g. 18⁴),† and here, too, in answer to prayer (cf. Sir 39⁹), the spirit of wisdom is given to men, that spirit which is the life and reason of the world, and which 'generation after generation enters into holy souls and makes friends of God and prophets' (7²⁷, cf. chs. 1. 6 ff.).

Apart from 4 Ezr, which, not being in the LXX, does not deserve consideration at this point, the other books of the A. make no claim to be reckoned among sacred Scriptures.

It is not easy to estimate the significance of the fact that we have no evidence in Jewish books that they were ever so regarded. Disputes are recorded regarding the exclusion of books of the Canon, but none regarding the admission of a^l books. Yet it should be said that the Jewish Rabbis usually covered up the tracks of past wanderings from the straight path that led to their own position. That additions to Dn and Est, and books like To and Jth, were once current among the Hagiographa in Pal. is not impossible. Josephus uses 1 Mac, 1 Es, and Ad. Est, without distinction from can. books as historical sources, and even says that he has written his whole history 'as the sacred books record it' (Ant. xx. xi. 2, cf. Pro. § 3). Yet he counts 22 books, and excludes from the first rank all later than Est. In his time, then, the line had been drawn.

In the rabbinical writings there are many

* Baba bathra 14 ascribes Job to Moses, Ru to Samuel, Ps to David, Ca and Ec to Hezekiah and his friends, Dn and Est to the men of the Great Synagogue, Ch to Ezra and Nehemiah.

citations from Sir; Zunz * counts 40, among them some 'in a manner usual only of Scripture passages,' and some as late as the 4th cent., which speak of it as one of the Kethubhim. Some doubt, at least, regarding its canonicity is probable. Of Ad. Est some traces exist in Heb. literature. Haggadic stories concerning Dn, among them traces of Bel, are found. The Maccabean legend of the mother and seven sons (2 Mac, 4 Mac) was a favourite theme of rabbinical Midrashim. Yet 1 Mac, which Jerome knew in Heb., seems to have left no trace in rabbinical books. The legend of Judith is found, though in a form very different from the LXX, and Tobit is still extant in Heb. Jerome says the Jews had Jth and To, and regarded them as historical but not as canonical; while Origen says they did not possess them even among their A.

3. THE RELATION OF THE APOCRYPHA TO THE RELIGIOUS TENDENCIES AND PARTIES OF JUDAISM. —Of a theology of the A. it is unhistorical to speak. The collection presents the ideas of no one man or party, of no one period or place. The theology, or the religious ideas of each book, may be treated (see separate articles), or a history of the religious ideas and movements in Judaism in a given period (e.g. 200 B.C.—100 A.D.) may be undertaken, in which these books will be important sources; but the historian of theology cannot separate the A. from the later can. books on the one side, and from Philo and Josephus, the Pseudepigrapha and the early rabbinical literature, on the other.

A few suggestions may, however, be made regarding the relation of these books to the chief religious tendencies and parties of Judaism.

The main distinction in the post-exilic Jewish religion was that between the priest, whose sphere was the temple and its cultus, and the scribe, whose activity centred in the synagogue and the law. The centre of gravity seems to have shifted gradually from the temple to the synagogue, from priestly ritual to the legalism of the scribes, whose work made it possible for Jews in the Dispersion, out of reach of the temple, to live religious lives, and prepared Judaism to survive the loss of its temple. The Hagiographa stands, as a whole, at the earlier stage, beginning with the Ps, the book of temple devotion, and ending with the great temple history of Ch, Ezr, Neh. The five Megilloth also came into connexion with the cultus by their use at the national feasts, though it is not known how early this happened. On the other hand, there is no early evidence of the regular use of Hagiographa in the synagogue service, and of the scribes' legalism they contain little. Only Dn, perhaps the latest book in this collection, can be called Pharisaic in tendency.

In the A., on the other hand, the legal predominates over the priestly interest. Sir, perhaps its oldest book, shows a transition from the priestly standpoint of Ch (to which belongs 1 Es) to the legal standpoint of the scribes (Zunz). The writer delights in the temple and the high priest's impressive ceremony, and dwells upon Aaron much more at length than upon Moses (ch. 45), and with still more enthusiasm upon the Simon whose ministrations he had himself witnessed (ch. 50); while Ezra, the patron saint of the Rabbis, is passed by in his praise of famous men. Yet he praises also the law as the wisdom of God (see above), and glorifies the office of the scribe (38²⁴⁻³⁴ 39¹⁻¹¹).

But it was especially the Maccabean crisis that sharpened the contrast between the two tendencies. The desecration of the temple by Antiochus was the occasion of the war. The recovery and reconsecration of the temple was the great deed of

* Gottesdienstlichen Vorträge der Juden, 2 Aufl. 1892, p. 106.

Judas. This meant to the scribes the re-observance of the law, and with that they were content. It meant to Judas the first step toward a recovery of political independence. Judaism was organised about its temple. Its supreme authority was the high priest. So that the Maccabean princes coveted the high priesthood as a political power, and finally gained it. But this was a violation of the law, and alienated the legalists, who became a party of separatists, Pharisees, with the scribes at their head and the synagogue as their institution. Against them the adherents of the temple and the new high priests became an opposing party, the Sadducees. The priestly tendency issued in a political party, the scribal in a religious party; and in the conflict of these parties the inner history of Judaism chiefly consisted until the fall of Jerusalem. Since Sadduceism was bound up with the temple and the national life, it ceased to be after the destruction of temple and State; and since its views were as obnoxious to Christianity as to surviving Judaism, none of its distinct literary products could survive. The A., however, owing partly to its Alex. selection, partly to its comparatively early date, is not a purely Pharisaic product, and stands aside from the controversy between the two parties of which we know (from the Pharisaic side) in Ps-Sol, Enoch, etc. Two books of the A. are Sadducean in tendency. Sirach writes before the Maccabean wars, so that his book can be called Sadducean only by anticipation. Sadducean in tone was not only his attachment to the temple and the priesthood (above), but also his reserve in regard to angels, his sceptical attitude as to demons (21²⁷) and the future life (e.g. 17²⁷⁻³² 14¹¹⁻¹⁹ 41¹⁻⁴), perhaps his insistence on the entire freedom of man (15¹¹⁻¹⁷ 17⁶⁻⁷), and his spirit of liberality toward outside sources of knowledge and culture (e.g. 39⁴). There is, indeed, a polemic against a Pharisaic spirit of ceremonialism in 34¹⁸⁻²⁶ 35¹⁷.

1 Mac follows the crisis out of which the parties arose, but precedes their serious conflicts. The writer's admiration for Judas and his brothers, 'through whose hand salvation was given to Israel,' is unbounded (5⁶², cf. 3¹⁻⁹ 9^{21f.} 13³⁻⁶ 14^{25f.} 16³ etc.). He paints Simon's reign in thoroughly Messianic colours (14⁴⁻¹⁵), and in the decision that 'until a trustworthy prophet should arise . . . Simon should be their prince and high priest for ever,' his political and religious creed was summed up. It was the creed of Sadduceism. Sadducean also is the writer's attachment to the laws and customs of the nation, and his opposition to innovations (21²⁸ 32¹. 29 6⁵⁹ etc.); but laws are for the strengthening and safety of the nation, and, when the observance of even so sacred a law as the Sabbath exposed the nation to danger, its non-observance was decreed (2³²⁻⁴¹). He looks to the valour of the hero to win victories (no miracle even in 9⁵⁵. 56 11⁶⁷⁻⁷⁴); as Jos. says, 'The Sadducees take away fate . . . we are ourselves the causes of good,' etc. (Ant. XIII. v. 9). His interest is in man more than in God, and in the present more than in the future.

The essence of Pharisaism was that it gave religion (i.e. legalism) the first place. The Sadducee attempted to further the welfare of the individual and of the nation by direct means (politics, war, etc.); the Pharisaic faith was that if the individual and the community kept the law, God would by a supernatural act secure their welfare. The Sadducees would set aside the law in smaller things (Sabbath), or in greater (high priesthood), when circumstances required. To the Pharisee the law was inviolable, whatever the extremity. This is the principle of Pharisaism. Out of it various developments issued.

That the law might never be broken by inadvert-ence, the scribes put about it a 'hedge' of additional precautionary rules, the Halacha, or oral law, which the Sadducees did not recognise. The belief that well-being was God's reward for the observance of the law, and misfortune His punishment for its transgression, though applied at first to the present life and lot of men and nations, might easily be referred to the future, and foster the thought of a coming national glory for Israel, and of an individual life after death. It might also stimulate the belief in miracles and in angels and demons as agents of God's blessings and judgments. Yet these marks of later Pharisaism are not uniformly or conspicuously present in the A.

Fasting is almost the only addition which we find to the Mosaic law (To 12⁸, Jth 3⁶ etc., cf. Dn 9³ 10³), with a further ascetic emphasis upon the laws regarding food (Jth 10⁵ 11¹² 12¹. 2, To 1^{10f.}, Ad. Est 14¹⁷, 2 Mac 5²⁷ 6²¹). The creed of the Bk of Jth is that no enemy can prevail against Israel so long as it keeps the ceremonial law, but if it breaks it, under whatever stress, it will fall (5¹⁷⁻²¹ 11⁹⁻¹⁹ 8¹⁷⁻²⁰). Moreover, Judith's deliverance of the nation is conditioned upon her individual fulfilment of the law even amid the greatest difficulties (8⁴⁻⁶ 12¹⁻⁹). This is true Pharisaism, and yet the book contains neither Messianic hope, nor rewards after death (16¹⁷ is not to be so understood), nor miracle, nor angel. Tobit illustrates the Pharisaic principle in the life of an individual. Legal righteousness is rewarded by deliverance from evil, long life and prosperity; while sin is always punished by evil, and all evil is due to sin (3¹⁻⁶ 1²⁰. 21 14⁴⁻⁸. 15). Here angels and demons play a far greater part than in any other book of the A. The national hope also is expressed (13. 14⁴⁻⁷), but there is no resurrection. The Bk of Bar contains the national hope (2³⁰⁻³⁵ 4²⁵⁻³⁷ 5¹⁻⁹), but no individual resurrection. 2 Mac views the work of Judas as an illustration of Pharisaism. It knows of no laxity regarding the law (cf. 5²⁵ 6¹¹ 8²⁰ 12³³ 15¹). The history is helped forward by angels and miracles and signs (3^{25f.} 33 5^{2f.} 9⁵ 10^{29f.} 11⁸ 15^{22f.}). The national hope finds frequent expression (12⁷⁻²⁹ 27¹⁸ etc.); and, here only in the A., the resur. of the bodies of the righteous is insisted upon (7⁹. 11. 14. 26 12^{33f.} 14⁴⁶).

It is evident that the later marks of Pharisaism (cf. Ac 23³⁻⁹) were not uniformly present. Legalism stands as the characteristic mark. 'This is the book of the commandments of God, and the law that endureth for ever. All they that hold it fast are destined for life, but such as leave it shall die' (Bar 4¹). And since the law of life was Israel's law, with legalism went particularism. 'O Israel, happy are we! for the things that are pleasing to God are made known unto us' (Bar 4⁴). Of this feeling, and the corresponding contempt for other peoples, passing over, in times of trouble, into jealousy and hatred, there is enough in the A. It inspires Ad. Est as it does Est itself. Jth and 2 Mac are dominated by it. It is a presupposition of To (4¹² etc.). Even Sir shares it, though his ruling interest is in the individual, not in the nation (esp. 36¹⁻¹⁷, cf. 24, and in 44-50, e.g. 47^{21f.}). Only the Hel. Bk of Wis rises to a broader view. In chs. 10-19 the special care of God for Israel is shown. 'In every way thou didst magnify thy people, and glorify them, . . . standing by them in every time and place' (19²²). But while Israel is God's son (18¹³, cf. 4), He also loves all men (11²⁴⁻²⁶ 6⁷ 1¹³), and His judgments are remedial (12^{27f.}). Nor, in spite of the first impression of 3⁷⁻⁸ 5¹⁷⁻²³ (cf. 4⁷⁻¹⁹), does the writer hold to a future earthly glory for Israel. The consummation is heavenly (immortality of the soul, here first in Jewish books), and is morally conditioned.

The Essenic type of Pharisaism is represented only in 4 Ezz, which does not properly belong to the collection. Here only do we find a personal Messiah. Hel. Judaism, which stood at one side of the conflict between Pharisee and Sadducee, is represented by Wis, which, though it sets the religious life and faith in contrast to worldliness and scepticism, puts no stress on ceremonialism, but interprets the law in a more ethical sense, and reviews the history of Israel to illustrate the beneficent rule of God's wisdom, rather than the inviolableness of His law.

But 4 Ezr cannot be treated apart from other apocalypses, nor Wis apart from other products of Hellenism.

It is chiefly in these two isolated books that foreign elements are prominent. Apart from these, and the (Pers.?) angelology of To, the A. stands in the main on (later) OT ground in its views of God, of man, and of the world.

iii. THE APOCRYPHA IN THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.—1. IN THE NEW TESTAMENT.—The writers of NT used almost exclusively the LXX OT, and we have no reason to suppose that a^{al} additions were wanting at that time. There are no direct citations from A.; this, however, is true also of the disputed books, Song, Ec, and Est as well as of Jos and Ezr-Neh. The Pent., the Prophets, and the Pss were, for obvious reasons, most frequently cited. The other books of the Hagiographa, and the A., offered far fewer material points of contact with Christianity, and would not be allowed the same value in argument by Jews. An acquaintance with a^{al} books is, however, generally recognised in the case of some NT writers. Thus there are parallelisms between Ja and Sir (e.g. Ja 1¹⁹ and Sir 5¹¹), between He and Wis (e.g. He 1³ and Wis 7²⁶), and between Paul and Wis (cf. Ro 9²¹ with Wis 15⁷; Ro 1²⁰⁻²² with Wis 11. 13. 15; 2 Co 5^{1,4} with Wis 9¹⁵), which reveal familiarity with this literature, but which do not imply that authority was ascribed to it. The question of the relation of the A. to the Canon cannot be decided on the ground of NT usage.

2. IN THE EASTERN CHURCH.—There is peculiar difficulty in determining the place of the A. in relation to the Canon in the E. Church because of the conflict between different lines of evidence. We shall consider (a) Original Usage, (b) Scholarly Theory, (c) Manuscripts, (d) Versions, (e) The later Greek Church.

(a) Original Usage.—The Christian Church used the LXX as its OT Scripture, and the Church Fathers cite all parts of it with similar formulas. 1 and 2 Clement, Barnabas, Ignatius, and the Teaching of the Twelve, contain allusions to a^{al} by the side of can. books. Irenæus cites Ad. Dn, Bar, and Wis; Tertullian—Sir, Wis, Ad. Dn, and Bar; Clem. Alex.—Sir, Wis, Bar, To, Ad. Dn; Cyprian—Sir, Wis, To, Bar; all with the formulas ('it is written,' 'Scripture says,' etc.) used of can. works. This usage continues to be the prevailing one, and Origen can appeal to the universal practice of the Church from the beginning against the appeal of Africanus to the authority of the Heb. Canon.

(b) Scholarly Theory.—The LXX came to Christianity from the synagogue of Hel. Judaism, and with it was accepted the theory of the inspiration and sacredness of this translation. The story of its origin, told by Aristeas of the Pent., was extended to the whole, and heightened into absolute miracle. (Justin, Dial. 68. 71. 84; Iren. iii. 21. 2-4; Tertul. Apol. 18; Clem. Strom. i. 38. 148. 149; Origen, ad Afric. 4; Cyril, Cat. iv. 34; Epiphanius, de mens.). But on the other hand, whenever the books of OT are counted, the number is given as 22 (24), and is expressly derived from the

* See the references in Schürer, HJP §§ 32. 33.

Jewish (Heb.) Canon. That the LXX was a tr. of the Heb. was, of course, never lost sight of, but it was an inspired tr., sanctified by Christian use from the apostles onwards. The discrepancy between the two was obvious, and yet could not be given its natural weight. The question of the status of the A. depended upon the relative importance given to traditional Christian usage and current Jewish usage, summarily expressed in the number 22, or to practice and theory, and upon new theories devised for their adjustment.

Five possibilities seemed open: (1) To insert the A. in OT in such a way as to retain the number 22. (2) To introduce some of the most valued A. into NT (as distinctively Christian possessions), or to append them at the end. (3) To make a third class of books, between can. and uncan. in dignity. (4) To give up the Heb. for the LXX Canon, making theory square with practice. (5) To give up the LXX for the Heb., making practice square with theory. The first three ways are followed, with more or less combination, in the East, the fourth finally by Rome, the fifth finally by Protestantism, though in neither case with entire consistency, since, in the Vulg., the LXX has been considerably modified in accordance with the Heb., and in the Prot. Bible the order of the Vulg. (and LXX) has been retained.

It is important to set forth the place of the A. in the various theoretical Canons of Eastern writers somewhat in detail.

Melito, Bishop of Sardis (c. 150-170 A.D.) learned from Jews or Jewish Christians in Pal. the contents of OT. His list (Euseb. iv. 26. 13, 14) contains only the books of the Heb. (omitting Est), but the titles and order (?) are from the LXX (Ch after K, Proph. after Poet. books; so in general: (1) History, (2) Poetry, (3) Prophecy). It cannot be certainly inferred that Jer and Dn were without the a^{al} additions. The Muratorian Fragment (175-200 A.D.) contains only NT (whether OT was originally given is uncertain); but it inserts Wis between 2 Jn and Rev (as by Philo?), and gives to the Shepherd the position of a book that is to be privately, not publicly, read. Its place is not among prophets or apostles, but also not among heretical books. The writer makes use of the second solution of the problem and suggests the third.

Origen (c. 185-254) deals with the problem with the fullest knowledge. His great Hexapla testifies to the importance of the problem presented by the deviating texts of OT Scripture, and gave him minute familiarity with the divergence of the LXX from the Heb. In his Com. on Psalms (Eus. vi. 25. 1) he gives a list of the 22 books of the Heb. Canon, apparently like Melito's, with the addition of Est. But he begins the use of the first solution of the problem above suggested by including in Jer not only La, but Ep. Jer (Bar?). Moreover, he says that 1 and 2 Ezr were counted as one book. This would be understood by Gr. readers as referring, not to the Heb. Ezr and Neh, but to the LXX 1 Es and 2 Es [= Ezr + Neh]. He mentions 'the Maccabæan books' at the end of his list as outside of the Canon. But from the Ep. to Africanus we learn that this Heb. Canon was not regarded by Origen as of final validity for Christians. He criticises the theory of a Heb. Canon on the ground of traditional Christian practice (i.e. he supplements the first by the fourth solution). His view is that the present is not the original Heb. Canon, since Jewish rulers and elders hid from the people passages that might bring them into discredit (§ 9). On this ground Susanna is defended, though it is now among the Jewish A. But To and Jth, which the Jews do not possess even among their 'hidden' books, are to be retained simply on the ground of Christian usage. Providence must have guided the practice of the Church, and Judaism is not to dictate to Christianity (the Catholic principle).

Cyril, Bishop of Jerus. (Cat. iv. 33-36, c. 348 A.D.), insists with equal stress upon the number 22, that of the Heb. Canon, and the authority of the usage of the Church. His list of 22 (12 historical, 5 poetical, and 5 prophetic) he seems to regard as that of the LXX in current use. His Jer includes Bar, and his Dn (and Est?) the additions. He declares that the books not read in the churches are not to be read in private, and, after all, himself cites Wis as by Solomon (Cat. ix. 2, 16).

The Synod of Laodicea (c. 360) affirms Cyril's list, with minor changes of order. The list in Apost. Canon, 85, is also Cyril's, with the addition, at the end of the histories, of 1-3 Mac. On the other hand, the metrical lists of Gregory of Naz. (d. 390) and Amphilochius, though following the same order, seem to have omitted the a^{al} additions as well as Est.

Epiphanius (c. 315-403) moves in the opposite direction. Like Cyril, he regarded the LXX as the inspired tr. of the 22 books of the Heb. Canon; but besides 1 Es, Bar, Ep. Jer and Ad. Dn, he seems to have included, under Est (with Ad.?) To and Jth; and, against Cyril, he introduces an intermediate class of writings, not 'in the ark,' but yet 'good and useful.' Here belong Wis and Sir, which he puts after NT in his list (Hæc. 76, cf. Hæc. 86, de mens. 4). He thus provides for the practical recognition of all the A. except Mac and Pr. Man. There are still other books, apocrypha proper, some of which the Seventy translate, upon which he does not wholly shut the door (de mens. 5. 10).

Athanasius, in his 39th Easter Letter (367 A.D.), carries through more consistently the third solution. His 22 books include Bar, Ep. Jer., 1 Es (?), Ad. Dn. But after NT he adds, 'for greater exactness,' that there are other books outside of these, not canonized, but stamped by the Fathers as books to be read by catechumens for their instruction. These are Wis, Sir, Est, Jth, To, Δδ. and Shepherd. They are called ἀναγιγνωσκόμενα, books to be read, i.e. by catechumens.

The threefold division is followed by the list in the Chron. of Nicephorus, which, after the 22 books of OT and the 26 of NT, gives 'disputed' books of OT, viz. 1-3 Mac, Wis, Sir, Ps-Sol, Est, Jth, Sus, To. There follow the disputed books of NT (Apoc. of Jn and of P., Ep. Bar and Gospel of Hebrews), and, finally, the 'apocrypha' of OT and NT (above). Here the A. are books whose canonicity is in dispute, ἀριμετρήματα. The name and the estimate differ essentially from Athanasius, though both are copied in the Synopsis of (Pseudo) Athanasius.

In the 'List of 60,' after the 60 can. books of OT and NT, follow, as 'outside of the 60,' Wis, Sir, 1-4 Mac, Est, Jth, To. After these come the 'apocrypha' (above).

We find then in the lists of writers of the E. Church, from the 2nd to the 6th or 7th cent., a practically unanimous adherence to the Heb. Canon of 22 books, and efforts to harmonise this with the Christian LXX by making the 22 as comprehensive of LXX additions as possible, and by assigning to other books of the A., so far as they were valued, a separate place, usually after NT, but distinct from heretical, rejected books.

(c) Manuscripts.—It is a striking fact that no extant MS of the LXX represents even approximately the Canon of Cyril or Athanasius. In no known Greek text do the A. stand by themselves. The codices agree with the usage, not with the theory, of the E. Church.

Of the 9 uncials in which a¹ books are found, the Vat. and the Alex. are given at the beginning of this article. Next in importance (3) stands the Sin., which originally contained the whole Bible. Of OT the extant parts are: (Fragments of Gn, Nu, 1 Ch, and Ezr), Neh, Est, To, Jth, 1 Mac, 4 Mac, Is, Jer, La (part), XII (except Hos, Am, Mic), Ps, Pr, Ec, Ca, Wis, Sir, Job. (4) Cod. Ephræmi Syri (5th cent.), contains fragments of Job, Pr, Ec, Wis, Sir, Ca. (5) Cod. Venetus (8th or 9th cent.) contains Job (end), Pr, Ec, Ca, Wis, Sir, XII, Is, Jer, Bar, La, Dn [Ad.], To, Jth, 1-4 Mac. (6) Cod. Basiliano-Vaticanus (9th cent.) contains second half of Pent., historical books, including 1 Es and Ad. Est. (7) Cod. Marchalianus (6th or 7th cent.) contains the prophets in the order of B (so Bar, Ep. Jer, Ad. Dn). (8) Cod. Cryptoferratisensis (7th or 8th cent.) contains the prophets. (9) Palimpsest fragments of Wis and Sir, of 6th or 7th cent. Swete does not cite 6 and 9, but adds ursive Cod. Chisianus (9th cent. ?), which contains Jer, Bar, La, Ep. Jer Dn, according to the LXX [all other MSS have substituted Theodotion's Dn], Hippolytus on Dn, Dn according to Theod., Ezk, Is. Both texts of Dn contain the additions. It is noteworthy that several cursives of the poetical books give Ps-Sol in the order, Job, Pr, Ec, Ca, Wis, Ps-Sol., Sir. [Swete, vol. iii. p. xvi. f.]

(d) Versions.—The Oriental translations of OT were nearly all made from the LXX, and were inclined rather to enlarge than to reduce its Canon.

The old Syr. Peshiṭta was an exception to this rule. Its OT was from the Heb., and so contained no A. It also lacked Ch. The influence of the LXX was, however, so great that the Pesh. was early revised in accordance with it, and the a¹ books were incorporated with some further additions. The chief codex (Ambrosianus) contains Wis, Ep. Jer, 1 and 2 Ep. Bar, Jth, Apoc. BAR. [here only], Apoc. of Ezra (= 2 Es), 1-5 Mac. [5 Mac = Jos. BJ vi.]. In other MSS are found 1 Es, To, Pr. Man. A MS of the 6th cent. has a 'book of women,' viz. Ru, Est, Sus, Jth, THECLA.

Wholly exceptional, on the other hand, was the critical view of the Nestorian school at Nisibis, which put Sir in the class of fully can. books, and regarded as of intermediate authority, Ch, Job, Ezr, Neh, Jth, Est, 1 and 2 Mac, Wis, Ca.

Exceptional also is a Syr. MS at Cambridge, in which an attempt is made to arrange OT in chronological order. This naturally throws most of the A. at the end. Wis is after Solomon's books, Bar and Ep. Jer after Jer. After the prophets, follow

Dn [and Bel], Ru, Sus, Est, Jth, Ezr-Neh, Sir, 1-4 Mac, 1 Es, To.

The Ethiopic version not only adopted the LXX Canon without criticism, but added various books besides 4 Ezr, several of which survived in no other collection, e.g. Enoch, Jubilees, Ascension of Is, etc.

The Armenian version also draws no line between Canon and A.

(e) The Later Gr. Church.—The views of the Fathers of the Eastern Church could not be without permanent influence, but their failure to reach consistency made it possible for the LXX to retain its currency. At the time of the Reformation some Eastern scholars, appealing to Cyril and Athanasius, declared the a¹ books to be uncan. So Metrophanes Critopulos (1625) and Cyril Lucar (1629). Against them the Synods of Constantinople (1638), Jaffa (1642), and Jerus. (1672) sustained the older usage, and declared the full canonicity of the A. It appears, however, that clearness and consistency have never been reached, for Philaret's Longer Catechism of the Orthodox Catholic E. Church (1839, etc.), which has official sanction, gives to all books outside of the 22 a subordinate place, as meant for the reading of those just entering the Church (citing Athanasius); while the official Bible of the Gr. Church contains (after Ch) Pr. Man; (after Neh) 1 Es, To, Jth; (after Ca) Wis, Sir; (after La) Ep. Jer, Bar; (after Mal) 1-3 Mac, 4 Ezr.

3. IN THE WESTERN CHURCH.—(a) Roman Catholic.—In the Lat. Church there was a stronger inclination to let Christian usage, rather than scholarly theory, determine the place of the A. in the Canon; and this in spite of the fact that Rome produced the man of all antiquity who most strongly pressed the sole validity of the Heb. Canon (Jerome), and committed to this very man the revision of its OT Scriptures.

The earliest Lat. tr. (Itala) was made from the LXX, and seems to have contained all the A. of the LXX except 3 and 4 Mac, and to have added 2 Es.

Jerome first revised the Itala after the LXX, but then tr. the OT anew from Heb. In this tr. the A. would fall out. And this Jerome demands. In the famous Prol. Galeatus he gives a list of the 22 books of the Heb. Canon in the Heb. order, and adds, 'whatever is beyond these is to be put among the A.' So Wis, Sir, Jth, To, and Shepherd 'are not in the Canon. Of Mac, I have found the first book in Heb.; the second is Greek,' etc.

This explicit denial that even an intermediate position should be given to the A. would, in consistency, require their entire removal from the Bible. But Jerome elsewhere gives these books an intermediate position. For he says (Prol. to Bks of Sol), 'as the Church reads Jth and To and the Bks of Mac, but does not receive them among can. Scriptures, so also let it read these two books [Wis and Sir] for the edification of the people, not for confirming the authority of Church dogmas.' Only by such a view can we understand Jerome's revision of Jth and To, which he undertook, indeed, under protest and with careless haste, excusing himself by the fact that they were extant in Chaldee, and that the Council of Niceæa counted Jth in the number of sacred Scriptures (of this there is no other evidence). Jerome also inserted the Additions to Dn and Est, distinguishing them by marks, and collecting the Ad. Est together at the end of the book, where they have remained, out of their proper place, ever since.

After these concessions by Jerome himself, it is not strange that the other books of the A. gradually found their old place in his version as it gained recognition.

Of other Lat. Fathers, Hilary of Poitiers (d. 368) reaffirms Origen's Can., but shows some inclination to add To and Jth, for which Origen's position gave ground.

Rufinus (d. 410), who studied at Alexandria and Jerus., gives the E. list of 22 books, and puts the A. in an intermediate class, which he calls (for the first time?) Ecclesiastici, viz. Wis, Sir, To, Jth, Bks of Mac, and, in NT, Shepherd and Two Ways [also Judgment according to Peter?]. These the Fathers wished to be read in the churches, but not brought forward for the confirmation of faith. 'Other Scriptures they named aei which they wished not to be read in the churches.' The three-fold division is E., but the name 'ecclesiastical' and the explanation (which is practically the view of Jerome also) are new. The A. are to be read not privately, but in the churches. This would originally have meant full canonicity. But a distinction is attempted in degrees of authority for doctrine among books which, in their text and in their church use, are not distinguished. It is not strange that the theory of an intermediate class gained no firm footing in the W., and that the A. went into the first, not into the third class.

The early Lat. lists are characterised by the two groups, (1) Ps, Pr, Ca, Ec, Wis, Sir; (2) Job, To, Est, Jth, 1 and 2 Mac, 1 and 2 Es, in which, apart from the additions to the prophets Jer and Dn, the books of A. are usually found. They are found in the Can. of Mommmsen, which perhaps represents the average Western Can. of c. 360 A.D. It includes the A., and still counts 24 books (Rev 4th) by the device of reckoning the 5 Solomonic books as one. The West had not, however, the interest in the number 24 that the East had in 22, and generally disregarded even this formal agreement with the Jews.

Cassiodorus (Institutio, etc., chs. xii-xiv., c. 544 A.D.) gives Jerome's (Heb.) Can., then Augustine's, and finally the Can. of the antiquatranslatio, which represents Lat. usage before Jerome, viz. Gn-Ch; Ps, Sol 5 (Pr, Wis, Sir, Ec, Ca); Prophets; Job, To, Est, Jth, 1, 2 Es, 1, 2 Mac. The two groups are to be noted. The divergence of the three lists from each other seems to cause the writer no trouble.

Similar to this is the list of the Decretum Gelasii, which, if it is that of the Synod of 382, is the first official Can. of the Roman Church. It puts Wis, Sir with Solomonic books, Bar with Jer, and ends with an 'order of histories,' which is our second group, as follows: Job, To, 1, 2 Es, Est, Jth, 1, 2 Mac.

The next official OT Can. was that of the African Councils of Hippo (393) and Carthage (397): Gn-Ch, Job, Ps, Sol 5, 12 prophets, Is, Jer, Dn, Ezk, To, Jth, Est, 1, 2 Es, 1, 2 Mac. Here Job is separated from the second group and put in its old connexion with Ps, Pr. These councils were dominated by Augustine, whose weight on the side of Church tradition overbore the influence of Jerome's learning. Augustine stands for the Catholic principle as determining the Can. (de doct. ii. 8, 12), even when he feels the objections, e.g. to Wis and Sir, that the ancient Church has received them as decisive (de civ. xvii. 20, 1). Augustine gives, in de doct. ii. 8, 13, a list of 44 books of OT—22 historical, made by adding to Gn-Ch, as a secondary list, our second group: Job, To, Est, Jth, 1, 2 Mac, 1, 2 Es; and 22 prophetic, made by prefixing to the 16 prophets our first group: Ps, Pr, Ca, Ec, Wis, Sir. In his last book, however (Speculum), he seems inclined to put the A. at the end of OT Can., separating Wis, Sir from group 1, and Job from group 2. This may reveal a growing sense of the secondary authority or security of the A.

Innocent I. of Rome, in a letter to the Bishop of Toulouse (405), gives a list in which the two groups still appear: Gn-4 K (with Ru); Prophets; Solomon 5, Ps; 'of histories,' Job, To, Est, Jth, 1, 2 Mac, 1, 2 Es, 1, 2 Ch.

The outcome of the matter in the Lat. Church was the Vulg., and the leading MS of it (Cod. Amiatinus, c. 700) gives, in the name of Jerome, a list identical with that sanctioned at Trent (see the list at the beginning of this article). The order is nearer to that of Augustine in de doct. ii. 8 than to that of the Council of Hippo. The secondary group of histories follows the primary (Gn-Ch), and the group of poetry follows it, preceding the prophets. Job, however, is put between the two, so that it might belong either to history or poetry, and 1, 2 Mac are separated from the group and put at the end—a partial compromise between the topical place given to this group by Augustine, and the more chronological place assigned it in the Old Latin, and at Hippo. The result is that the A. are found chiefly in the middle of OT, distinguished in no way from other books. Until the decree of Trent, however, it was still possible to regard the A. as of inferior authority, and, when can. was understood to mean authoritative, even as not in the Canon. The middle ages furnished some followers of Jerome (e.g. Hugo of St. Victor, d. 1140; Peter of Clugny, d. 1156; Nicolaus of Lyra, d. 1340) who anticipate the view of Cardinal Ximenes (1437-1517), who says in the Preface to the great Complutensian Polyglott, that the a¹ books are outside of the Canon, and are received by the Church as useful reading, not as authoritative for doctrine. Erasmus (1467-1536) also follows Jerome, though expressing himself with his usual reserve and formal submission to the judgment of the Church. 'Whether the Church receives them as possessing the same authority as the others, the spirit of the Church must know.' Cardinal Cajetan, Luther's opponent at Augsburg (1518), would interpret the decisions of Councils and Fathers by Jerome.

Though the Vulg. Canon had been reaffirmed by Pope Eugenius IV. and put forth as a decree of the Council of Florence (1439), it is not probable that the Roman Church would have taken the decisive step of 1545, against the views of its own best scholars, if it had not been for Luther. The Council of Trent declared the Vulg. to be in all parts of equal authority, and definitely rejected the efforts of Ximenes and others to put the A. in a separate class, 'ecclesiastical' or 'deutero-can.' In the Bibliotheca Sancta of Sixtus Senensis the case is correctly stated. The distinction of Proto-can. and Deutero-can. or ecclesiastical books is given (to the latter class belong, in OT, Est, To, Jth, Bar, Ep. Jer, Wis, Sir, Ad. Dn, 1 and 2 Mac; in NT, Mk 16⁹⁻²⁰, Lk 22⁴³⁻⁴⁴, Jn 7⁵³⁻⁸¹, He, Ja, 2 P, 2 and 3 Jn, Jude, Rev), but the distinction has only historical significance. These books, it is said, were not known till a late period; were even formerly held by the Fathers to be a¹ and not can.; were at first permitted to be read only before catechumens (Athanasius), then before all believers (Rufinus), but only for edification, not for the confirmation of doctrine; but were at last adopted among Scriptures of irrefragable authority.

This consistent position is deserted by modern Catholics for the unhistorical view that the LXX Can. was the original one, which was shortened by Jews for an antichristian purpose; so that the words proto-can. and deutero-can. reverse the true state of the case, and have not even an historical justification (Kaulen, in Wetzer u. Welte, Encyk. 2 art. 'Kanon').

(b.) Protestant.—Even on the ground of Catholic scholarship those who denied the authority of the Church must give the A. a secondary place. The first Prot. effort to fix the place of the A. was made by Andreas Bodenstein von Carlstadt, in his De canonicis scripturis, 1520. He discusses the views of Augustine and Jerome, and vindicates Jerome's position. He gives the Heb. OT Can., Law, Prophets, and Hagiographa, thinks these divisions indicate a decreasing order of value, and makes corresponding discriminations in NT. OT A. he divides into two classes: (1) Wis, Sir, Jth, To, 1 and 2 Mac; 'Hi sunt apocryphi, i.e. extra canonem hebraeorum, tamen agiographi.' (2) 3 and 4 Ezr, Bar, Pr. Man, Ad. Dn: 'Hi libri sunt plane apocryphi virgis censorii animadvertendi.' This significant effort remained almost without effect.

In contrast to this attempt to solve the problem by historical means (to return to the original position), Luther wavered between a free criticism of the Can. by the Christian consciousness, and, for practical purposes, the acceptance of the current Bible. He wished 1 Mac had the place of Est in the Canon. Of Jth, To, Sir, Wis, he judges favourably. Even Ad. Dn and Ad. Est have much good in them. Bar and 2 Mac, on the other hand, he condemns.

In Luther's Bible (completed 1534) the A. stand between OT and NT, with the title: 'A., that is books which are not held equal to the sacred Scriptures, and nevertheless are useful and good to read.' They include our A. with the exception of 1 and 2 Es. Luther's judgment on these two books was especially unfavourable, but for their omission he had the authority of Jerome, whose view perhaps affected their exclusion at Trent.

The Reformed Church took a somewhat less favourable view of the A. In the Zürich Bible (1529-1530) they stand, in Leo Jud.'s tr., after NT, as an appendix to the Bible, with the non-committal preface: 'These are the books which by the ancients were not written nor numbered among the Biblical books, and also are not found among the Hebrews.' Here 1 and 2 Es are included, as well as 3 Mac; while Three, Pr. Man, Ad. Est were added only in later edd.

The French Bible of Calvin (1535) puts the A. between OT and NT, with the title: 'The volume of the a^d books contained in the Vulg. tr., which we have not found in Heb. or Chaldee.' Here 1 and 2 Es are included. A preface, doubtless by Calvin, reaffirms Jerome's view as to the value of these books.

Coverdale was the first to tr. the A. from Gr. into Eng. (1536). He put them between OT and NT, with the title: 'Apocripha. The bokes and treatises which amonge the fathers of olde are not reckened to be of like authorite with the other bokes of the byble, nether are they foude in the Canon of the Hebrue.'

Matthew's Bible (1537) reproduces Coverdale's A., and translates Calvin's Preface, stating that these books are not to be read publicly in the Church, nor used to prove doctrine, but only for 'furtherance of the knowledge of the history, and for the instruction of godly manners.'

Cranmer's Bible (1540) divides OT into three parts: (1) Pent., (2) Hist. books, (3) Remaining books; and adds, 'The volume of the bokes called Hagiographa,' so called 'because they were wont to be read not openly and in common, but as it were in secret and apart'! But in the reprint of 1541 they appear as A., and simply as 'the fourth part of the Bible.'

The Bishops' Bible (1568) treats the A. still more favourably. The table of contents gives it as 'The fourth part called Apocryphus.' The separate title-page reads, 'The Volume of the bookes called Apocrypha.' But a classified list of 'the whole Scripture of the Bible,' under the headings Legal, Historical, Sapiential, and Prophetical, is given, which follows the Vulg., with two changes of order due to its scheme (puts 1 and 2 Mac after Job, and Ps before Is), and with the addition of 3 and 4 Ezr, with the explanation in the case of these two books only that they are apocryphal.

In the Authorized Version (1611) 'the bookes called Apocrypha' are marked by the running title 'Apocrypha' at the top of the page, but have no preface or separate table of contents; and in the table of lessons at the beginning they are included under OT.

The edd. so far seem to indicate a growing rather than diminishing regard for the books. It was not long, however, before edd. of AV began to appear in which the A. was omitted (1629, etc.).

The Confessions of Lutheran and Reformed Churches agree substantially with Article VI. of the Eng. Church (Lat. 1562, Eng. 1571), which, with the list of A., explains: 'And the other books (as Jerome saith) the Church doth read for example of life and instruction of manners; but yet doth it not apply them to establish any doctrine.' But a less favourable judgment, held at first by few, has gradually, through much controversy, prevailed in Protestantism. At the Synod of Dort (1618) a strong, though unsuccessful, effort was made to remove the A. wholly from the Bible. In England the opposition came especially from the Puritans, and took final form in the Westminster Confession (1648): 'The books commonly called A., not being of divine inspiration, are no part of the Can. of the Scripture; and therefore are of no authority in the Church of God, nor to be in any otherwise approved, or made use of, than other human writings.' This means the exclusion of the A. from the Bible and from use in Church service, which the Puritans demanded in 1639. It was not until 1827, after two years' sharp dispute, that the British and Foreign Bible Society decided to exclude the A. from all its publications of the Bible.

Within the Church of England the number of readings from the A. has been reduced. Originally covering Sept. 27-Nov. 23, in 1867 selections from Wis, Sir, and Bar only are assigned for Oct. 27-Nov. 17, beside some selections for certain holy days. The latter, with readings from To, Wis, and Sir for Nov. 2-20, are retained by the Amer. Epis. Church, while the Irish removes all.

Among non-Episcopal Churches the A. has had in recent years practically no recognition.

On the Continent the movement toward the exclusion of the A. from edd. of the Bible has been slower. The decision of the British Society in 1827 met with a storm of disapproval. The controversy revived in 1850, when numerous works appeared for and against the retention of the A. in edd. of the Bible. Its ablest champions were, among Conservative scholars, Stier and Hengstenberg; among Liberals, Bleek. In the Revision of Luther's Bible (1892) it still stands, with Luther's title.

The long controversy regarding the canonicity of the a^d books, in which the power of tradition and the weakness of reason in matters of religious concern are conspicuously illustrated, may be said to have ended for Protestantism. The modern historical interest, on the other hand, is putting these writings in their true place as significant documents of a most important era in religious history.

APOLLONIA (Ἀπολλωνία).—Apollonia, in Ac 17¹, a town through which St. Paul passed, after leaving Amphipolis, on his way to Thessalonica. It was an inland Græco-Macedonian town in the district of Mygdonia, distant from Amphipolis a day's journey (Liv. xlv. 28) or about 30 miles, and from Thessalonica about 38 miles. It lay not far from the Lake Bolbe, and the Via Egnatia passed through it. Little is known of its history. Its name (so common as to be represented by 33 entries in Pauly-Wiss. RE, three in Macedonia itself, while the most important was A. in Illyria) seems preserved in the modern Pollina (Leake, N.G. iii. 458). WILLIAM P. DICKSON.

APOLLONIUS (Ἀπολλώνιος).—Apollonius, a personal name of frequent occurrence (under which 129 entries appear in Pauly-Wiss. RE), is borne by several persons mentioned in 1 and 2 Mac.

1. The first, in the apparent order of time, is described (2 Mac 3⁵) as son of Thraseus (or Thraseas;—the RV notes the text as probably corrupt, and suggests, as perhaps the true reading, 'Apollonius of Tarsus', and governor (στρατηγός) of Coele-Syria and Phœnicæ under Seleucus IV. Philopator (B.C. 187-175). One Simon, designated as governor (RV guardian) of the temple (2 Mac 3⁴ προστάτης), having had differences with the high-priest Onias concerning 'market-administration' (ἀγορανομίας seems preferable to the common reading παρανομίας), took his revenge by suggesting to Apollonius that the temple at Jerus. contained untold treasures, which might tempt the king's cupidity. A. conveyed the suggestion to Seleucus, and induced him to send Heliodorus his chancellor (RV; not 'treasurer,' AV), to Jerus. to plunder the temple. The devices of Heliodorus, the consternation occasioned by his purpose, and the apparition by which it was baffled, are narrated in 2 Mac 3. In 4 Mac 4¹⁻¹⁴ the attempt is presented as the act of A. himself, and not of Heliodorus.

2. At 2 Mac 4²¹ an A., son of Menestheus, appears, sent by Antiochus Epiphanes as envoy to Egypt on occasion of the 'enthroning' (which seems the best interpretation of πρωτοκλισία or πρωτοκλήσια, literally the first 'sitting on,' or formal 'call to' the throne) of Ptolemy Philometor (in B.C. 173). He may not improbably be the same A. who is mentioned by Livy (xlii. 6) as having headed an embassy sent by Antiochus to Rome.

3. At 2 Mac 5²⁴⁻²⁶ we find an A. sent by Antiochus Epiphanes (in B.C. 166), with an army of 22,000 men, to Judæa, under orders to slay all that were of age for military service, and to sell the women and children. Coming to Jerus. under pretext of peace, he took advantage of the Sabbath, when the Jews were keeping their day of rest, to massacre 'great multitudes.' He is characterised as 'that detestable ringleader' (RV 'lord of pollutions'; μισάρχη, not occurring elsewhere, possibly 'ruler of the Mysians,' but probably 'leader in foul deeds'), while the use of the article seems to point to one previously mentioned, and so suggests his identity with the 'governor of Coele-Syria' (in ch. 3⁵ and 4¹: No. 1 above). The interval of nine years leaves this at least doubtful; but there is less reason to question his identity with the person not named but described at 1 Mac 1²⁹ as 'chief collector of tribute' sent by the Hellenizing king to carry out his policy of destruction. Jos. (Ant. XII. vii. 1) designates him as commandant (στρατηγός) of Samaria (apparently = provincial governor, μεριδάρχης, XII. v. 5), and records his subsequent fall, in conflict with Judas Maccabæus, as does also 1 Mac 3¹⁰⁻¹².

4. At 2 Mac 12² A., 'son of Gennæus,' appears as one of the local commandants who, notwithstanding the covenant that the Jews should have rest and leave to observe their own laws, continued to vex them, and to countenance such attacks on their liberties as the treacherous massacre at Joppa, which Judas hastened to avenge. Nothing more is known of him. The patronymic 'son of Gennæus' distinguishes him from (1) the son of Thraseus and (2) the son of Menestheus; and the suggestion of Winer (RWB s.v., following Luther's rendering edlen), that Γενναίος might be taken as an adjective, 'the well-born,' used ironically (presumably of the latter), is highly improbable; for, as Grimm remarks, the irony would be too covert, and Gennæus occurs elsewhere as a proper name (Pape, s.v.).

5. When Demetrius II. Nikator came forward to claim his father's crown in rivalry to Alexander Balas (about B.C. 148), we learn from 1 Mac. 10⁶⁷⁻⁶⁶ that he appointed (κατέστησεν) A., who was over Coele-Syria; who gathered a great force, challenged Jonathan the high priest as a supporter of Balas, but, after a series of successful manœuvres on the part of Jonathan with the support of his brother Simon, was defeated in battle at Azotus (B.C. 147). From the mode of expression, he would seem to have been previously governor under Balas, and won over by Demetrius; which is the more probable, if he is to be identified with the A. mentioned by Polybius (xxxii. 19. 6 and 21. 2) as the σύντροφος (foster-brother) and confidant of the elder Demetrius, who shared in the plot for his escape from Rome, and may readily have sympathised with the claims of the younger, when he came to assert them. Jos. (Ant. XIII. iv. 3) calls him a Daian, i.e. one of the Dai or Dalæ near the Caspian Sea, and speaks as though he fought against Jonathan in the interest of Balas; but this, as Grimm (in loc.) shows, is much less probable. The circumstance that the A. of Polybius had two brothers, Meleager and Menestheus (xxxii. 21. 2), is a somewhat slender ground for assuming relationship to the son of Menestheus (No. 3 above).

WILLIAM P. DICKSON.

APOLLOPHANES (Ἀπολλοφάνης, 2 Mac 10²⁷), a Syrian killed at the taking of Gazara by Judas Maccabæus. This Gazara is not the well-known town in the Shephelah, near to Nicopolis and Ekron; probably it should be identified with Jazer on the farther side of Jordan, in the Ammonite country (so Rawlinson). See 1 Mac 5².

APOLLOS (Ἀπολλῶς).—An Alexandrian Jew (Ac 18²⁴). Apollonius, of which Apollos is a natural abbreviation, is the reading of Cod. D, the chief representative of the Western text of the Acts, which is here very interesting, and probably presents a genuine tradition. He is described as 'fervent in spirit' (see Ro 12¹¹), as 'an eloquent man' (for λόγιος means this rather than 'learned'), and as 'mighty in the Scriptures,' i.e. well versed in the Gr. OT. He seems to have been connected with Alexandria by early residence as well as by race, for D records that his religious instruction was received ἐν τῇ πατρίδι. He came to Ephesus in the summer of 54, while St. Paul was on his third missionary journey, and there 'he spake and taught accurately the things concerning Jesus, knowing only the baptism of John; and he began to speak boldly in the synagogue.' The precise character of his religious knowledge is not easily determined from these few words. It has been generally held that A.'s instruction in 'the way of the Lord' (v. 25, see Is 40³, Mt 3²) was such as any well-educated Jew might have gathered from teaching like that of the Baptist, based on the Messianic prophecies. This view is confirmed to some extent by the account of what happened when St. Paul returned to Ephesus after A.'s departure. He there found twelve disciples, who being asked, 'Did ye receive the Holy Ghost when ye believed?' returned an answer which showed their ignorance of any distinctive gift of the Holy Spirit. They explained that they had formerly received John's baptism, but willingly accepted the Christian rite at St. Paul's hands. It is probable that these men were disciples of A., and that, having been influenced by his teaching in the synagogues of Ephesus, their knowledge of Christian truth fairly represented his. But Blass (in loc.) points out that the words μαθηταὶ and πιστεύσαντες used of them are never used save of Christians, and thus some knowledge at the least of the Christian story may be supposed to have been theirs. Indeed A. is said (v. 26) to have taught ἀκριβῶς the things concerning Jesus, although he knew only of the baptism of John. And so Blass suggests that, possibly from a written Gospel which had reached Alexandria, A. had learnt the main facts of the Lord's life, and that his ignorance of Christian baptism may be explained by his not having come in the way of Christian teachers. Taking this view, the narrative proceeds naturally: 'But when Priscilla and Aquila heard him, they took him unto them, and expounded unto him the way of God ἀκριβέστερον.' It would seem probable, though the fact is not stated, that A. received baptism at their hands, as his followers in a like case did at the hands of St. Paul. After some stay in Ephesus, A. determined to go to Corinth, an invitation to do so having come to him, according to the Western text, from certain Corinthians who were in Ephesus at the time. They gave him letters of commendation, and when he arrived in Corinth 'he helped them much which had believed through grace; for he powerfully confuted the Jews and that publicly, showing by the Scriptures that Jesus was the Christ' (Ac 18²⁸).

In the spring of 57, A. having returned to Ephesus, we learn from 1 Co (see esp. 1¹² and 3⁵) that there were divisions among the Christians at Corinth, the names of Paul and A. (as well as of Peter) being used as those of party leaders.* The question at issue may have been only as to the relative importance of Paul and A. in the founding of the Corinthian Church; but it seems likely that there was also a difference in the manner in which the gospel was presented by each. Possibly the eloquence of A. as contrasted with St. Paul's rugged style (see 1 Co 2¹⁻⁷, 2 Co 11⁶) appealed to a certain cultivated class at Corinth, and it may be (though for this there is no proof) that some doctrinal differences appeared after the lapse of years. The teaching of A.'s followers may, e.g., have degenerated into Antinomian Gnosticism. However that may be, the Corinthian Church was agitated by bitterly opposed factions as late as the time of Clement of Rome. But it is unlikely that there was any personal disagreement between St. Paul and A. It has indeed been suggested that in 1 Co 2¹, St. Paul has the eloquent A. in his mind, and again in 2 Co 3¹, where he declares that he at least needed no commendatory letters; and it is curious that A. is not mentioned at all as one of the founders of the Christian society at Corinth in 2 Co 1¹⁹. But however we explain these passages, they do not prove anything like serious estrangement. In 1 Co 16¹², St. Paul, probably in answer to an invitation for A., says, 'As touching A., the brother, I besought him much to come unto you with the brethren, and it was not at all his will to come now [for 'not God's will that he should come now']; but he will come when he shall have opportunity.' A. may well have been unwilling to return at a time when his presence would inflame party spirit. The last mention of A. in the NT is in Tit 3¹³. He was then (A.D. 67) in Crete, or was shortly expected there; and St. Paul urges Titus to set him forward on his journey with Zenas,—a kindly message which, while it does not suggest personal intimacy, does not suggest either any difference of interest or hostility of sentiment. Jerome (in loc.) thinks that A. retired to Crete until he heard that the divisions at Corinth were healed, and says that he then returned and became bishop of that city.

It was first suggested by Luther, and the opinion is now widely held, that A. was the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews. See HEBREWS.

LITERATURE.—Conybeare and Howson, St. Paul, vol. ii. ch. xiv. Neander, Planting, bk. iii. ch. vii. Renan, St. Paul, pp. 240, 372 ff. Blass, Comm. on Acts, pp. 201-3, and in Expos. Times, vii. 564; Wright, ib. ix. 8. J. H. BERNARD.

* Field, following Chrysostom, on 1 Co 4⁶, suggests that the names of the real party leaders are not known to us, and that St. Paul substituted for them his own name and that of Apollós. But, though his note is interesting, we prefer to follow the simpler and more usual interpretation in the text.

APOLLYON (Ἀπολλύων 'Destroyer').—The tr. of the Heb. name אַפּוֹלְיוֹן, the angel of the Abyss in Rev 9¹¹, who was king over the destructive locusts. In the Talm. tract Shabbath 55^a we find reference to the angels of destruction (מלאכי חבלה) who accomplish God's purpose on the wicked. They are six in number: Wrath, Indignation, Anger, Destruction, Desolation, and Consumption. Over these are placed Abaddon and Maweth (מָוֶת Death). See Weber, System der Pal. Theol. p. 166 f. These are obviously later Judaic developments of the simpler ideas of OT; for the tendency of Judaism after the Exile, and esp. during the Gr. period, was to interpolate personal mediating activities between the supersensuous and the phenomenal world. But though this enormous development of angelology was stimulated by Hellenic speculative ideas, its ultimate source must be traced to Bab. religion (cf. Schwally, Das Leben nach dem Tode, pp. 146 f.). Respecting the plague-demons of Bab. exorcism and personifications of evil, see Sayce, Hibbert Lect. pp. 306-312; cf. also 327-335.

Another name of like signification to that of A. is the Hellenic Ἀσμοδαίος Asmodæus, a name which occurs in To 3⁸ as that of the evil spirit which slew the seven husbands of Sarah, daughter of Raguel. This is the Græcised form of the Heb. אֶשְׁמֹדַי, 'Destroyer.' The derivation of this name must obviously be sought in the Heb. שָׂמַר 'to destroy.' The etymology which connects it with the Pers. Aêshma daêva, leader of the devas, adopted by Levy in his Chaldee Lex. from Windischmann (Zoroastr. Studien), is by no means so probable. This personification appears to be the same as Ὀλοθρευτῶν of Wis 18²⁸. In the Targ. on Ec 1¹² he is called כְּלַמֵּי רָשָׁעִי 'king of evil spirits.' It is not necessary to refer to the Jewish fables which represent Asmodæus as the offspring of Tubalcain and his sister Noëma. Respecting Paul's use of ὀλοθρευτής (ἡγεμὼν of Ex 12²⁸), introduced by him into the narrative of Nu 16^{12a}, see Heinrici-Meyer on 1 Co 10¹⁰.

The OT conceptions respecting Abaddon may be gathered from a comparison of the passages Job 26⁵ 28²² 31¹². In the first of these the word Abaddon stands in parallelism with Sheôl or the underworld (Hades), just as we find in Pr 15¹¹. Delitzsch in his comment on this last passage endeavours to draw a distinction between Sheôl and Abaddon, the latter designating the lowest depth of Hades; but I see no warrant for this in OT, though in later times we know that such a distinction was made (Schwally, ibid. p. 166, on Lk 16²²⁻²⁶, and Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, i. p. 169). Moreover, in Job 31¹² the same conception prevails in the mind of the writer as in the previous OT passages to which we have referred. So also in Ps 88¹¹, where Abaddon and the grave stand in parallelism. On the other hand, it is worthy of notice that in Job 28²² we find the beginnings of that personification which in later times was to have so extended a development. For in that passage both Abaddon and Death are personified, and words are ascribed to them. Cf. the vivid and dramatic portrayal of the devouring Sheôl in Is 5¹⁴. On the use of אַפּוֹלְיוֹן in the Wisdom literature of OT see art. ABADDON.

APOSTASY.—The Eng. word does not occur. The Gr. ἀποστασία is used twice: (1) in defining the charge made against St. Paul (Ac 21²¹) that he 'taught all the Jews which are among the Gentiles to forsake Moses' (so AV, RV; Gr. ἀποστασίαν ἀπὸ Μωσέως, lit. 'a. from Moses'); and (2) as the word used for the 'falling away' (so AV, RV) which precedes or accompanies the revelation of the 'Man of Sin' (2 Th 2³). See Comm. in loc. and art. MAN OF SIN.

J. HASTINGS.

APOSTLE.—The proper meaning of ἀπόστολος is an ambassador, who not only carries a message like an ἀγγελος, but also represents the sender. So Herodotus (i. 21) of Alyattes to Miletus; (v. 38) of Miletus to Sparta. The influence of Athens diverted it for a time (e.g. Demosth. p. 252) to mean a naval squadron; and in later law ἀπόστολοι were the litteræ dimissoriae by which a case was referred to a higher court. In Hel. Greek it returns to its other meaning. This is not very distinct in 1 K 14⁶ (Alijah ἀπ. σκληρός to Jeroboam's wife), the only place where it is found in LXX, though Symmachus has it clear in Is 18² (that sendeth πρὶν by the sea). So there seem to have been ἀπόστολοι sent from Jerusalem to collect the temple money, and ἀπόστολοι sent by the foreign Jews to bring it to Jerus. Later on, the patriarch at Tiberias had ἀπόστολοι at his disposal (Epiph. Hær. 30, p. 129; Cod. Theod. xviii. 8. 14, where Honorius, in 398, abolishes the whole system of taxation. See Gothofred, ad loc.).

In NT it is found Mt 10² (τῶν δὲ δώδεκα ἀπ.), Mk 6³⁰ (οἱ ἀπ.—those sent forth, v. 7), Jn 13¹⁶ (in the general sense), and frequently in Luke and Paul. Once (He 3¹) of our Lord Himself, which is the thought of Jn 17¹⁸.

After the ascension the number of the Lord's apostles was not fixed at twelve, except in the figurative language of Rev 21¹⁴. Setting aside envoys of men (2 Co 8²³ ἀπ. ἐκκλησιῶν, Ph 2²⁵ ὑμῶν δὲ ἀπ.) and false apostles (2 Co 11¹³, Rev 2²) who needed to be tried (contrast ἐπειρασάς with 1 Jn 4¹ δοκιμάσετε), we have first Matthias, though it is best left an open question whether he was permanently numbered with the Eleven. Of Paul and Barnabas there can be no doubt (e.g. Ac 14¹⁴ οἱ ἀπ. B. καὶ Π.), and of James the Lord's brother very little (Gal 1¹⁹, 1 Co 15⁷ and perhaps 9⁶). Andronicus and Junias at Rome seem to be 'notable' apostles (Ro 16⁷ ἐπίσημοι ἐν τοῖς ἀπ.), and possibly Silvanus also was an apostle. On the other hand, Timothy is shut out by the greetings of 2 Co, Col, Ph, and possibly 2 Ti 4⁵ (εὐαγγελιστοῦ), and Apollos (1 Co 4⁹ is indecisive) by Clement (Ep. 47), who most likely knew the fact of the case.

The first qualification of the apostle was to have 'seen the Lord' (Lk 24⁴⁸, Ac 1⁸, 22, 1 Co 9¹), for his first duty was to bear witness of the Lord's resurrection (e.g. also Ac 2³²). Matthias, Paul, and James (1 Co 15⁷) had this qualification; probably Barnabas, Andronicus, and Junias, who were all of the earliest disciples; and very possibly Silvanus also. On the other hand, it is unlikely of Apollos, hardly possible of Timothy, who were not apostles. We have no reason to suppose that this condition was ever waived, unless we throw forward the Teaching into the 2nd cent. The second qualification was (2 Co 12¹²) the 'signs of an apostle,' which consisted partly in all patience, partly in signs and wonders and powers, and partly again (e.g. 1 Co 9²) in effective work among his own converts.

These, however, were only qualifications which others also held. A direct call was also needed, for (1 Co 12²⁸ ἐθετο ὁ θεός, Eph 4¹¹ αὐτὸς ἐδωκεν) no human authority could choose an apostle. In the case of Barnabas and Saul (Ac 13³) an outward commission from the Church was added; and if Matthias remained an apostle, we must for once assume that the outward appointment somehow included the inward call of the Spirit.

The work of the apostle was (1 Co 1¹⁷) to preach, or (2 Co 5²⁰, Eph 6²⁰) to be an ambassador on behalf of Christ. He was (Lk 24⁴⁸) to be a witness to all nations, and (Mt 28¹⁹) to make disciples of them, so that the whole world was his mission field. There is no authentic trace (legends in Eus. HE iii. 1, and apocryphal works) of any local division of the world amongst the apostles, though (Gal 2⁹) it was settled at the Conference that the Three were to go to the Jews, Paul and Barnabas to the Gentiles. St. Paul's refusal (Ro 15²⁰) to 'build on another man's foundation' was due rather to courtesy and prudence than to any particular assignment of districts to another apostle.

It follows that the apostle belonged to the Church in general, and had no local ties. He had a right indeed (1 Co 9^{4, 5, 14}) to eat and drink and live off the gospel, and to lead about a Christian woman as a wife; but this was all. His life was spent in journeyings, in labours, and distresses (2 Co 6³), standing in the front of danger like (1 Co 4⁹) some doomed bestiarius of the amphitheatre. Certain dwelling-place he had none. The Teaching goes so far as to declare him a false prophet if he stays a third day in one place. St. Paul worked for months together from Corinth and Ephesus; but they were only centres for his work, no settled home for him. Only the unique position of Jerus. seemed to call for a stationary apostle in James the Lord's brother, who, moreover, was not one of the Twelve. John and Philip, and possibly Andrew, only settled down in Asia in their old age.

The apostle's relation to the Churches he founded was naturally indefinite. He would (Ac 14²²) choose their first local officials, start them in the right way, and generally help them with fatherly counsel (1 Co 4^{14, 15}) when he saw occasion. There is no sign that he took any share in their ordinary administration. St. Paul interferes with it only in cases where the Churches have gone seriously wrong. All that he seems to aim at is (1) to uphold the authority committed to him; (2) to check teachings which made the gospel vain, like the duty of circumcision, the denial of the resurrection, or the need of asceticism; (3) to stop corporate misconduct which the Churches themselves would not stop, as when the Corinthians saw no great harm in fornication, or turned the Lord's Supper into a scene of disorder. Questions referred to him he answers as far as possible on general principles, giving (1 Co 7) a command of the Lord when he can, and in default of it an opinion of his own, and sometimes a hint that they need not have asked him. In general, the apostle is not a regular ruler in the same sense as a modern bishop, but an occasional referee like the visitor of a college, who acts only in case of special need.

LITERATURE.—Lightfoot, Gal., Excursus on The Name and Office of an Apostle; Harnack, Texte u. Unters. ii. 1, pp. 93-118; Weizsäcker, Apost. Zeitalter 584-590; Haupt, Zum Verständnis d. Apostolats im N.T., 1806. H. M. GWATKIN.

APOTHECARY is found Ex 30^{25, 35} 37²⁹, 2 Ch 16¹⁴, Neh 3⁸, Ec 10¹, and in every case RV gives perfumer instead. For the ref. is not to the selling of drugs, but to the making of perfumes (נקח spice, perfume; נקח to mix spice or manufacture perfume; נקח a perfumer). But in Sir 38⁸ 49¹ (μυρεψός) RV retains a., though from 49¹ it is evident that the perfumer is meant. J. HASTINGS.

APPAIM (אפאם 'the nostrils').—Son of Nadab, a man of Judah (1 Ch 2^{30, 31}). See GENEALOGY.

APPAREL.—In early Eng. a. is used of household furniture, the rigging of a ship, and the like, but in AV it is confined to clothing. Although the word is now practically obsol., RV (following older VSS) has introduced it some ten times. In 1 S 17^{38, 39} a. replaces 'armour' of AV, very properly, for the reference is to Saul's military dress, not his armour. 1 P 3⁴ RV 'the incorruptible a. of a meek and quiet spirit' is the only instance of a fig. use of the word in the Bible. (Cf.

Ph 2^s, Tindale's tr., 'and was found in his a. as a man,' AV and RV 'fashion'). Apparelled occurs 2 S 13¹⁸, Lk 7²⁵; to which RV adds Ps 93¹ bis (both fig.). See DRESS. J. HASTINGS.

APPARENTLY, only Nu 12^s, and in the old sense of 'openly,' 'evidently,' not as now, 'seemingly': 'With him will I speak mouth to mouth, even a. (RV 'manifestly'), and not in dark speeches.' Cf. Shaks. Com. Err. iv. i. 78—

'If he should scorn me so apparently'.

J. HASTINGS.

APPARITION.—This word does not occur in AV except in the Apocr., Wis 17^s (Gr. ἰνδαλμα, RV 'spectral form'), 2 Mac 3²⁴ (Gr., ἐπιφάνεια, RV 'apparition,' RVm 'manifestation'), and 5⁴ (Gr. ἐπιφάνεια, RV 'vision,' RVm 'manifestation'). The Revisers have introduced a. at Mt 14²⁶, Mk 6⁴⁹ as tr. of φάντασμα (AV 'spirit'). J. HASTINGS.

APPEAL.—I. IN THE OLD TESTAMENT.—There is no provision made in the OT for appeal in the proper sense of the word, that is, for the reconsideration by a higher court of a case already tried. The distinction made in the Law between the competence of higher and lower courts is of a different nature. A 'great matter' must be reserved for the supreme court, while the lower officers are competent to decide a small matter. This distinction is found in one of the oldest parts of the Pent. (Ex 18^{21, 22} [E]), and in Dt 17^{8, 9} [D]. And the allusion to the delays in legal proceedings of which Absalom took advantage, 2 S 15⁴, also points to the antiquity of what is, after all, an obvious device inevitable in a growing nation. The supreme court for the hardest cases was either the king or the priest or the prophet, as the mouth-piece of Jⁿ Himself. The law of Dt 19¹⁶⁻¹⁸ is more like real appeal, for there a 'controversy' and 'false witness' seem to be presupposed before 'the judges make diligent inquisition'; but probably the first proceedings were rather administrative than judicial, and it hardly amounts to a second hearing of the case on appeal. According to 2 Ch 19¹¹ Jehoshaphat placed Zebadiah over the judges whom he appointed city by city throughout Judah; but it does not follow that he was to hear appeals from the local courts.

For the appellate jurisdiction of later times, see SANHEDRIN.

II. IN THE NEW TESTAMENT.—Ac 25, 26, and 28¹⁹. St. Paul was liable to be tried either by (1) a Jewish, or by (2) a Roman court. (1) The Roman government at this period allowed the authorities of each synagogue to exercise discipline over Jews, only they were not allowed to put any one to death. The Sanhedrin at Jerusalem appears to have had more moral weight and a wider jurisdiction (Ac 9² 26¹²), but not larger legal powers (Jn 18³¹); and the incidents of Ac 7⁵⁸ 22⁴ 26¹⁰ are to be regarded as in the eye of the law cases of lynching, at which the Roman government connived. A Roman citizen was entitled to claim exemption from the jurisdiction of the synagogue, but nevertheless St. Paul submitted to it five times (2 Co 11²⁴, Ac 28¹⁹).

(2) He was also liable to be brought before the Roman governor in charge of the province or district (Ac 18¹² etc.).

When, then, Festus asked him whether he was willing to go up to Jerusalem and there be judged 'before me' (Ac 25⁷), it is not clear whether the proposal was that he should be tried (1) by the Sanhedrin in the presence of Festus, or (2) more probably by Festus himself at Jerusalem rather than Caesarea, on the pretext that the charge could be better sifted there; but if so, why is the prisoner's consent necessary (Ac 25^{9, 20})? In the one case St. Paul 'appeals' from the Jewish tribunal to the Roman, invoking Caesar himself as supreme magistrate, because Festus was about to surrender him to the Jewish authorities (see Ac 25¹). In the other case he 'appeals' from Festus the delegate (procurator) to the legal governor of the province, viz. Caesar himself. It is further not clear whether the alternative in Ac 25^{12, 25} was that St. Paul should be released at once (Ac 26³² 28¹⁸), or that he should be compelled, in spite of his 'appeal,' to stand his trial at Jerusalem. This last is not impossible, for we learn from other sources (e.g. Suetonius, Galba 9) that at this time even a Roman citizen could not insist on being sent on to the supreme court from that of a provincial governor, who had the power of life and death (jus gladii); but only it was at his peril that the governor refused such an appeal. It was not uncommon for the governor in such a case to write to the emperor for instructions. The appeal in St. Paul's case has no connexion with either the provocatio ad populum, or the appeal to the tribunes of the plebs, as they existed under the Roman Republic. (See Mommsen, Römisches Staatsrecht, ii. 258, 931.)

W. O. BURROWS.

APPEASE.—To a. in its mod. use is to propitiate an angry person. In this sense is Gn 32²⁰ 'I will a. him with the present'; 1 Mac 15⁴⁷ 'Simon was a^d toward them' (RV 'reconciled unto them'); and Is 57⁶ RV 'shall I be a^d for these things?' Everywhere else in AV a. has the obs. meaning of to quieten (which is the orig. meaning, ad pacem, to 'bring to peace'), as Ac 19³⁵ 'when the town-clerk had a^d (RV 'quieted') the people'; Pr 15¹⁸ 'But he that is slow to anger ath strife'; Est 2¹ 'when the wrath of king Ahasuerus was a^d' (RV 'pacified'); Sir 43²⁸ 'he ath the deep' (RV 'hath stilled'); 2 Mac 4³¹ 'Then came the king in all haste to a. matters' (RV 'settle matters').

J. HASTINGS.

APPERTAIN.—To 'a. to' is (1) to belong to, of actual possession: Nu 16³² 'all the men that a^d unto Korah' (אֲנָשֵׁי קֹרַח אֲשֶׁר עִתְּרוּ אֵלָיו); Lv 6⁴ 'give it unto him to whom it ath'; Neh 2⁸ 'the palace which a^d to the house.' (2) To belong to, of right or privilege: To 6¹² 'the right of inheritance doth rather a. to thee than to any other'; 2 Ch 26¹⁸ 'It ath not unto thee, Uzziah, to burn incense' (1611 ed. 'pertaineth not,' so RV, Heb. אֲשֶׁר לָיְתָה); Bar 2⁶ 'To the Lord our God ath righteousness' (RV 'belongeth'); 1 Es 8³⁰, 1 Mac 10^{40, 42}, 2 Mac 15³³. (3) To be appropriate: Jer 10⁷ 'Who would not fear thee, O King of nations? for to thee doth it a.' (אֲנָשֵׁי אֱלֹהִים); 1 Es 1¹² 'they roasted the Passover with fire, as ath' (so RV; Gr. ὡς καθήκει, as is fitting. Cf. Lv 5¹⁰ εὐψέχει 'according to the ordinance'). See PURTENANCE. J. HASTINGS.

APPHIA.—A Christian lady of Colossæ, a member of the household of Philemon, very probably his wife. Her memory is honoured in the Greek Church on Nov. 22, as having been stoned to death at Colossæ with Philemon, Archippus, and Onesimus in the reign of Nero; but the authority for this fact is unknown. The name is Phrygian, being frequent in Phrygian Inscriptions under the varying forms 'Αφία, 'Αφφία, 'Αφφιας. In Philem. (v. 2) the best attested reading is 'Αφία; but 'Αφφία, 'Αμφία, 'Αππία are also found, and the Latin VSS vary between Apphiæ, Apphiadi, Appiæ. In the latter case it was probably assimilated to the Latin Appia (Lightfoot, Coloss. p. 372; Menæon, November, pp. 143-147). W. LOCK.

APPHUS ('Αφφους, Σαφφους Α, Σαφφους κ V, Apphus (Vulg.), אֲפֹחֻס (Syr.), 1 Mac 2⁵ 'Αφφους (Jos. Ant. XII. vi. 1)), the surname of Jonathan the Maccabee. The name is usually thought to mean 'Dissembler' (שׁוֹמֵר); and some suppose that it was given to Jonathan for his stratagem against the tribe of the Jambri, who had killed his brother John (1 Mac 9³⁷⁻⁴¹).

H. A. WHITE.

APPIUS, MARKET OF (Ἀππίου φόρον, AV Appii Forum, Ac 28¹⁵), was one of the two points on St. Paul's journey to Rome at which he was met by Christian brethren from the capital. It was situated 43 miles from Rome, on the great Appian military highway, which formed the main route for intercourse with Greece and the East. As a station where travellers halted and changed horses, it naturally became a seat of traffic and local jurisdiction. It was, moreover, the northern terminus of a canal (fossa) which was carried alongside of the road, and was used, as we learn from Strabo (v. 233), for the conveyance, chiefly by night, of passengers in boats towed by mules. Horace has (Sat. i. 5) preserved a vivid picture of the place, with its boatmen, innkeepers, and wayfarers, cheating, carousing, and quarrelling, amidst an accompanying plague of gnats and frogs from the Pomptine marshes.

WILLIAM P. DICKSON.

APPLE (תַּפּוּחַ tappuah).—The conditions to be fulfilled by the tappuah are that it should be a fine tree, suitable to sit under (Ca 2³): 'As the apple tree among the trees of the wood, so is my beloved among the sons. I sat down under his shadow with great delight.' It should be of size sufficient to overshadow a booth or house (Ca 8⁵): 'I raised thee up under the apple tree; there thy mother brought thee forth; there she brought thee forth that bare thee.' It had a sweet fruit (Ca 2³): 'and his fruit was sweet to my taste.' It also had a pleasant smell (Ca 7⁸): 'and the smell of thy nose like apples.' It was used to revive a person who was languid (Ca 2⁵): 'Stay me with raisins, comfort me with apples; for I am sick of love.'

The apple fulfils all the conditions perfectly. It is a fruit tree which often attains a large size, is planted in orchards and near houses, and is a special favourite of the people of Palestine and Syria. It is true that the fruit of the Syrian apple is far inferior to that of Europe, and especially to that of America. Nevertheless it is a favourite with all the people, and in a few places fine varieties have been introduced and thriven well. Doubtless such an epicure as Solomon would have had many of the choicest kinds. Almost all the apples of Syria and Palestine are sweet. To European and American palates they seem insipid. But they have the delicious aroma of the better kinds, and it is for this quality that they are most prized. It is very common, when visiting a friend, to have an apple handed to you, just to smell. Sick people almost invariably ask the doctor if they may have an apple; and if he objects, they urge their case with the plea that they only want it to smell. If a person feels faint or sea-sick, it likes nothing better than to get an apple to smell. It is an everyday sight to see an apple put over the mouth of the small earthenware water pitcher (called in Arabic abraq) to give a slight aroma of apple to the water. The first thing with which the capricious appetite of a convalescent child is tempted is an apple, which he fondles and squeezes with his fingers to develop the aroma, but perhaps never so much as bites. A very favourite preserve is also made of the apple.

It will be seen by these facts that the apple fulfils all the conditions of the tappuah. Add to this that the Arabic name tiffah is identical, and noway ambiguous as to its signification, and the evidence is complete. There is no other fruit which at all realises all these conditions. The quince has a sour, acerb taste, never sweet. The citron was probably introduced later than OT times; it has a fruit with a thick rind, eatable only after a very elaborate process of preserving with sugar. The pulp is never eaten in any form. The orange is a fruit introduced from the Spanish Peninsula during the Middle Ages. Its name, burdekan, is a corruption of the Arabic name for Portugal, bartughal. It was probably not known to the Hebrews. The apricot is not a fruit with any special fragrance, and is never used as the apple to refresh the sick. A further confirmation of the identity of tappuah with tiffah, the Arabic for apple, is the present name Teffah for Beth-tappuah (Jos 15⁵⁵).

The 'pictures of silver' (Pr 25¹¹) in which apples of gold are said to be placed, may have been filigree silver baskets for fruit. The Oriental silversmiths excel in the manufacture of such ware.

G. E. POST.

APPLE OF THE EYE (lit. 'child [יְשׁוּעָה, dim. of יְשׁוּעָה man] of the eye'; sometimes נַח 'daughter of the eye.' Ps 17⁸, in combination, נַח יְשׁוּעָה 'as child, daughter of, the eye.' Once, Zec 2⁸, נַח 'the opening, door, of the eye') is the 'eyeball,' or globe of the eye, especially the pupil or centre, the organ of vision; composed of exceedingly delicate and sensitive structures, carefully shielded from external injury. It is enclosed in the bony orbit, supported behind and on the sides by a quantity of loose fat, protected above by the eyebrows, and in front by the eyelashes and eyelids, the lids closing instinctively in presence of danger. The surface is kept continually moist by an almost imperceptible flow of tears. Hence its preciousness makes it a fitting emblem of God's unceasing and tender care for His people, as in Dt 32¹⁰, Ps 17⁸, Zec 2⁸. In Pr 7² the same figure represents the preciousness of the divine law; and in La 2¹⁸ continuous weeping is enjoined because of the terrible calamities that had befallen the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

S. T. GWILLIAM.

APPOINT.—In earlier Eng. this word had a considerable range of meaning, and there are many examples in AV of obsol. or archaic uses. To a. is literally 'to bring to a point,' i.e. fix or settle. 1. If the point in question is between two or more persons, then it means to agree, as Jg 20³⁸ 'Now there was an a^{ed} sign between the men of Israel and the liars in wait.' Cf. Job 2¹¹ 'Job's three friends . . . had made an appointment together to come to mourn with him and to comfort him.' 2. If it is one's own mind that is to be brought to a point or settled, then a. means to resolve, as 2 S 17¹⁴ 'The Lord had a^{ed} (RV 'ordained') to defeat the good counsel of Ahithophel.' 3. If it is other persons or things, then a. means (a) to make firm, establish, as Pr 8²⁹ 'He a^{ed} (RV 'marked out') the foundations of the earth.' (b) To prescribe or decree, as Gn 30²⁸ 'A. me thy wages, and I will give it'; 2 S 15¹⁵ 'Thy servants are ready to do whatsoever my lord the king shall a.' (RV 'choose'); 2 Es 3⁷ 'thou a^{edst} death in (RV 'for') him'; Is 30³² RV 'every stroke of the a^{ed} staff' (Heb. מַטְעָה מִטְעָה 'staff of foundation,' AV 'grounded,' RVm 'of doom'); 1 Co 4⁹ 'a^{ed} (RV 'doomed') to death'; 1 Th 5⁹ 'God hath not a^{ed} us to wrath.' (c) To set apart, as Job 7³ 'wearisome nights are a^{ed} to me'; Ac 1²⁸ 'they a^{ed} (RV 'put forward') two, Joseph . . . and Matthias.' Hence (d) to assign to some purpose or position, as Lk 10¹ 'the Lord a^{ed} other seventy also.' In this sense a. is used with 'out' in Gn 24⁴⁴ 'the woman whom the Lord hath a^{ed} out (RV 'a^{ed}') for my master's son'; Jos 20² 'A. out for you (RV 'assign you') cities of refuge.' Last of all (e) in Jg 18¹¹⁻¹⁷ a. means to furnish or equip: 'six hundred men a^{ed} (RV 'girt') with weapons of war.' With which cf. Shaks. Tit. And. iv. ii. 16—

'You may be armed and appointed well'; and Tindale's tr. of Lk 17^s 'Apoynyt thy selfe and serve me.' J. HASTINGS.

APPREHEND is twice used in AV in the still customary sense of 'making prisoner,' Ac 12^d, 2 Co 11³²; but RV turns a. into 'take' in both passages, in order to make the tr. of the verb (πιδάω) uniform. See Jn 7³⁰, 32, 44 8²⁰ 10³⁹ 11⁵⁷ 21³, 10, Ac 3^r, Rev 19²⁰. In Ph 3¹², 13 a. is found in the nearly obsol. sense of 'laying hold of,' and is used fig., 'If that I may a. that for which also I am a^{ed} (RV 'was a^{ed} by') Christ Jesus' (Amer. RV 'laid hold on'). To those, the only examples of a. in AV, RV adds Jn 1⁵ 'And the light shineth in the darkness, and the darkness a^{ed} it not' (AV 'comprehended,' RVM 'overcame,' with a ref. to Jn 12³⁵ 'that darkness overtake you not,' where the Gr. verb καταλαμβάνω is the same); and Eph. 3¹⁸ 'that ye . . . may be strong to a.' (same Gr., AV 'may be able to comprehend'), 'a minute and over-careful change,' says Moule. See COMPREHEND. J. HASTINGS.

APPROVE.—This word has now settled down into the meaning of 'to think well of'; examples are Ps 49¹³, La 3³⁶. But in other passages we see it only approaching this meaning, and that from two sides. We may a. of a thing if its worth is tested by us, or if it is demonstrated to us. Hence (1) to test, or a. after testing (Gr. δοκιμάζω or δόκιμος): Ro 16¹⁰ 'Salute Apelles, a^{ed} in Christ,' 21⁸ and Ph 1¹⁰ 'thou a^{est} the things that are excellent' (RVM 'provest the things that differ'), Ro 14¹⁸, 1 Co 11¹⁹ 16³, 2 Co 10¹⁸ 13^r, 2 Ti 2¹⁵, and in RV Ro 14², 1 Th 2^r, Ja 1¹².* And (2) to demonstrate, or a. after demonstration: Ac 22^a 'a man a^{ed} of God among you (RV 'unto you') by miracles' (ἀποδείχμενον εἰς ὑμᾶς, 'a strong word = clearly shown, pointed out specially or apart from others; it expresses clearness, and suggests certainty.'—Page and Walpole, Acts, p. 18); 2 Co 6⁴ 'in all things a^{ing} ourselves as the ministers of God' (συνιστάμεν, RV 'commending'); 7¹¹ 'Ye have a^{ed} yourselves to be clear in this matter' (συνιστάμεν, RV as AV). Cf. Pref. to AV (1611) 'We do seek to a. ourselves to every one's conscience.' J. HASTINGS.

APRON (ἱμάτιον, Gn 37; σμικκίνθιον (semicinctium), Ac 19¹²).—The OT instance is sufficiently explained by the context. That of Ac 19¹² was a wrapper of coloured cotton, in shape and size resembling a bath-towel, worn by fishermen, potters, water-carriers, sawyers, etc., as a loin-cloth; worn also by grocers, bakers, carpenters, and craftsmen generally, as a protection to their clothes from dust and stains, and as something to wipe their perspiring and soiled hands upon. St. Paul would wear an a. when making tent-cloth. The laboriousness of his life at Ephesus for the support of himself and others is referred to in the farewell words at Miletus (Ac 20³⁴). Handkerchiefs and aprons were chosen (Ac 19¹²) because they were light and portable, and of the same shape for all. The incident referred to is in intimate agreement with Oriental feeling. Superstition carries it to

* Craik (English of Shakespeare, p. 147) points out that a. in the sense of prove or test is very frequent in Shaks. He quotes Two Gent. of Verona, v. iv. 43—

'O, 'tis the curse of love, and still approved,
When women cannot love where they're beloved.'

And he says: 'When Don Pedro in Much Ado about Nothing (ii. i. 394) describes Benedick as "of approved valour," the words cannot be understood as conveying any notion of what we now call approval or approbation; the meaning is merely that he had proved his valour by his conduct.'

disgusting excesses, as when the foam is taken from the lips of one fallen insensible after the Moslem religious dance (zikr), or when torches are frantically lit from the holy fire at Jerusalem. But the underlying thought is that healing power being from above must prefer consecrated channels.

APT has lost its orig. meaning of 'fitted,' which has been taken up by the compound 'adapted.' This, however, is the meaning of apt in the Bible: 2 K 24¹⁶ 'all of them strong and a. for war' (πρῶτον ψυγ), 1 Ch 7⁴⁰; 'a. to teach' (διδασκατικός), 1 Ti 3², 2 Ti 2²⁴. J. HASTINGS.

AQUILA (ἄκβλας, 'an eagle').—The first mention which we have of Aquila in Scripture is in Ac 18², where he is described as 'a certain Jew . . . a man of Pontus by race.' It has been conjectured that St. Luke here fell into a mistake, and should rather have described A. as belonging to the Pontian gens at Rome, a distinguished member of which bore the name of Pontius Aquila (see Cic. ad Fam. x. 33; Suet. Jul. Cæs. 78). But for this there is no warrant beyond the similarity of the names; while, as further confirming A.'s connexion with Pontus, we know that the A. who in the 2nd cent. translated the OT into Greek was a native of that country (compare also Ac 2⁹, 1 P 1¹). Along with Priscilla or Prisca his wife (see PRISCILLA), A. had taken up his abode in Rome, but had to flee owing to a decree of Claudius, in A. D. 52, expelling the Jews (Suet. Claud. 25 says, 'Judaeos impulsore Chresto assidue tumultuantes Roma expulit.' For the meaning to be attached to the passage, see Neander, Pflanzung, I. p. 332, note 2; Lightfoot on Philippians, p. 16, note 1; Plumtre, Bibl. Studies, p. 419). That the decree, however, did not remain long in force, is proved by the mention of a number of Jews in Rome shortly afterwards (Ac 28¹⁷), and by A.'s own return (Ro 16^r). From Rome A. sought refuge in Corinth, where he received the apostle Paul on his second missionary journey. It has been debated whether A. had embraced Christianity before meeting Paul, or whether he owed his conversion to the apostle. Against the former view it is urged, that if he had been a Christian at the time of Ac 18², he would have been described by the common name of μαθητής or disciple; against the latter, that if Paul had brought him to the truth, the fact would hardly have remained unrecorded, and further, that community of occupation rather than community of belief is specially mentioned as having brought the two together. In the absence of fuller information it is impossible to decide the question with certainty; but the ready welcome which A. evidently accorded to one whom the bulk of his fellow-countrymen viewed with such disfavour as Paul, inclines us to the belief that when he came to Corinth he had at least accepted the first principles of the Christian faith, though his progress and growth in it he doubtless owed to the apostle. If so, he and his wife may be ranked as amongst the earliest members of the Christian Church at Rome; and it would be from them that Paul would learn those particulars regarding the state of that Church to which he afterwards refers in his Ep. (see Ro 1⁸ 16¹⁷⁻¹⁹). After about eighteen months' intercourse in Corinth, A. and Priscilla accompanied Paul on his way to Syria, as far as Ephesus, where they remained behind to carry on the work, amongst those coming under their influence being Apollos (Ac 18²⁴⁻²⁸). They were evidently still at Ephesus when 1 Co was written; and their house had come to be regarded as the meeting-place of one of those little groups of believers into which, without any definite organisation, the Church was then divided (1 Co 16¹⁹; cf. Ro 16³, 16). From Ephesus Aquila and Priscilla returned to Rome, partly perhaps on account of some great danger they had run on Paul's behalf, the warmth of the apostle's greeting proving, further, the general esteem in which they were held (Ro 16^a). Eight years later we find them again at Ephesus (2 Ti 4¹⁹). The frequency of these changes of abode has caused difficulty, but, apart from the fact that an itinerant life was strictly in accord with all that we know of the Jews of that day, what more natural than that A. and Priscilla should again desire to revisit the city whence they had been driven, as soon as it was safe to do so, even supposing they were not specially sent by St. Paul to prepare for his own coming? (See Lightfoot, Philippians, p. 176; Sanday and Headlam, Romans, p. xxvii and p. 418 ff.).

After 2 Ti 4¹⁹ A. is not again mentioned in Scripture, and the evidence of tradition regarding him is very scanty.

AR (אֵר Dt 2⁹, comp. עִיר 'city,' or אֵר-נוֹבָא Nu 21²⁸, Is 15¹), on the south bank of the river Arnon, on the northern border of the Moabite territory, situated in a pleasant valley where two branches of the river united (Nu 21¹⁵ 22³⁶ 'the city of Moab' = Ar of Moab). It is possibly the same as Kerioth (Am 2², Jer 48²⁴⁻⁴¹). It is also almost certainly referred to in Dt 2²⁶ as 'the city that is by the river,' AV, or rather, 'in the valley,' RV (Heb. לְהַ, LXX φάραγξ). The ruins of Rabbah, though often identified with Ar, lie, not on the banks of the Arnon, but at least 10 miles farther S., and represent a later city built after the old Ar had been destroyed by an earthquake in B.C. 342.

ARABAH (אֲרָבָה).—This word occurs only once in the AV (Jos 18¹⁸) in the description of the border of the lot of Benjamin; but in RV it has a more extended meaning, and is applied to at least a portion of the great valley (Wady el Arabah) which stretches from the Gulf of Akabah into the Jordanic basin. 1. In the former sense the name applies to the broad plain of alluvial land stretching from the N. shore of the Dead Sea along the right bank of the Jordan for a distance of about 50 miles, and bounded on the W. by the broken line of steep slopes and precipitous cliffs which close in the valley from its junction with the Wady el Jōseleh southwards to the heights of Kuruntāl and the shore of the Dead Sea itself. The surface is composed of successive terraces of gypseous marl and loam, rising by steps from the river's edge to a height of 600 ft., and marking the successive levels at which the waters stood when they were receding to their present limits. Nearly all authorities are now agreed that the plain we are considering was the site of the doomed cities Sodom and Gomorrah, and afterwards of the Jericho of Joshua and the more modern city in the time of our Lord. The climate is tropical and the soil rich; and being abundantly supplied with water from the Wady el 'Aujah, the Kelt, and the Mākuk, with natural fountains such as the 'Ain es Sultān and 'Ain Dūk, it may well have deserved the title bestowed upon it even in the days of Lot, 'the garden of the Lord' (Gn 13¹⁰). Near the banks of the Kelt is situated the miserable village of Er-Riha, probably the ancient Gilgal, surrounded by gardens producing lemons, oranges, bananas, figs, melons, and castor-oil trees. The copious spring of Es Sultān breaks out near the base of the limestone escarpment of Kuruntāl, and its waters are caught in a basin of solid masonry forming the ancient baths. The temperature of the water in the pool, taken on 15th January 1884, was 71° Fahr., but that of the spring itself is doubtless higher. The locality is rich in natural history objects, especially birds, of which Tristram records the bulbul (Ixos xanthopygius), the hopping-thrush (Crateropus chalybeus), the Indian blue kingfisher (Alcyon smyrnensis), the sun-bird (Cinnyris osea), Tristram's grackle (Amydrus tristrami), besides innumerable doves, swallows, and commoner species.

2. In the latter sense the Wady el-Arabah corresponds to the 'Wilderness of Zin' in part (Nu 34⁸), where it went up to the border of Edom on the E. Its limits are stated above; and from the Gulf of Akabah to the Ghōr the distance is about 105 miles. At its S. end the Wady el-Arabah rises gradually from the shore of the Gulf of Akabah, lined by a grove of palms, for a distance of 50 miles, and with an average breadth of 5 miles; and at this point, nearly opposite Mount Hor, it attains its summit level of (approximately) 723 ft. above that of the Red Sea, or 2015 ft. above that of the Dead Sea.*

On the E. the Arabah is bounded by the high escarpment of Edom (Mount Seir), often broken through by deep ravines which descend from the table-land of the Arabian desert; except along these ravines, the valley is almost destitute of herbage. On the W. side the Arabah is bounded by terraced cliffs of cretaceous limestone, along which the great waterless plateau of the Badiet et-Tih (Wilderness of Paran, Gn 21²¹, Nu 12¹⁶) terminates. The floor of the Arabah is generally formed of gravel, blown-sand, or mud flats; and these are sometimes hidden beneath vast débâcles of shingle brought down by torrents from the heights above and spread fan-like over the sides of the valley at the entrance to the ravines. The surface of the sandhills is often marked with the footprints of gazelles, and, to a smaller degree, of hyenas and leopards; and at intervals water can be had at springs or wells, of which the best known are the 'Ain el-Ghudyān and the 'Ayun Ghurundel at the entrance to the valley of that name.

Near the watershed (or saddle) at the limestone ridge of Er-Rishy the Arabah is contracted to a breadth of half a mile; but to the N. of this as it begins to descend towards the Dead Sea basin (the Ghōr) it widens out to a breadth of 10 miles, and follows the course of the principal stream, El-Jeib, which receives numerous branches from the Edomite mountains on the E. and the Badiet-et Tih on the W. These streams are fed by thunderstorms in the winter months; but the Jeib is probably perennial; and along its banks, from the 'Ain Abu Werideh for several miles, thickets of young palms, tamarisks, willows, and reeds line the course of the stream. At this spot, which is 24 miles from the banks of the Dead Sea, and at the level of the Mediterranean (1292 ft. above the Dead Sea), are to be found those remarkable lacustrine terraces of marl, sand, and gravel, with numerous semi-fossil shells of the genera Melanopsis and Melania, which attest the extent to which the waters of the Dead Sea had risen in the Pleistocene period. Other terraces of marl are to be found at intervals as the traveller descends towards the margin of the Ghôr; and here the valley breaks off in a semicircular line of cliffs formed of sand, gravel, and marl, which encloses the Dead Sea shore, and seems to be referred to in Jos 15⁹ as the 'Ascent of Akrabim.'

* The height of the watershed above the sea-level was determined by Major Kitchener and Mr. Armstrong in 1883 to be 660 ft., and by M. Vignes in 1880 to be 240 mètres, or 787 ft., mean 723 ft.; or 2015 ft. above the surface of the Dead Sea.

Geology.—The Jordan-Arabah depression owes its existence mainly to the presence of a line of 'fault,' or fracture of the crust, which may be traced at intervals from the G. of Akabah to the E. shore of the Dead Sea and onwards towards the base of Hermon. This line follows closely the base of the Edomite escarpment, and its effect is to cause the formations to be relatively elevated on the E. and depressed towards the W. Thus the cretaceous limestone (corresponding to the English chalk formation) which forms the crest of the Edomite escarpment and the plateau of the Arabian desert above Petra, at an elevation of 3000–4000 ft. above the valley, is brought down on the W. side of the same valley to its very floor at Er-Rishy, and forms (as stated above) that side of the valley throughout its whole length, breaking off in cliffs of nearly horizontal strata. The more ancient rocks which lie at the base of the Moabite and Edomite escarpment never reach the surface along the W. side of the Wady el-Arabah.* These consist of red granite and gneiss, various metamorphic schists, seamed by dykes of basalt, diorite, and porphyry; above which the carboniferous and cretaceous sandstones are piled in huge masses of nearly horizontal courses, the whole surmounted by the pale yellow beds of cretaceous limestone reaching to the summit of the escarpment. The richness of the colouring of the cretaceous sandstones, varying from orange through red to purple, has been a source of admiration to all travellers, particularly as it is displayed amongst the ruined temples and tombs of the city of Petra.†

Historical.—The Wady el Arabah appears to have been twice traversed by the Israelites: first on their way from Horeb to Kadesh Barnea, and afterwards when obliged to retrace their steps owing to the refusal of the king of Edom to allow them to pass through his land (Nu 20²¹, Dt 2⁸). No passage for the host by which to circumvent Mount Seir was practicable till they reached the stony gorge of the Wady el Ithem, which enters the Arabah 4 miles N. of Akabah. Traversing this rough and glistening ravine under the rays of an almost vertical sun, it is not surprising that (as we read) 'the soul of the people was much discouraged because of the way' (Nu 21⁴). In later times the Arabah became a caravan route from Arabia to Pal. and Syria. The fort and harbour of Akabah (Ezion-geber) now constitute an outpost for the Egyp. Government, beyond which its authority does not extend; the Arabah, as well as the Arabian desert, being held by independent Arab chiefs.‡

Dean Stanley concurs with the view expressed above, that it was through the Wady el Ithem (W. Ithm) that the Israelites passed on their way to Moab after their retreat from Edom (Sinai, p. 85).

‡ The head waters of the G. of Akabah are fringed by an extensive grove of the date palm (Phoenix dactylifera), together with some specimens of the rarer doum palm (Hyphæne Thebaïca), which is also found in Upper Egypt and on the banks of the Atbara. These trees are probably indigenous, as the old name of Akabah was 'Elath,' which means a 'grove of trees' (Dt 2⁸).

ARABIA (אֲרָבָה, Ἀραβία), the name given by the Gr. geographers to the whole of the vast peninsula which lies between the mainlands of Asia and Africa. Of the application of the name in the Bible some account is given under ARABIAN; this article will contain a brief account of the country itself, and of the references to it in the sacred books.

i. GEOGRAPHY AND GEOLOGY.—The shape of A. was compared by Pliny to that of Italy, but the breadth of the former is greater in comparison with its length; the length of the W. coast-line is about 1800 miles, while its breadth is about 600 miles from the Red Sea to the Pers. Gulf. The Sin. peninsula, which divides the Red Sea at its N. end into the Gulf of Suez on the W. and the Gulf of Akabah on the E., is ordinarily reckoned to A., of which the sea forms the boundary on the W., S., and E. sides. On the other hand, the N. limit is not so easily fixed. Some writers would draw an imaginary line from the head of the Gulf of Akabah to that of the Pers. Gulf; but this would cut the S. extremity of the Hamad, or stony plain which rises from the level of the Euphrates, and a little N. of 29° suddenly alters into the broken dunes of red sand called by modern writers Nefud. It seems best, therefore (with the most recent authorities), to extend the application of the name A. throughout the Hamad, making the Euphrates for the greater part of its course the N. boundary; Syria, which separates it from the Mediterranean, forming, between about lats. 32–36°, its E. neighbour.

For an incalculable period the sea has been receding from the Arabian coast, at a rate reckoned at 22 mètres yearly. Hence the peninsula is, esp. on the W. and S. sides, fringed with lowlands, called by the Arabs Tihamah; yet on parts of the E. coast the mountains rise directly from the sea. Of the long coast-line on the W. side, much is fringed with coral reefs, greatly endangering navigation. Between these and the shore in many places a narrow passage allows only ships of small burden to pass. The reefs commence in the Gulf of Akabah, where alone has their nature as yet been made the subject of minute investigation (see Valter, 'Die Korall-riffen der Sinai. Halbinsel,' Abhandl. d. Sächs. Akad., Math. Klasse, vol. xiv.). The inlets in the coast form not a few harbours, of which, however, owing to the paucity of towns in the interior, only a few are of any importance: Yanbo, the port of Medina; Jiddah, the port of Mecca; Hodaida, the port of Sa'na, on the W. coast; Aden on the S.; Mascat on the E. Of these, Aden perhaps is the same as the port which bears the name Eden in Ezk 27²³, called Athene by Pliny, and Eudaimon Arabia by the author of the Periplus; while Yanbo may be the Ἰαμβία of Ptolemy. The rest were not known to the ancients, whose ports have for the most part disappeared with the advancing coast-line. Of these, the chief port of the incense country, Moscha according to the Periplus, Abissa Polis according to Ptolemy, has been recently identified by Mr. Theodore Bent (Nineteenth Century, Oct. 1895) with a creek two miles long and in parts one wide near the village of Takha. Others that played an important part in ancient times, Leuke Kome, Charmotas or Charmutas, Okelis, Muza, and Canneh (Ezk l. c.), have been located with more or less certainty by Wellsted, Sprenger, Glaser, and other explorers. While the W. and S. coasts are broken by no very striking peninsulas, the sea which lies between A. and Persia is divided by the peninsula which ends in Ras Mesandum into the Pers. Gulf and the Sea of Oman, while the Pers. Gulf is again broken by the peninsula of Katar, to the W. of which lies the island of Bahrain, with the exception of Socotra on the S. side, the most important of the islands which lie off Arabia.

The geological character of A. is thus described by Mr. Doughty: 'The constitution of the Arabian peninsula appears to be a central stack of Plutonic rocks which are granited with traps and old basalts, whereupon are laid sandstones (continuous with those of Petra, and probably "cretaceous"), and limestones (sometimes with flints) overlies the sandstones. Newer rocks are the volcanic, and namely of the vast "harrahs": the flint land of gravel (upon limestone with flint veins) that is A. Petraea, in which were found flint instruments (as those of Abbeville) by Mr. Doughty at Ma'n, 1875; and ancient flood soil, block drift, loams or clays in the valleys and low grounds.'

The land won from the sea constitutes the lowlands (called by the Arabs Tihamah), which fringe the peninsula, and beyond which there rise ranges of mountains on all three sides. On the N. the great Nefud, which succeeds to the stony plain, occupies the centre of the peninsula, with a greatest breadth of 150 miles, and a greatest length of 400 miles. Of this wilderness of red sand the most accurate description has been given by W. H. Blunt (in Lady Blunt's Pilgrimage to Nejd, vol. ii. app. i.). Far greater, however, is the untrodden desert (Ahkaf) which cuts off Central A. from the E. and S.E. provinces. The sand of these wastes has peculiar properties, which, according to Blunt, render them as different from other deserts as a glacier is from a mass of snow. To the S. of the former Nefud rises the Jebel Aja, a red granite range, stretching E. by N. and W. by S. for some 100 miles, with a mean breadth of 10-15 miles, and rising to a height of 5600 ft. (Blunt, l.c.). To similar heights do the mountains rise which shut in the peninsula on the W. and E. sides; Wellsted gives the measurement 6500 ft. for the peak of Mowilah (S. of the Gulf of Akabah), while 9000 ft. is the height of some portions of the Jebel Akhdar, or Green Mountains, which tower over Oman in the E. (according to the latest researches of Mr. Theodore Bent, Contemp. Rev. Dec. 1895). To the same height, according to W. B. Harris (A Journey through Yemen, 1894), do the passes by which Yemen is entered from the S. rise in places; and if the measurements of this writer are correct, the plateau of central Yemen, in the S.E., has an average altitude of 8000 ft. Farther to the E. this southern range sinks till, where it separates the incense country from the desert (about 55° long. E. of Greenwich), its elevation is not above 3000 ft.

Between the mountains and the Nefud in North A. lies El-Hisma, the great sandstone country, described by Doughty as 'a forest of square-built platform mountains, which rise to 2000 ft. above the plain; the heads may be 6000 ft. above sea-level.' Between lat. 26° and 20° vast tracts form what are called harrahs, beds of basalt, where the sandstone is covered with lava. The most northerly of these volcanic platforms, called Uwayrid, stretches for 100 miles in length, its middle point being about 120 miles from the Red Sea. It is thickly strewn with the craters of extinct volcanoes, so thickly that in places as many as thirty can be seen at once. The highest of these peaks, called Anaj, is 7600 ft. About lat. 16° this phenomenon is repeated. We owe descriptions of it to Doughty and Glaser.

Of the rivers of A. none are navigable; few are perennial, or reach the sea. Some such, however, have been marked in South A. by the travellers Wellsted and W. B. Harris. Most of them disappear in the sand at some part of their course. Instead of a river system there is a system of wadys, great receptacles for the water brought down by the mountains, of which the surface for large portions of the year is dry, but where water can be got by digging. Such in North A. is the Wady Sirhan, which bisects the country in a line parallel with the Euphrates; in Central A., the Wady el-Dawasir and Wady el-Rummah, N. and S. of Yemamah respectively, both issuing in the Pers. Gulf—with the former of these, or with one great tributary of it, Glaser (Skizze, ii. p. 347) would identify the Biblical Pishon; and the Wady el-Humd, first traced by Doughty, which traverses the Hijaz, and issues in the Red Sea. At Saihut (long. 51°), on the S. coast, there issues the Wady of Hadramaut, once probably an arm of the sea, which in its course of 100 miles receives a series of wadys that drain the mountains behind it; while the mountains of Yemen proper are drained by wadys called Maur, Surdud, Siham, Kharid, etc., of which the course was traced by Glaser ('Von Hodaida nach San'a', in Petermann's Mittheilungen, 1886).

The classical writers divided A. into A. Felix, A. Petraea, and A. Deserta. This division was based on the political condition of A. in the 1st cent. A.D., the first being free, the second (inclusive of Idumaea) subject to Rome, the third subject to Persia. In the native divisions different principles, as Sprenger (All. Geog. Arab. p. 9) has pointed out, have been confused. According to a tradition which he quotes, Mohammed, standing at Tebuk (about 28° 0', 37° 40'), said that all to the N. was Sham (lit. the left, ordinarily used for Syria), all to the S. Yemen (the right). According to this, the name for the province of Mecca, Hijaz (lit. 'the barrier') would mean the land between Sham and Yemen. More probably it meant the 'middle region' between the lowlands and the Nejd (highlands). These last, then, are terms of physical geography; and as those by whom they were applied had no accurate instruments for determining heights, it is natural that the limits of these provinces should be very inexactly fixed. According to Blunt (l.c. i. 23 sqq.), Nejd includes all the land that lies within the Nefuds, 'the only doubt being whether it includes the Nefuds or not.' The treble division, Hijaz, Nejd, and Yemen, would thus include all A. within the Tihamas; Nejd itself being subdivided into seven provinces, whose names need not be given here. Ordinarily, however, it is not customary to extend the application of the name Yemen beyond 45° E. of Greenwich. Yet the name Hadramaut, applied in European maps to the vast region which extends hence to the S.E. of the peninsula, has been shown by Wellsted and Bent to be properly applied to a wady about 100 miles in length. Great discrepancies exist as to the delimitation of the province of Oman on the E. side, which, according to Palgrave (Travels, ii. 255), 'touches Hadramaut on the S., and Katar, or at least its immediate vicinity, on the N., forming a huge crescent, having the sea in front, and the vast desert of South A. for its background'; while the travellers Wellsted and Bent give the name a very limited application.

ii. CLIMATE, FLORA, AND FAUNA.—The fertility of portions of Yemen is so great as to have become proverbial in antiquity; and the few modern travellers who have climbed the mountains which tower above the S. coast, and have reached the tablelands beyond, speak with enthusiasm of the wealth of the soil, and the high degree of skill displayed by the natives in cultivating it. The greater part of the peninsula, however, is capable of supporting but a small population. 'Nothing like one-third of its surface,' says one of the most capable explorers, 'is cultivated without irrigation, the task of extending which beyond the valleys and natural oases is probably beyond the power of Turk or Arab. Vast spaces of unchangeable and unchanging barrenness spread themselves over it. Joining themselves to these are larger and scarcely less dreary regions, occupied by precipitous mountains accessible only to the goat; by labyrinthine sandy ravines or gorges bearing only the hardiest shrubs; and by tepid cultivated palm-oases, thick with semi-tropical vegetation' (Tweedie, The Arabian Horse). It must be observed that even in Yemen, according to Glaser (Petermann's Mittheilungen for 1884), cultivation even in this century has been steadily diminishing. Thus the plateaus between the basalt peaks were once cultivated, but are so no longer. Cultivation is indeed confined to the oases, which, of varying extent, enliven the stony plain, and to the valleys which intersect the central plateau, 'some broad, some narrow, some long and winding, some of little length, but almost all bordered with steep and sometimes precipitous banks, and looking as though they had been artificially cut out of the limestone mountain' (Palgrave). In some of the more northerly oases not only cereals, but fruits such as the plum, the pomegranate, the fig, the great citron, sour and sweet lemons, are cultivated. The palm, which has been compared to the camel for its small need of water, is widely spread, and its dates form the staple food of the nomad population. No part of the country, however, except perhaps the desert called Ahkaf, is quite destitute of vegetation; this has been proved in the case of the Nefud by Blunt, and Doughty assures us that the harras form better Bedawin country than the sandstone.

The flora and fauna of A. are still imperfectly known. Glaser (Von Hodaida nach San'a) states that he has himself collected out of South A. more than a hundred specimens of animals and birds previously unknown. In the Nefud, Blunt 'ascertained the existence of the ostrich, the leopard, the wolf, the fox, the hyæna, the hare, the jerboa, the white antelope, and the gazelle; and of the ibex and the marmot in Jebel Aja; of reptiles the Nefud boasts, by all accounts, the horned viper and the cobra, besides the harmless grey snake; there are also immense numbers of lizards. Birds are less numerous . . . yet in the Nefud most of the common desert birds are found.' Of animals the most characteristic of A. is undoubtedly the camel, the ability of which to go without water 'twenty-five days in winter and five in summer, working hard all the time,' renders it of unique service in the desert; the 'observations on the camel' in Baron Nolde's Reise nach Inner-arabien, 1895, ch. vii., form the latest contribution to our knowledge of this creature, with which the early Arabian poets are fond of parading their acquaintance. No less elaborate are their descriptions of the Arabian horse, seen at its best in the highlands of Nejd, of which special studies have been made by many English travellers, and most recently by the English officer, Major-General Tweedie, who would seem to have proved that the home of this animal is elsewhere. The ass is to be seen at his best in the province of Hasa, to the N.W. of the Pers. Gulf.

iii. HISTORY AND ETHNOLOGY.—Of the history of A. during the period covered by OT, little is known, since the records begin much later. Some notices, however, have been collected by Assyriologists from the cuneiform inscriptions of campaigns in which the 'Arabs' were concerned. In 854, Shalmaneser II. met in battle a confederation in which was 'Gindibu the Arab' with 1000 camels. In the next century Tiglath-pileser III. makes an expedition into A., and in the latter half of it we find Assyrian influence extending over the N.W. and E. of the peninsula; and in the following century many tribes which can be identified with more or less certainty as occupying localities in inner A. were defeated by Esarhaddon at Bazu (Buz). From these inscriptions, interesting as they are, we learn, however, little more than the names of states and occasionally of kings, many of which offer easy Arab. etymologies. The peninsula might seem to have been occupied by a number of independent tribes, subordinate to no central authority, —a state of things to which the difficulty of communication has very frequently reduced it. Nor is much more light to be obtained from the classical authors, who till the beginning of the 3rd cent. B.C. had only vague ideas about the peninsula. Great collections of inscriptions have, however, been made both in N. and S. Arabia by European scholars, esp. Arnaud, Halévy, and Glaser; and although many of the most remarkable of these still await publication, the Arabian states, of which merely the names had been recorded by Pliny and Ptolemy, and of which only a vague tradition circulated among the Arabs, have become far more familiar than formerly, and something has been learnt about their lines of kings, the extent of their territory, and their wars and alliances. To the Eng. travellers Wellsted and Cruttenden belongs the merit of having first called attention to the existence of the ruined cities in South A., whence the most important of these documents have been brought. Of the nations thus rescued from oblivion the most important were the Minæans (the מִנְיָאִים of the Heb. records) and Sabæans, whose dialects differed in certain particulars, while both had more in common with Heb. than with Arabic. A third monarchy, of which the indigenous name was Lihyan, has left traces of its existence and its language in North A., but far less distinct in their nature than those of the former two.

The chief towns of the Minæans were Ma'in, Karnau, and Yatil, all of them in South A.; yet the presence of Minæan inscriptions at El-'Ula in North A. would seem to show that their power was not confined to the S. of the peninsula, and some scholars would extend it as far N. as Gaza. While D. H. Müller would make the Minæan empire simultaneous with the Sabæan, arguments are adduced by Glaser and Hommel which make it probable that the latter State was one of several that sprang out of the ruins of the Minæan empire. Of these arguments, besides the greater antiquity of the Minæan character and dialect, may be noticed the fact that most of the names occurring in the Minæan inscriptions are prehistorical, while those in the Sabæan inscriptions can frequently be identified; that the Minæans are not mentioned in the Assyrian inscriptions, and must therefore have been powerful at an epoch prior to the intervention of the Assyrians in the affairs of A.; that whereas Saba is mentioned in some Minæan inscriptions, the Minæans are never mentioned in those of Saba. It is urged, on the other hand, that the acquaintance with the Minæans shown by Gr. writers and in late parts of the Bible (1 Ch 44, Job 21st LXX) is inconsistent with the hoary antiquity assigned them; to which the answer given by Glaser, that the classical writers are acquainted with them as a nation but not as an empire, is perhaps insufficient. The Minæan rule of El-'Ula is thought to have extended over at least nine generations (Hommel, Aufsätze, p. 27); and the statement in Jg 10th (cf. 2 Ch 20), that the Israelites before they had kings had been saved from the Minæans, implies that their power extended far north. Like other Oriental States, it is probable that the power of Ma'in varied greatly with the capacity of particular rulers; for, while from the Inscr. Halévy 504 it might appear that the Minæan king Waqah-il Yatha' was a vassal of the king of Kataban, his son Il-yafa-Yathar was a great conqueror, who extended his rule over the whole region S. of Jauf from E. to W. Lastly, we may notice as of great historical interest the Inscr. Halévy 535, which tells us of their successful resistance of an invasion of Saba and Haulan, and how their god Athtar saved them from trouble in a war that broke out between the king of the N. and the king of the S. This invasion of Saba was, if Glaser's theory be correct, one of a series of attacks continued for a period of 200 years, during which the princes of Saba were endeavouring to undermine the Minæan power,—an end achieved (according to the same scholar's reckoning) about 820 B.C. Both the inscriptions and the Bible tell us more of Saba, the tribe whose kings were the chief power in the south of A., till about A.D. 300 they gave way to the Abyssinians. Their capital was Marib (Mariaba of the classics), some 45 miles E. of San'a, famous for the great dam, the breaking of which was regarded by the Arab chroniclers as the immediate cause of the decline of the Sabæan empire (Sheba, Saba). The Sabæan empire was, without doubt, simultaneous with monarchies of Kataban, Hadramaut (with its chief town Sabata), Raidan, and Habashah, all of which are mentioned as included in a treaty in an interesting inscription commented on by Glaser (Die Abyssinier in Arabien, p. 68 ff.), and assigned by him to the 2nd cent. B.C. Habashah, corresponding with the region now known as Mahra, was, according to the same author's calculations, absorbed by Hadramaut about A.D. 45; the Katabanian state (with Timna for its capital) was ruined at some time in the 2nd cent. B.C.; and from an inscription of extraordinary interest, published on p. 118 of the work last quoted, we learn how the prince of Raidan and Himyar was defeated by the king of Saba in spite of the former's alliance with Habashah, and from that time (B.C. 115?) the kings of Saba style themselves kings of Saba and of Raidan. When the Katabanians disappear from the inscriptions, the Himyar (the Homeritæ of the classical authors) come into prominence; and at the commencement of our era the south of A. was shared by three monarchs, of Himyar, Hadramaut, and Saba with Raidan. Aided by the Sassanians, the Himyars presently became all-powerful in South A.; in the middle of the 4th cent. the monument of Adulis tells us that the Sabæan power had been overthrown, and the Abyssinians became rulers of Yemen; in 378 the Arabs had made head against the Abyssinians, and indeed confined them to the Tihamah, but in 525 the Abyssinians, with the countenance of the Byzantine empire, in a victorious campaign killed the king of the Himyars.

The condition of A., as represented by the authors of the inscriptions, is very different from the nomad and patriarchal condition which we ordinarily associate with the name Arab, and which is certainly associated with it in the Bible. The Sabæans and Minæans are people of fixed habitations; they build fortresses, and live in walled cities; they raise massive temples, and construct works of irrigation on a grand scale. War forms only an occasional incident in their lives; the main source of their wealth is commerce; and besides agriculture, they carry on mining and manufactures. Texts containing 'ordres de police' give evidence, says M. Halévy, 'd'une haute perfection d'organisation civile, et de l'existence d'un code pénal chez les Sabéens.' Their inscriptions are, many of them, specimens of the most finished workmanship, and show signs of the cultivation of other fine arts; nor can their civilisation be shown to have been derived from any other nation. Their Pantheon, says the same writer, was marvellously rich, and of prodigious variety. The temples of both the chief races were built east of the towns, which would point to the worship of the sun; yet this cannot be shown to have existed among the Minæans; neither do the Minæan documents show the worship of Al-Makah, the chief Sabæan deity. Common to both was the worship of Attar (the male Ashtoreth), who in Minæan texts appears in the two forms of שרקן and עירן, which, in the opinion of D. H. Müller, mean the rising and setting sun. Two female deities, Wadd and Nikrah, interpreted by the same writer as 'Love' and 'Hate,' also occupy an important place in the Minæan Pantheon.

Yet from the nature of things civilisation of this kind can only have existed in South A. and the oases; the life of the dwellers in the 'black tents,' as described by Burckhardt and Doughty in this century, must have existed from immemorial time in the desert. Several writers, indeed, suppose the difference between the nomad Arabs and the stationary Arabs to be one of race; and, strange as it may seem, the purest Arab blood is supposed to be found in the latter ('aribah); while the name of the former contains the idea of Arab by adoption (muta'aribah). Neither half of the Arab stock can be traced with any probability to any other country; and ethnologists are now with something like unanimity making A. the home of the whole Semitic race; and the emigrations of the Shammar and Anezah clans northwards in search of richer pasturage than the Aⁿ deserts afford, emigrations which have taken place within the last century, represent the continuation of a series of similar waves of which the commencement is prehistoric, all brought about by the same causes, though not all following the same direction. The fact that the names by which they call their towns and villages, as well as the natural features of their country, are all Arabic, and bear no trace of the memory of another home, is, as Gen. Tweedie has pointed out, strikingly in favour of the theory which makes the Arabs autochthonous.

This autochthony naturally does not exclude the presence of a certain number of colonists. Four Greek colonies are mentioned by Pliny, Ampelone, Arethusa, Chalkis, and Larissa, of which the first only seems capable of identification; Glaser (Skizze, ii. 154) tries to find it on the coast of Hijaz. Being a Milesian colony, it must have been planted not later than the 6th cent. B.C. The name Javan, mentioned in Ezk 27¹⁹ in a context which points to A., is possibly to be interpreted of a Gr. colony in the peninsula; and the statement of Diodorus (iii. 43), that a tribe on the W. coast of A. cultivated friendly relations with Greeks of Bœotia and the Peloponnesus, may have been rightly connected with the existence of these colonies by Glaser (l.c. p. 155). Jewish colonies also existed in A. long before the time of the Prophet Mohammed; in the 3rd and 4th cent. A.D. they would seem to have been favoured by the Persians in opposition to the Christian communities which had the support of the W. empire (Die Abyssinier in Arabien, p. 175).

The ethnological tables of Gn would seem to take special note of the inhabitants of A., who are assigned places in the human family in the following passages: Gn 10⁷ (children of Cush), 10²²⁻²³ (children of Shem), 10²⁵⁻³⁰ (children of Eber), 25¹⁻⁴ (children of Abraham and Keturah), 25¹²⁻¹⁸ (Ishmaelites). The eminent explorer Carsten Niebuhr argued from the number of places in Yemen and Hadramaut mentioned by 'Moses' in these places that the legislator must himself have travelled in the country; but his attempts at identifying them do little towards confirming this proposition. More elaborate attempts have been made in more recent times, notably by Glaser in his Skizze, ii. 314-470, without, however, producing many convincing results. The tables are not quite consistent, as the same names are assigned different pedigrees; but this Glaser would account for by supposing the tables compiled at different periods between the 11th and the 6th cent. B.C. Some of the names, such as Sheba and Dedan, are known from other parts of Scripture, and are otherwise famous; a few, e.g. Hadramaut (הדרמאوت), can be identified with certainty; several, esp. Ophir and Havilah, are frequently mentioned in Scripture, but are difficult to localise. Most of the names, however, occur in these tables only; and as we are quite ignorant of the sources from which their compiler drew, endeavours to localise them would seem to have little scientific value. They doubtless signified to the compiler tribes or nations; but the ordinary rule for the interpretation of these patronymic pedigrees, according to which the fathers stand to the sons in the relation of genus to species, cannot be applied to them. Thus the great nation of Sheba is called a son of Ra'mah (probably the Regma of Ptolemy, a town on the Pers. Gulf, Glaser, p. 252), which is co-ordinated with it in Ezk 27²², and Ra'mah itself a son of Cush. Still stranger is it that the patriarch of the Arab nations, including Ophir and Hadramaut, Joktan, should have left so little trace in A. that Sprenger (Geog. p. 50) is fain to identify the name with Bishat Yakzan, a station on the incense road. Glaser, perhaps with greater probability, connects it with Katan, a town of Hadramaut. It is probable, therefore, that these tables, so far from being exact, are as vague as might be expected in the case of so vast and unexplored a country. Even Saba, which we know to have been a powerful empire, is vaguely spoken of by the prophets as a distant country (Jer 6²⁰, Jl 3⁸), in NT as at the ends of the earth (Mt 12⁴², Lk 11³¹).

iv. TRADE AND COMMERCE.—The chief importance of A. to the ancients lay in its exports, of which the most renowned was incense, a gum obtained from a certain tree by incisions made in the bark. The country where this product is cultivated is a narrow strip of the S. coast from about 53-55° long. E. of Greenwich, its headquarters being the ancient city of Dafar (probably the דפר of Gn 10⁹). After doubts had been cast even on the possibility of A. producing incense (see the excursus on this in Ritter, Erkunde von Arabien), this region was visited by Mr. Theodore Bent in 1895, who described the industry in the Nineteenth Century for Oct. of that year. It is uncertain whether its cultivation ever extended over a much greater area than now.

Sprenger (Geog. p. 299) regards the incense country as 'the heart of the commerce of the ancient world,' owing to the vast amount of it required for religious rites, and terms the Arabs, or, more nearly, the inhabitants of the incense country, 'the founders of commerce as it existed in the ancient world.' It is perhaps noteworthy that the verb 'Arab' and its derivatives are used in Heb. to signify 'commerce.' The incense traffic of A. is alluded to by all the ancient writers who speak of that country, and it formed the basis of the proverbial wealth of the Sabæans, who regulated it with the utmost precision and severity (see Sprenger, l.c. pp. 269-303). Reference is made to this in the locus classicus for ancient commerce, Ezk 27²². Other scents and spices are also mentioned as Arabian exports; but we notice as interesting the observation of Glaser (l.c. p. 426), that the particular spices mentioned in Ezk 27¹⁹ as exported from a place we have grounds for locating in South A. do not really grow there. Almost as famous as the incense was the Arabian gold. The gold used by Solomon for gilding the temple is stated (2 Ch 3⁸) to have come from Parwaim, which is plausibly identified by Glaser (l.c. 347) with Sak-el-Farwain, a place mentioned by the Arabian geographer Hamdani, who has preserved many notices of gold mines at one time worked in Central A. (see Sprenger, pp. 49-63, and Glaser, p. 347 ff.). And since in Gn 10²⁹ Ophir, which by the time of the composition of the Bk of Job has become a synonym for gold, is called a son of Joktan, various scholars have attempted to localise that famous gold-producing region somewhere in Arabia; and there are still more forcible reasons for placing there the land of Havilah, 'where is gold, and the gold of that land is good' (Gn 2¹¹), which Glaser has endeavoured to identify with the province Yemamah. Precious stones, as well as gold and spices, were brought by the S. Arabian queen to Solomon (1 K 10²); and these are mentioned by Ezk (27²²) as the merchandise of Saba. The exportation of iron from Uzal, if that be the right reading, and if the tradition which identifies Uzal with San'a be correct (Ezk 27¹⁹), would agree with the fact that the steel of Sana is still in high repute; moreover, Mr. Doughty found places in Central A. where iron might be worked with profit. In the same passage of Ezk, Kedar and North A. are made to deal in cattle, and Dedan in horse-cloths. There is further mention in 27²⁴, if the text be correct, of embroidered textures 'in well-secured chests' from Eden (and perhaps other S. Arabian ports). This would correspond with the high state of civilisation which from the inscriptions we know the S. Arabians at early times to have attained. Sprenger, ZDMG xlii. 332, states that before the time of Islam leather was the chief export of Arabia.

D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

ARABIAN.—This word is used in different senses. 1. In Is 13²⁰ and Jer 3² it stands for 'an inhabitant of the desert or steppe' (Heb. עַרְבִי from עָרַב, without any indication of nationality).

2. In the pre-exilic authors we read occasionally of a tribe called collectively עַרְבִי, rendered in the EV 'Arabia' (1 K 10¹⁵, Jer 25²⁴, Ezk 27²¹). As the consonants of this word are the same as those of the word rendered 'mingled people' (Jer 25²⁰ etc.), and also of the word rendered 'evening,' it is not always certain which should be read. Thus in Is 21¹⁸ the word rendered in EV 'Arabia' should more probably be tr. 'evening'; while in 2 Ch 9¹⁴ the punctuation which signifies A. is substituted for the 'mixed tribes' intended by the punctuators of 1 K 10¹⁶. These 'Arabians' are also mentioned in the Assyr. inscriptions (see ARABIA), where the name of one of their kings is given. Herodotus (iii. 5) also speaks of an Arabian king through whose territories the Pers. king Cambyses had to obtain a pass before he could cross the desert to Egypt; and the same historian gives us the name of a port on the Mediterranean belonging to the Arabs, of which the name (Ienysus) can be easily interpreted from the Arabic (cf. anisa), but of the existence of which we possess no other notice. The Arabian territory, according to this author, was wedged in between lands belonging to the 'Syrians.' In the Bible this tribe is connected with Dedan and Kedar, and is probably therefore to be located in N. Arabia; the fact that it had a king makes it probable that it possessed some fixed habitations or towns, since that word is ordinarily associated with a royal residence. The etymology of the name, like most names of nations, is hidden in obscurity.

3. In the post-exilic records, where we meet with the word, it ordinarily signifies Nabatean. In 2 Mac 5⁸ we read of Aretas, the king of the Arabians; now Aretas was the name of several of the Nabatean kings, as we know from their own inscriptions; and Procopius speaks of Petra as the capital of the Arabs, whereas it was famous as the capital of the Nabateans. The Romans, who from the time of the ill-starred expedition of Ælius Gallus (B.C. 24), in which the Nabateans were their allies against the Arabs, had good cause to distinguish the two races, do not often confuse them; yet both Diodorus and Procopius (quoted by Quatremère) fall into this mistake. By the term 'Arabia,' then, St. Paul (Gal 1¹⁷ 4²⁵) probably means the territory of the Nabateans, which in the period of their greatest prosperity extended from the Euphrates to the Red Sea. One of their kings was the Aretas whose ethnarch in Damascus endeavoured to arrest St. Paul (2 Co 11³²). The misapplication of ethnic names is exceedingly common; and in this context it may be noticed that in the Sabæan inscriptions the Sabæans distinguish themselves from the Arabians (عرب; see J. Dérenbourg in CIS iv. fasc. 2, p. 93), with whom classical antiquity identified them. Perhaps 'Nabatean' is the sense to be attached to the name 'Arabian' applied to Nehemiah's opponent Geshem (Neh 2¹⁹), or Gashmu (Neh 6⁸), whose name in its latter form bears a genuinely Nabatean appearance. The important part played by this race was first pointed out by Quatremère in his Étude sur les Nabatéens (1835), the results of which were condensed by Ritter in his Erdkunde von Arabien (1846, i. p. 111 ff.). The inscriptions discovered at Madāin Sālih by Mr. Doughty (Documents épigraph. recueils dans le nord de l'Arabie, Paris, 1884), and recopied by Euting (Nabat. Inschrif. 1885), have thrown considerable light on their language, institutions, and history. Having originally come from Mesopotamia, this tribe profited by the weakness of the last Bab. kings to seize Petra, the ancient capital of the Idumæans. The unique position of this fortress at the meeting-place of three great commercial routes was the source of the wealth which enabled them to attain a remarkable degree of civilisation and luxury. Their first appearance in history is in B.C. 312, when, according to Diodorus (xix. ch. 95 sqq.), they successfully resisted Athenæus, the general sent against their fortress by Antigonos, king of Syria; their last in A.D. 106, when A. Petraea was turned into a Rom. province by Cornelius Palma. The possession of Damascus by Aretas IV. ('Philopatris,' mentioned in several of the Madāin Sālih inscriptions) is to be ascribed to a temporary arrangement of the emperor Gaius. The fact that the Nabatean empire extended to El-Hijr, called afterwards Madāin Sālih, is certified for the time of Augustus by the Rom. records. The notices of the Nabateans in ancient literature are put together by von Gutschmidt in the appendix to Euting's Nabateische Inschriften.

4. The employment of the name Arab for an inhabitant of any portion of the vast peninsula known to us as Arabia, begins somewhere in the 3rd cent. B.C., though the only trace of it in OT is in 2 Ch 21¹⁶, where the 'Arabians that are near the Ethiopians' would seem naturally to refer to the neighbours of the Habashah, whom there are grounds for placing in the extreme S. of Yemen; it is not, however, clear how these tribes could interfere in Jewish politics. In 2 Ch 26⁷ God is said to have helped Uzziah against 'the Arabians who dwelt in Gur-Baal,' and the Minæans; as this notice is not found in 2 K, its accuracy is open to suspicion; moreover, the name Gur-Baal bears no trace of Arabian nomenclature, and only vague conjectures can be hazarded about its situation. Equally uncertain is the use of the name in 2 Ch 17¹¹. An Arab prince Zabdiel is mentioned in 1 Mac 11¹⁷ as murdering the Syrian king Alexander Balas, who had taken refuge in 'Arabia'; and another Imalkuæ, or Iamblichus, as rearing the same Alexander's son (11³⁹). The residence of these princes, according to Diodorus (Excerpt. 32. 1), was called 'Aḡal. D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

ARABIC VERSIONS.—Arab. VSS of the Bible have been made from various sources, chiefly Gr., Syr., and Coptic. It is, however, most improbable that any Christian Arab. literature is as old as the time of Mohammed. There were Christians in the Arab. kingdom of Ghassân, E. of Damascus, and at Nejrân in S. Arabia, but, to judge from our very scanty historical information about the progress of the Church in these regions, the ecclesiastical language was Syriac.* It was not till after the success of the Koran had made Arabic into a literary language, and the conquests of Islam had turned large portions of Christian Syria and Egypt into Arabic-speaking provinces, that the need of translations of Scripture in the Arabic vernacular was really felt.

The extant forms of NT in Arabic are best divided according to the languages from which they are derived. Thus we have—(i.) translations from the Syriac; (ii.) translations directly from the Greek; (iii.) translations from the Coptic; at a later period we have also (iv.) eclectic combinations of the first three classes. It will be convenient to take the various divisions of NT separately.

THE FOUR GOSPELS.—(i.) Trs. from the Syr.—The oldest representative of this class, perhaps the oldest monument of Arab. Christianity, is the tr. of the Gospels in a MS formerly belonging to the Convent of Mar Saba near Jerus., now Cod. Vaticanus Arab. 13, called by Tischendorf ar^{vat} (Greg. cod. 101), and generally assigned to the 8th cent.† From some Gr. Iambics at the end of the MS we learn that it originally belonged to a certain Daniel of Emesa, and contained the Psalter, the Gospels, the Acts, and all the Epp.; of these only fragments of the Gospels‡ and the Pauline Epp. now remain. The style is somewhat paraphrastic, but internal evidence conclusively shows that the Gospels have been tr. not directly from the Gr., but from the Syriac Vulgate (Peshittâ).§

This free tr. from the Syr. Vulg. was probably made in some locality where Syr. had been the ecclesiastical language, and seems to have been

* Ibn Ishâc about the middle of the 8th cent. A.D. (Wüstenfeld's Ibn Ishâc, p. 150) quotes Jn 15²³⁻²⁶ as a prophecy concerning Mohammed; but the words are only a rough rendering from the 'Palestinian' Syr. version, not a quotation from an already existing Arab. tr. See Guidi, Ev. p. 6.

† The only accurate description of Vat. Arab. 13 is in Guidi, Ev. p. 8. Considerable extracts from the MS are given in Scholz, Krit. Reise, pp. 118-124.

‡ Mt 10²⁷—middle of 26, Mk 5²⁹⁻³⁰, Lk 7¹¹—beginning of 10.

§ E.g. in the account of the Temptation (Lk 4¹⁻¹³), Syr. Vulg. and ar. vat exactly agree in the names of the Evil One. In vv. 1. 3. 6 and 13 § διαβολος is rendered by Syr. Vulg. 'the

Accuser'; ar. vat has المجال 'the Slanderer,' and in v. 1

المجال الواشي 'the calumniating Slanderer' (for the rendering of المجال see 2 Ti 3³ in all Arab. VSS). But in v. 5 Syr. Vulg. has 'Satan,' so ar. vat. has الشيطان. The Arab. VSS not derived from the Syr. have in all these passages ابليس (=δίαβολος), but in v. 8 they insert يا شيطان to render the Gr. σατανᾶ, a word here omitted by both Syr. Vulg. and ar. vat.

It is worth noticing in this connexion that Syr. Vulg. and ar. vat alone among critical authorities agree in inserting the name 'Jesus' in Lk 4¹⁷.

Ar. vat has been wrongly cited (e.g. by Tischendorf) as omitting the 'last twelve verses' of Mk. It is owing to accidental loss of leaves that the MS breaks off just before the end of Mk 16⁸, thus:—فلم يقولوا لاحد شيئا لانهما كانتا— as Prof. Guidi has been kind enough to ascertain for this article.

soon discarded at Mar Saba for a more literal version made directly from the Greek. In other words, the Gospel text of ar. vat was already obsolete by the 9th cent. A.D. No other Arabic version can claim such a high antiquity.*

Another tr. from the Syr. Vulg. is found in cod. Tisch. 12 at Leipzig (Greg. cod. 75), a bilingual Syr.-Arab. MS of the 10th cent., brought to Europe by Tischendorf from the Syrian Convent of St. Mary Deipara in the Nitrian desert. A few leaves are at the British Museum (addl. 14467). This MS has been fully described by Gildemeister. The tr. keeps closely to Syr. Vulg., but some renderings recall the phraseology of ar. vat, e.g.

ليس لي بأهل in Mt 10^{27a} for 'is not worthy of me.' This idiomatic phrase is not used in the later Arab. VSS.

Here may be noticed the Arab. VS of Tatian's Diatessaron, which has been edited in full from two MSS at Rome by Ciasca (Eng. tr. by Hamlyn Hill). This VS was made, in the early part of the 11th cent., by the well-known scholar Abu'l Faraj ibn et-Tayyib from a form of the Syriac Diatessaron in which the text had been almost wholly assimilated to Syr. Vulg. It is therefore nearly worthless as an authority for the text, though most valuable for recovering the arrangement of Tatian's Harmony.

(ii.) Trs. from the Gr.—An Arab. tr. made directly from the Gr. appears in some MSS of the 9th cent., such as cod. K. ii. 31, in the Propaganda at Rome, and the fragments of Tischendorf's 'Lectionary' now at Leipzig (Greg. cod. 76). Both MSS come from Mar Saba.† Very similar to these is the Sinai MS Arab. 75.‡ These MSS have the Gr. τίτλοι and liturgical notes. They are perhaps ultimately derived from a bilingual Gr.-Arab. uncial MS generally quoted as Θ^b, of which only four leaves remain, one in its original home at the Convent of St. Catherine on Mt. Sinai, and three in the collection of Bp. Porphyry.§

(iii.) Trs. from the Coptic.—Most MSS of the Copt. (Bohairic) NT are accompanied by an Arab. VS. Among these cod. Vat. Copt. 9, written in 1202 A.D. (Greg. cod. Copt. 30) seems to have been used as a kind of standard text.¶ We shall see later on that the text of this MS is the ultimate source of all the printed edd. of the Gospels in Arabic.

(iv.) The two Eclectic Revisions.—None of the Arab. texts hitherto considered have been in any sense an official VS, and they present all the confusing variety natural in such independent productions. The need of a more fixed type, and one which took account of all three great national Vulgates of the E.,—the Gr., the Syr., and the Copt.,—was felt by the 13th cent., especially in Egypt, where Arabic had quite supplanted the native dialect.

The first revised ed. of this kind was made about 1250 A.D. at Alexandria by Hibat Allâh ibn el-'Assâl. This work, of which several MSS survive, consists of a revised text of the Gospels with various readings from the Gr., the Syr., and the Copt.¶ It was, however, found too cumbersome for a popular VS, and towards the end of the 13th cent. was

* Some of the missing portions of ar. vat in Mt have been supplied in a hand of the 10th cent. From the style and vocabulary they seem to have been copied from the original MS before the leaves were lost.

‡ Mrs. Gibson, Cat. of Arab. MSS, frontispiece.

§ The Arab. text of the Sinai leaf is printed by Dr. Rendel Harris in Mrs. Lewis' Cat. of Syr. MSS, Appx. p. 105. It seems to be the conjugate of one of Bp. Porphyry's leaves.

superseded by the modern 'Alex. Vulgate.' This is little more than the text of Vat. Copt. 9, filled out by inserting from the Syr. or the Gr. those numerous passages where the ancient Copt. VS did not contain words found in Syr. Vulg. and in the Gr. text of the Middle Ages. In many MSS of this Alex. Vulg. (ar. alex.) these passages are indicated by marginal notes.*

Besides these main types of text there are several later MSS of the Gospels in Arabic in which the language has been corrected or embellished. Guidi (Evv. p. 29) also mentions some late MSS from Spain which appear to present a tr. of the Latin Vulgate.

The printed edd. of the Gospels in Arabic are all forms of the Alex. Vulg. Of these the chief are the Rom. ed. of 1591, the ed. of Erpenius (Leyden, 1616), and Lagarde's ed. of the Vienna MS (Greg. cod. 36). The last is the only ed. containing the marginal notes which belong to ar. alex. Some edd. of Syr. Vulg. for use among the Maronites, of which the most accessible is the Paris reprint of 1824, contain also a Carshûnî VS (ar. carsh). This, however, is simply ar. alex. slightly modified to suit the Peshittâ.

THE PAULINE EPISTLES.—(i.) Trs. from the Gr. of the fourteen Epp. of St. Paul are found in ar. vat (8th or 9th cent., see above), and in a Sinai MS (ar. sin.-Paul) of the 9th cent., the text of which was published by Mrs. Gibson in 1894. Ar. vat has the so-called 'Euthalian' sections, etc. †; ar. sin., which is quite independent of ar. vat, is remarkable for having no 'Euthalian' matter, but nevertheless it represents the late Antiochian text mixed with a few good readings. ‡

(ii.) A Tr. from the Syr. is found in a MS now at St. Petersburg (Greg. cod. 134), brought by Tischendorf 'from the E.' It is dated 892 A.D., and appears to have been rendered from a Nestorian copy of the Peshittâ,§ but with glosses and additions like the Gospel text in ar. vat. From the VS found in this MS (ar. pet) is ultimately derived that of the printed edd. of Erpenius, and the Carshûnî ed. of 1824. The latter agrees very closely with B. M. Harl. 5474 (dated 1288 A.D.).

THE ACTS AND CATHOLIC EPISTLES.—No direct Arab. tr. from the Gr. is known for the Acts and major Cath. Epp. The chief edd. (ar. erp and ar. carsh) seem to be, as in the Gospels, an eclectic mixture of the Copt., the Gr., and the Syr. In the disputed Cath. Epp., which had no place in the

* Guidi, Evv. pp. 22-24. He also points out (p. 35 ff.) the highly important fact that the late text from which most MSS of the Eth. VS have been corrupted is none other than ar. alex.

† For Ro (Scholz, Krit. Reise, p. 122) the numbers are: 5 sect., 19 capp., 34 (sic) quot. from OT, and 920 sticht. Scholz also transcribes the whole of Philem and a few other passages. As ar. vat has been wrongly quoted in 1 Tim 3¹⁶ for وحقنا ان سر خشية الله هو عظيم الذي ابدى بالجسد.

The fact that the two dots of δ are never written in this MS seems to have prevented Schol from recognising that خشية الله

الله simply represents vivificatio. Scholz's text has ادى (for ابدى).

† See, e.g., Ro 16⁵, Gal 6¹⁵.

§ See ZDMG viii. 584; Delitzsch, Hebräer, pp. 764-768, who quotes the extraordinary rendering of ar. pet in He 2⁹: and so he without God, who had united Himself with him as a temple, tasted death for all men. The variant $\chi\alpha\rho\iota\varsigma$ $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$ is not found in Syr. Vulg. except in Nestorian copies. In ar. erp this is emended to express $\chi\alpha\rho\iota\varsigma$ $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$, and in ar. carsh we have 'God by His grace,' as Syr. Vulg. See Gildemeister, p. 1 (n.), who brings forward He 5⁸ as another instance where ar. erp and ar. carsh have a corruption of the text of ar. pet.

Peshittâ (2 P, 2 and 3 Jn, Jude), the tr. appears to have been made directly from the Greek.

A tr. from the Syr. of Ac and all seven Cath. Epp. (in the Gr. order) is found in a 9th cent. vellum MS at Sinai (Mrs. Gibson's Cat., No. 154). In this text, while the other parts are from Syr. Vulg., the disputed Cath. Epp. are translated from the Pocockian VS (Syr. bodl.), now generally printed in edd. of Syr. Vulg., and which is probably a fragment of the Philoxenian VS before its revision by Thomas of Harkel.* This MS is thus perhaps the oldest witness for Syr. bodl., though it does not contain the purest text.

THE APOCALYPSE.—The Apoc. was not a canonical book among the E. Churches; the Arab. VSS, therefore, vary greatly. Ar. erp is here perhaps a combination of the Gr. and the Copt. Ar. carsh contains some peculiar double renderings (e.g. Rev 1⁵⁻⁶), but their source is not very clear. It is not a tr. of the printed Syr. text.

THE OLD TESTAMENT.—Arab. VSS of OT fall under four heads, viz. trs. from the Gr., from the Syr., from the Heb., and from the Sam. Of these the greater bulk still remains in unexamined MSS, only a portion of the various sources having been printed. The great Paris Polyglott contains a complete Arab. text of the whole OT except the Apoc., and this text has been repeated with minor variations in Walton's Polyglott and in the Newcastle ed. of 1811, but it presents a singularly mixed text. The Pent. is the version of Sa'adya (see below). Jos is also from the Heb., but it does not directly appear that Sa'adya was the translator. Jg, S, K, and Ch are all from the Peshittâ, as is also the Book of Job. The Prophets, Psalms, and Proverbs are from the Greek, the Prophets being a tr. made by a priest of Alexandria from a good uncial MS resembling cod. A. This curious jumble rests upon an Egypt. MS of the 16th cent. used by the editors of the Polyglott (see Cornill's Ezechiel and Slane's Cat. des. MSS arabes de la Bibl. Nat. p. 1).

Of the trs. from the Peshittâ there are several MSS. The Psalter was printed in Carshûnî by the Maronites in 1610 at a convent in the Wâdy Qûzhayya ('Psalterium qûzhayyensis'), and reprinted by Lagarde. Some lacunæ in the Paris Polyglott (Cornill enumerates Ezk 11¹² 13⁴ 24¹⁶⁻²⁷ 27³² 42¹⁷.¹⁹) are supplied in Walton from an Oxford MS of this class.

There are also MSS containing a tr. from the Copt. VS of the LXX. Of this Lagarde has published Job (Psalterium, etc., 1876). An ed. of the Psalter and Cant. with critical notes similar to the work of Ibn-el-Assâl (see above), is to be found in B. M. Arund. Or. 15.

Several MSS present an Arab. tr. made from the Sam. Pent. Specimens (incl. Ex 3, 4) are to be found in a Programm by van Vloten, Leyden, 1803. The best MS is probably that in the Cambridge University Library (addl. 714).

The Arab. tr. of certain books of OT made direct from the original Heb. have an interest of their own for the history of interpretation, though they almost invariably conform strictly to the MT. Most of these trs. are from the pen of Sa'adya (סעדיה, Ar. سعديد) the Ga'on, a learned Rabbi, born in the Fayyûm in Upper Egypt (A.D. 892-942). His Biblical trs. have been published as follows: the Pent. at Constantinople in 1546, and again in the Polyglotts (see above); Is. by Paulus, 1790-91; † Cant. by Merx, 1882; Pr. capp. 1-9, by Bondi, 1888; Job, by Cohn, 1889. In addition to these there is the tr. of Jos in the Polyglotts mentioned above. Other VSS from the Heb., such as that in the ARAD (אָרָד).—A Benjamite who helped to put to flight the inhabitants of Gath (1 Ch 8¹⁵).

ARAD (אָרָד).—A city of one of the kings of the Canaanites, assigned to the tribe of Judah (Jos 12¹⁴), on the north-west border of the wilderness of Judah, to which place (if the present text be correct) a family of Kenites migrated from Jericho (Jg 1¹⁶). It has been identified with certain ruins on the top of a hill, Tell 'Arād, about 16 miles south of Hebron, on the plateau to the south of the Dead Sea. Eusebius and Jerome describe Arad as 20 Roman miles south of Hebron in the wilderness of Kadesh. The king of Arad fought against the Israelites as they were turning away from the south of Palestine, but was defeated at Hormah (Nu 21³³ 34⁰). In these passages in Nu where the RV, agreeably to the Heb. text, reads 'king of Arad,' the AV less happily renders 'king Arad.'

ARAM, ARAMÆANS (אַרָם, אַרְמֵי, Syri, Syri. AV 'Syrians' and 'Syria').—In Gn 10^{22, 23} Aram is the son of Shem, and father of Uz, Hul, Gether, and Mash, the last of which is Arabia Petraea, the Mas of the cuneiform inscriptions (cf. Gn 25¹⁴). In Gn 22²¹ Aram is the son of Kemuel, the son of Nahor, the two elder brothers of Kemuel being Uz (AV Huz) and Buz (Bazu in the Assy. texts).

In the OT Aram includes the northern part of Mesopotamia, Syria as far south as the borders of Pal., and the larger part of Arabia Petraea.

The inhabitants of this region were mainly of Sem. origin, and spoke a Sem. language, which, with its dialects, is known as Aramaic. In some parts of it, however, as at Kadesh on the Orontes, near the lake of Homs, and at Carchemish (now Jerablūs or Jerabis) on the Euphrates, the Hittites had occupied the country; and on the eastern bank of the Euphrates, in the neighbourhood of Carchemish, the powerful kingdom of Mitanni was established, with a language of a very peculiar type. An Aram. dialect was spoken by the Nabatæans of Petra, and it is probable that the Ishmaelite tribes must be classed as Aramæans.

In the Assy. inscriptions the name appears as Aramu, Arumu, and Arimu, as well as Armā. In a text of Tiglath-pileser I. (B.C. 1100) the waters on the east side of the Euphrates and westward of Harran are termed mami mat Armā, 'the waters of the land of the Aramæans.' Assurnazir-pal III. (B.C. 883-823) states that he restored to Assyria certain cities which a former Assy. king had fortified in the land of Nahri, towards the sources of the Tigris and Euphrates, and of which the 'Arumu' had taken possession. Among the Aramæan princes whom he subdued here were Ammi-baal and Bur-Hadad, i.e. Bar-Hadad or Ben-Hadad. There were many Aramæan tribes in Babylonia (Pūkudu or Pekod, Nabatu or Nabatæans, Ru'ua, etc.) who lived under sheikhs on the banks of the Tigris and Euphrates as well as on the coast of the Persian Gulf. They were partly traders, partly pastoral nomads, and were collectively called Arumu. The Assyrians never gave the name to the populations westward of the Euphrates, who were included under the general titles of Hittites and Amorites.

In the OT, on the contrary, the name is applied to the inhabitants of Syria as well as to those of Mesopotamia. The different Aramæan districts or states are distinguished by special titles. Mesopotamia is known as Aram-naharaim, 'Aram of the two rivers,' Tigris and Euphrates. It corresponds in part to the Nahrma of the Egyp. inscriptions, though the latter term denoted the district between the Euphrates and Orontes, as well as the kingdom of Mitanni on the eastern side of the Euphrates. In the Tel el-Amarna tablets, however, it is confined to Mitanni. The Assy. country of Nahri lay in a different direction, in the mountains of S. Armenia. Cushan-rishathaim, king of Aram-naharaim (AV Mesopotamia), who oppressed the Israelites for eight years shortly after their entrance into Canaan (Jg 3⁸⁻¹⁰), was a king of Mitanni. We learn from the Tel el-Amarna tablets that in the 15th cent. B.C. the kings of Mitanni or 'Nahrma' had already interfered in the affairs of Palestine, and had intermarried with the royal family of Egypt. The troops of Mitanni accompanied the northern hordes who attacked Egypt in the reign of Ramses III. (c. B.C. 1200); and as the king of Mitanni is not named among the conquered invaders, it is probable that he did not actually enter Egypt, but remained behind in Canaan. This would have been just before the Israelitish conquest of that country, and would throw light on the presence there of Cushan-rishathaim.

In certain passages of the Pent. assumed to belong to P (Gn 25²⁰ 28^{2, 5-7} 31¹⁸ 33¹⁸ 35^{9, 26} 48⁷), the name of Aram-naharaim as applied to the northern part of Mesopotamia is replaced by Pad[d]an-aram, of which S'dēh 'Arām, 'the field of Aram,' in Hos 12², is supposed to be a translation. Paddan is the same word as the Syr. and Arab. paddān, a measure of land which can be 'ploughed' by oxen in a day, and is found in Assyrian under the form of padānu. Padanu is explained in the cuneiform lexical tablets as meaning 'field' or 'garden' (WAI ii. 62. 33), from a root which signifies to 'cleave' or 'plough' the ground. It is also brought into connexion with kharrānu, 'a high-road,' whence the name of Harran (Gn 11³¹ 28¹⁰ 27⁴⁸), and is the equivalent of a Sumerian word signifying 'foot' or 'plain,' which was used to denote 'the land of the Amorites' (WAI ii. 50. 59). An early king of Babylonia, Agu-kak-rimi (c. B.C. 1700) calls himself 'king of Padan and Alman.'

On the western side of the Euphrates the Aramæan states and language extended, eastward of the Jordan, as far south as Mizpeh in Gilead (Gn 31⁴⁷, where the cairn is described as forming a boundary between the languages of Aram and Canaan). In the north was Aram of Zobah (the Tsubitē of the Assy. texts, which place it eastward of Hamath). In the time of Saul (1 S 14⁴⁷) 'the kings of Zobah' are mentioned, but soon afterwards Zobah appears under the sole rule of Hadadezer, son of Rehob (2 S 8³⁻¹²). Hadadezer, who had 'had wars' with Hamath, was defeated by David 'as he went to recover his border at the river Euphrates.' Subsequently, in spite of assistance from the Aramæans of Damascus (2 S 8⁵), and of Mesopotamia 'beyond' the Euphrates (2 S 10¹⁶), the army of Hadadezer was again overthrown at Helam (perhaps Aleppo, Assy. Khalman), and 'the kings that were servants to Hadadezer' became the vassals of Israel. Josephus transforms the place Helam, which he calls Khalaman, into a prince of Mesopotamia. Among the cities of Hadadezer captured by David were Tibhath (1 Ch 18⁸, called Betah in 2 S 8⁸) and Berothai (Cun in 1 Ch 18⁸). Tibhath seems to be the Tubikh of the Tel el-Amarna tablets and the geographical list of Tahutmes III. at Karnak, the Tebah of Gn 22²⁴. The whole district is probably that which is termed Nukhasse in the Tel el-Amarna texts (Anagas in the Egypt. inscriptions).

Adjoining Aram-Zobah was Aram Beth-rehob or Aram-rehob (2 S 10⁶⁻⁸), which may have derived its name from the father (or ancestor) of Hadadezer. Rehob is associated with Ish-tob, 'the men of Tob' (see Jg 11³⁻⁵); but in 1 Ch 19⁶ Aram-naharaim takes the place of both. To the south came Aram-maacah or Maacah, which, along with the adjoining Geshur, was assigned to Manasseh, eastward of the lakes of Merom and Gennesaret (Dt 3¹⁴, Jos 12⁹ 13^{11, 13}, 2 S 3³ 13³⁷). Like Tebah and Tahash, the Takhis of the Egypt. monuments, Maacah was a descendant of Nahor (Gn 22²⁴). Between Maacah and Zobah was the city of Damascus (As. Dimaska) which was conquered by the Egypt. king Tahutmes III. (B.C. 1480), and was still subject to Egypt in the age of the Tel el-Amarna tablets (B.C. 1400). Damascus is called Aram-Dammeseḳ in 2 S 8⁶, when it sent aid to Hadadezer. The defeat of Hadadezer made it tributary to David, but it recovered its independence early in the reign of Solomon under Rezon the son of Eliadah, who had been a vassal of the king of Zobah (1 K 11²³⁻²⁵). Damascus soon became a dangerous neighbour of the northern kingdom of Israel, and at one time even exercised a sort of suzerainty over Samaria. The other Aramæan states of Syria were absorbed by it, so that eventually the name of Aram was applied to it alone; but its power was finally shattered by the Assyrians.

Foremost among the Aramæan deities was Hadad or Addu (also Dadu or Dadda), the sun-god, identified by the Assyrians with their Ramman (Rimmon), the air-god, also called Amurru, 'the Amorite.' We find the combination Hadad-Rimmon in Zec 12¹¹. By the side of Hadad stood his divine son Ben-Hadad, as we learn from the cuneiform inscriptions. At Sendschirli mention is made, besides Hadad, of Resheph the fire-god, of El, Shamas, Or, and Rekeb-el or Rekub-el, which may possibly denote 'the chariot of El.' Numerous deities are referred to in the Palmyrene inscriptions, such as Baal-samen, Aglibol, and Yarkhi-bol; but several of them, like Bol, or Nebo, or Sin the moon-god of Harran, were borrowed from the Babylonian. So also was the goddess Atar, the Bab. Istar, who, in combination with the Syrian 'Ati, produced the hybrid Atargatis. In the south the Nabatæans of Tema, Petra, and the Sinaitic Peninsula had several deities of their own, such as Aumos (?), Katsiu (Kasios), and Zelem (As. Zalmu); but others, like Dusares and Allât, Manôt, Kais, and Kaisah, they shared with the Arabs. The gods of Syria are mentioned in Jg 10⁶. For the Aramaic Language, see LANGUAGE OF THE OT.

ARARAT (אֲרָרָט, Ararvia).—The Biblical A. is the Assyrian Urardhu (Urasdhu in the Persian period), the name given to the kingdom which had its centre on the shores of Lake Van. The name seems to be connected with Urdhû, which a cuneiform lexical tablet (WAI ii. 48b, 13) explains as 'Highlands' (Tilla),* and which appears as Urdhes in an inscription of the native king Sar-duris II., who describes it as in the neighbourhood of Lake Erivan. In Herodotus (iii. 94) the word takes the form of Alarodians. The cuneiform writing of Assyria was borrowed by the inhabitants of the country in the 9th cent. B.C., and we learn from the inscriptions composed in it that the native name of the kingdom was Biainas or Bianas, the Byana of Ptolemy, now Van. The capital of the kingdom, now represented by the modern city of Van, was called Dhuspas; this gave its name to the district termed Thôspitis in classical geography, now Tosp. It was upon 'the mountains of A.' that the ark rested (Gn 8⁴), and in Jer 51²⁷ A. is associated with Minni and Ashkenaz. Minni, in fact, called Manná or Minná in Assyrian, Mana in the Vannic texts, adjoined Ararat on the E., being separated from it by the Kotur range, and Ashkenaz is probably the Asguza of the Assyr. monuments, which was situated in the same neighbourhood.

* This is the explanation hitherto given by Assyriologists. But I believe that the true explanation is different. Urdhû or Ararat was denoted by an ideograph, which usually represented Accad in Babylonian, and signified 'a mound' or 'tel,' in Assyrian tilla, because Tilla happened to be the name of a city in Ararat with which the Assyrians were acquainted in early times. It is called Tela by Assur-nazir-pal, and is still known as Tilleh at the junction of the Bert and the Tigris.

The name of Armenia, written Armina in Old Persian, Kharmínuya in Amardian, first appears in the cuneiform inscriptions of Darius Hystaspis, but the origin of it is quite unknown. It may be connected with the Vannic word armani-lis, 'a stèle,' or with Arman ('the land of the Arameans'), an Aramean district south of Lake Van. Geographically, however, Armenia corresponds with Ararat. The supreme god of A. was Khaldis, who was worshipped under a variety of forms, and from whom the inhabitants of the country took the name of 'people of Khaldis.' From this was derived the name of Khaldæi or Khaldeans, assigned by classical geographers to the Armenian population who bordered on Pontus, and which was still preserved as late as the fifteenth century in the name of Khaldia applied to Lazistan (Belck in Zeitschrift für Assyriologie, ix. 1, p. 89).

The kingdom of Biainas or Ararat was originally bounded on the north by the Araxes, and although some of its kings made conquests still further north, it never seems to have comprised the Mount Ararat of modern times. This is still called Massis by the Armenians themselves, and the extension to it of the name of Ararat is of comparatively modern date. Its great height, the larger of its two peaks being 17,000 feet above the level of the sea, while the smaller peak, 7 miles distant, is 13,000 feet above the sea-level, has doubtless had much to do with the belief that it was the spot on which the ark rested. Arghuri, the only village which stood on its slopes, is even pointed out as the spot on which Noah planted his vineyard. It was first ascended by Parrot in 1829, and the ascent has since been achieved by Bryce and others.

The original site of the resting-place of the ark lay towards the south of Ararat in the Kurdish mountains, which divide Armenia from Mesopotamia and Kurdistan. According to the Bab. account of the Deluge, the 'ship' of Xisuthros, the Chaldean Noah, rested on the peak of 'the mountain of Nizir,' which lay E. of Assyria, between 35° and 36° N. lat. Similarly, Berosus the Chaldean historian fixed the spot in 'the mountain of the Kordyæans' or Kurds (Jos. Ant. i. iii. 6), and the Syriac version replaces Ararat by Kardu in Gn 8⁴. Nicolaus Damascenus also stated that the ark had rested on 'a great mountain in Armenia, beyond Minyas, called Baris' (Jos. Ant. i. iii. 6). Minyas is Minni, and Baris is more accurately given as Lubar in the Book of Jubilees (ch. v.). Lubar was the boundary between Armenia and Kurdistan (Epiphanius, Adv. Her. i. 5). The Jebel Judi is still regarded by the Kurds as the scene of the descent from the ark. It would seem, therefore, that the spot has been successively shifted from the mountain of Nizir (possibly Rowandiz) in the east, to Jebel Judi or Lubar, and then to the modern Mount Ararat in the far north.

The great plateau of Armenia, rising to a height of from 6000 to 7000 feet above the sea, was naturally a district which appeared to the dwellers in the southern plains beyond the reach of the Deluge. Intensely cold in the winter, it is equally hot in the summer. The vine is indigenous there (as it is in the Balkans), and the whole district is marked by the results of volcanic action. It is noteworthy that the present Armenian words for 'gold' and 'tin' are identical with the Sumerian or proto-Chaldean names of the same objects (oski, 'gold,' Sumerian, guski, wuski; anag, 'tin,' Sum. nagga).

The cuneiform characters of Assyria were introduced into the kingdom of Ararat in the 9th cent. B.C. The syllabary was greatly simplified, each character having only a single phonetic value attached to it, and the greater number of characters expressing closed syllables being rejected. The vowels were usually denoted by separate characters, and a good many ideographs were borrowed. It is to the use of these ideographs that the decipherment of the Vannic inscriptions is mainly due. The inscriptions are carved on rocks, altar-stones, columns, and the like, and are in a language which shows little resemblance to any other with which we are acquainted, though it may be distantly related to modern Georgian.

The introduction of the cuneiform syllabary was partly the result of the campaigns of the Assyr. kings Assur-nazir-pal and Shalmaneser II. in the north, and it seems to have been connected with the rise of a new dynasty which established itself on the shores of Lake Van (about B.C. 840). The founder of the dynasty was Sar-duris I. the son of Lutipris, who appears to have displaced Arame, the earlier antagonist of Shalmaneser II. Sar-duris was succeeded by his son Ispuinis ('the settler'), who, towards the end of his reign, associated his son Menuas with him on the throne. Menuas was a great conqueror and builder; he carried his arms as far as Mount Rowandiz in the east, and beyond the Araxes in the north, and he also claims to have defeated the Hittites and the king of Malatiyeh in the west. An inscription commemorative of the event was engraved on the cliff overhanging the Euphrates near Palu. Menuas was followed by his son Argistis I., who has recorded in a long inscription on the rock of Van the campaigns he made year by year, and the amount of spoil he brought back from them. The kingdoms of the Minni and other nations in the neighbourhood of Lake Urumiyeh were ravaged, and the Assyr. forces are stated to have been overthrown. Sar-duris II., the son of Argistis, continued the conquests of his father, and extended his empire as far as the borders of Cappadocia. But his career was suddenly checked by the revival of Assyria under Tiglath-pileser III. The northern league, which the king of Armenia formed against the new power, was shattered, and the Assyrians swept the country up to the gates of the capital, Dhuspas or Van. Rusa I., the son and successor of Sar-duris, was equally unfortunate in his attempt to check the progress of Assyria, and after the overthrow of his allies by Sargon, and the fall of the city of Muzazir, he killed himself in a fit of despair. His successor, Argistis II., however, managed to preserve his independence, as also did Erimenas, against whom Esarhaddon was carrying on war, when Sennacherib was murdered by his two sons. It was to the court of Erimenas that the murderers fled. His son Rusa II. improved the water-supply of Van, and built a palace, on the site of which various objects of Vannic art, such as ornamental shields and man-headed bulls of bronze, have been discovered. A few years later Sar-duris II. made alliance with the Assyr. king, Assur-banipal (B.C. 645). Ararat suffered soon afterwards, like the rest of W. Asia, from the invasion of the Kimmerians and Scyths, in the wake of which it is probable came the immigration of the Aryan Armenians, and the fall of the old kingdom of Ararat. According to the classical authors, these Aryan Armenians were a Phrygian colony (Herod. vii. 73; Eustath. on Dion. v. 694). The conquest of Armenia by Cyrus took place in B.C. 546.

ARATHES (Ἀριαράθης, v. AV Ariarathes; Ἀράθης, A. cursives, incorrectly, 1 Mac 15²²), v. PHILOPATOR, formerly called Mithridates, was king of Cappadocia B.C. 163-130. He was a firm ally of the Romans, and, in accordance with their wishes, rejected the proposal of a marriage with the sister of Demetrius Soter. The latter made war upon him, and expelled him from his kingdom, setting up in his stead Holofernes, a supposititious son of A. iv. Philopator fled to Rome about B.C. 158, and by Rom. aid he was restored to a share in the government. A few years later he again became sole king. In B.C. 139, in consequence of an embassy sent by Simon Macabæus, the Romans wrote letters to A. and certain other eastern sovereigns in favour of the Jews (1 Mac l.c.). See Diodor. xxxi. 19. 28. 32; Justin xxxv. 1; Polyb. iii. 5, xxxii. 20. 23, xxxiii. 12; Appian. Syr. 47. H. A. WHITE.

ARAUHAH (אָרַוְיָה, also אָרַוְיָה 2 S 24¹⁸, אָרַוְיָה 1 Ch 21¹⁵, 2 Ch 3¹).—A Jebusite who owned a threshing-floor on Mount Moriah. When David numbered the people, and the pestilence was sent as a punishment for his sin, this spot was indicated by the prophet Gad as the place where an altar should be erected to J, because the plague had been stayed. David went to A. and bought the threshing-floor and oxen for 50 shekels of silver. The price paid is given in 1 Ch 21¹⁸ as 600 shekels of gold—a discrepancy which we have no means of explaining. R. M. BOYD.

ARBA (אָרְבַּע) is described as 'the great man among the Anakim' (Jos 14¹⁵), 'the father of the Anak' (15¹³), 'the father of the Anok' (21¹¹). This may mean that he was regarded as the progenitor of the Anakim, and it certainly implies that he was regarded as the great man in their traditional history. Presumably he was regarded as the founder of the city that bore his name, and as having founded it seven years before the Egyp. Zoan (Jos 15¹³, Gn 23² 35²⁷, Nu 13²²). See ANAKIM, GIANT. Arbah, or Arba, City of. This phrase occurs in AV in Gn 35²⁷, Jos 15¹³ 21¹¹. It is simply a tr. of the name which elsewhere appears as Kirjath-arba, or Kiriath-arba (which see). This city is Hebron. W. J. BEECHER.

ARBATHITE (אֲרַבְתִּי 2 S 23³¹), Klostermann suggests בית הערבה [see ABI-ALBON] 'a native of Beth-arabah,' a town in the wilderness of Judah (Jos 15⁶¹ 18²²); but הערבה occurs without בית 1 Ch 11³², and הערבה Jos 18¹⁸. J. F. STENNING.

ARBATTA (ἐν Ἀρβάττοις, AV Arbattis), 1 Mac 5²².—A district in Palestine. The situation is doubtful. It may be a corruption for Akrabattis—the toparchy of Samaria near Akrah E. of Shechem. C. R. CONDER.

ARBELA.—The Syrian army under Bacchides, which came from the N. upon Jerus. B.C. 161, is described by the Gr. of 1 Mac 9² as proceeding 'by the way that leadeth to Gilgal, and encamping before Mesaloth, which is in Arbela (ἐν Ἀρβήλοις); gat possession of it and destroyed much people.' The sites represented by all these names are disputed, and there are several alternatives for the line of the Syrian march. The most natural direction for Bacchides to take was along the coast, and up the vale of Ajalon. On this route there lay a Gilgal, the present Jiljulyeh, on the plain of Sharon, but no trace is now discoverable of Μεσαλώθ or of Ἀρβήλαι. Jos. (Ant. XII. xi. 1) supposes that they came through Galilee, which he reads instead of Gilgal. On this route stands the modern Irbil, the identity of which name with Irbil or Arbela is proved by the medieval Arab geographers (Nasir-i-Khusrau calls it Irbil, but Yakut and others Irbid; cf. Reland, Pal. 358); and Robinson (BR ii. 398) suggests that Μεσαλώθ or Μαισαλώθ stands for מִסְעָר, a term he thinks appropriate to the precipices, honey-combed with caves, that always made Arbela a place of strategic importance. But this identification is doubtful. Again, Bacchides, having passed through Galilee, might have approached Jerus. across Esdraelon by the trunk road through Samaria, a direction which is called in the Bk of Jth (4⁷) the ἀναβάσεις to Judæa. On this route there lay a strong fortress, Gilgal, the modern Jiljilia, which might well have given its name to the route; and Ewald identifies this with the Gilgal of our passage (Hist. Eng. ed. v. 323). On the same road, much farther N. than Gilgal, stands a Meselieh, taken by some to be the Bethulia of the Bk of Jth, and therefore a fortress that Bacchides, if advancing by this direction, would certainly have to reckon with; while close to Meselieh stands Meithalûn. These two offer a probable identification for Μεσαλώθ. The latter is said to lie ἐν Ἀρβήλοις, and this form of the phrase suggests that Arbela (observe the plural) was the name, not of a town, but a district. Now Eus. (Onom. art. Ἀρβήλαι) notes the name as existing in his time in Esdraelon, 9½ miles from Lejjun, a position which suits the entrances from Esdraelon upon Meselieh and Meithalûn. It is just possible, therefore, that Ἀρβήλαι was the name of the whole district. A fourth alternative for the route of Bacchides was through Gilead, which name is read for Gilgal by the Syr. of 1 Mac 9². In the E. of Gilead there lies to-day a point of strategic importance known as Irbid; but there is neither a Mesaloth nor a Gilgal, unless the latter be taken to be the Gilgal by Jericho, which Bacchides might have passed had he come upon Judæa through Gilead. The Gilead route, however, is much the least probable of the four suggested. See BETH-ARBEL and GILGAL. G. A. SMITH.

ARBITE (אֲרִיבִי).—The LXX (2 S 23³⁵) apparently reads אֲרִיבִי (the Archite, cf. Jos 16² and 'Hushai the Archite,' 2 S 15³²); but a place 'Arab, in the S. of Judah, is mentioned Jos 15⁵². In the parallel passage 1 Ch 11³⁷ we find 'the son of Ezbai' (בֶּן-אִיבִי), a reading which is supported by several MSS of the LXX 2 S l.c. (ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ Ἀιβί), and which is probably correct. J. F. STENNING.

ARBONAI (Ἀρβωνάς, Jth 2²⁴).—A torrent apparently near Cilicia. It cannot be represented by the modern Nahr Ibrahim, since the ancient name of that river was the Adonis; nor does the latter answer to the term 'torrent' (χεῖμα ἄβυσσος) applied to the Arbonai. C. R. CONDER.

ARCH.—1. Of the Temple. The word 'arch' is used in the plural ('arches') 14 times in Ezk 40. That neither 'arch' nor 'arches' has any right to appear in the Eng. Bible at all, an examination of the Heb. word, of the versions, and of the context, will make clear. The Heb. word is according to the Mass. pointing אַרְכָּיִם 'elammîm, which is the plur. of אַרְכָּי 'elam; the word is, however, only found with suffixes, and as the text stands it is sing. not plur.; it is the Kerê or corrected reading that makes the word plural. Twice indeed (40¹⁶, 30) does the fem. plur. אַרְכָּי occur; but Smend (Comm. p. 326) suspects an error. (Cornill in v. 16 reads אַרְכָּי sing.; v. 30 he rejects, following most Heb. MSS.) In all the remaining 12 places the written text makes it singular and not plural. The word occurs nowhere outside this chapter, and it is almost certainly either a synonym of אַרְכָּי 'elam, porch, or a clerical error for this last word.

That the translators of the LXX had before them, in all the instances where either עֲזַרְיָה or עֲזַרְיָה is now found, one and the same Heb. word in the text, is suggested by the fact that these translators use but one Greek word, and that a mere translit. of עֲזַרְיָה, viz. αἰλάμ. Cornill in his amended text of Ezk reads עֲזַרְיָה, never עֲזַרְיָה, and trs. by Vorhalle (porch). It should be stated, however, that αἰλάμ trs. the Heb. word שַׁפֵּף saph, 'threshold,' in Ezk 40⁶, and לַיֵּשׁ 'ayil, 'post,' in 40^{10, 14, 16, 49} and 41¹. The Vulg. uses one word vestibulum for 'elam and 'alam. The Targ. also uses but one word, this being, however, אֶלְמָנָא 'alamna, not, as the LXX would lead us to expect, אֶלְמָמָא 'elamma. It is certain that 'elam is used in the sense of 'alam in Ezk 40^{31, 34, 36}, prob. also in 40^{25, 26}, where the 'elam is said to be toward the outer court. The Douay Version, which follows the Vulg. more closely than the latter does the LXX, uses in all cases the Eng. word porch. In the mod. Gr. version, σροά, porch, is the uniform rendering. In addition to Cornill, Smend, A. B. Davidson (see their Commentaries), Fried. Delitzsch (Prolegomena, p. 139), the Lexicons of Muhlau and Volck, Buhl, Oxford, and the majority of recent critics, accept the view that both Heb. words have but one meaning, viz. porch. What is intended by 'porch' in this connexion see under PORCH and TEMPLE.

2. General. It is a debatable point whether the Israelites in OT times were acquainted with the arch as an architectural device, and whether they used it. There is no corresponding word in Hebrew; but indeed few architectural terms are found in this language. Heb. is the language of poetry, of ethics, and of religion, and not of science or of art. See ARCHITECTURE.

ARCHANGEL.—See ANGEL.

ARCHELAUS.—See under HEROD.

ARCHERY.—Though bows are mentioned with tolerable frequency in the OT, one is tempted to think that the Israelites were not distinguished above the surrounding nations by their skill in the use of this weapon. The battle of Gilboa was probably lost through the superiority of the Philistine archers. David, after the battle, endeavoured to encourage archery practice in Judah (2 S 1¹⁸). Reject RV and compare Driver, Notes on Samuel, in loco. Elisha on his deathbed (2 K 13¹⁵⁻¹⁹) promised Joash victory over Syria by the use of the bow. Probably the revival of Israel's military power under Jeroboam, son of Joash, was due to improvement in archery; Hosea, a contemporary, speaks (1⁵) of the bow as the national weapon of Israel.

The most effective and scientific use of the bow, however, was that shown by the Assyrians. The terror caused by their archery is hinted at in Is 5²⁸ and 37³⁶. To judge from the Assyrian reliefs, it seems to have been the practice of Assyrian armies to overwhelm their enemies with the bow, and to use the spear and sword only when the foe was already in flight.

ARCHEVITES (אַרְכֵי־עֵרֶחַ).—The people of Erech, a town identified with the Bab. Uruk (modern Warka), on the left bank of the Euphrates. It is mentioned in Gn 10¹⁰, between Babel and Accad, as the second city of importance in Nimrod's kingdom; and its name occurs, in the inscriptions, along with that of Accad, as one of the principal towns in N. Babylonia.

Some of the inhabitants of Erech were 'deported' as colonists to Samaria by king Assurbanipal (668-626). Their name is mentioned in Ezr 4⁹ along with dwellers in Babylon; and the 'deportation' of Archevites most probably indicates that Erech sided with Babylon in the revolt of Samas-sum-ukin against the Assyrian king (cf. Ryle, Ezra and Nehemiah).

H. E. RYLE.

ARCHIPPUS.—Archippus is mentioned only twice in NT. The short letter sent by St. Paul to Philemon is addressed not only to Philemon and Apphia, but also to 'A., our fellow-soldier,' as well as to the church in Philemon's house (v. 2). The position here assigned to A., between the mention of Philemon and that of the church in his house, renders it highly probable that he was, if not a near relative (perhaps a son or brother), at any rate one belonging to the household circle. 'Fellow-soldier' is doubtless applied to him (as to Epaphroditus, Ph 2²⁵; cf. also Ph 4³, 2 Ti 2²³) as enduring conflict in the service of the Church or the gospel, probably in some official position; but what that position was, we have no means of knowing. Nor is much more light supplied by the other passage (Col 4¹⁷) which speaks of his 'ministry (διακονία) in the Lord.' The term διακονία need not necessarily be taken in its technical sense of the office of deacon, or in that of bishop or presbyter or evangelist; it may denote any service, but the adjunct ἐν Κυρίῳ defines it as specially undertaken for the Church by one 'living and acting in the Lord under the sense of holy obligation' (Meyer). The form of the admonition has been thought to imply some misgiving or doubt or censure, as though A. were still young or subordinate, weak or too indulgent, or inclined to be remiss, and so in special need of warning or stimulus; but it need not convey more than that the 'service' was a difficult one, in which he might well be strengthened by the encouragement of the Church acting on the apostle's message. The suggestion of Lightfoot, among others, that A. was a Laodicean teacher, on the ground that 4¹⁷ is joined by καί to the context in which the Laodicean Church is spoken of, seems improbable; for, apart from other difficulties, why should St. Paul have taken this roundabout way of reaching A. (if not himself a Colossian) through a strange church, when he was almost simultaneously addressing him directly (Philem²)? There seems little historical basis for the tradition that A. was one of the 70 disciples, who became bishop of Laodicea and suffered martyrdom at Chone.

WILLIAM P. DICKSON.

ARCHITE (אַרְכִי).—The native of a town (Erech?, not Archi as in AV of Jos 16²) situated on the north border of Benjamin, probably the modern 'Ain 'Arik, west of Bethel. Hushai, David's friend (2 S 15³²), belonged to this town. See SWP vol. iii. sheet xvii.

ARCHITECTURE.—The influences which formed the architecture of the Hebrews were very diverse. Besides the highly developed structures of Egypt and Babylon, there was the native Amorite building, and the starting-point of the people themselves from a nomadic life. The great tent of the tabernacle, with its chamber of wood, must have been the ideal type for a long period to the Hebrews. It is, according to Fergusson's rendering of it (see TABERNACLE), strictly in accord with what may be seen as the system of development from the Bedawi tent at present. A widespread low tent is pitched, fencing of reeds or piles of stone is built around it to make a shelter from storms; the tent is then carried out over the shelter walls, or else enclosed in a courtyard, and settlements are thus formed which are compounded of walling for the sides and tent for the covering. Such seems to have been the principle of the tabernacle; and long after the entrance into Pal. the Hebrews, in the south at least, continued to depend on tents and skins, instead of building and pottery. The closely inhabited region south of Hebron, where at every mile or two a name of an OT village is to be found, is absolutely bare of any early building, and not a fragment of Jewish pottery is to be found there. This shows that the people retained the nomadic type of life although settled on the land.

The Amorite buildings of brick were massive and imposing to a desert people: 'cities great, and fenced up to heaven' (Dt 1²⁸). The thick walls of well-laid brickwork, as seen at Tell Hesi, were very strong defences, and quite wide enough to have considerable houses built upon the wall (Jos 2¹⁵). Woodwork was largely used (Jos 8²⁰); but probably for roofing, as no trace of vaulted brick roofs has yet been found. This system of mud-brick building continued to be used throughout the Jewish history, as is seen at Tell Hesi, and alluded to by Ezekiel (13¹⁰⁻¹²); and such building was probably in type, as well as material, a continuation of the Amorite style. What the external appearance of these buildings was, is shown by the figures of forts conquered by the Egyptians in Syria, and represented on the monuments. High blank walls gave no opening or hold for an enemy; pilasters and towers strengthened the faces and corners of the forts; and projecting chambers overhanging the more important points enabled the defenders to prevent any sapping or scaling. The gateway was a projecting building in front of the entrance, a plan which enabled the defenders to make it a death trap to any attacking party; for on forcing the outer gate the besiegers would be confined in a narrow space exposed to ceaseless attack overhead. Defence at this age seems to have been far superior to attack; and without a siege train such forts could be reduced only by stratagem (as at Ai) or by starvation.

When stone building was required, it appears to have been probably of masonry hewn to fit on the spot, or at least of irregular courses; for the Jews were astonished at proper construction, with hewn stone all cut regularly in advance, and they remark when neither hammer nor axe nor any tool of iron was heard in the house while it was in building (1 K 6⁷). The mechanical Phœnicians appear to have planned the temple entirely in advance, as the Egyptians did in early times, marking each stone with its place; Hiram's builders and the Gebalites being responsible for this work (1 K 5¹⁸). The stone was sawn with saws, as in the best Egyp. work (1 K 7⁹). The cause of this Phœn. superiority in stonework is probably from their occupying a rocky coast where brick is less attainable, and a wet coast where stone is the more needful.

Of the architectural forms very little is known directly. The only carvings yet seen, which are certainly of the period of the monarchy, are the slabs of Tell Hesi. There a cavetto cornice, like the usual Egyp. form of the nineteenth dynasty, is carved on a thin slab, which was placed over a doorway as a lintel. From the want of solidity, and the curve of the back, manifestly following that of the face, it is evident that this was not a structural, but only an ornamental member; like the similar thin stone lintels attached by (wooden?) pegs to the brick wall behind, in the palace of Akhenaten at Tel el-Amarna. What the real nature of the door-crown was has not been preserved; it may have been of wood, but looking to Egyp. usage it is more likely to have been an arch of brickwork, like the walls.

The sides of the doorways have also been preserved, though reversed in re-use in a later building. They are decorated with pilasters, which show the form of the columns in use at that age. A rounded low stone base supported the stout and clumsy column, which is even represented as equal in diameter to the base. At least the ideal was very different from that of the Egyp., whose column was far narrower than its base. The column diminished greatly upward, and was capped at the top by a volute of Ionic nature. In the stonework this volute seems to imitate a coil of metal; but the whole design appears to come from a decorating of wooden posts with rams' horns, a similar idea to the bucrania in Gr. use. On Assyrian monuments, capitals are represented which have been considered to foreshadow the Ionic; but the horn form (if it ever existed in these) has been lost, whereas in the earlier Jewish example, which is probably Solomonic, the coil is much more isolated and pronounced.

These pilasters show by their shortness that a dado existed below them, and was an important feature in the building; but no stonework of a dado has been preserved. A peculiar feature of Jewish design is the duplication of the doorway. In the rock tombs there is a general tendency to a double entrance; sometimes only carried out in the porch, where a pillar will stand directly in front of the doorway. The same duplication is seen in the building at Tell Hesi in which the stone slabs were re-used, as above described: the object of the building is not known, but on three sides, if not four, it had two doors. As these doors required to be secured by locks or fastenings, the taste for double entrances must have been very strong. Such a duplication occurs both in Assyrian and Persian buildings, and belongs therefore to an established system.

Of other ornament the drafting of the walls was the most prominent, and is likewise known in Persia. The edges of the stones were dressed to a straight line with flat faces, while the middle of each external face was occupied by a projecting boss. This boss was sometimes left quite rough—like the rusticated work of the Pitti palace; but usually it was dressed flat, thus leaving the joint lines recessed half an inch to 3 inches from the main face of the wall, according to the scale of the work. The great stones of the temple substructure are the best known example of this work, but they are not certainly older than Herod. On a smaller scale this same work was found in the lower courses of a door of the fortress at Tell Hesi, which takes it back to the middle of the Jewish monarchy; and from the persistence of the type to the present day it appears to truly belong to the country.

Of the plans of buildings we know even less than of the decoration. The temple, as Fergusson has pointed out, was simply a doubling of the dimensions of the tabernacle, and we may carry the parallel further. The great tent pitched over the tabernacle sides extended beyond them, and the covered space thus left around the tabernacle would doubtless be used for subsidiary purposes. This space was reproduced in the temple as a chain of chambers all round the sides, a construction which was not favourable to any grand treatment of the exterior. The plan, therefore, was ruled by its development from the previous sacred place. In the later temple of Herod the great porch was the most striking feature, and accords in taste with the enormous porticoes of the Herodian rock-tombs at Jerusalem, which are often much larger than the tomb inside the rock. Minor buildings of the age of the monarchy have been found in the only excavations yet made in a city,—those at Tell Hesi. One building already mentioned was square, with two doors on each side. Another—perhaps a barrack—was a long hall with two rows of columns from end to end. Until further excavations may reveal more examples, we can glean but little about the usual arrangements of Jewish architecture.

ARCTURUS.—A star of the first magnitude in the constellation Boötes or the Herdman. Arcturus is the rendering of AV for שָׁח 'Ash, Job 9^o, and שָׁח 'Ayish, Job 38³².

The identification of 'Ash, 'Ayish, has formed subject for wide conjecture. Versions: LXX Ἐσπερος in both places (agreeing with Pesh. in placing שָׁח, Πλειάδα, before שָׁח in 9^o); Pesh.

لَيُّوْثُ 'Iyyūthā of doubtful meaning, explained by Arabic Lexx. as Capella Aurigæ, but placed in Taurus; Vulg. 9^o Arcturum (whence AV), 38³² Vesperum; Targ. 9^o transliterates, 38³² 'the hen with her chickens, i.e. the Pleiades; Sa'adya בְּנֵי תַּיִשׁ

נַעֲשׂ, i.e. Ursa Major. In the Talm. Berachoth

58^b, R. Yehuda explains 'Ash as שָׁח Yūthā, and later Talmudists interpret this as 'the tail of the Ram, i.e. Pleiades, or 'the head of the Bull, i.e. Aldebaran with the Hyades. Ibn Ezra, 'the Bear.'

Among moderns there are two main explanations.

1. The great Bear or Wain; Ges., Del., RV, etc. With the Arabs the four stars of this group which form the quadrilateral are known as Na'sh 'the bier,' the three stars of the tail being 'the daughters of the bier,' a phrase which resembles that of Job 38³² 'Ayish with her children.' It is, however, impossible philologically to identify the root of Arab. Na'sh with Heb. 'Ash, and still more so with 'Ayish.

2. The Pleiades; Stern in Geiger's Jüd. Zeitschr. iii. 258 ff.; Hoffmann, ZATW. iii. 107 f.; Noldeke. Stern points out that Job 38²²⁻²⁸ deals with weather phenomena, and that therefore the constellations mentioned vv. 21-22 appear to be regarded as marking or influencing the changes of the seasons. Since the Bear is visible in the N. hemisphere throughout the year, it could scarcely be thought of as a season prognosticator. Thus Job 38^{32b} is rendered, 'Alcyone with her children,' i.e. the principal star of the Pleiades group with its companions, the other constellations mentioned being interpreted as the Hyades, Orion, and Canis Major with Sirius. We then have allusion to four groups regarded by the Greeks as signs of the seasons, and rising in close succession one upon another. The form 'Ayish is thought to be correct (so Dillmann) rather than 'Ash, and Hoffmann vocalises 'Ayyūsh, thus connecting with Pesh. 'Iyyūthā. C. F. BURNEY.

ARD (אֲרָד).—Benjamin's son, Gn 46²¹, but his grandson, Nu 26⁴⁰=1 Ch 8⁹ (Addar). Patronymic Ardites (Nu 26⁴⁰). G. HARFORD-BATTERSBY.

ARDAT (2 Es 9²⁶ AV Ardath), 'a field' in an unknown situation.

ARDON (אֲרֹדָן).—A son of Caleb (1 Ch 2¹⁸).

ARELI (אֲרֵלִי 'lion' or 'hearth of El').—A son of Gad (Gn 46¹⁶, Nu 26¹⁷). Patronymic Arelites (Nu 26¹⁷). G. HARFORD-BATTERSBY.

AREOPAGITE (Ἀρεοπαγίτης, Ac 17³⁴ only), applied to Dionysius (wh. see) as member of the Council of the Areopagus.

AREOPAGUS (Ἀρεῖος Πάγος, AV 'Areopagus' Ac 17¹⁹, 'Mars' hill' 17²²).—The Hill of Mars is an eminence nearly due west of the Athenian Akropolis, and separated therefrom by a low, narrow declivity. Here sat from the earliest antiquity the council of the Areopagus, at first a mainly judicial body composed of Eupatridæ recruited annually from the retiring archons. After the Macedonian subjugation of Athens, and under the Roman rule, this council probably retained more authority within Attica than any other representative body, and references to it in later Attic inscriptions are numerous. The hill rises gradually from the W., but drops abruptly on N. and E. On the summit remain the benches cut out of the rock on which the Areopagites sat in the open air (Ἰππαθριοὶ ἐδικάζοντο, Pollux, viii. 118). Sixteen worn steps cut in the rock lead to the summit; and the two stones, called the ἀργοὶ λίθοι, the λίθος ἀναειδίας 'of implacability,' and ὄβριος 'of ill-doing,' still remain, on one and the other of which sat the accuser and the accused of murder. The council is termed in Inscr. Attic. iii. 714, 'the most holy,' τὸ σεμνότατον συνέδριον; and to us the awful associations, which attached to the hill and to the cave of the Furies at its foot, made it a fitting background for St. Paul's solemn declaration of a new faith in the unknown God. However, there is no reason to suppose that the curious idlers who led St. Paul thither had any other end in view than to gain a quiet spot, far removed from the hum of the busy Agora below, where they might hear in peace what this newest of enthusiasts had to say. The statement of St. Luke, that the philosophers took St. Paul by the hand (ἐπιλαβόμενοι, Ac 17¹⁹, cf. Ac 9²⁷ 23¹⁹, also Mt 14³¹, Mk 8²³), is not appropriate to accusers bringing to trial a religious innovator. Nor, if the meeting which St. Paul addressed had been a judicial court, would it have dispersed in the way related; some mocking, while others said, 'We will hear thee again of this matter.' Therefore Chrysostom's view, that St. Paul was formally arraigned before the Areopagite council, must be dismissed. There is every reason, moreover, for believing that in Ac 17²²⁻³¹ we have the actual gist of what St. Paul said, and in tone it is not the defence of a man forcibly apprehended and put on his trial for blasphemy.*

Standing on the Areopagus and facing N., St. Paul had at his feet the Theseion, and on his right hand the Akropolis, with its splendid temples intact. Such surroundings would fill with enthusiasm every cultured Christian of to-day. Wherever St. Paul turned, his glance must have fallen on the severe and lovely works of art which still adorned the decadent city. Thus a table was spread before him of which nineteenth century humanists are laboriously but thankfully gathering up the scattered crumbs. To St. Paul's Semitic imagination nothing of all this appealed. It was to him just gold or silver or stone, graven by art and man's device, the work of a period of ignorance at which God had mercifully winked.

ARETAS (Aram. אֲרֵתָא, Gr. Ἀρέτας, more correctly Ἀρέθας, as in the name of the famous bishop of Caesarea Mazaca; the analogy of ἀρετή probably influenced the commoner spelling).—1. King of the 'Arabians,' 2 Mac 5⁸ (see below). 2. King of the Nabataean Arabs, whose 'ethnarch' or governor, apparently at the instance of the Jews (Ac 9^{19, 22, 23}, his wife may well have been a proselyte), was guarding the city of Damascus to capture (πιάσαι, 2 Co 11³²) and destroy (Ac 9) St. Paul. He escaped the ethnarch's hands by the aid of the disciples, who lowered him in a basket from a window in the wall. This was shortly after St. Paul's conversion, which event, rather than his escape from Damascus, would seem to be the terminus a quo of the μετὰ τρία ἔτη of Gal 1¹⁸ (see Lightf. in loc.). If so, the escape may have taken place at any point of time during the three years. If the escape itself is the point from which they are reckoned, the conversion can hardly lie far behind.

How Damascus, a town within the Rom. prov. of Syria, came to be guarded by the officer of an Arab king, is a much-debated question. The most probable solution is the hypothesis of a temporary extension of the Arab kingdom to Damascus. The facts are as follows:—

The Nabateans (נבט) are possibly identical with the NEBATIOI (Νεβαιοί) of OT (so Jos. Ant. i. xii. 4). The main difficulty is the unvarying distinctness of the final consonants b and n. They were probably of Arab race, but used the Aram. language for writing and inscriptions (Nöldeke in Schenkel, BL, 1872, s.v. Nabatier, and in ZDMG xvii. 703 sqq., xxv. 122 sqq.). We first meet with them as a formidable power in connexion with the wars of Antigonos, B.C. 312, centred in the former Edomite stronghold of SELA (Nabat. 'Sal,' Gr. Πέτρα, hence the name for their country, 'Αραβία ἢ πρὸς τῇ Πέτρα, or 'Arabia Petraea'), whence their power gradually extended itself N. and S. Their first known ruler is the Aretas of 2 Mac 5⁸, with whom Jason was imprisoned (ἐγκλεισθεῖς) or, perhaps, 'accused' (adopting the conjecture ἐγκληθεῖς), B.C. 169. A. is ῥίφανος, not yet a recognised king. A few years later the Nabateans appear as friendly to the Maccabean party (1 Mac 5^{25, 93b}). With the decay of the Gr. kingdoms of Syria and Egypt the Nabateans increase in power; about B.C. 105 their 'king' Erotimus 'nunc Aegyptum nunc Syriam infestabat magnumque nomen Arabum viribus finitimorum exsangulis fecerat' (Trog. Pomp. ap. Justin, xxxix. v. 5-6). By B.C. 85 A. III. is master of Damascus; to him belong the coins Βασίλειος Ἀρέτων Φιλέλληνος struck at Damascus (Schürer, HJP I. ii. 353, n. 11). He took the side of Hyrcanus against Aristobulus, B.C. 65-62, and in the latter year was attacked by Scarus whom Pompey had left as legate of Syria; Scarus obtained a nominal submission and a payment of money (Jos. Ant. xiv. v. 1; BJ i. viii. 1). Damascus had already fallen into Rom. hands (Ant. xiv. ii. 3; BJ i. vi. 2), in which it remained, with the exception to be noticed below, as part of the prov. of Syria, but with certain liberties of its own (for proof in detail see Schürer, n. 14, in part modifying Mommsen's important note, Provinces, Eng. tr. vol. ii. p. 148 sq.). A. III. was succeeded by Malchus (c. 50-28), Obodas II. (c. 28-9 B.C.), and A. IV. (c. 9 B.C.-A.D. 40), the subject of the present article.

His original name was Aeneas, but he assumed the name of A. on taking the kingdom (Jos. Ant. xvi. ix. 4). In B.C. 4 he sends some unruly auxiliaries to aid the expedition of Varus against the Jews (BJ ii. v. 1; Ant. xvii. x. 9). After A.D. 28 he attacked and defeated Herod Antipas, partly in revenge for the divorce of his daughter by the latter (see HERODIAS, and Jos. Ant. xviii. v. 1, 2: the victory was transferred in Christian legend to Abgar of Edessa; Gutschmidt, Kleine Schriften, iii. 31). Tiberius ordered Vitellius, propraetor of Syria, to chastise A. for this attack, but the news of Tiberius' death (A.D. 37) put an end to the expedition (Jos. ibid. § 3).

This brings us to the period of St. Paul's escape, which was within 3 years of his first visit to the Church at Jerus., which latter again was within 14 years of the visit recorded in Gal 2. Taking the latter (against Ramsay's view, St. Paul the Traveller, but see Sanday in Expositor, Feb. and Apr. 1896) as identical with that of Ac 15, and working back with the data of the Ac from the arrival of FESTUS, A.D. 60, we time Gal 2 about the year 51. 'Fourteen years' previous, i.e. about 38, comes St. Paul's first visit to the Church of Jerus., and the three previous years again, viz. 38, 37, and 36, bring us to the time of his conversion, and cover the time of his escape from Damascus.

At some time, then, during the three years in question, Damascus had come under A. It cannot have been long before, as there are coins of Damascus with the image and superscription of Tiberius down to A.D. 34; but there are none with those of Gaius or Claudius. The image of Nero begins in 62-63. The inference is natural that the accession of Gaius marks the transfer. That A. could have seized it by force in the face of Vitellius is out of the question. But it is not improbable that it was granted to him by the new emperor. Gaius was not kindly disposed towards Herod Antipas, and would not be unlikely to grant a mark of imperial favour to his bitter enemy. It is true that the deposition and banishment of Herod took place only in the summer of 39 (Schürer, i. ii. 36 n.), a date scarcely early enough for St. Paul's escape from Damascus. But the grant to Agrippa of the tetrarchy of Philip and Lysanias, with the title of king, appears to have been one of Caligula's first acts (Ant. xviii. vi. 10), and in 38 the emperor granted an Ituraean principality to Soemus (Dio Cass. lix. 12). A similar grant may well have been made to Aretas.

A. must have lived till about A.D. 40, as of the 20 dated Aretas-inscriptions of el-Hegr, two belong to his 48th year, as also do certain coins. No other Nabatean king has left so rich a legacy of coins and inscriptions. On both, his standing title is Rahem-ammeh, 'lover of his people' (the contrast with the φιλέλλη of A. III. supr. is suggestive). Under him the Nabatean kingdom extended from the Euphrates to the Red Sea (cf. Jos. Ant. i. xii. 4). By 62 Damascus had again been taken over by the Romans, and belonged to the province of Syria when, in 106, the Nabatean kingdom itself was added to the empire as the province of Arabia.

What is greatly wanted is a coin (or coins) of Damascus between 37 and 54 A.D. Meanwhile, it should be noted that 2 Co 11³² is our solitary piece of positive evidence for Damascus having formed part of the Nabatean kingdom at any time after the Christian era. The fact, as has been shown above, has an important bearing on Pauline chronology.

The best collection and discussion of the evidence is in Schürer, HJP I. ii., esp. his indispensable Appendix ii. on the Nabatean kingdom, pp. 345-362, to which the above article is principally indebted.

C. F. BURNLEY.

ARGOB (אֶרְגֹב; once, Dt 3¹³, with the art. אֶרְגֹבִי.—A district mentioned in Dt 3⁴, 13, 14, 1 K 4¹³, and described as situated on the E. of Jordan, in Bashan, in the kingdom of 'Og, and as containing three-score cities, all strongly fortified, 'with high walls, gates, and bars, besides very many cities of the country folk' (i.e. unwall'd cities: see Ezk 38¹¹). The particular district intended is uncertain. The Targums of Onk. and Jon. represent Argob by אֶרְגֹבָא (Pseud.-Jon. אֶרְגֹבָא), i.e. the Trachonitis, or ὁ Τραχωνίτης, of Greek writers (see Schürer, HJP I. ii. 10 ff.; G. A. Smith, Geogr. 543), some 25 miles S. of Damascus, a remarkable volcanic formation, in shape resembling roughly a pear, about 25 miles from N. to S., and 19 miles from E. to W., the rugged surface of which consists of innumerable rocks or boulders of black basalt, intersected by fissures and crevices in every direction (see TRACHONITIS). This formation, which owes its origin to the streams of lava emitted from the Jebel Hauran, on the S.E., rises some 20–30 ft. above the surrounding plain; and 'its border is as clearly defined as a rocky coast, which it very much resembles.' It forms a natural fortress, which a small body of defenders could hold even against a determined invader; and hence its modern name the Leja (i.e. leja'ah, refuge, retreat). Some modern writers have accepted the identification thus suggested by Onk. and Jon., supporting it further, partly by the fact that the Leja contains the remains of several ancient cities, partly by the philological arguments that Argob signifies 'stony,' and that the term אֶרְגֹב (AV 'region'), used regularly in connexion with it in the OT, is intended as a designation of its rocky boundary spoken of above. The identification is, however, extremely doubtful, and has been abandoned by the best recent authorities. To take the latter point first, the philological arguments appealed to are exceedingly precarious. Argob can be interpreted stony only upon the questionable assumption that the root אֶרְגֹב is cognate with אֶרְגֹב: to judge, however, from אֶרְגֹב clouds of earth (Job 21³³ 38³⁵), it would denote naturally a rich and earthy soil rather than a stony one, and so (Smith, Geogr. 551) is 'probably equivalent to our word "glebe."' And אֶרְגֹב is a cord (Jos 2¹⁵), or measuring-line (Mic 2⁵), fig. a measured portion or allotment (Jos 17⁴ 19⁹), applied to a particular district or 'region' (RVm), Zeph 2⁵, 6, 7: there is consequently no ground for supposing it to have been used specially on account of the rocky border of the Leja. Secondly, the remains of ancient cities in (or about) what must have been the biblical Bashan are by no means confined to the Leja; on the contrary, they are much more numerous on the sloping sides of the Jebel Hauran (S.E. of the Leja), which, covered by a rich and loamy soil, sinks down gradually, especially on the S. and W., to the level of the surrounding plain. The whole of this region is studded with deserted towns and villages—according to Wetzstein, who has described it most fully (Reisebericht über Hauran u. die Trachonen, 1860, p. 42), the E. and S. slopes of the Jebel Hauran alone contain the remains of some 300 such ancient sites; they are also numerous on the W. and S.W. slopes (cf. Porter, *Five Years in Damascus*², pp. 229, 239, 251, 253). The dwellings in these deserted localities are of a remarkable character. Wetzstein distinguishes four kinds—(1) some are the habitations of Troglodytes, being caverns hollowed out in the side of a hill, or of a Wady, in the soft volcanic rock, and so arranged as to form separate chambers: these are chiefly on the E. of Jebel Hauran (Wetzstein, pp. 22, 44 f., who names three, viz. Umm Ḍubéb, 'Ajéla, and Shibikke).* (2) Others are on a larger scale, being subterranean chambers entered by shafts invisible from above, and capable of forming a secure retreat from an invader; these are frequent on the W. of the Zumleh range (ib. p. 46 f.; cf. Oliphant, Land of Gilead, pp. 103, 108 f. [about Irbid]); an extensive underground city of this kind at EDRE'I (at the N.E. foot of the same range) was explored by Wetzstein (p. 47 f.) and Schumacher (p. 121 ff.). (3) A third kind, of which Wetzstein saw but one example, at Hibikke, on the E. of J. Hauran, about 8 miles N.E. of Salchad, consists of chambers cut out in an elevated plateau of rock, and covered with a solid stone vault, producing outside the appearance of a cellar or tunnel. Hibikke was originally surrounded with a wall, in the manner of a fortress (p. 48 f.). (4) The fourth and commonest kind consists of dwelling-houses built in the ordinary manner above ground, but constructed of massive well-hewn blocks of black basalt,—the regular and indeed the only building material used in the locality, —with heavy doors moving on pivots, outside staircases, galleries, and roofs, all of the same material: of this kind are the remains described by Porter (l.c. chs. x.–xiii.) at Burák, on the N. edge of the Leja, Sauwarah, Hít, Heyát, Bathaniyeh, Shuka, Shuhba, east of it, Kanawát and Suweideh on the W. slopes of J. Hauran, Boṣrā, Salchad, and Kureiyeh, on its S. slope (cf. Heber-Percy, A Visit to Bashan and Argob, 1895, pp. 40, 47, 60, 71, etc., with photographs). Many of these cities are in such a good state of preservation, that, as Wetzstein observes, it is difficult for the traveller not to believe that they are inhabited, and to expect, as he walks along their streets, to see persons moving about the houses. The architecture of these remains (which include temples, theatres, aqueducts, churches, etc.) is of the Græco-Roman period, and is such as to show that between the first and the seventh centuries A.D. the cities in question were the home of a thriving and wealthy population. Can, now, any of these deserted localities be identified with the 'three-score cities, with high walls, gates, and bars,' of the ancient kingdom of 'Og? The spectacle presented by many of them is so singular and impressive that amongst those who visited and almost re-discovered them, in the present century, there were some who assigned them confidently to a remote antiquity, and who boasted that they had themselves traversed the cities 'built and occupied some forty centuries ago' by the giant race of the Rephaim: so, in particular, J. L. Porter, who visited the district in 1853 (Five Years in Damascus, 1855, ii. 206 f., ed. 2, pp. 257 f., 263 f.; Giant Cities of Bashan, 1892, pp. 12, 13, 30, 84, etc.), and Cyril C. Graham, who visited it in 1857 (Journal of the Royal Geogr. Soc. 1858, p. 256 f., Cambridge Essays for 1858, p. 160 f.). The emphatic contradiction which Porter's theory received from Douglas Freshfield in The Central Caucasus and Bashan, 1869, ch. ii., led to a somewhat heated correspondence in the Athenæum for 1870 (June, pp. 774, 837; July, pp. 18, 117, 148; cf. also

* The habit of dwelling in caves in these parts is illustrated by an interesting but unfortunately mutilated inscription (Le Bas and Waddington, Inscriptions Grecques et Latines recueillies en Grèce et en Asie Mineure, iii. 1, No. 2329) from Kanatha (Kanawát), on the W. slope of J. Hauran, which seems to speak of an attempt made by king Agrippa (prob. Agrippa I.) to civilize τοὺς ἰσχυροτάτους, and reclaim them from their ὀπιθίους κατάρτους (cf. Jos. Ant. xiv. xv. 5; also, of the Leja, x. 1; xvi. ix. 1).

Porter, *Damascus*², Preface). There can, however, be little doubt that Porter and Graham much exaggerated the antiquity of these remains. As has been stated, the prevalent style of architecture is Græco-Roman; in many of the cities Greek inscriptions, dating from the time of Herod onwards, have been found, and, in the opinion of the best and most independent judges, the extant remains, at least in the great majority of cases, are not of a more ancient date than the 1st cent. A.D. De Vogué, the principal authority on the architecture of the Hauran, in the preface (p. 4)* to his collection of 150 plates, called Syrie Centrale, Architecture Civile et Religieuse du i^{er} au vii^e siècle (1867), expressly states that he had found no structures of an earlier date: Burton and Drake (Unexplored Syria, 1872, i. 191-196) declare that even a careful examination of foundations disclosed to them no specimen of 'hoar antiquity.' Wetzstein and Waddington express a similar judgment, though not quite in the same unqualified terms: the former (pp. 103 f., 49) agrees that in the main there are no edifices earlier in date than the Christian era, but allows that the Troglodyte dwellings, and those found at Hibikke (see above), may be of very great antiquity, and also that very ancient building materials may be preserved in such places as Bosrâ and Salchat; the latter writes (op. cit. p. 534): 'Malgré les recherches prolongées et minutieuses que j'ai faites pendant un séjour de cinq mois dans le pays, je n'ai pu découvrir aucun monument antérieur au règne d'Hérode. Il y a sans doute des habitations grossièrement construites en pierres brutes, des cavernes fermées par une devanture en pierres sèches, qui peuvent être de toutes les époques, et dont quelques-unes sont peut-être fort anciennes, mais, je le répète, il n'y a pas trace de civilisation régulière, de temples, d'édifices publics, avant le règne d'Hérode.' And the majority even of such buildings, he adds, are later than this, and belong to the period between Trajan and Justinian. The caves and tunnel-like dwellings, described by Wetzstein, however, can hardly be the strongly fortified cities mentioned in Dt. Whether the low private dwellings, built with 'ponderous blocks of roughly hewn stone,' on the antiquity of which Porter (*Damascus*², pp. v, 257) insists, are identical with the 'habitations grossièrement construites en pierres brutes,' which Waddington allows may be ancient, can hardly be determined by one who has not visited the country.† On the whole, it may be safely concluded that the existing deserted cities are not those of the ancient Argob;‡ though it does not seem improbable that some of the cities built in the Græco-Roman period may have stood upon the sites of cities belonging to a far earlier age, and that in their construction the dwellings of the ancient cities of 'Og may have been, in some cases, utilised and preserved. Perhaps future exploration may prove the substructures to be of earlier date than has been hitherto suspected.§

The site of Argob cannot be determined with certainty. Guthe (ZDPV, 1890, p. 237 f.), inferring from Dt 3¹⁴ that Argob extended to the W. as far as Geshur and Ma'acah, places it, though not without hesitation, in the country about Der'ât (Edre'i), and northwards as far as Nawâ, in which he says that there are sufficient ruins of

* Cited at length in Merrill, East of Jordan, p. 63.

† Heber-Percy, pp. 92, 95, states that at Roum (E. of Kanawât) he found ruins different from any which he had hitherto seen, viz. a village consisting of one-storied houses, built almost entirely of rough unhewn stones; he thought that this had been a village of peasants.

‡ So also G. A. Smith, Geogr. p. 624 f.

§ W. Wright (Palmira and Zenobia, p. 251) mentions that he descended some 16-18 ft. in Burâk, and found the walls there to consist of enormous undressed stones, unlike those on the surface.

ancient sites to justify the biblical description. The inference based on Dt 3¹⁴ is perhaps doubtful: the verse seems to be written with a harmonistic motive (see Comm., and JAIR), and hardly says distinctly that Argob reached to Geshur and Ma'acah. Dillm. suggested a site more towards the E., between Edre'i and 'Ashtaroth, and J. Hauran. If there is reason in the supposition that the deserted cities referred to above stand upon the site of the ancient cities of 'Og, the part of Bashan in which they are most numerous would seem to be the W. declivities of J. Hauran, N. of Salchah (the S.E. limit of Bashan), the soil of which—a disintegrated lava—is rich and fertile (Wetzst. p. 40 f.), such as might be described by a derivative of אָרְגָב.*

ARIDAI (אֲרִידַי Est 9⁹), the ninth of Haman's sons, put to death by the Jews. The name is prob. Persian, perhaps haridayas, 'delight of Hari' (Ges. Theo. add.); but LXX has a different text.

H. A. WHITE.

ARIDATHA (אֲרִידַתָּה Est 9⁸), the sixth son of Haman, put to death by the Jews. The name is perhaps from the Persian Haridâta, 'given by Hari'; but the LXX has Φαραδάθα, this name coming fourth.

ARIEH (אֲרִיֵהוּ, with def. article, 'the lion').—Mentioned with Argob in a very obscure passage (2 K 15²⁵). See ARGOB. C. F. BURNEY.

ARIEL (אֲרִיֵאל, 'Αριήλ).—1. The name of one of Ezra's 'chief men,' Ezr 8¹⁶. It doubtless signifies here 'lion of God.' 2. The name, in RV (so LXX and most moderns), of a Moabite whose two sons were slain by Benaiah, one of David's mighty men, 2 S 23²⁰,† 1 Ch 11²² (LXX, in later passage, has ροῦς δύο ἀριήλ). 3. A name, in Is 29¹⁻² (four times), for Jerusalem. The original meaning is quite uncertain. It may be (see RVm) either (1) 'lion (or lioness) of God,' so, among others, Ewald, Cheyne (Comm.), Dillm.; or (2) 'hearth of God,' so the Targum, Del., Orelli, W. R. Smith (*OTJC*² p. 356), König (Lehrgeb. d. Heb. Spr. ii. 1, p. 416). The latter seems the more probable, in view of אֲרִיֵאל (God's hearth = altar, RV 'altar hearth'), Ezk 43¹⁵, and אֲרִיֵאל with the same signification on the stele of Mesha (l. 12). Duhm (Comm. in loc.) takes l as a formative letter, and suggests aryal as original form (=sacrificial hearth). Cheyne (Introd. to Is. p. 187, n.) now favours this, and writes Ariel. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

ARIMATHÆA ('Αριμαθαία), Mt 27⁵⁷⁻⁶⁰.—The situation of this place is not indicated. In the Onomasticon (s.v. Armathem-Sophim) it is identified with Ramathaim-zophim (1 S 1¹), and placed near Thamna and Lydda. The village Rantieh

* The Onom. (p. 216) identifies 'Αριήλ with a village 'Erya, 15 miles W. of Gerasa, which may well be er-Rujéb, on the W. Rujéb, at just that distance from Gerasa; but this is clearly too far south for the Argob in Bashan.

† AV has 'two lion-like men of Moab.' For other suggested emendations, see Klostermann's Comm. in loc., whose ingenious conjecture has been accepted by Budde (in Haupt's Bible); Sayce, Athenæum, Oct. 9, 1886; and W. R. Smith, RS 462.

seems intended, but the various traditions disagree and have no value. See SWP vol. ii. sheet xv. See also ARUMAH. C. R. CONDER.

ARIOCH (אִרְיָח).—1. ARIUCH was the vassal-king of Ellasar, under the Elamite king Chedor-laomer, when the latter invaded Canaan in the time of Abraham (Gn 14¹). The name has been found in the cuneiform inscriptions of Babylonia.* When the country was still divided into more than one kingdom, Eri-Aku, 'the servant of the moon-god,' was king of Larsa (now Senkereh, between the Tigris and Euphrates in the south of Babylonia, a little east of Erech). Larsa is evidently the biblical Ellasar. The name of Eri-Aku was transformed by his Sem. subjects into Rim-Sin (pron. Riv-Sin, whence the v of Arioeh), and explained as a Sem. compound, like the names of other Bab. kings of the period. He was the son of an Elamite, Kudur-Mabug, who is called 'the father of the land of the Amorites' or Syria, and the son of Simti-silkhak. Inscribed bricks of his exist, as well as contracts drawn up during his reign. In his inscriptions he calls himself 'the shepherd of the possessions of Nippur, the executor of the oracle of the holy tree of Eridu, the shepherd of Ur, the king of Larsa, and the king of Sumer and Accad,' and in one of them he mentions his conquest of 'the ancient city of Erech.' He was attacked by Khammurabi, king of Babylon, and in spite of the assistance furnished by the Elamites was defeated and overthrown. Khammurabi annexed his kingdom, and from henceforth Babylonia became a single monarchy, with Babylon as its capital. Mr. Pinches has lately found a tablet, belonging, however, to a late period, in which mention is made of Eri-Aku, Tudkhula or Tidal, the son of Gazza (ni?), and Kudur-Lagamar, the Chedor-laomer of Genesis. 2. The 'captain of the king's guard' in the time of Nebuchadrezzar, according to Dn 2¹⁴⁻²⁵. The name, however, was Sumerian, and not used at that period of Bab. history. It has been taken from Gn 14¹. 3. King of 'the Elymaeans' or Elam, acc. to Jth 1⁶. The name has been borrowed from Gn 14¹, where it stands beside that of Chedor-laomer, king of Elam.

ARISTARCHUS (Ἀριστάρχος), the devoted fellow-labourer of St. Paul, was a native of Thessalonica (Ac 20⁴ 27²). He is first mentioned as having been seized along with Gaius during the great riot at Ephesus. He accompanied St. Paul from Troas on his last journey to Jerusalem (Ac 20⁴), and thereafter on his passage to Rome (Ac 27²). He was with St. Paul at Rome when he wrote the Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon (Col 4¹⁰, Philem 24). It has been suggested that he shared St. Paul's imprisonment voluntarily, and that he and Epaphras (cf. Col 4⁹, Philem 23) may have participated in the apostle's bonds alternately. The word used by St. Paul in these passages (συναϊχάλωτος) has led to the further suggestion that the reference is to spiritual captivity, that in common with the apostle they were held captive by Christ; but that is not likely. Tradition affirms that Aristarchus suffered martyrdom in Rome under Nero. W. MUIR.

ARISTOBULUS (Ἀριστοβούλος).—1. Amongst the list of persons greeted by St. Paul at the end of the Epistle to the Romans (16¹⁰) are certain called τοὺς ἐκ τῶν Ἀριστοβούλου, 'members of the household of Aristobulus.' The following is the explanation of this phrase given by Bishop Lightfoot.

A., son of the elder A. and Berenice, grandson of Herod and brother of Agrippa I. (see HEROD), lived and died a private man, was a friend of the Emperor Claudius, and apparently a resident in Rome. It is suggested that the 'household' of A. were his slaves, who after his death, which must have taken place before this time, had become the property of the emperor, probably by legacy. We know that in other cases members of households which became the property of the emperor, retained their name. We find Maecenatiani (CIL vi. 4016, 4032), Amyntiani (ib. 4035, cf. 8738), Agrippiani, Germaniciani. So, too, there might be Aristobuliani, and this would be translated of Ἀριστοβούλου. This household would presumably contain many Jews and other Orientals, and would therefore be a natural place in which to find Christians. The name Herodion following, was that of a Jew, and suggests a member of the Herod family. See HERODION, NARCISSUS.

ARIUS (Ἄρης, 1 Mac 12⁷ 20), a king of Sparta. In v.⁷ the name appears in the corrupt form of Δαρείος; in v.²⁰ many MSS read Ὀνιάρης or Ὀρειάρης, a form produced by the combination of Ὀνία Ἄρης (so v.¹⁹ in AV Oniaries); but * Ὀνιαρῆς, Vet. Lat. Arius; in Jos. Ant. XIII. v. 8, the reading varies between Ἀρειαῖος and Ἀρεῖς, the latter being the more correct form. The person referred to is Areus I., the grandson and successor of Cleomenes II., who was king of Sparta from 309 B.C. to 265 B.C., and was contemporary with the high priest Onias I., the successor of Jaddua. The Spartans were at that time engaged in a struggle against Antigonos and his son Demetrius Poliorcetes, and they probably hoped to create difficulties for their opponent by raising disturbances in the East. Friendly letters were interchanged between Areus and Onias (probably about 300 B.C.); and Jonathan Maccabæus refers to these communications in a letter which he sent by his ambassadors to Sparta (about 144 B.C.), 1 Mac 12⁷ 19¹¹. ARK OF INFANT MOSES.—A box (קֶבֶד tēbhah), made of bulrushes or papyrus reeds, the stems of a succulent water plant, rendered watertight by layers of slime and pitch, in which Moses when three months old was placed and committed to the river (Ex 2³). The word seemingly is of Egyptian origin, primarily meaning 'hollow,' 'a concave vessel,' and the possible source of the obscure Heb. root which appears in 'ob, ventriloquist, necromancer, ghost. Papyrus reeds were commonly used in Egypt for the construction of light boats. A very similar story of a remarkable preservation is told on a Babylonian tablet from Kouyunjik, about Sargon I., a monarch who reigned in Agade, one of the cities of the Euphrates valley, c. 3500 B.C. It is said (see Smith, Chaldean Genesis, 880, p. 319) that his mother placed him in a basket of rushes, sealing up his exit with bitumen, and launching him on a river which did not drown him, from which he was taken and brought up by his preserver.

ARK OF NOAH.—The vessel built by the patriarch at God's command for saving life upon the earth during the great Flood. The period of detention within it is said to have lasted over a year (Gn 7¹¹ 8¹⁴ P); hence it was necessary that large accommodation should be provided for the storage of provisions. The ark, in short, is to be conceived of as an immense floating store, fitted to lie solidly on the surface of the waters. Its dimensions were: 300 cubits long, 50 cubits broad, and 30 cubits high. The length of the cubit is six hand-breadths, and is usually reckoned at 21 inches. In our measures, therefore, the ark would be 525 ft. long, 87½ ft. broad, and 52½ ft. high. In 1609, Peter Jansen of Horn in Holland built a vessel of the same proportions, and found that it would stow one-third more cargo than other ships of ordinary structure. It has been calculated that it would contain a space of 3,600,000 cubic ft., and that after 9/10 had been set aside for storage of food, there would be over 50 cubic ft. each allowed for 7000 pairs of animals. Such calculations, though in earlier times treated with all seriousness, now receive little consideration. The measurements given in the biblical text are not sufficiently detailed, nor is the description of the whole construction sufficiently explicit, to form the basis of such conclusions. (See BABYLONIA, FLOOD.)

The ark was built of gopher wood, supposed to mean pitch wood, and possibly, as Delitzsch suggests, the conifer cypress, much used by the Phoenicians for shipbuilding on account of its lightness and durability. It was divided into 'rooms' or 'nests,' קנים. The whole structure was three storeys in height, and was lighted by windows under the roof on each side. The pitch used to render the ark watertight was not vegetable, but mineral pitch or asphalt. Berosus, writing about B.C. 300, asserts that remains of the ark were then found in Armenia, which were used in making bracelets and amulets. Between the announcement to Noah of the coming Flood and the actual fulfilment of the judgment, there intervened, acc. to Gn 6³ (J), 120 years, and during that time the ark was building, and Noah was, by word and by act, a preacher of righteousness to his generation (1 P 3²⁰, 2 P 2⁹).

J. MACPHERSON.

ARK OF THE COVENANT.—i. NAME.—The ark (אֲרוֹן) was the most ancient and most sacred of the religious symbols of the Heb. nation. Its name in the oldest sources is 'the ark of J'' (אֲרוֹן יְהוָה), or 'the ark of God' (אֲרוֹן אֱלֹהִים). In Dt we first* meet with the designation 'ark of the Covenant of J'' (אֲרוֹן בְּרִית יְהוָה), Dt 10³ 31⁹, 25², 28⁶, shortened elsewhere to the familiar 'ark of the Covenant,' Jos 3⁶, 8 etc. In several passages of the older hist. books (cf. LXX text of 1 S 4³⁻⁵) which have been edited by writers of the Deuteronomic school, the earlier form 'ark of J'' has been expanded to 'ark of the Covenant of J'' (as is clear from such grammatical impossibilities as we find in Jos 3¹⁴⁻¹⁷), and the favourite expression 'ark of the Covenant' intentionally or unintentionally substituted for the earlier forms. A still later designation, 'ark of the testimony' (אֲרוֹן הַעֲדוּת), occurs only in P, Ex 25²² etc. The rest of the names occasionally met with are merely variations of these. Throughout all the books we find 'the ark' as the popular and universally intelligible designation.

ii. HISTORY OF THE ARK.—In this article we propose to confine ourselves to the history and significance of the ark as given in the pre-exilic literature. Its place in the scheme of the Priests' Code will be discussed in the article TABERNACLE. In the prophetic narrative of the Pent. (JE) the ark first appears as an object of peculiar sanctity in the important passage Nu 10^{33a}. † Here it is expressly recognised as the leader of the host in the march through the desert, in virtue of its being, in some sense, the dwelling-place of J'. In another passage from the same source, Nu 14⁴, the ark is intimately associated with Moses.

Had these sources come down to us intact, we should have had much earlier information than anything which we now have regarding the origin and construction of the ark. No one can read the present text of Ex 33 without being struck with the abrupt transition from vv. 1-6 to v. 7^d, and with the sudden introduction of 'the tent' (v. 7) as of something already explained. We may therefore consider it a matter of certainty that the compiler of the Pent. has omitted from the prophetic source the accounts of the erection of 'the tent of meeting' as inconsistent with the much fuller account in P. Another question now emerges. Did the excised portion of JE also contain an account or accounts of the construction of the ark? To this an affirmative answer must be given; for if we read carefully the retrospect given in Dt 10⁴⁻⁵, and bear in mind that the whole of D's historical references are taken from the prophetic narratives, we can scarcely have any doubt that in JE, as it lay before the author of D, there must have been a record of the construction by Moses of 'an ark of wood' (Dt 10⁴) before his ascent to the mount. In the absence of the original text of these older sources, it is no longer possible to speak with certainty as to their mode of conceiving J's relation to the ark. The most probable view seems to be that already referred to as found in the antique poetical fragment, Nu 10³⁵⁻³⁶, where J' is conceived of as personally present in the ark, and guiding the march of His chosen people. The same representation is met with somewhat later in the composite narrative (chiefly JE)* of the passage of the Jordan, in which the ark, borne by the priests, shows the way, while the people follow at a considerable distance (Jos 3^{3a}). During the subsequent conquest of W. Pal., as related in the Books of Jos and Jg 1-2 from materials of various dates, the ark and the tent of meeting must have had their headquarters in the standing camp at Gilgal (Jos 9⁶ 10^{4b}), the former we may suppose frequently accompanying the tribes to battle. Thus we know the prominence given to the ark in the siege of Jericho (Jos 6); and the sacrifice in the presence of the ark on Mt Ebal (Jos 8³ from D²) may be taken as a typical episode in the history of the conquest. From Gilgal the headquarters were moved by divine command to Bethel (Jg 2^{1a}). †

The next resting-place of the ark was at Shiloh, in the territory of Ephraim. Here, according to P (Jos 18¹), it was deposited by Joshua himself, and here it is found at the close of the period of the Judges (1 S 3³). The original tent ‡ is now replaced by a temple (1 S 1⁹ 3³), the guardians of which are members of an ancient priestly family (1 S 2²⁷), with Samuel the Ephraimite as attendant.

The following section (chs. 4¹⁻⁷) is a document of the first importance as a record of the popular conceptions of the ancient Hebrews with regard to the ark. The various incidents in the narrative are too familiar to need repetition. The leading thought throughout is the conviction that the presence of the ark secures the presence of J' Himself in the camp of the Hebrews. §

The capture of the sacred object by the Philis-

‡ The words of 1 S 2^{22b}, wanting in LXX, are admittedly a very late addition to the original text (Wellh., Driver, Kloost., Budde).

§ This is clear from the whole tenor of the narrative without our requiring to read, with Kloost., 'our God' (אֱלֹהֵינוּ) for 'unto us' (43). It is also more than probable, in view of the fem. construction in v. 17, that we should render, 'that he may come and save us.' Cf. 6²⁰.

tines, the effect of the news on the aged Eli, the incidents of its sojourn in Phil. territory, and its restoration, are graphically told by the narrator.* After a short stay at Bethshemesh, the ark is removed to Kiriath-jearim and deposited in the house of Abinadab 'in the hill,' while Eleazar, his son, is set apart as its guardian. Here it remained, according to a later addition to the text, for twenty years, a period admittedly too short by at least a generation.† Why an object of such sanctity was not restored to its proper home in the temple of Shiloh we can only conjecture. Most probably the temple had been destroyed, and Shiloh‡ itself occupied by the Philistines. As a result a period of spiritual declension followed, lasting well into the reign of Saul § (cf. 1 Ch 13⁹). The centre of the purest teaching must have been the home of Samuel at Ramah (1 S 7⁷), the fruit of which we may perhaps trace in the higher religious conceptions that mark the reign of David.

This sovereign, once securely seated on the throne of 'all Israel,' took active steps for the removal of the ark to his new capital on the slopes of Ophel, as related at some length in 2 S 6 and lovingly expanded in 1 Ch 13. The text of the former passage has suffered greatly, but the general sense is clear. From the house of Abinadab at Kiriath-jearim [otherwise Baalath (of Judah), Jos 15⁹] the ark is brought in state on the way to Jerus. The sons of Abinadab, Uzzah and Ahio, are in charge of the new cart on which the ark has been placed, the former walking|| beside the ark, the latter guiding the oxen in front. Dismayed by a sign of the divine displeasure, David desists from his purpose for a time, leaving the ark in the custody of Obed-edom the Gittite. After three months, however, the removal is successfully accomplished, and the ark safely deposited 'in the midst of the tent that David had pitched for it' (v. 17). After this, in the epigrammatic words of the Chronicler, the ark had rest (1 Ch 6³¹). For the last time we meet with the ark as the representative of J'' on the field of battle in the campaign against the children of Ammon (2 S 11¹¹). Somewhat later, on the occasion of Absalom's rebellion, when the priests Zadok and Abiathar ¶ (2 S 15^{24ff.}), in accordance with ancient custom, wished to take the ark as the guarantee of J''s presence with them, the king shows that he has attained to a worthier view of the divine nature by ordering the restoration of the ark to its proper abode in Jerusalem.

The last chapter in the history of the ark opens with its removal by Solomon from its modest tent, and its installation in the inner sanctuary of the temple, 'under the wings of the cherubim' (1 K 8^{1ff.}). From this point onwards there is no mention of the ark in the older historical books. Was it, as some think, among 'the treasures of the house of the Lord' which Shishak carried off

* It is important to observe that the MT of 6¹⁹ will not bear the rendering put upon it by AV and RV, 'because they looked into the ark.' The text, however, is corrupt. Adopting Klostermann's 'happy suggestion' (Budde) we render, 'But the sons of J. did not rejoice among the men of B. when they beheld the ark of J'', and he smote,' etc.

† There is no ground in the text for the statement in Smith's *DB*² that to Kiriath-jearim "all the house of Israel" resorted to seek J''. Whatever may be the meaning of the obscure and probably corrupt וַיֵּרָאוּ, 7², the verse serves as the introduction to the following narrative of Samuel's prophetic activity.

‡ It is a mistake to base the assertion that 'in the early part of Saul's reign Ahiah was the Lord's priest in Shiloh' (Smith's DB—ARK) on 1 S 14³, for the qualifying phrase refers, not to Ahiah, but to Eli. Equally groundless is the supposition (op. cit.) that the ark may have been at Nob.

§ In 1 S 14^{18a} where the true rendering is clearly 'the ephod' (LXX; cf. v. 3), the retention of 'the ark' in RV is inexcusable. V. 18^b is, of course, an explanatory gloss like Jg 20^{27b}.

so early as the reign of Rehoboam? (1 K 14²⁶). Or was it first removed by Manasseh to make way for his image of Astarte (2 Ch 33⁷), and reinstated by Josiah (35³), to perish finally in the destruction of city and temple by Nebuchadrezzar? The latter seems on the whole the more probable view (cf. 2 Es 10²²), if the single reference, Jer 31^{16, 17}, really implies (which is doubtful) the existence of the ark in the prophet's day, although it must be confessed that the silence of the rest of the prophetic literature is difficult to explain (cf. Kuenen, Rel. of Israel, i. p. 233). The fable of 2 Mac 2⁴ is evidently based on the passage of Jeremiah just quoted. There was no ark in the second temple (Jos. Wars, v. v. 5).

iii. From the analogy of other objects bearing the same name,* as well as from the measurements in the scheme of the priestly code (Ex 25¹⁰), we may best think of the ark as an oblong chest of acacia or shittim wood (so Dt 10¹⁻³, doubtless following the other sources JE; see § ii. above). In the absence of the original text of these sources in Ex 33. 34 it is impossible to say with absolute certainty whether the ark was represented by them as furnished with figures corresponding to the cherubim of P (Ex 25^{18ff.}). They are not mentioned in Dt 10¹⁻³, nor in the Books of Sam. or Kings—the phrase 'that sitteth upon the cherubim' (RV) of 1 S 4⁵, 2 S 6², if not a late gloss (so Kuenen, Smend, Nowack, etc.), being capable of another explanation. The language of 1 K 8⁸ further seems to imply the absence of cherubim on the ark itself. This result is confirmed by what we may infer as to the size of the sacred chest, for we find it carried by two priests (2 S 15²⁹, also in corrected text of v. 24, 1 S 4^{5b}). An important difference of representation exists between the provisions of the Priests' Code—by which the ark had to be carried by Levites (Nu 3³¹ 4¹⁵), as distinguished from a higher caste of Aaronic priests—and those of the older legislation of Dt. First, indeed, among the privileges of the whole priestly tribe of Levi enumerated in Dt 10—privileges assigned to them, we can scarcely doubt, as the reward of their zeal and fidelity in the cause of J'' (Ex 32^{26ff.})—is that of bearing 'the ark of J'' (cf. Dt 31^{9, 25}). And this is in accord with the evidence of the older historical books in which the priests are the bearers of the ark [see ref. above, and cf. Jos 3³ (E), 6⁶ (J), 6^{6, 12} (E), 8³³, 1 K 2²⁶ 8^{3, 6} † etc.]. As to the precise relation of the ark in earlier times to the ritual of sacrifice, we have no contemporary evidence.

iv. Every student of OT who has realised to what extent the pre-exilic literature has been worked over by later editors, will appreciate the difficulty, if not the impossibility, of gaining an accurate estimate of the conceptions entertained of the ark in the earliest times. So much depends also on the opinion we may form of the historical value of even our oldest sources. This much, however, seems clear. The ark is in these sources something more than a mere symbol of the divine presence. By the popular mind, at least, J'' was conceived as actually residing in the ark,—a conviction clearly reflected in the ancient fragment, Nu 10^{35, 36}. That the ark was regarded as, in some sense, the abode of the Deity, is apparent also, as we saw above, from the early narratives in the Books of Samuel. Even by David himself, if we can trust the reading, the ark is still spoken of as God's habitation (2 S 15²⁵).

Only on the basis of this conception can we explain the fact that in all the passages we have studied, 'before the ark of Jⁿ' is identical with, or parallel to, 'before Jⁿ' Himself (cf. e.g. Jos 6^s with 6^s*). What is done in close proximity to the ark is everywhere represented as done in the presence of Jⁿ, as sacrifice (2 S 6¹³), casting of lots (Jos 18⁶, 10), dancing (2 S 6¹⁷), and the like. With the spread of more developed views of religion under the influence of prophetic teaching, the importance of the ark undoubtedly decreased, a fact to which we may perhaps ascribe the silence of later writings regarding it. The ark in any case must be regarded as from the first a national and not a merely tribal sanctuary.† Its loss is bewailed as a national calamity (1 S 4²¹, 22). Nor does the writer see reason (even granted that 1 K 8⁹ may be a gloss) for rejecting the ancient tradition which the author of Dt found in his sources, that the ark contained the tables originally deposited there by Moses himself (Dt 10²). The view now generally adopted by continental writers, that if the ark really contained anything at all, it was a stone or stones of fetish origin, involves a conception of Moses and his teaching which the writer cannot share. On the other hand, the statement that the ark contained also the pot of manna and Aaron's rod that budded (He 9⁴), seems based on a late Jewish tradition.

Arka is also mentioned in the inscription of Tiglath-pileser II. as one of the towns reduced by that monarch (Schrader, *COT*² i. 87, 246). Jos. (Ant. i. vi. 2) states that Arucas, one of the sons of Canaan, possessed Arce, situated at the N.W. base of the Lebanon. It was still a place of considerable importance in the Middle Ages, and sustained a severe siege in A.D. 1138, but was taken by the Crusaders. Its site is now marked by the ruins of Tell Arka. ARM (אַרְמַת זֶרְעָא), the outstretched arm; also the straight foreleg of an animal. 1. As a unit of measurement arm follows the hand with its digit, palm, span, and gives the standard length called the 'ammah' (see WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, s.v. 'cubit'). As this seems to have varied from 17.6 in. to 25.19, it is possible that besides the reckoning of the fore-arm, there was another of the arm's length, the latter corresponding to the modern Arab. dihirā'a, 24 in. The kindred Arab. word for full-arm (dharā'a) also means, like the fig. use of zēra'a, capacity, influence, power. 2. Fig. use of Arm.—Among Orientals the extended arm is a familiar sign of animation and action. During the excitement of discussion, it is an understood prelude to speech, and implies the possession of something that ought to be heard. Throughout the Bible the a. is an expressive emblem of power to direct, control, seize, overcome, and hence also describes the purpose, either of punishment or protection, towards which the power is employed.

Thus the Exodus is freq. referred to as the 'outstretched a.' of God. Similarly the a. of Pharaoh is said to be broken; and the doom of Eli's family is called the cutting off of his a., and that of his father's house. In the same way, the unwelcome novelty of the spiritual kingdom and its living sacrifice raises the prophetic lament—'to whom hath the a. of the Lord been revealed'? (Is 53¹). Further, the original meaning of power is sometimes transcended, and by frequency of special association the motive of holiness is transferred to the a.—'The Lord hath made bare his holy arm' (Is 52¹⁰). On the other hand, utter powerlessness is the a. 'clean-dried-up' (Zec 11¹⁷). Cf. Job's imprecation on the abuse of power (Job 31²²). So the appeal of the helpless is 'Put on strength, O arm of the Lord!' (Is 51⁹). Hence, finally, the contrast between the man who makes flesh his arm, and Israel for whose security 'underneath are the Everlasting Arms' (Dt 33²⁷). See also HAND.

ARMENIAN VERSION OF THE OT.—The following points need discussion as regards the Armenian OT.

- i. The text from which it was translated.
- ii. Its value for critical purposes.
- iii. Its date, and where it was made.
- iv. Its contents, and order of books.

i. The Arm. OT is a version of the Gr. LXX, the text of which it everywhere fits closely as a glove the hand that wears it. This statement has been controverted; * but its truth is apparent if we anywhere open the Peshitta or Massora and, noting their peculiarities, look for them in the Armenian. Let us test it then by a few cases where the Syriac Peshitta varies from the LXX; but where the LXX is exactly rendered by the Arm., the sense of which I occasionally add within square brackets.

Syriac Version.
Vae diripienti: vos ne diripiatis, et deceptor nequam decipiet vos, cum volueritis diripere, diripiemi. Domine miserere nostri, quoniam in te est fiducia nostra: esto adiutor noster in matutino, et salva nos in tempore angustiae.

Armenian Version.
Woe unto those who distress you, but yourselves no one can distress: and he that despiseth, despiseth not you. For they shall be given over unto defeat who despise you, and like the moth upon the garment, so shall they be given over to defeat. Lord, pity us; for in thee have we hoped. The seed of the unfaithful hath come to destruction; but our salvation is in thee in time of straits.

In all these cases the Arm. is faithful, as against the Syr., to the LXX. In spite of this general conformity, however, there are numerous cases in which the Arm. supplies omissions of the LXX; e.g. Is 66^s runs thus in the Arm.: 'But the lawless who offers to me an ox as offering [is just as if one should smite the head of a man, and he that offers the sheep as offering] is just as if one should slaughter a dog.' Here the words bracketed have dropt out of the ordinary LXX text; but they were added to the LXX text by Sym. and Theod.

In Jeremiah the traces of correction by direct or indirect use of the Massoretic or Syr. texts are frequent, e.g. ch. 16^s the Arm. = et ne gignantur tibi filii et filiae. In v. 4 it = sed in exemplum erunt super faciem terrae. In gladio cadent et in fame consummabuntur. Et erunt cadavera eorum in cibum volatilibus caeli et bestiis terrae. In the above the plural gignantur . . . filii et filiae in v. 2, and in v. 4 exemplum, belong to the LXX; but the arrangement of clauses in v. 4, as also the addition cadavera eorum, are due to the Syr. or to the Massora. It may be noticed that Jerome, who consulted the Heb. text, combines it with the LXX in just the same way, only reading with the Heb. sterquilinum for exemplum. In order to demonstrate this composite character of the Arm. text, I give a collation with Tischendorf's text of ch. 23. Wherever the variants of the Armenian reflect the Massoretic or Syr. texts, or both, I add M or S or SM.

The arrangement also in the Arm. of verses and chapters of Jeremiah follows SM and not the LXX. Where S and M differ it is usually M which the Arm. follows; but the basis of its text, even where it is so copiously supplemented as in this chapter of Jeremiah, is clearly the LXX. It is certain, then, that in OT the Armenians translated the LXX, supplementing it, however, and adjusting it to the Massoretic text. The only question remaining regards the medium through which they knew the Massora. From their traditional account of the making of the version we might infer that they knew the Heb. through the Syr., and in the case of some few parts of OT this may have been so. But more often, and especially in the prophetic books, it is the Heb. rather than the Syr. text which directly or indirectly was used.

This composite character of the Arm. text is probably due to the fact that the translators used the Hexaplaric text of Origen, whose obeli and asterisks, marking additions of the LXX to the Massora, or additions to the LXX from Aq. Sym. Theod. Gr. VS of the Massora, here and there survive in Arm. MSS,* as well as actual marginal references to these Gr. VSS. used by Origen. The Armenians, then, must have made their version from a Hexaplaric text such as we have in the Gr. Codices 22 and 88.

ii. In answering the first question, we have by implication answered also the second of those which we asked above, viz. as to the value for critical purposes of the Arm. version. It needs only to be added, that for beauty of diction and accuracy of rendering the Arm. cannot be surpassed. The genius of the language is such as to admit of a tr. of any Gr. document both literal and graceful; true to the order of the Gr., and even reflecting its compound words, yet without being slavish, and without violence to its own idiom. We are seldom in doubt as to what stood in the Armenian's Gr. text; therefore his version has almost the same value for us as the Gr. text itself, from which he worked, would possess. The same criticism is true of the Arm. NT as well.

iii. Three Arm. writers of the 5th cent., Koriun, Lazar of Pharpi, and Moses of Chorene, record that the Scriptures were translated between A.D. 396 and 430 by Mesrop, the elaborator of the Arm. alphabet, Sahak the Patriarch, Eznik, and others. According to Koriun (p. 10 of Arm. edition of Venice, 1833), Mesrop, with the help of a Gr. scribe Rufinus, began a version in Edessa about 397 A.D., commencing with the Proverbs of Solomon. The context implies that they used a Gr. copy; and they may have taken the second half of a Bible, complete in two volumes, of which the second began with Proverbs. There can be no other reason why they began there. Later on Koriun and Eznik fetched back from Constantinople an accurate and sure copy of the Scriptures, and the work of translation already begun by Sahak was resumed.

Moses of Chorene says that Sahak's inchoate version was from the Syr., because the Pers. king Meroujah had burned, thirty years before, all the Gr. books of the Armenians. Lazar, however, who is more credible, declares that Sahak's version of the Old and New Testaments was made from Gr. Lastly, Moses (iii. 60) declares that Sahak and Mesrop, not content with their Byzantine 'exact' copies, sent himself to Alexandria for the purpose of completing their work in ways not clearly specified. Moses also states that two of the translators, John and Artzan, on their way to Constantinople, stayed in Cæsarea (? of Cappadocia). The accounts of these writers then add little to our knowledge. We may only gather that texts from Edessa, Byzantium, and Alexandria were used by the translators. The translation itself was no doubt made in the basin of Ararat, where lay the earliest centres of Arm. Christianity, Valarshapat, with its convent of Edschmiatzin, and Twin.

iv. The books of the OT in Arm. MSS follow the order given in Tischendorf's LXX (Lipsiæ, 1880) as far as 1 and 2 Es (except that 2 Es in Arm. = the Gr. Ezra); then follow: Neh (called in the

* E.g. in Ex 33⁴ the Arm. = 'And the congregation having heard that evil word, lamented lamenting* and the man did not take the ornament on his person.' If the Syr. lower margin 3 Es), Est, Jth, To, 1 to 3 Mac, Ps, Pr, Ec, Ca, Wis, Job, Is, the XII Prophets, Jer, Bar, La, Death of Jer, Dn, Ezk, Death of Ezk. In some codices Job follows 3 Mac and precedes Psalms. Various Apoc. books also appear in the MSS, viz.: The Testaments of the XII Patriarchs, the History of Joseph and his wife Asenath, and the Hymn of Asenath. All these are given in Lord Zouche's Bible after Gn and before Ex under the general title of 'Book of Paralipomena,' as if they were esteemed part of the same. In other MSS the Testaments succeed Dt. These are not given in printed editions of the Arm. Bible, nor are they found in all codices. The same is true of the apoc. entitled 'the Death of the Twelve Prophets,' and 'the Prayer of Manasses.' The Third Book of Ezra or Esdras, usually known as the Fourth, follows Nehemiah in the MSS which contain it, e.g. in the MS Bible of the British and Foreign Bible Society. Each book of OT is prefaced by a brief introduction of unknown authorship, but coeval with the version; and also by a summary of contents. Besides the usual preface to the Ps, some MSS introduce a passage of David the Philosopher, another of Athanasius, and a third of Epiphanius, of Cyprus. Dn is translated from the text of Theodotus. Sir was twice translated, first of all in the 5th century, and again, perhaps, in the 8th. The former version is printed in the Venice Bible of 1860, and is the more complete and accurate though it does not comprise the whole of the Gr. text, ch. 8, for example, being omitted: the latter was printed in Zohrab's Bible, Venice, 1805. Usan made and published in his Bible a third version in the year 1666. F. C. CONYBEARE.

ARMENIAN VERSION OF NT.—The old Armenian writers (mentioned in § iii. ARMENIAN VERSION OF OT) give us no special information in regard to the date and circumstances of their version of NT. Whatever statements they make apply to it as to OT. Codices of the four Gospels of great age are relatively common, written in large uncials for church use.* Codices of the rest of NT separate from the Gospels are rare, and will generally be found to have formed part of a larger MS containing the entire NT. They are not common at all before the 13th cent., before which epoch also codices of the entire Bible are very rare. The OT is never found apart from the New, and the extreme rarity of uncial OT fragments in the bindings of later MSS suggests that the entire Arm. Bible was never written out from beginning to end except in a small hand, though there were, of course, uncial lectionaries for church use, and the Bibliothèque Nationale contains such a lectionary written probably in the 9th cent. In Edschmiazin there is an entire Bible on parchment of 1151, and two more on paper of 1253 and 1270. In Venice, one of 1220. The London Bible Society has a choice copy of about 1600, Lord Zouche another not so old.

Separate codices of the Gospels rarely occur in which St. John precedes the Synoptists; but in the library of M. Enfédjans in Tiflis there is a very old specimen of such a codex. The order of the rest of the NT books in the oldest MS at Venice, written A.D. 1220, is as follows: Acts, Catholic Epistles, Revelation of John the Apostle, Epistles of Paul, at the end of which is added the letter of the Corinthians to Paul. The Ep. to the Hebrews

* At Moscow is an Evangeliar., dated 887. At Venice in the San Lazzaro Library are two, dated 902 and 1006 respectively. At Edschmiazin, two of 989, 1035. In Erzeroum, one of 986. In St. Anthony's convent in Constantinople, one of 960. In the Sevan monastery in Russian Armenia, one of 966. In the Bibliothèque Nationale, in the British Museum, and in private collections, are many more very ancient copies.

precedes those to Tim. and follows Thess. In a 13th cent. MS of the Brit. Mus. (Add. 19,730, Saec. xiii.), the order of books is this: Apocalypse, Epistles of Paul, Acts, Cath. Epistles. In this and in other codices the apocryphal rest of St. John usually follows St. John's Gospel.

The Gospels invariably have the Canons of Ammonius added in the margin, and are preceded by Eusebius' letter to Carpianus, with the tables of the Canons. The Acts and Epistles of St. Paul are preceded by the prefaces, summaries, lists of Testimonia and Colophons of Euthalius, whose marginal chaptering and subdivisions and calculations of stichi in the text are also added in the older MSS. In these we also find a division of Acts and Cath. Epistles each into forty-nine chapters; and in the case of Acts, this rather artificial system presupposes that of Euthalius.

A collation of the Arm. text of the OT is given in the Septuagint of Holmes and Parson (Oxon. 1798-1827). A collation of the Arm. NT was first published by Tregelles, and the same is given in Tischendorf's later edd. Moses of Chorene asserts that the NT, like the OT, was first rendered from Syr., and that this first version was, about A.D. 430, revised from more exact Gr. texts from Constantinople. This tradition is certainly correct, for Prof. Armitage Robinson (Euthaliana, Cambridge, 1895) shows that the Arm. NT bears traces of having been made from an ancient form of the Syr. text, such as that which Mrs. Lewis recently discovered at Mount Sinai. This earlier version from Syr. may be the 'First translation' of the Gospels to which Theodoros Chrtthenavor (Contra Majragoumatzi) refers in the 7th cent. as having contained the disputed verses Lk 22^{43, 44}.

These references are so important that I translate them from the Venice ed. p. 148: 'They (i.e. the phantasiastæ) say, it was not by weakness, but by strength, that He (i.e. Christ) overcame the enemy. So do His own words testify. The house of the giant is not plundered, unless first the strong man is bound.* And if this be true, it is plain, they say, that the First translation is not to be accepted, which in the (episode of His) praying relates the 'Bloody Sweat' of the almighty 'Word of God, and that He was encouraged by the angel.'

Ibid. p. 154: 'The letter of the Gospel spoke of the sweat allegorically, as it were of blood; but not (as) a welling-out of blood from a wound made with a weapon.'

In the same context we read that the heretics in question contended that the 'old edition of the Gospel is not to be accepted' because Gregory the Illuminator, in his homiletic exposition of all the Gospel oracles which announced the economical passibility of the Divine Word, yet made no special mention of the 'Bloody Sweat' passage.

The answer of Theodore to this argument is that neither did the Nicene Fathers nor the new recension of the Scriptures recognise more than fourteen Epistles of Paul; yet that Gregory had cited and so testified to the Third Epistle of the Corinthians to Paul, which the said Fathers had passed over in silence, and which was 'not added in the new translations.' The verse cited by Gregory is 3 Co 11: 'The lawless prince when he desired to be God bound all men under sin.' 'This' (i.e. 3 Co), says Theodore, 'was contained in the ancient text, but not in the new ed. (= svyryazh). If, however, because of its omission from the text of the newly issued translations you reject the older Gospel as not true, you, in doing so, calumniate even the great sage Gregory, though you make a show of praising him. But if the truthful Gregory did not in composing (his work) follow the chapters in their order of the entire Gospel, but wrote with peculiar simplicity to suit those who were weak in understanding what they heard, merely propounding testimonies in a summary way to satisfy immediate needs, and confirming (the Gospel statements) by the prophecies, then why do you make a stalking horse of him?'

The above passages warrant two inferences, one certain, the other probable.

(1) The Armenians had a first or early version of NT which contained the verses Lk 23^{43, 44} and also 3 Corinthians.

(2) Gregory had this early version. He quoted 3 Co from it, and he would have quoted Lk 22^{43, 44} also, only his literary purpose did not require him to do so.

I do not see how else we can interpret the last paragraph of Theodore. The same conclusion can be reached by another way. For the version of 3 Co belonged to the first translation of the NT. Gregory had this 3 Co, and cited it. Is it likely that he would have used an outlying portion of NT in a certain edition of it, and not have had the Gospels also? We may note that the 'First translation,' as it contained Paul's Epistles, cannot have been merely an Arm. Diatessaron, though the statement that Gregory did not cite the texts in order is suggestive of such a supposition. If these inferences are just, the first Arm. version of NT was made at the beginning rather than towards the end of the 4th cent., although the native historians of the 4th cent. are silent about it.*

Parts of NT were translated in the 5th cent., but were omitted from the later Arm. Canon. Thus the Apocalypse was not read in church before the 12th cent., when Nerses of Lampron issued a much changed recension of the old version. Similarly the last twelve verses of Mk were rendered in the 5th cent., for Eznik cites them about A.D. 435; but they hardly appear in the MSS before the 13th cent., and then not as an integral part of the second Gospel. In a 10th cent. codex of the Gospels at Edschmiatzin they are headed by the title 'of Ariston the Presbyter,' written in small red uncials by the first hand. Ariston has been identified with Aristion the teacher of Papias. And the knowledge which the Armenians had that the verses were his and not Mark's, explains the hostile attitude towards them of the Arm. Church.

The episode of the woman taken in adultery is likewise absent from the oldest MSS; though it is cited as early as A.D. 950 by Gregory of Narek. The Edschmiatzin codex of A.D. 989 is the oldest codex which contains it, though not in the form in which Gregory and the later codices give it, but as follows:—

'A certain woman was taken in sins, against whom all bore witness that she was deserving of death. They brought her to Jesus (to see) what he would command, in order that they might malign him. Jesus made answer, and said, "Come ye, who are without sin, cast stones, and stone her to death." But he himself, bowing his head, was writing with his finger on the earth, to declare their sins; and they were seeing their several sins on the stones. And, filled with shame, they departed, and no one remained, but only the woman. Saith Jesus, "Go in peace, and present the offering for sins, as in their law is written."

This primitive form of text has the Arm. equivalent of τὰ τῆς μοιχαλίδος written against it in the margin by the first hand. It is probably derived from Papias or the Heb. Gospel.

One other reading of the old Arm. version deserves notice. It occurs in the oldest known codex, dated A.D. 887, preserved in the Lazareffski Institute at Moscow. It is in Mt 2^o, and as follows: ὁ ἀσθήρ . . . ἐστάθη ἐπάνω τοῦ σπηλαίου οὗ ἦν τὸ παιδίον. The same text is found in the Prot-evangel, c. xxi., and accounts for the variant here found in the Codex Bezae.

The Arm. Bible was first printed at Amsterdam in 1666, but from a single manuscript, and the printed text was in places adjusted to the Latin Vulgate. A later edition, issued in 1733 by Mechtar in Venice, was mainly a reprint of the edition of 1666. The first critical edition was issued in 1805 at Venice under the care of Zohrab, who used several codices, the best of them one written early in the 14th cent. The variants of the MSS used are given under the text; but without distinguishing in which codex which variant is read. However, one codex of the Arm. Bible differs very slightly from another. Other edd. have been published in Moscow, Constantinople, and Venice during this century; those of Venice being particularly good and reliable. There is not the slightest foundation for the statement sometimes made, that the Arm. version was in the time of the Crusaders conformed to the Lat. Bible. At that time, indeed, the Lat. chapering began to be added in the margin, and the Prologus Galeatus of Jerome was translated, and in some codices affixed, to the Book of Kings; but no changes were made under Lat. influence in the text itself.

* A comparison of the Arm. text of the Paulines with Ephrem's commentary (preserved in Arm.), with the Syr. and with the closely allied Georgian Version, demonstrates that the Arm. and Geo. versions were originally made from the pre-Peshitta Syr. text used by Ephrem, and were afterwards corrected from Gr. texts. This revision of these two versions was probably made about 400 A.D., and was more thorough in the case of Arm. than of Georgian.

ARMHOLE occurs Jer 38¹² and Ezk 13¹⁸ (RV 'elbows'). The meaning of the Heb. word (אֵמָו, see Oxf. Heb. Lex. and Davidson on Ezk 13¹⁸) is doubtful, but the word in AV means the armpit, as it is now called.

ARMLET (אֵמָו kámdz, AV tablet, Ex 35²², Nu 31⁵⁰).—A flat open clasp worn on the upper arm, mentioned among the votive offerings of gold for the tabernacle (see BRACELET).

ARMONI (אַרְמוֹנִי).—Son of Saul by Rizpah (2 S 21⁸).

ARMOUR, ARMS.—I. In OT. The Heb. nearest equivalent to 'armour' is maddim (מַדִּים 1 S 17³⁸), rendered 'clothes' in 1 S 4¹² (a fugitive arrives from the battle 'with his clothes rent').

It is a plural word signifying the different parts of a soldier's dress. The coat of mail, shiryón (שִׁירְיוֹן), would be chiefly meant, but the helmet and shield and the loose cloak, simplah (שִׁמְלָה Is 9⁸), are included. Ehud (Jg 3¹⁶) wears a dagger under his maddim, i.e. between the shiryón and the simplah.

The Heb. nearest equivalent for 'arms' is kélim (כֵּלִים), a word of general significance, 'moveable property, instruments of any kind, arms,' including the quiver (Gn 27⁹), and probably the shield (hence the common phrase, 'bearer of kélim,' i.e. armour-bearer).

A third word rendered 'armour' is hálizah (הַלִּיצָה 2 S 2²). It describes the equipment of a soldier which an adversary would strip off as spoils, and is rendered (in the plural) 'spoil' in Jg 14¹⁹ (AV and RV).

II. With regard to armour and arms in use in NT times among the Romans, two passages, one from Polybius (c. 167 B.C.) the other from Josephus (c. 70 A.D.), may be left in an abridged tr. to speak for themselves, and to illustrate the language of St. Paul (esp. Eph 6¹⁴⁻¹⁷). Polyb. vi. 23: (a) 'The Roman panoply consists in the first place of a shield (θυρεός), the breadth of which, measured by the arc which it forms, is 2½ ft. and the length is 4 ft., while the depth (thickness) reaches 3 inches . . . And there is fitted to it an iron boss which wards off great blows from stones and from pikes, and in general from darts though hurled with violence. (b) And along with the shield is a sword (μάχαιρα); now this a man wears on his right thigh, and it is called the Spanish sword. And this has an excellent point; and a powerful cut can be delivered with both its edges, because the blade is strong and durable. (c) Next come two javelins (i.e. the pila), and (d) a bronze helmet (περικεφαλαία), and (e) a greave* (N.B. sing.). And in addition to all this they are adorned with a crown of feathers and with three upright purple-red or black feathers about a cubit in length, so that when these are added to the crest the soldier in full armour appears to be double his own height. . . . (f) Now the majority when they have further put on a bronze plate, measuring a span every way, which they wear on their chests and call a heart-guard (καρδιοφύλαξ), are completely armed; but those citizens who are assessed at more than 10,000 drachmæ wear, together with the other arms mentioned, cuirasses made of chain-mail.

Josephus, BJ III. v. 5 (vol. iii. p. 236 of Bekker's edition): 'Now the infantry are armed with cuirasses (θώραξ) and helmets (κράνος), and wear swords (μαχαιροφορέω) on both sides. But the sword (ξίφος) worn on the left is much the longer of them, for that on the right is not more than a span in length. And the infantry escort of the general carry lance (λόγχη) and buckler (ἀσπίς), but the rest of the array a spear (ξυστόν) and a shield (θυρεός), and in addition to these a saw and a basket, a mattock and an axe, and further a thong, and a reaping-hook (δρέπανον), and a chain, and three days' provisions, so that the infantry are little short of beasts of burden. And the cavalry have a long sword (μάχαιρα) on the right side, and a long lance (κορτός) in the hand, and a shield (θυρεός) held slantwise by the side of the horse. And from a quiver (κατὰ γυυριού) hang three or more darts (δκων) having broad points, and in size little less than spears (δόρυ); and all have helmets and cuirasses like the infantry.'

ARMOUR-BEARER.—The office is mentioned in very early times in connexion with Abimelech (Jg 9⁵⁴) and Saul (1 S 31⁴). An armour-bearer's functions were various; he slew those whom his chief struck down (1 S 14¹³); he carried the great shield (zinnah) in front of a champion to protect him from treacherous arrows (1 S 17⁷, and Homer, I. iii. 79, 80); or, again, he collected arrows aimed against his chief for his chief to discharge again. This last function was executed by Mohammed when a lad in attendance upon his uncles (Ibn Hishâm, p. 119, l. 1, quoted by W. R. Smith, *OTJC*² p. 431).

W. E. BARNES.

ARMOURY.—There was naturally no store of arms nor place for keeping them in Israel before the establishment of the nucleus of a standing army under Saul. Saul found the nation, or at least the southern tribes, almost destitute of arms in the true sense (1 S 13¹⁹): no doubt he remedied the defect as far as possible (1 S 8¹²). A tower named after David, perhaps built by him, held 1000 shields (Ca 4¹). Solomon kept 200 golden shields and 300 golden bucklers in the 'house of the forest of Lebanon' (1 K 10^{16, 17}). This armoury was doubtless in Jerusalem (Is 22⁵ 'The armour in the house of the forest'), and lasted till at least Hezekiah's day. Shields and spears were kept even in the temple in the days of Jehoiada the priest (2 K 11¹⁰). This store was attributed to king David.

ARMY (אָרֵי zābhā', 'service,' as we say in Eng. 'the Service'; חַיִל hayil, 'force, host'; אָמ am, 'people,' a frequent designation; מַחֲנֵה mahāneh, properly 'an army encamped'; מַצְבֵּי ma'arākhāh, 'an army in array').—The history of warfare among the Israelites may be divided into two periods. During the first of these, which was closed by the establishment of the kingdom, Israel had fighting men, but no army, i.e. [no permanent organised force; during the second period, which lasted to the fall of the Southern kingdom, there always existed the nucleus at least of an army, both in the north and in the south, attached to the person of the sovereign. There was no doubt a partial revival of military organisation at the revival of independence under the Hasmonean princes.

No standing army existed before the time of the kings. But the beginnings of the formation of a fighting caste appear under Saul, consisting of (1) picked 'regulars' to form the nucleus of an army (1 S 14⁵²), and (2) 'regular' officers to command the militia, who formed the bulk of the army in the field.

How, then, in the earlier period was an army formed to meet an emergency? Under the most rudimentary conditions four elements are required to make a fighting force, viz. (1) men, (2) officers, (3) arms, (4) commissariat.

1. MEN.—It was difficult, before the kingdom was established, to collect a sufficient number of men even for small border wars. The sons of Israel were, indeed, numerous enough to cope in turn with such adversaries as Moab, Midian, Ammon, and Philistia; but Israel was a group of tribes rather than a nation, and the bond of union was so feeble that single tribes, or groups of two or three, were left to bear unaided the brunt of invasion or oppression.

The work of the Judges and of Saul, the earliest king, was to unite, as far as was possible, the tribes of Israel, and to bring border wars to a speedy conclusion by the application of organised force. But authority had to be won before it could be exercised, and the leader had to assert his leadership by some striking deed or sign before his countrymen would rally round him. Ephraim rallied round Ehud the Benjamite after he had assassinated the king of Moab (Jg 3²⁷). Gideon roused N. and E. Israel by destroying the altar of Baal, and appearing as the champion of the worship of J' (Jg 6²⁴⁻³⁴). In the civil war against Benjamin the warlike passion of all the remaining tribes was stirred by the sight of the remains of the murdered concubine (Jg 19^{29a}). Saul gathered his first host by the pictured threat to destroy the oxen of every man who failed to present himself. Even remote Judah on this occasion, we are told, sent thirty 'thousands' to the relief of Jabesh-gilead (1 S 11^{2a}). Against the Amalekites, Judah was not so keen (1 S 15⁴), having perhaps family relations with them; in any case Judah sent only 10,000 (MT), 30,000 (LXX).

The difficulty regarding the numbers of the Israelite armies must be mentioned here.

These numbers are often surprisingly high. Thus in 1 S 11⁸ it is stated that Saul numbered over three hundred 'thousand' men in Bezek for the relief of Jabesh-gilead. If we take 'thousand' in its literal numerical sense, we get a number equal to more than one-tenth of the whole population of the land—a number improbably large. 'Thousand,' however, is used (Mic 5²) to designate the chief towns of Judah, perhaps as each containing, together with its dependent hamlets, a population of about a thousand. The men of such a town would probably be called a thousand (אָלָף) when they went forth to war, and their headman would be called the captain of a thousand. The actual number of this tactical unit would vary much according to the urgency of the danger. It would probably, however, never exceed 300 men, and might conceivably fall below 100. According to this reckoning, Saul's army of relief was not in any case more than 90,000 in number, and it may have been but 30,000.

Side by side, however, with this loose reckoning, the Israelites may have had a stricter system of counting. Thus the number of men of war carried into captivity with Jehoiachin, viz. seven thousand (2 K 24¹⁶), is quite probable in itself, and consistent with other indications of number. Similarly 'thousand' is no doubt to be understood in its ordinary numerical sense in 2 K 13⁷, where it is said that the Israelite army was reduced by Syrian ravages to 50 horsemen, 10 chariots, and 10,000 infantry.

The existence of two reckonings side by side, one based on the numerical sense of 'thousand,' the other on its territorial sense, is not a serious difficulty. To an Oriental, numbers are important only either when they are sacred numbers of mystic meaning, or when it is necessary to indicate generally the relative proportions of things.

The example set by Saul of gathering picked warriors round him was followed by David, who on his accession already had a band of some 600 armed vassals. At the time of Absalom's revolt David's guard must have grown in number, if we rightly read 2 S 15¹⁸ to mean that the Gittites belonging to it amounted by themselves to 600, without reckoning the numbers of the Cherethites and Pelethites. The strength of the whole guard may be guessed from the fact that Ahithophel thought it necessary to take 12,000 chosen men to ensure success in his proposed pursuit of David (2 S 17¹).

ii. OFFICERS.—After the host was collected under its commander, some organisation had to be given to it. Captains of 'thousands' and 'hundreds' had to be appointed. The army 'was numbered,' or, according to the Heb., 'appointed officers over itself' (צבא נקרא Jg 20¹⁵). Two results were gained. Officers were appointed under the eye and influence of the commander over thousands and hundreds; and, secondly, the commander learnt the number of these tactical units, 'thousands' or 'hundreds,' under his command. Besides these 'regimental' officers, one or more officers bearing the title of 'scribe' were attached to the army in the field to aid in its organisation, to serve as provost-m Marshals, and to make a list of the booty taken (Jg 5¹⁴ and 1 Mac 5⁴²).

iii. ARMS.—In the earliest days, no doubt, each man brought his own arms, for we hear of no store of arms till after the establishment of the kingdom (see ARMS). There is nothing to show that the Israelites had horses and chariots until after Saul's day. An Israelite army in the time of the Judges was probably a crowd of men carrying bows, slings, and rustic weapons, such as clubs and oxgoads (Jg 5⁸, 1 S 13²²). Though individually equal in valour, they were probably far inferior in armament to a people like the Philistines, who were sufficiently advanced in the art of war to possess chariots, swords, and spears, and perhaps an organised corps of archers (1 S 31²).

iv. COMMISSARIAT.—Commissariat is twice alluded to in the OT. In Jg 20¹⁰ a tenth of the assembled Israelites are sent 'to fetch victual' (זֶדָהָה נָקָה, 'food taken in hunting') that the people may carry out their expedition against Gibeah. Again, in 1 K 20²⁷ the children of Israel 'were mustered and were victualled' (RV) for a campaign against the Syrians.

ARNA.—One of the ancestors of Ezra (2 Es 1²), corresponding apparently to Zerariah of Ezr 7⁴ and Zariaias of 1 Es 8².

ARNAN (אַרְנָן).—A descendant of David (1 Ch 3²¹). While MT has אֲרָנָן, LXX reads Ὀρνὰν υἱὸς αὐτοῦ (sc. preceding Παφάλα) = Orna his son. See GENEALOGY.

ARNI (WH 'Aprel, TR 'Αράμ, AV Aram).—An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3³⁸), called in Mt 1³⁻⁴ Ram (RV). Cf. Ru 4², 1 Ch 2⁹⁻¹⁰, and see GENEALOGY.

ARNON (אֲרֹנוֹן).—Two streams unite about 13 miles E. of the middle of the Dead Sea to form the A., now known as Wady el-Mojib. Of these the N. one (Wady Waleh) is formed by a number of brooks—often dry—rising near the Haj route, N. of 31° 30' N. The S. branch, which is the more important, drains most of the country between the Haj route and the Dead Sea, between 31° 30' and 31° 10', and is formed by the streams now known as Seil S'aideh, Wady es-Sultan, Seil Lejjun, and Wady Bal'a. These are all united before reaching the neighbourhood of 'Ar'air, and flow thence almost direct W. for about 20 miles, when they are joined by the Wady Waleh. The E. half thus forms a complete network of streams (הַחֵלֵי אֲרֹנוֹן). For the greater part of its course the river flows through a deep trench some 2 miles in breadth at the top and about 40 yards at the bottom. The rocky and precipitous banks consist of limestone capped with basalt, and rise in places to a height of 1700 ft. Their slopes are fringed with oleanders, tamarisks, and willows, and near the mouth with castor-bean and cane. Like most rivers in Pal. its stream varies in width and velocity according to the season of the year. Where it issues from its steep banks to the flat shore of the Dead Sea it ranges from 40 to 100 ft. in width, and from 1 to 4 ft. in depth, while near 'Ar'air, where the old road from Heshbon to Kir crosses it, and where the remains of an old bridge still exist, it is almost dry in July.

The A. formed a strong natural boundary, and early separated the territories of the Amorites and Moab (Nu 21¹³, cf. Jg 11^{12a}); later those of Reuben and Moab (Dt 3¹⁰). Isaiah mentions the 'fords of A.' (16²), and Jeremiah uses 'A.' as the name of a district (48²⁰). The river is also mentioned on the 'Moabite Stone.' On the N. edge of the S. stream was the town Aroer (see AROER), and between the N. and S. streams Dibon (see DIBON).

AROD (אֲרֹד).—A son of Gad (Nu 26¹⁷) = Arodi (אֲרֹדִי), Gn 46¹⁶. Patronymic Arodites (Nu 26¹⁷).

AROER (אֲרֹעֵר).—1. A city in the portion assigned to the tribe of Judah (1 S 30²⁸), prob. in what is now the Wady Ararah, 20 miles S. of Hebron and 12 miles to the S.E. of Beersheba. To the elders of this city David sent a share of the spoil taken from the Amalekites who had attacked Ziklag. 2. A well-known city on the N. bank of the Arnon, generally described by its situation in order to distinguish it from other cities of the same name (Dt 2²⁶ 3¹² 4⁴⁸, Jos 12¹³, Jg 11²⁶, 2 S 24⁵). It was part of the region conquered by the Amorite king Sihon, and so, at the time of Israel's attack, it lay to the N. of the Moabite territory. It was assigned to the tribe of Reuben, and formed the S. frontier city of that tribe. It is this Reubenite city that is named with the S. towns as having been built by the children of Gad before the definite settlement and distribution of the land (Nu 32²⁴). When the Syrians under Hazael conquered all the trans-Jordanic district, Aroer is named as the S. limit (2 K 10²⁸). In later times the Moabites, from whom it had been taken first by the Amorites, regained possession of it from the Israelites (Jer 48¹⁹). Eusebius speaks of it as still standing in his day. 3. A town in the portion assigned to the tribe of Gad, in the valley of Gad, originally an Ammonite city (Jg 11²⁸), in the district watered by the Jabbok, east of Rabbah (Jos 13²⁵). The cities of Aroer, referred to in Is 17², are evidently the two trans-Jordanic cities of the Moabites and the Ammonites. Gentile name Aroerite, 1 Ch 11⁴⁴.

AROM (אַרֹמִי), 1 Es 5¹⁶.—His descendants are mentioned among those who returned with Zerubabel. The name has no parallel in the lists of Ezr and Neh, unless it represents Hashum (B' אַרֹמִי, A' אַרֹמִי) in Ezr 2¹⁹.

ARPACHSHAD (אַרְפַּכְשָׁד).—The third son of Shem, A. was the father of Shelah, and grandfather of Eber, from whom the Hebrews traced their descent (Gn 10^{22, 24} 11¹⁰⁻¹³). Gesenius regards the name as also designating a people or region, and thinks the conjecture of Bochart not improbable, that this is Ἀρραπαχίτις, Arrapachitis, a region of Assyria near Armenia (Ptol. vi. 1), the native land of the Chaldeans. Jos. (Ant. I. vi. 4) says that from him the Chaldeans were called Arphaxadæans (Ἀρφαξάδαλους).

ARPAD (אַרְפָּד).—A city of Syria north-west of Aleppo, 2 K 18³⁴ 19¹³, Is 10⁹ 36¹⁹ 37¹⁸, Jer 49²³. Now the ruin Tell Erfud. The city stood a two years' siege by Tiglath-pileser III.

ARPHAXAD (Ἀρφαξάδ).—1. A king of the Medes (Jth 1¹⁷). He reigned at Ecbatana, which he strongly fortified. Nebuchadrezzar, king of Assyria, made war upon him, defeated him, and put him to death. Some have identified A. with Deioces, the founder of Ecbatana, and others with his son Phraortes. But the former of these died in peace, and the latter fell while besieging Nineveh. The narrative in Judith would accord better with the supposition that he was Astyages or Ahasuerus, the last king of the Medes according to Herodotus. 2. The spelling of Arpachshad in AV, and at Lk 3³⁸ by RV also. See ARPACHSHAD.

R. M. BOYD.

ARRAY (formed by prefixing ar to the subst. roi, rai, order, arrangement) is common in AV for the arrangement or order of an army in battle, always in the phrase 'set in a.' or 'put in a.' (But RV gives once 'order the battle a.' 1 Ch 12³⁸.) The subst. is also used once for dress, i.e. garments arranged in order on the person, instead of the common word raiment (=arrayment), 1 Ti 2⁹ 'not with braided hair, or gold, or pearls, or costly a.' (ἡματισμός, RV 'raiment'). And in this sense the verb is frequent, as Gn 41⁴² 'a^{ed} him in vestures of fine linen' (Heb. שָׂרָב, as always, except Jer 43¹² שָׂרָב); Mt 6²⁹ 'Solomon in all his glory was not a^{ed} like one of these' (περιβάλλω, so Lk 12²⁷ 23¹¹; but ἐνδύω, Ac 12²¹ 'Herod, a^{ed} in royal apparel'). 'Array' does not mean in the Bible, as it does now, 'to dress up with display,' but simply to put on raiment, to dress.

ARROGANCY.—Arrogance, though quite as old as arrogance (both being forms of arrogantia, the assertion of more than one has a right to), is not used in AV, but RV gives it at Job 35¹⁵ (שָׁז, the only occurrence of the Heb. word, AV 'extremity'). Arrogancy is found in AV 1 S 2⁸, Pr 8¹⁸, Is 13¹¹, Jer 48²⁹; RV retains these, and adds 2 K 19²⁸, Is 16⁶ 37²⁹, Wis 5⁸, giving also arrogant, Ps 5⁵ 73³ 75⁴ (for 'foolish' or 'fool' of AV), and arrogantly, Ps 75⁴ 94⁴.

J. HASTINGS.

ARROW (קֶטֶב).—The arrow of the Hebrews was probably like that of other early nations in consisting of a light shaft with a head of flint or metal. Owing to the suddenness with which the arrow inflicted wounds, and to the fact that such wounds often came from an unseen hand, the arrow was used as a symbol of the judgments of God. Job, in his sickness, complains that he is struck by the poisoned arrows of the Almighty (Job 6⁴). God overthrows the mischievous plotters by wounding them suddenly with an arrow (Ps 64⁷).

Again, the secret mischief done by slanderers is compared to the wound of an arrow ('whose teeth are spears and arrows, and their tongue a sharp sword,' Ps 57⁴). Children begotten in their father's youth are likened to arrows (Ps 127⁴). Arrows are also a symbol of that which is carefully guarded and highly valued; thus, Israel itself is God's polished arrow, 'he hath made me a polished shaft, in his quiver hath he kept me close' (Is 49³ RV).

ARROWSNAKE (Is 34¹⁵ RV for AV 'great owl').—See SERPENT.

ARSACES (Ἀρσάκης, connected possibly with the Armen. Arschag) was a Scythian (Strabo, xi. 515) from the banks of the Oechus, who founded the Parthian empire and the dynasty of the Arsacidae (Justin, xli. 5; Strabo, xv. 702). The sixth king of the name (known also as Mithridates I.) subdued Persia and Media, and when opposed by Demetrius Nikator, who thought the people would rise in his favour and afterwards assist him against Tryphon, deceived him by a pretence of negotiations, and in B.C. 138 took him prisoner (1 Mac 14¹⁻³; Justin, xxxvi. 1). Demetrius received in marriage Rhodogune, daughter of A. (App. Syr. 67), but died during his captivity (Jos. Ant. XIII. v. 11; Justin, xli. 6; Oros. v. 4). In 1 Mac 15²² A. is mentioned among the kings to whom was sent an edict (Jos. Ant. XIV. viii. 5) from Rome forbidding the persecution of the Jews; but there is a lack of confirmatory evidence of this, though the incident would, notwithstanding the independence of Parthia, accord with the practice of Rome.

ARSIPHURITH (B Ἀρσιφουριθ, A Ἀρσιφρ., AV Azephurith), 1 Es 5¹⁶.—112 of his sons returned with Zerubbabel (B omits the number). The corresponding name in Ezr 2¹⁸ is Jorah (יָרָה), B Οὐρά, A Ἰωρά; and in Neh 7²⁴ Hariph (הָרִיף), B Ἀπέφ, A Ἀπέφ. It has been conjectured that the name in 1 Es is due to a mistaken combination of the two forms in Ezr and Neh, the c in the second syllable being due to confusion between c and e.

ART.—The Hebrews, like many other nations, did not excel equally in all branches of art. In literature and poetry they have shown great ability in all ages down to the present time. In music they were apparently quite the equal of their neighbours, judging from the variety of instruments named and the frequent references to singing and playing, and in modern times they fully sustain this character. But, on the contrary, in mechanical arts, in form and design, and in representations, they showed an inability amounting to positive aversion. That this aversion was not on religious grounds alone is evident on seeing that, when sculptured figures were made for the temple, the chief artist in metal was a Tyrian half-breed, and there was not among the Jews 'any that can skill to hew timber like the Sidonians' (1 K 5⁶). Probably the aversion and the prohibition to imitate natural forms acted and reacted on each other, so that all ability was lost. We find in earlier times that, on the contrary, artistic work is attributed entirely to Hebrews shortly after the Exodus, when the Egypt. training and skill would be still possessed (Ex 35³⁴).

There does not appear to be much that can be distinctively marked as Jewish or Palestinian in the motives of design; many of the elements that we can trace in the scanty remains showing Egypt. or Bab. origin. What original style Pal. possessed among the Amorites was mostly destroyed by the Heb. invasion. This can be traced best in the pottery, as, though simple in forms and material, it is the most continuous series that we have. The Amorite shows good and original forms of a pure style; the Phœnician is entirely different, but also well shaped and original; but the Jewish pottery has no original motives, and is merely a degradation of the Amorite, running down into complete ugliness and baseness (see POTTERY). In architectural forms there appears to be little that is distinct from Egypt. sources. The details have been noticed under ARCHITECTURE; but the general impression is that a plain and simple masonry with some local features was overlaid by foreign designs. The motive of a row of bucklers hanging over a parapet is suggested in the modification of Gr. metopes and triglyphs on the so-called 'Tomb of Absalom'; and it appears to be an early feature, as Solomon made two hundred targets and three hundred shields of beaten gold for the house of the forest of Lebanon. The shields were used by the guard (1 K 14²⁷), but the targets may have been decorative. The tapering form of the Moabite Stone is rather akin to Assyr. than Egyp. types. And the horns upon the pillars (Ionic volutes) belong to the same source.

In surface decoration some late examples seem to reflect a national style, as we do not know of any external source for them. The graceful design of plant forms decoratively treated over the door of the so-called tombs of the Judges (perhaps Maccabaean), the later and more classical foliage work of the so-called tombs of the kings (Herodian), and the great golden vine which Herod placed over the front of the temple, point to a treatment of surfaces which is most nearly akin to some Egyp. work that is probably of Mesopotamian motive. In the plant decoration of the columns, etc. of Akhenaten's palace at Tel el-Amarna there is the same flowing style of foliage covering the surfaces, and the motive of this may well have come from northern Syria or Mesopotamia, like other influences of that reign. In the absence of any details about early Syrian art, it seems that we may perhaps see in this one of its features, which lasted until the Greek period. That surface decoration was a main feature of the richer Jewish work is shown by the details of the temple: 'He carved all the walls of the house round about with carved figures of cherubim, and palm trees, and openings of flowers, within and without' (1 K 6²⁹), and the doors were likewise decorated (vv. 32, 36). On the bronze bases of the lavers were 'lions, oxen, and cherubim' (1 K 7²⁹), and 'cherubim, lions, and palm trees' (v. 30). This frequent decoration with palm trees is singularly un-Egyp., and points to a Mesopotamian influence, as palm trees and winged genii are very characteristic of that style.

Of sculpture in the round the most striking examples must have been the great cherubs of olive wood, plated with gold, which stood in the most holy place. Their height of ten cubits, or fifteen to twenty feet, shows that they were joined and built up of many pieces, like the lesser statues in Egypt. The wings, stretching out to a width equal to the height, were also, of course, joined on. The position of these cherubs was not at all like that described of the similar figures on the mercy-seat of the ark; the latter were face to face, but those of the temple stood side by side, both facing one way. The most holy place was twenty cubits wide; of each cherub 'from the uttermost part of one wing unto the uttermost part of the other were ten cubits,' and they stood 'so that the wing of the one touched the wall, and the wing of the other cherub touched the other wall, and their wings touched one another in the midst of the house' (1 K 6^{24, 27}). They appear to have only had two wings each, like those of the mercy-seat, and in this resembled Egyp. cherubic figures, while the Assyr. many-winged figures are more akin to the four-winged of Ezekiel or the six-winged of Revelation. In actual artistic work only two-winged figures appear to have been made. But we must not hastily suppose that these were direct copies of the winged figures of Egypt; the Heb. figures were male, while the Egyp. protective winged figures were always female, and often specialised as Isis and Nephthys. The symbolic meaning of these statues is outside of our scope here; but the strange duality of two equal figures placed side by side is parallel to the two great columns before the temple, and the curious feature of a double entrance to porches with a central pillar, as seen in the tombs.

Figures of animals were also made, as the brazen serpent, which was still treasured and worshipped down to the time of Hezekiah; also the twelve oxen of Solomon, which seem to have been done away with by Ahaz, as there is no mention of them in the plunder (Jer 52) after he had removed the brazen sea from them (2 K 16¹⁷). This unnatural motive of placing a great vessel on the backs of animals is unknown in Egypt, unless in some of the Asiatic goldsmith's work; but the same idea appears in Syria, where the goddess Kadesh stands on a lion's back.

In embroidery we see another sign of Asiatic rather than Egyp. influence. No embroidered robes appear on Egyp. figures, at least until post-Exodic times; whereas in Babylonia and Assyria dresses are constantly represented as being embroidered with elaborate patterns. The Egyp. system was that of appliqué work of leather, which was elaborately carried out in complex patterns; and such a style of decoration still survives in the usual tent-lining of Egypt, where pieces of various coloured cloths are all stitched on to the backing in a pattern, and elaborate inscriptions cut out and applied in the same way. The mention of large figures upon the curtains and veil of the tabernacle appears as if they were appliqué; but they are only on the linen curtains, so that leather work of this kind is not implied. On the other hand, the making of gold wire by cutting up sheet gold is specially described for the ephod (Ex 39²), and this shows that dresses were certainly embroidered with thread.

LOTUS AND BUD PATTERN (Egyptian), misnamed in Palestine as BELL AND POMEGRANATE.

Until some extensive and well-directed excavations may open up for us the remains of Syrian and Jewish art, it is hopeless to do more than indicate the mere outlines. These seem to show a native Syrian style, influenced mainly by Mesopotamia, but also in some respects by Egypt. A single good slab of stone might teach us far more than all we know at present.

W. M. FLINDERS PETRIE.

ARTAXERXES (𐎠𐎼𐎷𐎡𐎴, 𐎠𐎹𐎷𐎡𐎴).—The name is written Artakhshatra in Old Persian, Artaksatsu and Artaksassu in Bab. cuneiform, and is derived from the Persian arta, 'great,' and khshatra, 'kingdom.' The meaning of 'great warrior,' therefore, given to it by Herodotus (vi. 98) is incorrect. Ardeshir is the later Persian form of the name.

The only Artaxerxes mentioned in the OT is Artaxerxes I. Longimanus (or 'Long-handed'), the son of Xerxes, who reigned B.C. 464-425.

Ewald, Hitzig, and other commentators have supposed that in Ezr 4²³ the pseudo-Smerdis (B.C. 522) is meant under the name of Artaxerxes. But the decipherment of the cuneiform inscriptions has shown that the Persian kings did not bear double names of the kind implied by the theory, and the difficulty felt by the commentators has been occasioned by the insertion of letters which relate only to the rebuilding of the city and walls of Jerusalem into the narrative of the rebuilding of the temple. The 24th verse of the chapter ought immediately to follow the 5th. (See ZERUBBABEL.)

It may have been in consequence of the letters which passed between the Persian king and his representatives in Palestine that in his seventh year Ezra was allowed, with other priests and temple-servants, and a grant from the imperial exchequer, to go up from Babylon to Jerusalem and there settle the affairs of the community (Ezr 7. 8). Thirteen years later (B.C. 444), Nehemiah, the cup-bearer of Artaxerxes, was allowed to leave Susa for Jerusalem for a similar purpose, the first result of his mission being the restoration of the city walls.

Artaxerxes was the third son of Xerxes, and after the assassination of his father made his way to the throne by crushing the Bactrians under his brother Hystaspes, and murdering another brother, Darius. In B.C. 460 Egypt revolted; but in spite of the assistance rendered by Athens to the rebels, the revolt was suppressed in B.C. 455. In B.C. 449 the war with Greece was ended by a treaty, known as that of Kallias, by which Athens gave up Cyprus, and Persia renounced her claims to the Gr. cities of Asia Minor. Not long afterwards Megabyztes the satrap of Syria revolted, and compelled the Persian king to agree to his own terms of peace. Artaxerxes was succeeded by his son Xerxes II.

ARTEMAS.—A trusted companion of St. Paul, in the later part of his life (Tit 3¹²). According to Dorotheus (Bibl. Maxima, Lugd. 1677, iii. p. 429) he had been one of the 70 disciples, and was afterwards bishop of Lystra, but there is no extant evidence to support either statement. An Artemas is honoured in the Greek Menaæ for April 28, but apparently he is not the same.

Although Jerome (de nom. Hebraicis) treats the name as Hebrew, and explains it as 'anathematizans sive conturbans,' it is undoubtedly Greek, formed from Ἀρτεμης (cf. Ἐρμῆς, Ὀλυμπῆς, Ζηρῆς, Ἐπαφρῆς), perhaps by contraction from Artemidorus, a name common in Asia Minor.

ARTILLERY (1 S 20⁴⁰ AV, 'weapons' RV).—A general word, including in its meaning both bows and arrows. The word still survives in the name of the Honourable Artillery Company of London, which was originally a guild or club of archers.

In 1 Mac 6⁵¹ 'artillery' ('mounds to shoot from,' RV) is the tr. of βελουστῆσεις, 'ranges of warlike engines' set against a besieged city.

ARUBBOTH (אֲרַבּוֹת), 1 K 4¹⁰ only.—A district, apparently in the south of Judah, near Hopher and Socoh. The Negeb plains are perhaps intended.

ARUMAH (אֲרַמָּה), Jg 9⁴¹.—The refuge of Abimelech when driven out of Shechem, supposed to be the ruin El Ormeh, on the hills S.E. of Shechem. In the Onomasticon (s.v. Ruma) it is placed at Remphis, in the region of Diospolis (Lydda), which was 'by many called Arimathæa.' The village Rentis seems to be meant, near Rantieh. See SWP vol. ii. sheets xii. and xiv.

ARVAD, ARVADITES (אַרְוָד, אֲרַוְדִי), northernmost city of the Canaanites, and race inhabiting it (Gn 10¹⁸, 1 Ch 1¹⁸). The city was built on an island, Arvad or Aradus, now Ruwād, off the Syrian coast, about 2 miles from the mainland, 3 or 4 miles north-east of Tripolis, scarcely a mile in circumference, on which houses were built close together and very high, so as to accommodate a large population in a small space. On the mainland opposite, at some distance from the coast, lay the town of Antarados. According to Strabo, fugitives from Sidon settled there and built the city in B.C. 761, but these can only have dispossessed or reinforced older inhabitants, probably like those of Sidon from around the Persian Gulf, under whom it had already risen to a position of some importance. As far back as about B.C. 1100, we find Tiglath-pileser I. speaking of sailing into the great sea in ships of A. (Schrader, COI i. 173). In Ezk 27⁸⁻¹¹ the men of A. are mentioned along with those of Sidon as supplying mariners and warriors to Tyre in the time of her glory. In B.C. 138 the Phœn. town Aradus was one of those named in a circular from the Roman Senate as containing a large Jewish population, towards whom the kings of Egypt, Syria, etc. (to whom the despatch is addressed), are enjoined to show favour (1 Mac 15¹⁶⁻²³. See Schürer, HJP II. i. 221).

ARZA (אַרְצָא).—Prefect of the palace at Tirzah, in whose house king Elah was assassinated by Zimri at a carouse (1 K 16⁹). C. F. BURNEY.

ARZARETH (2 Es 13⁴⁵).—A region beyond the river from which the ten tribes are to return. It has been supposed to represent the Heb. אֲרִיזָה (Dt 19²⁸), and became the subject of many later Jewish legends concerning the Sabbatic River beyond which the lost tribes were to be found—variously identified with the Oxus and the Ganges. The true site of the Sabbatic River is, however, in Syria, north-east of Tripoli, the present Nahr es Sebta. Northern Syria appears to be called the Land of Akharri or 'westerns' in cuneiform texts.

AS.—There are some obs. uses of this conj., but they are mostly quite intelligible. 1. As concerning occurs Lv 4²⁶, 1 Ch 26²¹, Ac 28²², Ro 9⁵ 11²⁸, 1 Co 8⁴ 2 Co 11²¹, Ph 4¹⁵; and as concerning that, Ac 13³ 'as c. that he raised him up from the dead' (Gr. simply ὅτι); as pertaining, Ro 4¹, He 9⁹; as touching, Gn 27⁴², 1 S 20²³, 2 K 22¹⁸, Mt 18¹⁹ 22³¹, Mk 12²⁶, Ac 5³⁵ 21²⁵, Ro 11²⁸, 1 Co 8¹ 16¹², 2 Co 9¹, Ph 3⁵, 1 Th 4³, 2 Es 15⁸. In these phrases (the Gr. is generally a simple prep. ἐπι, κατά, and esp. περί) the as is now dropped. So in whenas, Sir Prol. i. 'whenas therefore the first Jesus died,' Sir 33⁷, 2 Mac 15²⁰; while as, He 9⁸; what time as, Bar 1², 1 Mac 5⁵⁵, 2 Mac 1⁷; like as, Jer 23²⁹ 'Is not my word like as a fire?'; Wis 18¹; as it were, Rev 8¹⁰ 'burning as it were a lamp' (RV 'as a torch'); cf. Ps 14⁸, Pr. Bk. 'eating up my people as it were bread.' On the other hand as = 'as if' in Ac 10¹¹, Rev 5⁶ 'a Lamb as it had been slain' (ὡς, RV 'as though'), 13³. As stands for 'that' in 1 Mac 10⁸ 12¹⁵ 'so as we are delivered from our enemies.' In Lk 2¹⁵ it is an adv. 'as the angels were gone away from them into heaven' (ὡς, RV 'when').

J. HASTINGS.

ASA (אַסָּא, perhaps 'healer').—1. King of Judah c. B.C. 918-877. The history of his reign as given in 1 K 15⁹⁻²², when compared with that in 2 Ch 14-16, presents an excellent illustration of the different view-points of the two writers. For convenience we shall keep the two narratives apart.

(A) Acc. to 1 K 15⁹⁻²². A. did what was right in the eyes of the Lord, opposing every form of idolatry, putting away the kedeshim or terephim out of the land, and removing the idols which his fathers had made. He even degraded the queen-mother because of 'an abominable image' (מַצֵּבֶת) which she had made for (an) Asherah. Being attacked by Baasha, king of Israel, he used the treasures of the temple and the palace to buy the alliance of Benhadad, king of Syria, who, by the vigour of his attack upon the N. kingdom, speedily compelled Baasha to leave Judah in peace. With the materials of Baasha's abandoned works at Ramah, A. built Geba of Benjamin and Mizpah. (In Jer 41⁹ there is mention of a pit at Mizpah which A. had made 'for fear of Baasha, king of Isr.'). In his old age A. suffered from a disease in his feet. He died in the 41st year of his reign, and was succeeded by his son Jehoshaphat.

(B) In 2 Ch 14-16 Asa's reforming zeal is placed in a still more favourable light. Cf. 2 Ch 14⁵ (but see 15¹⁷) with 1 K 15¹⁴. As a reward for this zeal A. enjoyed peace and prosperity in the early years of his reign, and during this period he built fortresses and made other warlike preparations, assembling an army of 580,000 men (14^{6a}). He was thus enabled to meet and conquer Zerah the Ethiopian (which see). (The historicity of this campaign there is no reason to call in question, although the numbers must be excessive). After this victory A. was met by the prophet Azariah, the son of Oded, who exhorted him to carry out further religious reforms (15¹⁻⁸). In obedience to this call, a popular assembly, representing not only Judah, but certain districts of the N. kingdom, was held at Jerus. in the 3rd month of the 15th year of A.'s reign. A solemn covenant was entered into to seek the Lord with all their heart and all their soul (15¹²). On account of A.'s conduct in this matter, another period of peace was enjoyed by the land, which continued till the 35th year of his reign (15¹³). In his 36th year (16^{1a}) war broke out with Baasha, king of Israel, and A. hired the help of the king of Syria. This action was viewed by Hanani the seer as indicating a want of faith in God, and he addressed reproaches and threatenings to the king, who thereupon cast the faithful prophet into prison, and at the same time began to oppress some of his subjects (16^{7a}). As a punishment for this he was, in his 39th year, attacked by a disease in his feet, which led him to seek not to the Lord, but to physicians (16¹²). Upon his death in the 41st year of his reign he was buried with most gorgeous funeral rites (16¹⁴).

The Chronicler's additions to the earlier narrative comprise, then, A.'s building of fortresses and other warlike preparations, his victory over the Ethiop. king, more detailed specifications of time, his severity towards Hanani and others, and the details as to his obsequies. The subjectivity of the Chronicler is marked throughout, but there is no reason to doubt that for the basis at least of these additions he had documentary authority, although very serious difficulties, which have never been satisfactorily explained, attach to the chronology of his narrative. These are fully discussed in the literature cited below.

ASADIAS ('Asadías, prob. = אֲסַדִּיָּא, 'J' is kind,' cf. 1 Ch 3²⁰).—An ancestor of Baruch (Bar 1¹).

ASAH (אַשָּׁח) is the name of four men mentioned in OT. 1. The youngest son of Zeruiah, David's sister, and the brother of Joab and Abishai. He was famous for his swiftness of foot, a much valued gift in ancient times. He was one of David's thirty heroes, probably the third of the second three (2 S 23²⁴). He was also commander of a division in David's army (1 Ch 27⁷). He was slain by Abner (2 S 21⁸⁻²³). 2. A Levite, who with other ten Levites and priests went throughout all the cities of Judah and taught the people in the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 17⁸). 3. A subordinate collector of offerings and tithes in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Ch 31¹³). 4. Jonathan, son of A., opposed Ezra's action in connexion with the divorce of foreign wives (Ezr 10¹⁶). W. MUIR.

ASAI (אֲסַי, 'J' hath made').—1. One of the deputation sent by Josiah to consult Huldah the prophetess, 2 K 22^{12, 14} (AV Asahiah), 2 Ch 34²⁰. 2. One of the Simeonite princes who attacked the shepherds of Gedor, 1 Ch 4³⁸. 3. A Merarite who took part in bringing the ark to Jerus., 1 Ch 6^{30, 15^{6, 11}}. 4. The first-born of the Shilonites, 1 Ch 9⁵, called in Neh 11⁵ Maaseiah. J. A. SELBIE.

ASANA (A 'Asard, B 'Ass-'), 1 Es 5³¹.—His descendants were among the 'temple servants' or Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel: he is called Asnah (אֲסַנָּה, 'Ased'), Ezr 2²⁰. Nehemiah omits. H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

ASAPH (אֲסַפִּי 'gatherer').—1. The father of Joah, the 'recorder' or chronicler at the court of Hezekiah (2 K 18^{18, 37} etc.). 2. The 'keeper of the king's forest,' to whom king Artaxerxes addressed a letter directing him to supply Nehemiah with timber (Neh 2⁸). 3. A Korahite (1 Ch 26¹), same as Abiasaph (wh. see). 4. The eponym of one of the three guilds which conducted the musical services of the temple in the time of the Chronicler (1 Ch 15^{16a} etc.). The latter traces this arrangement to the appointment of David, in whose reign Asaph, who is called 'the seer' (2 Ch 29³⁰), is supposed to have lived. We really know practically nothing about the worship in the first temple, although the probability that the musical service was even then to a certain extent organised, is witnessed to by the fact that at the return from exile 'the singers, the sons of Asaph' (Neh 7⁴⁴, Ezr 2⁴¹), are mentioned as a class whose functions were recognised and well established. At first the Asaphites alone seemed to have formed the temple choir, and in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah (wherever we have the memoirs of the latter in their original form) they are not yet reckoned among the Levites. At a later period they share the musical service with the 'sons of Korah' (see KORAHITES). When the latter become porters and doorkeepers, the guild of Asaph appears supplemented by those of Heman and Ethan; and as, in the estimation of the Chronicler (c. 250 B.C.), Levitical descent is necessary for the performance of such functions, the genealogies of Asaph, Heman, and Ethan are traced respectively to Gershom, Kohath, and Merari, the sons of Levi (1 Ch 6³³⁻⁴⁷). W. R. Smith (OTJC p. 204, n.) remarks that the 'oldest attempt to incorporate the Asaphites with the Levites seems to be found in the priestly part of the Pentateuch, where Abiasaph, "the father of Asaph," or in other words the eponym of the Asaphite guild, is made one of the three sons of Korah (Ex 6²⁴). Pss 50 and 73-83 have the superscription אֲסַפִּי, which means in all probability that they once belonged to the hymn-book of the Asaphite choir (see PSALMS).

ASARA ('Asard, AV Azara'), 1 Es 5³¹.—His sons were among the temple servants or Nethinim who returned under Zerubbabel: omitted in the parallel lists in Ezr and Neh. H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

ASARAMEL (Ἀσαράμειλ κ V, Σαραμέλ A, AV Saramel). — A name whose meaning is quite uncertain (1 Mac 14²⁸). See RVM.

ASAREL (אַסָרֵל, AV Asareel). — A son of Jehallelel, 1 Ch 4¹⁶. See GENEALOGY.

ASBASARETH (1 Es 5⁶⁹).—A king of Assyria, probably a corrupt form of the name Esarhaddon, which is found in the parallel passage Ezr 4². AV form Azbazareth comes from the Vulg.; LXX has Ἀσβακάρθ B, Ἀσβασάρθ A; Syr. ܐܫܒܐܪܬܗ (Ashtakphath).

ASCALON.—Jth 2²⁸, 1 Mac 10⁸⁶ 11⁶⁰ 12³⁸, for ASHKELON.

ASCENSION.—Ascension is the name given to that final withdrawal of the Risen Christ from His disciples which is described in Ac 1^{9a}. There is no account of anything exactly like it in the OT, though the same word has been applied to the departure of Enoch and of Elijah from this life. In Sir 44¹⁶ as in He 11⁵ Enoch's removal is called a translation (μετετέθη), but in Sir 49¹⁴ as in Ac 1¹¹ it is an assumption (ἀνελήμφθη ἀπὸ τῆς γῆς). This last alone seems to be employed of Elijah. In the LXX of 2 K 2¹¹ we have ἀνελήμφθη Ἡλιὸν ἐν σσσεισμῷ ὡς εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν, and in Sir 48⁹ Elijah is ὁ ἀναλημφθεὶς ἐν λαίλαπι πυρός. Cheyne's Hallowing of Criticism treats this last as 'the grandest prose poem in the OT,' but, even so, it opened the mind to the idea that human life might have another issue than that which awaits it in the ordinary course of nature.

In the NT the A. does not bulk largely as an independent event. In Mt it is not mentioned at all. In Mk it is found only in the dubious appendix (16¹⁹), and there it is narrated in OT words, a fact which suggests that the writer is recording what he believed, not what he had seen. The first half of the verse—ἀνελήμφθη εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν—is from 2 K 2¹¹; and the second—ἐκάθισεν ἐκ δεξιῶν τοῦ θεοῦ—from Ps 110¹. The explicit reference in Lk 24⁵¹ (διέστη ἀπ' αὐτῶν καὶ ἀνεφέρετο εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν) has the last five words doubly bracketed in WH. 'The A.,' they say in a note, 'apparently did not lie within the proper scope of the Gospels, as seen in their genuine texts; its true place was at the head of the Acts of the Apostles, as the preparation for the day of Pentecost, and thus the beginning of the history of the Church.' The insertion of the words, ἀνεφέρετο εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν, in Lk 24⁵¹, would thus be due to some one who assumed that 'a separation from the disciples at the close of a Gospel must be the A.' But it can hardly be doubted that Luke means in these verses (24⁵⁰⁻⁵³) to describe the final separation of Jesus from His disciples, so that the assumption in question would be justified; and the difficulty remains untouched, that this final separation, whatever its circumstances, seems to take place, on the most natural construction of the whole passage (vv. 15-53), on the evening of the Resurrection day, whereas in Ac 1 it is forty days later. In the Fourth Gospel there are more explicit references to the A. than in any of the rest, but no narrative. 'What if ye shall see the Son of Man ascending (ἀναβαίνοντα) where he was before?' (6⁶²). More notable still is the language of 20¹⁷, where Jesus says to Mary Magdalene, 'Touch me not; for I have not yet ascended (ἀναβέβηκα) to the Father: but go to my brethren and tell them, I ascend (ἀναβαίτω) to my Father and your Father, and my God and your God.' The present tense in this last clause is not quite clear. It might describe what was imminent, an A. close at hand; but Westcott renders it, 'I am ascending,' as if the process had actually begun. 'In one sense the change symbolised by the visible A. was being wrought for the apostles during the forty days, as they gradually became familiarised with the phenomena of Christ's higher life' (Com. on Jn 20¹⁷). But it is confusing to combine with the visible A. the idea of something going on in the apostles' minds for six weeks before. Christ's manifestations of Himself during those weeks to His disciples, undoubtedly familiarised them with the idea that now He no more belonged to this world, but had another and higher mode of being; but the A., as a separate event, is more than this. It is the solemn close of even such manifestations, and the exaltation of Christ into a life where contact with Him may be more close and intimate than ever (this is the force of 'Touch me not; for I am not yet ascended'), but must be purely spiritual. In the Book of Acts (1^{9a}) the A. narrative is most complete. Jesus had been speaking to the disciples about the universal destination of His kingdom, and the promised gift of the Spirit, and as He finished He was taken up (ἐπῆρθη—here only in NT applied to the A.) while they looked on, and a cloud received Him out of their sight. Two men in white raiment assured the apostles that He would come in like manner as they had seen Him go into heaven.

The Epistles may be said to look at Christ in His exaltation, 'seated at the right hand of God,' and rather to involve the A. than to refer directly to it. Yet there are passages in several in which allusion seems to be made to the same event as is described in Acts. Eph 4⁸⁻¹⁰ is one. Christ is there spoken of as ὁ ἀναβὰς ὑπεράνω πάντων τῶν οὐρανῶν. Similarly, though there is perhaps a more poetic and less historical flavour in the words, we read of Him in He 4¹⁴ as διεληλυθότα τοὺς οὐρανοὺς and in 7²⁶ as ὑψηλότερος τῶν οὐρανῶν γερόμενος. There is less dubiety as to the reference in 1 P 3²² ὅς ἐστιν ἐν δεξιᾷ θεοῦ πορευθεὶς εἰς οὐρανόν, and in the hymn cited in 1 Ti 3¹⁶ ἀνελήμφθη ἐν δόξῃ, where the same word is used as in Mark and in Acts.

It is quite true to say that the A. is not separately emphasized in the NT as an event distinct from the Resurrection, or from the state of exaltation to which it was the solemn entrance. But it is quite false to say that it is identified with either, or that Resurrection, A., and sitting at God's right hand, are all names for the same thing. Certainly each of them might be used in any age, and they might be used still as a comprehensive name for the glory of Christ, but this does not abolish the distinction between them. When Jesus rose from the dead, He 'manifested himself' to His disciples. Already He belonged to another world, and it was only when He would that He put Himself in any relation with those who had loved Him in this. After each manifestation He parted from them; how, we cannot tell; the NT only suggests that it was not in that way which marked the A. When faith in the Resurrection was assured in the apostles' hearts; when He had expounded to them the Christian significance of the OT, and the universal destination of the gospel; when He had again promised the Holy Spirit to endue them with power from on high, He parted from them for the last time in such a way that they knew it was the last; He passed with something like kingly state to the right hand of the Father. To talk about Copernicanism in this connexion, and to object to the whole idea of the A. because we cannot put down the heaven into which Jesus entered on a star-map, is to misconceive the Resurrection and everything connected with it. The Lord of glory manifested Himself to His own, and at last put a term to these manifestations in a mode as gracious as it was sublime: but the whole series of events is one with which astronomy has nothing to do.

Neither is there any reason to argue back from the phenomena of the Epistles, through those of the Gospels, to the conclusion that the Christian belief in the exaltation of Jesus created the beautiful myth of the A. Westcott and Hort may be right in their suggestion that the A. does not belong to the idea of a Gospel, though the suggestion does not of itself seem conclusive; but even if the final parting of Jesus is referred to in Lk 24⁵¹, and even if the date is not the same as in Ac 1, it does not follow that the story in Acts is mythical. Luke may have learned the details more accurately in the interval that elapsed between the composition of his two works; and in any case it is highly improbable that a myth-producing spirit, which had the same motive to impel it from the first hour the Resurrection was preached, should have suddenly (as it would be in this case) generated an A. myth at the very moment when it would dislocate St. Luke's histories. Neither is there any reason to oppose to each other, as many do, the A. narrative and what is called the religious idea underlying it, as husk is opposed to kernel. The Christian faith certainly holds that 'Christ, as the transfigured One, is absolutely exempt from the limitations of earth and nature, and that He, the ever-living One, is the head of humanity, exalted in glory, in whom humanity is conscious of its own exaltation' (Schenkel, Bibel-Lexicon, s.v. Himmelfahrt Jesu). But the A. story is not the husk of which this faith is the kernel. It is the record of the last and apparently the most imposing of those manifestations of the Risen One to which this faith owes its origin. No kind of objection lies against the A. which does not lie also against the Resurrection. Its historicity is of the same kind, though the direct attestation of it is less; and the manifestation of Christ, at a later date, under quite exceptional circumstances, to St. Paul at his conversion, while it is in harmony with the fact of the A., does not really affect its significance as the formal cessation of this mode of manifestation.

In itself the A. is no more than a point of transition: its theological significance cannot be distinguished from that of the Resurrection and Exaltation of Christ. If we regard Christ merely as ideal man, the A. may be said to complete the manifestation of human nature and its destiny: this exaltation, and not the corruption of the grave, is what God made man for. Man is not revealed in moral character simply; there is a mode of being which answers to ideal goodness, and the A. is our clearest look at it. If we regard it in relation to the work of Christ's earthly life, it merges in His exaltation as God's acknowledgment of that work, and the reward bestowed on him for it (see Ph 2⁶⁻¹¹). If we regard it in relation to the future, it seems to be, judged by our Lord's own words in Lk 24⁴⁹, Ac 1⁶, and Jn 14-16, the condition of His sending the Spirit in the power of which the apostles were to preach repentance and remission of sins everywhere. It enthroned Him, not only in their imaginations, but in reality; He was able now to exercise all power in heaven and on earth. 'Being therefore exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, He hath poured forth this which ye see and hear. For David ascended not into the heavens' (οὐκ ἀνέβη). This is the aspect of the subject which prevails in the NT.

LITERATURE.—The subject is discussed in all the Lives of Christ: as typical on opposite sides may be named Neander (p. 484 ff. Eng. tr.) and Hase, Geschichte Jesu, § 113. See also Swete, The Apostles' Creed, p. 64 ff., the commentators on Ac 1^{9ff.}; Milligan, Ascension and Heavenly Priesthood, Lect. I.; and Knowling, Witness of the Epistles, p. 397 ff.

ASCENT is the rendering in AV of three Heb. words. 1. אָלַח ma'alah, used of the 'ascent (pass) of Akkrabbim' (Nu 34⁴), and the 'ascent of the Mt. of Olives' (2 S 15³⁰). Besides these two instances (all that occur in AV), RV correctly gives the same rendering 'ascent,' where AV uses such phrases as 'the going up to,' in Jos 10¹⁰ 15². 7 18¹⁷, Jg 8¹², 1 S 9¹¹, 2 S 15³⁰, 2 K 9²⁷, 2 Ch 20¹⁶ 32²⁸, Is 15⁵, Jer 48⁵, in all of which the same Heb. term אָלַח is employed. The plural אָלַח of the cognate fem. form occurs in the well-known title of several Psalms (שִׁיר אֲלָחִים, AV 'Song of degrees,' RV 'Song of ascents'). See PSALMS. 2. אָלַח 'alah, is rendered 'ascent' by both AV and RV in 1 K 10⁶, 'his ascent by which he went up into the house of the Lord,' although RVm offers as an alternative rendering, 'his burnt-offering which he offered in,' etc. This last is certainly the usual meaning of אָלַח, and there appears to be no sufficient reason for departing from it in the present instance. If Solomon offered sacrifices on the colossal scale referred to in 1 K 8²⁶, the admiration of the queen of Sheba was natural enough. This is the view of the passage taken by Kittel, Reuss, Kamphausen, Kautzsch, etc., and it has the support of LXX (δολοαύωσι), Syriac and Vulg. 3. In the parallel passage 2 Ch 9⁴ we find אָלַח aluyyah. This word signifies elsewhere an 'upper chamber' (ὑπερφόν), and it is so rendered, or by 'chamber' alone, in 1 K 17¹⁹, 22, 2 K 4¹⁰, 11, 2 S 18³³, 1 Ch 28¹¹, 2 Ch 3⁹, Neh 3³⁰, Ps 104³, 13, Jer 22¹³, 14 (in Jg 3²³, 26 both AV and RV have 'parlour'). If we retain the MT, we must understand the reference to be to an upper chamber which Solomon was building (observe the imperf. אָלַח) upon the temple. This, however, yields an improbable and unsuitable meaning, and in all likelihood the text ought to be corrected from אָלַח to אָלַח (LXX δολοαυώματα) in conformity with 1 K 10⁶ (see notes on 2 Ch 9⁴ by Kittel in Haupt's Sacred Bks. of OT, and by Kautzsch in Heil. Schr. d. A.T.). J. A. SELBIE.

ASEAS ('Asalas), 1 Es 9⁸².—One of the sons of Annas who agreed to put away his 'strange' wife, called Isshijah (אִשְׁיָה: 'whom J' lends'), Ezr 10⁸¹.

ASEBEBIAS ('Ασβεβίας, AV Asebebia).—A Levite who accompanied Ezra to Jerus., 1 Es 8⁷.

ASEBIAS (A 'Ασβιά, B omits, AV Asebia).—A Levite who returned with Ezra, 1 Es 8⁴⁸.

ASENATH (אֲסַנַּת).—The daughter of Poti-pherah, priest of On, and wife of Joseph. She was the mother of Ephraim and Manasseh (Gn 41⁴⁵, 50 46²⁰). The name may mean 'belonging to (or favourite of) Neith' (Qaf. Heb. Lex. s.v.). She is commemorated by the Greek Church apparently on Dec. 13, and by the Ethiopian on the 1st of Senne. The story of A. has been made the subject of a remarkable novel which exists in Greek (the original language), Syriac, Armenian, and Latin, as well as in many mediæval European versions made from the Latin. The Latin is itself not older than the 13th cent., and is the work, as is believed, of Robert Grosseteste, bishop of Lincoln, or of one of the scholars associated with him. The name of the romance is either the History of A. or The Book of the Confession of A. It has been assigned by its last editor, P. Batiffol, to the 5th cent. It is certain, however, that the Syriac version is as old as the 6th cent., and the probability is that the original is at least as early as the 3rd cent.

In its present form it is a Christian version of a Jewish legend. A full account of the story may be seen in Hort's article in Smith's Dict. Christ. Biogr. Summarised it runs thus: A. is the proud and beautiful daughter of Pentephres of Heliopolis. She lives in magnificent seclusion and despises all men. Her father and mother propose that she shall marry Joseph, now prime minister to Pharaoh. She rejects the thought with scorn. However, Joseph soon arrives at the house on one of his journeys through Egypt to collect corn. Asenath sees him and at once falls in love. But Joseph, who has a horror of all women, will have nothing to say to her, and cannot even kiss her, since she worships idols. He blesses her, and then she retires to her room. Here she shuts herself up for seven days in sackcloth and ashes, throws her idols out of the window, and does strict penance. On the 8th day she utters a long prayer. Thereafter an angel comes to her in the form of Joseph and blesses her, and gives her to eat of a mystic honeycomb, on which the sign of the cross is made. A., then accepted of God, arrays herself in beautiful garments, and goes forth to meet Joseph, who now returns to the house. The parents are away, but the betrothal takes place in their absence; and then the wedding in Pharaoh's presence. At this point the Armenian version makes a break, and ends the first part; here also in Syr., Arm., and Lat., but not in any known Greek MS, occurs a lamentation of Asenath for her former pride.

The second part of the book contains the story first of A.'s introduction to Jacob when he came to Egypt, and then, at great length, of an attempt on the part of Pharaoh's firstborn son to abduct A.,—an attempt in which he enlists the services of Dan and Gad, and in which he is baffled by Benjamin, Simeon, and Levi, and loses his life. This part of the story, which is very well told, has hardly any religious interest, save in the forgiveness of Dan and Gad by A. But in the first part of the book the religious element is far more prominent. Stress is laid on purity and on repentance.

The raison d'être of the book, or rather, of the Jewish legend which lies behind it, is to evade the difficulty of Joseph's marriage with a heathen wife: and, as Batiffol and Oppenheim (see Lit.) have shown, the original legend made A. a Jewess by birth. It identified her with the daughter of Dinah, Jacob's daughter, and of Shechem. This has been slurred over in the Greek novel; but it is implied by certain words in the Syriac, where A.'s visit to Jacob is described.

The romance is altogether one of the most successful, from a literary point of view, that the apocryphal literature affords. It was widely known in Europe by means of the extracts from it which Frater Vincentius (Vincent of Beauvais) included in his Speculum Historiale in the 13th century.

ASH (אֲשָׁ, 'oren, אֲרֵז, pinus) (Is 44¹⁴, AV. RV has fir, with ash in m.).—The conditions to be fulfilled by this tree are that its wood should be suitable to be carved into an image, and used for fuel; that it should be a familiar tree, planted, as distinguished from the forest trees mentioned in the former part of the verse; and that it should be nourished by rain, and not by artificial irrigation, as in the case of almost all the cultivated trees of Syria and Palestine. These conditions exclude several of the candidates. They make it improbable that the unknown tree 'aran, described by Abu Fadli as growing in Arabia Petrea, is intended. Such a tree would not be likely to be planted, nor to thrive out of the stations where it is indigenous. Salvadora Persica, proposed by Royle, is a desert shrub, with a trunk out of which it would be impossible to find a piece large enough to carve into a graven image, and in every other way quite unsuitable. Luther's surmise, that the final י of the Heb. original is a י, and that the tree is a cedar, is forbidden by the previous mention of the cedar in the same passage. The interpretation ash of AV has no support from philology. It is wholly improbable that 'oren has any connexion with ornus. There are three species of ash in Syria—Fraxinus Ornus, L., which grows in the mountains from Lebanon to Amanus; F. excelsior, L., Amanus and northward; and F. oxycarpa, Willd., var. oligophylla, Boiss., Tel-el-Kaḍi (Dan) to Antilebanon, Lebanon, and Aleppo. The modern Arab. name for the last is dardār (also the elm). It is a fine tree, with a hemispherical comus, 15 to 45 feet high, and has a trunk which would furnish wood suitable for the requirements of the text. But it grows wild, usually near or by water, and therefore would not likely have been selected as a tree which the 'rain doth nourish.' Fir is an unfortunate guess, as there are other words which correspond to the different sorts of fir. Pine has the authority of the LXX. There are three species of pine growing in the Holy Land—Pinus Haleppensis, Mill, the Aleppo Pine; P. Brutia, Ten.; and P. Pinea, L., the maritime or stone pine. The latter tree fulfils best the conditions of the 'oren.

It is a tree well known by the Arabic name snowbar, with a resinous, hard wood, capable of being carved, and much used for fuel, especially in the public ovens. It produces large cones, and an edible seed, for which it is cultivated, and the taste of which when roasted resembles that of a roasted peanut. Moreover, it is a tree which is very extensively planted, and always in sandy places or on dry hillsides, where it receives only the rain. It is one of the few cultivated (planted) trees in this land which are never watered except by the rain. It is never planted in irrigated ground. The seed is sown in low-lying districts along the coast after the first rains, when the ground is softened, and in the mountains in the latter days of February, when all danger of the tender sprout being nipped by frost has passed away, but when there is prospect of rain sufficient to 'nourish' the seedling for its exposure to the blazing sunshine during the eight long rainless months that are to follow. The explanatory clause of our passage has very peculiar force with reference to this tree. The objection of Celsius, that the pine does not bear transplanting, is futile, as it is only said that they were planted. The same word is used for the lign-aloes (Nu 24⁶), and the cedars (Ps 104¹⁶), both of which it is said the 'Lord planted,' i.e. sowed, for they were certainly not transplanted. Also God is represented as planting the desolate places (Ezk 36³⁶). Vast groves of snowbar have been planted at points along the coast to arrest the movement of the sand dunes. Such a grove was planted by Ibrahim Pasha in 1840 near Beirūt, and is one of the most picturesque features of the beautiful plain between the city and Lebanon. Large numbers of these groves are planted on the red sandstone of Lebanon, and in parts of Palestine. As the tree grows, the lower branches are lopped off, and only a mushroom-shaped top is left. The trees grow near together and very uniformly, so that the top of a large grove such as that near Beirūt, when looked upon from the mountain, presents a flat green surface, which constitutes a very marked and attractive feature of the landscape. When planted on steep mountain sides, as in Lebanon and on the Apulian coast of Italy, the tall trunks, surmounted by their dense crown of evergreen leaves, fringe the tops and dot the sides of the rugged grey peaks with a beauty hardly rivalled by any other tree.

ASHAN (אָשָׁן), Jos 15²² 19⁷, 1 Ch 4³² 6⁹⁹.—Perhaps the same as Cor-ashan, which see. It was a town of Judah, near Libnah and Rimmon, belonging to Simeon, and not far from Debir. It must have been on the slopes of the hills east of Gaza, but the site is doubtful. C. R. CONDER.

ASHARELAH (אֲשָׁרֵלָה, AV Asarelah).—An Asaphite (1 Ch 25²), called in v.¹⁴ Jesharelah (see Kittel's notes on 1 Ch 4¹⁶ 25^{2, 4}).

ASHBEA (אֲשָׁבֵעָ) occurs in an obscure passage (1 Ch 4²¹ 'house of A.') where it is uncertain whether it is the name of a place or of a man. See GENEALOGY.

ASHBEL (אֲשָׁבֵל, perh. corrupted from אֲשָׁבֵל 'man of Baal').—The second son of Benjamin (1 Ch 8¹; cf. Gn 46²¹, Nu 26³⁸). In Nu 26³⁸ Ashbelite, inhabitant of Ashbel, occurs.

ASHDOD (אֲשְׁדוֹד, 'fortress'?).—One of the five great Philistine cities. Jos 11²² 13³ 15^{46, 47}, 1 S 5¹⁻⁷, 2 Ch 26⁶, Neh 4⁷ 13²⁴, Jer 25²⁰ 47⁵, Am 1⁸, Zeph 2⁴, Zec 9⁵. Azotus, 1 Mac 5¹⁸ 10⁸⁴, Ac 8⁴⁰. It is now the mud village Esdlūd, on the edge of the plain, close to a large hillock of red sand, backed by dunes of drifted sand which extend to the shore cliffs. A few palms grow near, and water is supplied by a pond. The sand probably covers the site of the ancient city. The inhabitants, in type and dress, resemble the Egypt. rather than the Pal. peasantry. A small gein was found here in 1875, representing Dagon as a fish-man; but this may be comparatively recent, resembling Gnostic gems of the 2nd cent. A.D. A. was not taken by the Hebrews, and was the refuge of the Anakim (Jos 11²²). The villages near it belonged to Judah (Jos 15^{46, 47}). The inhabitants were still independent in the time of Samuel (1 S 5¹), but A. was attacked by Uzziah (2 Ch 26⁶). Its inhabitants were enemies of the Jews after the Captivity (Neh 4⁷), and it is mentioned as a reproach that the children of the mixed marriages spoke 'half in the speech of A.' (Neh 13²⁴). The city is said in the 7th cent. B.C. to have sustained a 29 years' siege by Psammitichus (Herod. ii. 157). In B.C. 711 A. was besieged by Sargon after the capture of Samaria. Its king, Yavan or Yamani, had been set up in place of the Assyrian nominee Akhimiti, whom Sargon placed on the throne instead of a certain Azuri who had refused tribute. The Philistines, Jews (Ja'udu), Edomites, and Moabites were allied, and had sent for aid to Piru (Pharaoh?); yet A. was obliged to submit to the Assyrians. In B.C. 702 Sennacherib, according to his own record, freed Mitinti (who seems to have been also king of Ashkelon about thirty-four years later) from Hezekiah, and he became tributary for a time to Assyria. In B.C. 668 the name of the king of A., tributary to Assurbanipal, was Ahimilhi or Ahimelech. The city was taken by Judas Macabæans (c. 165), and again (c. 148) by Jonathan (1 Mac 5⁸⁸ 10⁸⁴). It became a bishopric in the 4th cent. A.D., but its importance gradually decreased, and the site was not generally known in the Middle Ages. See SWP vol. iii. sheet xvi.

ASHER (אָשֵׁר, 'happy').—This was the name of Jacob's eighth son, the second born to him by Zilpah, Leah's handmaid; her elder son being Gad (Gn 35²⁶). Asher had four sons and one daughter (Gn 46¹⁷ R). A 'happy' lot was predicted for him in Jacob's blessing, 'his bread shall be fat, and he shall yield royal dainties' (Gn 49²⁰ J). His good fortune is also foreshadowed in the blessing of Moses, 'Blessed be Asher with children; let him be acceptable unto his brethren, and let him dip his foot in oil' (Dt 33²⁴). When Israel left Egypt the adult males of the tribe numbered 41,500; more than either Ephraim, Manasseh, or Benjamin. Before the invasion of Western Pal. the numbers had grown to 53,400 (Nu 1⁴¹ 26⁴⁷ P). The tribe appears in the name-lists with the others throughout the earlier books. The position of Asher in the desert march was between Dan and Naphtali on the N. of the tabernacle (Nu 2²⁶⁻³⁰ P). Sethur, the chief, went with the head men of the other tribes from the wilderness of Paran to spy out the land (Nu 13¹³). Of Asher in future days little is deemed worthy of record save his inglorious failures. As his rich territory lay close to the Phœnician cities with their open markets and prosperous commerce, he seems very soon to have identified his interests with theirs. This may account for his failure to take possession of many of the cities that had been allotted to him (Jg 1³¹), and also for his inactivity when, in opposition to Sisera and his host, Zebulun 'jeopardied their lives unto the death, and Naphtali upon the high places of the field,' while he 'sat still at the haven of the sea, and abode by his creeks' (Jg 5^{17, 18}). The decline of Asher was so rapid that the name does not appear in the list of chief rulers in the days of David (1 Ch 27¹⁶⁻²²). He shares with Simeon the reproach of having given no hero, judge, or ruler to Israel. Not wholly lost, a few from Asher with others from Manasseh and Zebulun 'humbled themselves and came to Jerusalem' in response to the call of Hezekiah (2 Ch 30¹¹). Of this tribe was the saintly Anna, whose lofty piety sheds a ray of glory upon the family in the gathering evening of the nation's life (Lk 2³⁶⁻³⁸).

We cannot accurately trace the boundaries of the territory of Asher. Even if the towns apportioned to it (Jos 19²⁴⁻³¹, Jg 1^{31, 32}; see also Jos 17^{10, 11}) were all identified, which they are not, the difficulty would remain. Each town carried with it the land belonging to its citizens, the limits of which it is impossible to determine. Dor, the modern Tanturah, on the seacoast S. of Carmel, although inhabited by Manasseh, was in the lot of Asher (Jos 17^{10, 11}). Nahr ez-Zerka, known also as the 'Crocodile River,' would therefore form a natural boundary to the south. The border may then have passed over the S.E. shoulder of Carmel. Touching the western point of Esdraelon, the territory of Issachar, it proceeded northward in an irregular line, at a distance of eight to ten miles from the sea, skirting the western edge of Zebulun and Naphtali. Nearly opposite Tyre, probably, it bent eastward, taking in a large part of what is now called Belād Beshārah and Belād esh-Shukūf, turning seaward again in the direction of Sidon. This agrees with the account of Josephus (Ant. v. i. 22), 'The tribe of Aser had that part which is called the Valley [by which he evidently means the low land along the seaboard], even all that part which lay over against Sidon.' This includes much of the finest and most fruitful land in Palestine. Grain, excellent in quantity and quality, is grown on the Phœnician plains. The orchards of Acre and the orange groves of Sidon are justly held in high repute. Even in the decay of the country it continues to yield 'royal dainties,' many tons of oil being sent annually to the palaces in Constantinople, the produce of these deep, rich valleys in Upper Galilee, where the hardy peasants cultivate the olive as of old. W. EWING.

ASHERAH (אֲשֵׁרָה).—1. A Phoenician and Canaanite goddess (Ex 34¹³ RVm) (a) the same as or (b) distinct from 'Ashtōreth'. The name occurs (1) in two Phoen. inscriptions, one from Kition, ZDMG xxxv. 424, the other from Ma'sub, Rev. Archéologique (1885), v. 380. In the first, as read by Schröder, one 'Abdosir dedicates a statue to 'the Mother 'Asherah.' The second speaks of 'Ashtōreth in the 'Asherah'; (2) in the Tel el-Amarna inscriptions (RP 2nd Ser. ii. 67, iii. 71, v. 97, vi. 50). In these mention is made of one 'Abad-'Ashrat, i.e. Servant of Ashrat, and the latter word is said to be emphasized as a divine name (Schrader, Zeitsch. für Assyriol. iii. [1888] 364); (3) in the OT, Jg 3⁷ 'the children of Israel . . . served the Baalim and the Asheroth'; 1 K 15¹³=2 Ch 15¹⁶ 'Maacah . . . made an abominable image for an Asherah'; 1 K 18¹⁹ 'the prophets of the Asherah'; 2 K 21⁷ Manasseh 'set the graven image of Asherah' in the temple; 23⁴ 'vessels that were made for Baal and for the Asherah'; 23⁶ Josiah 'brought out the Asherah from the house of the Lord'; 23⁷ 'the women wove hangings for the Asherah.' (For 'Asherah as a goddess, see Kuenen, Rel. of Israel, ii. 88; Movers, Die Phönizier, i. 560; Sayce, HCM 81.)

But the existence of this goddess is a disputed point. The evidence, it must be admitted, is very limited, and not decisive. With regard to the Phoen. sources, the word on the Kition inscription supposed to represent 'Asherah is differently read by Stade, ZAW (1881) 344 f., and in the CIS i. 1. 13; whilst the phrase in the Ma'sub inscription is obscure, and can be explained in different ways (Halévy, Rev. des Études Juives, xii. 110; Hoffmann, Ueber einige Phön. Inschr. 26 ff.). Again, the value of the evidence of the Tel el-Amarna inscriptions upon this point is as yet uncertain (Nowack, Heb. Arch. ii. 307, n. 2; W. R. Smith, Rel. Sem. 173 n). And, lastly, the OT passages are perhaps best explained by supposing that the compilers of the hist. books misunderstood the term 'Asherah, and confused it with 'Ashtōreth (Stade, Gesch. des Volkes Isr. i. 460; Nowack, p. 19; W. R. Smith, p. 173; Montefiore, Hibbert Lect. 89).

2. A sacred tree or pole. The ordinary furniture of a Can. high-place or shrine consisted of the altar, near to which stood a stone pillar or Mazzébah, and a sacred tree or 'Asherah, 1 K 14²³, 2 K 18⁴. For an altar and an 'Asherah of Baal, cf. Jg 6²⁵⁻³⁰. When the Israelite invaders appropriated for their own religious worship the high-places of the Canaanites, they adopted also the Mazzébahs and 'Asherahs, Mic 5¹²⁻¹⁴, Is 17⁸, 27⁹, Jer 17², 1 K 14²³, 2 K 17¹⁰⁻¹⁶. Not until the centralisation of the cultus at Jerus., carried out by Josiah, did the high-places, and with them the pillars and sacred trees, become illegal, Dt 16²¹.

An idea of the appearance and nature of an 'Asherah may be obtained from a comparison of some of the passages in which the word occurs. It was a tree, or stump of a tree, planted in the earth, Dt 16²¹; it could be artificially made, Is 17⁸, 1 K 14¹⁵ 16³³; it was made of wood, Jg 6²⁶; it might receive an image-like form, 1 K 15¹³; it could be 'cut down,' Ex 34¹³, 'plucked up,' Mic 5¹⁴, 'burnt,' Dt 12³, or 'broken in pieces,' 2 Ch 34⁴. What are supposed to be representations of such sacred trees may be seen in Rawlinson's Ancient Monarchies, ii. 37, or in Nowack, ii. 19.

The original signification of the 'Asherahs is not clear. Some have held that they were symbols either of a supposed goddess 'Asherah (Kuenen, Rel. Isr. ii. 75, 88, 247), or of 'Ashtōreth (Baethgen, Beiträge, 218 f.; Oettli on Jg 3⁷ in Strack and Zöckler's Kurzgefasster Komm.). Others believe them to have been connected with Phallic worship (Movers, Collins, PSBA, June 4, 1889, 291; M. Ohnefalsch-Richter, Cyprus, the Bible, and Homer, 146, 170); but against this, see W. R. Smith, p. 437. Perhaps the most probable view is that which sees in the 'Asherahs a survival of tree-worship, whilst the Mazzébahs represent a survival of stone-worship (W. R. Smith, p. 169; Stade, Gesch. i. 460 ff.; Pietschmann, Gesch. der Phönizier, 213; Nowack, ii. 19).

The rendering 'grove' (plu. 'groves,' RV Asherim) of AV comes from LXX ἄσος, a trans. which, though possible in some cases, is obviously inappropriate in others, e.g. 1 K 14²³ 15¹³ 2 K 23⁶.

LITERATURE.—Driver on Dt. 16²¹; Moore on Jg 3⁷ 6²⁵; and the ref. above. For a fresh attempt to connect tree and pillar veneration with Phallic worship, see Trumbull, The Threshold Covenant (1896), p. 228 ff.
W. C. ALLEN.

ASHES.—1. 'Sackcloth and ashes' are, in OT, Apoc., and NT alike, the familiar tokens of humiliation and penitence, generally accompanied by fasting (Job 42⁶, Is 58⁶, Dn 9³, Jon 3⁶, Est 4¹, Jth 4¹¹, 1 Mac 3⁴⁷, Mt 11²¹, Lk 10¹³ etc.). Ashes were also, with earth and dust, the usual signs of mourning, 2 S 1², Job 2⁸⁻¹², Jer 6²⁶, Is 61². In both cases the penitent or mourner took the ashes and cast them with expressive gesture 'toward heaven,' so that they fell on his person, and especially on his head, a custom not confined to the Hebrews (cf. Iliad, xviii. 23 ff.). In extreme cases the mourner sat upon a heap of ashes (Job 2⁸). References to the custom are freq. in Scripture (see, in addition to passages already quoted, Job 2¹² 42⁶, Jer 6²⁶, Ezk 27³⁰, Est 4³, Jth 4¹¹ 9¹, 1 Mac 3⁴⁷ 4³⁹). The priests in times of great affliction seem to have put ashes on their 'mitres,' Jth 4¹⁵. Ashes upon the head were also a sign of physical humiliation and disgrace (2 S 13¹⁹, Ezk 25¹⁶, Mal 4³). Ashes are used in OT, alone or with 'dust,' * as a natural synonym of worthlessness and insignificance, Gn 18²⁷, Is 44²⁰. Job 13¹² (proverbs of ashes = worthless, trashy proverbs) 30¹⁹, Sir 10⁹. 2. The same term (אֵשָׁה, σποδός) is employed in Nu 19⁹⁻¹⁰ (P) to denote the mixture composed of the ashes proper of the red heifer and those of 'cedar wood, hyssop and scarlet,' and used for the preparation of the so-called 'water of separation.' See PURIFICATION, RED HEIFER. 3. The priestly term. tech. for the ashes of the animals burnt in sacrifice is אֵשֶׁת (lit. fatness, LXX πύρρος), Lv 1¹⁶ 4¹³ 6¹⁰⁻¹¹ (P); the corresponding verb denotes the clearing away of the accumulated fat ashes, Ex 27⁸, Nu 4¹³. See TABERNACLE. 4. The word rendered 'ashes' in Ex 9⁸⁻¹⁰ (P) of uncertain origin, and only found here) more probably signifies 'soot,' as in the m. of RV. See Commentaries. 5. In 1 K 20³⁸⁻⁴¹ 'ashes' in AV is a mistranslation, from a confusion of אֵשָׁה, a bandage, with אֵשָׁה ashes; RV correctly, 'with his head-band over his eyes.' For the use of ashes in the preparation of bread, see BREAD.
A. R. S. KENNEDY.

ASHHUR (אֲשּׁוּר, AV Ashur).—The 'father' of Tekoa (1 Ch 2²⁴ 4⁵). See GENEALOGY.

ASHIMA (אֲשִׁימָה, 2 K 17³⁰).—A deity of the Hamathites, who introduced its worship into Samaria, when settled there by Sargon in place of the exiled Israelites. Many conjectures have been made as to its identity, but none has been generally accepted. Jewish tradition has represented it as a hairless goat, or, again, as a cat to which the ram of the guilt-offering was sacrificed. Similarity of sound has led to comparison with the Pers. asmān, Zend. azmano, heaven, with Eshmun, the eighth of the Phoen. Kabirim, and with the Bab. Tashmetu, goddess of revelation, wife of Nebo. As Hamath was occupied by the Hittites, the name very possibly is of Hittite origin.

* Ges. Lex. (12th ed.), following Barth's suggested connexion (Etym. Stud. 20) of אֵשָׁה with Arab. ghibār 'dust,' would render by 'dust' in all the passages above, by 'a.' only in Nu 19⁹⁻¹⁰.

ASHKELON (אַשְׁקֶלֶן, in AV Eshkalon, Jos 13⁸; Ashkelon, Jg 1¹⁸, 1 S 6¹⁷, 2 S 1²⁰; Ashkelon, Jer 25²⁰ 47, Am 1⁸, Zeph 2⁴, Zec 9⁵; in Apoc. Ascalon both AV and RV).—One of the five chief cities of Philistia, between Joppa and Gaza, standing on low cliffs close to the shore, and without a harbour. It continued to be under the rule of native chiefs or kings down to the Greek period. It is first noticed monumentally in the Tel el-Amarna tablets, about B.C. 1480–1450, the inhabitants being said to have offered tribute to the Khabiri. Letters in this collection from Yamir-Dagan and Dagan-takala, chiefs of Ashkelon, subject to the Pharaoh, show the early worship of Dagon among its inhabitants. A. was reconquered in the 14th cent. B.C. by Ramses II. In the 7th cent. B.C. its king is noticed as a tributary of Esarhaddon, and of Assurbanipal, and was named Mitinti. It was captured by Jonathan, brother of Judas Maccabæus (1 Mac 10⁸⁸ 11⁹⁰). Herod the Great was born at A., and beautified it with new buildings (Jos. Wars, I. xxi. 11). In the 4th cent. A.D. it became a bishopric, and was conquered by the Moslems in the 7th cent. The Crusaders took it in 1153, and it submitted to Saladin in 1187. The latter demolished its walls in 1191, but they were rebuilt by Richard 'Lion-Heart' next year, and subsequently again destroyed by agreement with Saladin. At the present day the ruins of these later walls enclose only gardens supplied by wells and half-covered with sand. The modern name is Askelan. A curious bas-relief, representing Ashtoreth with two attendants, has been excavated in the ruins, and a gigantic statue (probably Roman) was found and destroyed by Lady Hester Stanhope. Until the 13th cent. A.D. A. was an important fortress in all ages, and a depot on the trade route to Egypt. See SWP vol. iii. sheet xvi. C. R. CONDER.

ASHKENAZ (אַשְׁכְּנַז, Gn 10⁸, 1 Ch 1⁶).—The eldest son of Gomer, giving name to a Japhethite people, referred to along with Ararat and Minni in Jer 51²⁷, and therefore apparently in or near Armenia, somewhere between the Black and the Caspian Seas. Ashken is an Armenian proper name, and az is an Armenian name ending. Ascanios, the Homeric hero, was a Phrygian, while there is an Ascanian lake in Phrygia as well as in Bithynia. Later tradition associates the name of Scandinavia with that of this race. See F. W. Schultz in Herzog, art. 'Gomer,' vol. v. 271 f., and comm. on Gn 10⁸ by Delitzsch and Dillmann.

J. MACPHERSON.

ASHNAH (אַשְׁנָה). The name of two towns of Judah. 1. Jos 15³⁸, near Zorah; the site is unknown. 2. Jos 15⁴³, near Nezib, farther south than the preceding, also unknown. In the Onomasticon a village, Asan, is noticed, 15 (or, in the Greek, 16) miles from Jerusalem. The direction is not stated, and it may be the Heb. Jeshanah, though identified with Ashan. C. R. CONDER.

ASHPENAZ (אַשְׁפְּנַז, etym. uncertain).—The chief of Nebuchadrezzar's eunuchs (Dn 1³).

ASHTAROTH (אַשְׁתָּרֹתַי, in form the plural of Ashtoreth; cf. Anāthōth from Anāth: the name is no doubt an indication that the place was once a notable seat of the worship of Ashtoreth).—A place mentioned in OT as (with Edre'i) one of the two royal cities of 'Og, the king of Bashan (Dt 1⁴, Jos 9¹⁰ 12⁴ 13^{12, 21}), and as a Levitical city (1 Ch 6⁷¹ (56)); the parallel text Jos 21²⁷ has BE'ESHTERAH, i.e. probably House, or Temple, of Ashtoreth) assigned (according to P) to the Gershonites. So far as the biblical data go, Ashtaroth might be identical with Ashteroth-Karnaim (the name being merely abbreviated from it); if, however, the statements of Euseb. (in the Onom.) be correct, the two places were distinct. In the Onom., namely, we read: '(1) Ashtaroth Karnaim: there are still two villages [of this name] in Bashan, 9 miles distant from each other, between Adara (Edre'i) and Abila (p. 209, Lag.). (2) Ashtaroth: an ancient city of Og, in Bashan, 6 miles from Adara (p. 213). (3) Karnaim Ashtaroth: now a large village in the corner [see Jerome, p. 108, 18] of Bashan, where the traditional dwelling of Job is shown (p. 268).' Now, an ancient tradition (see Wetzstein in the App. to Delitzsch's Hiob (E. tr. ii. 397 ff.; ed. 2, p. 552 ff.) places 'Uz, the fatherland of Job, in this region: at the top of a long, low hill, 16 miles N.N.W. of Edre'i, on which stands the village of Sa'diye (also called Sheikh Sa'd), is a mosque, containing the Ṣakhret Ayyub, or Job's Stone, a monolith of basalt, against which, according to the legend reported by Arab. writers, the patriarch leaned as he sat on the ground and received his friends (see Wetzst. p. 563, and Schumacher, Across the Jordan, pp. 189–191, with plans and cuts); at the foot of the hill, from what is supposed to be the spot where, at the close of his sufferings, Job stamped his foot (cf. Kor. 38^{aa}), gushes forth the beautiful 'Job's Spring,' the waters of which, after flowing a short distance, are conducted to the Hammām Ayyub, or Job's Bath, reputed to possess healing virtues (Wetzst. p. 562; Schum. p. 193 f.; also PEFSt, 1895, p. 180); slightly to the S. of this, Wetzstein (p. 561 f.) saw the Maḳām Ayyub, or Tomb of Job; a little farther S., about $\frac{2}{3}$ of a mile from Sheikh Sa'd, at a government settlement now called El-Merkez, there was, until recently (for its place is now occupied by barracks), a Dēr Ayyub, or Monastery of Job, the foundation of which is assigned by Abulfeda (Hist. anteisl., ed. Fleischer, p. 128) to the Ghassānide prince 'Amr I. in the 3rd cent. A.D. (Wetzst. pp. 564–566; Schum. p. 196; Socin in Bäd. Pal.² 303; Schum. p. 197 also describes here a Maḳām Ayyub, or Tomb of Job, which is not mentioned by Wetzst.; but van Kasteren, ZDPV, 1893, pp. 200–204, declares this building to be not 30 years old, and argues that the site of the Maḳām must have been changed since Wetzstein saw it in 1853). All these Job-antiquities are frequently mentioned by Arab. writers (see Wetzst., and v. Kast. l.c.). The 'angulus' of Jerome may be the angle formed by the two deep gorges of the Nahr er-Rukkād and the Shari'at el-Menādīreh, still called 'the Eastern Angle' (Schum. pp. 3, 342): cf. Onom. 282, 90 (where Naveh is Nawā). 'Job's Stone' is described more fully by Schumacher in the ZDPV, 1892, 142 ff. (with photographs): the representation of an Egyp. king worshipping before a deity can be traced upon it, together with characters, which Erman (ib. 1893, 205 ff.) reads as Wesr-ma-Re, 'chosen of Re,' the official title of Ramses II. (19th dynasty); it is consequently in reality a monument of the age when the Egyp. kings held rule over Syria. Further, only $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles S.S.W. of Sheikh Sa'd there is a hill, Tell 'Ashterā (عشترا), rising about 80 ft. above the surrounding plain, and watered at its foot by the same copious stream spoken of above as having its source in 'Job's Spring,' and here called Moyet en-Neby Ayyub ('stream of the prophet Job'). Tell 'Ashterā was a military centre in the Middle Ages (Nöldeke, 'Zur Topogr. u. Gesch. der Haurāngend,' ZDMG, 1875, p. 431, with the references); and there are remains of fortifications around the summit, together with massive blocks of stone at its S. and S.W. base, running up the hill to meet the wall at the top, all of a character betokening an early age (Merrill, East of Jordan, 329 f.; cf. Schum. Across the Jordan, p. 209). There is a strong presumption that the 'Karnaim Ashtaroth' of Euseb. was one of these localities; and Wetzst. (p. 575; Eng. tr. p. 427), Guthe (ZDPV, 1890, p. 235), and v. Kasteren (ib. 1891, p. 213), all identify the biblical 'Ashteroth-Karnaim with Tell 'Ashterā,—the last named scholar, who interprets (after Wetzst.) the name as signifying 'Ashtaroth near Karnaim (cf. Moresbeth-Gath, etc.), supposing, further, that Karnaim (which Euseb. connects closely with Job's home) was at Sheikh Sa'd, though owning (ib. 1893, p. 197 f.) that this site is hardly so inaccessible as 'Karnaim' is described as being, in 2 Mac 12²¹).

If, however, this was the 'Karnaim Ashtaroth' of Euseb., where was his 'Ashtaroth'? Just 9½ miles south of Sheikh Sa'd, and 6½ (Schum.)—or 8 (Stübel's map, ZDPV, 1890, Heft 4)—miles N.W. of Edrei,—almost exactly, therefore, at the distances assigned by Euseb.,—is the village of El-Mezeirib—situated on the great pilgrim-track (the Derb el-Hajj) between Damascus and Mecca, and the first halting-place of the pilgrims after leaving Damascus. A plan, description, and view will be found in Schumacher, pp. 157-166. The situation of El-Mezeirib gives it importance: an annual fair is held there at the time of the Mecca-pilgrimage: the ancient city (which lies in the centre of a small lake) 'must have been once a strongly fortified place,' and the ruins and huge basaltic blocks, scattered about the shores of the lake, 'seem to be the remains of pre-Mohammedan buildings' (Schum. p. 165). This may well be the 'Ashtaroth' of Euseb. (so Buhl, Topogr. des Nördl. Ostjordanlandes, 1894, p. 16). Whether, however, it is the biblical 'Ashtaroth, the residence of 'Og, is less certain. There is a site, 4½ miles S. of Tell 'Ashterā, and 11 miles N.W. of Edrei, called Tell el-'Ash'ari, which, though no argument in favour of the identification can be drawn from the Arab. name (which is radically different from 'Ashterā), is preferred by others (e.g. v. Kasteren, ZDPV, 1891, p. 213), and which is adapted, by its situation (see the description under ASHTEROth-KARNAIM; and for a view, Oliphant, Land of Gilead, 87 f., where the name is wrongly spelt Asherah), for a royal stronghold. On the whole, there is a reasonable probability that Tell 'Ashterā is one of the two 'Ashtaroths (if there were two), and that either El-Mezeirib or Tell el-'Ash'ari was the other. And if Euseb. distinguishes the two places correctly (though in calling both Ashtaroth Karnaim he shows confusion), the former was 'Ashteroth-Karnaim, and one of the latter 'Ashtaroth. Others identify Tell 'Ashterā with 'Ashtaroth, and either Tell el-'Ash'ari (Oliphant, Schum. pp. 207 f., 209) or Mezeirib (Buhl) with 'Ashteroth-Karnaim: this is opposed to Euseb., and we do not know, as Schum. tacitly assumes, that 'Ashteroth-Karnaim was a more considerable place than 'Og's capital, 'Ashtaroth; but it seems to have the advantage of providing for Karnaim a site more nearly agreeing with the description in 2 Mac 12²¹.

The antiquity of 'Ashtaroth (if the name be read and identified correctly) is attested independently by Egypt. and Assyr. inscriptions: an Ashtertu occurs in the list of places in Southern Syria conquered by Tahutmes III., of the 18th dynasty, in his twenty-second year (Tomkins, TSBA ix. 262, and in *RP*² v. 45, No. 28; W. Max Müller, Asien u. Eur. nach altäg. Denkm. p. 162; cf. Wiedemann, Ag. Gesch. 348 f., 371); and an Ashtarti is mentioned in the correspondence, from Pal., with Amenôphis IV. (15th cent. B.C.) as having been in the possession of the Egyptians, and being seized by rebels (Bezold and Budge, The Tel el-Amarna Tablets in the Brit. Mus., Nos. 43, 64; cf. Sayce, Patriarchal Age, 1895, pp. 133, 153). The writers named identify these places with 'Ashteroth-Karnaim; but they may equally well have been the later capital of 'Og, 'Ashtaroth (supposing this to have been distinct).

ASHTEROth-KARNAIM (עֲשְׁתְרוֹת קַרְנַיִם Ashtaroth of the two horns*).—This is given in the Sam. Targ. as עֲשִׂית קַרְנַיִם † 'Aphnith Karnaim,' and in the Arab. vs of Sa'adya as 'Es-Sanamain.' It is a site of hoary age. The Rephaim were there smitten by Chedorlaomer (Gn 14⁹). Under this name it is seen no more in canon. Scrip.; but it appears as 'Carnaim' or 'Carnion' in the Books of Mac. It is a city 'great and strong' (1 Mac 5²⁶). It is 'hard to besiege, and difficult of access, by reason of the narrowness of the approaches on all sides' (RV 2 Mac 12²¹). Judas Maccabæus took the city by assault. The inhabitants took refuge in the great temple of Atargatis, an idol resembling Dagon of the Philistines; by some also identified with the Gr. Astarte. There some five and twenty thousand were slain, and the temple itself was destroyed.

The distinction between Ashtaroth and Ashteroth-Karnaim, indicated in the Onomasticon, is confirmed by the existence of two sites bearing similar names, Tell 'Ashterā and Tell 'Ash'ari. Eusebius and Jerome describe Ashteroth-Karnaim as vicus grandis in angulo Batanææ, distinguishing two villages of the same name, 9 miles apart, which lay inter Adaram et Abilam civitates. From Tell 'Ash'ari, Der'ah (Adara) is distant 11 miles to the S.E., and Abil (Abila) 14 miles to the S.W., while Tell 'Ashterā is about 5 miles N. Tell 'Ash'ari is a position of great strength. On one side is the deep gorge of the Yarmuk, on the other extends a great chasm at the head of which is a waterfall. Built on this projecting headland the city was protected on the only side open to attack by a triple wall, traces of which still remain. There are ruins of a temple beside a bridge which spans the Yarmuk lower down, possibly that destroyed by Judas. Tell 'Ashterā, standing in the plain, although once girt by mighty walls, could never have been a place of such strength as this. The question of identification can be settled only by excavation. The Sam. Aphnith, which may be 'Afnêh on Jebel Hawrân, not far from Bosrah (Waddington, No. 2296-7), and the Arab. Es-Sanamain on the Haj road, south of Damascus, 20 m. N.N.E. of Tell 'Ashterā, are palpably impossible. W. EWING.

ASHTORETH (עֲשְׁתְרוֹת, plur. עֲשְׁתְרוֹת Ashtarôth).—The principal goddess of the Sidonians (1 K 11^{5, 33}, 2 K 23¹³), and a prominent goddess among the Phœnicians generally, in whose honour Solomon built a high-place on the hills opposite the temple (ll. cc.), who is stated (by different Deut. writers) to have been worshipped previously by the unspiritual Israelites, Jg 2¹⁹ 10⁶, 1 S 7^{3, 4} 12¹⁰,—all plur., 'Ba'al (or the Ba'als) and the 'Ashtoreths,' i.e. Ashtoreths distinguished by the places at which they were worshipped, or by special attributes,—and in whose temple at Ashkelon (1 S 31¹⁰) the Philistines deposited the armour of Saul. The true pronunciation of the word was probably Ashtart (cf. LXX and other Gr. writers, Ἀσθάρτη): Ashtôreth (cf. Môlech for Milk) perhaps arose by malicious substitution of the vowels of bōsheth, 'shame.' 'Ashtart is frequently mentioned in Phoen. inscriptions, and is an element in numerous Phoen. proper names. Tabnith, king of Sidon, styles both himself and his father Eshmun'azar I., priest of 'Ashtart; and in his sepulchral inscription places his tomb under her protection, declaring that its violation would be an 'abomination to 'Ashtart' (see the Inscr. in full in Driver, Notes on Samuel, p. xxvi). Eshmun'azar, son of the Tabnith just mentioned, and his mother Am'ashtart, 'priestess of 'Ashtart, our lady (רבת), state that they have built a house (temple) for 'Ashtart in Sidon (CIS i. i. 3¹²⁻¹⁶). This was probably the great temple of Ἀσθάρτη in Sidon, which Lucian visited (de Dea Syria, § 4). Besides, however, this temple which was dedicated to 'Ashtart, as patron-goddess of Sidon, Eshmun'azar and his mother built another in honour of a second 'Ashtart, bearing the title of שם בעל 'name of Ba'al' (ib. l. 13).^{*} So again Bod'ashtart, another king of Sidon, builds a temple לעשרה 'to his god 'Ashtart' (ib. 4⁹). It is in accordance with the leading position thus accorded to 'Ashtart at Sidon that on Sidonian coins the goddess is often figured standing on the prow of a galley, with her right hand, holding a crown, stretched forward, as though pointing the vessel on its way.†

* As pointed by the Massoretes, Ashtêroth is the construct state of Ashtârôth, the plural of Ashtôreth.

† So Petermann's MS A: Petermann's text, however, has עֲשִׂית קַרְנַיִם; and Walton's Polyglott reads קַרְנַיִם עֲשִׂית.

According to Menander, as reported by Jos. (Ant. VIII. v. 3; c. Ap. i. 18), Hiram built in Tyre a temple to Herakles (Melkart), and afterwards one to 'Ashtart, whose priest was Ithobal, Jezebel's father: in Tyre, however, Melkart was the principal god, and 'Ashtart took the second place. The worship of 'Ashtart is also widely attested in the Phoen. colonies on the coasts and islands of the Mediterranean, esp. in Cyprus, Sicily, and Carthage. At Kiti (Kition) in Cyprus we read of an image erected by a worshipper לרבותי לעשרה 'to his lady, to 'Ashtart' (CIS ib. 11³); from the same locality we have an Inscription (ib. 86) giving particulars of the provision made for the service of her temple, including builders, door-keepers, barbers, scribes, and other attendants. In Gul (Gaulus, near Malta) we hear of a עשרה בח עשרה, or 'sanctuary of the temple of 'Ashtart' (CIS ib. 132); and her worship at Eryx, in Sicily, is attested by two Inscriptions, one found in Eryx itself, the other from Sardinia, beginning with the words, 'To the lady, to 'Ashtart, ‡ and 'To 'Ashtart of Erekh,' respectively. At Carthage, one 'Abdmelkart styles himself (ib. 255) 'servant of 'Ashtart, the glorious (הגדולה); and we read (ib. 263) of Am'ashtart אש עשרה 'who is of the people of the men of 'Ashtart,' i.e. who belonged to the people attached to her temple. Of names compounded with 'Ashtart we find Am'ashtart (ib. 3¹⁴ al.), and Ammath'ashtart (46³ al.), 'handmaid of 'A.; Ger'ashtart, 'client [Cheyne on Ps 15¹] of 'A.' (138² and often); 'Abd'ashtart, 'servant of 'A.' (115¹), § usually contracted to Bod'ashtart (4². 3 35⁶ and very often); 'Ashtartyathan, 'A. has given' (72¹. 2); see further references in Bloch, Phoen. Glossar (1891).||

* Name = manifestation (cf. Ex 23²¹, Dt 12⁴, etc.). Others, however (as Halévy, E. Meyer, Dillm., Nowack, Heb. Arch. ii. 307), render 'Ba'al's Celestial 'Ashtart' (cf. below), pronouncing עש; and in l. 16 group the letters into ארית שם ארית 'Ashtart of the glorious heavens.'

† Cf. B. V. Head, Hist. Numorum, p. 673; Babelon, Les Rois de Syrie, p. cxliii, 152, 162, with the two spirited representations, Plate xxii. 6 and 22. The goddess is also represented on the coins of other Phoen. cities, as Aradus, Berytus, Botrys, Byblus, Tyre, etc. (Head, l.c. pp. 668, 669, 674, 676).

‡ Followed by the words ארית חיים, i.e. (probably) 'of long life,' an epithet of the goddess, whence it has been plausibly conjectured that the city Eryx—on inscriptions and coins (CIS i. i. p. 173) ארית—received its name.

§ The name also of Hiram's grandson (Jos. c. Ap. i. 18.—Ἀβδάσπαρας).

Although, however, 'Ashtart was thus a distinctively Phoen. goddess, Phoenicia was not her original home. The prototype of 'Ashtart was Ishtar, a deity who had for long held a conspicuous place in the Pantheon of Assyria, and who was localised, with special attributes, in many different cities of Assyria and Babylonia.* In a prayer of Assurnazirpal, purporting to date c. 1800 B.C., Ishtar of Nineveh is addressed by him as 'queen of the gods, into whose hands are delivered the commands of the great gods, lady (bilít) of Nineveh . . . daughter of Sin (the moon-god), sister of Shamash (the sun-god), who rules all kingdoms, who determines decrees, the goddess of the universe, lady of heaven and earth, who hears petitions, heeds sighs, the merciful goddess who loves justice'; he, her 'priest-king,' protests that she had called him to his throne, he had restored and beautified her temple; and he calls upon her now to hear his cry, and to heal him in his sickness. Other monarchs (Shalmaneser II., Sennacherib, etc.) place Ishtar next to Asshur, and he calls upon her together as marching at their side, directing them in their wars, and giving them victory over their foes. Esarhaddon, for instance, says, † 'Ishtar, the lady of onslaught and battle, who loves my priesthood, stood at my side and brake their bows.' Shalmaneser II. also styles her 'princess (rishti) of heaven and earth'; ‡ and Esarhaddon calls her 'queen (sharrat) of all.' § Another aspect of Ishtar's character is brought before us in the curious mythological poem, which recounts her descent into the Underworld in search of the healing waters which should restore to life her bridegroom Tammuz, the young and beautiful Sun-god, slain by the cruel hand of winter. Here it is related how, as she journeys towards the realm of Allat, queen of the dead, 'the land without return, the house of darkness,' she is stripped in succession, as she passes its seven gates, of all her attire, her crown, her earrings, her necklace, her mantle, her girdle, her bracelets, and her tunic: while she is there all intercourse between male and female ceases in the animal creation; at last, at Ea's command, she is released, her adornments are restored to her, and she returns to earth. Here Ishtar, who is evidently conceived as the goddess of fertility and productiveness, symbolises, it seems, the lifegiving earth, which loses, one by one, its adornments as it passes into the dark prison-house of winter, to have them restored to it at springtime, as nature awakens with the returning love of the youthful sun-god.||

Another Ishtar is Ishtar of Arbela, daughter of Asshur, and sister of Marduk, styled by Esarhaddon 'lady of ladies, terrible in onslaught, lady of battle, queen of the gods,' a martial goddess, who appears to Assurbanipal in a vision, armed with quivers and a bow, and brandishing a sword, and promises him victory against his foes. Ishtar of Uruk (Erekh) plays an important part in the legend of Izdubar (Gilgamesh): when the hero has delivered Uruk from the Elamites, who have been besieging it, and won for himself the crown, Ishtar offers him her hand: he refuses it, reproaching her with the levity with which she had chosen and discarded her former husbands.* Here Ishtar is not only lavish with her love, but appears almost as a polyandrous goddess.† In other respects the 'lady of Uruk' resembles Ishtar of Nineveh. Ishtar of Babylon is addressed in a hymn as 'mother of the gods, fulfiller of the commands of Bil, producer of verdure, lady of mankind, begotress of all, mother Ishtar, whose might no god approaches,' and whose aid and sympathy a suppliant may expect to receive.‡ This was the goddess under whose protection, in virtue of a singular custom—reported independently by Herodotus (i. 199),§ the author of Bar 6²², and Strabo (xvi. 1. 20),—the women of Babylon placed themselves by the sacrifice of their chastity.

Lastly, Ishtar is identified with the planet Venus: on this aspect of her nature it will be sufficient, however, to refer to the passages translated in Schrader, *KAT*² on Jg 2¹³, or in Sayce, Hibb. Lect. p. 253 f. (cf. p. 269=Jeremias, Izdubar-Nimrod, p. 62).

Though Ishtar was thus variously localised, her general attributes remained the same. She occupied a place in the Assyrian Pantheon next to Asshur himself: in particular, she was (1) the lady (or mistress) of the locality in which she was worshipped; (2) queen of the gods, and princess of heaven and earth; (3) a warrior goddess; (4) the goddess of generation and productivity; (5) she was identified with the planet Venus. These aspects of her nature are retained as her cult travels westwards, sometimes one being more prominent than the other, sometimes several being combined.¶

From the notices contained in OT itself, it would not be possible to determine the ideas associated with the Phoen. 'Ashtart, or the character of her rites; but there are many independent indications which make these clear. She must have been pre-eminently the goddess of sexual passion. By Greeks and Phœnicians alike she is habitually identified with 'Aphrodite; and there are sufficiently definite allusions to the unchaste character of the rites with which she was worshipped. Lucian (De dea Syria, § 4) visited a great temple of Aphrodite in Byblus (Gebal), in which the rites of Adonis (who corresponded to TAMMUZ, q.v.) were performed: here such women as would not shave their hair in commemoration of his burial, were obliged to sell themselves to a stranger, the money received being expended on a sacrifice to Aphrodite (cf. the Bab. custom referred to above). At Aphaka in the Lebanon there was a temple of Aphrodite,†† the rites practised at which were of such a character that they were suppressed by Constantine (Euseb. Vit. Const. iii. 55).

Again, as we saw, Ishtar was 'queen of the gods, and princess of heaven and earth'; and it scarcely admits of doubt that the 'Queen of § Mōlatta, as Hdt. calls the goddess (whom he identifies with Aphrodite), is probably Belit,—the word rendered 'lady' in the extracts cited above, and the fem. of Bel (Ba'al), lord.

¶ How fully, in the popular creed, Ishtar became the goddess asr' ishtar, may be inferred from the fact that the plur. ishtardt was used to express the idea of female divinities in general (*KAT*² 180).

† The etymology of Ishhtar, as of 'Ashtart, is obscure: there is no apparent Sem. derivation, and the conjectures that have been offered are not satisfactory; the Arab. athara (Barton, p. 71) is not to fall simply, but to stumble or trip. It is, perhaps, of non-Sem. origin (*KAT*² 179; Sayce, Hibb. Lect. 252 f.). The gender of the deity, after it was adopted by the Phœnicians, was marked externally by the addition of the fem. termination, t.

 Hence her worship may be alluded to in passages such as Hos 4^{13, 14}, Jer 2²⁰ etc.

Heaven,' to whom, in Jeremiah's day, the women of Judah offered cakes (סֻּמִים, a peculiar term) and other sacrifices (Jer 7¹⁸ 44¹⁷⁻¹⁹), was either the Assyrian Ishtar,* or her Phoen. counterpart 'Ashtart. 'Celestial,' now, is an epithet applied to 'Ashtart elsewhere. Sanchoniathon (p. 30) speaks of Astarte as daughter of Οὐρανός; and Sozomen remarks that the Aphrodite mentioned above as worshipped at Aphaka, was called there Οὐρανία. The temple of Οὐρανία 'Aφροδίτη, also, in Ashkelon, mentioned by Herodotus (i. 105), and stated by him to be the oldest of that goddess of which he could learn, can hardly be any other than the temple of 'Ashtart, referred to in 1 S 31¹⁰.† All this becomes clearer if we supplement the somewhat scanty notices which we possess of 'Ashtart herself by the more abundant materials relating to Aphrodite. For not only did Aphrodite correspond in general character to 'Ashtart, but nothing is more certain than that her attributes were largely moulded upon those of 'Ashtart, and that many elements in her cult were of Phoen. origin. Already Homer frequently speaks of Aphrodite as Κύπρις (Il. v. 330, etc.) and Κυθέρεια (Od. viii. 288, etc.), and alludes to her temple at Paphos,‡ which, then and afterwards, was so celebrated that no term is more frequently applied to Venus by classical writers than Paphia or Cypria. Cyprus, however, is known independently to have been not only colonised from Phœnicia, but also (see above) to have been devoted to the worship of 'Ashtart; and according to Herodotus (l.c.), the Cyprians themselves declared their temple (at Paphos) to have been founded from that of Οὐρανία 'Aφροδίτη at Ashkelon; while the temple of the same deity in Cythera, the island off the S. coast of Lacedæmon, reputed to be the oldest and most sacred of Aphrodite in Greece (Pausan. iii. 23. 1), is stated likewise by Herodotus (ib.) to have been a Phoen. foundation. Cicero also speaks (N. D. iii. § 59) of four distinct Venuses, one being 'Syria Cyproque concepta, quæ Astarte vocatur, quam Adonidi nupsisse proditum est.' That Aphrodite was the goddess of sexual passion, needs, of course, no proof; and Cyprus was the chief centre, whence her worship was diffused through the Gr. world. But, secondly, she often bore in Greece also the title Οὐρανία; temples of 'Aφροδίτη Οὐρανία are thus mentioned, not only at Cythera, but also at Athens, Argos, Corinth, Thebes, and elsewhere; § and speaking of the one at Athens, Pausanias expressly remarks (i. 14. 7) that Οὐρανία was revered first by the Assyrians, then by the Paphians of Cyprus, and the Phœnicians dwelling in Ashkelon, from whom

These scholars point to an inscription in which among 20 titles of 'the lady (bilit) of countries, the queen (malkatu), Ishtar,' there actually occurs that of 'queen (malkatu) of heaven.' Schrader further remarks that there is independent evidence of an 'Ashtar, conceived specially as a celestial goddess, being prominent at the same time in the name 'Athar of Heaven,' mentioned in the inscriptions of Asshurbanipal, as the goddess of a N. Arabian tribe (*KAT*² on Jer 7¹⁸; on 'Athar='Ashtar, see below). Cf. also Sayce, Hibb. L. pp. 261, 269 f. (=Jeremias, l.c. 62 f.).

Certain types of the coins of Ashkelon also exhibit the head of Astarte: B. V. Head, Hist. Numorum, 1887, p. 679 f.; De Saulcy, Numismatique de la Terre Sainte, 1874, pp. 179 f., 202 (No. 13), 206 (No. 2). The dove, which (see below) was sacred to 'Ashtart, is also a standing feature on the imperial coins of Ashkelon; see De Saulcy, l.c. p. 179, Nos. 9 and 10 (both with head of the goddess), 189-191 (Augustus), Nos. 8, 10, 11, 13, etc., and Plate ix. 5, 6.

§ Paus. i. 14. 7, 19. 2; ii. 23. 8; vi. 20. 6, 25. 1; viii. 32. 2; ix. 16. 3. The Greeks often understood Οὐρανία to be the goddess of loftier, purer love, as opposed to 'Aφροδίτη πάνδημος, who represented the merely sensual passion (Xen. Symp. viii. 9; Paus. ix. 16. 4, Bekk.).

her cult was introduced into Cythera. Then, thirdly, Ishtar, as shown above, was also a martial goddess. From the mere fact that Saul's armour was deposited by the Philistines in the temple of 'Ashtart at Ashkelon, it could hardly be inferred that 'Ashtart bore there a martial character (for trophies of a victory might be dedicated to any deity); but there are some other indications which support this supposition. In the temple of Cythera, which, as we have seen, was founded from Phœnicia, if not from Ashkelon, the statue of the goddess was a ξανόν ὀπλισμένον (Paus. iii. 23. 1). At Corinth and Sparta also there was an 'Αφροδίτη ὀπλισμένη (ib. ii. 5. 1; iii. 15. 10, Bekk.); several epigrams in the anthology (Jacobs, ii. 677-679) describe Aphrodite as armed with helmet and spear; she also receives the epithet νικηφόρος, and is represented with the weapons of Ares (as in the well-known statue called the Venus of Capua).^{*} Nor was the influence of the Phœn. 'Ashtart confined to the Gr. world. The worship of the Rom. Venus, originally a goddess of springtime, of gardens, of blossoming vegetation, assimilated many elements from her cult. Mention has been made already of the great Phœn. temple of 'Ashtart at Eryx in Sicily; and this seems to have formed a centre as influential for the diffusion of her rites in Italy as Paphos or Cythera had been for their diffusion in Greece. That the goddess worshipped at Eryx was identified by the Romans with Venus, can be readily shown: who does not recollect Horace's 'Erycina ridens, Quam Jocus circumvolat et Cupido' (Carm. i. 2. 33 f.), or the passage in which Virgil connects her with the Venus of Cyprus, 'Tum vicina astris Erycino in vertice sedes Fundatur Veneri Idaliæ' (Æn. v. 759 f.)?† Venus Vicatrix and Venus Genetrix, also, just develop ideas which we have already seen combined in 'Αφροδίτη Οὐρανία, viz. that of the martial goddess of victory, and that of the fertile mother of all.‡

Some account of the temple and rites of the Paphian Aphrodite is given by Tacitus (Hist. ii. 2. 3).§ Κινύρας, a personage who plays a considerable part in Cyprian mythology (cf. Il. xi. 19-23), was its reputed founder; the priests of the goddess, who were also kings, were styled Κινυραδαί. Only male victims were offered in sacrifice to her, kids being accounted the best for purposes of extispicium, for their skill in which her priests were famed. No blood, however, was shed upon the altar, which, though standing in the open air, was supposed never to be rained upon. The goddess herself was symbolised by a cone.|| Her devotees were initiated with impure rites.¶ Doves were sacred to her.* A large number of inscriptions have been found at Paphos, headed Παφία Ἀφροδίτη: in many of these parents dedicate their children to the goddess.†

'Ashtart appears to have been generally represented as a female figure, somewhat short in stature, usually naked, with rounded limbs, but sometimes draped, the hands supporting the breasts,‡ or sometimes with one holding a dove in her bosom;§ terra-cotta statuettes of this description are found not only in Cyprus, but also upon most of the isles and coasts of the Ægean Sea. Figs. 381, 382 in Perrot and Chipiez' work are particularly interesting. The right hand here supports the breast, while the left hand is extended downwards in front: may figures of this kind, one is tempted to ask, have formed the type out of which the Venus of Medici was ultimately developed?|| Clay figures, of the same general type, usually considered to represent Ishtar, are also found in large numbers in the ruins of Mesopotamia, and at Susa.¶

In some localities 'Ashtart seems further to have been regarded as a moon-goddess. Thus Lucian (De dea Syria, § 4), speaking of the temple at Sidon, mentioned above, says, ὡς μὲν αὐτοὶ λέγουσιν, Ἀσθάρτης ἐστὶν Ἀσθάρτην δ' ἐγὼ δοκέω Σελήνην ἔμμεναι; and Herodian declares (v. 6. 10) that Οὐρανία Φοίνικες Ἀστροδρχην ὀνομάζουσι, σελήνην εἶναι θελήουτες.

How this transformation of the character of Ishtar †† took place is not perfectly certain. It is conceivable that Ba'al, as Ba'al Shamaim (Ba'al of heaven), was identified with the sun; and hence his consort 'Ashtart might not unnaturally be regarded as the moon. Another explanation is, however, possible. There was great intercourse in antiquity between Phœnicia and Egypt; and the influence of Egypt is palpably impressed upon Phœn. art. The Egypt. goddesses Isis and Hathor, now, are habitually represented as supporting upon

The dove is also often figured on the coins of Paphos, sometimes with the head of Aphrodite on the obverse: see J. P. their head, between two cow-horns, the solar disc.* Isis, further, is stated by Plutarch to have journeyed to Byblus (Gebal), where she was called by some 'Ashtarrah'; † and in the famous Stele of Yehawmelek, king of Gebal, the king is represented as making his offerings before a horned goddess, closely resembling the Egyp. Isis, while the accompanying inscription is a petition addressed by him to his 'mistress, the lady of Gebal.' ‡ Philo of Byblus says also that 'Ashtarrah ἡ μεγίστη . . . ἐπέθηκε τῇ ἰδίᾳ κεφαλῇ βασιλείας παρσημον κεφαλῆν ταύρου (Sanchoniathon, ed. Orelli, p. 34). In the light of these facts it is not impossible, as Meyer suggests, that the disc and horns with which 'Ashtart was represented may have been misunderstood, and taken to be the symbols of the full and crescent moon respectively.

'Ashtart, then, if what has been said above be correct, was the link connecting Ishtar with Aphrodite and with Venus. Born originally in the far E., the goddess was born again, for the Greeks, from the foam (ἀφρός) by Cyprus; and once brought under touch of the creative genius of Greece, her character was transformed; particular aspects of it were made more prominent; if in one direction she was identified more and more with the sensuous side of human nature, in other directions her attributes were idealised; she furnished art with its most attractive ideals of female grace and beauty (see already II. xiv. 214-217—her κεστόν ἰμάντα); she became even the personification of the all-pervading, living force of nature. 'Comme la nature même dont se résumaient et se personnifiaient sous ce nom toutes les énergies, Astarté, vraie souveraine du monde, dans son activité sans repos, ne cessait de détruire et de créer, de créer et de détruire. Par la guerre et par les fléaux de tout genre, elle éliminait les êtres inutiles et vieilliss; en même temps, par l'amour et la génération, elle présidait au perpétuel renouvellement de la vie.' § This far-reaching conception of the range of her activity is exhibited strikingly in a passage placed by Plautus in the mouth of an Athenian woman,|| and in the fine exordium, addressed to the 'Æneadum genetrix,' with which Lucretius opens his great poem, De rerum natura. ¶

Traces of a corresponding Sem. deity elsewhere.—There was a S. Sem. male deity, 'Athtar (which agrees phonetically with Ishtar; cf. שלש, ثلاث, etc.), mentioned in the Sabæan inscriptions (from Sanâ, the capital of Yemen); but little definite is at present known about him, except that the gazelle or antelope was sacred to him.

There are also some compound names of deities, in which 'Ashtar (or 'Ashtart) forms part. Mesha relates (Stone, l.c.) that he 'devoted' 7000 Isr. captives to עשתרת, i.e. 'Ashtar-chemosh, or 'Ashtar of Chémôsh. Among the Phœnicians, also, we find Milk'ashtart, a deity formed by combination of the

ASHURITES (אשורית, Β Θασοειπελ, Α Θασούρ, Luc. 'Εβρου).—One of the tribes over whom Ishbosheth ruled (2 S 2⁹). The name is clearly corrupt, for neither the Assyrians (אשור), nor the Arabian tribe (אשורים Gn 25²) can be intended. Ewald, Thénius, Wellh. follow the Pesh. and Vulg. in reading 'the Geshurites' (גשורי), whose territory bordered on that of Gilead (Jos 12⁵ 13¹⁴), and who might therefore be suitably included here. It has been urged, however, against this view, that Geshur was an independent kingdom at this time (cf. 2 S 3³ 13³⁷), so that Ishbosheth could not have exercised control over it. We must therefore read, with Köhler, Klost., Kirkp., and Budde אשורית 'the Asherites,' i.e. the tribe of Asher (cf. Jg 1³²); this reading is supported by the Targ. of Jonathan (על ריבת אש), and agrees well with the context; according to the latter, the dominions of Ishbosheth extended from Asher to Benjamin on the W. of Jordan, and further included the large tract of Gilead on the E. ASIA ('Asia) was the Roman province which embraced the W. parts of the great peninsula now called Asia Minor, including the countries Mysia, Lydia, Caria, and great part of Phrygia, with the Dorian, Ionian, and Æolian coast-cities, the Troad, and the islands off the coast (Lesbos, Chios, Samos, Patmos, Cos, etc.). The name, as thus used, was created by the Rom. administration. The Gr. geographers generally employed the name Asia to denote the whole continent; but the Romans during the 2nd cent. B.C. were accustomed to term the Pergamian sovereigns (with whom they were in close political relations) 'kings of Asia'; and when Attalus III. bequeathed his kingdom to Rome in 133, it was formed into a province, and named Asia. With rare exceptions, historians and geographers under the earlier Roman Empire use the name Asia only in two senses,—either the Roman province or the entire continent. About A.D. 285, Asia was greatly reduced in size, Caria, Phrygia, Lydia, and Mysia (Hellepontus) being separated from it; and the name Asia was then restricted to the coast-cities and the lower valleys of the Mæander, Cayster, Hermus, and Caicus. In the NT, as is generally agreed, 'Asia' means the Rom. province (Ac 2⁹ being a possible exception). At first Pergamos was the capital of the province;

but after a time the superior advantages of Ephesus gave it the pre-eminence, and the rule was that the governors must land there. Under Augustus, and even earlier, Ephesus was the supreme administrative centre of Asia, and the headquarters of the great provincial officials; but the title 'First of Asia' (πρώτη Ἀσία) was keenly contested also by Pergamos and Smyrna. The governor, who bore the title proconsul, was appointed by the Senate by lot from among the senior ex-consuls; not less than five years must have elapsed between consulship and proconsulship; and, owing to the number of ex-consuls, the usual interval became longer as time passed (being twelve or more years in the 2nd cent.). As a rule, the office was annual; but in exceptional cases a second year, and still more rarely even a third year, of office was permitted. Asia was one of the most wealthy and populous and intellectually active of the Rom. provinces; hence the natural sequence of the work done by Paul and Barnabas on their first journey was to preach in the great cities of Asia; and this was evidently St. Paul's intention on his second journey, until he found himself prevented from speaking the word in Asia (Ac 16⁶). The evangelisation of Asia was reserved for the third journey, when, during St. Paul's residence of two years and three months in Ephesus, 'the entire population of Asia heard the word' (Ac 19¹⁰); partly on account of the frequency with which the provincials came to Ephesus for trade, religion, law, or festivals; partly through missions of St. Paul's coadjutors to the leading cities of the province. In OT Apocr., dating before the formation of the Rom. province, the term Asia denotes the continent. On the Asian Jews, see the cities COS, EPHEBUS, LAODICEA, etc.

ASIARCH (Ἀσιάρχης) was the title of certain officials of the Rom. province Asia, whose number, tenure of office, and mode of appointment are most obscure. Such widely divergent views are still held about the Asiarchate that it is hardly possible to give any adequate account of it in our limited space. The Asiarchs (like the analogous officials, Galatarch, Syriarch, Lykiarch, Pamphylarch, etc.) were provincial, not municipal officials; and they exercised certain powers in the Association in which the whole province of Asia united for the worship of Rome and the Emperors, called Commune Asiæ (Κοινὸν Ἀσίας). That the Asiarchs were the high priests of the temples of the Imperial worship erected by the Commune Asiæ in Pergamos, Smyrna, Ephesus, Cyzicus, Sardis, and perhaps other cities (ἀρχιερεὺς τῆς Ἀσίας παῶν τῶν, or ναοῦ τοῦ, ἐν Περγάμῳ, κ.τ.λ.), is denied by some good authorities, but seems to us highly probable: we take the term A. as a popular conversational name, which gradually established itself even in official usage, for these 'high priests of the temples of Asia.' We also regard it as probable (though it cannot be definitely proved) that, beyond the high priests of the temples in the individual cities, there was a supreme high priest as head of the entire provincial cult. These high priests seem, along with probably some other officials, to have formed a sort of Council, which managed the business of the Commune Asiæ, and had the disposal of certain funds intended for the maintenance of the Imperial temples and ceremonial. The Commune Asiæ celebrated in the great cities of the province festivals with games, called Κοινὰ Ἀσίας ἐν Σμύρνῃ, Λαοδικείῳ, κ.τ.λ.; and the games were presided over by an A., perhaps the supreme A., if we are right in supposing his existence. It is not improb. that the Council of the Asiarchs sat at stated periods in the great cities alternately; and that they assembled at the city where the Κοινὰ Ἀσίας were being held. In that case the Asiarchs were prob. assembled at Ephesus for such a purpose when they sent advice to St. Paul to consult his safety (Ac 19³¹); and perhaps the festival had both brought together a vast crowd of the Asian populace, and shown clearly to the artisans that their trade in selling small shrines to the pilgrims and devotees who had flocked to the festival was dwindling. The tenure of office of the Asiarchs, acc. to our view, was four years (a term which was very common for such offices in the E. provinces); but some high authorities hold that the Asiarchs were appointed annually. It is certain that the proconsul governing Asia (which see) took some part in the appointment; but the details are doubtful and disputed. An A. enjoyed great dignity in his native city, and coins or inscriptions of very many cities in the province commemorate the names of Asiarchsprung from thence. They acted, doubtless, as presidents in local festivals as well as in the provincial games (Κοινὰ Ἀσίας), and, of course, incurred in such cases considerable expense, part of which was compulsory, but most was voluntary (from ambition, or generosity, or ostentation).

ASMODEUS (ἄσμοδος To 3¹⁷) is probably identical with the evil demon of the ancient Persian religion, Æshma dæva=the 'covetous' or 'lustful demon.' When the Hebrews borrowed the name, they connected it with ἄσμος, to destroy. Hence this is the being called ὁ ἀσθερέων in Wis 18²⁵, and ἄσμος = ὁ ἀπολλύων in Rev 9¹¹. In the latter passage he is styled 'angel of the abyss' and 'king' of the destructive creatures shaped like locusts, but with men's faces and flowing hair. The only mention of Asmodæus in the Gr. Bible is in Tobit, where he is described as τὸ πονηρὸν δαιμόνιον; Vulg. dæmonium nequissimum; but in the Aram. and Heb. VSS 'King of the Shedhim.' By this name he is known in the Bab. Talmud (Pesachim 110a), and in the Targ. of Ec 1¹². In To 6¹⁴ (B. Syr. Itala) we are told that he 'loved' Sarah, the daughter of Raguel, and that he slew seven men to whom she was married as soon as they entered the nuptial chamber (3⁸). When Tobias visited Raguel, he also at once loved Sarah, and yet naturally was afraid to marry her; but his companion, Raphael in disguise, taught him how to exorcise the demon by a fumigation of the heart and liver of a fish. The demon fled to Upper Egypt, where he was pursued by Raphael and bound (To 8³), after which the pious couple lived in peace. The Shedhim are the δαμόνια of the Gospel narrative. They were conceived by the Jews as distinct from the fallen angels of the Book of Enoch, in being mortal, of both sexes, and, according to some, the offspring of those angels and human mothers (Chagigah 16a; Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus, ii. 759-763). As Sammael was head of all the Satans, so Asmodæus was king of the demons, and the long-haired Lilith was their queen (Eruvin 100b). In Talmudic legends, Asmodæus was implicated in Noah's drunkenness; and after revealing to Solomon the whereabouts of the worm Samir, which noiselessly shaped the stones of the temple, he dethroned that monarch for a while, assumed his appearance, and was the real author of the offences which history ascribes to Solomon.

ASNAH (אֲסָנָה = Aram. אֲסָנָה 'thorn bush,' Ἀσνά).—The head of a family of Nethinim which returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2⁵⁰, 1 Es 5^{31a}).

ASOM (Ἀσόμ), 1 Es 9²⁸.—His sons were among those who put away their 'strange' wives. Called Hashum (אֲשׁוּם), Ezr 10²⁸.

ASP.—See SERPENT.

ASPALATHUS (ἀσπάλθος, balsamum, Sir 24¹⁵).—The name of an aromatic associated with cinnamon in the passage cited, but impossible to identify. Pliny (Nat. Hist. xii. 52, and xxiv. 68, 69) speaks of a thorny plant known by this name, and which in the first passage he identifies with the Erysisceptrum, and in the second seems to distinguish from it. The same plant is alluded to by other ancient authors, but with such indefiniteness that we are unable to identify it with any known plant. It is probable that there were two or more plants, and more than one vegetable product, known by this name. G. E. POST.

ASPATHA (אֲסַפְתָּה, Est 9⁷).—The third son of Haman, put to death by the Jews. The name is perhaps from the Persian aspadāta, 'given by the (sacred) horse' (so Ges. Thesaurus, add.).

ASPHALT.—See BITUMEN.

ASPHAR Pool (ἀσφάρ, Ἀσφάρ), 1 Mac 9²⁸.—A pool in the desert of Tekoa, or Jeshimon, where Jonathan and Simon the Maccabees encamped. The site is doubtful. C. R. CONDER.

ASPHARASUS (Ἀσφάρασος), 1 Es 5².—One of the leaders of the return under Zerubbabel. Called Mispār (מִסְפָּר), Ezr 2², and Mispereth (מִסְפֶּרֶת), Neh 7⁷.

ASRIEL (אַשְׂרִיֵּל, in AV of 1 Ch 7¹⁴ Ashriel).—A Manassite (Jos 17³, Nu 26³¹; in the latter the patron. Arielite occurs). Acc. to the LXX of 1 Ch 7¹⁴ A.'s mother was an Aramitess, a concubine of Manasseh. J. A. SELBIE.

ASS.—1. (חֲמֹר, חֲמֹר hāmôr; bos, υποόύγιον, asinus). Hāmôr is the generic name for the ass, and the specific designation of the he-ass (Arab. himâr).

Few animals are mentioned more frequently in the Scriptures than the ass. It was used for a variety of purposes.

(1) For riding. For this purpose it was used by both rich and poor. Moses took his wife and two sons on an ass to Egypt, passing through the Sinaitic desert (Ex 4²⁰); Balaam rode a she-ass (Nu 22²¹⁻³³); the unnamed prophet rode an ass (1 K 13^{13, 23, 24, 27-29}); so did Achsah (Jos 15¹⁸, Jg 1¹⁴), the thirty sons of Jair (Jg 10⁴), the sons of Abdon (Jg 12¹⁴), Abigail (1 S 25^{20, 23}), Ahithophel (2 S 17²³), and Mephibosheth (2 S 19²⁰). When it is said that Christ is 'lowly,' because He should ride on an ass (Zec 9⁹; comp. Mt 21⁷), the reference is not to any degradation in the riding of an ass, but to the peaceful nature of His advent. The horse was used in war, and a king coming on a horse would be surrounded by military circumstance and pomp. Asses are yet ridden by persons of rank in State and Church. There are many fine breeds of them, and every large city of the interior boasts its special strain. Many of these are sold at very high prices. They have a rapid walk, and an easy shuffling pace or short canter. They are exceedingly sure-footed. Some of them are breast high, and weigh as much as a small horse. White asses (Jg 5¹⁰) fetch specially high prices, and are very handsome beasts, while their caparisons are often quite magnificent. These consist of a thick stuffed saddle, often covered with crimson, or dark green, or other rich coloured cloth, bound with braids of brighter colours, and with silver ornaments and dangling tassels of woollen twist. The headstall and bridle are likewise decorated with shells, silver studs, and plates, and not infrequently composed in part of silver chains. A collar of silver links, with a breastplate of the same metal, completes the adornment.

(2) For burdens. Abraham probably loaded his ass with wood (Gn 22³); the sons of Jacob loaded their asses with corn (Gn 42^{20, 27}); Joseph sent twenty asses bearing the good things of Egypt to his father (Gn 45²³); Jesse sent an ass-load of provisions by David to Saul (1 S 16²⁰); Abigail loaded her present to David on asses (1 S 25¹⁸), as also Ziba (2 S 16¹); the provisions for the feast at David's coronation at Hebron were brought on asses (1 Ch 12⁴⁰); asses were used in harvesting (Neh 13¹⁵). The ass is still the most universal of all beasts of burden in Bible lands. Small ones can be bought for a pound or two. There is a great variety in the breeds of pack-asses. Some are no larger than a Shetland pony, while others are as large as a small mule, and carry very heavy loads. They are very economical to keep, living on straw, thistles, stubble, and a very small quantity of grain, and standing any amount of exposure and harsh treatment.

(3) For ploughing. The expression ear (Is 30²⁴) means to plough (comp. 32²⁰). It was not allowed to plough with an ox and an ass together (Dt 22¹⁰). The writer has seen a camel and an ass yoked together to a plough. The equation of force was made by tethering the ass at the long end of a cross-bar, which was fastened to the front of the plough. Doubtless the reason of this prohibition was the principle of the Mosaic law, that there should be no intermixtures. Thus priests could not have patched or parti-coloured garments. Piebald cattle could not be offered in sacrifice. Cattle could not gender with a diverse kind. A field might not be sown with mingled seed. A garment could not be made of two different sorts of stuffs, as linen and woollen. A person with patches of leprosy, mixed with patches of clean skin, was unclean, while one covered all over with leprosy was clean. This principle enters into the whole symbolic economy. It is intended to illustrate simplicity and purity. Asses' milk is used as food by the Arabs, and is recommended for persons of scrofulous and tubercular tendencies. The flesh of the ass was not allowed to the Hebrews as food, because the animal does not divide the hoof and chew the cud. In the famine at the siege of Samaria, however, 'an ass's head was sold for eighty pieces of silver' (2 K 6²⁵). In Jg 15¹⁶ Samson says, 'with the jawbone of an ass, heaps upon heaps.' In the Heb. there is a fine alliteration, עַבְרֵי הַחֵבֶרֶת וְהַחֵבֶרֶת הַחֵבֶרֶת 'with the jawbone of an ass a heap, two heaps,' the word for ass and heap being the same.

2. The she-ass (יוֹנָה אֲתוֹן; ἡ βνος, βνος θηλειά; asina, Arab. 'atán) was Balaam's mount (Nu 22²¹⁻³³). Saul went to search for the stray she-asses of his father Kish (1 S 9³). The Shunammite rode one (2 K 4²²⁻²⁴). It has always been customary to separate the females of the flocks and herds at times. David had an officer charged with the care of the she-asses at such times (1 Ch 27³⁰). It is said that the vigour of the stock of the Egypt. ass is maintained by tying the she-asses at the border of the deserts on either side of the Nile Valley, so that they may receive the visits of the Asinus Onager, Pall., the original of the domestic ass of the East.

3. The Heb. term עַיִר, 'ayir; πῶλος; pullus asinæ; Arab. jahsh, corresponds to four Eng. equivalents in the AV.—(1) Foal (Gn 32¹⁵ 49¹¹); (2) ass colt (Gn 49¹¹, Jg 10⁴ 12¹⁴); (3) young ass (Is 30⁶⁻²⁴); (4) colt (Job 11¹², Zec 9⁹). The Arab. equivalent of the Heb. 'ayir is, as before said, jahsh, i.e. young ass, and not 'ayir, which means the ass in general. The stupidity of the ass is proverbial in the East as well as in the West. The allusions to this quality in the Bible are not, however, unequivocal (Is 1³, Pr 26³).

4. Two words are used in the Heb. for the wild ass—(1) פֶּרֶ' (Gn 16¹², where Ishmael is called a wild ass man, Job 6⁵ 11¹² 24⁵ 39⁵, Is 32¹⁴, Jer 2²⁴, Hos 8⁹); (2) אֲרֹדֶה (Aródh (Job 39⁵, Dn 5²¹, Chald. אֲרֹדֶה). We have no philological grounds for determining the species referred to, nor any certainty that the terms are more specific than their Eng. equivalents. The parallelism in Job 39⁵ does not necessarily imply two species. The Arabs have a large number of names for the lion, the camel, the horse, the ass, and other familiar animals. Tristram gives two species of wild asses as found in the deserts contiguous to Palestine, Asinus Onager, Pall., which he considers to be 'Aródh, and Asinus hemippus, St. Hil., which he regards as peré. For neither of these specifications does he give any philological authority. It is safe to believe that the scriptural writers had no particular species in view, but the general characteristics of all known wild asses.

ASSAMIAS (B' Ἀσσαμίας, A' Ἀσαμίας, AV Assanias).—One of twelve priests entrusted with the holy vessels on the return to Jerus., 1 Es 8⁶⁴.

ASSAPHIOTH (B' Ἀσσαφίωθ, A' Ἀσαφίωθ, AV Azaphion), 1 Es 5³³.—His descendants returned with Zerubbabel among the sons of Solomon's servants. Called Hassophereth (B' Ἀσεφήραθ, A' Ἀσεφώραθ), Ezr 2⁶⁵; Sophereth, Neh 7⁵⁷ (B A Σαφάραθ, κ-θι). H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

ASSASSIN.—Used in RV of Ac 21³⁸ as a translation of the Greek σικάρτιος (AV 'murderer'). St. Paul is said to have been mistaken by Lysias, the chief captain, for the EGYPTIAN who had 'led into the wilderness the 4000 men of the Assassins.'

According to Jos. there arose in Judæa during the procuratorship of Felix a body of men called σικάρτιοι. They were robbers, who carried under their garments a short sword, about the size of a Persian scimitar (ἀκινάκης), curved like a Roman sica, whence their name, which was of Latin origin. They used to commit their murders openly, and by day, mingling in the crowd at feasts. Their first conspicuous exploit was the murder—according to Josephus at the instigation of Felix—of Jonathan, son of Annas, who had been high priest (prob. in 55 or 56 A.D.). After this, men lived in constant dread of them. They were conspicuous under Felix, who sent troops against them, and at a later date they took a leading part in the Jewish War, and in the disturbances which led to it, being always amongst the most violent of the combatants. They held Masada, and from thence pillaged the country. Eventually some of them dispersed to Egypt and Cyrene, where, under the combined influence of want and fanaticism, they introduced a reign of terror.

Josephus never definitely connects them with the EGYPTIAN (wh. see), as does St. Luke.

Apart from the illustration afforded to the narrative of the Acts, the robbers and impostors who were so numerous at this time, illustrate the fanaticism, both religious and political, which culminated in the fall of Jerusalem.

ASSAULT.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS.

ASSAY is not found as subst. As verb it has two general meanings: 1. Test, prove, of which the only example is in the Preface, 1611, 'To a. whether my talent . . . may be profitable in any measure to God's Church.' 2. Set oneself to do (more than merely attempt); so all the occurrences in AV: Dt 4²⁴ 'Hath God a^{sd} to go and take him a nation?' Job 4² 'If we a. to commune with thee' (both עָמַד); 1 S 17³⁹ 'David girded his sword upon his armour (RV apparel), and he a^{sd} to go' (לָחַם); Ac 9²⁵ 'he a^{sd} to join himself to the disciples,' 16⁷ 'they a^{sd} to go into Bithynia,' 2 Mac 2²⁸ (all πειράζω); He 11²⁹ 'which the Egyptians a^{sd} to do' (πείρασαν λαβόντες). RV retains all these, and adds Ac 24⁶ 'who, moreover, a^{sd} to profane the temple' (πειράζω, AV 'who also hath gone about to'); 26²¹ 'the Jews . . . a^{sd} to kill me' (πειράσονται, AV 'went about to kill me').

J. HASTINGS.

ASSEMBLE, now almost entirely intrans., is trans., intrans., and reflex. in AV, as Mic 4⁶ 'In that day, saith the LORD, will I a. her that halteth, and I will gather her that is driven away'; Dn 6¹¹ 'Then these men a^{sd} (RV 'a^{sd} together'), and found Daniel'; Nu 10⁸ 'all the assembly shall a. themselves to thee' (RV 'gather themselves unto thee'). 'A. together' occurs as tr. of the same verbs without change of meaning; and even 'a. together with,' Ac 1⁴ 'and [Jesus] being a^{sd} together with them' (συναλιζόμενος, with αὐτοῖς understood; AVm and RVm 'eating with them' after Vulg. convescens). The reference would then be to Lk 24⁴¹, Jn 21¹², where Jesus is spoken of as 'eating with' the disciples. But this meaning of συναλιζω, as if derived from εἶς, 'salt,' instead of ἀλής, 'crowded,' is scarcely made out). In He 10²⁸ 'not forsaking the a^{sd} of yourselves together,' the Gr. is a noun (ἐπισυναγωγῆ). 'A. into' is found Jer 21⁴ 'I will a. (RV 'gather') them into the midst of the city.'

J. HASTINGS.

ASSEMBLY.—A. is employed in AV as the rendering of several Heb. words, the two most important of which are עָמַד and עָמַד. The Revisers, however, have endeavoured (as they have themselves explained in their Preface) 'to preserve a consistent distinction' between the words 'assembly' and 'congregation,' 'without aiming at absolute uniformity.' This they have done by rendering לָקָה and its cognate verb by 'assembly' and 'assemble,' retaining 'congregation' for קָהָל. This last is the older word of the two, denoting a gathering or assembly of any kind, whether for deliberative (as Gn 49^b) or other purposes. Gradually, however—mainly through the influence of Dt—לָקָה assumed a more technical signification as denoting the Israelitish community, in whole or in part. Thus לָקָה, Dt 23²², denotes the theocratic community. 'The assembly' par excellence is frequent in P in the sense just given, although not so characteristic of this document as the synonymous term קָהָל, which occurs over a hundred times in the technical sense of the theocratic community or congregation of the Exodus. It is doubtful if קָהָל occurs in any genuine pre-exilic text in this sense. See CONGREGATION.

LITERATURE.—Moore, Judges, 201, crit. note; Giesebrecht in Stade's Zeitschrift, i. 243 f. On לָקָה read Holzinger, ibid. ix. 105 f. On ἱεμενος ἐκκλησία (Ac 19³⁹), Ramsay in Expos. 5th Ser. iii. 137 ff.

ASSENT, the subst., in the archaic sense of accord or consent, occurs 2 Ch 18¹² 'the words of the prophets declare good to the king with one a.' (מִפִּי, RV 'mouth'). Cf. Carlyle, Past and Present, 'Travelling with one a. on the broad way.' The verb is found Ac 24⁹ 'the Jews also a^{ed}' (TR συνέθευτο, edd. συνέπεθευτο, RV 'joined in the charge').

ASSESSOR.—An a. is one who sits beside a magistrate to act as his adviser. The word occurs only 1 Es 9¹⁴ RV, 'Mosollamus and Levis and Sabbatens were a' to them' (συνεβραβευσαν αυτοις, lit. 'judged alongside of them'). The simple verb βραβευω, 'to act as umpire, arbitrate,' occurs Col 3¹⁵ 'Let the peace of Christ rule in your hearts,' RVm 'arbitrate'; see Meyer and Lightfoot, in loc. The compound καταβραβευω is found Col 2¹⁸ 'Let no man beguile (RV 'rob') you of your reward'; κ. = 'to decide against one, and 'to decide against one unjustly,' hence 'to rob.'

ASSHUR.—See ASSYRIA.

ASSHURIM (אֲשֻׁרִים).—An Arab tribe, descended from Abraham and Keturah (Gn 25³), whose identity cannot be traced. (Cf. Dillmann and Delitzsch l.c.)

ASSIDUOUS, only Wis 8¹⁸ RV 'in a. communing with her is understanding' (ἐν συγγυμνασίῳ ὁμιλίας, i.e. 'in constant exercise of fellowship'). The simple γυμνασία is used 1 Ti 4⁸ σωματικῆ γ., 'bodily exercise'.

ASSIR (אֲסִיר).—1. A son of Korah (Ex 6²⁴, 1 Ch 6²²). 2. A son of Ebiasaph (1 Ch 6^{23.27}). 3. A son of Jeconiah (AV and RVm of 1 Ch 3¹⁷). It is prob., however, that RV correctly renders 'Jeconiah the captive' (אֲסִיר). See Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v.

J. A. SELBIE.

ASSOCIATE.—Only Is 8⁹, and there reflex., 'A. yourselves, O ye people.' Heb. שָׁבַע, not from שָׁבַע 'to be friendly,' 'combine together,' as Targ., Vulg., AV, etc.; but from שָׁבַע 'to make a noise,' RV 'Make an uproar'; though Del. prefers שָׁבַע 'to be evil'; while Cheyne follows LXX, γνώρε (i.e. שָׁבַע), 'take knowledge.'

J. HASTINGS.

ASSOS (Ἄσσος), in the Roman province of Asia, was an ancient city on the S. coast of the Troad, some miles E. of Cape Lectum; the Æolic dialect was spoken in it; and it was said to be an Æolic colony. It was planted on a hill that rises with a long steep ascent from the water's edge; and the natural strength was increased by walls, which still stand in wonderfully good preservation. The sculptures of the temple of Athena on the summit of the hill (most of which are now in Paris, the rest being in Constantinople and Boston, U.S.A.) are among the most important remains of archaic Gr. art. The harbour of A., formed by an artificial mole, was situated at the foot of the hill on which the city stood; and beside it now cluster the houses of the modern village Behram. This harbour gave the city considerable importance in the coasting trade of ancient times (Ac 20¹³), as is attested by its coinage, which begins early in the 5th cent. (when the city was released from the Persian domination), and continues as late as A.D. 235. The importance of A. under the Pergamenian kings is shown by its re-foundation with the name Apollonia, a favourite Pergamenian name (Pliny, NH v. 123). The trade of great part of the S. Troad has passed through the harbour of A. at all periods of history. It was connected by a Roman road with Troas and the coast of the Troad generally, and the road from Troas to A. required less time than the voyage round the long projection of Cape Lectum (Ac 20¹³). Wheat was extensively grown in the district, according to Strabo, p. 735; but valonia is the chief modern export.

LITERATURE.—The best account of A. is by J. T. Clarke, Report on the Investigations at Assos, Boston 1882. Many inscriptions are published by Sterrett in Papers of American School at Athens, i. pp. 1-90.

ASSUR (2 Es 2⁹)=ASSHUR, ASSYRIA.

ASSURE, ASSURANCE.—Assure in the sense of 'give confidence to,' 'confirm,' is used in 1 Jn 3¹⁹ 'hereby we know that we are of the truth, and shall a. our hearts before him' (πειθω, lit. 'persuade'). Cf. 2 Ti 3¹⁴ 'Abide thou in the things which thou . . . hast been a^{ed} of' (πιστώσω), and Ac 17³¹ 'He hath given assurance (πίστις) unto all men.' Assurance is RV tr. of ὑπόστασις (AV 'substance'), He 11¹, a word of great importance in Gr. philosophy and Chr. theology, and which occurs in NT 2 Co 9⁴, RV 'confidence'; 11¹⁷ RV 'confidence'; He 1³ RV 'substance'; 3¹⁴ RV 'confidence.' 'Full a.' is the tr. of πληροφορία, Col 2², He 6¹¹ (RV 'fulness'), 10²² (RV 'fulness'); but the same word is tr. 'much a.' in 1 Th 1⁵. A. is found also Wis 6¹⁸ 'the a. of incorruption' (βεβαλωσις ἀφθαρσίας). Cf. Ac 16¹⁰ 'assuredly gathering' (συνυβραβύσας, RV 'concluding').

J. HASTINGS.

ASSURANCE.—The religious and moral value of firm conviction is fully recognised in Scripture. It is the very aim and object of the divine message in whatever form it comes to produce it. Without it there cannot be that peace and joy in the soul which constitute the highest blessing of religion, nor that inward strength which alone can fit man for moral conquest. The want of it makes the 'double-minded man,' who is compared to the 'surge of the sea, driven by the wind and tossed' (Ja 1⁶). Even in OT times it was realised, as shown in the beautiful description of Isaiah (32¹⁷), where for AV 'quietness and assurance' RV reads 'quietness and confidence,' the original word denoting 'to hang upon something,' hence fig. 'to trust.' A word by which St. Paul expresses this state of mind is πέπεισμαι, 'I am persuaded,' whether he refers to the certainty of God's love in Christ (Ro 8³⁸), or to that which he had committed to his Lord (2 Ti 1¹²). The term, however, most frequently used for A. in NT and also in patristic writers is πληροφορία. From the fact that the cognate verb appears probably for the first time in the LXX of Ec 8¹¹, where it is a trⁿ of the Heb. כָּרָה, Cremer (Bib. Theol. Lex.) infers that it was of Alex. origin. It means 'to be fully persuaded, to be fixed and firm' (Ro 14⁵, Col 4¹²). The noun occurs in Col 2², πλ. τῆς συνέσεως, 'full a. of understanding'; 1 Th 1⁵ ἐν πλ. πολλῶ; He 6¹¹ πλ. τῆς ἐλπίδος; He 10²² πλ. πίστεως. In the last two passages RV (also Westcott in loc.) renders πλ. by the simpler word fulness rather than full assurance (as AV), 'the full measure or development of hope,' 'faith which has reached its mature vigour.'

A. STEWART.

ASSURBANIPAL.—Esarhaddon, king of Assyria, died in B.C. 668, while on his way to suppress a rebellion in Egypt. Samaš-šum-ukin (Σασσοδούχιμος of Ptolemy), an illegitimate son, had been set over the province of Babylon. Assurbānipal was heir to the throne at Nineveh. A Heb. writing of the name is probably found in Ezr 4¹⁰ אַשּׁוּרְבַּנְפַּל (Schrader, COT ii. 65; Delitzsch, Paradies, 329; contra, Halévy, Revue Études Juives, ix. 12). His own cuneiform annals and letters give us an abundance of information regarding his long reign. His first expedition was the prosecution of the unfinished campaign of his father against the Ethiopian Tirhakah. This rebellious leader fled to Ethiopia only to await the withdrawal of the Assyrian forces. The native governors of the provinces, as Necho and Šarludari, were aroused by Tirhakah to form a coalition against foreign authority. But Assyria pounced down upon them, carried off prisoners, and drove Tirhakah back to his lair, where he died about B.C. 664. Egypt was again tranquil, though hiding a volcano. An invasion of Egypt by Tanūtamon (Assyr. Urdamani) precipitated the last and decisive campaign of A. In B.C. 662 the Assyrian army fell upon Egypt, and drove Tanūtamon out of its bounds, captured and plundered Thebes, and carried off to Nineveh great booty. This concluded the sway of Ethiopia over the land of the thrifty Egyptian.

A.'s next expedition enveloped the E. coast of the Mediter. Sea, which rendered him submission. The king of Lydia, Janus-like, gave presents to A., and made a league with Tušamīlki of Egypt. This combination succeeded finally in throwing Assyria out of Egypt. The country of Van next fell before the arms of A. Elam, which had for centuries stood as a peer of its neighbours, fell at last, after several bloody battles continuing through a course of years, at the feet of the conqueror from Nineveh. His half-brother at Babylon, elated with flatteries and thirsting for independence, threw off the yoke of Nineveh. A. swept down upon Bab., overthrew the opposition, and captured the city. The seceding ruler, fearing the wrath of A., took refuge in his palace, and burned it over his head (B.C. 648). The secession of Samaš-šum-ukin is probably (Schrader COT ii. 53-59) but a hint at a general uprising against Assyria throughout the S.W., in which Manasseh of Judah was involved (2 Ch 33¹¹). The Arabians likewise were forced to submission, and A. was again lord of his empire.

This great warrior was also an enthusiast in other occupations. With the help of Aššur and Ištar he was able to cope with and slay lions. One of his chief sports seems to have been fighting lions, either those which were wild in the forests or those which were loosed from cages for the purpose.

But the most important feature of his career for us was his interest in literature. His library in Nineveh, which was uncovered by G. Smith, has preserved for us thousands of clay tablets, which were copied from older tablets in other libraries of his land. The topics treated are historical, ethical, linguistic, religious, and many others—all pertaining to Assyria and Babylonia.

As a builder, he was equal to his predecessors. The remains of his palace at Kouyunjik testify to the architectural ingenuity and taste of the monarch. In many cities of his empire he built beautiful temples to the gods, and adorned all with exquisite pieces of art. He laid every available source under tribute to his royal enterprises.

As a ruler and warrior, as a builder, as a litterateur, he is well deserving the title given him in Ezr 4¹⁰. The last years of his reign are comparatively wrapped in obscurity.

- iii. Literature.

A. is the country, famed in antiquity, on the east of the middle Tigris between 35° and 37° N. lat. The only town on the west of the Tigris, on the Mesopotamian tableland, was the old capital of the kingdom, Assur, from which the whole land takes its name. Its northern boundary is formed by the wilds of the Armenian-Kurdish mountains, in which the Tigris rises, and through which it flows till it enters the plain near Nineveh, over against the town which is now called Mosul. On the east it is bounded by the ranges of Zagros, which derive their name from the Assyrian zakru, 'pointed, high.' These ranges form a continuation of the Armenian mountains, and reach as far as Elam. They are the source of the great and little Zab, which flow into the valley of the Tigris. Of the other tributaries of the Tigris the Khusur may be mentioned (the Khōser, Khōsr-Su of to-day), which empties itself into the Tigris between the ruin-mounds of Kouyunjik and Nebi-yunus, and thus flows right through the midst of ancient Nineveh. Ancient Assyria extended in later times beyond these narrow boundaries; on the north-west to the left source of the Tigris, the Subnat (now Sebbeneh-Su); on the west to Khabur and Belikh, two well-known tributaries of the Euphrates in Mesopotamia; and on the south to the Radānu and Turnat, tributaries of the Tigris—one of which is to be identified with the modern Diyāla.

The Climate of Assyria—as we might imagine from its comparatively northern situation—may be said to be really very temperate. The general nature of the country is preponderatingly mountainous. Only the capitals were situated on the Tigris in the valley, e.g. ancient Assur, Nineveh, and Kalakh (Calah Gn 10²). The new royal residence built by Sargon, Dur-Sarrukin (Sargon's castle), the modern Khorsabad, was situated to the north of Nineveh, just at the foot of the mountains; while the well-known city of Istar, the market-town Arbēla (Arbailu, i.e. Town of the Four Gods—now called Erbil), together with the great military place to the south-west of it, Kakzi (modern Schemamek), etc., were situated in the higher parts of Assyria.

With regard to the Flora of Assyria, the slopes of the last-mentioned mountain districts were covered with oak, plane, and wild pine trees; while on the plain proper, besides abundance of nuts, fig and olive trees flourished, together with the vine plant. These last were originally unknown to the East-Semitic districts, and were first imported by the Assyrian kings from Syria. Agriculture was confined mainly to the cultivation of wheat, barley, hemp, and millet.

The Fauna was formerly far more varied than it is to-day, as the pictures on the monuments and the statements in the inscriptions prove beyond the possibility of doubt. In addition to hares, roes, stags, and mountain goats, lions and wild oxen (rîmu, Heb. rê'ém) were found in great numbers—the former in the tall reed plantations on the banks of the Tigris, the latter in the mountain districts, the happy hunting-grounds of the Assyrians. Magnificent horses—the famous Assyrian chargers, which were probably of the Medo-Elamite type—and cattle, goats, and sheep pastured on the slopes; while wild asses and camels are known only in later times, through the Assyrian incursions into the Syro-Arabian desert. The culture of bees was also actively carried on. Of domestic animals, the dog may be mentioned; of wild beasts, the panther, the wolf, the bear, and some others.

With regard to kinds of stone—alabaster (pîlu), which was employed for the Assyrian bas-reliefs, was found on the left bank of the Tigris in abundance. Of metals—iron, copper, and lead were found in any quantity in the Tiyari mountains near Nineveh.

Not only is Assyria far more rugged by nature than Babylonia, which is much more southerly and lies nearer the sea, but the inhabitants of the two countries differed in character, the Assyrians being of a much more powerful and rugged type than their Babylonian brothers, in spite of the fact of their common Semitic origin and speech. The Babylonians have been very appropriately called the Greeks, and the Assyrians the Romans of the ancient East. Especially striking is the resemblance between the Assyrian type of face, as it appears in pictorial representations on the monuments, and the features which we meet with to-day in the majority of Jews; while the pictures of the Babylonian kings suggest no such associations to our minds. The ancient Assyrians had purer Semitic blood in their veins than the Babylonians, for the latter in very early times show traces of an admixture of other races. The best authorities advocate the view implied in the table of races in Gn 10, which reckons only Assur and Aram (not Babel or Shinar) among the sons of Shem. In proof of this, v.¹¹ may be cited ('out of that land,' viz. Shinar or Babylonia, 'he [i.e. Nimrod] went forth into Assyria and builded Nineveh,' etc.), a statement which is confirmed by the monuments. As Assyria was originally only an offshoot from Babylonia, its language—at any rate the language of its literature, which is the only one known to us—is also Babylonian. The writings themselves, as well as the art and science, bear the clearest witness that they are equally dependent upon the motherland of Babylonia. It is noteworthy that while the oldest Assyrian inscriptions exhibit most clearly the old Babylonian cuneiform characters, after the time of Tiglath-pileser I. (c. B.C. 1100) they evolved a style of writing which fell back upon what can be proved to be a debased form of Babylonian writing, which previously existed only in North Mesopotamia. Hence there arose, in distinction from the new Bab. writing, a special form of new Assyr., in which were written most of the Assyr. royal inscriptions, and, above all, the many clay tablets of the Assyr. court libraries, up to the time of Assurbanipal.

The Assyrian Religion, too, is essentially the same as the Babylonian, with some modifications. When, for instance, on the so-called Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser II. (B.C. 859-825) mention is made of the following gods: Asur, Anu, Bel, Ea, Sin, Ramman, Samas, Merodach, Nindar (or Ninib), Nergal, Nusku, Belit, and Istar, this list is identical with the Babylonian Pantheon (see BABYLONIA), with the exception of the god Asur, who heads the list, but is entirely wanting to the Babylonians. This Asur, the chief god of Assyria, was originally only a differentiation of Anu, or the god of heaven. His name An-sar, which afterwards became Assar, Assur, Asur, 'Host of Heaven,' appears in the Bab. cosmogony, but plays in the Bab. religion a far less important part. Probably on account of the similarity of sound between the name of the god and the name of the country Assur (originally Asur, from the Sumerian A-usar 'water plain'), the originally more abstract god of heaven, Asur, was exalted to the highest place and became king of the gods. Special reverence was also paid to the storm god Ramman, who in the most ancient times cannot be very clearly distinguished from the god of the air, In-lilla or Bel. Assur and Ramman, therefore, held a similar place in Assyria to Anu and Bel, who were the two chief divinities of the old Babylonians. Further, we find an Istar of Nineveh, an Istar of Arbela, and an Istar of Kitmur, the two former being goddesses of war, while the latter appears to be a goddess of love; and finally, two masculine divinities of hunting and war, Nindar (Nin-ib) and Nergal. Proper names, especially those of the kings, always serve as a test which enables us to determine the amount of favour meted out to the different divinities. Here we meet most frequently with Assur and Ramman (=Bel, cf. Rammân-nirâri, 'Ramman is my help,' with Bel-nirâri).

In the case of the word Shalman-asarid (Shalmaneser), the name Shalmân appears to be a cognomen of the god Nindar. The latter the Assyrians preferred to call Asharid Ilâni, 'Prince of the gods.' The pronunciation Adar instead of Nindar (written Nin-ib) has no foundation to rest on.

While in Babylonia, the mother country of Assyria, the priests were always more powerful than the kings, in Assyria the king himself was also chief priest, and upon him the priesthood was completely dependent. Primarily, however, the king of Assyria was a general. The army always played the chief rôle in Assyria. The king was also the chief judge. All his subjects might come direct to him with their petitions and suits, which were always decided with the strictest impartiality and in accordance with the provisions of the laws, to which the king himself always bowed. Hence disobedience and rebellion were severely punished, as all the enemies of the king were regarded as rebels against Assyria as well. In the treatment of captives and prisoners the Assyrians displayed an inhumanity which we rightly regard as revolting. The court, as the political power of the nation increased, became ever more and more magnificent.

In Architecture, again, the Assyrians seem, in course of time, to have surpassed their original teachers, the Babylonians. It is characteristic of the Assyrians, that far more magnificence and wealth were expended on the palaces than on the temples. For although the kings in their inscriptions never omit to lay due emphasis on the temples which they built, yet, as a matter of fact, the excavations (see below) have brought to light the remains of far more palaces than temples. The statues of the kings, like those of the gods, were made with great skill and care, but pre-eminence was reached by the Assyrian artists in bas-relief, with which the walls of the palaces were adorned. The older specimens are rather stiff and clumsy; but the productions of the age of Sargon and Sennacherib show a very marked improvement, and the highest perfection was reached in the reign of Assurbanipal. The British Museum affords the best opportunity for admiring the war scenes, the triumphal processions, the pictures of private life, and especially the realistic hunting pictures, which form the masterpieces of the Assyrian artist. But the impulse to this development of Assyrian art will probably have come from without. With the increasing growth of the Assyrian empire, immense treasures of merchandise and art poured into Nineveh and Kalakh (cf. Nah 2^o) from the newly-conquered provinces; and these importations stand in direct relation to the refinement that took place in the taste for art.

In Literature the Assyrians entirely followed Bab. models, as, to take a single illustration, the prayer of Assur-nazir-pal II. (c. B.C. 1050) to the goddess Istar proves. In most cases they contented themselves with simply copying out Babylonian literature. But in this way they did us a greater service than if they had composed 100 or 1000 poetical imitations of a second-rate character. For it is owing entirely to the activity of the Assyrians as collectors of books, and especially of Assurbanipal, the Mæcenas of literature, that the bulk of Bab. literature has been preserved for us. In scientific literature too—astronomy, mathematics, medicine, grammar, lexicography—all alike were simply copies of Bab. originals. It was only in practical mechanics that the Assyrians advanced beyond their Bab. masters, as can be proved from the process they adopted for transporting the colossal images of bulls, as it is depicted on the bas-reliefs. In this connexion brief reference may also be made to the convex lenses found in Nimroud, used perhaps for the purpose of magnifying the writing on the clay tablets, which was often very minute.

As far as Agriculture is concerned, Assyria was not, owing to its more northern aspect, the rich corn-bearing land that Babylonia was; but all the more on this account efforts were made on the part of the kings, by the construction of canals and weirs, to increase the fertility of the soil. The water needed for the land, which was supplied in such abundance by the mountain streams, was in this way properly regulated and distributed.

HISTORY OF ASSYRIA.—Thanks entirely to the excavations of the ruins of the old cities, especially Nineveh and Kalakh, the history of Assyria from its earliest beginnings, c. 2000 B.C., to the fall of Nineveh, can be set forth with great detail and exactness. The great number of inscriptions* which have been brought to light puts us in the position of being able to write an uninterrupted history of the Assyrian empire for many centuries. In these Discoveries the palm belongs without doubt to Englishmen—especially to Sir Austin Henry Layard (d. 1894) and Hormuzd Rassam.

It was Claudius James Rich who first discovered the ruins of Nineveh, and drew the attention of investigators to this city, which is of such importance to antiquarians. After visiting Mosul three times (the first visit being paid in 1811), and superficially examining the rubbish-mound which is to be found on the opposite bank of the Tigris, he resolved in the year 1820 to make a thorough examination of it, the results of which were published sixteen years later (1836), in accordance with the terms of his will. The scanty remains of sculptures and inscribed stones brought by him to Europe formed the basis of the Assyrian collection in the British Museum, which has since become so splendid, and confirmed the conjecture made by Joseph Hager in 1801, that the same cuneiform writing which had been found in Babylon at the end of the previous century was the foundation of the culture of the Assyrian world-empire. New paths of rich promise were thus pointed out to Oriental archæology.

The excavations of the Frenchman P. E. Botta, 1843–45, at Khorsabad, a village five miles to the north of Nineveh, and, above all, of the Englishman Austin Henry Layard at Nimroud, the site of ancient Kalakh (end of 1845 to middle of 1847), and at Kouyunjik, ancient Nineveh (1849–51), brought to light a whole series of Assyr. palaces and a multitude of sculptures and inscriptions, after a slumber of 2500 years. It was Layard who urged Botta to persevere with his excavations, which at first were fruitless; and some years afterwards, when Layard himself commenced to excavate, he found in the consul, Hormuzd Rassam, an indefatigable helper—a fact which was first clearly recognised and duly acknowledged some ten years later. At Khorsabad, Botta had the good fortune to lay bare the first Assyr. palace, which had been built by king Sargon (Is 20^o), Dur-Sarrukin (castle of Sargon), the bas-reliefs and inscriptions of which now embellish the Louvre in Paris; while Layard, in Nimroud and Kouyunjik, excavated no fewer than five great palaces, of which the antiquities were brought to the British Museum. By this stroke of good fortune the greater part of the famous clay tablets of the library of king Sardanapalus (Assurbanipal) now came to light.

Additions were made in the following years to these discoveries of Botta and Layard by the after-gleanings of Rassam, from 1851–54, in Kouyunjik, and of the French architect Victor Place in Khorsabad. In 1854 Rassam excavated the North Palace of Assurbanipal, and by this stroke of fortune discovered a fresh portion of the library mentioned above.

During the next decades Assyr. excavation was at a standstill; but, to make up for this, the first three volumes of the great work on Assyr. inscriptions, The Cuneiform Inscriptions of Western Asia (1861, 1866, 1870), were published during that period by Henry Rawlinson, Edwin Norris, and George Smith. This book was preceded by a volume of Assyr. inscriptions, edited by Layard, 1861, a work which, it must be admitted, was not nearly so accurate as that of Rawlinson. To this period also belongs the preliminary settlement of the grand problem of decipherment inaugurated by Rawlinson, Hincks, and Oppert.

In the years 1873 and 1874 the excavations in Nineveh were resumed, the unfortunate George Smith, who died of fever in Aleppo on Aug. 19, 1875, making two journeys of investigation, which produced rich results. Amongst many other finds, this enthusiastic and gifted young investigator discovered a number of clay tablets belonging to the library of Assurbanipal, amongst them being the Bab. account of the Flood and other allied mythological texts (see BABYLONIA). These discoveries won for him a celebrity and popularity such as few others have attained.

The work which had been resumed by Smith, and which was unfortunately cut short by his premature death, was continued by the veteran Hormuzd Rassam in a further expedition in the years 1877–78, from which he came back with far richer spoil than even G. Smith's. Mention must here be made of the discoveries of a temple in Nimroud, the famous bronze gateway of Balawat, with its sculptures dating from the 9th cent. B.C. (see below, under Shalmaneser II.), and 1400 more tablets from the library of Assurbanipal, not to speak of the 'finds' on Bab. ground made in 1878-79 and 1880-81. Since then no further systematic excavations have been organised in Assyria, but every year some fresh Assyrian relics are brought to England through the agents of the British Museum.

Several Assyrian monuments and inscriptions have also come to light outside Assyria. To this class belong, first of all, the statues of the Assyrian kings found at Nahr el-Kelb, or Dog River, two leagues north of Beirut; next, some inscriptions of the kings found in the district at the source of the Tigris, and in the ruins of Kurkh, 20 miles beyond Diarbekr; and, above all, the tablets, dating from B.C. 1500, discovered about the end of 1887 at Tel el-Amarna in Upper Egypt. Among these were the letters written in cuneiform characters and directed to the Pharaohs Amenhotep III. and IV., the greater number of which are now in the Berlin Museum, though a good many are in the British Museum, and a few in Cairo. The last included a letter written by the Assyrian king Assur-uballit to Amenhotep IV. It may be here remarked that the letters of the kings of Mitanni (on the middle Euphrates), which belong to the Tel el-Amarna find, are also written in Assyrian cuneiform characters, as is the case with the so-called Van inscriptions of the Armenian kings, which belong to a later time, B.C. 800. Assyrian inscriptions have also been found in Cappadocia, which probably date about B.C. 2000, but unfortunately they do not contain the names of any kings.

Finally, a short account must be given of the valuable find some years ago—also made outside Assyria—in Zinjirli near Mar'ash, on the borders of Cilicia and Syria, by the Oriental ethnologist Felix von Luschan. After the discovery by L. Ross in 1845 of a stele of Sargon in Cyprus, Luschan found in the neighbourhood of Zinjirli (the Assyrian vassal state of Sam'al) a monument of the Assyrian king Esarhaddon, with a full inscription, besides eighteen Hittite sculptures and three old Aramaic inscriptions. Both the monument of Sargon and that of Esarhaddon are in the Royal Museum at Berlin, which also contains the many relics dug up in Zinjirli.

The excavations just described have brought to light Assyrian inscriptions which constitute our primary sources for Assyrian history. These sources are most copious, being composed not only of annals and the so-called votive inscriptions which form the most important element, but also of decrees, letters, reports, sale-contracts, etc. Chronicles too, which form the first beginnings of real historiography, were discovered. While the inscriptions of the kings were written either on the walls of the palaces or on obelisks and monoliths, or even on the sides of rocks, the chronicles were found in the Assyrian libraries. The two most complete works that have come down to us are: (1) the so-called Synchronistic History of Babylonia and Assyria, from c. B.C. 1400-800, in which there is unfortunately a great gap between B.C. 1050-900; and (2) the Babylonian Chronicle, which covers the time from Nabonassar to Assurbanipal (744-668). Since Babylonia all through this period was subject to the supremacy of Assyria, the last-mentioned document, which is of paramount importance, affords far more valuable contributions towards Assyrian than towards Babylonian history. Most welcome light is also thrown on Assyrian history by other Babylonian documents, of which we may mention a long inscription, which has been brought to Constantinople, of the Babylonian king Nabonidus, dealing with the invasions of Assyria by the Medes.

Second in importance as sources for the history of Assyria come the Books of the Kings of Israel, which form a most valuable complement to the official account of the Assyrian kings, the latter being sometimes a little coloured and not always absolutely true to fact. Furthermore, we have the Prophetic Literature of the OT, which is in many respects more important for our subject than the historical records. Last of all may be mentioned the records of the Classical Historians, which, however, with the single exception of the famous Canon of Ptolemy, as it is called, are of very little use.

This table of rulers, which begins with Nabonassar, B.C. 747, brings us to the question of Chronology. It contains the list of Bab. kings (including also the Assyrians Poros [Puru, Tiglath-pileser], Sargon, and Esarhaddon), with accurate particulars of the dates of their reigns, down to Nabonidus. Then it gives their Achæmenidean successors down to Alexander the Great, and ends with the rulers of Egypt (the Ptolemies and the Romans). The Canon of Ptolemy was appended to the well-known astronomical work of Claudius Ptolemæus, as a commentary (based on Bab. and Alex. computations) upon the eclipses of the sun and moon alleged to have been seen; and consequently it bears within itself the guarantee of its trustworthiness. The statements of the Bab. Chronicle and the many chronological notes on Assyrian and Bab. inscriptions were confirmed by it, and, conversely, confirmed its accuracy. It also furnished the key for determining the chronology of the most important Assyrian chronological document, the Eponym Canon, found in the library of Assurbanipal.

From B.C. 900 to 667 (that is, to the time of Assurbanipal) these incomparable and invaluable lists give year by year the chief officers of state, and always make a special point of noting the accession of every new king to the throne. After the time of Samsi-Ramman IV. (B.C. 824-812) this list is further supplemented by the contents of the so-called 'List of Expeditions' (extending to B.C. 700), in which, opposite to every name, there is a short notice of the different campaigns carried out in each year. But it was by the help of the Canon of Ptolemy that we were first able to bind the Eponym Canon together in chronological order from beginning to end, and thus establish the fact that the first officer mentioned in it, Assurdan, belongs to the year B.C. 902, the last, Gabbaru, to B.C. 667. It is therefore possible to fix the exact dates of the reigns of all the Assyrian kings who fall within this period, from Rammân-nirârî II. to the accession of Assurbanipal.

The earlier epochs, also, can be dated from these fixed points, at any rate partially and approximately. The rulers of Assyria have left us some special chronological notes in their inscriptions which refer to kings who lived long before them.

(a) Sennacherib relates that the Bab. king Marduk-nadin-akhi carried off to Babylon, at the time when Tiglath-pileser I. was king of Assyria, two images of gods, which he himself, 418 years later, had brought back. It is clear, therefore, since this statement belongs to the year of the destruction of Babylon by Sennacherib, viz. B.C. 689, that the year B.C. 1107 may be definitely fixed as a certain date in the reign of Tiglath-pileser I. (c. B.C. 1120-1100?).

(b) The same Sennacherib remarks, on another occasion, that he recognised amongst the Bab. treasures a seal of Tuklat-Nindar, the son of Shalmaneser I., which had been taken to Babylon 600 years before. This fixes the reign of Tuklat-Nindar somewhere about B.C. 1300 (more exactly 1289). We must take into consideration, however, the fact that the round number 600 may, if necessary, stand for 560, or even 550; in this latter case, we should have the average date of B.C. 1250.

(c) Finally, Tiglath-pileser I., whose date is approximately fixed by consideration (a), says that, 60 years before, his great-grandfather, the long-lived Assur-dan, pulled down a temple which had fallen into ruins, and evidently had not finished rebuilding it when death overtook him. Thus Assur-dan died somewhere about B.C. 1175.

(d) The same Tiglath-pileser, in the same passage, had previously remarked that the temple in question was built by the old high-priest Samsi-Ramman, son of Ismi-Dagan, 641 years before. The date of Samsi-Ramman is therefore fixed about B.C. 1815.

A series of specially important dates for Bab. chronology is to be found in the inscriptions of the Bab. king Nabonidus (B.C. 555-539). (See BABYLONIA.) We possess also a list of the kings of Babylon, which unfortunately is not quite complete, beginning c. 2000 B.C., as well as the so-called 'Synchronistic History' (see above), which gives side by side a complete enumeration of the kings of Babylon and their Assyrian contemporaries. From these sources we secure, although indirectly, some fresh basal points for Assyrian chronology.

Finally, we conclude, from some astronomical notices in Egyptian inscriptions, that Tahutmes III. reigned from 1503-1449, and further obtain B.C. 1400 as the date of the death of Amenhotep III. and the accession of Amenhotep IV. Thus the date of both these kings, with their Bab. and Assyrian contemporaries, is approximately fixed (see above, on the discoveries at Tel el-Amarna).

The first beginnings of Assyrian History will probably always remain veiled in darkness. That the Assyrian state was originally an offshoot from Babylonia may be regarded as certain from its writing, language, and religion, as well as from the witness, by no means to be despised, of Hebrew tradition (Gn 10¹⁴), which confirms this inference, and which is itself of Bab. origin. It is certain, too, that the oldest rulers of Assyria known to us styled themselves 'priests' (Sumerian, pa-te-si; Assyrian, iššaku) of the god Assur. Besides the two priest-kings mentioned in the chronology, viz. Samsi-Rammân and his father Ismi-Dagan,† we know of others whose tablets have come down to us, viz. a certain Irisu and his father Khallu, as well as of a second Samsi-Rammân and his father Igur- (or Bel-) kapkapu. ‡

It is noticeable that the title 'Patesi' is not bestowed on the last-named, so that it looks as if he or his son Samsi-Rammân was the first founder of the Assyrian state. In that case we must, of course, place this Samsi-Rammân before B.C. 1816, probably about B.C. 1850 or even B.C. 1900. On the other hand, the later king, Rammân-nirâri III. (c. B.C. 800) calls himself 'the descendant of the old king Bel-kapkapu, who ruled even before the primitive period of the reign of the Sulili.' Finally, Esarhaddon, grandson of the usurper Sargon, claims to be 'the perpetual descendant of Bel-bani, son of Adasi, king of Assyria.' By this Bel-bani is probably meant one of the kings who sat on the Assyrian throne during the period between B.C. 1800 and 1500. It was during this period that the rulers of Assyria assumed the official title 'King of Assur,' instead of the old title 'Patesi.' About B.C. 1800 we find in Assyria the arrangement by which the year (limmu) was called after the chief officer of state; and even at that time Assyria, which, owing to the position of its old capital Assur on the west bank of the Tigris, had begun to gravitate unduly towards the north-west, must have cultivated commercial relations with Cappadocia. Only on this supposition can we account for the fact that a considerable number of Assyrian contract-tablets, containing lists of contracts in ancient writing, which belong to this period, have been discovered in Cappadocia. We may also infer that the intermediate territory, especially Mesopotamia and Harran, was probably at times under Assyrian rule, or, at any rate, Assyrian influence.

* I.e. 'my sun is Ramman' (Bel).

† I.e. 'Dagan heard.' Dagan is another name for Bel. An old Bab. king of Nisin bore the same name.

‡ I.e. 'Bel is mighty.' Igur (Ocean of Heaven) is another name for the god Bel.

To the period when the Assyrian rulers bore the title 'Patesi' probably belong most of the half-mythological, half-historical narratives which have been preserved for us in the Assyrian libraries. In one of these a description of the building of temples in Sirgulla, Nippur, and Nisin is followed by an account 'of terrible wars, and a famine so fearful that brothers ate one another, and parents sold their children for gold, and the treasures of Babylon were carried to the land of Su, the king of Babylon allowing the treasures of his own palace to be handed over to the prince of Assur.' It is of some importance that in this text the ruler is called, not 'king,' but 'prince' (rubû) of Assur at that time. The so-called 'Legends of the Plague-Demon' (see BABYLONIA) seem to refer to the same events. The inhabitants of Su, the wild Sutæans, who at that time possessed the greater part of Assyria, and a part of Mesopotamia as well, are proved to have been the originators of the fearful devastations in Babylonia; and it appears from the same text, that not the Sutæans, but the Elamites, those old foes of Babylon and Assur, were the instigators. Finally, the disastrous wars were diverted from the territories of the Euphrates and Tigris to the west, from which we may surmise that the predatory Sutæans poured also over a part of Syria and Palestine. As a matter of fact, some centuries later, in the Tel el-Amarna letters, the Sutæans are mentioned as the enemies of the Phœnic town Gebal (Byblos). In the Egyptian inscriptions of the New Kingdom (somewhere about B.C. 1600) a similar name (Setet) proves that the Asiatics in general, and more particularly the Asiatic hunting tribes, as well as the Bedawin of the Syro-Arabian desert, extended their marauding expeditions at that time, just as they do to-day, to Palestine and Phœnicia, on the one side, and beyond Mesopotamia and the territory to the east of the Tigris, on the other.

Accurate and uninterrupted knowledge of Assyrian history begins about the year B.C. 1500. Possibly, however, the two kings Assur-nirâri and Nabudan belong to the previous centuries, which as far as our knowledge is concerned are complete blanks. All that we know about these kings is that they were contemporaries of a king—about whom also we know nothing—Rammân-musheshir of Kardunias (i.e. of Babylon, at the time of the Kassite rulers). From B.C. 1500 to B.C. 1430 Asur-belnishê-shu, who was contemporaneous with the Bab. Kara-indash, and Puzur-Assur, the contemporary of Burnaburias I., ruled over Assyria. The Synchronistic History relates that they settled the boundaries between Babylonia and Assyria. We do not know whether Puzur-Assur ('security of the god Assur') was the direct successor, or, as is possible, the grandson of Asur-belnishê-shu ('Assur is lord of his people'). It must have been one of these kings, however, who sent presents to the powerful Pharaoh Tahutmes III. (B.C. 1504-1450) in token of his allegiance, as was also done by the kings of Mitanni and Sangar (West and East Mesopotamia) and the king of Arrapach (east of Assyria, in the mountainous district, at the source of the lower Zab). The presents of the king of Assyria and those of his nearest neighbours stand out pre-eminently on the Bab. Blue Stone (lapis-lazuli, Assyr. uknû) which has been brought from Mt. Bikni in Media.

From Assur-nadin-akhi (c. B.C. 1430) to the year B.C. 1050 we possess an absolutely complete series of the kings—the son as a rule succeeding his father. Almost all these rulers are to be found mentioned on the inscriptions, and the 'Synchronistic History' gives us further information about most of them. We can with perfect certainty, therefore, draw out the following list:—

While at the beginning of this period (c. B.C. 1400) Babylonia had still the supremacy in the Euphrates and Tigris districts, and aspiring Assyria possessed in Mitanni a powerful and dangerous rival, in a few centuries the picture was totally changed. As early as the reign of Ramman-nirâri I., who has given us the first long royal inscription that we possess, Assyria commenced the upward march which was afterwards so steadily maintained, and the campaigns of Tiglath-pileser I. laid the foundation of the great world-empire which Assyria became in later times.

Assur-uballit * I. is well known to us from a letter which he wrote to the Pharaoh Amenhotep (Amenophis) IV. expressing his allegiance to him, in which he describes himself as the son of Assur-nadin-akhi. He is also distinguished for his energetic attempt to secure, by family relationships, the right of interference in the affairs of

* Or Assur-uballit, or Ashur-uballit. The Assyrians sometimes spell the name of their national god Assur, and sometimes Assur. The sibilant is properly pronounced sh, but was very early pronounced s in Assyria, in contradistinction to Babylonia.

Babylon. The Bab. crown prince Kara-khardas had become his son-in-law. Assur-uballit lived to see not only his accession to the throne, but also the accession of his grandson Kadashman-kharbi.

The last-named, however, was overthrown by the Kassites, who were then predominant in Babylon, because the interference of his royal Assyr. mother Muballitat-sherûa and of his grandfather proved dangerous to them. The murderers of Kadashman-kharbi placed a certain Suzigas (or, according to another tradition, Nazibugas) upon the throne in his stead. But the aged Assur-uballit did not allow him to be unavenged. He got Suzigas put to death, and placed his own great-grandson, Kurigalzu, who was still a minor, upon the throne. The last-named king, who reigned c. 50 years, came into conflict with two Assyr. kings, Bel-nirâri and his grandson Ramman-nirâri, about the possession of a portion of Mesopotamia.

Under Assur-uballit and his grandson Pudu-ilu, the Assyrians succeeded in freeing themselves from the suzerainty of the kings of Mitanni. Tushratta,* the powerful king of Mitanni, who was the contemporary of Assur-nadin-akhi (the father of Assur-uballit), as well as of Assur-uballit himself, lent the image of Istar of Nineveh to Egypt, obviously in order that his daughter, who was married to the Pharaoh, might be able by its help to practise her native cultus. The natural inference is that Assyria was then a mere vassal state of Mitanni, and that Nineveh had become, to say the very least, the common Istar sanctuary for both Mitanni and Assyria. In the language of Mitanni, which is a Hittite and not a Semitic dialect, Istar of Nineveh is called Sha'uspi; and Sargon, 700 years later, lifted up his hands to 'Sha'uspi, the ruler of Nineveh' (Cylinder Inscript. 1. 54), thus calling Istar by a name which reminds us of the times of Tushratta. Now it is expressly stated that Assur-uballit destroyed the military forces of the extensive region of Shubâri (i.e. Mesopotamia), and that Pudu-ilu not only subjugated the mountaineers of Guti (Arrapachitis), but also defeated the Akhلامي and Sutæans, the predatory nomads of Mesopotamia. These territories, however, in the days of Tahutmes III. were under the absolute and uncontrolled rule of the independent kings of Arrapach and Mitanni. We may regard it as almost certain, that even in the days of Bel-nirâri the once powerful Mitanni was overthrown by the sudden attacks of these Sutæans, a result which was heartily welcomed by the aspiring Assur.

Ramman-nirâri I., in the inscription mentioned above, briefly recounts all these events in the reigns of his three immediate predecessors, in order to relate how he rebuilt the towns which had been destroyed in the previous wars which devastated the territories on the east and west of Assyria. Owing to the fact that the land of the Guti (Göim, Gn 14) had been overthrown by his predecessors, some boundary disputes arose with Babylonia, since the territory in question had formerly been within the Bab. sphere of influence.† The Bab. king Nazi-maraddash, however, was conquered by Ramman-nirâri, and compelled to consent to a fresh delimitation of the boundaries, more favourable to Assyria.

Under the rule of his son Shalman-asharid (Shalmaneser I., c. B.C. 1300, Assyria made an important advance. This king undertook a whole series of campaigns against the mountainous regions to

* Son of Sutarna, who was the son of Artatama, a contemporary of the Pharaoh Tahutmes IV. Tahutmes IV. was related by marriage to the kings of Mitanni. An elder brother of Tushratta, who died early, was called Arta-shûmara.

† There exists an inscription of a king of Guti, written in old Bab. cuneiform characters, which vividly calls to mind the era of old Sargon of Agade, c. B.C. 3700.

the north of Mesopotamia, between the modern Diarbekr and Malat'iyeh, advancing into the interior of Western Armenia as far as the country which is often called in the cuneiform inscriptions Musri (Musur-dagh on the Upper Euphrates). It is interesting to note that North Mesopotamia, near the mountains of Masius (Assyrian, mts. of Kasyar), is always called the land of Arimi or the Aramæans, not only in the inscriptions of Shalmaneser I. himself, but also in a later account of the campaign, which dates from the time of Assur-nâzir-pal II. We naturally compare with this the biblical derivation of the four peoples, Uz, Hul, Gether, and Mash (this latter=Mt. Masius), from Aram (Gn 10²³). As a matter of fact, shortly before the reign of Shalmaneser, the Aramæan nomads must have been driven away from the Bab.-Elamite frontier (the biblical Kir, Am 9⁷, cf. Is 22⁶, Kir near Elam), their original home, into Mesopotamia. The Akhلامي too (after whom a stone in the breastplate of the Heb. priests was called Akhlamah, Ex 28¹⁹), who were conquered by Pudu-ilu, are expressly stated by Tiglath-pileser I. to have been Aramæans. Shalmaneser I. took from the Bab. king Kadashman-buriash several towns in the district of Dûr-Kurigalzu (near the modern Baghdad). He wished, too, to be regarded as a builder. He laid the foundation of a new residence Kalakh (Gn 10¹²), Assur having up to this time been the capital town, and built afresh the sanctuary of Istar in Nineveh, which Assur-uballit had only very roughly restored. And, finally, it is worth remarking that he was the first Assyrian king who assumed the title 'King of the World' (sar kiššati) on his inscriptions, a circumstance which obviously stands in special relation to the conquest of Mesopotamia, and more particularly to the acquisition of the primitive sanctuary-town Harran.

Shalmaneser's son *Tuklat-Nindar I. was probably still a contemporary of the Babylonian king Shagarakti-shuriash (c. B.C. 1269-1257(?)), certainly of his successors Bibiash (B.C. 1256-1249(?)), Bel-nadin-shumi (B.C. 1248), Kadashman-kharbi (B.C. 1247-6), and Rammân-shum-idina (B.C. 1246-1240(?)). The last-mentioned was king only in name, for after Babylon had been enfeebled by the invasion of the Elamite king Kidin-khutrutash, Tuklat-Nindar seized the Bab. empire for himself for seven years, calling himself king of Sumer and Akkad. Finally, however, he was overthrown by his own son Assur-nâzir-pal I., while the throne of Babylon was successfully occupied by Rammân-shum-uzur,† son of Rammân-shum-idina. A seal with the inscription 'overthrow of Kardunias,' which was struck at Babylon in the time of Tuklat-Nindar, was brought to Assyria 600 years later by Sennacherib. Of course 600 is a round number, and the event may reasonably be connected with the year 1246 of the Chronicle of the Kings of Babylonia (comp. above, p. 179^b).

We do not know whether the next Assyrian king, Bel-kudur-uzur, was a son, or, as is possible, a brother of Assur-nâzir-pal I. The Synchronistic History informs us that he was conquered by the powerful Babylonian king Rammân-shum-uzur (B.C. 1239-1209(?)) and lost his life in the battle. His successor Nindar-pal-isharra had great difficulty in repulsing Rammân-shum-uzur's attack on the town of Assur. It appears, however, that he was successful at last in victoriously driving back the Bab. army. He was succeeded by his son Assur-dan I., who lived to an advanced age, and towards the end of his reign (B.C. 1181) conquered Zamâma-shum-idina of Babylon, and by this means extended the Assyrian frontier beyond the lower Zab.

* Or Tukulti-Nindar (i.e. 'Nindar is my help'). The Hebrews write a similarly formed name, Tukulti-pal-isharra as Tiglath-pileser. They seem therefore to have written Tuklat-p. instead of Tukulti-p.

† The name ideographically written is Rammân-MU-SIS. Possibly Rammân-nadin-akhi could also be read.

In the reign of Assur-dan's son Mutakkil-Nusku, the Mosks (the biblical מוסק), a people from Asia Minor, made an incursion into North Syria and the contiguous district of North-West Mesopotamia. This incursion seems to have set in motion other waves. The Akhلامي (who had been formerly subdued by the Assyrians) on the Middle Euphrates, the *Lullumi and the Guti to the north and east of Assyria, lifted up their heads again; and so Mutakkil-Nusku's son, the energetic Assur-rish-ishi ('Assur lifted up his head'), had to undertake the great task of reconquering these old enemies before he could think of subduing the Mosks. His Bab. contemporary Nabu-kudur-uzur I. (c. 1145-1122) had the glory of conquering the same Lullubi (as the Babylonians call them, instead of Lullumi), who had extended their settlements into the mountains between Armenia and Media, some distance within the frontiers of Assyria and Babylonia. Probably it came at last to a struggle between the two kingdoms, which was settled by the Assyrian king obtaining a victory over Nebuchadrezzar I., who was, notwithstanding, a distinguished and powerful prince.

The first really great Assyrian conqueror, however, was Assur-rish-ishi's son Tuklat-pal-isharra (Tiglath-pileser) I., whose name means 'Help of the son of Isharra' (i.e. the god Nindar). While, in former times, only the Babylonian kings—and last of these Kadashman-kharbi and Nebuchadrezzar—had penetrated as far as the so-called 'Westland' or Martu, he was the first Assyrian king to undertake campaigns in this direction, reaching even the frontiers of Palestine. He journeyed on ships of Arvad in the north of Phœnicia, to the Mediter. Sea, and killed a great sea monster called a nâkhîr ('snorting'), probably somewhere between Arvad and the Gulf of Issus. He also hunted wild oxen (rimu, Heb. re'em) at the foot of Lebanon. His renown reached even to Egypt, and the Pharaoh of the day sent to Assyria a female pagû (probably an ape), a crocodile, and a hippopotamus for his zoological gardens.

In his annals, which contain about 800 lines, there is a detailed account of his first six campaigns (B.C. 1120-1115), the results of which are summed up in the following words: 'Altogether 42 countries with their rulers, reaching from beyond the lower Zab—the districts of the mountain forests on the other side of the Euphrates—to the land of the Khatti and the Upper Western Sea (Gulf of Issus), from the beginning of my reign to the end of the fifth year, have been conquered by my hand, and I have received tribute and taxes from them.' A further campaign, which carried him to Lebanon, is not included, as it was undertaken in a later year. Unfortunately, up to the present we know of this last-named campaign only incidentally through another inscription which describes his hunting expeditions. Tiglath-pileser was also the first Assyrian king who, besides the title 'King of the World' (sar kiššati) which his predecessors had borne before him, assumed another title known to old Babylonian history, viz. 'King of the Four Quarters of the World,' and rightly, for he was the first to reach the Mediterranean Sea. With regard to his special campaigns, by far the most important was the war against the Mosks of Asia Minor (Meshech, Gn 10², Ezk 27¹³ 33²), who, 60 years before, had made an incursion into North Mesopotamia and conquered the land of Kummukh (Commagene, on the farther bank of the Euphrates). The Kurkhi (Kurdi?), who lived in the mountainous districts towards Armenia, had also joined the Mosks as allies. The scene of the war lay between Commagene on the Euphrates and the Gordyan mountains on the Upper Tigris. We may conclude from their names that the tribes of these districts were all of Hittite and non-Semitic nationality. The names of two of the hostile kings conquered by Tiglath-pileser are of special interest, Kili-Tishup son of Kali-Tishup, and Sadi-Tishup son of Khatu-shar. Tishup was the name of one of the Hittite gods. In the time of Ramses II. we hear of a Hittite named Tar-Tishbu. Moreover, the old storm god of Armenia and Mitanni was called Tishupash; and, finally, the same name for a god turns up again in Susa as Tishpak. Khatu-shar, too, is identical with Kheta-sar, by which name a Hittite foe of Ramses II. is called. Now Khatu was a divinity of the Hittite population scattered about from the west of Asia Minor to Elam. The names of the Lydian kings, Aly-attes and Sady-attes, which were formed like Kali-Tishup and Sadi-Tishup, prove this, for the god Attes, spelt in Aramaic inscriptions ghatē (𐤒, -γᾱtis in Ἀτᾱρ-γᾱtis; -κετω in Δερκετω), cannot be any other than the one which appears in Khatu-shar.

North of Kummukh, Tiglath-pileser made tributary the land of Khani-rabbat, so often mentioned in the cuneiform inscriptions (the great Kheta-land of the Egypt. inscriptions), near Milid (Malat'yeh). This country (erroneously transcribed Khani-galbat by some Assyriologists) was the old mother-land of the Hittites. There was no longer, however, a great Hittite empire at the time of Tiglath-pileser, but the Aramæans had attempted to establish themselves in several places in the north of Syria and Mesopotamia. Tiglath-pileser expelled them from the region between the Euphrates and Belikh, the original country of the Mitanni, and plundered their pasture-grounds which were situated along the farther bank of the Euphrates, the land of Sukhi (Shuah, Gn 25³; Job 2¹, 'Bildad the Shuhite'). He also conquered by force of arms the land of Musri in West Armenia, against which Shalmaneser I. had formerly waged war, and the Cappadocian district of Kumânû, which was in alliance with it. Thus he not only restored his kingdom to the size it had attained in the time of Shalmaneser I., but expanded it still farther, especially in the direction of Armenia; and by pushing forward towards North Syria and the Mediterranean, mapped out the path for Assyrian expeditions in the future. The Bab. king Marduk-nadin-akhi (cf. above, p. 179^b) succeeded in robbing the Assyrians of the images of Ramman and his consort Shala which belonged to the (Mesopotamian?) town Ikallâti, but Tiglath-pileser inflicted a signal defeat upon him in his own country. Amidst all these expeditions, architecture and the material welfare of the country were not neglected by Tiglath-pileser, who bestowed special attention upon the restoration of the old temple of the gods Anu and Rammân in the ancient capital Assur (cf. above, p. 180^a).

Tiglath-pileser was succeeded by his son Ashurbel-kala ('Assur is Lord of All'), who removed the royal residence from Kalakh to Nineveh. He married the daughter of the Bab. king Rammân-pal-idina, but evidently died without children, since his brother Samsi-Rammân III. succeeded him on the throne. We possess an earnest petition of the son of the latter, Assur-nazir-pal II., to the goddess Istar of Nineveh, in which he prays that he may be cured of an illness. After this (c. 1050) Assyria underwent a period of decline, during which not even the names of the kings have been preserved. We only know of one of them, Assur-irbi (c. 990?), who set up an image of himself at the Gulf of Issus, and from whom the Aramæans took away the two fortresses on the Euphrates, Pitru (Pethor, Nu 22⁵, Dt 23⁴) and Mutkinu, which had been conquered in the time of Tiglath-pileser I.

The powerful development of the Aramæans at this time is also clearly reflected in OT, in the history of David (see 2 S 10¹⁶, where Hadadezer brings Aramæans from the other side of the Euphrates). The growth of the power of Israel under Saul, David, and Solomon forms a striking contrast to the decline of Assyria about B.C. 1000.

Probably the immediate successor of this Assur-irbi was Tuklat-pal-îsarra (Tiglath-pileser) II. After him we have an accurate and genealogical list of kings, without any gaps at all.

Tiglath-pileser II. c. 970.

Assur-dan II. (son of above) c. B.C. 930-913.

(Here the Eponym Canon begins).

Ramman-nirâri II. (son of above) B.C. 912-891.

Tuklat-Nindar II. (son of above) B.C. 890-885.

Assur-nâzir-pal III. (son of above) B.C. 884-860.

Under the last-named king a new period of development commenced for Assyria. Of the four predecessors of Assur-nâzir-pal, we only know that Ramman-nirâri II. waged some wars against his Bab. contemporaries Samas-mudammik and the latter's successor Nabu-šum-iskun; and that Tuklat-Nindar advanced to the sources of the Tigris, and threw his heart into the task of again reducing to subjection the mountainous districts in the north, a work which was continued by Assur-nâzir-pal and Shalmaneser II. For the conquests made by Tiglath-pileser I., after so much effort, had been lost again long ago.

Assur-nâzir-pal rebuilt Kalakh, and selected it for his royal residence in memory of his great predecessor Shalmaneser I., after whom he also named his son (Shalmaneser II.). His main ambition was to annex the whole of Mesopotamia to Assyria, which he succeeded at any rate partially in accomplishing. The little Aramæan principality Bit-Adini (which is called Benê-Eden 2 K 19²², and is situated between the Euphrates and Belikh) offered strong resistance to the Assyrians, and Assyria only succeeded in getting the payment of a temporary tribute from it. Greater results, however, were achieved among the mountain tribes on the east, between the lakes Van and Urmia, in the countries of Mannai (Minnî, Jer 51²⁷, which certainly ought to be vocalised 𐤎, near Ararat), Kirruir, and Zamua; the last-mentioned being situated to the south of the lake of Urmia. In North Syria further opposition was experienced from the little states that had sprung up on the wrecks of the Hittite empire, whose princes still bore Hittite names, though the populations were Canaanite. The most noteworthy of these was Karkhemis, where king Sangar reigned; and next to that the land of Unki ('Amk) or *Khattin on the Orontes, the capital of which was called Kunulua, and the king Lubarna. Both these territories were traversed by the Assyrians. The Assyrians advanced right up to Lebanon and the coast of Phœnicia, so that the towns of Tyre, Sidon, Gebal, Arvad, etc., were compelled to send valuable presents in order to induce the hostile forces to march away. The Bab. contemporary of Assur-nâzir-pal was Nabu-pal-idinâ. (See BABYLONIA.)

tions. Instead of being satisfied with merely sending threatening expeditions to exact a fresh payment of tribute, he introduced a systematic plan—afterwards always adopted—of placing governors over conquered territories, and thus making them actual provinces and putting them under direct Assyrian control. Moreover, it was in his reign that the first contact between Assyria and the kings of Israel (Ahab and Jehu) took place. Lastly, it was his reign that saw the first beginnings of the Armenian empire under the kings Arimi and Sarduri (Siduri, or, more accurately, Sardurri), whose successors gave Assyria so much trouble, till they brought it to the brink of ruin. Tiglath-pileser III. and Sargon were the first to succeed in breaking its power, and in helping Assyria forward to new development. The oldest Armenian inscriptions, which date from Sarduri I., are written in Assyrian cuneiform characters and Semitic-Assyrian, while his successors employ their own Armenian dialect (related to the Georgian), though they use the Assyrian method of writing as well.

We are very fortunate in possessing pictorial representations of several events in the reign of Shalmaneser. These are to be found chiefly in the magnificent reliefs on the bronze doors of Balawat (Imgur-Bel), and also in the remarkable pictures on the 'Black Obelisk,' as it is called. In five series and on four panels are to be seen ambassadors from Gurzan (on Lake Urmia), from king Jahua (Jehu) of Israel, from the land of Musri in West Armenia, from Marduk-pal-uzur of Suchi, and from Karparunda of Khattin. Both monuments are in the British Museum. The inscription on the series devoted to the land of Musri says: 'Tribute from Musri. Camels with double humps, oxen from the river Sakiya (or Irkia?), a susu (kind of antelope), female elephants, and apes.' The words of the inscription are confirmed by the pictures, which actually contain double-humped camels, wild steers, an antelope, an elephant, and four apes. This land of Musri, which must be looked for neither in Afghanistan nor in India, but to the north-east of Cilicia, is mentioned in the Bible, 1 K 10²⁸, according to which Solomon brought his horses from Muzrim and from Ku'i (Cilicia), as the emended reading runs. Double-humped camels (Assyrian udrati, from the Arm. uldu, Sanskrit ustra) were to be found in different parts of Armenia, and Assur-nazir-pal boasted, as did also Tiglath-pileser I. and Tahutmes III., that he had killed elephants in Mesopotamia. Shalmaneser made his way into the land of Tabal (the biblical Tubal), which lies to the west of Malatijeh, where he took possession of the silver, salt, and alabaster works which he found on the mountains, and took the opportunity of exacting tribute from the neighbouring Musri; then he invaded the land of Ku'i (on the Cilician coast), reaching the city of Tarzi, the well-known Tarsus, the birthplace of the apostle Paul. He advanced into Armenia as far as the sources of the Euphrates; then he proceeded eastward to Parsua, the motherland of the Persians, lying to the east of Lake Urmia, and southwards to Namar, which was formerly a Protectorate of Babylon, lying to the south of Lake Urmia. His journeys were thus more extensive than those of any of his predecessors. In Babylonia, in the year B.C. 853, Nabu-pal-idinâ was overthrown by his son Marduk-shum-idinâ, whose brother Marduk-bel-usâti, however, raised a revolt against him. Thereupon Marduk-shum-idinâ relinquished to his brother the southern part of Babylonia, formerly known as the land of *Kaldu (or Imgi), at the same time calling upon the king of Assyria for assistance. Shalmaneser attacked and killed the rebellious brother of the Babylonian king, and naturally claimed an extension of frontier in return for his services.

Of far greater interest for biblical history is the campaign of Shalmaneser against the town of Hamath (Amattu or Amâtu) on the Orontes, and its allies, in B.C. 854, the sixth year of his reign. Shalmaneser had scarcely conquered (B.C. 856) and imprisoned one of his most stubborn opponents, king Akhuni of Bit-Adini (see above), when a powerful army came out to meet him near Karkar (on the line of march from Aleppo to Hamath):

	Chariots.	Horsemen.	Foot.
Bir-idri of Damascus	1200	1200	20,000
Irkhulini of Hamath	700	700	10,000
Akhabbu of Sir'il	2000	..	10,000
Gu'i	500
Musri	1,000
Irkanat	10	..	10,000
Matin-ba'al of Arvad	200
Usanat	200
Adunu-ba'al of Shiana	30	..	10,000
Ba'sa (son of Rukhub) of Ammon	1,000
Camels	1,000
Gindibu the Arab	1,000

A mere glance at this table shows that the three most important princes of this league were Bir-idri (Benhadad) of Damascus, Irkhulini of Hamath, and Akhabbu of Sir'il. Besides these, two Phœnician cities were prominent in supplying troops, Irkanat (probably = Arka, גרן Gn 10¹⁷) and Shiana (or Siana, שן of Gn 10¹⁷, which must be corrected to שן). Akhabbu of Sir'il is no other than king Ahab of Israel, who chose Jezebel (the modern Zer'in) for his royal residence; and who, in his last year (B.C. 854), before he went to the war against the Syrians, in which he lost his life, had undertaken the obligation of leading an army against the Assyrians. Shalmaneser's victory over Damascus and Hamath does not seem to have been very permanent, since on two occasions, in B.C. 849 and 846, his annals give an account of the repulse of the Syrians and their twelve allies. On the first occasion (B.C. 849), in all probability, the Israelites were present in the battle under the leadership, not of Ahab, but of his son Joram. Joram, however, soon after was attacked by Benhadad, and Samaria was in a state of siege. The Syrians withdrew only upon receiving information that a hostile force was marching against Damascus. The foes, however, were not Hittites and Musrites (2 K 7⁶, i.e. from the land of Musri in West Armenia), as the Syrians in their panic at first believed, but there is the highest probability that they were the Assyrians who, in the year 846, made a new expedition against Damascus. Finally, in the year 842 Shalmaneser made a fresh attack on Syria, this time against Bir-idri's (Benhadad's) successor Khaza-ilu (Hazael), whom he defeated, and ultimately besieged in Damascus. The surrounding country was devastated, and Shalmaneser took the opportunity of exacting tribute from Tyre, Sidon, and 'Jahua of the house of Omri.' On the black obelisk already mentioned there are pictures of the ambassadors of this same Jahua, bringing gifts, with the following inscription: 'Tribute of Jahua, son of Khumri: silver, gold, a vessel of gold, a ladle of gold, golden drinking cups, golden buckets, tin (or lead), a staff for the king's hand, and spear-shafts (budilkhâti) I received.'

That this Jahua, in spite of the inaccuracy of the expression 'son (i.e. according to the Assyrian use of the word, 'of the dynasty') of Omri,' must be identified with Jehu of Israel, is a fact which does a dialectic variant. By this we see, at the same time, that the Heb. expression Ur-Kasdim had its origin long before the time of Shalmaneser.

not admit of the least doubt. Although at first a good deal of difficulty was felt on account of the dates (Ahab B.C. 854, Jehu 842), the identification of Ahab with Akhabbu of Sir'il, and of Jahua with Jehu, must now be regarded as settled. The chronology of the period of the kings of Israel, as is generally admitted, has been confused by later redactors, a fact which is clearly proved from the summary of the length of the reigns* alone. Now that the dates 854 and 842 have been absolutely fixed, we have obtained data of the highest value for restoring the original numbers in the text of the Bible (see below, under Tiglath-pileser III.).

The great Shalmaneser II., who lost his life in a rebellion, was succeeded by his son Samsi-Ramman IV. (B.C. 824-812, who led expeditions against the Bab. kings Ba'u-akhi-idina and Marduk-balat-su-ikbi, and also against the land of Kaidu. Advancing into Media as far as the so-called 'White Mountain,' Elwend, near Ecbatana (Hamadan), he sought to make the lands of Mannai and Parsua, to the north and east of Lake Urmia, secure against the ambition of the Armenian king Ispuinis, son of Sardu'arri I., who was eager to conquer them.

His son Ramman-nirari III. (B.C. 811-783) succeeded in advancing still farther into the heart of Media—right up to the Caspian Sea. He was very young when he came to the throne. In all probability his mother, the Bab. princess Sammuramat (the Semiramis of Greek legend), held the regency for him at first. In Armenia, his powerful rival Menuas, who lived at Turuspa (Thosp) on the Lake of Van, caused him much trouble, wrestling from the Assyrians several powerful vassal states, e.g. Khani-rabbat (Melitene) and Dayaini. It is to be regretted that the account of Ramman-nirari's campaigns against Syria and Palestine are so very scanty: 'From the upper part of the Euphrates to the land of Khatti (North Syria), Amurri (Coele Syria) to its farthest borders, Tyre, Sidon, the land of Omri (Israel), Udumu (Edom), and Palastu (Philistia), right up to the great western sea, I reduced to subjection and exacted tribute and imposts: I marched against the "land of asses" (Damascus), and shut up Mari'a, king of the land of asses (mat imiri-su), in his chief town Damascus. Dread of renowned Assur struck him to the earth: he clasped my feet and gave himself up. . . . His countless wealth and goods I seized in Damascus; his residence in the midst of his royal palace.' The Assy. list of officers for the year 804 mentions an expedition to the town of Ba'ali (= בעליר at the foot of Hermon?), and for the year 797 one to Manzu'ati (מנזואתי?), which is evidently a town of the Israelites. In one of these years Ramman-nirari's expedition against Damascus, Edom, and Philistia must have taken place. It happened either at the end of the reign of the Isr. king Jehoahaz, or at the commencement of the reign of his successor Joash. According to the Bible, Benhadad son of Hazael was king of Damascus at the time. If this be so, Mari'a is only a title, like the Aramaic Marya', 'Lord,' unless we see in Mari'a a brother of Hazael of whom nothing else is known.

Under the successors of Ramman-nirari, Shalmaneser III. (B.C. 782-773), Assur-dan III. (B.C. 772-755), and Assur-nirari II. (B.C. 754-745), Assyria was always losing more territory to the Armenians. Armenia was ruled at this time by

* From Rehoboam to the sixth year of Hezekiah there are 260 years, while from Jeroboam I. to Hoshea (conquest of Samaria) there are only 241. As a matter of fact, from the death of Solomon to B.C. 722 there are only 218 years. The mistake arises with regard to Pekah. Instead of Pekahiah 2 years, Pekah 20 years, we ought simply to read Pekah 2 years. Pekahiah is only the fuller form of the name Pekah.

the mighty kings Argistis (c. B.C. 780-760) and Sardu'arri II. (B.C. 760-730), and ultimately all 'the lands of Na'iri' to the north of the Tigris, from Melitene to Lake Urmia, came into its possession.

This period of deepest eclipse (while Israel flourished at the same time under Jeroboam II.) was followed by an era of prosperity, which lasted for a long time without a break under the usurper Pulu or (to give him his official title) Tuklat-palisharra III., called in the Bible Tiglath-pileser (B.C. 745-727), who raised Assyria to a height unreachd before, and may therefore be called, and with much reason, the real founder of the great Assyrian monarchy (in its largest sense). For the first time in history Tiglath-pileser brought Babylonia, where Nabu-nazir (Nabonassar) reigned from B.C. 747-732 and Nabu-nadin-zir from B.C. 733-732, directly under the sway of the Assyrian sceptre. He also reconquered the territories that had been lost to Armenia, and annexed to the Assyrian empire a great part of Syria, where before there had only been at the best of times some vassal states—never any properly constituted provinces. In Babylonia, Tiglath-pileser had next to deal with the Aramean tribes on the frontiers of Babylon and Elam, among whom the Pukudu (Pekod, Ezk 23²³, Jer 50²¹) and Gambulu played the chief part, and to whom also belonged the Nabatu,* who at later times emigrated to the north-west of Arabia. The instigators of this rebellion were probably the small states of the Kaldi, or Chaldeans, in the south and middle of Babylonia. The prime mover was a certain Ukinzir (Chinzeros) from Bit-Amukkan, who ultimately, in B.C. 731, succeeded in seizing the Bab. throne. Already after the defeat of the Arameans in 745, Tiglath-pileser had assumed the title 'King of Sumer and Akkad,' but now, after his victory over Ukin-zir, he got himself crowned 'King of Babylon' with great solemnity at the new-year festival of B.C. 728.

In the year B.C. 744 Tiglath-pileser marched through the land of Namri (see above) right into the interior of Media to the Bikni mountains, to Demavend, that lies to the south of the Caspian Sea, in order to reassert Assyrian influence, which had been destroyed by the Armenians. He reconquered also (B.C. 737) the provinces of Parsua and Bustus, that lie between Armenia and Media. In the North of Syria the Armenians had been driven out by Mati-el of Jakhan (also written Akhan), who was called, in accordance with his descent, Prince of Bit-Agasi. Tiglath-pileser besieged him in his royal residence at Arpad (Tell Erfud, north of Aleppo, the biblical Arpad), which, after three years' resistance, fell into his hands in B.C. 740. He had previously (B.C. 743) repelled the Armenian army which tried to impede the siege of Arpad, and had defeated it in a decisive battle on the Upper Euphrates.

Tiglath-pileser was now able for the first time to advance into the interior of Syria. In the year B.C. 738 he conquered the town of Kullani (Calno, Is 10⁹), which lies to the north of Hamath, and overpowered 'Asriya'u of Ja'udi.'† Nineteen districts of Hamath fell before him and were captured, while Kullani, which was evidently the residence of Asriya'u, became the seat of an Assyrian governor. Thereupon all the independent kings of Syria who lived in the neighbouring regions (Kustaspi of Kummukh, Razunnu of Damascus,

* The Arabian Nabayati mentioned in Assurbanipal's inscription are a totally different people. They are the Nebaioth of the OT. The Nabatu (Arab. بنات) on the other hand, are the well-known Nabatæans. They were of Aramean origin, as the Nabatæan inscriptions inform us.

† Not Judah (יהודה), but a country in the north of Syria (מא), as the inscription of king Panammu of Sam'al makes obvious.

Minikhimmi of Samirina, Hiram of Tyre, Sibittib'il of Gebal, Urik of Ku'i, Pisiris of Carchemish, Ini-el of Hamath, Panammu of Sam'al, Tarkhulara of Gurgum), and some also who lived in more remote districts, viz. the princes of Milid (Malat'iyeh) and Tabal (Tubal), and a North-Arabian queen, Zabibi,* came to do homage to the great king. Another expedition to the West followed in the year B.C. 734, which was specially directed against Philistia, where king Khanunu (Hanno) of Gaza was defeated.

The main campaign against Damascus and Israel, however, belongs to the years B.C. 733 and 732. In Israel, Pekah (Assyr. Pakakhu) had just succeeded Menahem on the throne. Rezin (Razunnu), king of Syria, was defeated. Damascus was besieged (B.C. 733) and captured (B.C. 732). In Israel, Tiglath-pileser took a series of towns, including the whole land of Naphtali (2 K 15²⁹), and Pekah was compelled to pay a very considerable tribute. In the year B.C. 731 he was murdered, and Hoshea (Assyr. Ausi'v) was confirmed by Tiglath-pileser as king of Israel. After the fall of Damascus (B.C. 732), which forthwith became the seat of an Assyrian governor, the following princes, Sanib of Ammon, Salamán of Moab, Mitinti of Ashkelon, Ja'ukhazi (i.e. Joahaz=fuller form of Ahaz) of Judah, and Kaus-malak of Edom, were compelled to pay tribute. Ahaz had some time previously called in Tiglath-pileser to protect him against Pekah and Rezin, who had robbed him of the harbour of Elath. The Arabian queen Samsi was also conquered by the Assyrians, who took the opportunity of advancing into the north of Arabia for the first time. Thereupon certain Arab tribes, even the remote Sabæans, sent him rich presents.

The following synchronisms in Tiglath-pileser's annals, which may be safely trusted, are of supreme importance for the chronology of Israel and Judah:—

738	B.C.,	Menahem of Israel.
733-2	„	Pekah of Israel.
732	„	Ahaz of Judah.
731 (?)	„	Hoshea of Israel.

To this it may be added that Rezin of Damascus, as is stated both in the Bible and in the inscriptions, was the contemporary of all these kings.

If we accept B.C. 854 as the last year of Ahab, B.C. 842 as the first year of Jehu, and B.C. 722 as the date of the destruction of Samaria, we may construct the chronology of Israel as follows:—

842 B.C.,	1st year of Jehu, who reigned 28 years.
814	„ 1st year of Joahaz, „ 17 „
797	„ 1st year of Joash, „ 16 „
782	„ 16th year of Joash and „ 41 „
742	„ 41st year of „ „
	Zeehariah reigned 6 months.
741	„ Shallum one month.
	1st year of Menahem, „ 10 „
732	„ 10th „ „ „
	1st year of Pekah.
731	„ 2nd year of Pekah.
730	„ 1st year of Hoshea, „ 9 „
722	„ 9th year of Hoshea and „ „ conquest of Samaria.

There is room in this arrangement for only a two-years' reign of Pekah. Exactly the same things are related of Pekahiah as of Pekah, and the two names are virtually the same (see above). It is clear that the original text of the Bk. of Kings had only one Pekah (or Pekahiah), who reigned

* Probably she was the princess of the Bir'æans (for which we may, however, substitute Sab'æans, סבא, not to be confounded with the Sab'æans, סבא), an Arabian tribe which is always mentioned first in the inscriptions of Tiglath-pileser that speak of the tribute of the Arabians. (Mas'æans=מסא, Temæans=טמא, Sabæans=שבא, Khayappæans=חאפא, etc.)

two years, between Menahem and Hoshea. The addition of Pekah's twenty years to Pekahiah's two was the work of a later editor, and, as a result, all the synchronisms of Israel and Judah for this period naturally fell into disorder. Instead of there being an irreconcilable antagonism between the Bible and the inscriptions in relation to chronology, the latter rather help us to correct an old error in the text of the Bible (not in the Bible itself as the word of God—only in the text), while they have essentially confirmed the truth of the biblical narrative throughout.

We have still to speak of a policy which Tiglath-pileser was the first to introduce, and which essentially contributed to the strengthening of the Assyrian empire. In forming new provinces, he and his successors adopted the following plan. As the cuneiform inscriptions and the Books of Kings (e.g. 2 K 15²⁹ 17⁶) relate, all sections of the population were transplanted into distant provinces, and, conversely, the territories thus left empty were settled with other prisoners of war.

Finally, with regard to king Panammu of Sam'al, mentioned above in connexion with the year B.C. 738, the Berlin Museum now possesses several inscriptions from Zinjirli (south of Mar'ash, Assyr. Markasi) belonging to Panammu's son Bir-Rokeb (ברכב), which are written in old Phœn. characters, and composed in a dialect which is a mixture of Can. and Aramaic. These inscriptions mention Tiglath-pileser,—the word being spelt in the same way as in the OT, תיגלתיסר (it is also on one occasion spelt תיגלתיסר)—calling him בלך אשר, and on one occasion 'Lord of the four quarters of the earth' כרם ארץ ארבע רבעי ארץ (Assyr. shar-kibrat-irbitti, king of the four quarters of the world). Panammu, son of Bir-zur, died in the camp of Tiglath-pileser at Damascus B.C. 733 or 732, whereupon Bir-Rokeb was appointed king of Sam'al by the Assyrian king. The inscriptions of Zinjirli relate that Bir-zur, the grandfather of Bir-Rokeb, was murdered by a usurper (probably the Asriya'u mentioned in the annals of Tiglath-pileser) from the neighbouring country of Ja'udi (יאדי), whereupon Panammu turned to Tiglath-pileser for protection. It seems that in previous times another Panammu, son of Karal, had ruled over Ja'udi (יאדי), one of whose inscriptions (in somewhat ancient writing) has lately been found. Both these Panammu belonged to the dynasty of Gabbar, which in the time of Shalmaneser II. was in possession of Sam'al, and whose kings were called כלכי כבר (kings of Kabbar). The gods of Sam'al and Ja'udi are Hadad-El, Rokeb-El (who was also called בעל בית=Lord of the House), Shemesh, and Reshep—the last-named being a special god of Ja'udi. The name of the usurper Asriya'u (most probably=ערייה) points to an Israelitish descent. A usurper of Hamath in the time of Sargon was called sometimes Uá-bi'di, sometimes Ia'u-bi'di, which also points to his Isr. origin. The redactors of the Books of Kings appear to have possessed information about this Asriya'u of Ja'udi, since they evidently identified him with king Uzziyah* of Judah, and in many places the name ערייה has been substituted in the text for עייה. Sam'al, too (=Northland), was not unknown to the Bible, for Nu 24²⁴ evidently ought to read: 'A vessel (?) shall come from Sam'al (סמאל) and boats from Kittim (Cyprus) which shall afflict Asshur (not Assyria, but=Asshurim, Gn 25², 2 S 2⁹), and shall afflict Eber; moreover, he himself also (=Og of Bashan, cf. LXX) shall come to destruction.' The whole passage refers to the attacks made by the populations of the Mediter.

* Prophetic literature clearly shows that Uzziyah was his only name, as also does the well-known old Heb. seal 'of Shebanyô, servant of Uzziyô, עזרי עבד שביני'.

(Europe and Asia Minor) upon Syria and Egypt in the days of Ramses III.

Tiglath-pileser was followed by Shalman-asharid IV., the Shalmaneser of the Bible (B.C. 726-722), who was probably his son. As king of Babylon he was called Ululai (Elulæus), i.e. 'he who was born in the month Elul.' Immediately after his accession to the throne, before the year B.C. 727 was over (726 was the first official year of his reign), he conquered the Assyr. town Shabarain (Sepharvaim, 2 K 17²⁴?). In the year B.C. 724 he began to invest Samaria, which fell at the end of a three years' siege, in the first month of the reign of his successor Sargon, who took all the credit for this achievement, as well as for the transportation of the ten tribes, without thinking of his predecessor. The Bible account, however, very justly connects the name of Shalmaneser with the fall of the Northern Kingdom (B.C. 722).

Israel now, like the kingdom of Damascus before, became an Assyr. province, Samaria being the seat of the governor.

The zenith of Assyr. power was reached in the reign of the usurper Sargon* (Assyr. Sharru-ukin = 'the king has restored order'), B.C. 721-705, who is only once mentioned in the Bible (Is 20¹), in connexion with the taking of Ashdod. In the very year that he entered upon his reign ('at the beginning of his reign,' as the official expression runs), B.C. 722, he carried off the inhabitants of Samaria, 27,290 men, to the rivers Belikh and Khabor, the river of Gozan, and the cities of Media (2 K 17⁹), settling Babylonian (Cuthaites) and other colonists in the territories of the conquered city.

Sargon's main political ambition was the consolidation of Babylonia, as well as the provinces of Assyria which bordered upon Armenia, and finally Syria. This ambition was realised by the final reduction of Armenia, whose king at that time was Rusa (or Ursa), the son of Irimenas, and also by the humiliation of the Mannæans † (2 K Jer 51²⁷), who were the most powerful allies Armenia possessed, and of the Sagartæans (Assyr. Zikirtu), an Eranian nomadic tribe which lived to the east of the Mannæans; and finally by the war against Elam. The last-named state was henceforth the most dangerous foe the power of Assyria possessed, and was always in firm alliance with the small states of South Babylonia (the so-called Chaldeans), and above all with Bit-yakin. The prince of Bit-yakin, Marduk-pal-idina, immediately after the death of Shalmaneser, had seized the throne of Babylonia for himself. In B.C. 721 Sargon, who had till then been occupied with other duties, marched against him and his ally Khumbanigas of Elam. The battle was indecisive; and Sargon had to march against the Armenians; so that it was not till B.C. 710 that he was successful in defeating Marduk-pal-idina, and getting himself crowned king of Babylon (B.C. 709-705). This Marduk-pal-idina is the Merodach-baladan of the Bible, whose embassy to Hezekiah, which is related in 2 K 20¹², as a supplement to Sennacherib's campaign, belongs either to B.C. 715 (first year of Hezekiah's reign) or to 703, in which year Merodach-baladan was king of Babylon a second time.

Of Sargon's other campaigns, those against

* The Hebrew קַרְנִי is based upon a similar word in popular use, Sargānu (= 'mighty').

† In the year B.C. 745 a Mannæan governor Daiukku is mentioned in the annals of Sargon, and in B.C. 713 a land of Bit-Daiukku between Man and Illip (in the west of Media). In Assyrian it is called Mdt Bit-Daiukku, 'Land of the Dynasty (House of the Prince) of Daiukku.' This Daiukku is evidently the Deiokes (Deioeces) of Greek tradition, who, according to the later story, was the first king of Media. Gamir also (Gomer, Gn 10⁹) is mentioned as having broken into Armenia even in the time of Sargon.

Syria, Palestine, and Arabia have special interest for the OT student. The first, B.C. 720, was an expedition to suppress an insurrection which a certain Ilû-bi'di,* who is also called Ia'u-bi'di, had raised in Hamath. This Ilû-bi'di had not only induced the Assyr. provinces of Arpad, Simyra, Damascus, and Samaria to revolt, but had also formed an alliance with Khanûnu (Hanno) of Gaza and Sib'i (סִיבַי 2 K 17³, i.e. Sev'e) of Egypt. Probably Judah, where Ahaz was still on the throne, was also included in the alliance, since Sargon once calls himself (indeed before he speaks of Hamath at all) the 'Conqueror of the remote land of Judah.' The Egypt. army was, however, defeated at Rapikhu (Raphia, south of Gaza), and Hanno found himself in an Assyr. prison, while Ilû-bi'di and his other allies were defeated and destroyed at Karkar (in the neighbourhood of Hamath).

In the year 715 Sargon undertook a campaign into the interior of North Arabia 'against the remote Arabians of the Desert, of whom the wise and learned knew nothing.' The tribes of Thamûd, Ibâdid, Marsiman (Gn 25¹³ כְּנַעַן, according to LXX Μασσαμ, 1 Ch 4²⁵ Μασσαμ?), and Khayappa (חַיָּאָה, LXX Γαίφα) were conquered, and partially settled in Samaria. Thereupon Pir'u (cf. פִּירִי Jos 10⁶, scarcely equivalent to Pharaoh) of Musur (the territory called Ma'in-Muzrân of the South Arabian inscriptions, in the north of the peninsula of Sinai?), queen Samsi of Aribi (a part of North Arabia), and the Sabæan Ita'amar (יְעֻזָּאִיר of the South Arabian inscriptions), 'the kings of the sea-coast and the desert,' brought rich presents, among which were 'sweet-smelling spices of the mountains' (frankincense), gold, precious stones, horses, and camels.

In the year B.C. 711, the same year in which the North Syrian state Gurgum (capital town Markasi, modern Mar'ash) became an Assyr. province, † a certain Yamani, who is also called Yatna, ‡ overthrew king Akhimiti of Ashdod. When the Assyrians despatched an expedition against Ashdod (cf. Is 20), Philistia (Pilistiu), Judah (Ja'ûdu), Edom (Udumu), and Moab (Mâ'ab), instead of sending their presents to Assur, sent them to king Pir'u of Musur, who has been already mentioned, because they trusted to him and to Arabia (Cush, Is 20⁶ and often in the OT). Ashdod and Gath (Gimtu) were conquered and made into an Assyr. province, but Yamani fled to the 'king of Milukh' (north-west of Arabia, cf. Job 39⁶ מִלֻּכָה, parallel to מִלֻּכָה). It is evidently the same Pir'u of Musur who is alluded to in a parallel passage which runs, 'He (Yamani) fled to the territory of Musur which belongs to the district of Milukh,' the last phrase being added to distinguish this Musur from the Musur which is the equivalent of Egypt.

Besides these campaigns of Sargon's, which are of great importance for the study of the Bible, we may further mention that in B.C. 709 he received presents from seven Cyprian kings. An image of him, which is now in Berlin, was discovered on the island of Cyprus (see above, p. 178ⁿ).

The new residence which Sargon built for himself in Khorsabad (see above, p. 178ⁿ) was consecrated in the year B.C. 707. In the year B.C. 705, however, he fell by the hand of an assassin, who was probably instigated by his own son Sennacherib. The latter, strangely enough, never mentions his father in his inscriptions. As far as the character of Sargon is concerned, it is sufficiently clear from his inscriptions that as 'Father of his country' he deserves the praise of being called a 'righteous and noble prince' (cf. especially on this point the very instructive cylinder inscription which has been translated by Lyon).

* On this name, see above. Others read Ilu-ubi'di and Ja-ubi'di (or Ila-ubi'di) with much less probability.

† Already, in B.C. 717, a similar fate had befallen the powerful town of Carchemish (cf. Is 10⁹). Kummukh (Commagene), too, came under the power of Assyria in B.C. 708.

Sin-akhi-irba ('Sin multiply the brothers'), the biblical Sennacherib, reigned from B.C. 704-681. He it was who removed the royal residence from Kalakh back again to Nineveh, which, by extensive building operations, and at the expense of Babylon, which he destroyed in a very barbarous fashion, he elevated into the capital of the united empire of Assyria and Babylonia. The great palace, too, in the south-west of Kouyunjik deserves to be specially mentioned—the 'peerless palace,' which in later times the grandson of Sennacherib, Assurbanipal, surrounded with buildings. Nor must we forget the great arsenal (bit kutalli) at Nebi-yunus, which Esarhaddon extended, and the magnificent waterworks in the neighbourhood of Nineveh.

The most important political undertakings of Sennacherib were his wars against Elam and Babylonia on the one side, and his expeditions to the West on the other. The only other campaign worth mentioning was one against Cilicia (properly Khilakku, the mountainous district in the interior* of Cilicia) and Tabal (the biblical Tubal), which probably belongs to the year B.C. 695. Probably it is this expedition that is referred to in the remark of Berosus, that Sennacherib, 'after a severe struggle conquered the Ionians who dwelt on the Cilician coast, and then [re]founded Tarsus.' The Assyrians had also to deal with this district a second time in the days of Sennacherib, in the year B.C. 681; for at the moment when Sennacherib was murdered, the crown prince Esarhaddon was in Khani-rabbat (east of Tabal) with his troops.

In Babylonia, Merodach-baladan the Chaldee, who is so well known from the inscriptions of Sargon, had established himself once more upon the throne, having allied himself for this purpose with Kudur-nankhundi of Elam and the Aramæan nomad tribes. Sennacherib conquered Merodach-baladan and his allies, and placed a certain Bel-ibni on the throne of Babylon. After several vicissitudes, when the Elamites, as allies of Babylonia, always had a hand in the game (Merodach-baladan himself on one occasion taking part in the struggle again), in B.C. 691 the bloody battle of Khalûlin, which ended unsuccessfully, or at any rate indecisively, for Sennacherib, was fought against the united armies of the Elamites, Babylonians, Aramæans, Chaldeans, and certain districts of Media. The Median districts Anzan (also written Anshan), where the dynasty of Cyrus originated, and Illip, were now, as allies of Elam, for the first time called after Parsua, the motherland of the later Persians. At last, in the year B.C. 689, Sennacherib succeeded in taking possession of Babylon, and in wreaking fearful vengeance upon it. It was levelled to the ground, and only rebuilt again in later times under Sennacherib's gentler and nobler-hearted son Esarhaddon.

Sennacherib's great expedition to the West, which was undertaken in the year 701, began with the punishment of king Luli (Elulæus) of Sidon, who fled 'into the sea,' possibly to Cyprus or else to the island of Tyre, which, if we are to trust our Greek sources of information, was besieged by the Assyrian king in vain.

In Sidon a new king, Tuba'al (Ethobaal), was appointed, to whom Sarepta, Akko, and other Phœn. states were given. Arvad and Gebal

* Ku'i (mp 1 K 10²⁸), on the other hand, is the Cilician coastland. Khilakku probably occurs in the Bible, Ezk 27¹¹ ארור חילק ארדא, Arvad and Khelak. Thus both names for Cilicia are found in the OT.

(Byblus), however, like Ashdod of Philistia and the states bordering on Judæa, Ammon, Moab, and Edom, offered a voluntary tribute. The town of Ashkelon in Philistia, whose king Sidka (Zedekiah) refused to pay tribute, together with Joppa (Yappû) and other towns, were conquered and plundered. The town of Ekron (Amkarrûna) handed its king Padi, who had submitted to the Assyrians, over to Hezekiah (Khazakiya'u) of Judah. Ekron and Judah called in to their assistance the king of Musur (see above) and the archers of the king of Milukh, but were defeated by Sennacherib at Eltekeh (Altaku). Sennacherib next besieged and conquered 46 fenced cities and villages of Judah, and carried off 200,150 of their inhabitants as prisoners, until at last he pitched his camp in Lachish (Assyr. Lakishu), the extreme south-western corner of Judah. Up to this point the passage in 2 K 18³³ agrees with the Assyrian narrative: 'In the fourteenth year of king Hezekiah (B.C. 701) did Sennacherib, king of Assyria, come up against all the fenced cities of Judah, and took them.' Then the Bible account goes on to say that Hezekiah sent a message of peace to Sennacherib at Lachish, and that Sennacherib promised to abstain from further hostilities on the payment of 300 talents of silver and 30 talents of gold (2 K 18⁴⁻¹⁶). In spite of this, as the biblical narrative continues (2 K 18¹⁷ to 19³), Sennacherib sent his chief officer with an army to invest Jerusalem, but was obliged to return to Assyria again without having effected his purpose. The main points of this record agree with Sennacherib's own account: 'and Hezekiah himself I shut up like a bird in a cage in Jerusalem (Ur-Salimmu), his royal city. I threw up entrenchments against him, and when any one came out of the gate of the city, I punished him. The cities that had been taken away from him I cut off from his land and gave them to the kings of Ashdod, Ekron (Padi), and Gaza. In addition to his former assessment (see above, 'the 300 talents of silver and the 30 talents of gold'), I added other tribute, and exacted it from him. Dread of the greatness of my majesty overwhelmed Hezekiah; while the Bedawin (? Assyrian amel Urbi) and his own special warriors, whom he had collected together to defend Jerusalem, rendered him no assistance (irû ballati). In addition to the 30 talents of gold and 800 * talents of silver, precious stones, antimony † . . . his daughters and women from his harem, male and female slaves, he sent his ambassadors after me, to bring to Nineveh an extra gift of tribute and an expression of his fealty.'

To a later period (this we must infer from the fact that mention is made of the Ethiopian king Tirhakah, called Tarkû by Esarhaddon and Assurbanipal), belongs the account given in the Bible (2 K 19³⁻³⁷). It really appears as if Sennacherib had undertaken, shortly before his death, an expedition against the Arabians (cf. the inscriptions of Esarhaddon, and Herodotus II. 141), and had made use of the opportunity to march a second time against Hezekiah as well.

Shortly after this, on the 20th of Tebet 681 B.C., he was murdered by his own son, or, according to the account in 2 K 19³⁷, by his two sons, Adrammelech and Sharezer. The rebellion lasted till the 2nd of Adar, about a month and a half, because Esarhaddon, who had been appointed by Sennacherib to succeed him, was at that time absent in Armenia, whither the conspirators marched against him, only, however, to be defeated.

Esarhaddon thereupon ascended the throne

* The annual tribute of 300 talents of silver imposed on Hezekiah was thus increased by 500 talents.

† Here follows an enumeration of a series of other special presents.

amidst general rejoicing, on 18th of Adar 681 B.C., and set himself to the task of rebuilding the town of Babylon, towards which he had always shown special favour.

Ashur-akhi-idina (i.e. 'Asur give still a brother'), the Esarhaddon of the Bible, reigned from B.C. 680-669. During his reign a great danger threatened Assyria, on account of an invasion of the Cimmerians (Gimirraï; their land was called Gamir; see above, p. 187*, note), who joined with the Medes and burst like a storm upon the country. These Cimmerians were Eranian nomads, who, according to classical tradition, had originally come from the north coast of the Black Sea, and who had threatened even in the time of Sargon to cross the Caucasus into Armenia. There was a certain Dusanni of Saparda (דַּסְאִי, Ob v.²⁰), an Ispakāi of Ishkūza (אִשְׁכּוּזָא), a Median chief Mamitiarsu, and a Kāstarit of Karkassi (the Karkasia of the inscriptions of Sargon) in Media, who, in conjunction with the Mannæans, and with Tiuspa, leader of the Gimirraï, threatened the east frontier of Assyria, and more especially Kishassu, which, since the time of Sargon, had been an Assyrian town, and which probably they were successful in taking. Ashur-akhi-idina, however, advanced into Media as far as Fatus'arra (Ἰατασσοῦρα, Strabo xv. 3), 'to the borders of the salt desert at the verge of the Bikni mountains' (or Demavend). In the north-west he conquered the Cilicians, who had allied themselves with Ishkallu of Tabal, Muggallu of Milida, and the Kuzzurakāi, enlisting Greek soldiers against them, as Berosus narrates.

Ashur-akhi-idina's chief successes, however, were in the West. After he had conquered and beheaded (676) the king of Sidon, Abdi-Milkut, he besieged king Ba'al in Tyre, and brought to a successful issue a very hazardous expedition to the remote land of Bāzu (בָּזוּ of Job 32²), in the interior of Arabia. He also led on two occasions (B.C. 674 and 671) expeditions to Egypt against the Pharaoh Tirhakah. He conquered Memphis (B.C. 671), and established over it an Assyrian vassal-king, Necho by name. The Assyrian troops advanced as far as Thebes (נִי'י, נִי), so that Tirhakah was compelled to flee into his Ethiopian motherland. Ashur-akhi-idina was the first Assyrian king able to assume the proud title 'King of Assyria, Egypt, Paturisi (= Upper Egypt, פְּטוּרִיס), and Kūs (Nubia or Ethiopia).' He boasted of the palaces he built, and especially of the great arsenal in Nebi-yunus, for the rebuilding of which, he tells us, 22 kings (of whom 10 were princes of towns in Cyprus) were compelled to send materials: Ba'al of Tyre, Manasseh (Minasi) of Judah, Kausgabri of Edom, Musur of Moab, and the kings of Ammon, Gaza, Ashkelon, Ekron, Ashdod, Gebal, and Arvad.

Manasseh is also mentioned in the time of Assurbanipal, though only briefly, at the commencement of his reign (B.C. 668); and as the Bible account says that he reigned till 642, his transportation to Babylon, mentioned in the Books of Chronicles, must have taken place under Assurbanipal, and not under Esarhaddon.

Esarhaddon was about to invade Egypt a third time, in B.C. 669, when he was taken ill on the journey. He died on the 10th of Arahsamma (Marcheshvan) in the same year.

His son and successor, Assur-bani-pal (the Sardanapalus of the Greeks, the Osnappar of the Bible, Ezr 4¹⁰), B.C. 668-626, was marked out by Esarhaddon as heir to the throne with great solemnity on the 12th of Iyyar B.C. 669. After coming to the throne, he allowed his brother Samaš-sum-ukin (Sammughes, or Saosduchinos), in accordance with Esarhaddon's wishes, to be crowned king of Babylon (in Iyyar B.C. 668). He was the last great king of Assyria. In his reign we clearly see the downfall of the Assyrian world-empire approaching. Assur-bani-pal had been educated from early youth in the arts and sciences of the Babylonians, and it is entirely owing to his literary tastes that we possess so many remains of old Bab. literature in new Assyrian copies (see above, p. 178*). He was a real Oriental despot, keeping his generals and armies busy in the provinces and along the frontiers, while he himself lived at home, with his wives, his sciences, and the service of his gods.

One of the first of Assur-bani-pal's undertakings was directed against Egypt. Tirhakah had regained possession of Memphis. The expedition, which had been broken off owing to the death of Esarhaddon, was resumed. Tirhakah was defeated and pursued to Thebes, whence, however, as before, he escaped to Ethiopia. The smaller princes of the delta were enrolled as Assyrian vassal-kings. Some of them (such as Necho of Sais) who tried to throw off the Assyrian yoke, and called in Tirhakah to help them, were compelled to go in chains to Nineveh. Necho obtained favour with Assurbanipal again, and was reinvested with the rule of Sais.* Meanwhile Tirhakah had died, and his nephew Tandamani (Tanut-Amon), son of Sabako, conquered Thebes and On (Heliopolis). Assurbanipal marched against Egypt a second time, drove out the king of Ethiopia, and made Necho's son Psamtik (Assyrian Pisamilku) Pharaoh B.C. 663. Afterwards Psamtik, by the help of the Ionian and Carian troops which Gyges, king of the Lydians, had sent to him, succeeded in freeing himself from the control of Assyria. The Gyges, just mentioned (Assyrian Gūgu), requested help from Assurbanipal, when the Cimmerians (see above) invaded Lydia in B.C. 657. His son Ardys drove out the Cimmerians from Lydia, and afterwards conquered the whole of Asia Minor up to the river Halys.

The might of Assyria spent itself, in the time of Assurbanipal, in the conflict with Babylonia and Elam. It was only after a furious struggle that Assurbanipal succeeded in defeating his insurrectionary brother Samas-sum-ukin (who in B.C. 648 threw himself, in despair on account of his defeat, into the flames of burning Babylon), and his allies the Elamites, and in conquering Susa B.C. 640, thus putting an end to the kingdom of Elam. Samas-sum-ukin's other allies, the Chaldæans, the Babylonian Aramæans, the kings of the West (probably Manasseh was amongst them) and of Arabia (specially of Kidru, i.e. קִדְרוּ, and Nabayati, i.e. נְבַיָּטִי) were also subdued. These contests, however, so weakened the resources of Assyria, that revolt following on revolt was the order of the day, especially in the Mannæan and Median districts (between Armenia and Elam). Some expeditions against Akhsir, king of the Mannæans, against Biriskhadri, a Median, and against the sons of Gāgi (cf. Ezk 38 and 39, Gog and Magog, i.e. the land of Gog) and of Sakhi (the Sakes?), could not keep back for many decades the storm that was even now beginning to rage. With regard to the attacks instigated by Tugdammī (cf. Lygdamis, captain of the Cimmerians, Strabo i. 3. 21?) and his son Sanda-kshatra against Assyria, our information is based on dark hints contained in a prayer of Assurbanipal to Merodach, the god of the city of Babylon. Whether Assurbanipal reigned from B.C. 648-625 over Babylonia, under the name Kandalānu, known to us from contract-tablets and through Ptolemy, or whether this was the name of a rival king, cannot be definitely determined. We only know that after the death of Assurbanipal, the Chaldean Nabopolassar (Nabû-pal-uzur), who was originally one of Assurbanipal's generals, obtained for himself the Bab. throne (B.C. 625-605). In Assyria itself Assurbanipal was succeeded by his son Asur-îtil-ilâni (the fuller form of which was Assur-îtil-ilâni-ukin), who ruled at least four years, and by his other son Sin-shar-ishkun (at least seven years), who was probably the Sarakus of Berosus, and hence the last king Assyria ever had. It was in his day that the swamping of anterior Asia, by the Sakæan Scythians (mentioned in OT), the Umman-manda (or hordes of the Manda) of the Assy. inscriptions, took place. This was only the prelude to the end. As a newly-discovered cylinder of the Bab. king Nabonidus relates, fifty-four years before the consecration of the temple of Sin in Harran, which had been destroyed by the Manda hordes, a Manda king, who was probably called Arbak,* working in conjunction, as the cylinder just mentioned clearly proves, with Nabopolassar (Belesys), razed to the ground the famous Assyrian capital. Nineveh probably fell into the hands of the Medes in 607, after a two years' siege, since the completion of the temple of Sin seems to belong to somewhere about the third year of Nabonidus (553).

* The same thing also probably happened in the case of Manasseh, only at a later time, when Assur-bani-pal was staying in Babylon (instead of Nineveh), probably shortly after the death of his rebellious brother Samas-sum-ukin (B.C. 648), whose ally Manasseh had been.

Nahum's prophecy was literally fulfilled, and the whole of Western Asia breathed freely again when the stronghold of their tyrants was demolished. The small remaining territory (since the Pharaoh Necho II. had taken away Palestine and Syria) was divided between the Scythians, to whom the Medes of classical tradition (Cyaxares) belonged, and the Babylonians, Mesopotamia falling to the latter. The names Assur and Nineveh survived, to a large extent, because of the lasting effects of the influence of the Assy. empire in politics and culture alike. Even down to the Christian era this is proved by (among other reasons) the fact that the whole district of the Euphrates and Tigris (including Babylonia) was called Assyria by the Greeks and Romans, and even to-day we call the science which has to do with the antiquities of both Assyria and Babylonia, and which has thrown new light on many important passages in Holy Writ—Assyriology.

ASTAD (A 'Αστάδ, Β'Αργαλ, AV Sadas).—1322 or 3622 of his descendants are mentioned as returning with Zerubbabel (1 Es 5¹³). He is called Azgad (אֶזְגָּד) in the can. books; and 1222 descendants are mentioned in the parallel list in Ezr 2¹² (B 'Ασγᾶδ, A 'Αβγᾶδ), 2322 in Neh 7¹⁷ (B 'Ασγᾶδ, κ'Ασράδ, A 'Αγερᾶδ). He appears as Astath ('Ασθάθ), 1 Es 8³⁸, when a second detachment of 111 return under Ezra (= Ezr 8¹², B 'Ασράδ, A 'Αγᾶθ). Azgad appears among the leaders who sealed the covenant with Neh. (Neh 10¹⁶ B 'Ασγᾶδ, A 'Αγᾶδ).

ASTATH.—See ASTAD.

ASTONIED, the past part. of the old verb astony, of which astonish is a later corruption,* is found only in OT, but there ten times, Ezr 9^{3, 4}, Job 17⁸ 18²⁰, Is 52¹⁴, † Jer 14⁹, Ezk 4¹⁷, Dn 3²⁴ 4¹⁹ 5⁹. RV retains 'astonied' (and even changes 'astonished' into 'astonied' at Ezk 3¹⁵); but Amer. RV prefers 'astonished,' except Dn 5⁹ where RV and Amer. RV give 'perplexed' (עָשָׂה, the only occurrence). See ASTONISHED. J. HASTINGS.

ASTONISHED.—This part. (the finite verb does not occur) had undoubtedly more force when AV was made than it has now. Perhaps the verb astound, which started off later from the orig. astonien or astumien, has carried away some of its strength. The orig. idea was to stun or stupefy as with a thunderbolt (Lat. extonare 'to thunder'; cf. Milton, Hist. of Britain, 'Astonished and struck with superstition as with a planet'; and the Argument to Par. Lost, Bk. i., 'Satan with his Angels lying on the burning lake, thunderstruck and astonished'); then to shock mentally, bewilder. The earliest occurrence of the part. seems to be in Coverdale's Bible (1535) at Jer 2¹², which was retained in AV, 'Be a., O ye heavens, at this, and be horribly afraid.' It is used 14 times in OT as tr. of עָשָׂה, once (Job 26¹¹) of עָשָׂה. In NT it is tr^a of ἐκπλήσω 10 times (9 times in Gosp., and always in ref. to Christ's words, except Mk 7²⁷ of His works; once in Ac 13¹² 'being a. at the teaching of the Lord'); of ἐξίστημι 6 times, of θαμβέω and θαμβός

* The suffix ish is, in most other words, only added where the derivation is from a French verb ending in -ir, and forming its pres. part. in -issant; so that the addition of it in the present case is unauthorized and incorrect. It was probably added merely to give the word a fuller sound, and from some dislike to the form astony, which was the form into which the M.E. astonien had passed.—Skeat, Etymol. Dict. 2 v.

† In this great passage (Is 52¹⁴) the edd. of AV subsequent to 1688 have generally changed what Scrivener calls 'the pathetic astonied' into 'the more commonplace astonished.' The Camb. Bible restores it.

περίχει once each.* RV retains 'a.' throughout OT, but in NT changes it into 'amazed,' when the Gr. is other than ἐκπλήσσω. Astonishment is found only once in NT, Mk 5⁴² 'they were a^{ed} with a great a.' (RV 'amazed with a great amazement,' Gr. ἐκστασις) in ref. to the raising of Jairus' daughter. But RV adds Mk 16⁸ 'trembling and a. had come upon them' (Gr. ἐκστασις, AV 'they trembled and were amazed'). In OT a. is more frequent. In Ps 60⁸ 'thou hast made us to drink the wine of a.' (תַּגְּמַת, RV 'staggering'), the obs. physical sense of stupefaction is conveyed. (Cf. Is 51¹⁷ 'thou hast drunken the bowl of the cup of staggering [same Heb.], and drained it.') As trⁿ of תַּגְּמַת 'a.' freq. means an object of a., and always in a strong sense; esp. in Jer., as 25¹⁸ 'to make them a desolation, an a., an hissing, and a curse.'

J. HASTINGS.

ASTROLOGIAN is the more accurate form, having the classical termin. -anus added to a class. root. But while the analogous form theologian held its ground, astrologer with the Eng. term. -er drove this out. It is found in Dn 2²⁷, AV 1611, and Camb. Bible, but is replaced by astrologer in nearly all mod. editions.

J. HASTINGS.

ASTRONOMY AND ASTROLOGY.—Heavenly bodies, in Genesis, are called 'lights' or 'bodies giving light' (אֲרוֹת, pl. מְאֹרֹת, mē'ōrōth). Dillmann (Genesis) remarks that in no other work (of creation) is the object of their creation so fully indicated, and asks whether a silent contrast to heathen superstition, which was attached to the stars, may not lie therein. The object of the heavenly bodies is stated to be 'to divide between the day and the night,' and 'for signs, for seasons, and for days and years,' and it is for this purpose that they are fixed (lit. 'given,' אָמַן, 'and he [God] gave them') in the firmament. The whole account of the creation and placing of the heavenly bodies is, in fact, based on the old geocentric view of the ancient astronomers, which mainly prevailed until the birth of modern astronomy. The account as given in Gn, however, is correct for the time at which it was written, and suited the needs of the people to whom it was addressed. The heavenly bodies were among the great marvels of the creative power of God, and they are taken purely and simply from the point of view of what they are for us, and the effect they have upon our minds, regardless of any preconceived or acquired scientific ideas and theories that we may possess.

Not less than the Hebrews did the Babylonians and Assyrians regard the heavenly bodies as for signs and seasons, days and years; and this view was associated with their usual heathen ideas that the heavenly bodies were divinities. The following translation of the portion of the Bab. creation story, corresponding with Gn 1, will form a basis of comparison with the two accounts:—

'He (Merodach) formed the stations of the great gods—stars were their likeness; he caused the lumaši † to be set; he designated the year; he outlined the forms (of the constellations?); he caused three stars ‡ to be assigned to each of the 12 months; from the day of the year § he formed the figures; he caused the station of Jupiter || to be founded to make known their limits, that an error might not be made, that none might sin.

* Besides ἕξις (Jth 11¹⁶ 13¹⁷ 15¹, Sir 43¹⁸, 1 Mac 16²²) and θαυμάσιον (Wis 17³, 1 Mac 6⁸), the Apocr. gives 'a.' as trⁿ of ταράσσω (Jth 14⁷), σπείρω (Jth 16¹¹), ἐκπλήσσω (Wis 13⁴), and καταπλήσσω (2 Mac 3²⁴), thereby showing more clearly the force of the Eng. word.

† The lumaši were seven in number, and seem to have been constellations, among them being Arctitenens.

‡ Or, possibly, constellations.

§ Apparently = new year's day.

|| So Jensen. The original word is Nibiru, regarded by Fried. Delitzsch in 1885 as being = Heb. מְאֹרֹת ma'abbār, 'place of passing,' here = 'zodiac.'

He set with him the station of Bel and Éa; he opened then great gates on both sides, the bolt he made strong on the left and the right—in its middle-point the zenith. He caused Nannaru (the moon) to shine, (and) he ruled the night, he designated him also as the thing of the night, to make known the time.

Monthly, without failing, he enclosed (him) in a ring, at the beginning of the month to shine in the evening, the horns proclaiming to make known the division (of time)—on the seventh day with a [half]-ring.'

At this point the text is mutilated; but after the placing of the moon, the chief god of the Babylonians is represented as turning his attention to the sun, and 'when the sun arrived on the horizon of heaven,' he seems to have addressed and directed him as to his course. Imperfect as the Bab. text here is, it is nevertheless easy to see that it is the account of a nation who knew much more of astronomy, on the whole, than the Hebrews. This is, in fact, indicated by the large number of tablets from Babylonia and Assyria referring to astrology that have been found, as well as those referring to astronomy proper, in which the stars and planets are enumerated and classified, and their positions sometimes described. Catalogues of these works were made, and explanations how to use them were given. References, not only to stars, but also to comets, are found, but they are comparatively rare.

The Hebrews, in OT, do not seem to have looked on the stars from an astronomical or astrological point of view, but rather as signs placed in the heavens, one of their most important functions being to show the power of the Almighty. Thus we are told that He created them (Gn 1¹⁶, Job 9⁹, Ps 8³ etc.), counts them, names them (Ps 147⁴), and has the whole of them in His power (Job 9⁷). To the horrors of His judgment-day it belongs that the stars lose their brightness (Is 13¹⁰, Ezk 32⁷, Lk 21²⁵, Jn 3³⁰, Rev 8¹²), fall from heaven like withered leaves (Is 34⁴—the stars are here called 'all the host of heaven'),—a simile in all probability derived from the observation of falling or 'shooting' stars, just as the reference, in Jude v. 13, to 'wandering stars' possibly derived its origin from the comets which came to excite the wonder and terror of the world. In the expression 'courses' of the stars (Jg 5²⁰) it is the planets that are referred to. The distance of the stars from the earth seems to have struck the nations of the ancient world, hence the mention of the stars in Job 22³, cf. also Is 14¹³. The comparison of their brightness is made in 1 Co 15⁴¹, and their great number referred to in He 11¹².

The stars are, as a rule, indicated by the usual word כֹּכַב kōkāv, Arab. kawkab, Syr. kawkebā, Eth. kawkab and kōkab, Assy. kakkabu. One of the poetic expressions for 'stars' is כֹּכַבֵי בֹקֵר 'stars of the morning,' an expression applied apparently to the angels (Job 38⁷); and the words 'morning star' could also be applied to a man who was considered to be great, like the high priest Simon (Sir 50⁸); to a thing greatly to be desired, as 'salvation' (2 P 1¹⁰) and 'heavenly glory' (Rev 2²²); and, finally, to Christ Himself (Rev 22¹⁶).

The date at which the stars were divided into constellations is very remote, and there is considerable uncertainty as to the approximate period and the people with whom this division had its origin. In all probability, however, it is due to the Chaldæans, who seem to have had it from the Akkadians, most of the names of the signs of the zodiac and constellations being written in the non-Sem. dialect of ancient Babylon. The Hebrews, in their turn, may have obtained their knowledge of the constellations from the Chaldæans, but we have no real evidence of the fact.

The well-known constellation of the Great Bear, שֵׁן 'ash (Job 9⁹) or שֵׁן 'ayish (fem. Job 38³²),* is said to be connected with na'sh 'a bier,' the name of that constellation in Arabic. The 'sons' of 'Ayish' (שֵׁן) are spoken of in Job 38³², and are regarded as the three stars in the tail of the bear, a parallel to the Arab. expression banāt na'sh 'the daughters of the bier,' which means the same thing. The Arab. legend connected with the constellation of the Great Bear is as follows:—

* For 'the bear' of the RV the AV has 'Arcturus.'

Na'sh having been killed by Gedi (the pole star), the children of Na'sh (the sons in front with the body of their father, the daughter behind with the nurse, who carries a child in her arms) go round nightly seeking the murderer, with the hope of avenging their father's death. Canopus (Arab. Suhél), however, wishes to go to the help of Gedi, but, having set out too late, finds himself always foiled, not being able to reach his point in time to prevent the approaching catastrophe. Whether some legend similar to this was attached to the constellation by the ancient Hebrews is uncertain, and, whilst admitting a likeness in the Heb. and Arab. names, the differences in their forms must, nevertheless, not be forgotten. Fried. Delitzsch points out that the Heb. šy elsewhere (Job 4⁹ etc.) means 'a moth,' and that a star bearing that name (sāsu 'moth') seems to have been known to the Assyro-Babylonians (WAI ii. 49, 64). M. A. Stern (in the Jüd. Zeitschr. 1866) regards this constellation as the Pleiades.

Another constellation mentioned is Orion, in Heb. קיי (Job 9⁹ 38³¹, Am 5⁸), pl. קייים (Is 13¹⁰).^{*} The word means, literally, 'the fool,' or 'impious one,' corresponding with Arab. jabbār, Syr. gabbārā,† Chald. niphla 'the giant,' the name given to this constellation by the Semites of old because regarded as the figure of a man—probably one of the larger male figures seen on those Bab. boundary-stones which show figures of the constellations. Gesenius suggests that they (the Hebrews, etc.) seem to have looked on this constellation as the figure of an impious giant bound in the sky, whence Job 38³¹ 'Canst thou loose the bands of Orion?' The plural in Is 13¹⁰ 'constellations,' means, literally, 'the Orions'—the giant constellations of the sky, prominent by their brightness. A very ingenious suggestion is that quoted in the Chronicon Paschale, Cedrenus, John of Antioch, and others, from Pers. sources, that Chesil or Orion is the impious giant Nimrod chained to the heavens. This, however, is late, and probably has no solid basis as its origin.

The well-known passage in Job (9⁹) supplies us also with the word for the Pleiades, קיימה kīmah, Syr. kima, Arab. thurayyā, words meaning 'heap,' 'cluster,' 'plenty,' 'multitude,' from the seven larger stars and the smaller ones closely grouped therewith. The Arabs also call the Pleiades an-najm 'the star,' or 'cluster' par excellence, said to be so named on account of their monthly conjunction with the moon, by which they served to measure time, and thus rule the calendar. In Job 38³¹, קיימה קיימה, 'the cluster (AV 'sweet influences') of the Pleiades' is mentioned, corresponding with the Arab. akd ath-thurayya. The Rabbis (see R. David Kimchi in his Lexicon) thought that the 'bands of the Pleiades' referred to their influence upon vegetation, kīmāh having great cold, and binding up the fruit, though R. Isaac described the influence of the Pleiades as being the reverse of this, ripening the fruits. In the Pers. poets (Sadi, Hafiz, etc.) these stars are regarded as a brilliant rosette with a central star, etc.

The popular name used by Luther, 'die Glucke,' i.e. 'the clucking hen,' reminds one of the English name 'hen and chickens,' and the French poussinière, O.F. pulsinière. The appearance of the constellation of the Pleiades being conventionally that of a large star surrounded by several smaller ones, was likened to a brood-hen with her chickens under her wings, hence this name; and for this reason the Pleiades were also supposed to be the same as Succoth-benoth, which is rendered by R. David Kimchi 'hen (with) chickens.' This name for the Pleiades, which occurs in the Targ. to Job, is said also to be usual with the Arabs. Whether the Hebrews of ancient times had also this idea, is uncertain, and seems to be improbable. It is to be noted that Fried. Delitzsch denies the meaning 'star-cluster' for this constellation, and connects קיימה kīmah with the Assyr. kimtu 'family,' explaining it as the 'family of stars,'—an etymology which does not invalidate, as will be seen, the popular legends concerning it.

קיימה קיימה 'the fleeing serpent,' or 'swift serpent' (Job 26¹³), has been regarded as the sign of the dragon, between the Great and the Little Bear; but this identification is very uncertain. It would seem, however, to be something connected with the sky, as is indicated by the first part of the verse: 'By his spirit are the heavens garnished' (RV), or, 'beauty' (m).

The sign of the Twins (Castor and Pollux, AV; The Twin Brothers, RV; Gr. Δίδυμοί) is mentioned as the name of a ship in Ac 28¹¹.^{*}

The word קיימה mazzārōth (a plural form, Job 38³²), is, with common consent, regarded as signifying 'the signs' of the zodiac, which come forth 'in their season,' and, as is implied, could not be led forth by a man. In 2 K 23³ occurs the word קיימה mazzālōth, translated 'planets' in the AV and RV, with the marginal reading 'twelve signs' of the zodiac. This word is compared by Jensen and others with the Assyr. manzalti, WAI iii. 59. 35, a comparison which is not without its difficulties, as, if correct, it would imply complete ignorance of the root of the Assyr. word on the part of the Heb. scribes, manzalti being for manzalti,† by a common law of interchange between z and l—ignorance which would not, however, be altogether inexcusable, as the Chaldee form is מזאל mazzālayā, and, though unprovided with the feminine ending, would present the same root, the individual signs being מזאל mazzāl. The Chaldee forms themselves, however, seem rather to increase the difficulty of connecting קיימה with the Assyr. manzalti.

That expression in Job 9⁹ which accompanies the names of the constellations, namely, קיימה קיימה hadrē tēmān, 'the chambers of the south' (=Arab. akhādīr al-janūb or mukhādī al-janūb), is one of peculiar interest. Gesenius would render it 'the most remote southern regions'; but it seems better to regard it as meaning 'the southern constellations,' some of which, in all probability, represented pictorially 'chambers,' from which heathen (divine) creatures looked out, similar to the reliefs representing the constellations on the Bab. boundary-stones. Should this explanation be correct, 'the chambers of the south' would be in contradistinction to mazzaroth or mazzaloth 'the constellations' (of the north), but the uncertainty of the exact signification of the two expressions makes every attempt at explanation unsatisfactory. A point to be noted is that an Arab. translation of Job 9⁹ mentions 'the heart of the south,' a name of Suhel or Canopus, the principal star in the constellation of the Ship (Delitzsch, Job, 2nd ed. p. 128 n.), which marks, by its rising,

^{*} The Bab. names of the signs of the zodiac were (about B.C. 500) as follows: The Workman=the Ram; Mulu and the Bull of Heaven=Taurus; Sib-zi-anna, and the Great Twins=Gemini; Allul=Cancer; the Great Dog=Leo; the Ear of Corn=Virgo; Zibanit=Libra; the Scorpion=Scorpius; Papilsag=Arcitenens; the Fish-goat=Caper; Gula=Amphora; the Water-channel and the Tails=Fishes. There were also many other constellations, the number of which is uncertain.

† The changes would be manzalti, manzarti, manzalti, mazzalti.

^{*} The LXX has Ἐρριπος in Job 9⁹; Ἰσίων in Job 38³¹. The LXX of Amos 5⁸ differs entirely from the received text of the Heb.

† Also called in Syr. iyātha, a word which is said also to mean Aldebaran, Capella, and the Pleiades.

the season in which the fruit becomes ripe through the increase of the heat. The 'heart of the south' would seem to go with and explain the 'chambers of the south.'

Venus is apparently mentioned (Is 14¹²) under the name hēlēl, 'the shining one,' with the addition šar-šar 'son of the morning,' i.e. Lucifer, the day-star, a name of Venus as the morning star, to which the king of Babylon is, in this passage, compared. This Heb. word agrees in meaning with that used for Venus in Arab., namely, zuharah 'splendid (star),' and is from the same root as the Assy. ēlēlu 'to be bright.' Strange to say, however, no Assy. name for Venus from this root has been as yet found, the word generally quoted, muštililu, being a ghost-word, due to a faulty copy.* As the Assyrians knew, from the earliest times, that Venus as a morning and as an evening star was the same, it is probable that the Hebrews were aware of the fact also.†

In Am 5²⁶, where it is said, 'Yea, ye have borne Siccuth your king, and Chiun your images, the star of your god, which ye made to yourselves' (RV), there is hardly any doubt that Chiun (šar-šar kiyyūn) is the Assy. kāwanu (or, as read by some, kāwānu), the planet Saturn, which was known to the Bab. and Assy. under that name, preserved in Arab. under the form kāwān, and in the Peshitta as kāwānā, and of which the Παράλυ of the LXX is supposed to be a corruption. The pointing of the Heb. form is regarded by Schrader as incorrect, and he therefore writes, upon the model of the Arab., etc., šar-šar kēwān.‡ Chiun or Kēwān does not properly belong to Heb. astronomy, but it probably gives us the name of the planet Saturn among the Hebrews, who seem to have worshipped him under the form of the star which represented him.

Mention of the sun is common, but the passages in which it is referred to are rather general than truly astronomical. It is used to indicate the time of the day, as 'when the sun went down' (Gn 15¹⁷), 'till the sun be hot' (Neh 7³); comparison, as 'clear as the sun' (Ca 6¹⁰), etc. etc. In the account of the Creation it is called the 'greater' of the 'two great lights' (Gn 1¹⁶), made 'to rule the day,' and set in the firmament of the heaven 'to give light upon the earth,' and, with the lesser light, 'to divide the light from the darkness' (vv. 16-19). The sun would also be included among the lights in the firmament of the heaven in v. 14, which were 'for signs, and for seasons, and for days and years.' It will be seen from this that the astronomical ideas of the Hebrews with regard to the sun were strictly those of an observer on the surface of the earth, and were based upon the strictly practical view of its value in the matters of everyday life—in fact, they were the ideas generally held by the people of that and succeeding ages until the birth of modern astronomy. If we had the Bab. account of the Creation complete, we should in all probability find therein views embodying those in the first chap. of Genesis. What may be regarded as a poetical astronomical view of the sun in his course is that contained in Ps 19⁴⁻⁵, where the 'tabernacle of the sun' is mentioned, and he is compared to 'a bridegroom coming out of his chamber,' and 'rejoicing as a strong man to run his course.' This poetical description of the sun, however, reminds one of those Bab. cylinder-seals on which the sun-god is represented as a man, from whom rays of light stream forth so dazzling that the divine attendants who open the doors which enclose him are obliged to look the other way whilst performing this duty.* The going forth of the sun 'from the end of heaven,' and the 'circuit unto the ends of it' (v. 6), refer, naturally, to the daily journey of the sun, which, as it would seem from this passage, had been noticed to be a curved course in the heavens. As with the Babylonians and Assyrians, the sun was used to mark the points of the compass, east being 'the rising sun,' west 'the setting sun,' etc. The indication of the different parts of the day from the position of the sun was, no doubt, from actual observation, the use of sun-dials (see below) not being by any means common in the ancient East. For further information see SUN.

There is no express mention of eclipses in the Bible, but certain expressions, such as 'I will cause the sun to go down at noon, and I will darken the earth in the clear day' (Am 8⁹), have been regarded as referring to something of the kind. In the case of the above quotation, the fact that noon is mentioned in connexion with the sun going down might well refer to an eclipse; but in the case of Mic 3⁶, Zec 14⁶, Joel 2^{10, 31, 32}, which were formerly taken to refer to eclipses, this can hardly be the reference, as the phenomena accompanying the obscuration of the sun and the moon do not favour that view. So also the passing reference in Jer 15⁹ 'her sun is gone down while it was yet day,' can only mean that 'good fortune has ceased for her.' Reference to an eclipse has been seen also in 2 K 20¹¹, Is 38⁸, where the shadow going back ten degrees on the dial of Ahaz is spoken of; but real observation under natural conditions would be necessary before accepting this as being conclusive or even probable. This supposed eclipse has been identified with an annular eclipse of the sun in 689 B.C. (Bosanquet in the Trans. Soc. Bibl. Archaeology, vol. iii. p. 31 ff., vol. v. p. 261, etc.). The same writer also understands Ezk 30^{18, 32} to refer to the total eclipse of the sun in B.C. 556; but there is the same objection to this as to the supposed references in Micah, Zech., and Joel.

The Hebrews had more than one word for the moon (see MOON), serving to designate the luminary in a general sense, when full, and when new. The apparent motions of the moon were well known to the Hebrews, as it was by that heavenly body that their festivals were fixed; and it has a special importance, because the Heb. year, like that of the Babylonians, was lunar, and was used to fix 'signs and seasons' more, probably, than any other heavenly body. The moon played a part just as important in Bab. astronomy, for there was not only a large series of forecasts connected with its movements, but it was also used, as with the Hebrews, to determine the beginning of the month, and thus to fix the dates of the various festivals, etc. (FESTIVALS). The Heb. idea of the moon as 'the lesser light to rule the night,' finds its echo in the Bab. account of the creation of the heavenly bodies (translated above), in which she is described as the ruler of the night, the indicator of the beginning of the month, and apparently (by her changes) the divider of the month into weeks. It is not unlikely that the Hebrews learned these astronomical uses of our satellite from the Babylonians, probably at some early period, and also during the Captivity, by which time Bab.

* A very poetical hymn to the sun-god, from Borsippa, describes him when going to rest, and speaks of the greetings of the bolts and the satisfaction of the door of heaven on his arrival at the end of his daily journey.

* The Assy. word for the planet Venus is generally read Dilbat, more correctly Delebat (Δελία), explained as Nabat kakkabu 'the star Nabat,' or 'she who proclaims.'

† It is to be noted that the Heb. word hēlēl is masc., and in this resembles Heosphoros (Hesperus); but the name in Assy., Arab., etc., is fem. The name Lucifer, applied to Satan, is due to Hieronymus and the Fathers of the Church, and apparently had its origin in the legend of the fall of the angels, introduced into the works of Bishop Avitus, the poet Caedmon, and Milton in Par. Lost (cf. Lk 10¹⁸, Rev 12¹⁰).

‡ Schrader reads in the same passage Sakkūth for Siccuth, and compares this word with the cuneiform Sak-kut, one of the names of the god Ninip, worshipped of old in Babylonia.

astronomy had made great progress. Eclipses of the moon seem not to be referred to in the Bible.

In all probability most of the nations of the ancient East had, like the Babylonians and Assyrians, professional astrologers, by whom the stars were consulted, horoscopes drawn, and lucky days predicted, for such as wished to know what the future had in store for them, so that they might 'know the ordinances of heaven,' and their 'dominion in the earth' (Job 38³³). The Hebrews, however, seem to have been less of astrologers than the nations around, for the prophet Jeremiah (10²) exhorts them not to learn the way of the nations, and not to be dismayed at the signs of heaven, for the nations were dismayed at them, implying that the Hebrews, at least at that time, did not imitate 'the nations' in the matter of astrology to any great extent, though there was, in truth, a tendency to do so. The antiquity and reality of the belief in the influences of the stars in the ancient East is well brought home to us in Deborah's triumphal song, where she says 'the stars in their courses fought against Sisera' (Jg 5²⁰), which, though only a poetical figure, is sufficiently characteristic.

Older, however, than the above, are the many tablets of the Babylonians and Assyrians referring to forecasts. Through a long series of years, probably extending into four millenniums, these nations seem to have carried on observations, which they quoted, with the omens derived from current events, for future reference. Again and again, moreover, we meet with communications which passed between the Assyrian kings and the astrologers, in which the former inquired what the stars indicated with regard to Assyria and the nations around. Thus we meet with such predictions as, 'If, upon the 16th day (of the month Ab), an eclipse happen, the king of Akkad will die, Nergal (i.e. pestilence) will destroy the land.' 'If, on the 16th day (of the month Elul), an eclipse happen, the king of a foreign land or the king of Hatti will come and take the throne. Rain from heaven and flood from the channel will overflow.' The planets and the sun and moon also furnished omens of a similar nature, for it was supposed that what had happened before would, under similar astral influences, happen again.

When, accordingly, the Hebrews came into close contact and relationship with the Assyrians and Babylonians, they found them to be nations among whom astrology, far from being forbidden and in disfavour, was a recognised institution, resorted to by all, from the king downwards—a venerable 'science.' The desire to know the future was, no doubt, as strong in the breasts of the Hebrews as in those of their conquerors, and they must often have resorted to those 'astrologers,' 'stargazers,' and 'monthly prognosticators' (Is 47¹³) of whom the prophet speaks so contemptuously. The astrologers are called קְרָיִם הַקִּיָּרִים (Qerê), generally rendered 'dividers of the heavens'; the stargazers קְרָיִם בְּקוֹרְבָּיִם, lit. 'those who gaze on the stars'; the monthly prognosticators מְרַמְּסֵי הַחֳדָשִׁים, AVm 'that give knowledge concerning the months'—probably those who predicted at every new moon what was likely to happen during the coming month. In Dn 1²⁰ 2² etc., the RV has rightly 'enchanters' for the 'astrologers' (מְרַמְּסֵי) of the AV, and the same remark holds good for the Aramaic form מְרַמְּסֵי in v. 27 etc. These biblical expressions for the various kinds of astrologers, it must be noted, are, to all appearance, true Hebrew words, not borrowings from the Assyrians and Babylonians, showing, in all probability, that celestial forecasts were far from being altogether novelties with the Hebrews. Nevertheless, as has been already remarked, they seem to have been generally averse to divination of this kind, partly on account of the general prohibition against the use of divination and the practice of augury (Dt 18¹⁰⁻¹⁴, 2 K 21⁶), partly because such of the people as were rigid monotheists (and among these we must class all OT writers) looked upon the heavenly bodies as the objects of adoration by the heathen nations around, and mentioned them therefore but seldom—partly because they had but little need to speak of them, but also because they wished to avoid reference to those things likely to call up in the mind of the reader heathen practices.

ASTYAGES (Ἀστύαγης, so Herodotus, Xenophon; Assyr. Istuvigu) was the son of Cyaxares, king of the Medes, and succeeded to the throne on the death of his father, B.C. 584. His wife was the daughter of Alyattes, king of Lydia, his sister was the queen of Nebuchadrezzar of Babylon, and Cyrus was his daughter's son by a Persian father. According to Bel and the Dragon (v. 1), when A. was gathered to his fathers, 'Cyrus of Persia received his kingdom.' Not, however, in the way of ordinary succession. Herodotus (i. 127-130), confirmed by the Annalistic Tablet of Cyrus (RP 2nd Ser. v. 159) records that when A. marched against the disaffected Persians under Cyrus, his own troops deserted him or would not fight, and he was defeated and taken prisoner, thus losing his crown in B.C. 549, after a reign of 35 years. He was the last of the line of Median kings (known on the monuments as kings of the Manda), who had reigned 150 years—the list being as follows:—Deioces (Daiukku), B.C. 699-646; Phraortes (Fruvartis), B.C. 646-624; Cyaxares (Kastariti), B.C. 624-584; Astyages (Istuvign), B.C. 584-549.

ASUR (Ἀσοῦρ, AV Assur, 1 Es 5³¹).—His sons returned among the temple servants under Zerubbabel. Called Harhur (חַרְחֻר, 'Apoúr), Ezr 2⁵¹, Neh 7⁵³.

ASYLUM.—See REFUGE.

ASYNCRITUS (Ἀσύνκριτος, 'Assyn-, Asyncritus), Ro 16³⁴.—A Christian greeted by St. Paul with four others 'and the brethren that are with them,' perhaps members of the same small community. The name occurs in Rom. Ins. CIL vi. 12,565, of a freedman of Augustus. See Sanday and Headlam, Romans, p. 427. For later traditions, which may be neglected, see Acta Sanct., April, i. 741; June, iv. 6.

ATAD (אֶתָד, 'thorn'), Gn 50¹⁰⁻¹¹.—Appears to have been 'over Jordan' (see ABEL-MIZRAIM), a threshing-floor on the road to Hebron. The site is unknown.

ATAR (Ἀτάρ, B omits, AV Jatal), 1 Es 5²⁸.—His sons were among the porters or door-keepers who returned with Zerubbabel. Called Ater, Ezr 2⁴², Neh 7⁴⁵.

ATARAH (אֶתָרָה), wife of Jerahmeel and mother of Onam (1 Ch 2²⁶).

ATARGATIS.—The worship of this Syrian goddess is nowhere named in the canonical books, but in 2 Mac 12²⁶ mention is made of a temple of Atargatis (RV Atergatis) at Carnion in Gilead (Ἀταργατείον, Ἀτερργατείον, A, the former being shown by inscriptions to be the more correct form of the name). In inscriptions discovered at Delos this goddess is generally joined with Adad, and once she is styled Ἀφροδίτη Ἀταργατίς. In Palestine the principal seat of her worship was at Ashkelon, where she was probably identified with the Heavenly Aphrodite (whose temple is named by Herodotus, i. 105). Another famous shrine of Atargatis was at Hierapolis, or Bambyce (Mabug), on the Euphrates (Lucian, De Syria Dea, 14; Pliny, Hist. Nat. v. 23). At both these shrines sacred fish were kept, and at Ashkelon the goddess herself was represented as a woman with a fish's tail (Lucian, l.c.; comp. Ovid, Metam. iv. 44-46). According to the Gr. version of the legend, Atargatis, or Derceto (to use the shorter form of the name, more commonly found in Gr.), was a maiden, inspired by Aphrodite with love for a youth who was worshipping at her shrine. By him Derceto became the mother of a daughter; but, filled with shame, she threw herself into the water at Ashkelon, or at Hierapolis, whereupon she was changed into a fish (Diod. Sic. ii. 4). According to Hyginus, Astron. ii. 30, she was saved by a fish. The child, who had been exposed, was brought up at the temple of Aphrodite, and became the famous Assyrian queen Semiramis.

Older derivations of the name have become obsolete since the discovery on coins and Palmyrene inscriptions of the true Sem. form of the name עטרותה or עטרות. In the first part of this word we may recognise the Aram. form of the name which appears in Assy. as Ishtar, in Heb. as Ashtoreth (אשטרת), and in Phœnician as Astarte (אשרת). Comp. also 'Aðara in Strabo, xvi. 27. The second portion of the name is usually understood to be the title of another deity, Ati or Attah, whose name is found in Melito, Apology (Migne, Patr. Gr. v. 1223), on inscriptions from Phœnicia and (in proper names) from Palmyra, and perhaps also in such personal names as Alyattes, Sadyattes, etc. For the compound name we might then compare Astar-Chemosh of the Moabite Stone. Lagarde, however, shows (Mittheilungen, i. 77) that this explanation is not free from difficulties. The Gr. legend, the sacred fish at Ashkelon and Hierapolis, and the representations of Atargatis as half woman, half fish, all point to an original connexion between this goddess and the water; and she is probably a personification of the fertilising power of water.

Carnion, a town which may probably be identified with Ashteroth-karnaim (Gn 14⁷), was taken and destroyed by Judas Maccabeus during an expedition into Gilead about B.C. 163, and the inhabitants who fled to the temple of Atargatis were put to death (2 Mac 12¹⁸⁻²⁰, cf. 1 Mac 5²⁴⁻⁴⁵; Jos. Ant. XII. viii. 4).

ATAROTH (עטרות, עטרות, 'crowns'), the name of several towns east and west of Jordan.—1. Ataroth, Nu 32^{3, 34}, is in both places named next Dibon, which is identified with the present Dhibân (see DIBON), and Ataroth is doubtless Khûrbet 'Attarûs on Jebel 'Attarûs, which latter may be the Atroth-shophan of v. 35. It is 3 or 4 miles east of Machærus, where the Baptist was imprisoned and murdered. The objection that it is said to have been built by the children of Gad, while this site is in the territory of Reuben, would apply also to Dibon and Aroer; it only proves that the tribes were greatly intermingled, or at first aided one another (as Jg 1³) in conquering and possessing their territories. 2. Jos 16³, a town on the border of Benjamin and Ephraim, towards its western extremity. Conder recognises it in the modern Ed-Dârieh, on the W. slope of the hill which lies south of Bethhoron-the-nether. 3. Ataroth-addar, Jos 16⁶ 18¹³, apparently the same as the preceding. 4. Jos 16⁷, a town on the same boundary of Ephraim and Manasseh, but towards its eastern extremity, next Naarath (which see). Conder suggests Tell et-Trûny in the Jordan Valley, or Khûrbet Kaswal, also called Kh. et-Taiyireh. The name is lost. Dômeh, the Edumia of the Onomasticon, with its ancient rock-cut tombs, is about the place one would look for it. Three places, one 4 miles north of Samaria, a second, 6 miles north of Bethel, a third, 7 miles north of Jerusalem, now bear the name Atâra, but are unnamed in Scripture. 5. Atroth-beth-Joab, 1 Ch 2³⁴, possibly = Atarites. ATHACH (אחא), 1 S 30³⁰.—An unknown town in the south of Judah.

ATHALIAH (אחזיה, 'whom J' has dragged roughly'),* daughter of Ahab and Jezebel (2 K 8¹⁸), called daughter of Omri, 2 K 8²⁶, 2 Ch 22². She married Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah (2 K 8¹⁸, 2 Ch 18²¹); and as she inherited her mother's strong character, her influence for evil was predominant over both her husband and her son (2 K 8^{18, 27}, 2 Ch 22^{3, 4}). Under her influence the cult of the Zidonian Baal prevailed in Judah to such a degree that the temple of J' was 'broken up' (2 Ch 24⁷),—the materials being probably used for the temple of Baal,—so that a thorough restoration was needed in the following reign. On the death of Ahaziah, Athaliah, who enjoyed already much authority as queen mother, and probably had a considerable following among the people, procured the massacre of all her grandchildren, Joash alone escaping, and Athaliah was queen of Israel for six years. No particulars are recorded of her reign, but the circumstances of her deposition are related minutely. According to 2 K 11, the high priest Jehoiada, having won over 'the captains over hundreds, of the Carites and of the guard,' arranged that the portion of them who formed the temple guard on the Sabbath day should be posted in three equal divisions at the three main approaches to the temple, v. z. (a) the entry from the palace (Jos.; cf. 1 K 10⁶, 2 K 16¹⁸); (b) 'the gate Sur'; (c) 'the gate behind the guard' (Ewald's idea [HI iv. p. 135], that 'the watch of the king's house' means the usual palace guard, seems inconsistent with Jehoiada's words in v. 9); while the other two companies should not go off guard as usual, but 'compass the king round about' wherever he went. Additional solemnity was given to the proceedings by the use made of David's dedicated armour. See JEHOASH. Roused by the unusual noise caused by the acclamations which greeted the coronation of Joash, Athaliah came into the temple alone, her guard having been prevented from following her (Jos. Ant. IX. vii. 3). The truth flashed upon her at once; 'she rent her clothes, and cried, Treason, treason!' Any sympathy that might have been evoked was covered by the overwhelming display of force. The sacred precincts might not be polluted with her blood, 'so they made way for her,' and she passed out, and was struck down 'by the way of the horses' entry to the king's house.' The variations of the Chronicler (2 Ch 23) from this account are characteristic. Under the second temple, uncircumcised foreigners were not permitted to approach holy things; he therefore substitutes for 'the Carites and the guard' the courses of priests and Levites whose weeks of service began and ended respectively on that Sabbath. They are posted at (a) 'the king's house,' (b) 'the gate of the foundation' (מִסְדֵּר for כְּסֵר), (c) 'the doors.' The captains—five in number, whose names are given—having been thus deprived of their men, are represented as 'set over the host' (v. 14), i.e. the whole population capable of bearing arms, and are obliged to 'go about in Judah, and gather the Levites out of all the cities of Judah, and the heads of fathers' houses,' to Jerusalem. The young king is publicly presented to 'all the congregation,' not, as in Kings, secretly to the captains alone. The people, who take a very subordinate part in Kings, fill, with the Levites not on duty (cf. 2 Ch 5¹¹), the temple courts. Thus, while in Kings the deposition of Athaliah is effected by a sudden coup d'état carried out by the high priest and foreign mercenaries, and every precaution is taken against a popular rising in Athaliah's favour; in Chron. it is the act of the whole nation, constitutionally represented by the ecclesiastical and civil authorities, and it is executed in the most deliberate and orderly fashion.

'The sons of Athaliah,' 2 Ch 24⁷, has been explained to mean (a) Ahaziah and his brethren before they were carried away, 2 Ch 21¹⁷ (Jos. Ant. IX. viii. 2); or (b) the priests of Baal (Jerome, Qu. Heb., in loc.); or (c) her illegitimate children. 2. 1 Ch 8²⁶, a Benjamite dwelling in Jerus. 3. Ezr 8⁷, father of Jeshaiiah, who was one of Ezra's companions. N. J. D. WHITE.

ATHARIM (אֶתְרִים), Nu 21¹.—Either, a proper name of a place from which the route was named; so RV 'the way of Atharim,' as LXX,—or, 'the way of tracks,' i.e. a regular caravan road (cf. Arab. Uthr, a trace). The rendering of AV, 'way of the spies,' follows Targ. and Syr.; אֶתְרִים may then be a plur. of אֶתְרָא in a sense slightly different from that given above, or = אֶתְרִים 'spies.' The 'way of Atharim' will then be that described in Nu 13²¹⁻²⁵. See HORMAH. A. T. CHAPMAN.

ATHENIANS ('Αθηναῖοι, Ac 17²¹; 'Ἄνδρες Ἀθηναῖοι, 17²² AV, RV 'men of Athens').—Inhabitants of ATHENS.

ATHENOBIOUS ('Αθηνοβίος, 1 Mac 15²⁸⁻²⁹), a friend of Antiochus VII. Sidetes. When Antiochus had gained some successes against Tryphon, he sent Athenobius to Jerusalem to remonstrate with Simon Maccabæus for the occupation of Joppa, Gazara, the citadel of Jerusalem, and certain places outside Judæa. Simon was ordered to surrender his conquests or to pay an indemnity of 1000 talents of silver; but he refused to promise more than 100 talents, and with this answer A. was obliged to return in indignation to the king. ATHENS ('Αθήναι).—St. Paul having sent Timotheus away, 'thought it good to be left at Athens alone' (1 Th 3¹). From Ac 17 we learn what he did and said during his solitary stay. Leaving aside the history of A., I shall describe the aspect of this famous city in St. Paul's epoch. St. Paul, like Apollonius of Tyana, landed at the Piræus, and, like him, would have walked to A. by the new road, called Hamaxitos, which ran north of the ancient roadway, already encumbered with the ruins of the great wall of Pericles.

Pausanias, in his description of A. (i. 1. 4), and Philostratus,* relate that along this road were raised at intervals altars to the unknown gods. St. Paul marked these, and worked them into his argument against polytheism, addressed upon the Areopagus to the Stoics and Epicureans. On his left hand, as he entered the Piræus gate of the city, St. Paul skirted the Ceramicus or ancient burial-ground, where we still see, bared by recent excavations, some of the old sculptured tombstones; to look upon which is a revelation to us of the noble and, in its calm self-restraint, almost divine regret with which, in the fourth century B.C., Athenian workmen could depict death and the last farewells of mortals.

Innumerable booths of olive, fruit, and fish sellers were no doubt set up then as now round the entrances to the city. St. Paul would push his way past these, and, leaving to his left the noble temple of Theseus, which remains intact in its grandeur, he would enter the Agora. Here his eye fell on portico after portico, painted by the brush of famous artists, and adorned with the noblest statues. But St. Paul would not have admired these so much as the tower and water-clock of Andronicus, telling out to him the hours of his solitary waiting. This still stands to-day, along with a few ruinous arcades, the sole remnant of an architectural splendour which eclipsed that of the Piazza del Duomo of Pisa, or of the Piazza di San Marco of Venice. The impression which the latter makes on one of us to-day might be compared with that of which St. Paul would have been sensible as he entered the Athenian Agora; if at least he could, in spite of his Semitism, have felt the charm of the highest plastic art.

The Agora was dominated on its south side by the abrupt hill of Mars and the still more impressive heights of the Acropolis, and it was such a place of resort as is to-day the Piazza San Marco at Venice. There St. Paul found himself amidst the throng of 'all the Athenians and strangers who spent their time in nothing else but either to tell or to hear some new thing.' In the Stoa Poecilé he met with the successors of Zeno, the Stoics, with whom, as with the Epicureans, he, like a second Socrates, 'disputed daily.' And perhaps when he wearied of these discussions, and of the noise of the rich men's slaves chaffering over their purchases, or of the porters thronging round, of the quack doctors and barbers, he may have passed on by the Via Tripodum and have gained the theatre of Dionysus on the south side of the Acropolis, there to witness, perhaps, the performance of a play of Euripides or Menander; or he may, from the other end of the Agora, have gone up by the temple of the Furies to the Acropolis, and have mounted the steps of the Propylæa of Mnesicles, whose columns still remain to awe us with their sublime harmony. Having thus gained the platform of the Acropolis, he would wander through a forest of the most perfect statues, pacing round that most glorious shrine and monument of all, the temple of the virgin goddess Athene, whose power and attributes were destined with the triumph of St. Paul's new gospel, and, after an epoch briefer than that which had already elapsed since its erection, to pass on by seeming inheritance to the Blessed Virgin of the orthodox Greek Church.

* Philostratus, Vit. Apollon. 6. 2: σφοδρότατος γὰρ τὸ πρὸ πάντων θεῶν εὐλόγιον καὶ ταῦτα Ἀθηναίων, εὐ καὶ ἀγνώστων δαιμόνων βασιλεῖ ἰδρυται. This, of course, refers to St. Paul's own day.

St. Paul 'disputed in the synagogue with the Jews, and with the devout persons' (Ac 17¹⁷). It has been thought that the site of this synagogue may be fixed by a slab found in the ancient district of Koropus at the foot of Hymettus, bearing the legend: αὐτῆ ἡ πόλις τοῦ κυρίου, δίκαιος εἰσελεύσονται ἐν αὐτῇ (Ps 118²⁰).^{*} But this is a monument only of the third or fourth century, and is of Christian origin. Other slabs, however, have been recovered in A. bearing Jewish inscriptions, and marking the burial-places of Greek Jews. And we have in the writings of the Jew Philo, by a single generation earlier than St. Paul, and, like him, an ardent apostle of monotheism, some graphic allusions to A., whither, no doubt, he went, like Horace, as to the chief centre of art and philosophy. For A. was the university city of the Roman world, as it was also the focus from which the sacred rays of learning radiated to Tarsus, Antioch, and Alexandria. In his youthful essay on the theme that every good man is free, Philo declares the Athenians to be the keenest-sighted mentally of the Greeks (Ἑλλήνων ὀξυδερκέστατοι διάνοιαν), and says that A. is to Greece what the pupil is to the eye, or the reason to the soul.† And in these words, which follow in the same context, he doubtless describes a scene which he had actually witnessed—

'It was only yesterday that the actors were exhibiting tragedy, and were reciting those famous lines of Euripides—

"For Freedom is a name all precious,
Even if a man hath little thereof,
Let him esteem himself to have great riches."

'Then I beheld that all the spectators stood up on tiptoe with excitement, and with loud cheers and sustained cries prolonged their applause of the sentiment no less than their applause of a poet, that not only glorified Freedom in deed, but glorified its very name.'

Such was the impression which A. made on a cultured Jew, who yet reprobated not less keenly than St. Paul the worship by man of the works of his own hands; and we may well believe that St. Paul's heart also beat high as he entered so famous a city.

Contemporary writers give the Athenians the same characteristics of over-religiousness and versatile curiosity as does St. Paul. One of these witnesses is himself a Jew, namely Josephus the historian, who declares (Contra Ap. ii. 12) the Athenians to be the most pious of the Greeks (τοὺς εὐσεβεστάτους τῶν Ἑλλήνων). Testimony of like effect is rendered by Livy, xlv. 27: Athenas inde plenas quidem et ipsas uetustate famæ, multa tamen uisenda habentes; arcem, portus, muros Piræeum urbi iungentes. . . Simulacra Deorum hominumque, omni genere et materiæ et artium insignia. Petronius Arbiter, Sat. c. 17, unkindly hints that it was easier to find gods in A. than men: Utique nostra regio tam præsentibus plena est Numinibus, ut facilius possis Deum, quam hominem inuenire.‡

Nor was the desire of the Athenians to hear something new unnatural. For theirs was a city without commerce, but whose traditions and memories led many who had leisure and liked discussion to resort thither. Among Alciphron's Letters (ii. 3) is one by Menander the poet, relating how he had declined the invitation of Ptolemy to leave A. and settle in Alexandria. In this charming jeu d'esprit we get a picture of A. in its decadence, which shows how delightful a place it was to live in for religious persons of leisure and cultivation.

ATIPHA (Ἀτεφά), 1 Es 5³².—See HATIPHA.

ATONEMENT.—By its derivation this word describes the setting 'at one' or reconciliation of two parties who have been estranged. It is used in the English Bible as the equivalent for various forms of the root כָּפַר in OT, and for καταλλαγή in NT. The verb כָּפַר (to cover) is used to describe the effect of the sacrifices at the original consecration of the high priest and the altar (Ex 29³⁶, Lv 8³⁵, Ezk 43²⁰ etc.), and of the annual sacrifices for the renewal of the consecration of the high priest and his household, of the people, and of the tabernacle (Lv 16¹⁰ etc.), on the day called expressly 'the Day of Atonement.'

It is used also to describe the effect of the sacrifices offered on behalf of the nation and of individual Israelites, occasionally in connexion with the 'whole burnt-offering' (Lv 1⁴), but more frequently in connexion with the various forms of 'sin' and 'trespass' offerings (Lv 4²⁰ etc., Nu 5⁸), the prescribed acknowledgment of guilt or defilement incurred accidentally or in ignorance.

It is used, besides, to describe the effect of the intercession of Moses at Sinai (Ex 32³⁰), of the incense offered by Aaron (Nu 16⁴⁶), and of Phinehas' summary judgment on Zimri (Nu 25¹³). The offences for which atonement is accepted in these cases go far beyond anything with which the Levitical sacrifices were appointed to deal, and so the way is prepared for the hope of atonement for 'moral offences as such' expressed in Ps 65³ 78³⁸ 79⁹, cf. Pr 16⁶, Dn 9²⁴.

The same verb when it describes the direct action of God is translated 'to pardon' (2 Ch 30¹⁸, cf. Ezk 16⁶³).

The subst. קָנָה (LXX λύτρον = 'ransom,' cf. Mk 10⁴⁵) is used of 'blood money' (Ex 21³⁰, Nu 35³¹), sanctioned on behalf of a man gored by an ox, but not in a case of homicide; and of the half-shekel paid at a census (Ex 30¹²).

רַחֲמֵי (LXX τὸ ἰλαστήριον) = the mercy-seat.

Two points in regard to the provision for atonement under the old covenant deserve especial attention. First, this provision is ascribed directly to divine appointment. The sacrifices, therefore, while bearing witness to the existence of an obstacle in the way of man's communion with God, were guarded against the gross misinterpretation which would represent them as human devices for overcoming God's reluctance to forgive. Second, the power of atonement resided in the blood, as containing the life of the sacrificial victim (Lv 17¹¹). Under cover of the blood of a victim slain by his own hand in acknowledgment of the righteousness of the divine judgment on his sin, and in virtue of the life still quick within it, liberated rather than destroyed by death, and brought by consecrated hands into direct contact with the symbols of the divine presence, the worshipper, in spite of his defilement, might himself draw nigh to God.

In NT, though the thought is fundamental, and finds expression in a variety of forms, e.g. Forgiveness, Propitiation, Redemption, the word Atonement or its equivalent Reconciliation (καταλλαγή, in LXX practically confined to 2 Mac 5²⁰) is found only in 2 Co 5^{18e}, Ro 5^{10e}, 11¹⁵, cf. Col 1². Here, as in OT, the use of the word presupposes an estrangement between God and man. On man's side this estrangement is the direct consequence of his sin. On God's side it is the direct consequence of His holiness and His love. Because He is holy and loving, He cannot be indifferent to sin. His wrath must rest upon the disobedient (Jn 3³⁶, cf. Ro 1¹⁸). Now in human wrath there mingles almost inevitably a feeling of personal irritation, pique, or resentment. The language of the NT is carefully chosen to guard against the supposition that any such shadow mars the purity of the divine indignation. Men are spoken of as God's enemies (ἐχθροί, Ro 5¹⁰, cf. 8⁷), but God is never spoken of as the enemy of man. Men are invited to accept the offered reconciliation; God is never brought before us as Himself needing to be appeased or reconciled. On the contrary, the atonement originates with Him. See esp. 2 Co 5¹⁹ 'God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself,' Ro 3²⁵ 'whom God set forth to be a propitiation.' The atonement, therefore, of which the gospel speaks, cannot, any more than the means of atonement provided under the law, be regarded as a device for overcoming any reluctance on God's part to forgive. It is the provision which He Himself has made for the removal of the obstacle to communion which sin has introduced.

Let us consider a little more closely what this obstacle is.

Sin is lawlessness (1 Jn 3⁴). It is the refusal on man's part, a refusal now as it were ingrained in his very nature, to remain in subjection to the law of God (Ro 8⁷). Each act of sin, therefore, is the outward sign of a spiritual alienation from God. But yet more. Each act of sin reacts upon the sinner, and increases his alienation. It not only weakens his power of moral self-determination, and so makes him more than ever a slave to his sin (Ro 7¹⁴); it incurs fresh guilt, and so adds new terror to the curse of the law (Gal 3¹³); it deepens his defilement, and so makes him shrink more than ever from the presence of God. And the wages of sin, which from another point of view express the judgment of God upon it, is death (Ro 6²³).

The power by which this obstacle has been overcome springs from the person of Christ. He Himself is our peace (Eph 2¹⁴). He, the Eternal Son of the Eternal Father, is the Lamb 'foreknown before the foundation of the world' (1 P 1²⁰), and the restoration of the broken harmony of the universe (Col 1²⁰, cf. Eph 1¹⁰) springs from His eternal surrender of Himself to do the Father's will (He 10⁹). This eternal sacrifice, which is thus seen to have its roots deep in the inmost mystery of the divine nature, was manifested in time, and became effectual for our redemption, when the Word was made flesh and revealed at once the relation in which mankind stands to Him and His own eternal relation to the Father, through a life on earth of perfect obedience to the Father's will. This obedience reached its final consummation when He shed His blood upon the cross, and His life, even as the life of the sacrificial victims in the OT, was set free by death for the work of our reconciliation. The atonement, therefore, is ascribed specifically to His death (Ro 5¹⁰), His cross (Eph 2¹⁶), and His blood (Col 1²⁰).

The cost of the atonement is represented from two sides,—as it affected the Father, who 'spared not His own Son, but freely gave Him up for us all' (Ro 8³²); and as it affected the Son, who 'suffered for us' (1 P 2²¹), and by 'whose stripes we are healed' (1 P 2²⁴, cf. Is 53⁵). The cost to the Father we clearly have no power to conceive, and the Bible makes no effort to define it. The sufferings of the Son in our flesh were human sufferings. We are able therefore in some measure to conceive of them. They were the direct result of His perfect acceptance of all the consequences that the presence of sin in the world entails upon us. They culminate on the one side in an agonising and shameful death; on the other in an unfathomable depth of spiritual suffering, when for a moment it seemed as if even God had forsaken Him (Mt 27⁴⁶, cf. Mt 26³⁸⁻⁴⁴ and parallels, He 5⁷).

Such light as we can receive on the relation of these sufferings to the work of our atonement is derived chiefly from the typical ritual of OT sacrifices. This included, as we have seen, (1) the presentation of an offering with an acknowledgment of guilt, (2) the slaughter of the victim, (3) the symbolic use of the blood so shed. Each of these elements found a place in the sacrifice on the cross.

(1) Christ Himself, as the Head of our race, presented Himself as an offering on our behalf. The laying down of His life is represented as His own deliberate voluntary act (Jn 10¹⁷). He made His soul an offering for sin (Is 53¹⁰, cf. Mt 26²⁸). He gave His life (ψυχή) a ransom for many (λύτρον ἀντι πολλῶν, Mt 20²⁸). This presentation involved, according to OT analogy, the surrender to death of an appointed victim, together with a confession of our guilt, and the acceptance, with a full acknowledgment of its justice, of the sentence of death which has been pronounced upon us for our sin.

(2) He was at the same time not only the Offerer but the Victim. His whole life was (as we have seen already) a life of perfect self-surrender to the loving service of His brethren in trustful obedience to His Father's will. His voluntary submission to the death of the cross for the redemption of His murderers, was the ultimate expression at once of His obedience and of His love. It is therefore the culminating point in His offering, and the final test of its completeness.

(3) The blood of the offering, which, again according to OT analogy, is regarded as the special seat of the atoning power, is represented as being sprinkled on those who enter the new covenant (He 12²⁴, 1 P 1²). It is brought into the most intimate and impressive relation with each one of them when he takes into his hands the Cup of the covenant (Mt 26²⁸ etc., cf. Ex 24⁸) and drinks of it according to the commandment.

In the power of the same blood, our Lord, as the great High Priest, has entered into the inmost heaven, and there without ceasing offers intercession (He 7²⁵) on our behalf. The blood thus becomes a living bond reuniting man to man and the whole race of man to God.

The effect of the atonement is therefore to remove altogether the obstacle introduced by sin, to undo the work of the devil (1 Jn 3⁸), and to open anew the way by which sinful men can return into communion with their Father in heaven (He 10²⁰). The blood of Christ, understood in the full measure of its spiritual reality, reveals the true law of man's being, and brings home to him the extent of his degradation. By its revelation of the love of God triumphant over sin, it wins men back from their spiritual alienation, making them ready to return to their allegiance, and willing to give up their sin. It cleanses their consciences from the stain of sin, and sets them free from the curse of the law, by the assurance that a perfect satisfaction has been offered to the righteous claims of the divine justice, and by enabling them to make their own the perfect confession of their sins that has already been offered in their name. It is the wellspring of a new power of moral self-determination by which they may be enabled, in spite of the tyrannous domination of past habits acquired and inherited (1 P 1¹⁸), and in the midst of an atmosphere of temptation, to live henceforward in obedience to God's will, submitting in patience and in hope to all the suffering that He may require from them, whether by way of discipline or of service. It thus robs even death itself of its sting.

It is true that we can but dimly see why such a sacrifice as the death of Christ should have been necessary, and guess in the light of partial human analogies at the secret of its power. But it is enough for our present guidance to know that the sacrifice itself has been offered, and that there have been men in every age who, from their own experience, have borne witness that it is effectual. See also FORGIVENESS and PROPITIATION.

ATONEMENT, DAY OF (יִוֵּם הַכִּפּוּרִים Lv 23²⁷ 25⁹, ἡμέρα (ἐξ)λασίου, dieſ expiationum, or (Lv 23²⁸) propitiationis).^{*}—The principal passages relating to this great annual fast of the Jews are Lv 16 and 23²⁶⁻³²; but some additional particulars are to be found in Nu 29⁷⁻¹¹, Ex 30¹⁰; cf. Lv 25⁹. All these passages, though probably belonging to different dates, are connected with the priestly code. The Day of Atonement, which was a day for the assembling of the people for divine worship (a 'holy convocation' Lv 23²⁷), was kept in the autumn, on the 10th day† of the 7th month, or, according to our reckoning, from the evening of the 9th till the evening of the 10th. The people were charged (Lv 23²⁶⁻³², cf. 16²⁹, 31), under pain of extermination from the community, to rest from every kind of work, and to 'afflict their souls,' the last phrase denoting the strict abstinence from food and drink which marked a day of fasting and self-humiliation. The special offerings for the day (in addition to the regular burnt-, meal-, and drink-offering), are prescribed in Nu 29⁷⁻¹¹; they consisted of a young bullock, a ram, and seven lambs of the first year, as burnt-offerings, with their appropriate meal-offerings, viz. three-tenths of an ephah for each bullock, two-tenths for the ram, and one-tenth for each lamb, also of a he-goat for a sin-offering. These additional offerings are similar to those for the 1st day of the month, and the 8th of the Feast of Booths (vv. 1-6, 35-38).

The distinctive ceremonial of the Day of Atonement is described at length in Lv 16. The high priest first selected for himself a young bullock for a sin-offering, and a ram for a burnt-offering; then, having bathed, he discarded his distinctive golden vestments, and arrayed himself in garments of white linen. After this he took from the people a ram for a burnt-offering, and two goats for a sin-offering, and proceeded to choose by lot from the two goats one for J' and one for AZAZEL‡ (Lv 16³⁻¹⁰). This done, he offered the bullock, which he had selected previously, for himself and his family; and having filled a censer with coals from the altar of burnt-offering, and taking with him a handful of incense, he entered the Most Holy Place, where he threw the incense upon the burning coals, causing thereby a cloud of smoke to envelop the ark and the mercy seat; after this he dipped his finger in the blood of the bullock, and sprinkled the blood once on the front (or east) side of the mercy seat, and seven times in the vacant space in front of the mercy seat (vv. 11-14). Having thus completed the atonement for himself and his house, the high priest returned to the court; and after killing the goat of the people which had been allotted to J', he again entered the Most Holy Place, and sprinkled its blood, in the same manner as that of the bullock, on the front of the mercy seat and before the mercy seat. The purification of the Most Holy Place being thus accomplished, the high priest went out into the Holy Place (called the 'tent of meeting' v. 17), and there performed a similar atoning ceremony. The details of this ceremony are not described in Lv 16; but in Ex 30¹⁰, which seems to be a later addition to P, we learn that the blood of the sin-offering of atonement was to be placed on the golden altar of incense, which is nowhere mentioned in Lv 16. During this time no one except the high priest was allowed to be present in the tabernacle. When the high priest again came out into the court, he completed the atonement of the sanctuary by placing on the horns of the altar of burnt-offering* some of the blood both of the bullock and of the goat, and with his fingers sprinkling the blood seven times on the altar (v. 15-19). The living goat was then brought near; and the high priest, having placed both hands upon its head, confessed over it all the sins and offences of the Israelites; after which the goat was led away, by a man standing in readiness, into the wilderness for Azazel, that it might bear the iniquities to a land 'cut off,' i.e. to one remote from human habitations, from which there was no chance of its bringing back again its burden of guilt (vv. 20-22). The high priest then returned to the Holy Place, and after bathing, and putting on his usual priestly garments, came out and offered the two burnt-offerings (vv. 3, 5) for himself and for the people (vv. 23, 24). Finally, the fat of the sin-offerings having been consumed in sweet smoke upon the altar,† the rest of their flesh (in accordance with the general rule, Lv 4^{11, 21} etc.) was carried outside the camp and destroyed by fire; those to whom this service was intrusted, and also the man who had led away the goat for Azazel, being not permitted to return to the congregation till they had bathed, and washed their clothes (vv. 25-28).

Two main questions arise in connexion with the Day of Atonement, which, as we shall see, are in some measure connected with each other: (1) to what date is the ceremonial enjoined in ch. 16 to be ascribed? (2) is the chapter describing it homogeneous in structure?

(1) We hear nothing of the observance of the Day of Atonement in pre-exilic times, nor is any mention made of this day in the earlier legal codes ('Book of the Covenant,' Dt, H). On the other hand, there are several points in the law regulating its observance which seem to connect it with the period after the exile, when the ceremonial aspects of sin and atonement at least occupied a more prominent place in the life and ‡ לִפְנֵי יְיָ, to make atonement for it, because, probably, by standing before J' during the ceremonial which follows, it shares in the atonement made thereby for the sanctuary, and so becomes fitted to bear away the sins of the people. * The altar of v. 18 cannot be the altar of incense. The purification of the Holy Place has been described in v. 16¹. For 'before J'' (v. 18), cf. Lv 15: J' dwells in the tabernacle (Ex 25⁸, 22), and the great altar stands in front of this.

† v. 25 seems to be misplaced. Its natural position would be immediately after v. 19 (cf. 48-10. 19. 26 etc.).

thought of the people than was the case previously. The phrase 'to afflict the soul' (עָנָה נַפְשׁוֹ, see Lv 16²⁹, 31 23²⁷, 29, 32, Nu 29⁷) occurs elsewhere only Is 58³, 5, 10 (exilic) and Ps 35¹³ (influenced by Jer). Fasting as a religious observance was practised among the Hebrews in ancient times; but we first hear of annual fasts on stated days in connexion with the fall of Jerusalem (Zec 7³⁻⁵ 8¹⁹). The elaborate ritual of the blood probably points to a comparatively late date (cf. Lv 4¹⁻²¹, one of the later portions of P; and contrast 9⁸⁻¹¹); while the nearest analogies to the public confession of sins (16²¹) are to be found in post-exilic writings (Ezr 9, Neh 1⁴⁻¹¹ 9³, Dn 9⁴⁻²⁰). Moreover, the priestly prophet Ezekiel, in his legislation for the restored people (ch. 40-48), prescribes a ceremonial, which, while its general aim is similar to that of the Day of Atonement, is much simpler in character; he enjoins, viz. (45¹⁸⁻²⁰), two solemn purifications of the sanctuary on the 1st day of the first month, and on the 1st of the seventh month (so LXX; see RVm), when a young bullock was to be slain for a sin-offering on behalf of all who might err through inadvertence or natural slowness (כַּאִשׁ שְׂגוּהָ, כַּכֹּהֵן), and the blood of the victim was to be placed on the doorposts of the temple, on the corners of the ledge of the altar, and on the gateposts of the inner court. The prophet, in his legislation for the future, attaches himself largely to existing usage; if, therefore, the law of Lv 16 had been in his day a time-honoured institution, would he have either disregarded it or stripped it of so many of its significant rites? Does it not seem more probable that the law of Lv 16 is a development of the simpler ceremonial prescribed by Ezekiel? Indeed, there are reasons for supposing that its introduction was decidedly later than Ezekiel's time. In Neh 8-10 we possess a fairly circumstantial account of the events of the 7th month of B.C. 444, including, for instance (8², 13-15), notices of what happened on the 1st and 2nd days of the month, and the observance, in accordance with Lv 23³⁹⁻⁴², of the Feast of Booths from the 15th to the 23rd days; that being so, it is remarkable, if the fast of the 10th day had been an established institution, that no mention should be made of its observance, especially when we are expressly told (9^{12a}) that the 24th day was observed as a day of fasting and of confession of sins. Reuss, indeed, on the ground that the fast of the 24th would have been superfluous, if the fast of the 10th had just preceded, argued (Hist. sainte et la loi, i. 260) that Lv 16 did not even form part of the law-book read by Ezra; but, as Kuenen (Hex. § 15. 32; cf. Dillm. NDJ p. 673; Stade, Gesch. ii. 182) points out, this argument is hardly decisive; the fast of the 24th is manifestly intended as a special token of humiliation for national shortcomings, preparatory to the conclusion of the covenant (9^{8a}); it has thus little or nothing in common with the annually-recurring Day of Atonement, and it might have been appointed whether Lv 16 was contained in Ezra's law-book or not. But Kuenen agrees that the non-mention of the day on the part of the well-informed narrator of Neh 8-10 is 'very strange,' if it were an established institution, and considers it to be an indication that it was introduced for the first time in the law-book of Ezra, though not observed at once, on account of its forming part of a new system, which had not yet been formally accepted by the people. Whether this argument be satisfactory or not, it is important to recollect that the argument against the antiquity of the Day of Atonement is not, as it is often represented as being (e.g. by Delitzsch, in his study on the subject, ZKWL, 1880, p. 173 ff.), solely an argumentum e silentio: that, as Kuenen observes (Th. Tijdschr. 1883, pp. 207-212), is but one argument out of many; the Day of Atonement is part of a system, the ceremonial system of the Priest's Code; when, therefore, the question of its antiquity is raised, it cannot be treated by itself, but forms part of a larger question, viz. the antiquity of that system as a whole, and must be answered in the same sense as that in which the wider question is answered.

(2) The second question is whether Lv 16 forms a homogeneous whole. The chapter is connected with the narrative of the death of Aaron's sons for offering strange fire (ch. 10; cf. 16¹, 2a 'that he die not,' and 12, 13; and contrast 'fire from the altar,' v. 12, with 'strange fire,' 10¹); but it treats of two distinct subjects, without clearly indicating the transition from one to the other. It opens with a warning addressed to Aaron against rashly entering the Most Holy Place, and prescribes the preliminary rites to be performed, whenever he may have occasion to do so.* It passes on to describe a solemn atoning ceremony to be performed for the tabernacle itself, and for the worshippers; and it concludes with the institution of an annual fast on the day of the atoning ceremony. This change of subject suggests a doubt whether the chapter in its present form can be wholly the work of one writer. Dillmann explains the change of subject, and the connexion with ch. 10, by the supposition that originally the chapter contained the description of a ceremony of purification, to be performed in consequence of the defilement brought upon the tabernacle by the sin of Nadab and Abihu. He supposes that directions were given for the repetition of the rite after any subsequent desecration; that in later times it had become the practice to perform this service once, and once only, in every year; and that the chapter was altered to suit the later practice. This explanation, however, requires us to supply a good deal which is not stated, and only indirectly suggested, by the present text.

A different solution of the difficulty is proposed by Benzinger. In an interesting and suggestive study on Lv 16 (ZATW, 1889, p. 65 ff.), Benzinger points out that the literary form of the chapter is imperfect. Thus v. 6 and v. 11a are really doublets, suggesting that vv. 7-10 are derived from another source; there is a sharp break between v. 28 and v. 29; vv. 29-34d are not really a summary of the foregoing verses, for they introduce some new points (fasting and the date), and, while mentioning the white garments of the high priest, say nothing about the more important ceremonies connected with the sprinkling of the blood, and the goat for Azazel; finally, v. 34b suggests the immediate carrying out of some definite command given to Moses. Accordingly, Benzinger, who is followed by Nowack (Hebr. Arch. ii. 182-194), distinguishes between earlier and later portions of the chapter, and considers that the older sections are vv. 1-4, 6-11a (omitting 'which is for himself') 12, 13, 34b (regulations defining the conditions under which Aaron, when occasion required, was to enter the Holy of Holies), and vv. 29-34a (a law prescribing a relatively simple rite of atonement—substantially identical with the inaugural ceremony of 9^{7a}—to be repeated annually on behalf of the people and sanctuary, and specifying the manner in which the day was to be observed publicly). In this form, he points out, the law for the Day of Atonement would agree closely with Lv 23²⁶⁻³², where also stress is laid on the necessity of fasting and abstinence from work, but no allusion is made to the special ceremonies prescribed in the central portion of ch. 16. The 'offering by fire' of 23²⁷, and the 'sin-offering of atonement' of Nu 29¹¹, would both be explained by the sacrifices alluded to in Lv 16^{32, 33} (or Nu 15²⁴⁻²⁶) and described more fully in Lv 9. The more elaborate ritual prescribed in the rest of the chapter (vv. 5, 7-10, 14-28)^{*} is, upon Benzinger's view, a subsequent development of that enjoined in vv. 30, 32, which, as it now stands, is interwoven with directions relating to Aaron alone, on account of its having become the custom for the high priest to enter the Holy of Holies on the Day of Atonement only.

That the ritual prescribed in this chapter was of gradual growth is indeed highly probable; but it may be doubted whether a merely literary analysis can adequately indicate its successive stages. The words not at all times in v. 2 suggest that even when the supposed earlier law was formulated, there were restrictions on the occasion as well as on the manner of the high priest's entering the Holy of Holies, and the terms of vv. 29-34^a appear to presuppose some preceding regulations, defining more particularly the character of the atoning ceremonies there alluded to.† It is true, 23²⁶⁻³² is parallel to 16^{29-34a}, in the stress which it lays upon the manner in which the Day is to be observed by the people; but it also presupposes in v. 23 some special atoning rites, the nature of which it does not itself more closely define.‡ Hence it seems that to limit the original regulations of the Day of Atonement to v. 29-34^a would leave them less systematic and complete than is probable. The more elaborate ritual prescribed for the blood, as compared with 9^{7, 9, 15}, and even with 4^{6, 7, 17, 18}, is not necessarily due to its being a later development: it may be due to the special solemnity of the occasion, a ceremonial enacted once a year only on behalf of the entire nation. The chapter undoubtedly deals with two distinct subjects (the conditions under which the high priest might enter the Most Holy Place, and the annual Day of Atonement for the sins of the nation), which it imperfectly connects together. We may conjecture that the association of these two subjects is due to the fact that the occasions of the high priest's entry into the Most Holy Place came gradually to be limited to the single annual Day of Atonement: it is also highly probable (esp. in view of Ezk 45¹⁸⁻²⁰) that the ritual of this day was originally simpler than that now prescribed in Lv 16; but it may be doubted whether the successive stages in the amalgamation and development of the two ceremonies can be distinguished by means of a literary analysis.

The Mishnic treatise Yômā (i.e. the Day) gives several fresh details respecting the ceremonies observed on the Day of Atonement in the time of the Second Temple.§ Minute directions were given to ensure the ceremonial purity of the high priest on that day. For the seven days preceding he dwelt in a special chamber, and not in his own house. It is expressly stated that he entered four times into the Most Holy Place, viz. on the three occasions suggested by Lv 16^{12, 14, 15}, and again after the evening sacrifice, to bring out the censor, and the plate which had held the incense. It is said that a stone three fingers high stood in the Holy of Holies in the place of the ark (v. 2). Immediately before slaying the sin-offering for himself, the high priest, laying his hands upon it, made the following confession: 'I beseech Thee, O LORD, I have done iniquitously, I have transgressed, I have sinned before Thee, I, and my house, and the sons of Aaron, Thy holy people. I beseech Thee, O Lord, forgive (כַּפֵּר), now, the iniquities, and the transgressions, and the sins, wherein I have done iniquitously, and transgressed, and sinned before Thee, I, and my house, and the sons of Aaron, Thy holy people' (iv. 2). The blood of each of the sin-offerings was sprinkled by the high priest, once upwards and seven times downwards, first on the Holy of Holies, and afterwards upon the veil in the Holy Place: lastly, mixing the blood of the two victims, he put some of the mixture on the altar of incense, and poured out the remainder at the foot of the altar of burnt-offering (vi. 1, 2). With regard to the two goats, we are told that they were to resemble one another as closely as possible (vi. 1; cf. Barnab. 7⁸ ὁμοίους). The lots were made of boxwood, and afterwards of gold; the high priest drew out one lot in each hand, and then tied a 'tongue' of scarlet cloth* upon the neck of the goat destined for Azazel. The words of the high priest's confession were, 'We beseech thee, O LORD, Thy people, the house of Israel, have done iniquitously, transgressed, and sinned before Thee. We beseech Thee, O LORD, forgive, now, the iniquities, the transgressions, and the sins, wherein Thy people, the house of Israel, have done iniquitously, transgressed, and sinned before Thee' (vi. 2). The goat was led away, accompanied by some of the nobles of Jerusalem; and its arrival at a place which was regarded as the edge of the wilderness was signalled back to the high priest in the temple. Finally, the goat was conducted by a single man to a steep place called Šuk, where it was thrown backwards over the edge of the cliff, and dashed to pieces among the rocks (vi. 6-8). The site has been identified by Schick (ZDPV iii. 214 ff.) with a crag near the village of Bêt-hudédîn, on the road running through Bethany in the wilderness, 12 miles east of Jerusalem (see AZAZEL).

The Day of Atonement represents the culminating institution of the Levitical system. Not only, from a merely formal point of view, does Lv 16 form the climax of the sacrificial and purificatory ordinances contained in Lv 1-15, but the ceremonial itself is of a peculiarly comprehensive and representative character. It was a yearly atonement for the nation as a whole (including the priests); and not only for the nation, but also for the sanctuary, in its various parts, in so far as this had been defiled during the past year by the sins of the people, in whose midst it stood. The sins thus atoned for must not, however, be supposed to be those committed 'with a high hand' (Nu 15^{30c}), i.e. defiantly and wilfully; but sins of ignorance and frailty (ἀγνοήματα, He 9⁷), such as human nature, even when striving after God, is ever liable to.†

* לישן של הוריות: Barnab. 7⁸ τὸ ἐπιση τὸ κόκκινον.

† The Jews, as Danz [see ad fin.], pp. 1010-1012, shows from the Mishna (Shebu'oth 16), Maimonides (Comment. on Yômā 42), and Abarbanel (שׁוּרֵי הַתּוֹרָה), Venice, 1534, fol. 251, col. 3, l. 14 ff.), in view of the comprehensive terms of Lv 16^{16, 21, 30}, held that the sacrifices of this day made atonement for all sins of every kind, whether done involuntarily or deliberately; but this is an exaggeration which is in conflict with the general theory of the Jewish sacrifices. The sin-offering made atonement only for sins committed 'in error,' i.e. accidentally and involuntarily (Lv 4^{2, 13, 22, 27}, Nu 15²⁴⁻²⁹), not for those committed 'with a high hand' (Nu 15^{30c}), i.e. defiantly and deliberately; and it is incredible, in spite of the terms of Lv 16^{16, 21}, that the sacrifices of this day can have so far deviated in principle from the general theory of the priestly legislation as to have been supposed to atone, e.g., for the sin of an impenitent murderer. The ceremonial of the Day of Atonement was designed in fact to effect

* Except v. 17b and v. 28b (from and make), which Benzinger treats as later harmonistic glosses.

† The circumstantial enumeration of v. 33 must surely presuppose something more than either the ordinary sin-offering of the community (Nu 15²²⁻²⁶), or even Lv 9^{9, 15}; moreover, it exactly summarises the principal present contents of vv. 14-28.

‡ The 'offering made by fire' of 23²⁷ will not be the special atoning sacrifice intended; for that offering is common to most of the sacred seasons mentioned in ch. 23 (v. 8, 13b, 25, 36). Nu 29⁷⁻¹¹ also alludes (v. 11) to the 'sin-offering of atonement'; but the calendar of sacred seasons, contained in Nu 28-29, may be of later date than the present form of Lv 16.

§ Cf. Ep. Barnab. c. 7 (with Gebhardt and Harnack's notes), where some of the same details are alluded to.

The ceremonial was enacted at the central sanctuary; but the individual Israelites, by their abstinence from labour and fasting, not only expressed at the same time their humiliation for sin, but also signified their co-operation in the offices of the day; provision was thus made for the ceremonial being more than a mere opus operatum. As it was the highest atoning ceremony of the year, the blood was not merely applied, as in other cases (Lv 4), to the altar of burnt-offering, or even to the altar of incense; it was taken into the Holy of Holies, and sprinkled, not once only, but seven times, as close as possible to the place immediately associated with the presence of J^h (Ex 25²², Nu 7⁸⁹). Once a year the sins of the people were thus solemnly atoned for, and the nation's lost holiness was restored (v. 30 'to cleanse you: from all your sins shall ye be clean before J^h'). The slain goat made atonement for the people's sins, and restored their peace and fellowship with God; the goat over which the people's sins were confessed, and which was afterwards sent away to Azazel in the wilderness, symbolised visibly their complete removal from the nation's midst (Ps 103¹², Mic 7¹⁹): 'a life was given up for the altar, and yet a living being survived to carry away all sin and uncleanness': the entire ceremonial thus symbolised as completely as possible both the atonement for sin, and the entire removal of the cause of God's alienation.

As regards the part taken in the office by the high priest, it is to be observed especially that the ceremonial of the Day of Atonement was the highest exercise of his mediatorial office: he performed an atoning rite on behalf of the entire people; and, represented by him, the entire people had access on that day to the presence of J^h. As the representative of a sinful people, he naturally discarded his gorgeous high-priestly dress,* and assumed an attire, which, being plain and destitute of ornament, was such as became a suppliant suing for forgiveness; while, being white, it symbolised the purity and innocence required in those who appear in the immediate presence of the Holy One (cf. the angels in Ezk 9²⁻⁵, 11 10² 6, 7, Dn 10⁵ 12⁶ 7). Nor can he, even then, complete the atonement for the people, until he has first offered atonement for his own sins; and when he enters the Holy of Holies, the incense burnt by him there forms, further, a protecting cloud, coming as a veil between himself and the holiness of J^h, and at the same time possessing a propitiatory efficacy (Nu 16^{46f}).

Jos. (Ant. III. x. 3) gives a short account of the ceremonies of the Day of Atonement; and Philo, in his treatise περὶ τῆς ἐξομότητος, § 23 (II. 296, Mangey), draws out the ethical teaching which he understands them to imply. Allusions to the holy day are also found in Sir 50^{56f}, Ac 27⁹, He 9⁷.

The later Jews were not unconscious of the deeper spiritual truths of which the ceremonial of the Day of Atonement was the expression. Philo, for instance (l.c.), speaks of it as an occasion for the discipline of self-restraint in regard to bodily indulgences: the more effective, as it came at a season of the year when the fruits of the earth had just been gathered in, and the temptation to an ideal atonement and reconciliation on behalf of the nation, as such; its benefits extending to individuals, only in so far as they had sinned involuntarily, or were truly penitent. Comp. Oehler, § 140 (Eng. tr. ii. 43 ff.); Riehm, AT Theol. § 37. 2; v. Orelli, in Herzog², xvi. 414; R. W. Dale, The Atonement, pp. 85, 466-470; C. G. Montefiore, The Bible for Home Reading, 1896, p. 144 ff. (where the ancient significance of this annual rite is well pointed out).

* His dress became, in fact, almost that of the ordinary priests, except that he had still a 'turban' (כַּטְמֶנֶת)—though only one of white linen, not his usual decorated one (Ex 28^{36f});—instead of a 'cap' (כַּפֹּתֵי, Ex 28⁴⁰), and a plain linen 'sash' (אֲבֵנִים), instead of a coloured one (Ex 28⁴⁰).

indulgence would be naturally the stronger; abstinence at such a season would raise men's thoughts from the gifts to the Giver, who could sustain life καὶ διὰ τούτων καὶ ἀνευ τούτων. Those who took part in the prayers for the day asked for forgiveness, not in dependence upon their own merits, ἀλλὰ διὰ τὴν ἕλεον φύσιν τοῦ συγγνώμην πρὸ κολάσεως ὀρίζοντος (cf. Vit. Mos. ii. 4, II. 138; Leg. Cai. 39, II. 591). The Mishna also is careful to teach that the ceremonies of the Day of Atonement are ineffectual unless accompanied by repentance. 'Death and the Day of Atonement work atonement, where there is repentance (תְּשׁוּבָה). Repentance makes atonement for slight transgressions, both of omission and of commission; and in the case of grave ones, it suspends punishment till the Day of Atonement comes, and brings atonement. If a man says, "I will sin, and (then) repent, I will sin, and (then) repent," Heaven does not give him the means of practising repentance; and if he says, "I will sin, and the Day of Atonement will bring atonement," the Day of Atonement will bring him no atonement' (Yōmā, viii. 8-9).

The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews contrasts (9^{6f}) the work of the high priest on the Day of Atonement with the superior atoning efficacy of the work of Christ. The Jewish high priest entered once yearly* into the Holy of Holies, with the blood of appointed victims: Christ entered once for all into the true sanctuary, the actual presence of God, through His own blood; He obtained not a temporary, but an eternal deliverance (9¹¹⁻¹²), His blood is far more efficacious for the cleansing and renovation of human nature (9¹¹⁻¹⁴, 22-8) than that which was offered under the Jewish law. And whereas, under the Law, full access to God was limited to the high priest, and to him, moreover, under many restrictions of time and mode, Christ has opened a new and living way, by which those whose hearts are properly purged from an evil conscience may at all times have free access to the Father (9⁹⁻¹⁰ 10¹⁹⁻²²).

ATROTH-SHOPHAN (אֲתֹרֹת שׁוֹפְחָן). LXX has Σωφάρ and γῆν Σωφάρ, as well as Σωφάν [Swete's notes].—A town of Gad (Nu 32³⁵). The identification is doubtful, as the tribes of Gad and Reuben seem confused, Dibon, Ataroth, and Aroer being given

* ἄπαξ τοῦ ἱναυροῦ (97). Exactly the same expression is used by Philo (Leg. Gai. l.c.; cf. De Mon. ii. 2, II. 223; and ἄπαξ κατ' ἱναυρόν, Jos. BJ v. 7 end., 3 Mac 1¹¹). The meaning is, of course, on one day in the year, not on one occasion: Lv 16¹³⁻¹⁵ implies more than one entrance on the day; according to the Mishna, the high priest entered four times, viz. with the incense (Yōmā, v. 1), with the blood of the bullock (v. 3), with the blood of the goat (v. 4), and at the close of the day, after the ordinary evening burnt-offering, to fetch out the censor and incense-dish, which he had left there (vii. 4).

(v.³⁴) as cities of Gad, while they certainly were in Reuben's territory. If Atroth-shophan lay near Ataroth, it may be, as Tristram suggests (Land of Moab, p. 276), that the cone-shaped Jebel 'Attarus represents the former and Khürbet 'Attarus the latter. If it lay near Jazer and Jogbehah (which see), named immed. after it, it must be sought farther N.—possibly at Safût beside the latter.

ATTAI (עַטַּי).—1. A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 2^{85, 86}). 2. A Gadite warrior who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12¹¹). 3. One of Rehoboam's sons (2 Ch 11²⁰).

ATTAIN has now lost its literal meaning 'to reach a place,' which occurs in Ac 27¹² 'if by any means they might attain to Phenice' (RV 'reach Phoenix'). Elsewhere in AV the meaning is fig., as now. In Ph 3¹¹ the same Gr. verb (καταρτάω) is used as in Ac 27¹² just quoted, 'if by any means I might a. unto the resurrection from the dead.' But in the next verse ('not as though I had already a^{ed}') the verb is different (λαμβάνω, RV 'obtained'), being connected rather with the verb (καταλαμβάνω) tr^d 'apprehend' in the same verse. See APPREHEND. In Ph 3¹⁶ 'whereto we have already a^{ed}', there is no word corresp. to 'already' in Gr., 'already a^{ed}' is an attempt to tr. φθάνω, which, in Ro 9³¹ is tr^d 'attain' simply. But in Ph 3¹² an adv. (ἤδη) is used. In 1 Ti 4⁵ AV gives a wrong direction to the thought: 'good doctrine, wherunto thou hast attained' (Gr. παρακολούθω, RV correctly, 'which thou hast followed,' adding until now to complete the sense). J. HASTINGS.

ATTALIA (Ἀττάλια) was a city on the coast of Pamphylia, founded by Attalus II. Philadelphus (B.C. 159-138), as the harbour (Ac 14²⁶) through which the S. parts of the great Pergamian kingdom might communicate with the S. sea, with Syria, and with Egypt; and throughout subsequent history it has retained its name and its importance as a seaport. It is now (or at least was until steamships revived some other harbours like Mersina) the chief harbour of the S. coast of Asia Minor, bearing the name Adalia. In the Byzantine ecclesiastical system A. was originally subject to Perga, the metropolis of Pamphylia Secunda, but in 1084 it was made a metropolis; there can be no doubt that this elevation in rank was due to the fact that Perga had completely decayed, and was a mere name, giving a title to the metropolitan bishop. The small harbour of A. is still used by boats, though steamships anchor outside, and it was in use in the end of the 12th cent. (Anna Commena, ii. p. 113). The river Catarrhactes flowed into the sea near A., though it has now been diverted into so many channels for irrigation and other purposes that it hardly deserves to be called a river. The cults mentioned at A. seem all to spring from its Pergamian origin, as Zeus Soter, Athena, Apollo Archegetes.

LITERATURE.—The best account of A. is in Lanckronski, Städte Pamphyliens und Pisidiens, i. pp. 6-32 and 153-163; see also Beaufort, Karamania; Spratt and Forbes, Lycia.

ATTALUS (Ἀττάλος, 1 Mac 15²²).—Attalus II. Philadelphus was king of Pergamum 159-138 B.C. He promoted the imposture of Alexander Balas, who claimed to be a son of Antiochus Epiphanes (Justin, xxxv. 1), and sent a body of troops to Syria to support the pretender. When the embassy sent by Simon Maccabaeus came to Rome (B.C. 139), the Senate passed a decree in favour of the Jews, and wrote to the kings of Pergamum, Egypt, Syria, Cappadocia, and Parthia, and to several small autonomous States, instructing them to respect the independence of the Jewish territory. Josephus (Ant. XIV. viii. 5) records a decree of the Senate in favour of the Jews, which he assigns to the time of Hyrcanus II. But the terms and circumstances of this decree resemble so closely those of the decree referred to in 1 Mac 15¹⁹⁻²⁴, that many modern scholars consider that the Senatus-consultum preserved by Josephus is really to be connected with the embassy of Simon. Cf. esp. Schürer, HJP i. i. 266 ff. H. A. WHITE.

ATTENDANCE in the obs. meaning of attention is found 1 Ti 4¹³ 'Till I come give a. (RV 'heed') to reading.' Cf. Barrow, Works, vol. iii. sec. 22, 'What is learning but diligent attendance to instruction of masters?' The same Gr. verb (προσέχω) is used He 7¹³ 'no man gave a. at the altar'; but it is generally tr^d 'give heed to,' as Ac 8^{6, 10, 11}; in 1 Ti 3³ it is used in a bad sense 'given to much wine.' In 1 Mac 15³² attendance = retinue.

ATTENT and 'attentive' were both in use, and both are found in AV without difference of meaning, the former in 2 Ch 6⁴⁰ 'let thine ears be attent unto the prayer,' and 7¹⁶. J. HASTINGS.

ATTHARATES (A Ἀτθαράτης, B Ἀτταρατή), 1 Es 9⁴⁰.—A corruption of the title 'the Tirshatha,' cf. Neh 8⁹, and see Atharias.

ATHARIAS (Ἀθαρίας, AV Atharias).—A corruption of תִּרְשָׁתָא 'the Tirshatha,' which appears as a proper name in 1 Es 5⁴⁰, cf. Ezr 2⁶³ Ἀθερσαθά, A (Ἀθερσαθ, B). The mention of 'Nehemias and Atharias' in 1 Es is doubly a mistake; Zerubbabel the Tirshatha is referred to.

ATTIRE.—See DRESS.

ATTUS (A Ἀττούς, B om., Tisch.³ Λαττούς, AV Lettus), 1 Es 8²⁹ called son of Sechenias.—He was grandson of Shechaniah (1 Ch 3²²). The same as Hattush, Ezr 8², where 'of the sons of Shechaniah' has been wrongly attached to the next clause. The form in AV and Tisch. is due to confusion of A and A. H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

AUDIENCE.—Now 'the people gathered to hear,' signifies always in AV after Lat. audientia, the act of hearing or attention to what is spoken. In OT the word is simply 'ears' (אָזְנוֹת), as Gn 23¹⁰ 'in the a. of the children of Heth.' In NT 'give a.' occurs Ac 13¹⁶ 15¹² 22²², where the Gr. is simply ἀκούω, hear; so Lk 20⁴⁶ 'in the a. of all the people'; but Lk 7¹ 'when he had ended all his sayings in the a. of the people,' the Gr. is εἰς τὰς ἀκοάς, 'in the ears.' J. HASTINGS.

AUGIA (Ἀγία), 1 Es 5³⁸.—A daughter of Zorzelleus or Barzillai. Her descendants by Jaddus were among the priests who could not trace their genealogy after the return under Zerubbabel, and were removed from the priesthood. Her name is not given in the lists of Ezr and Neh, and is omitted here by the Vulg.; perhaps it has arisen out of 'the Gileadite,' which follows Barzillai in those lists. H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

AUGURY.—Lv 19²⁶, Dt 18^{10, 14}, 2 K 21⁶, 2 Ch 33⁶, all RV, for AV 'times.' See DIVINATION.

AUGUSTUS (Αὐγουστος, Lk 2¹; Σεβαστός, Ac 25^{21, 25}).—1. The first Roman emperor. His original name was that of his father, Caius Octavius; as the heir of Cæsar, who was his grand-uncle, he received the names Julius Cæsar; in his subsequent career he was designated Caius Julius Cæsar Octavianus. The title Augustus was given him by the Senate after he had attained to supreme power. Augustus was born B.C. 63.

After spending a studious youth, he came suddenly to the front at the death of Cæsar (B.C. 44), when he began to manifest the singular adroitness of character by which he made and maintained his position. Marching against Antony ostensibly in defence of the republic, he came to terms with the usurper. At first he had the chief place in a triumvirate. But one after another his rivals were removed out of his way, till the defeat of Antony at Actium (B.C. 31) left him undisputed master of the Roman world. In B.C. 29 he returned to Rome, and thenceforth ruled autocratically under the forms of republicanism, establishing and preserving order throughout his wide dominions, till he died in old age, saddened by family trouble, morose and suspicious, leaving Tiberius, whom he had already associated with himself in the government, as his successor (A.D. 14). As the Jews were subject to Rome, Augustus became their supreme ruler. After the battle of Actium, Herod, previously a supporter of Antony, passed over to the victorious side, and was confirmed in his kingdom by Augustus, who added to his territory on the occasion of a subsequent visit to Syria (B.C. 20, Jos. Ant. xv. x. 3). In honour of the emperor, Herod erected a marble temple at Panias, built the capital, Cæsarea (B.C. 10), and rebuilt Samaria, calling it Sebaste. After Herod's death Augustus carried out his wishes in the division of his kingdom among his sons (Jos. Ant. xvii. xi. 4), but subsequently joined Judæa and Samaria to the province of Syria, exiling their ruler Archelaus (Jos. Ant. xvii. xiii. 2). Jesus Christ was born in the time of Augustus, and was about eighteen years old when the emperor died. Augustus ordered a more or less complete census to be taken on four occasions, viz. in B.C. 26 and 6, A.D. 4 and 14 (Lk 2¹).

2. The title of subsequent Roman emperors. The Augustus (Σεβαστός) mentioned in Ac 25^{21, 25} (AV) is Nero. In RV the word is translated 'the emperor.'

AUGUSTUS' BAND (Ac 27¹ σπεῖρα Σεβαστή, RV 'the Augustan Band').—A similar name is the Italian Band (Ac 10¹ σπεῖρα Ἰταλική). In each case RVm has 'cohort' for 'band.'

The two designations have been fully discussed by E. Egli (to whom I am chiefly indebted in the following article) in ZWTh. xxvii. (1884) p. 10 ff. In both cases it may be said that there is no reference to Roman legionaries. Judæa from 6 A.D. to shortly before 70 A.D. was in the position of the 'inermes provinciæ,' and was garrisoned only by auxiliary troops. The bulk of these auxiliaries were provincials; thus, in the case of Cæsarea, Josephus tells us (BJ II. xiii. 7; cf. Ant. XIX. ix. 2) that the larger part of the garrison consisted of Syrians.

The Augustan and Italian bands (cohorts), therefore, were not in any case legionary. The latter, no doubt, was one of the many 'cohortes civium Romanorum,' 'cohortes Italicorum voluntariorum,' which consisted of volunteers recruited in Italy, i.e. for the most part of Italians who had been unable to find service in the Prætorian Guard.

The Augustan band (which may or may not be identical with the Italian band) had the name 'Augustan' as a title of honour. We read on an inscription: 'Ala Aug(usta) ob virtutem appellata' (Orelli's Corpus, No. 3412). Egli, following Schürer, is inclined to accept as proved that this title of honour was sometimes borne by auxiliary as well as by legionary troops. We have, however, no monumental evidence to prove that any Cæsarean cohort was called 'augusta.'

As regards strength, a cohort sometimes numbered 1000, sometimes 500 men. As regards composition, a cohort was sometimes made up of 760 infantry and 240 cavalry. Such a cohort was called a 'militaria equitata.' See BAND, CAPTAIN.

AUL is the spelling in mod. edd. of AV. The spelling of 1611 was 'aule.' Wyclif (1382) has 'alle,' Ex 21⁶ 'he shal thril his ear with an alle' (ed. 1388 'a nal,' a mistake arising from joining the n of 'an' to 'awl,' the forms nal, nall, nalle, and nawl being found. Cf. Topsell (1607), 'The worm . . . must be pulled out by some nail or needle'). Geneva Bible has 'awle,' (Coverdale, 'botkin'), RV 'awl.' See AWL.

AUTEAS (Αύραλος, Hodiah RVm, Hodijah AVm).—A Levite who taught the law under Ezra (1 Es 9⁴⁸). Called Hodiah, Neh 8⁷.

AUTHORIZED VERSION.—See VERSIONS.

AVARAN (Αβάραν, Vulg. Abaron, Syr. ܐܘܪܐܢ Ḥauran), 1 Mac 2⁵, but in 6⁴³ Σαυαράν A, Αύραν * V, Vulg. Saura, Syr. as before), surname of Eleazar, the brother of Judas Maccabæus. The name probably signifies 'pale' (קָרָן, from חָרַר, to be white, or pale).

H. A. WHITE.

AVEN (אָבֵן).—A place-name occurring in this form in Ezk 30¹⁷. The LXX gives Ἐλιον πόλις, the usual Gr. name of On, and it is evident that the name was intentionally distorted from On to Aven, 'idolatry' (see Oxf. Heb. Lex.), by a punning change of vocalisation quite permissible in Heb. The slight was the more contemptuous, as On was sacerdotally the most important city in Egypt. With regard to the context it should be remembered that On, lying on the main road between the heart of Egypt (at Memphis) and Syria, has been a notable battlefield on many occasions, even since the ruin of the city. See BETH-SHEMESH and ON.

The Plain (אָבֵן bēkabh) of Aven (Am 1⁵, RV 'the valley of Aven') is probably the Plain of Cœle-Syria, so called from the idolatrous worship of the Sun in the great temple of Baalbek.

F. LL. GRIFFITH.

AVENGE is found in AV both as trans. and intrans. verb. 1. As a trans. verb the object may be (1) a person, and then the meaning is 'to vindicate' by punishing the offender. Thus (a) actively, Lk 13⁸ 'A. me of mine adversary,' Nu 31⁸ 'a. the LORD of Midian' (RV 'execute the LORD's vengeance on M. '); (b) pass., 1 S 14²⁴ 'that I may be a^d on mine enemies'; (c) reflex., 2 S 13¹⁹ 'the LORD hath a^d him of his enemies.' The prep. that governs the offender is indifferently on or of. (2) The object may be a thing, and the meaning 'to take satisfaction for,' as Dt 32⁴³ 'he will a. the blood of his servants.*' 2. As an intrans. vb. it is rare, and occurs in AV once only, Lv 19¹⁸ 'Thou shalt not a. nor bear any grudge against

* Once the person on whom the vengeance falls is made the subject of the verb, Gn 4²⁴ 'If Cain shall be avenged sevenfold, truly Lamech seventy and sevenfold.' This is the sense in which the passage is taken by the Douay Bible, which translates, 'Sevenfold vengeance shall be taken of Cain,' and adds the comment, 'by prolongation of his miserable life till his seventh generation, when one of his own issue slew him.' AV follows the Geneva, which has the marg. note, 'He mocked at God's sufferance in Cain, jesting as though God would suffer none to punish him, and yet give him licence to murder others.' But the Heb. means, 'if Cain shall take vengeance for any wrong done him, Lamech (perhaps with the use of the new weapons) much more.' So Del.: 'Denn siebenfache wird Cain gerächt,' Dillm. etc. Cf. G. W. Wade, The Book of Genesis (1886), p. 214, 'The Song of Lamech celebrates the invention of weapons, and implies that the possession of them confers the power of exacting greater vengeance than that demanded by God against anyone who might slay Cain.'

the children of thy people.' In mod. usage 'a.' is retained for the sense of just vengeance, while 'revenge' is used for the gratification of resentment. This distinction does not obtain in AV, but RV has endeavoured to introduce it. Thus Jer 15¹⁵ 'a. me of my persecutors' (for AV 'revenge me'), Nah 1² 'The LORD is a jealous God and asth (AV 'revenge'), and 2 Co 10⁶ 'being in readiness to a. all disobedience' (AV 'revenge'). Cf. also 'avenger' for 'revenger' in Nu 35^{19, 21, 24, 25, 27}, 2 S 14¹¹, Ro 13⁴, and 'avenging' (subst.) for 'revenge,' 2 Co 7¹¹. Again, Lv 19¹⁸ 'thou shalt not a.' (RV 'take vengeance'); in Ro 12¹⁹ 'Avenge not yourselves, beloved,' is retained, because the ref. is to righteous vengeance. Avenger of blood. See GOEL. Avengement is found 2 S 22^{48m}, and avengements Ps 18^{47m} for 'vengeance.' Cf. Edward Irving, Babylon, ii. 319, 'The Lord, in all His avengements, hath . . . an eye . . . to the reformation of the wicked.' J. HASTINGS.

AVOID.—This verb is used thirteen times in AV (counting Wis 16^{4, 18} one), yet it does not twice translate the same word. In 1 S 18¹¹ there is an instance of the intrans. use, 'David a^{ed} out of his presence twice.' Cf. North, Plutarch, 'they made proclamation . . . that all the Volsces should avoid out of Rome before sunset.' In this sense 'avoid' is most frequently used in the imperative. Thus Coverdale's tr. of Mt 16²³ is 'Auoyde fro me, Sathan.' Cf. Shaks. Comedy of Errors, IV. iii. 48—
'Satan, avoid! I charge thee, tempt me not!'
J. HASTINGS.

AVOUCH.—Dt 26^{17, 18} only, 'Thou hast a^{ed} the LORD this day to be thy God . . . and the LORD hath a^{ed} thee this day to be his peculiar people.' Advocare became in French first avouer, whence Eng. 'avow,' and then avochier, whence 'avouch,' the latter with a more technical meaning, 'to call on one in law as defender, guarantor,' etc. In AV avouch is scarcely to be distinguished from the use of 'avow' with a person as obj. 'to acknowledge, declare to be one's own.' J. HASTINGS.

AVVA, AVYIM, AVYITES (אֲבָיִם, cf. Ebaïtes).—The spelling Avim, Avites is incorrect. 1. A people which lived in villages near Gaza, and was superseded by the Capthorite Philistines (Dt 2²³). In the Sept. their name is confounded with that of the Hivvites, and some scholars have regarded them as a branch of the Hivvites. That they were not so, but were of the giant peoples of Pal., is rendered probable by two considerations: (1) they are spoken of in Dt 2 precisely as are the other giant peoples, except that they are not expressly said to be rephaim; (2) the name is uniformly used in the plural ('the Avvim,' that is, the Avvites, not the Avvite), a usage by which the Philistines as a whole, and the several giant peoples, are distinguished from the Can. peoples. That they once had possessions in the mountain country, as well as near Gaza, may be probably inferred from the fact that one of the towns of Benjamin was called 'the Avvim' (Jos 18²⁸). The statement that the Capthorim destroyed them does not necessarily imply that they were then exterminated; and we find them mentioned among the peoples that Joshua failed to conquer, along with the Philistines but not of them, the Avvites going along with the Gazite, the Gittite, the Ekronite, etc. (Jos 13³). Presumably, these Avvim are to be identified with the Anakim who were left over in Gaza, Gath, and Ashdod (Jos 11²³), and were the ancestors of the giants of David's time. See GIANT, REPHAIM.

2. People from Avva (cf. Ivvah, 2 K 18³⁴ 19¹³, Is 37¹³), whom the king of Assyria settled in N. Israel after the capture of Samaria, and who set up idolatrous worship there (2 K 17^{24, 31}).

W. J. BEECHER.

AVYIM (אֲבָיִם), Jos 18²⁸.—A town of Benjamin, unknown. See preceding art.

AWAIT.—Only Ac 9²⁴ 'their laying await (Gr. ἡ ἐπιβουλὴ αὐτῶν, RV 'their plot') was known of Saul.' Await is often read as if it were an adv.; it is, however, a subst. Tindale has simply 'There awayte wer known of Saul.' Blount, Law Dict. (1691), says, 'Await seems to signify what we now call waylaying or lying in wait, to execute some mischief.' J. HASTINGS.

AWAY WITH.—1. Is 1¹³ 'the calling of assemblies, I cannot away with.' Although with the force of a verb, it is really an adv. with the verb elided, get away with, i.e. get on with, tolerate. Cf. More, Utopia, p. 165 (Arber ed.), 'He could not away with the fashions of his country folk'; and Sanderson, Serm. (1621), 'He being the Father of lyes . . . cannot away with the Truth.' The Heb. has a still greater ellipsis than the Eng., being simply אֲנִי לֹא יָכוֹל I cannot. Such verbs, however, as לָכֵן to be able, מָנָן to refuse, are really trans. in Heb. See Davidson, Syntax, p. 129. 2. Other elliptical expressions, as Ex 19²⁴ 'Away, get thee down' (RV 'Go, get thee down'), Ac 22²² 'Away with such a fellow from the earth,' are easily explained and still in use. 3. 'Make him away' in 1 Mac 16²²='make away with him' (RV 'destroy him'; cf. Wis 12⁹ AV 'to destroy them at once,' RV 'to make away with them at once'). J. HASTINGS.

AWE.—Besides He 12²⁸ RV (for AV 'reverence,' Gr. δέος), only in the phrase 'stand in awe.' AV gives Ps 4⁸ (אֲנִי), 33⁸ (אֲנִי), and 119¹⁶¹ (אֲנִי). RV retains these, changing also 'fear' into 'stand in awe' in Ps 22²⁸ (אֲנִי), Is 29²³ (אֲנִי); and 'was afraid' into 'stood in awe of' in 1 S 18¹⁸ (אֲנִי), Mal 2⁵ (אֲנִי). Ruskin (Mod. Painters, II. III. i. 14, § 26) says that awe is the contemplation of dreadfulness from a position of safety, as a stormy sea from the shore; while fear is the contemplation of dreadfulness when one is obnoxious to danger from it. Perhaps it was with a feeling for some distinction of this kind that RV made those changes; but in old Eng. awe stood for fear or dread even of an acute kind, and no such distinction can be discovered in AV either from the Heb. or the English words. Cf. Shaks. J. C. i. ii. 95—
'I had as lief not be as live to be
In awe of such a thing as I myself.'

AWL (אֲוִל).—An instrument mentioned in Ex 21⁶ and Dt 15¹⁷ in connexion with the boring of the ear of a slave. In Syria the awl is used only by shoemakers and other workers in leather. It is straight, and tapers to a sharp point.

AX, AXE (in most modern editions of AV spell ax, although the edition of 1611 had axe throughout) is EV tr. of seven Heb. words, the distinction between which cannot always be discovered. 1. אֲזַק (probably 'pick-axe') Dt 19⁵ 20¹⁹, 1 K 6⁷, Is 10¹⁵. 2. חֶרֶב (properly 'sword') Ezk 26⁶. 3. מַטְוֵל (RV 'hatchet') Ps 74⁶. 4. מַטְוֵלָה 2 S 12³¹. The same word should be read in the parallel passage 1 Ch 20³⁶ for 5. מַטְוֵלָה, which means 'saw' (cf. 3^a and 2 S 12^{31a}). 6. מַטְוֵלָה Is 44¹² (AV 'tongs'), Jer 10⁸. 7. מַטְוֵלָה Jg 9⁴⁵, 1 S 13^{20, 21}, Ps 74⁵, Jer 46³².

In NT axe occurs twice (Mt 3¹⁰, Lk 3⁹) as tr. of ἀξίη. See also the following article.

J. A. SELBIE.

AXE.—Two types of axe were known in both Egypt and Palestine. One was developed from the stone axe, and is longer from back to edge than it is across.

BRONZE AXE.
(From Tell el Hesi.)*

The other type was purely metallic, and was developed from a sharp edge of metal inserted into a stick, as seen in early Egypt. forms.

COPPER AXE (BATTLE AXE?).
(From Tell el Hesi.)*

Probably the first type was used as a tool, the second as a weapon.

In Egypt the axe was attached to the handle, but neither passed through the other. In Assyria the axe appears to have passed through the handle (Bonomi, Nineveh, fig. 69). But the handle passing through the axe, as in modern usage, is unknown until the Roman age.

The material of axes as tools was first stone, then copper, bronze, and, lastly, iron. The latter metal was unknown for tools in Egypt, and still rare in Assyria at 700 B.C. Hence the use of the word 'iron' for axe-head among a party of peasants in Pal. two centuries earlier (2 K 6⁹), seems as if it were a variation due to a later copyist.

AXLE, AXLETREE.—See WHEEL.

AZAEEL (Ἀζάελος).—Father of the Jonathan who with Ezekias undertook the investigation of the matter of the foreign marriages (1 Es 9¹⁴, cf. Ezr 10¹⁵ Asahel).

AZAEELUS (Β' Ἀζάελος, Α' Ἀζαήλ), 1 Es 9²⁴.—One of those who put away their 'strange' wives after the return under Ezra. There is no corresponding name in Ezr 10⁴¹.

AZALIAH (אזליהו 'whom J^h hath set apart'; 2 K 22³, 2 Ch 34⁸).—Father of Shaphan, the scribe under Josiah.

AZANIAH (אזניהו 'J^h hath heard').—A Levite (Neh 10⁹). See GENEALOGY.

AZARAIAS (Β' Ἀζαρίας, Α' Ζαρίας, AV Saraias), 1 Es 8¹.—Seraiah, the father, or more prob. a more remote ancestor, of Ezra (Speaker's Com. on 2 Es 1¹).

AZAREL (אזרעל).—1. A Korhite follower of David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12⁶). 2. A son of Heman (1 Ch 25¹⁸), called in v. 4 Uzziel. 3. Son of Jeroham, prince of the tribe of Dan when David numbered the people (1 Ch 27²²). 4. A son of Bani, who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10⁴¹). 5. A priest, the son of Ahzai (Neh 11¹³). 6. One of the Levite musicians who marched upon the right at the dedication of the walls (Neh 12³⁶). (AV has in the first five instances Azareel, and in No. 6 Azarael.)

AZARIAH (אזריהו, עזריה 'Whom J^h aids').—1. King of Judah; see UZZIAH. 2. 2 Ch 22⁶ for Ahaziah. 3. 2 Ch 15¹⁻⁸ a prophet, son of Oded, who met Asa's victorious army, on their return from defeating Zerah the Ethiopian, at Mareshah, and urged them to begin and persevere in a religious reform. His speech is a general illustration, from the experience of the past, of his opening words: 'The Lord is with you while ye be with him; and if ye seek him, he will be found of you; but if ye forsake him, he will forsake you.' It is conceived in the same spirit as the historical retrospects in Jg 2¹¹⁻²³ and Neh 9. 'Now, for long seasons' (v. 3), 'in those times' (v. 6), refer to periods of national defection; 'the inhabitants of the lands,' 'nation against nation' (vv. 5, 6), are magniloquent indications of the foreign oppressions, or the civil wars between the various tribes of Israel (cf. Gn 25¹⁶). Kamphausen renders the whole passage in the future; but a prediction seems irrelevant here. In v. 8 'Azariah' should be read for 'Oded,' with Pesh. Vulg. A; B has 'Aδδδ, but 'Ωδδδ in v. 1, where A has 'Aδδδ (in 28⁹ both have 'Ωδδδ). 4. High priest in the reign of Solomon, 1 K 4², where he is called son of Zadok, though really of Ahimaaz (1 Ch 6⁹). The note in 1 Ch 6¹⁰ 'he it is that executed the priest's office in the house that Solomon built in Jerusalem,' is misplaced, and must refer to this man, and not to his grandson of the same name. 5. 1 Ch 6¹⁰, Ezr 7³, father of Amariah, who was high priest under Jehoshaphat. This man, therefore, must have held the office in the reign of Asa; on this list see AMARIAH, Nos. 2, 3. 6. High priest in the reign of Uzziah (2 Ch 26¹⁶⁻²⁰), who with his attendant priests withstood and denounced the king when he presumptuously attempted to usurp the priests' office of burning incense upon the altar. The wrath of Uzziah at being thus resisted, and his persistence, were at once divinely punished. An earthquake took place (Jos. Ant. IX. x. 4; cf. Am 1¹, Zec 14⁵); 'the leprosy brake forth in his forehead'; the priests 'looked upon him' (cf. Lv 13⁹), and thrust him out of the temple. In 2 K 15⁵ we only read that 'the Lord smote the king, so that he was a leper.' The conclusion is almost inevitable, that here, as often elsewhere, the Chronicler has supplied a justification for the afflictions of a good man. The narrative acquires additional significance when we note that in expanding 1 K 9²⁵, he omits the statement that Solomon 'burnt incense upon the altar that was before the Lord.' 7. 2 Ch 31¹⁰, high priest in the reign of Hezekiah, described as 'chief priest, of the house of Zadok,' and 'the ruler of the house of God' (v. 13). This last phrase is also found in 1 Ch 9¹¹, Neh 11¹¹, where it is uncertain whether it refers to Ahitub II. or to Azariah (Seraiah), i.e. Eliashib, as representative of that house (Rawlinson). A very similar title is applied in Jer 20¹ to Pashhur, who was not high priest. Perhaps the office indicated is that of the 'Captain of the temple' (Ac 4¹ 5^{24, 26}). To this high priest and to Hezekiah the Chronicler ascribes the building of store chambers in the temple to receive the oblations of the people. 8. In the genealogy of Jehozadak, 1 Ch 6^{13, 14}, and in that of Ezra, Ezr 7¹, Azariah (Ezerias, 1 Es 8¹: Azarias,

2 Es 1¹) is son of Hilkiah, high priest under Josiah, and father of Seraiah, who was killed by Nebuchadrezzar. There is room in the history for such a high priest; but in 1 Ch 9¹¹, Neh 11¹¹, in a list of those priests who dwelt in Jerusalem in the time of Nehemiah, is found an Azariah or Seraiah, whose genealogy is traced up to the second Ahitub, and is all but identical with that of Jehozadak and Ezra. This Azariah must be the priest clan, second in the list, Neh 10²; called Ezra (עזרא) in the lists, Neh 12¹⁻¹³, where it comes third. In Neh 12³³, where both Azariah and Ezra are mentioned, perhaps the former is the same as Seraiah; see No. 7. 9. 1 K 4⁵, a son of Nathan, who 'was over the officers,' i.e. the twelve commissariat officers (v. 7). 10. 1 Ch 2⁵, son of the Ethan whose wisdom was surpassed by that of Solomon (1 K 4³¹). 11. 1 Ch 2³⁸, a man of Judah who had Egyptian blood in his veins (v. 34). 12. 1 Ch 6³⁶, a Kohathite Levite (called Uzziath in 1 Ch 6³⁴), an ancestor of the prophet Samuel. 13, 14. 2 Ch 21², Azariah and Azariahu, two of the six sons of Jehoshaphat, to whom their father gave 'great gifts' and 'fenced cities,' and who were slain by their elder brother Jehoram on his accession (B om. both, but A has them). 15, 16. 2 Ch 23¹, Azariah and Azariahu, two of the five 'captains of hundreds' who assisted Jehoiada in the restoration of Joash. It is just possible that the second of these, 'the son of Obed,' may be the same as No. 11, who was the grandson of Obed. 17. 2 Ch 28¹², one of the four 'heads of the children of Ephraim,' in the reign of Pekah, who supported the prophet Oded when he rebuked the army of Israel for purposing to enslave the captives of Judah. He and his fellows treated the captives kindly, and conducted them back to Jericho. 18, 19. 2 Ch 29¹², two Levites, a Kohathite and a Merarite. The son of the former, Joel, and the latter, were among those who took a leading part in cleansing the temple in the reign of Hezekiah. 20. Neh 3²³, one of those who repaired the wall of Jerusalem, probably a priest. 21. Neh 7⁷, called Seraiah, Ezr 2²; Zacharias, 1 Es 5⁸; one of the twelve leaders of Israel who returned with Zerubbabel. 22. Neh 8⁷ (LXX om.); Azarias, 1 Es 9⁸, one of those who helped the Levites to 'cause the people to understand the law.' 23. Jer 43², son of Hoshaiah (the Maacathite, 40⁸), also called Jezaniah (40⁸, 42¹), Jaazaniah (2 K 25²⁵), etc. He was one of the 'captains of the forces' who joined Gedaliah at Mizpah. They warned him of his danger (Jer 40¹³), and endeavoured to avenge his murder (41¹¹). But, the assassin escaping, they feared lest they should be implicated in the affair, and prepared to flee into Egypt. They then went through the form of consulting Jeremiah; but when he advised them to stay in Judæa, 'all the proud men' refused, and carried off the prophet to Egypt. 24. The Heb. name of Abednego, Dn 1⁶. 7. 11. 19. 2¹⁷ (see HANANIAH).

AZARIAS (ʿAṣṣaras).—1. 1 Es 9²¹, called Uzziath, Ez 10²¹. 2. 1 Es 9⁴³, one of those who stood beside Ezra at the reading of the law: the name is omitted in Neh 8⁴. 3. 1 Es 9⁴⁸, called Azariah, Neh 8⁷. 4. Name assumed by the angel Raphael (To 5¹² 6⁵. 13 7⁸ 9²). 5. A captain in the army of Judas Maccabæus (1 Mac 5¹⁵. 56. 60).

AZARU (B ʿAṣṣaros, A ʿAṣṣouros, AV Azuran), 1 Es 5¹⁵.—The progenitor of a family of 432 who returned with Zerubbabel. There is no corresp. name in the lists of Ezr and Neh. He is perhaps identical with Azzur (B ʿAdouṣ; * A ʿAṣṣouṣ) in Neh 10¹⁷.

AZAZ (אזז), a Reubenite, the father of Bela (1 Ch 5⁸). See GENEALOGY.

AZAZEL (אזאזל).—The name of the spirit (Lv 16⁸. 10. 20), supposed to have its abode in the wilderness, to whom, on the Day of Atonement, the goat laden with the sins of the people was sent (ib. v. 20-22). 'Azazel is not mentioned elsewhere in OT; but the name occurs in the Book of Enoch (2nd cent. B.C.) as that of the leader of the evil angels who (Gn 6²⁻⁴) formed unions with the daughters of men, and (as the legend is developed in the Book of Enoch) taught them various arts, and whose offspring, the giants, filled the earth with unrighteousness and blood. On account of the wickedness wrought by 'Azazel upon earth, the four archangels, Michael, Gabriel, Uriel, and Raphael (9¹ Gr.), are represented as impeaching him before the Almighty, who thereupon (ch. 10) bids Raphael bind him hand and foot, and secure him, under 'rough and jagged rocks,' at a place in the desert called 'Dudael,' until on 'the great day of judgment' he is cast into the fire.* Whether this legend is developed from the notice of 'Azazel in Lv, taken in connexion with the fact that the goat was actually, in the time of the Second Temple, led away to perish at the spot referred to, or whether the belief in the existence of such a spirit, bound in the wilderness, had already arisen at the time when the ceremonial of Lv 16 was framed, we do not know: the latter alternative is supported by Cheyne (ZATW 1895, pp. 153-156), who supposes that the aim of this part of the ritual of the Day of Atonement was partly to provide the ignorant people with a visible token of the removal of the sins of the year, partly to abolish the cultus of the se'irim (Lv 17, 2 Ch 11¹⁵, 2 K 23⁸ [reading עֲרִיבֵי he-goats, for עֲרִיבֵי gates]; cf. Is 13²¹ 34¹⁴), by substituting a single personal angel, 'Azazel (evil no doubt by nature, but rendered harmless by being bound), for the crowd of impersonal and dangerous se'irim. But whatever the precise attributes with which 'Azazel was invested at the time when the ritual of Lv 16 was framed, there can be little doubt that the ceremonial was intended as a symbolical declaration that the land and people are now purged from guilt, their sins being handed over to the evil spirit to whom they are held to belong, and whose home is in the desolate wilderness, remote from human habitations (v. 22 'into a land cut off'). No doubt the rite is a survival from an older stage of popular belief, engrafted on, and accommodated to, the sacrificial system of the Hebrews. For the expulsion of evils, whether maladies or sins, from a community, by their being laid symbolically upon a material medium, there are many analogies in other countries (see J. G. Frazer, The Golden Bough, ii. 182 ff.). † The belief in goblins, or demons (jinn), haunting the wilderness and vexing the traveller, is particularly common in Arabia (see Wellhausen, Keste Arab. Heidentums, pp. 135-140) ‡: in OT it is found in Lv 17, Is 13²¹ 34¹⁴ ('satyrs,' lit. he-goats, and Lilith, the night-monster). 'Azazel must have

* Cf. 54⁵⁶. 554. 67 and 81, which also mention 'Azazel, but treat him not as first but as tenth in command, are considered by Dillm. and Charles (Enoch, p. 61) to belong to a later stratum of the work. The first part of the name Duda-el has been ingeniously explained by Geiger (Jüd. Ztschr. 1864-1865, p. 201) as a corruption of Hadūdō in 'Beth Hadūdō' ('place of sharp rocks'), the place 12 miles from Jerus., to which, according to the Mishna (Yoma 64⁶. 8), the Targ. of Ps.-Jon. (on Lv 16¹⁰. 22), and other authorities, the goat was led on the Day of Atonement, and precipitated over the rocks that it might perish. Beth Hadūdō has been identified, with great probability, with a ruined site now called Bet-hudēdān, on the edge of a chalk range, overhanging a steep and rocky chasm, nearly due E. of Jerus., and at the required distance (Schick, ZDPV, 1880, p. 218).

† In the OT the aim of the rite described in Lv 14⁶. 51-53 (the living bird let loose in the ritual of purification after leprosy) is probably similar (Dillm. p. 632; Nowack, Arch. ii. 291 ff.; W. R. Smith, Rel. Sem. 2 p. 422).

‡ The ghūl ('surpriser'; plur. aghwāl) was one of them (Lane, Arab. Lex. p. 2911). See also Smith, Rel. Sem. 2 p. 126 ff.

been such a spirit, sufficiently distinguished from the rest, in popular imagination, to receive a special name, and no doubt invested with attributes which, though unknown to us, were perfectly familiar to those for whom the ceremonial of Lv 16 was first designed.

The meaning of the name is very uncertain. No root עז is known in Hebrew; but 'azala in Arab. means to remove, place far apart; hence it has been conjectured that the name may have signified the averter of evil (Ges.),* or have denoted a spirit, supposed to separate travellers in the desert from their companions, or divert them from their way (Steiner, and, with some reserve, Dillm.).† Cheyne considers that the name was originally אֱזַזְיָה 'God is strong' (cf. עֲזַזְיָה 1 Ch 15²¹),‡ but that it was afterwards deliberately altered, to conceal the true derivation of the fallen angel's name.§

AZAZIAH (אֲזַזְיָה).—1. A Levite musician who took part in the proceedings when David brought up the ark to Jerus. (1 Ch 15²¹). 2. The father of Hoshea the prince of Ephraim when David numbered the people (1 Ch 27²⁰). 3. An overseer of the temple in Hezekiah's reign (2 Ch 31¹³).

AZBUK (אֲזַבֻּק Neh 3¹⁶).—Nehemiah, the son of A., took part in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem.

AZEKAH (אֶזְקָה 'a place hoed over').—A city of Judah, named Jos 10¹⁰⁻¹¹, 1 S 17¹, 2 Ch 11⁹, Neh 11³⁰. It was evidently near the valley of Elah and near Gath, and was a frontier fortress of Rehoboam. The Jews inhabited it 'and the villages thereof' after the Captivity. The later notices would agree with a site in the south, where the name might be traced at Tell el 'Azek; but this would not suit the earlier notices. The name El 'Azek is stated to occur in the hills north of the valley of Elah, but

* Averruncus. So Olsh. § 188*, Stade, § 124*, treating 'azūzel as (anomalously) softened from the intensive form 'azalzel.

† The form of the word is peculiar, and resembles one of the types of Arab. 'broken,' or collective, plurals. This was remarked long ago by Bochart (Hieroz. i. 750, —with many examples) though he assigned to it an improbable meaning: Steiner (Schenkell, Bibellez. v. 590), adopting the same suggestion, but interpreting more probably, conjectures that originally 'azūzel was a collective designation of such spirits of the desert (from a sing. 'azzāl. Wright, Ar. Gramma. i. § 305, II.), and that it only gradually became the name of a single spirit.

‡ Not only Gabriel and Michael in the Book of Enoch, are compounded with El 'God (Ariel, Raphael, Kokabiel, Tamiel, etc.: see vi. 7).

§ The rendering of AV scape-goat, inherited from the 'Great Bible' of 1539, may be traced back through Seb. Münster ('caper abiturus'), Coverdale ('the free goat'), Luther ('der ledige Bock'), and Jerome ('caper emissarius') to the τράχλος ἀποσπόμενος (v. 10 ἀφαιόμενος) of Symmachus (2nd cent.); but implies a derivation (אֲזַזְיָה = אֲזַזְיָה עֲזַזְיָה 'the going goat') opposed to the genius of the Heb. language (which does not form such compounds), besides being inconsistent with the marked antithesis between for 'Azazel and for Jehovah, which does not leave it open to doubt that the former is conceived as a personal being, to whom (cf. v. 20) the goat is sent. The Targ. of Pa.-Jon. (on v. 10) and other Jewish authorities interpret 'Azazel as the name of the 'strong and difficult place' (קושי וקושי חזק),—implying the view that the first part of the word was in some way connected with עז strong in the wilderness to which the goat was sent: the LXX (v. 8 τῷ ἀποσπόμενῳ, v. 10 εἰς τὴν ἀποτομίαν, v. 26 εἰς ἀπειρῶν) seems to have rendered freely, treating the word in v. 8 as meaning the one sent away (see Field, Hexapla, Auctarium, p. 60), and in v. 10, 26 as meaning dissimul; and the latter rendering has also been adopted by some moderns. But these explanations are equally open to philological or other objections, which place them out of the question. All the principal modern authorities agree in explaining 'Azazel as a personal name. Scape-goat is, however, a felicitous expression; it has become classical in English; and there is no reason why it should not be retained as a term descriptive of the goat sent into the wilderness, provided it be clearly understood that it is in no way a rendering of the Heb. אֲזַזְיָה.

B.—This letter is used in critical notes in the OT and NT (except in Rev) to denote the readings of 'the Vatican MS' (Codex Vaticanus 1209). It is a quarto volume, consisting at present of 759 leaves of fine vellum, written (except the poetical books of OT) in three columns to a page. It has lost 31 leaves at the beginning (Gn 1-46²⁸), part of a leaf at f. 178 (2 K 2⁵⁻⁷ 10-12), 10 leaves after f. 348 (Ps 105²⁷⁻¹³⁷) [Eng. 106. 138]. The NT begins on f. 618, and breaks off at f. 759 in the middle of He 9¹⁴. The books are arranged in the following order: Gn to 2 Ch, Es 1 and 2, Ps, Pr, Ec, Ca, Job, Wis, Sir, Est, Jth, To, 12 Proph, Is, Jer, Bar, La, Ep. Jer, Ezk, Dn (Theodotion's version), Gospels, Ac, Cath. Epp., Ro, 1 and 2 Co, Gal, Eph, Ph, Col, 1 and 2 Th, He. The codex never contained the Prayer of Manasses or the Books of the Maccabees. The loss of leaves at the end makes it impossible to speak definitely of the contents of its NT canon. Of the books now recognised it lacks 1 and 2 Ti, Tit, Philem, Rev. The missing chapters in He and the Rev were added in 15th cent., perhaps, as Tregelles conjectures, in preparation for its presentation to the Library. This part of the MS is quoted as '263' (Greg. '293') in He, as '91' in Rev. The orig. MS was written at some time in 4th cent., and is the work, according to Tischendorf (the Roman editors reserve their judgment), of three scribes, one of whom, the scribe who wrote NT, is identified (also by Tischendorf) with the scribe who wrote part of OT and a few leaves of NT in \aleph (which see). On this identification it seems impossible as yet to pronounce a final verdict. Armitage Robinson, however, has pointed out that there is other evidence to show that the two great Bibles once stood side by side in the same library (Euthaliana, p. 37). This evidence is supplied by the presence in the margin both of \aleph and B (in each, apparently, as the result of an early insertion) of a remarkable system of chapter-numbering in the Acts, derived ultimately from the work of Euthalius, and found besides in two important MSS of the Latin Vulg. (am and fu).

In the Gospels B lacks the Ammonian sections and Eusebian canons, and presents a division into sections which appears besides only in Ξ (Codex Zacynthius) an 8th cent. MS of St. Luke. In Acts, besides the system already referred to, there is an earlier (?) one, making 36 chapters. The Cath. Epp. also show an earlier and a later system of division into chapters. From the earlier system 2 P was apparently excluded. The system in the Pauline Epp. is remarkable. They are treated as a single book, and the sections numbered continuously throughout, the sequence of the numbers showing that in the source from which this system of division was derived, Hebrews stood between Galatians and Ephesians.

The birthplace of the MS is still obscure. Hort suggested Rome; Armitage Robinson's work on Euthalius gives some plausibility to Rendel Harris' suggestion of Caesarea. The Text of the MS was revised soon after it had been written, with the help of a fresh MS, by a corrector who is quoted as B² in the NT and B^a by Swete in the OT. Six centuries later another scribe (B^b=B³) retraced the faded original writing throughout. In consequence, the work of the original scribe is almost entirely hidden from sight except in the case of isolated words or letters which the restorer, for one reason or another, omitted to retrace.

The text of the OT section of this MS has been generally accessible since it was taken as the basis of the Roman edition of the LXX in 1587. Its NT text, on the other hand, during the first half of the present century, was to be ascertained only by a comparison of three more or less imperfect collations,—one made by Bartolucci in 1669, preserved in Paris; one made for Bentley by Mico about 1720 (supplemented by Rulotta 1730), preserved in Trin. Coll., Cambridge; and one by Birch, published in 1788, 1798, and 1801. The MS was taken to Paris by Napoleon, and there carefully examined, though not collated, by Hug in 1809. After its restoration to the Vatican it was inspected at various times by Tischendorf, Tregelles, and Alford, but under conditions that precluded thorough collation. Since 1850 three editions, purporting to give the text of the MS, have been published at Rome. The first, under the names of Mai and Vercellone, in 1857; the second, under the same names, in 1859; the third, under the names of Vercellone and Cozza, at various dates between 1868 and 1881. These editions are now superseded by a magnificent reproduction in photographic facsimile of the entire MS. Its readings in the OT are most readily accessible in Swete's Camb. edition, 1887-1889. They are recorded in the NT in the critical editions of Tregelles and Tischendorf.

NOTE.—The same symbol, in critical notes on Rev, denotes an 8th cent. MS of Rev, also preserved in the Vatican. It is to be carefully distinguished from the MS described above, and it would prevent confusion if this latter MS were referred to as B₂.

BAAL (בַּאֵל, Baal or Baal).—The word means owner or lord, and is used both of men and gods. When used of men it implies possession, so owner of house, land, cattle, etc.; then it comes to mean husband. When applied to gods it also means owner, not sovereign, possessor of the land rather than ruler of men. Thus we have the B. of Tyre, the B. of Peor, etc., and, by an extension, B. of other objects, e.g. B.-berith; sometimes B. is prefixed to the name of a god, so possibly in the case of Baalgad. The name was so obnoxious to the Jews in later times that בָּשֶׁת (bōsheth, shame) was freq. substituted for it (see ISHBOSHETH). Thus we get Ishbosheth, Mephibosheth for Ishbaal, Meribbaal; and Dillmann has shown that this is the origin of the fem. הַבְּאָל (hā bā'al being the kerē) that we find in the prophetic books (LXX) and Ro 11⁴.

The original conception is a problem of great difficulty and obscurity, the more so on account of the misconceptions that have gathered about it. It is commonly held that there was a supreme deity known as Baal, who is frequently identified with the sun. It will be convenient to examine first the alleged solar character of Baal. The evidence may be thus summarised. We find on inscriptions Baal Hammon, and on a Carthaginian monument Baal Hammon is represented with a crown of rays. The Hammanim are sun-pillars, and used in idolatrous worship. The root means 'to be hot.' Further, Baalbek was called by the Greeks Heliopolis (sun-city). At Beth-shemesh (house of the sun) there was a temple to B. But this evidence is far from cogent, and much too slender to bear the identification of B. with the sun; at the most it will show only that the sun was sometimes regarded as a B. This is all that can be inferred from the temple of B. at Beth-shemesh; and the Gr. name of Baalbek is even less weighty, since evidence of that kind is necessarily somewhat late. And, on the other hand, B. and the sun are distinguished, 2 K 23³. It was perfectly natural for sun-worshippers to speak of the sun as a B., but it does not follow that the converse is true, and that B.-worshippers identified the object of their worship with the sun. It is not probable that B. was even a sky-god. It is true that the Baalim were regarded as the producers of fertility, and to them were ascribed the corn and wine and oil (Hos 2⁵⁻⁶). We think of the sun and rain as givers of fertility. But much of the district where B. worship prevailed was not fertilised by rain, but by natural and artificial irrigation. The land that was thus naturally watered and made fruitful was said in Arabia to be 'watered by the Baal'; and in the phrase 'what the sky waters and what the Baal waters,' the latter is expressly distinguished from the former. So the Mishna and Talmud draw a distinction between land artificially irrigated and land naturally moist, calling the latter the 'house of B.' or 'field of the house of B' (W. R. Smith, *RS*² 97). It is true that in Pal. the cultivation of corn depended on rain, and corn was certainly regarded as a gift of the Baalim. But analogy would make the transition possible from the idea of the Baalim as givers of fertility through the springs of the oasis to the idea that they gave it through the rains of heaven. It is true that analogy may have worked the other way, and that they may first have been conceived as givers of rain, and then as givers of the fertilising streams and underground waters. If, as Nöldeke and Wellhausen think, B.-worship originated in Arabia, the former view would be more probable. W. R. Smith, however, argues that 'cults of the B. type and the name of B. itself' were borrowed along with agriculture from the Northern Semites, and entered Arabia with the date-palm. At the same time, he argues forcibly that B.'s land is not originally land watered by the sky, but by 'springs, streams, and underground flow,' although later the Baalim were regarded as fertilising the land watered by rain.

We may now pass to the question whether the common view is correct, that B. was the name for the supreme deity of the Canaanites. It is a serious objection to this view, that, except in names, neither on the monuments nor in the OT can we find B. as a proper name standing by itself. We frequently have B. with the article, the B., or B. followed by the name of a place, quality, etc. In the former case the use of the article precludes us from treating B. as a proper name: it means the divine owner or landlord of the district in question. Similarly in the latter case the particular B. intended is distinguished from other Baals by the addition of the qualifying words. It is said by some that B. was originally one and the same deity, but for the consciousness of the people, the B. of one place was a different god from the B. of another (cf. Baethgen, Beiträge, p. 19). But if that had been so, we should have expected to find traces of this original deity, whereas all we find is the Baals into which he has been differentiated. Nor is it easy on this view to account for the use of the plural 'the Baalim.' This has been interpreted as an emphatic plural 'great B.,' or as images of B., or B. under his various manifestations. But, taken with the facts already mentioned, by far the most natural explanation is that the word is a collective plural, and means the local Baals. And if this be so, it follows that B. can hardly be the sun, for it is the same everywhere, while the Baalim were distinct from each other, and thus our previous conclusion is confirmed by an independent line of argument.

The evidence seems to warrant the following statement. There was originally no supreme deity called B., nor is B. to be identified with the sun. There was only the Baal (or Baals) of particular places distinct from each other. The worship probably arose in connexion with agriculture. The local Baals fertilised each his own district by his streams and springs, and hence they were the owners of these naturally fertile spots. Tribute was therefore due to them, whether for the crops raised on the fertile ground, or for the water used in making land fertile by irrigation. By a natural extension the fertility of land watered by rain was also ascribed to the Baals. But by a process, to which we have abundant parallels in the cults of the powers of fertility, the giving of animal fruitfulness was attributed to them, and their worship was thus debased by repulsive immorality. These Baalim seem from Hos 2⁷ to have had their individual names. It is admitted by W. R. Smith that 'in later times B. or Bel became a proper name, esp. in connexion with the cult of the Bab. Bel' (*RS*² 95).

When Israel entered Canaan the worship of the Baalim was everywhere present. As it was esp. associated with agriculture, which the Israelites learnt from the Canaanites, there was danger lest they should take over also the religious festivals connected with the various agricultural seasons, and thus succumb to the deadly fascination of the sensual nature-worship of the older inhabitants. That this actually happened we learn from the history. Matters were made worse by the custom, which we find among the Israelites, of speaking of J" as Baal. Since B. was not a proper name, but only an appellative, this custom was perfectly innocent, and all that was meant was that J" was the divine owner of His people, or the husband of Israel. But this double use of the term Baal for the local deity and for J" tended to produce confusion between them, and by this syncretism the conception of J" was debased by elements borrowed from nature-worship, and the lapse into idolatry was made much easier. The fact referred to, that the Israelites spoke of J" as Baal, has been disputed, but rests on very strong evidence. We have names such as Ishbaal and Meribbaal, and even such a name as Bealiah (1 Ch 12⁵), 'J" is Baal.' Further, we learn from Hosea that the Israelites called J" Baali, i.e. my Baal (Hos 2¹⁶; see Driver, Sam. 186, 195 f., 279; Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 141 ff.).

With Ahab a new phase emerges. The B. whose worship he established was Melkart, the B. of Tyre, his wife's home (1 K 16³²). We have here an instance of a local B. worshipped in a foreign country. The worship of Melkart was not intended to supersede the worship of J", but to exist side by side with it. Elijah forced on the popular mind the conviction that J" and Melkart were mutually exclusive. The worship was discontinued by Jehoram, the son of Ahab (2 K 3²), but stamped out by Jehu's treacherous slaughter of its adherents (2 K 10¹⁸⁻²⁷). In Judah it seems to have been established by Jehoram, the son of Jehoshaphat, and continued by Ahaziah (2 K 8¹⁸⁻²⁷). We find it in the reign of Athaliah, and it was suppressed at her death (2 K 11¹⁸). The later B.-worship, to which we find several references in the prophets (Hosea, Jeremiah, Zephaniah), seems to have been the worship of the local Baalim rather than of Melkart.

The Baalim were chiefly worshipped at the high-places, but also on housetops. Obelisks stood beside their altars, and sometimes an Asherah or sacred pole. Children were offered as burnt-offerings in the valley of Hinnom (Jer 19⁵; but cf. *RS*² 372 n.). We often read of incense being offered to them. Melkart was worshipped with animal sacrifices, and homage was done to him by bowing the knee and kissing his image. He had not only priests, but prophets. These are numbered at 450 in the time of Ahab, and a very graphic picture of their frenzied prayers and cutting of themselves to gain the attention of their god is given in 1 K 18²⁸.

LITERATURE.—By far the most important discussion is that of W. R. Smith, Religion of the Semites, 2 pp. 98-113. BAAL (בַּעַל).—1. A Reubenite, the father of Beerah, who was carried captive by Tiglath-pileser (1 Ch 5⁹). 2. A Gibeonite, granduncle of Saul (1 Ch 8³⁰=9³⁶).

BAAL, BAALAH, BAALATH (בַּעַל, בַּעֲלָה, בַּעֲלָתָה).—1. Baalah (1 Ch 13⁹, Jos 15⁹⁻¹⁰), a name for Kiriath-jearim. 2. Baalath Mount (Jos 15¹¹), the ridge which runs west from Ekron to Jabneel. 3. Baalath (Jos 15²⁹), a city in the extreme south of Judah, prob. the same as Balah, Jos 19⁹ (= Bilhah, 1 Ch 4²⁹) and Bealoth, Jos 15²⁴. 4. Baalath (Jos 19⁴⁴), a town of Dan. The site is uncertain. 5. Baalath (1 K 9¹⁸=2 Ch 8⁶): the town is noticed with Tadmor, but also in the second passage with Beth-horon. The site is uncertain. It might be No. 4. 6. Baalath-beer (Jos 19⁹; Baal, 1 Ch 4³³). This seems to have been perhaps the same as Ramah of the Negeb, according to the first passage. Evidently a hill in the Tih plateau, S. or S.E. of Beersheba. A conspicuous object in this part of the desert is the white dome of the small shrine called Kubbet el Baul, which may retain the name, S. of Tell el Milh. C. R. CONDER.

BAAL-BERITH (בַּעַל בְּרִית = 'lord of the covenant'), the god of Shechem, where he had a temple, Jg 8³³ 9⁴; also called El-berith, Jg 9⁴⁶. The name may mean the god who presides over covenants, cf. Zeus "Ορκιος; or the god of the Can. league which centred at Shechem; or the god of the covenant between Canaanites and Israelites, cf. Gn 34.

BAALE-JUDAH (בַּעַל יְהוּדָה) 2 S 6².—The same as Baalah (Jos 15⁹, 1 Ch 13⁶⁻⁹), the old name of KIRIATH-JEARIM, which see. The name is no doubt an error for 'Baal of Judah' (cf. parall. 1 Ch 13⁶ 'to Baalah,' and Jos 15⁹ 18⁴, where it is called Kiriath-baal, i.e. 'city of Baal'). It must have been noted once as a seat of Baal-worship.

C. R. CONDER.

BAAL-GAD (בַּעַל גַּד = 'Baal of fortune?'), Jos 11¹⁷ 12⁷ 13⁹.—Close to Hermon, but in the valley of the Lebanon. It must have been, therefore, on the north-west slopes of Hermon. The most probable site is at Ain Jeddeideh, 'the strong spring,' in this direction, near the road to Damascus.

C. R. CONDER.

BAAL-HAMON (בַּעַל חַמּוֹן), Ca 8¹¹.—Perhaps for Baal-Hermon, or the Amanus.

BAAL-HANAN (בַּעַל חַנּוּן = 'Baal is gracious').—1. A king of Edom (Gn 36^{38, 39}, 1 Ch 1^{49, 50}). 2. A Gederite who had charge of David's olive and sycomore trees (1 Ch 27²⁸).

BAAL-HAZOR (בַּעַל חָצוֹר), 2 S 13²³, near Ephraim, appears to be the high mountain east of the road to Shechem, called Tell Asur. It is very rugged, with grey limestone slopes, and with a small group of oaks at the top beside a shrine, and ruins of a town. SWP vol. ii. sheet xiv. See PALESTINE. C. R. CONDER.

BAAL-HERMON (בַּעַל הַרְמוֹן), Jg 3³, 1 Ch 5²⁸. See HERMON.

BAALI and BAALIM.—See BAAL.

BAAL-MEON (בַּעַל מְעוֹן), Nu 32²⁸, 1 Ch 5⁸, Ezk 25⁹. Beth-baal-meon, Jos 13¹⁷. Beth-meon, Jer 48²³; probably Beon, Nu 32⁹.—A town of Reuben near Dibon. It is named on the Moabite Stone, l. 9, as built by Meshah. The present ruin, Ma'in, a large mound at the edge of the plateau west of Medeba. The ruins are those of a Roman town. See Mem. East Pal. Survey, vol. i. s.v. The valley beneath to the south is well watered. In the Onomasticon (s.v. Baalmeon) this site is noticed as still a large village near Baaru (Machærus; see Reland, Pal. pp. 487, 611, 881), and 9 Roman miles from Heshbon, where were natural hot springs. The springs are those of Callirrhoe, in the great ravine of the Zerka Ma'in to the south. C. R. CONDER.

BAAL-PEOR (בַּעַל פְּעוֹר, Βαελπεγορ, Dt 4^{3b}, Nu 25⁹, Ps 106²⁸) was the local deity of Mt. Peor. In Dt 4^{3b}, Hos 9¹⁰ it is perhaps the name of a place. The Israelites are said (Nu 25⁹) to have worshipped him during their stay in Shittim. It is frequently supposed that his worship was especially licentious, since in the same context mention is made of the unchastity of the Israelites with the women of Moab and Midian. But the two facts are not definitely connected, so that we have no evidence for this opinion (cf. Driver on Dt 4³).

A. S. PEAKE.

BAAL-PERAZIM (בַּעַל פְּרָצִים), 2 S 5²⁰, 1 Ch 14¹¹. It was near Jerusalem, but the situation is uncertain. See Driver on 2 S 5²⁰.

BAALSAMUS (Βαλσαμος, AV Balasamus), 1 Es 9⁴; in Neh 8⁷, MAASEIAH.

BAAL-SHALISHAH (בַּעַל שְׁלִישָׁה), 2 K 4². Compare Shalisha. The situation is uncertain, but it seems to have been in Mount Ephraim. The village Kefr Thilth preserves the name of Shalisha. See SWP vol. ii. sheet xiv.

C. R. CONDER.

BAAL-TAMAR (בַּעַל תְּמָר = 'Baal of the palm'), Jg 20³³.—It was near Bethel and Gibeah,—perhaps connected with the palm of Deborah (Jg 4⁵), which was between Bethel and Ramah,—a position which might suit the notice of Baal-tamar, whence Gibeah was attacked.

C. R. CONDER.

BAALZEBUB (בַּעַל זְבוּב, Βαάλ μυία, 2 K 1^{2, 3, 6, 16}).—A Baal of flies, worshipped in Ekron, and consulted by Ahaziah, the son of Ahab and king of Israel. Why he was called Baal of flies is not clear. Probably he was regarded as the lord of flies, and worshipped by those who did not wish to be troubled by them. If Baal were the sun, the name would probably be connected with the fact that the heat of the summer sun calls out the flies in such numbers that in hot countries they become a plague. But this is probably not so (see BAAL). We see from the narrative in Kings that he was specially famous as a giver of oracles. Probably the busy flies, who swarm everywhere, were regarded as his messengers. In NT (Mt 10²⁵ 12^{24, 27}, Mk 3²², Lk 11^{15, 18, 19}) the name is changed to Beelzebul (Βεελζεβούλ, WH Βεεζεβούλ, AV and RV Beelzebub, RvM Beelzebub; cf. Beliar for Belial), and has become a name for the prince of the devils.

A. S. PEAKE.

BAAL-ZEPHON (בַּעַל צְפּוֹן) is mentioned Ex 14^{2, 9},

Nu 33⁷ only, as one of three places near 'the sea' crossed by the Israelites. It was the seat of some form of Baal-worship, the character of which, as indicated by Zephon, is uncertain. Gesenius (Theo. p. 225b) translates B-Z. by locus Typhonis vel Typhoni sacer, and others are disposed to regard Typhon as a variant of Zephon. But Typhon seems to be pure Greek, with a suitable Gr. derivation, and no good reason has been adduced for attributing an Egypt. origin to the word. Typhon was called by various names, the most common being Set. Set appears to have been regarded as a god of foreigners, and was combined, or perhaps confused, with Baal. Other explanations of Zephon are, (1) the north, or the north wind, making it equivalent to זָפַן; (2) a watch-tower, from the root זָפַן. The word זָפַן occurs as a proper name Nu 26¹², and in the parallel passage (Gn 46¹⁶) זָפַן occurs, which seems to be derived from זָפַן.

The situation is as uncertain as the etymology. It has been placed on the N. shore of Egypt by Brugsch, who identifies it with Mt. Casius; about the middle of the present Isthmus, on some hill like Shekh Ennedek (Neville); at Jebel 'Atakah, or a spot on the E. side of the modern canal nearly opposite fort Ajrud. The conjecture of Ebers (Durch Gosen zum Sinai, p. 570) that Phœnician sailors propitiated the god of the north wind when starting southwards on a voyage down the Gulf of Suez is a plausible one. The much quoted tract of Plutarch, de Iside et Osiride, may be referred to for further information about Typhon; and in Baumeister, Denkmäler des class. Alter. p. 2135b, there is a picture, Egyptian in style (No. 2393).

BAANA (בָּאנָא, possibly for בָּנָא 'son of distress'?) but this and similar contractions are highly uncertain.—1. (1 K 4¹²) and 2. (1 K 4³⁰) Two of Solomon's twelve commissariat officers. 3. (Neh 3⁴) Father of Zadok, one of the builders of Jerusalem under Nehemiah. 4. (1 Es 5⁸ Baavā A B) One of the leaders of the people who returned from the Captivity with Zerubbabel. Possibly the same as (3) and BAANAH (3).

C. F. BURNEY.

BAANAH (בָּאנָה).—1. Son of Rimmon, a Benjamite from Beeroth, who, with his brother Rechab, murdered Ishbosheth and brought his head to David at Hebron. They were slain at David's command, and their hands and feet hung up over the pool in Hebron (2 S 4¹²). Possibly the brothers had fled from Beeroth, a Gibeonite city, when Saul slew the Gibeonites (2 S 21¹). 2. A Netophathite, father of Heled (Heleb), 2 S 23²⁹, 1 Ch 11³⁰. 3. One of those who returned from the Exile with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2², Neh 7⁷, and probably 10²⁷). See also BAANA (= בָּאנָא).

BAANI (A Baavī, B -vel, AV Maani from the Aldine text), 1 Es 9²⁴=Bani, Ezr 10²⁴.

BAARA (בָּאָרָה).—Wife of a Benjamite (1 Ch 8⁸).

BAASEIAH (בָּאָסִיָּה probably by error for בָּאָסָה, Maa'al, B).—A Kohathite (1 Ch 6⁴⁰).

BAASHA (בָּאָשָׁה), son of Ahijah, of the tribe of Issachar. He seems to have been of lowly origin, as the prophet Jehu describes him as having been 'exalted out of the dust' (1 K 16²). When Nadab, son of Jeroboam I., was besieging the Philistine town of Gibbethon, Baasha conspired against him and slew him. He also exterminated all the seed of Jeroboam, thus fulfilling the sentence pronounced by Ahijah the Shilonite. Ascending the throne of the ten northern tribes about B.C. 914, he reigned for twenty-four years. His reign was that of a restless and warlike adventurer. He carried on a long war with Asa, king of Judah. Unable to withstand him, Asa purchased the help of Benhadad, king of Syria, who invaded the northern frontiers of Israel, and captured several towns. This drew Baasha away from the work in which he had been engaged, the building of a fort called Ramah, to blockade the north of Judah. Asa led his forces against Ramah and destroyed it, using the materials to build the towns of Geba and Mizpah (1 K 15¹⁶⁻²¹, 2 Ch 16¹⁻⁶). (See ASA.) In matters of religion Baasha did not profit by the warning given in the destruction of Jeroboam and his house, but followed his evil example in maintaining the calf-worship. On this account the same fate was denounced against his house by the prophet Jehu, son of Hanani (1 K 16²). He himself, however, died a natural death, and was buried in Tirzah, his capital. Elah, his son, succeeded him on the throne (16⁶).

R. M. BOYD.

BABBLER.—To 'babble' (a word supposed to be formed from the childish sound ba ba, with freq. term. le) is to talk incoherently, hence foolishly or unseasonably. 'Babbler' is given in AV as tr. of ba'al hallāshôn (בַּעַל הַלָּשׁוֹן), lit. 'the lord of the tongue' (RV 'the charmer'), Ec 10¹¹; λαπιστός (RV 'braggart'), Sir 20⁷; and σπερμολόγος, Ac 17¹⁸.

In the last word there is a touch of something worse than babbling. It was applied first to the crow, as the bird that picks up scattered grain (σπίρμα 'a seed,' and λίγυρ 'to gather'); then to any 'parasite' or 'hanger on,' who picks up what he can in the market or harbour by his wits. Such an one is indifferent as to the obligation of his words, and so any mere prater may have been called a spermologos.* See Trench, On the A V, p. 166 f.

Babbling as a subst. is found in Pr 23²⁹ 'who hath b.?' (בָּבְבָה, RV 'complaining'); Sir 19⁵ 20⁵ (λαλιά); 1 Ti 6²⁰, 2 Ti 2¹⁵ 'profane and vain b.' (κενοφωνία, lit. 'empty talkings').

J. HASTINGS.

BABE.—Two distinct words have been tr^d 'babe' in NT. 1. Brēphos (βρέφος), either an unborn (Lk 1⁴¹, 44) or recently born child, Lk 2¹², 16, 1 P 2² (with adj. ἀργέννητος 'newborn'); Lk 18¹⁵ RV 'they brought unto him also their b.' (AV 'infants'); Ac 7¹⁹ RV (AV 'young children'); 2 Ti 3¹⁵ RV 'from a b. (AV 'child') thou hast known the sacred writings.' 2. Nēpios (νήπιος), a child that cannot yet speak (νή='not,' έπος='a word'), Mt 11²⁵ 21¹⁶, Lk 10²¹, Ro 2²⁰, 1 Co 3¹, He 5¹². It is a pity that RV has not kept these words distinct. 'Infant' (in 'not,' fans 'speaking') is so evident a trⁿ of nēpios that it might have been used throughout for that word, and for that word only, leaving 'babe' for brēphos. Then the point of Mt 21¹⁶ would have been seen at once, 'Out of the mouth of infants (children not old enough to speak) thou hast perfected praise'; and of Ro 2²⁰ 'a teacher of infants.' Besides, nēpios carries the suggestion of contrast between infancy and manhood (τέλειος, adult, as He 5¹², 14, 1 Co 14²⁰, or ἀνήρ, man, as 1 Co 13¹¹, EV 'child,' Eph 4¹², 14, EV 'children'). And the further use of 'infant' to signify a legal minor would very well express the apostle's point in Gal 4¹⁻³ 'as long as the heir is an infant,' etc. (EV 'child').

In OT 'babe' is given as trⁿ of na'ar (נָעַר) Ex 2⁵, the usual word for a boy of puberty=país, puer; of lāl (לָל) Ps 8² 17¹⁴, a suckling; and of tal'al (תָּלַל) from the same root, Is 3⁴. J. HASTINGS.

BABEL, CITY AND TOWER OF.—The city of Babel or Babylon was, from the time of Khamurabi downwards, the capital of the Babylonian empire. It was especially famous for its temple

* Ramsay, in a full and interesting discussion of this word in the Expositor (5th ser. vol. ii. pp. 220 f., 262 f.), denies all reference to speaking. The Athenians, he thinks, applied this slang term of contempt to St. Paul simply as one who did not belong to their learned and exclusive society.

Sag-illa ('of the exalted [lit. 'reaching to the clouds'] head'), situated upon the east bank of the Euphrates. At Borsippa (Birs-Nimroud), the neighbouring town to Babylon, there may be seen at the present day a ruined temple of Nebo which was called by the Babylonians E-Zidda ('house of eternity'). Like the latter, the temple E-sag-illa, dedicated to Bel-Merodach, had seven storeys, following in this the fashion of all the larger Babylonian temples (see BABYLONIA, p. 220*). A detailed account of Babylon, unquestionably based on personal observation, is given by Herodotus (i. 178 ff.). It is now generally admitted that the sanctuary of Zeus-Belos mentioned by him must be identified, not with the still partially preserved temple of Nebo at Borsippa, but with the temple Sag-illa, which was then standing, although it has long since disappeared. The latter temple, moreover, not only consisted of the so-called zikkurat or storied tower just mentioned, which bore the special name of E-timin-an-ki ('house of the foundation-stone of heaven and earth'); it was a whole complex of sanctuaries. In one of these stood the famous image of Bel-Merodach, the annual touching of which by the kings of Babylon at the New Year's festival served to confirm afresh their title and to establish their dominion. On this account Xerxes had it removed (cf. C. F. Lehmann, Samas-sum-ukin, p. 49), while he spared (Her. i. 183) the other image of Zeus (no doubt the statue of Nebo, which also had a place in Sag-illa). His removal of the first occasioned the mistake into which later historians (e.g. Arrian and Strabo) fell, of supposing that Xerxes completely destroyed Sag-illa.

With regard to the site of Babylon, the ruinous heaps running from N. to S. and all on the E. bank of the Euphrates, represent the following ancient structures: Jumjuna=the great banking-house; Tell 'Amrân=Sag-illa; Kassr=one of the palaces of Nebuchadrezzar (the royal palace mentioned by Herodotus was on the W. bank); Babil=the famous terraced gardens. The two great walls described by Herodotus (i. 181) were built by Nebuch. II., who, in a special sense, was the refounder of Babylon. The outer wall was named Nimitti-Bel ('dwelling of Bel'), the inner Imgur-Bel ('Bel was gracious'), probably in imitation of the names of the walls of Nippur, the ancient city of Bel (Nimitti-Marduk and Imgur-Marduk).

In the biblical story of the Tower of Babel (Gn 11¹⁻⁹), v. 9 is probably a later addition, for Babel was certainly not amongst the oldest sanctuaries of the land of Shinar (Chaldaea). In this connexion a tradition preserved by the LXX of Is 10⁹ is of the highest interest. We read there, τὴν χώραν τὴν ἐπάνω Βαβυλῶνος καὶ Χαλαννῆ (according to Talm. tradition Calneh is the ancient Nippur) οὗ ὁ πύργος ἀκοδομήθη, 'the country above Babylon and Calneh where the tower was built.' Kiš, to whose situation these words may perhaps refer, contained the famous temple Kharsag-kalamma ('mountain of the world,' cf. Is 14¹⁸), and in the same city Khammurabi built the temple Miti-ursagga, whose 'top (sag) he carried up (illa) as high as heaven' (anná-gim). The same Khammurabi would then have built also Sag-illa at Babel. See also TONGUES, CONFUSION OF. F. HOMMEL.

BABI (A Baβί, B Baβίρ), the head of a family which returned with Ezra (1 Es 8³⁷), called in Ezr 8¹¹ Bebai (wh. see).

BABYLON IN OT.—See BABEL, BABYLONIA.

BABYLON IN NT.—1. In Mt 11¹², 17, Ac 7⁴⁸ (adapted from Am 5²⁷) the name certainly denotes the ancient city.

2. The name occurs in Rev 14⁸ 16¹⁹ 17⁵ 18², 10, 21.

In 17⁵ it is described as μωσθηριον, i.e. a name to be allegorically interpreted (cf. Rev 11⁸ 16¹² 21⁴, 20). A full discussion would require an investigation of the apocalyptic imagery generally. The chief conditions, however, of the problem are these: B. is described (1) as 'the harlot,' the supreme antithesis of 'the bride,' 'the holy city,' 'the new Jerus.'; (2) as the centre and ruler of the nations, 14⁸ 17¹⁴, 15, 18; (3) as seated on 'seven mountains,' 17⁹ (see Wetstein's note); (4) as the source of idolatry and impurity, 17^{2a}, 18² 19² (cf. Ro 1¹⁸⁻²⁸, Eph 4^{17a}, 1 P 4^{3a}); (5) as a great trading centre, 18³, 11-19; (6) as enervated by luxury, 18⁷, 12a, 22; (7) as the arch-persecutor of the saints and of 'the witnesses of Jesus,' 17⁶ 19². These considerations, taken together, are decisive (a) against the view of a few interpreters, that by B. is meant Jerus.; (b) in favour of the almost universal view that Rome is symbolised by B. This use of the name in an early Judæo-Christian book is in harmony with (1) the many analogies between ancient B. and Rome, both being capitals of great empires, homes of idolatry and impure luxury, oppressors of 'the Israel of God'; (2) the Jewish love for mystic names, Rome and the Rom. Empire being often designated among the Jews as Edom (see, e.g., Buxtorf, Lex. Chald. p. 29 ff.); (3) the Jewish conception of the antagonism of the Rom. Empire to, and its destruction by, the Messianic kingdom (see Weber, Die Lehren des Talmud, p. 364 f.; Edersheim, Jesus the Messiah, ii. p. 439); (4) the fact that Rome is called B. in what may well be an early Jewish portion of the Sibylline Oracles, viz. v. 143, 158 (for the different views on Bk. v. see Schürer, HJP II. iii. 286 f.). The comparison of Rome to B. underlies much of Jewish apocalyptic literature (2 Es, Apoc. Baruch; cf. Ryle and James' note on Psalms of Solomon, ii. 29). The only passage from Talmudic literature commonly cited for this mystic use of B. is the Midrash Shir hashirim Rabba, i. 6 (quoted by Wetstein on Apoc. 17¹⁸; see also Levy, Neuh. u. Chald. Wörterb. 1906). Zunz (Lit. der Synag. Poesie, p. 100 f.)* refers also to Midr. Ps. 121 and Bamidbar rabba, c. 7 (end), noting that the name Babylonians was given by Jews to the Christians (Gen. Haggada, c. 27, in Jellinck's Beth ha Midrash, iv. p. 41). The interpretation of B. in the Apoc. as Rome dates from the earliest times; it is implied in Iren. v. 26. 1, distinctly stated in Tert. adv. Marc. iii. 13=adv. Judæos, 9). So Jerome and Augustine, quoted by Wetstein on Apoc. 17¹⁸. Andreas (Cramer, Catena, p. 560) speaks of it as derived 'from ancient teachers of the Church.' Such opinions as that by B. is meant (a) 'New Rome' (= Constantinople), 'because in it, in the times of the Arians, much blood of the orthodox was shed' (Cramer, Catena, p. 429); (b) the Papacy, either at Avignon or at Rome (see Speaker's Com. iv. 754), scarcely belong to historical interpretation.

3. The name B. is found in 1 P 5¹³, ἀσπάξεται ὑμᾶς ἢ ἐν Βαβυλῶνι συνεκλεκτή. κ and some other authorities add ἐκκλησία. Two cursives read ἐν Πώμῃ. Three interpretations of B. in this passage have been suggested: (1) The Eyp. B., which, however, is described by Strabo (xvii. p. 807) as simply φρούριον ἐρυμνόν. (2) The Assyr. B. But (a) there is apparently no evidence either that St. Peter was ever at B. or that a Christian church existed there in early times; (b) in Jos. Ant. xviii. ix. 5-9 we have positive evidence as to the desolation which befell the Bab. Jews about A.D. 40, and the consequent improbability that an Apostolic Church would have been planted among them (cf. Neubauer, Géogr. du Talm. p. 344). (3) Rome. The evidence in its favour is both internal and external: (a) Internal evidence. It harmonises with (i.) The context. The language is allegorical, the Church being spoken of as a lady (cf. 2 Jn¹⁻¹³). Moreover, St. Mark is mentioned as being with St. Peter. Now, St. Mark was summoned to Rome by St. Paul (2 Ti 4¹¹), probably towards the close of A.D. 67, and very early tradition describes St. Mark as St. Peter's companion and interpreter (Papias ap. Eus. HE iii. 39) at Rome (Iren. iii. 1, Clem. Alex. ap. Eus. HE ii. 15, vi. 14). (ii.) The figurative application elsewhere in the epistle (1²⁴⁻¹⁰) of language primarily used of ancient Israel. (iii.) The general tone of the epistle, especially in regard to persecution, duty towards the state, and 'the universality of [St. Peter's] teaching' (Hort, Judaistic Christianity, p. 155). (iv.) The order of the Provinces in 1⁵, Silvanus coming from the West and landing in Pontus. (b) External evidence. (i.) The Apoc. (see above) shows that Asiatic Christians at this time would so understand the name B. (ii.) Such was the ancient interpretation. Eus. HE ii. 15 introduces it by the significantly indefinite φασί (see the φασί just above; it may, however, refer to Papias and Clement Alex. just mentioned). It seems, indeed, to have been universally accepted, till Calvin (in loc.), for controversial reasons, urged the literal interpretation. (iii.) Ancient testimony is unanimous, and from its range seems decisive, for a visit of St. Peter to Rome. The evidence for this visit is collected and discussed by Bishop Lightfoot, Clement, ii. p. 493 ff. See also art. on ST. PETER.

BABYLONIA, the cradle of the civilisation of the whole of anterior Asia and the West, and probably also of that of ancient Egypt, is the territory enclosed by the lower Euphrates and Tigris, extending from the neighbourhood of the modern Baghdad to 'the mouth of the rivers.' The latter, however, in ancient times flowed separately into the Persian Gulf, a little above Basra. The extraordinary fertility of the soil here, as in the case of the Delta of the Nile, was due to the extensive and careful canal system of the early colonists. As soon as these canals fall into disrepair, the same cheerless waste of waters presents itself again to view, as in primitive times.

The country of Babylonia, which extends from about 30°-33° N. lat., is bounded on the W. by the Arabian desert, from which it is separated only by a very narrow strip of cultivated land; on the N. by Mesopotamia proper; on the E. by the plain at the foot of the Elamite Mountains, over which in ancient times nomadic Aramaean tribes used to wander (the land of Kir [קִיר] of Is 22⁶, Am 9⁷); and on the S. by the Persian Gulf.

The Climate, especially in South Babylonia, is extraordinarily warm. The months during which rain prevails are from November to February. At the present day, according to the accounts of travellers, the heaviest rains occur in November and December; but in ancient times, as the names of the months prove, the rainy season would appear to have been in Tebet (תֵּבֶת Est 2¹⁶) and Shebat (שֵׁבַת Zec 1⁷), i.e. from the end of December to the end of February. Not only the Sumerian names for these months (ab-ba-ul-du 'coming from the sea,' and ash-a-an 'curse of the rain'), but also the Semitic (tibētu 'submersion,' and shabātu 'destruction'), refer to rain-storms.

The fertility of the soil, already mentioned, went hand in hand with the mildness of the climate. There were two sowings every year (in Tebet and in Nisan), and two harvests (the first in Adar and the second in Sivan, i.e. May-June). The Chief Productions were wheat (Sumerian zig, zid, whence σῖρος, Semitic she'u), which gave from fifty to a hundred fold return; sesame, which yielded oil; and the date-palm, introduced at a very early period from Arabia (Magan). This tree satisfied all the remaining wants of the people, since from it they obtained wine, vinegar, honey, flour, and material for all kinds of wickerwork. The stones were used by smiths as a substitute for charcoal, and when steeped served for fattening oxen and sheep. The reed which grew by the numerous canals attained a height of 15 feet, and was used for building huts and for the construction of mats, and even boats. In the latter case asphalt was employed for pitching purposes. Gn 6¹⁴ אֵי נֹי (AV 'an ark of gopher wood') must probably be explained in this way, since gipāru means originally a 'reed-stand.' On the other hand, there were none of the trees characteristic of the lands adjoining the Mediterranean Sea (the vine, the olive, and the fig). For these only the Western Semites have common names, although the vine (Sumer. gishtin 'tree of life,' Semitic-Babylonian karānu), and the fig tree (Sum. dib, Sem. tintu, tittu) were in course of time introduced from abroad.

Stone and minerals were almost unknown in the alluvial soil. The absence of these was, however, atoned for by the excellent building material that lay to hand in the clay, while the best possible mortar was obtained from the asphalt contained in the numerous naphtha wells. All the buildings in ancient Babylonia were accordingly constructed of brick. When sandstone, or still harder kinds of stone, such as basalt or diorite, were used (e.g. for statues), they were brought by ship—even in the earliest times—from the territories along the frontier (Mesopotamia, Elam, Arabia). The same is true of alabaster, marble, gold, silver, copper, tin, iron, and lead; all of which are mentioned as early as the Sumer. inscriptions.

With regard to the Fauna, the lion (nīšu, labbu) was a very common tenant of the reed-beds between Arabia and Babylonia; and not only the panther (nimru), the jackal (akhu, barbaru), the fox (selību), and the wild boar (shakhu, dabū), but especially the wild ox (rīmu, Heb. אֵרֶם), frequently figure in the literature and the pictorial representations (e.g. on the oldest cylinder-seals). Many species of gazelles, antelopes, and wild goats were found along the frontiers of the country. The horse (sišu, Heb. סֵס, but Syr. סִסָּא) was unknown to the earliest settlers. The Sumerians called it 'ass of the East' or 'the mountain' (anshu kurra), just as by circumlocution they called the lion lig-magh 'big dog.' The strictly domestic animals were the cow (alpu), the sheep (šenu, lahru, and other words), the goat (inzu), the ass (imēru, an incorrectly written form of himēru, Sumerian anshu), and the dog (kalbu). The elephant (pīru) of Mesopotamia, the camel (gam-malu) and the wild ass (burīmu) of Arabia, were also known to the Babylonians. Such a word as gammalu shows by its very form (if it were a genuine Babylonian word it would be written gamlu) that it has been borrowed from Arabia. Of tame birds, we may mention the raven (āribu), the swallow (sinuntu), and the dove (summatu) (cf. Gn 8^{7a} and the Babylonian account of the Flood); of half-wild birds, geese and waterhens (the late Heb. חֲנִיט 'cock,' comes from the Sumerian dar-nugalla 'king's fowl'), falcons (surdū) which were tamed even at this early period by the Babylonians for the purpose of hunting. Of birds of prey, the eagle (arū and erū, also nashru) holds the first place, then come the owl (iššipu, Heb. אֵשֶׁת; and the horn-owl (kadū), etc.

In the sphere of Ethnology and Language, it can be shown that a dualism existed in Babylonia from the earliest period. The Sumerians, who in all probability came from Central Asia, and whose language is related to the Turanian, as the Babylonian method of writing proves, were the founders of all the civilisation of anterior Asia. Besides these, we find as early as B.C. 5000 or 6000 distinct traces of a Semitic population, which came from the North-West (Mesopotamia) and took possession of the civilised settlements founded by the Sumerians, until, by their gradual incorporation with the original inhabitants of the country, there arose a single new race.

The Semitic Babylonians have the closest relationship with the other Semites (Hebrews, Arabs, and Aramæans), and yet, in opposition to these, they form a special group, as the grammar and lexicon clearly prove. If the Syro-Arabian Semites may be properly designated west Semites, the ancient Egyptian speech, on the other hand, belongs to the east Semitic, or the Bab.-Assyrian branch of Semitic languages. The Egyptians must in the remotest antiquity have emigrated from Mesopotamia to Africa. Apart from considerations of grammar and the great number of Sumerian loan-words contained in their language (which is otherwise Semitic), this is proved by extensive coincidences between the Egyptian and Babylonian systems of writing, their religion, and other branches of culture.

The Religion of the Babylonians meets us even in the oldest inscriptions as a tolerably finished system. Although most of the names of the gods are Sumerian, the Semites must have had a more or less important share in the development of this system. Many gods have two names, one Semitic and one Sumerian, e.g. Bêlu 'Lord' (West Semitic Ba'al), Sumerian En-lilla, 'Lord of the air,' and we cannot always be certain that the Sumerian name is the older and more original. As kings who are without doubt Semitic (e.g. the kings of Nisin) set up Sumerian inscriptions, so may Semitic gods in primitive times have received Sumerian names even from Semitic Babylonians, especially since Sumerian continued for long to be the sacred tongue. The beginnings of Babylonian culture go farther back than any inscriptions, and we cannot therefore answer questions such as this with anything like certainty. We get, however, the general impression that the baser elements of the Babylonian religion originally belonged to the Sumerians, while the purer and nobler ideas in it came from the Semites. The sovereign position occupied by Bel (in spite of his secondary rank in the genealogical system) points to this conclusion. Even the Star-worship (Sun, Moon, and Planets) which the Semites at an early date conjoined with the cult of Bel, is a far purer and nobler type of Polytheism than the crude idolatry of so many other heathen peoples.

If the Sumerians in their old incantations always invoke Heaven and Earth as the two highest powers of nature, regarding the earth-god as the 'good' spirit and offering him the greater devotion, it seems to have been the Semites who expanded this dualism into a genealogical system: first by inserting their Bel between the original two, and then by adding the sun and planet-gods, which were all regarded as children of the earth-god. It seems to have been the Semites, too, who converted the more general conception of 'Heaven' into the more special one of an 'ocean of heaven,' which extended over the Firmament ('the waters above the Firmament,' Gn 1⁷). To this they gave the Sumerian title nun (with a dialectical variant dun), and regarded it also as continuing behind the horizon and under the earth. This 'Ocean of Heaven,' Anun or Anum (as the Sumerians preferred to write it), was placed at the top of the genealogical tree. Then came Bel, 'Lord of the air' (En-lilla, Sem. Bel-zakîki), as his son, and Ea or En-ki ('Lord of the earth') as his grandson. An ancient title for Bel, as god of the air and the storm, was Ramman (Sumer. Martu and Imir), who in course of time became a separate god, worshipped alongside of Bel. In primitive times the Moon-god (Sin) and Ea had likewise common titles (e.g. En-zu, 'Lord of wisdom,' Semitic Bel-nimêki), the Moon-god being hence called the first-born son of the god Bel.

Anum (shortened, Anu) was originally thought of as without a consort, for the goddess Anat or Antu is only a later philosophical abstraction, and has nothing whatever to do with the West Semitic ny. On the other hand, both the consort of Bel, Nin-lilla ('mistress of the air,' in Semitic absolutely Bêlu 'mistress') or Baru, and the consort of Ea, Dam-gal-nunna or Damkina, were female personifications of the Ocean of Heaven. The four children of the Earth-god (who was represented as a Ram) and his consort Damkina, the goddess of Heaven, were Merodach (Amar-uduk, Mar-uduk, and simply Marduk, as he was specially called in Babylon), the god of the morning-and-spring sun, his sister and consort Istar, his hostile brother Nergal, and the latter's consort Ghanna (𒄩) or Gula, whose name was written with the same ideogram as the town of Nineveh (Ninû). A very ancient designation of Merodach was Gur-alimma (same ideogram as 'domicile' and 'eye'). A god originally identified with Nergal (god of agriculture and of the kingdom of the dead), but afterwards differentiated from him, was Nin-ib (or Nindar) god of war. The god Dumu-zi or Tammûz, of whom the same myth is related as of the Egyptian Osiris, was only another manifestation of Merodach. Finally, mention must be made of the son of Merodach, Nabû or Nusku, the messenger of the gods, the god of the art of writing, who also appears as the god of fire, and bears other titles besides (e.g. Nin-gish-zidda). His consort was Tashmêtu ('hearing prayer').

In very early times Merodach, Istar, Nergal, Nindar, and Nabû (Nebo) became Planet-gods, and, corresponding to their relative distance from the earth, the following was the primitive arrangement: Sin (Moon), Nabû or Dun-pa-uddu (Mercury), Istar or Dilbat (Venus), Samas (Sun), Nin-ib or Käivânu (Mars), Marduk or Gud-bir (Jupiter), and Nergal (Saturn). Afterwards Nin-ib and Nergal changed places, Käivânu becoming Saturn. Similarly, the title Gud-bir was at a later period given to Nabû (Merodach's son), and the new name Mulu-babbar (written Te-ud) assigned to Jupiter. The conjunction of Sakkut (read 𒍪) and Kävân in Am 5²⁶ may be compared with the conjunction of the gods Tibal (Earth? 𒍪), Sakkut (title of Nindar, originally Sa-kud, 'judge,' sc. of the dead in the under-world), and Käivânu in a Semitic exorcism (WAI iv. 59, 8).

The oldest sanctuary of the gods, whose names and genealogical connexions have just been enumerated, and the special home of the gods in Babylonia, was the ancient town of Nun-ki ('place of heaven') or Eridu (Uru-Dugga, 'good town' or 'town of the good god,' i.e. Ea). There too, 'at the mouth of the rivers,' stood the holy palm (Giš-kin, Semitic Kiškanû), the famous oracle-tree of Eridu, to which the ancient Babylonian ideas of Paradise attach themselves, since here is to be found 'the pure abode, which stretches out its shade like a grove, but within it no one treads' (WAI iv. 15, 52 ff.). Besides this, the Babylonians had also another conception of a land of the gods to the south of the mouth of the Euphrates, and of a river of death and an Island of the Blessed far out in the ocean. In the epic of Gišdubar, the hero, the biblical Nimrod, sets out from Erech by land through Arabia, to seek for his great-grandfather Šit-napišti (the biblical Noah), who has been translated to Paradise. Between Aga and Salma, the mountains of the land of Mashu, dwell the mythical scorpion-men, who guard the gold of Mount Arallu. After a long journey 'through the land of darkness,' Gišdubar at last reaches the sea-coast and the palace of the virgin goddess Sabitu (i.e. the Sabæan), thence he travels to the 'waters of death,' and crossing over arrives at the residence of Šit-napišti. It looks as if the incense-island Šokotra, to the south of Arabia, had furnished the material for this conception.

The conception of Hades or 'the land without return' (Bab. Shēlu, from shu'ālu 'place of judgment,' al iršiti 'town of the under-world,' and other similar names) is also found amongst the Babylonians, who place it in the farther south, where the waters of the ocean extend below the earth and connect themselves with the under part of the Ocean of Heaven. Here the different gods of the under-world, especially the night-and-winter sun (also called the South sun, Nin-ib, Nergal) but also the fire-demon Nebo-Nusku, and the Moon-god, acted as judges of the dead. All this clearly implies the notion of a retribution beyond the grave. Besides the Eden, which is conceived of as situated on the coast of the Persian Gulf (נַיַּי from Sumerian Edin, 'desert,'* 'low ground'), there is also a Paradise above in Heaven with the names E-garsag-kur-kurra ('Mountain-house of the lands') E-garsag-kalamma ('House of the Mt. of the World'), Ekur ('Mountain-house,' properly E-gur 'House of the Ocean of Heaven'), E-sharra ('House of assembly,' מִשְׁכַּן לֵאלֹהִים 1s 14^{13c}). Since the Babylonians thought of the north as above, and of the south as below, it is evident why this mountain of the gods is, in 1s 14¹³, placed to the north (its opposite is Sheol, 14¹⁶), and we are not to think of any earthly mountain, such as Ararat.

The Babylonians also connect the serpent with Paradise. In the epic of Nimrod it is the serpent which snatches the plant of rejuvenescence from Gišdubar as he returns home. In a well-known picture on an old cylinder-seal, a serpent is twining itself behind a seated female (?) figure. In front of the figure stands a palm, and on the other side of the palm sits a personage whose ox-horns mark him out as a divinity. Both figures, however, are stretching out their hands to the fruit of the tree that stands between them. The Babylonian dragon of the primeval world is represented as a monster with the head of a lion and the feet of an eagle; but after his defeat by Merodach he is transported to Heaven in the form of a serpent. In connexion with this we may remember that the 'serpent-god,' who is regarded as masculine, is called the 'watcher (rābišu) of the house of heaven.' Finally, Nebuchadrezzar set up, both at the gates of Babylon and on the threshold of the temple of Bel, colossal bulls and enormous serpents of metal as guardians.

Unfortunately, no direct parallel to the biblical account of the Fall and the expulsion of man from Paradise has been as yet found in Babylonian literature. Nevertheless, apart from the pictorial representation mentioned above, the legend of Adapa presents a parallel. Adapa, who is called the 'seed of mankind,' forfeits for ever the immortality offered to him by the god of heaven by his refusal to take the bread and water of life. If, in addition to this, we note the prominent place occupied by the knowledge of sin and the yearning after forgiveness amongst the Babylonian Semites, the existence of a narrative of the Fall, standing in intimate relation to Paradise, can scarcely any longer be doubted. The same remark applies to the confusion of tongues at the building of the Tower. The Tower of Babel (Gn 11) is indeed a tower of steps, and, as such, a temple; and, according to the Babylonian conception, men were created by God to build temples for the gods. At the same time the presumption of wishing to climb up to heaven comes out clearly in the Etana legend, where it is punished by a downfall.

Sacrifices and prayers played an important part among the Babylonians at all times. Besides the priests, there were also the magicians and soothsayers with their exorcisms. The laws and ordinances (teriti תְּרִיתֵי) of the gods are often mentioned; and we can see clearly, from the hymns and litanies that have come down to us, that the ritual of sacrifice and worship was a rich one. Liturgical forms, like so much else, had their home in Babylonia, as can be proved down even to the minutest details of expression. There are two chief kinds of sacrifices mentioned in the oldest inscriptions: the prescribed daily sacrifice ginū or sattukku (Sumer. sa-dug, probably a word originally borrowed from the Arabian ṣadaḳat 'right'), and the freewill sacrifice nindabū (נִינְדָבָה), which originally consisted of a gift of corn (Sumer. nidab) to the goddess Istar. Other expressions for sacrifice are: kurbannu (קִרְבָּן), properly 'presentation,' niḫū (properly 'libation,' but used for sacrifice in general, since libations were always used at the sacrifice of beasts), kurinnu 'incense-offering,' zibu (from zib'u = זִבַּח), sirku ('drink-offering'), and surkinu. It is worth remarking that the same word which is used in Hebrew of pardon and forgiveness, נָסַח, is used in Babylonian of sprinkling sick or unclean men. Sickness, however, is always treated by the Babylonians as a result of sin, and hence sacrifice is always regarded as a propitiation for sin. Human sacrifice, up to the present, has been found portrayed only upon ancient seal-cylinders,* and it is still open to question whether the victim does not represent a god rather than a man. In that case there would be an allusion to a myth unknown to us. Of the many expressions for 'prayer' and 'petition' in use, suppū, a denominative from sippu, a threshold, has a special interest, because the threshold of the house or the temple was the place at which prayer and sacrifice were offered in ancient times.

From the earliest times the temples were regarded in Babylonia as the earthly dwelling-places of the gods (Bab. bitu, isirtu, and ekallu עִיכָל, which usually, however, means palace). They were generally in the form of a tower of steps (zikkuratu), and were three storeys and sometimes seven storeys high, the latter being an earthly copy of the seven heavenly spheres, or circles, of the planets. Occasionally these temples contained also the graves of the kings (giguru), as in the case of a temple of Gudea. In the 'Holy of Holies' there were special divisions, which were called by several names, parakku, papahu, panpanu, dūu, usukku, and sukku (cf. נָקָה, also used in a religious sense). It is remarkable that the oldest form of the ideogram for parakku clearly represents tapestry or a curtain (cf. פְּרִיכָה).

The functions of the priests, seers or prophets, magicians and soothsayers, often overlap one another in the texts, though they were in reality always very carefully differentiated. The most common expressions for priest are kalū and ṣangū (Sumerian sag), the high priest being hence called ṣangu-mahhu (from sag 'priest' and mah 'high'), for seer and prophet mahhū, from which the word magician is derived, asū (which also means 'physician,' Sumer. azu, originally signifying 'he who knows'), and bārū ('the seer,' exactly=the Heb. בָּרָא). The Heb. word בָּרָא is also found, at any rate in the name of the god Nabi'u, Nabū, Nebo ('proclaimer,' 'herald,' as a planet, Hermes).

* Observe the wording of Gn 28 'and God planted a garden in Eden,' i.e., according to the above explanation, 'out in the waste.'

* Ménant, Collection de Clercq, No. 176-182; pierres gravées, I. figs. 94, 95, 97.

The Heb. קָדֵשׁ also has its equivalent in the Bab. muškinu (from muškahinu), 'one who pays homage or worships.' The rich cultus of the Babylonians, in addition to its numerous sacrifices, prayers, and litanies, included from an early period also sacred water (agubbá), censers (adaguru), processions (masdahu), barges of the gods (as in Egypt). All these naturally had their chief place at the numerous festivals.

Not only were there Festivals which were repeated on certain fixed days every month (as the nubattu or festival specially connected with the worship of Merodach and his consort Zarpanit on the 3rd, 7th, and 16th days of the month, or the so-called 'unlucky-day,' ámu linnu [corresponding to the Hebrew Sabbath], which was held on the 7th, 14th, 19th, 21st, and 28th of the month, and had to be observed as a day of fasting and repentance even by the king), but there was also a series of annual festivals, of which the Festival of the New Year (zagmukku, akitu) was regarded as the most sacred. At this festival Bel (in Babylon Bel-Merodach, in Sirgulla Ningirsu, as the consort of Ba'u) entered the holy assembly-room (ubsuginna) in order to fix the fates of men, especially that of the king, for the coming year. This Festival of the New Year and the Spring was also held in remembrance of the day of Creation. After Bel had conquered the dragon and made the world, on the 8th and 11th days of the new year he entered Dulazagga, the 'holy of holies' of Ubsuginna, for the purpose mentioned above (Epic of the Creation, Table iii. l. 61, Nebuk. ii. 54-65).

In this connexion the ancient names of the Babylonian Months, as they are given from about B.C. 2000 both in Sumerian and Semitic, are as follows:—

1. Barag-zag-gar ('the Holy of Holies of the Temple'). Nisannu, also named Arah-rabúti (month of the great gods, i.e. Anu and Bel): begins on 21st of March. March-April.
2. Gud-si-di ('ox of right guidance' (?)). Iyaru. April-May.
3. Shigga (month of bricks). Sivánu, likewise called Kusalúu and Šitán. May-June.
4. Shu-gunna (sowing). Du'ázu (Tammuz), also Pit-bábi ('opening of door'). June-July.
5. Bil-bil-gar (fire month). Abu, also month of the star of the bow (or Sirius). July-August.
6. Gur-Ninni (harvest of Istar). Ululu (Elul). August-September.
7. Dul-azagga (see above). Tashritu (=beginning). September-October.
8. Apin-dua (the lifting of the watering-can?). Arah-samna (the eighth month, Marchesvan). October-November.
9. Gan-gan-na-ud-du (month of clouds). Kisilivu. November-December.
10. Ab-ba-ud-du (month of the sea). Tibítu, also Tamširu (rain). December-January.
11. Ash-a-an (curse of rain). Shabátu, also Isin-Ramman (festival of the storm-god). January-February.
12. She-gur-kud (grain-harvest). Adaru, also Arah-sibúti (month of the seven evil gods). February-March.

The names of months in use amongst the Hebrews after the Exile are well known to have been derived from the Semitic names which are always mentioned second in the foregoing list. As the names Dul-azagga, which is used in connexion with the New Year, and Tisri, which signifies 'beginning,' show, the New Year Festival must, at some early date, have been held in harvest instead of in spring. This also explains why the god of the seventh month is Samas (the sun, who rules the year), and why the Babylonians, even in later times, instead of a second Adar, intercalated occasionally a second Elul (very rarely a second Nisan) as the last month of the year. In the time of Abraham the month in Babylonia had 30 days, as is clear from the contract-tablets. The year thus consisting of 360 days, it was necessary every six years to intercalate a thirteenth month—generally a second Adar. The Babylonians also recognised a lunar year of 324 days, whose months each contained 27 days. From this they fixed the ratio of silver (moon) to gold (sun) as 27 : 360 (lunar month : solar year)=3 : 40=1 : 13½. A lunar month had three weeks of 9 days or 60 uddu (the uddu was reckoned as 6×6×6=216 minutes). The Babylonians divided the day into twelve double hours, and the double-hour into 60 minutes, their unit of time being thus equal to about two minutes of our reckoning, corresponding to the time taken by the sun to traverse a space in the heavens equal to his apparent diameter.

In the contract-tablets of the later kings of U₁ (about B.C. 2300), some centuries therefore before Abraham, we find a list of Sumerian names for the months, only three of which correspond with those mentioned above, viz. the 4th (Shu-gunna), the 5th (Festival of the Fire-god), and the 12th (She-gur-kud). The first month in this old list is called She-illa ('when the grain grows tall'), the 7th 'Feast of Tammuz,' the 8th 'Feast of king Dungi' (who was worshipped as a god), and the 9th 'Feast of Ba'u.' Even at this date there is already evidence of the intercalation of a second Adar (dir she-gur-kud).

It is much to be regretted that no special calendar of festivals has been discovered up to the present. We only know that Bel was the patron god of Nisan, Ea of Iyyar, Nino of Sivan, Nin-ib of Tammuz, Nin-gis-zidda (Nebo, as Fire-god) of Ab, Istar of Elul, Samas of Tisri, Merodach of Arah-samna, Nergal of Kislev, and Ramman of Shebat, and that probably the chief festival of the gods mentioned was held in the months that corresponded to them. It is most likely, however, that not only different epochs, but also different places of worship, had their own special festivals. At Sippar, for instance, the City of the Sun in N. Babylonia, Samas had special feast-days not only on 7th Nisan and 7th Tisri, but also on 10th Iyyar, 3rd Elul, 15th Marchesvan, and 15th Adar. In this connexion it may be noted that, judging from the Heb. Feast of Purim (14th and 15th Adar), there was probably in Babylonia a feast observed in honour of Istar the sister of Samas.

The circumstance that each month had its patron deity, has a partial connexion also with the Division of the Zodiac, which originated in Babylonia before B.C. 3000. At that early date the principal constellations, and especially those that are traversed by the sun, moon, and planets, were already known by nearly the same names as they bear to-day. They formed twelve 'stations' (manzattu, hence mazzartu and mazzaltu, from which are borrowed Heb. מַנְזָלוֹת, מַזְלֵי [Job 38³², 2 K 23⁵] and Arab. manzal). From B.C. 2000 onwards it can be demonstrated that the order of the months was Nisan, Iyyar, etc. This reckoning starts with the Ram (Aries) as the vernal point, but there was an older order which began with the Bull (Taurus, the symbol of the god Merodach). The latter system, which finds the vernal point in the Pleiades, carries us back at least to somewhere about B.C. 4000. The Zodiac was also divided into a region of Anu (Taurus, Gemini, Cancer, Leo), a region of Bel (Virgo, Libra, Scorpio, Sagittarius), and a region of the earth-and-water god Ea (Capricornus, Aquarius, Pisces, Aries). These last four constellations, lying between Sagittarius and the Pleiades (כִּמְתוּ, cf. Bab. kimtu, 'family'), and forming the path of Ea, are what are called in Job 9⁹ 'the chambers of the south' (תְּרֵי תִקְוָה). Along this path of Ea (Sumer. sil sigga, written with the signs tar and pa), lay, according to Bab. notions, the entrance to the under-world; hence the constellation Sagittarius was called ka-sil 'opening of the path,' and the corresponding month Kisilivu (Kislev). But as the Babylonians were fond of applying one and the same designation to stars in opposite quarters of the heavens, Orion was also named ka-sil (Heb. כִּסְלִי) and the month Sivan, which belonged to Gemini, was called Kusallu. It is certainly no fortuitous circumstance that precisely at the point where the path of Ea begins (between Sagittarius and Capricornus), another path, the Milky Way, intersects the ecliptic, and that the ecliptic is again crossed by the Milky Way at the point where the path ends, exactly between Gemini (month Sivan) and Orion (Bab. shu-gi or shibu, also ka-sil, Heb. כִּסְלִי). The Great Bear was called by the Babylonians 'Wagon-star' (more precisely kakkab sumbi, 'star of the baggage-wagon'), by the W. Semites 'Lion-star' (Heb. שִׁי, cf. Syr. כִּשְׁי, Arab. ayithh), for the Arab. na'sh (Bab. neshu) also meant originally 'lion.' The underlying explanation is probably that the Lion of the Zodiac (Bab. 'dog-star'), on account of his nearness to the sign of the Great Bear, was thought of as harnessed to the latter as his wagon. At a later period the Babylonians designated the Dog (our Leo) aru ('lion'); in Sumer. lig means 'dog,' and lig-magh 'lion' (literally 'big dog').

The oldest reliable evidence for the Bab. origin of the zodiacal signs is derived from the ancient Bab. boundary-stones with their pictorial representations. These date from the 12th cent. B.C., and from them we obtain the following series:—Ram, Bull, two dragons=Gemini, Hydra (south of Cancer) with a spindle, Dog, Ear of corn with a cow (the symbol of the virgin Istar), Balance (Yoke), Scorpion, Scorpion-man with a bow (Sagittarius), Goat-fish (a goat with the body and tail of a fish) or Tortoise, Pitcher, and Water-hen (Horse), to which the Raven, as symbol of the intercalary month (originally a second Elul), is added as a thirteenth sign (hence the raven is viewed as a bird of evil omen). That the real origin of this system goes back, however, to a far remoter antiquity, is proved not only by the star-names found in the so-called astrological work (c. B.C. 2000), but by the circumstance that throughout the latter the Pleiades (Taurus) appear as the first of the zodiacal signs. The exact astronomical proof was rendered possible by the Planet-tables of the Arsacid period (2nd cent. B.C.), and the laborious task was undertaken by the Jesuit fathers Epping and Strassmaier. It turned out,* moreover, that the Babylonians were acquainted not only with the twelve signs of the Zodiac, but (quite in accord with the testimony of Diodorus, ii. 30) also with 24 (afterwards 27) stations of the moon† and 36 stations of the planets (the so-called decani). That is to say, they divided the ecliptic as the path of the sun into 12, as that of the moon into 27, and as that of the planets into 36 parts, and distinguished each part by certain stars. The same investigation makes it probable that the 24 'hour-stars' and the 36 'decani-stars' of the ancient Egyptians were borrowed in the remotest antiquity from Babylonia. (We shall presently describe [p. 220 f.] how the Babylonians wove the signs of the Zodiac into the composition of both their great epic poems, the one concerning the Creation, the other concerning Nimrod.) Of remaining stars we have yet to mention Sirius, 'bow-star' (kakkab kashti); Procyon (kakkab mishri, lit. 'north star' or 'northern weapon,' in contradistinction to the 'southern weapon,' viz. Sirius); ashkar or iku (Arab. ayyuk) = Capella; 'king-star' = Regulus in Leo; 'jackal-star' = Antares in Scorpio; sig-bil-sagga = Myra Ceti, south of Aries, the 'fire-star' (or star of Nimrod or Gisdubar); etc. etc. In the whole list there are only a few names which cannot now be identified.

Babylonia was the home not only of Mathematics (see below) and Astronomy, but of Astrology. This is eloquently witnessed to by the so-called astrological work mentioned above, which bears the special title, nur Bel, 'illumination of Bel.' The seers (baru) and magicians (mahu), who are so often mentioned along with the priests, were, above all, 'star-gazers' and 'prognosticators'; cf. Dn 2², where already the name Kasdim (Chaldeans) appears as synonymous with magicians. That the magoi of Mt 2¹ were likewise Chaldeans, is plain from various passages of the astrological work, where we read, 'Under such and such a constellation a great king shall arise in the land of Martu (Palestine), and peace and joy shall prevail in the land.'

If Bab. Medicine did not reach a level much higher than that of magical formulæ,* the acquaintance of the Babylonians with Mathematics deserves all the fuller recognition. The subject will be best elucidated by a brief survey of the Bab. Metrology, from which admittedly all the ancient metrological systems (that of ancient Egypt included) were derived. The latter circumstance proves indirectly how remote is the antiquity to which the beginnings of the system must be carried back. Metrology, moreover, lays the foundation for the material civilisation of a people, as religion does for their spiritual development. For the Babylonians the connecting link between the two was Astronomy.

First, as regards linear measure, we now know from the scale of Gudea (c. B.C. 2500), published in de Sarzec's Découvertes, that the half-cubit ($\frac{1}{2}$ great cubit) was divided into 15 finger-breadths of 16·6 mm. each. The cubit thus contained 498 mm., and the great cubit (ammatu rabitu) 996 mm. These again were divided respectively into 30 and 60 finger-breadths. Both the small and the great cubit were also divided into six equal parts, the former containing 6×5 , the latter 6×10 finger-breadths. The latter system of division appears, for instance, in the tablet of Senkereh (WAT iv.² 37), on the reverse of which are given the squares and cubes of the cubit from the number 1 up to 60, and on the obverse the fractions and multiples of the cubit. We learn that a 'reed' (gi or kanu) was 6 great cubits; a gar (written with the sign sha) 12 great cubits; an ush (stadium) 60 gar or 720 great cubits; a kasbu (parasang) 30 ush (c. 21 kilomet.); and a double-kasbu 60 ush. In all probability there was also a small kasbu, answering to the small cubit, and containing 10,800 cubits (c. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ kilomet.).

Besides its division into sixths, the cubit was divided also into 10 (5) hand-breadths (each of 6 finger-breadths). Further, as we learn from the scale of Gudea, the finger-breadth (16.6 mm.) was divided into 180 parts, of which, however, the only ones in actual use were the $\frac{1}{18}$ ($\frac{1}{180}$), $\frac{1}{9}$ ($\frac{2}{180}$), $\frac{1}{6}$ ($\frac{3}{180}$), $\frac{1}{4}$ ($\frac{4}{180}$), $\frac{1}{3}$ ($\frac{6}{180}$), and $\frac{1}{2}$ ($\frac{90}{180}$). The hand-breadth, whose minimum was taken at 99, and maximum at 99.6 mm., served, moreover, as the side of a cube which contained exactly a ka (nearly a litre), and which, when filled with water, weighed a great mina (c. 990 grammes). In the same way, as is well known, a cubical decimetre (i.e. a litre) of water weighs a kilogramme. In this most ingenious fashion did the Babylonians in that remote antiquity derive not only their superficial measures and their measures of capacity, but even their weights from a common standard, the hand-breadth. It is further to be noted that in the latitude of Babylon (31° N. lat.) the length of the seconds' pendulum is 992.35 mm., which is almost exactly equal to the length of the Bab. double-cubit (990-996 mm.).

* Important conclusions can be deduced, however, from the Bab. literature, notably from the bilingual magical formulæ and from the Epic of Nimrod, regarding the nature of certain diseases. For instance, the 'head-disease' so frequently mentioned, which is accompanied with violent fever, is erysipelas; the symptoms of Gisdubar's illness are those of typhus venerea; while the disease of Ea-bani appears to have been leprosy. There is also frequent mention in the religious texts of fever and plague.

* The proof of this will be found in Hommel's art. 'Ursprung u. Alter d. arab. Sternnamen' in ZDMG, Bd. 45, pp. 592-619.

† The names of these passed in course of time from the Babylonians to the Arabs, Persians, Hindus, and Chinese.

From their linear measure the Babylonians derived also their reckoning of time. A distance of 360 double-cubits is covered by an average walker in 4 minutes ($\frac{2}{15}$ of the whole day), a great kasbu (21,600 cubits) in four hours or a night-watch. Thus the kasbu was used to mark the periods of the day; $\frac{1}{2}$ of a day (2 ho.) being a small, and $\frac{1}{3}$ a great kasbu. The reckoning was controlled by the observation that the sun requires exactly 2 minutes ($\frac{2}{3}$ of the double-hour) to traverse a space equal to his apparent diameter. Thus discovered, the system of reckoning by 60 (sussu, originally sudsu, i.e. $\frac{1}{3}$ of 360) was adopted by the Babylonians as the fundamental principle of their whole metrological system. It was astronomy* then, in conjunction with the linear measures derived from the cubit and the hand-breadth, that gave birth to the famed sexagesimal system, which spread from Babylon over almost the whole world. With this goes naturally the division of the circle into 720 (360) degrees; and the observation that the sixth part of the circumference of a circle is equal to the radius, stands also in the closest relation to the same system. Both the principles referred to were known to the Babylonians from the earliest times.

By squaring the various linear measures, we obtain the corresponding superficial measure. As early as the time of the kings of Ur we meet with the 'field' (gan)=1800 'gardens' (sar); and the 'garden' (60 sq. cubits?)=60 gin.† Then the gin (1 sq. cubit?) was divided into 180 she. Besides the great gan of 1800 sar, there was originally a small gan of 180 sar; hence the great gan bears the name also of bur-gan ('ten gardens'). The Babylonians, moreover, gave designations to pieces of land according to the amount of seed-corn required to sow them. Thus, e.g., they would speak of a 5 gur cornfield. This introduces us to—

Measures of capacity. In Abraham's time there were already three systems simultaneously in use: the gur of 360 ka, the gur of 300 ka ($\frac{1}{3}$ less than the first, and standing to it in the same relation as the gold mina of 50 shekels to the silver mina of 60 shekels), and the gur of 180 ka. The last-named system of reckoning, acc. to which the ka contained about 2 litres, was the only one in use in the New Bab. period. Now, since the Heb. kor (כֶּרֶס) contained 180 kab (כַּב), just as the Bab. gur contained 180

ka, it is clear that the Hebrews borrowed both the names and the divisions from the Babylonians. The Heb. has even preserved the original and fuller form of the name ka, namely kab. Besides the ka (see above for its origin) there were also larger sub-divisions of the gur or kor, such as the pi or 'ass's burden' (imiru Heb. עִמְרוּ)= $\frac{1}{3}$ gur; the as (Heb. Bath or Ephah)= $\frac{1}{6}$ gur; the bar (Heb. Se'ah)= $\frac{1}{12}$ gur, etc. In addition to this, the ka (originally about a litre) was divided into 60 parts, which, as in the case of the mina and the sar, were called gin. Since among the Hebrews the hin (הֵין) was the 60th part of the kor, as amongst the Babylonians the gin was the 60th part of the ka, הֵין must also be a Bab. loan-word. It found its way into Heb. through the medium of Egypt, where the hin was the fundamental measure; and the name ephah also comes from Egypt.* Besides this division of the ka into 60 gin, we meet with another into 10 gar (written sha).

Finally, in regard to weights, the talent (gun, Semit. perhaps gaggaru) contained 60 minæ (mana, Semit. manû); the mina 60 shekels (gin with the sign tu, Semit. šiklu 'weight'; and, as the original measure, kuddu 'cup'); the shekel 360 (180) she (or grains of corn). But, as happened so often in the Bab. metrology, there were several systems of weight in use simultaneously: [1] The heavy mina of about 990 gr. (the weight of the ka filled with water, see above). [2] The light mina, which weighed $\frac{1}{2}$ of the heavy, i.e. c. 495 gr. (491-492 gr. in the case of the weights still extant). [3] A weight= $\frac{1}{3}$ of the light mina (50 instead of 60 shekels) used specially for gold, the so-called gold mina, usually=409-410 gr. Even c. B.C. 2000, however, there had come into use a gold mina of a higher (so-called royal) standard=427 $\frac{1}{2}$ gr., as can be proved from a weight recently found at Nippur. [4] A weight about $\frac{1}{3}$ more than the light mina, the Bab. silver mina=546 gr. Although the last-named is a derived and secondary weight, it is still very ancient, for its 60th part, the silver shekel of 9.1 gr., answers exactly to the ancient Egypt. ked, which is likewise=9.1 gr. The Bab. ideogram for shekel has not only the pronunciation šiklu (שִׁכְלוּ), but also kuddu (Arab. kadah 'cup'), and this kuddu is naturally the prototype of the Egypt. ked, which weighs exactly the same. Ten of these ked made up the Egypt. pound (deben, not uten) of 10 shekels (91 gr.), and in point of fact there was also a Bab. weight of 10 shekels, whose name was in Sumer. garash† and in Semit. tibnu, but which was also designated absolutely abnu 'stone' (cf. 2 S 14²⁶ אֲבָנֵי הַיָּם, and Pr 16¹¹ אֲבָנֵי הַיָּם, Bab. aban kisi). Three of these made up a half-mina, and six a mina.

In regard to Bab. Art (architecture, sculpture, engraving, etc.), our former conceptions have been fundamentally changed by the excavations at Telloh and Niffer (in South and Central Babylonia). From these we see that as early as B.C. 4000-3000 the bloom of art in Babylon was such as was in some respects never attained in later days,—a case quite analogous to that of Egypt in the era of the Pyramids. Under the older kings of Sargulla the style of art is of course still somewhat awkward and crude, but under the older Patesi it shows a high finish, e.g. in the carving of the beautiful silver vases of En-timena (c. B.C. 3800); and the cylinder-seals and reliefs of the old kings of Agade (Akkad), c. B.C. 3500, are still more finely executed. At Nippur, prior to B.C. 4000, architects already used the arch of burned brick, which formerly was supposed to have originated at a much later period. The Bab. temples, formed of brick like Bab. buildings in general, were in 'stage' form, and had either three or seven storeys, the latter number in imitation of the seven planets (see p. 216^b). The oldest kings already refer, in their inscriptions, to palaces, and on a statue of Gudea (c. 2900) we find even the plan of such a building. The surface of each brick was stamped with an inscription of six to ten lines, and formed a square with a side of 330 mm. (i.e. $\frac{3}{4}$ of a cubit = 1 Bab. foot). The science of hydraulics was also highly developed (dams, canals, sluices, cisterns, etc.). From the fragments of vases which still exist (beautifully ornamented, and in some cases with lengthy inscriptions), formed either of alabaster or of clay, we see that pottery had made great advances in the very earliest times. The same is true of weaving. Long before the time of Abraham, the magnificent Bab. carpets and mantles were in high repute (cf. Jos 7²¹). Music and poetry (on the latter see the remarks on Bab. literature, below) were sedulously cultivated. As early as the time of Gudea we find a twelve-stringed harp portrayed. To the forms of poetry belonged, as we have now learned, a highly-complicated strophic system, as well as the regular succession of a certain number of cadences, and finally the so-called parallelismus membrorum. The diorite statues of the Patesi of Sirgulla may confidently be matched against the famous statues of wood and diorite which belong to the Egyp. art of the so-called ancient empire. Special skill was displayed, however, by the Babylonians at all periods, in engraving; and their cylinder-seals, which date as far back as c. B.C. 4000, show a fineness of execution which cannot but arouse our admiration. Mythological scenes are the favourite subject; particularly common is the portrayal of such as belong to the circle of legends which formed itself around Gišdubar (Nimrod). The inscriptions appended give, as a rule, simply the name and title of the owner of the seal and his father; but as these are frequently kings, such cylinder-seals not infrequently serve as important sources for the tracing of history. Metallurgy, finally, was also in an advanced stage in early days. The relation of silver to gold was in point of value 3 : 40, or 1 : 13 $\frac{1}{3}$, the same ratio as that of the ancient lunar month of 27 days to the solar year of 360 days. From the first we find the Babylonians acquainted also with the smelting of iron. The latter was originally obtained from meteoric stones, hence the Sumer. name an-bar, 'heavenly metal.' They had also learned the composition of bronze (Sumer. zabar, Semit. siparru) from copper and tin. They were acquainted even with the manufacture of glass. As early as c. B.C. 1500 we meet with cobalt-coloured glass as an artificial substitute for the costly lapis-lazuli imported from Media.

† It is possible, however, that the length of side of the sar was 60 great cubits, in which case its area would be 3600 sq. cubits, while that of the gin would be 60 sq. cubits, and of the she $\frac{1}{3}$ of a sq. cubit.

The Literature of Babylon, as was to be expected from a people so highly civilised, was of the most varied character and greatest extent. Unfortunately, in spite of the numerous discoveries made by excavation (esp. the remains of actual libraries, inscribed on clay tablets), only the ruins of this literature have been preserved; but in this form we have specimens of at least all the more important branches.

First, as regards literature in the narrower sense, the poetry of Babylon, even the so-called secular epic, e.g. the Nimrod-epos, bore an essentially religious character. To the poetical fragments which have come down to us either in Sumerian alone, or (as is generally the case) with a Semitic interlinear translation as well, belong above all the numerous magical formulæ (with the title enna or shiptu, 'incantation'), as well as a great number of hymns to the gods, and penitential psalms. While the first-named are composed in relatively old and pure Sumerian and generally written ideographically, the last two show an admixture of numerous later forms of speech: they contain Semit. loan-words and frequent instances of phonetic writing (the so-called imi-sal forms or 'women's speech' in opposition to the 'priests' speech' of the earliest period). From all this, the N. Babylonian and Semit. origin of the penitential psalms, and of a large number of the hymns to the gods, may be certainly inferred. Moreover, the line of thought in the penitential psalms, notwithstanding their being composed in Sumerian, is far more Semitic than Sumerian. In particular, there appear in them with tolerable clearness purer religious conceptions, approaching monotheism. While the magical formulæ certainly go back to a very remote antiquity, the penitential psalms may possibly have taken their rise somewhere between B.C. 3000 and 2000, i.e. in the last centuries before Abraham. In any case, they are essentially more recent than the formulæ.

By far the greater half of the Bab. literature was composed, however, only in the Semit. idiom of the country. This is true of certain magical formulæ (e.g. the so-called 'burning series' or mahlû, i.e. burning of wax figures of evil spirits or of witches) and many hymns to the gods. To the same class belong, above all, the epic poems, of which, fortunately, a whole series have come down to us, more or less perfectly preserved. These poems might with equal propriety be called mythological texts, for the purely epic and narrative element in them is constantly mingled and combined with the mythological. The most important and (as is proved by the order adopted for the zodiacal signs, the Ram, kusarikku, being last) the oldest poem is—

(a) The Creation-epos. 'When heaven above had not yet been named and earth below yet bore no name—but the ocean (apsû, 𒀭𒀫), the primeval, their progenitor, and chaos (Tihâmat or mummu T.) the bearer of them all, yet mingled their waters together, when as yet no cornfield was cultivated, and no reed seen—when as yet none of the gods existed, no name they bore, destinies were not yet assigned, then were born the gods [of mummu or chaos]; Lukhmu and Lakhâmu came forth [first], æons grew up (=elapsed?) . . . Anshar and Kishar were born, long days passed by till at length Anu, Bel, and Ea were produced; [but the son of Ea and Damkina was Marduk the creator of the world]. So begins, in remarkable accord with Gn 1st, this poem, whose commencement has also come down to us in Greek in Damascius' Quest. de primis principis. The further course of events described is briefly as follows: After the above-named gods originated from chaos, a strife arose between Tihâmat (𒀭𒀫), the female personification of the primeval ocean, and the rest of the gods. Anu claims the right to decide the dispute; Tihâmat, however, declares war, and binds the tablets of destiny (cf. the Urim and Thummim of OT) to the breast of her consort Kingu. Anshar,* after fruitless attempts, through the medium of Anu, Ea, and Marduk, to conciliate Tihâmat, sends to inform Lukhmu and Lakhâmu that Marduk is prepared to undertake the conflict with Tihâmat. The detailed account of this conflict between the god of light, Marduk, and the dark primeval ocean, † makes up the 4th canto of the epos, which fortunately we possess complete. Marduk conquers the dragon and his eleven helpers (cf. Job 9¹³), cleaves Tihāmat, and out of the one-half fashions the firmament of heaven, in which he assigns their places to the gods Anu, Bel, Ea, and to the moon and the stars, while out of the other half he fashions the earth. The eleven helpers were placed in the sky as the zodiacal signs, Merodach himself being the twelfth. The connected fragments still extant make it plain that thereafter followed a description of how plants and animals, and finally man, were all formed by Bel-Merodach. Beside this there was another Bab. myth, according to which it was the god Ea who formed man of clay. Moreover, in the epos, Bel the god of the air and of storm, whom the Babylonians portrayed with thunderbolts in his hand, is confounded with Merodach, a circumstance which points to Babylon, whose tutelary deity, Merodach, was called the younger Bel. The original notion that the elder Bel (Semit. Bēlu 'lord' κατ' ἔξοχῆν) was the creator, finds its echo in Genesis (cf. the 'spirit of God' of Gn 1² with the Sumerian name of Bel, En-lilla, 'lord of the air' or 'the wind').

* Originally identical with Anu, An-šar being = heaven's host, but afterwards differentiated from him, and at a later period assimilated to Aššur (Damascius' Acroasis).

† In pictorial representations Tihâmat appears as a dragon (hence the serpent of the Bab. boundary-stones) with a lion's head, hence she is called also labbu, 'lion.'

(b) The so-called Nimrod-epos (cf. Gn 10⁹⁻¹²). The 12 cantos of this magnificent poem stand in evident relation to the 12 signs of the Zodiac, of which, however, it is no longer the Bull but the Ram that comes first. The hero Gišdubar, also called Nārūdu (for Namrūdu), Namrasit, and Gibil-gamis, sprang from a city which afterwards completely disappeared, Surippak (on the river Surappu?). He becomes king of Erech, where he rules as a tyrant, until the gods create Ea-bānī, a kind of Priapus, to destroy him. The two, however, strike up a friendship after Gišdubar has overcome a mighty lion. (This last scene is often depicted on cylinder-seals and reliefs.) Together they next deliver the city of Erech from the Elamite oppressor Khumbaba (Combabos). Istar, the goddess of love, now offers to Gišdubar her hand, which, however, is refused by the hero (Canto 6). Out of revenge Istar sends a scorpion, whose sting proves fatal to Ea-bānī; Gišdubar himself she smites with an incurable disease. In consequence of this he sets out, in quest of relief, for the dwelling-place of his great-grandfather Šit-napišti (=rescue of life), the Bab. Noah ('Rest' i.e. of the soul), far away on the ocean in the Isles of the Blessed. With this aim he first traverses, amidst great dangers, the land of Māshu (Central Arabia, מִשְׁכּוֹ or מִשְׁכָּו of the OT), and then crosses the waters of death to Šit-napišti, who (Canto 11) gives him a detailed account of his escape from the Deluge (see below), heals him of his disease, and presents him with the plant of life. The latter, however, is snatched from him on his way home by an earth-lion (i.e. a serpent). On his arrival at Erech, he bewails, in the temple of the goddess Ninsunna, the death of his friend Ea-bānī, and prays the god Nergal to restore the spirit of Ea-bānī to him. With the granting of this request, and a graphic description by Ea-bānī of the under-world, the epos closes.

(c) The Bab. Story of the Deluge. This is contained in the 11th canto of the Nimrod-epos (see previous section). When the great gods, with Bel in his quality of storm-god (Bel-Ramman) at their head, determined to send a flood,* Ea revealed to Šit-napišti in a dream how he might save himself by constructing a ship. Ten gar (120 cubits) was to be the height of its sides, and the same was to be the width of its deck; it was to have six storeys, each of which was to have seven divisions, while the area was divided into 9 parts (3 on each side of a square?). Since the length is not specified, we are probably to think of the Bab. ark as square-shaped, thus forming a cube. On the 7th day the vessel was ready; then for 6 days on end the rain fell in torrents, till on the 7th day again the storm abated. After other 7 days, during the whole of which the ark had been in sight of Mt. Nišir ('rescue'), Šit-napišti sent forth a dove. 'The dove flew hither and thither, but since it found no resting-place, it returned. Then I sent forth a swallow,' so proceeds the story, 'and let it go; the swallow flew hither and thither, but since there was no resting-place, it returned. Then I sent forth a raven, and let it go; the raven flew away, saw the abating of the waters, approached wading and croaking, but returned not.' On the top of Mt. Nišir, S. of Laké Urmia and E. of Assyria,* and thus between Media and Armenia (Ararat), the ark stranded. The gods smelt with pleasure the odour of the seven vessels of incense offered by Šit-napišti; especially gratified was Istar, the goddess of the bow; and Ea besought Bel never more to send a flood upon the earth. Bel suffered himself to be persuaded,† took Šit-napišti and his wife by the hand, blessed them (cf. Gn 9¹), and translated them to Paradise.

* As a judgment on the sins of the inhabitants of Surippak. This is clear from the close of the Deluge-story, e.g. lines 184-5 (or, acc. to another reckoning, l. 170), where we read, 'Upon the sinner let his sin lie, and upon the transgressor his transgression, but let no flood come any more as a punishment upon man' (cf. the parallel in Gn 8²¹).

We have to note finally that here, as in the case of the Creation-epos, both the OT writers, the Jahwist (J) and the Elohist (E), have a surprising number of points of contact with the details of the Bab. text, from which it is evident that these coincidences carry us back to a very early date.

(d) Istar's descent to Hades. Istar determines to descend to Hades to free the dead who dwell there. As she passes through the seven gates of the under-world, all her garments and ornaments are taken from her, and Nin-ki-gal or Allatu (for Aralatu), the goddess of Hades, orders her servant Namtar the plague-demon, to smite Istar with disease. Meanwhile in the upper world all procreation ceases, owing to the absence of the goddess of love, until the gods send Uddušunamir ('his brightness is fair', a transposition of the name Namra-uddu or Nimrod) to Allat with the request that she would allow Istar to return to earth.

(e) The Namtar-legend. The gods are holding a banquet, and send to their sister Nin-ki-gal (Allatu), who had been carried off by Nergal, a message desiring that she would send for the portion of food meant for her. Thereupon she sends her herald Namtar to heaven. Nergal's distrust is awakened by this intercourse between his wife and the heavenly powers, and he imagines that she is planning flight. Accordingly, although he loves her dearly, yet, tortured by jealousy, he resolves to have her put to death. He stations the fourteen watchers of the under-world as sentinels at the gates, and orders Namtar to strike off the head of Nin-ki-gal. The latter pleads with her husband to spare her life, and she will submit to any conditions, nay, will give to him the sovereignty over the earth. Nergal weeps for joy, kisses his wife, and wipes away her tears. Unfortunately, the other parts of this legend, which has come down to us in a copy written in Egypt amongst the Tel el-Amarna correspondence, are of so fragmentary a character that it is impossible to extract from them a connected story.

(f) The Adapa-legend (also derived from Tel el-Amarna). Merodach, the son of Ea, appears here

* The Assy. king Assur-nazir-pal mentions this mountain in connexion with an expedition to the land of Zamua. See ASSYRIA (p. 183^b).

† It is worth noting that Bel, upon a similar occasion, namely, after his conquest of Tihāmat, gives up his bow to Anu, who solemnly, in presence of all the gods, hangs it up in heaven (cf. the bow of Gn 9¹³ which God sets 'in the cloud').

under the name of Adapa as the progenitor of man.* Adapa, who had broken the wings of the south wind, is cited before the god of heaven to justify himself. His father, Ea, counsels him not to accept of the food offered him there, as it will cause death. Adapa follows this advice, but finds that by his refusal he has forfeited immortality, since it was really the 'food of life' which Anu offered him.

(g) The Etana-legend. Etana (𒂗𒌷 1 K 5¹¹?) applies to the sun-god for something to mitigate the pains of parturition for his wife. He is referred to the Eagle, which can furnish him with the requisite 'birth-plant.' As Etana relates to the Eagle how in a dream (?) he had seen the gate of Anu and that of Istar, the Eagle offers to carry him up to heaven. The enterprise succeeds in the first instance, and the two arrive at the gate of Anu, but in flying to the gate of Istar the strength of the Eagle gives way, he falls headlong, and Etana atones for his presumption by his death. He is transferred as a demi-god to the under-world. Shortly afterwards the Eagle also loses his life through the cunning of a serpent whose young he had devoured.

(h) The legends of the god Zû (Sumer. Im-dugud, the 'storm-bird god'). Acc. to one form of the story, Zû steals the tablets of destiny from Bel-Merodach, and Rammân and various other gods decline, from fear, to take them back from him. Acc. to another text, the god Lugal-banda (the moon-god) sets out for the distant mountain of Sâbu (in Central Arabia) to overreach Zû by cunning. In the heavens the god Zû is represented by the constellation Pegasus, and Taurus (Merodach) is his son.

(i) The legend of the god Girra (Nergal as god of war). A devastating inroad of the Sutai (the Semitic nomad tribes of Mesopotamia) directed against Babel, Sippar, and Erech, is in dramatic fashion connected with the conflict of Nergal and his herald, the fire-god (or Nebo), with Merodach, the tutelary god of Babylon. The mention of the Assyrians and the Kassites plainly indicates that this poem did not originate prior to the so-called Kassite period.

Special mention is due also to the second tablet (written entirely in Semit.) of the exorcism-series shurpu, in which the priest in the form of a long litany inquires what may have been the transgressions that have brought the punishment of the gods on the man who is possessed or sick. 'Has he perchance set his parents or relations at variance, sinned against God, despised father or mother, lied, cheated, dishonoured his neighbour's wife, shed his neighbour's blood?' etc. The coincidences with the Heb. Decalogue, and with the Egyp. Ptah-hotep sentences or the Trial of the Dead before the 42 judges of the dead, are unmistakable.

That the Babylonians, as well as the ancient Egyptians, possessed also historical narratives in romance-form, is proved by the stories of Sargon of Agade and Kudur-Dugmal. The former of these has also come down to us in Greek from the pen of Ælian, only that the Gr. writer has confounded the name of Sargon with that of Gilgames. Sargon is the illegitimate son of a princess, who gives birth to him in secret and exposes him to perish. The child, however, is brought up by a gardener, and in the end comes to the throne. The only new element Ælian introduces into the story is that the boy was rescued by an eagle. (This is prob. due to a mistaken combination with the Etana-legend.) The legend (in metrical form) of the invasion of Babylonia by the Elamite king Kudur-Dugmal (a later form of Kudur-Lagamar) furnishes at the same time the best proof of the historicity of Gn 14. For the Heb. narrative is in accord with the original inscriptions dating from the time of Khammurabi (Amraphel), and not with the later Bab. legend. Yet the latter is what we should have expected if the Hebrews had first made acquaintance with the matter of Gn 14 during the Exile. The history knows of only the father of Iriaku (Arioch) of Larsa, who was king of Iamutbal, and resided at Dûr-ilu on the Elam.-Bab. frontier; the legend, on the other hand, makes of the city Dûr-ilu a son of Iriaku, viz. Dûr-makh-ili, of whom neither the Bible nor the inscriptions contain any notice.

Of great variety, although not belonging in the stricter sense to literature, are the other components of Bab. writing. Tables of paradigms and lexical-lists served to facilitate the learning and practice of the Sumer. speech. But along with these there were also lists containing only Semitic words (the so-called synonym-lists) and forms (e.g. the word-table, WAI v. pl. 45). As an introduction to the complicated writing, there were syllabaries and collections of signs. Very numerous also are the commentaries which the Babylonians have left to us. These deal partly with the poetical literature, especially with the rare words that occur in it, and partly with the explanation of legal and agricultural terms in the old Bab. contract-tablets (the so-called ana-itti-su series). In such instances whole laws are sometimes quoted verbatim, so that we thus get a glimpse of the most ancient codes of the Babylonians. The contract-tablets themselves, which have come down to us in great abundance from all epochs of Bab. history, do not indeed belong to literature, but deserve special mention here because they supply us with the most interesting information not only about business but about all the possible details of private life.

A sort of counterpart to the lexical-lists is presented by the lists of names of places, countries, temples, officials, and stars, as well as the numerous lists of gods. We must mention also the numerous omen-texts, medical prescriptions, astronomical and mathematical tables, and finally some lists connected with the history of literature (e.g. a list of epic poems with the names of the authors or collectors). The historical literature will be dealt with below, when we come to speak of the sources of Bab. history. How the most important of the latter, namely, the inscriptions, were brought to light, we learn from the intensely interesting History of Excavations. As early as 1802 the first considerable Bab. inscription, on the so-called Caillou de Michaux, a boundary-stone of the 12th cent. B.C., was brought to Europe, and soon afterwards, through the efforts of the East India Company, a whole collection of Bab. antiquities (among them considerable inscriptions of Nebuchadrezzar) was brought from Bassorah to the British Museum and the East India House. But it was not till 1811 that Mr. C. J. Rich, the rediscoverer of Nineveh, was able to explore more thoroughly Hillah, the ruins of ancient Babylon. In the fifties archæological research was resumed in Babylonia by the Englishmen, W. K. Loftus, J. E. Taylor, and A. H. Layard, who discovered the ruined sites of Niffer (Nippur), Warka (Uruk or Erech), Senkereh (Larsa), Mukayyar (Ur), and Abu Shahrein (Eridu); and by the Frenchmen, Fresnel and Oppert, who instituted further excavations at Hillah (Babel and Borsippa). In these ruins just named, in S. Babylonia, the inscriptions discovered were all brief, but on account of their antiquity they were proportionately important. These consisted for the most part of so-called brick stamps,* although in Babel more considerable inscriptions were found, dating especially from the period of the New Bab. empire. Meanwhile Henry Rawlinson had deciphered the Bab. version (the so-called third form) of the trilingual Achæmenidean inscription of Persepolis. The key was found in the old Pers. version (the so-called first form), which had already been interpreted by G. F. Grotefend (1802), Rawlinson, and Burnouf, and which had been proved, by the two last named in particular, to be in an Indo-Germanic language. The work of deciphering the third form (whereby also the cuneiform inscriptions of the Ninevite monuments became readable and intelligible) was continued and perfected in the sixties by the talented Hincks, the Englishman E. Norris, and the Parisian scholar Julius Oppert. Later on, in the seventies, the excavations in Babylonia, notably at Babel and in the surrounding country, were continued, especially by George Smith and Hormuzd Rassam. In the course of his last expedition (1880-1881) Rassam discovered the ruins of Sippar-Agade at the modern Abu-Habba, along with the archives of the ancient temple of the sun. Moreover, by digging in Tell Ibrahim, 10 Eng. miles E. of Babel, he was able to prove once for all that this was the site of the ancient Kutha, as Rawlinson had already conjectured.

The work of bringing to light the oldest civilisation of Babylonia (Sumer. as well as Semit.), leaving out of account the small beginnings of Loftus and Taylor, has been due especially to the Frenchman de Sarzec, and to the American University of Pennsylvania (Peters and others, and at a later period, above all, J. H. Haynes and the scientific director of the fund, Prof. H. V. Hilprecht). Through their excavations at Telloh (1876-1881) and at Niffer (1888-1896), the history and archæology of Babylonia have been enriched as they had never been before; from c. B.C. 5000 we can trace continuously the civilisation of Babylonia by aid of monuments and inscriptions. Instead of the cuneiform proper, the oldest inscriptions still use linear signs, in which it is often quite possible to trace clearly the figures that form the basis of the system. The Americans also discovered at Niffer nearly 1000 contract-tablets of the so-called Kassite period, whose dates now enable us to fix with certainty the exact succession of the then reigning monarchs.

Of 'finds' outside Babylonia, we must mention above all the clay tablets which were discovered at Tel el-Amarna in Upper Egypt (see ASSYRIA). Among these there are letters to the Pharaohs not only from Bab. kings, but also from a great many Phœn. and Pal. governors. The Bab. writing and language were then (c. 1400 B.C.) employed for diplomatic communications over almost the whole of W. Asia. The Elamites too borrowed their mode of writing from the Babylonians, as at a later period the Armenians did from the Assyrians. Further, it is becoming ever more probable that even the so-called Can. or Phœn. form of writing, to which the S. Arabian is most nearly allied, was derived not from the Egyptians, but from the Babylonians, and as early indeed as c. B.C. 2000. It is a transformation into cursive of a number of old Bab. signs, and may have originated in E. Arabia about the time of the first N. Bab. dynasty, which was of Arabian descent.

Sources for Bab. History. These are, first and foremost, the inscriptions discovered in course of the excavations we have described; but the

* The only exceptions were Senkereh (Larsa) and the adjacent Tel Sifr; for there Loftus found a great number of old Bab. contract-tablets dating from the time of Khammurabi and Iriaku (or the epoch of Abraham).

Assyr. libraries brought to light in the palaces of Nineveh have also supplied us with a number of copies not only of the Bab. religious writings, but also of historical records. In the art. ASSYRIA we have already spoken of the so-called 'synchronistic history' and of the 'Bab. chronicle.' During the last two decades there have been recovered also numerous remains of Bab. libraries, esp. from the time of Nebuch. downwards, reaching as far as the Seleucid period. To these we are indebted not only for the many Bab. duplicates of the remains of Bab. literature hitherto known only from the library of Assurbanipal, but also for not a few passages that are entirely new. Even at Tel el-Amarna, as was already remarked (p. 221¹), the fragments of two ancient Bab. legends about the gods were found.

Apart from the innumerable contemporaneous and original monuments of Bab. kings, and the contract-tablets so important for a knowledge of chronology and of private life, not to speak of other records of a more private character, we have to mention as a historical source of the very first rank the great Bab. List of Kings. This contains the names of the kings of Babel from the Arab dynasty down to the last native king Nabonidus (Nabu-na'id), with note of the length of the reign of each. We have already (p. 222²) referred to some poetically embellished traditions. On the omen-lists, as they are called, and on the great astrological work, as important historical sources for the old Bab. era, we shall speak afterwards, when we come to deal with the history of Sargon and the so-called younger kings of Ur. Amongst extra-Bab. sources, the first rank must be assigned to the OT writings (Gn, esp. chap. 14, the Bks of Kings, the Prophets, esp. Jer, Ezk, Is 40-66, and finally Ezr-Neh). Only a secondary place belongs to the scanty notices of classical writers, whose importance is specially due to the fact that they have preserved for us some valuable citations from the work (unhappily lost) of the Bab. priest Berosus. For the New Bab. period, and esp. for the topography of Babel, a valuable authority on many points is Herodotus, who himself visited Babel in the course of his travels. Also in Strabo's geography we find several interesting details regarding Babylonia. On the other hand, the information must be pronounced rather untrustworthy and inexact which the extant fragments of Ctesias give us concerning Bab. history. We have already (see ASSYRIA) said all that is most essential about the value of the so-called Canon of Ptolemy (2nd cent. A.D.) for Bab. chronology. In conjunction with the so-called Bab. Chronicle, which runs parallel to it, and the list of kings (which unhappily is not free from gaps), whose starting-point was first accurately fixed by aid of the Canon, the latter forms the most important source for the Chronology. Besides the Canon of Ptolemy and the Assyr. and Egyp. synchronisms already described in art. ASSYRIA, important chronological data are supplied by the later historical inscriptions, esp. those of Nabonidus, and by some earlier monuments. In using these data, however, it must always be borne in mind that in all probability, as early as the time of Assurbanipal, the Bab. chronographers had already fallen into the error of making the first two dynasties in the list of kings successive instead of contemporaneous. Consequently, a number of the following dates must be reduced by 368 years, the duration of the second dynasty.

a. A boundary-stone, dated the 4th year of king Bel-nadin-apli (Hilprecht, Old Bab. Inscrip. i. pl. 30), informs us that from Gulkishar, king of the sea-land (i.e. Gulkišar, the sixth king of the second dynasty), to Nebuch. I., there were 696 years. Now, since Bel-nadin-apli was the immediate successor of Nebuch. I., the first four years of his own reign must be added to the above number, giving us the round number of 700 years between the death of Gulkišar and the time when the boundary-stone was set up. As the latter date is c. B.C. 1118, the death of Gulkišar would have to be dated B.C. 1818, or a few decades later, for the round number 700 may, if need be, stand also for 650 or 660.

b. Sennacherib relates that 418 years before the destruction of Babylon (B.C. 689), Marduk-nadin-akhi, the contemporary of Tiglath-pileser I. of Assyria, carried away two images of gods from the Assyr. city of Ikallāti to Babylon. This implies that in B.C. 1107, and during the reign of Marduk-nadin-akhi, Babylonia had the upper hand of Assyria. Now it so happens that a boundary-stone, dated the 10th year of Marduk-nadin-akhi, records a great victory gained that year over Assyria, so that this 10th year will be B.C. 1107, or, in other words, the first year of M.'s reign must be dated B.C. 1117.

c. Assurbanipal, in connexion with the conquest of Elam (c. 640 or later), mentions that the image of a god brought back by him from Elam to Erech had been carried away from the latter city 1635 years before, by Kudur-nankhundi. This invasion of Babylonia by the Elamites must accordingly have taken place c. B.C. 2275. It is quite possible, however, that, for the reason stated above, this last number ought to be reduced by 368 years, and that the date should be B.C. 1907.

d. Nabonidus relates that he restored the temple E-ulmash at Sippar-Anunit (i.e. Agade), which had not been restored since the reign of Shagaraktiburiash 800 years before. This gives us as the year of the death of the latter (which took place 750–800 years before Nabonidus, who himself reigned B.C. 555–539) a date somewhere between B.C. 1300 and 1350. (See further below, under Kurigalzu II.).

e. In the same inscription (WAI, v. pl. 64) Nabonidus states that 3200 years before himself, the old king Narām-Sin, son of Sargon (now known to us from the inscriptions as Sargāni-shar-ali, king of Agade), founded the temple of Samas at Sippar. This carries us to the high antiquity of B.C. 3750 for the reign of Narām-Sin. This figure, however, for the above reason, should certainly be reduced to c. B.C. 3400.

f. Nabonidus further mentions, in an inscription which found its way to the Brit. Museum in 1885, that Burnaburias restored the temple of the sun at Larsa 700 years after Khammurabi. Since this undoubtedly refers to the more celebrated monarch of that name, Burnaburias II. (c. 1400–1375),* we are enabled thus to fix the date of Khammurabi's reign at c. B.C. 2100. And, as a matter of fact, we obtain c. 2139–2084 as the date of his reign, if we follow the later custom of adding together the years of dynasties A and B as if they had been successive instead of contemporaneous, and if we assume (with Dr. Peiser, Zeitsch. f. Assyr. vi. 264–271) as the probable duration of dynasty C only 399 instead of the traditional 576 years (6 sosses and 39 years, instead of 9 sosses and 36 years). In reality, however, Khammurabi, the contemporary of Abraham, must have reigned B.C. 1772–1717 or 1949–1894.

History of Babylonia. As far back as we can go, and thus in any case considerably earlier than B.C. 4000, we find Sumerians and Semites side by side in Babylonia. Yet we can see clearly enough—(1) that the Semites in the earliest period were settled for the most part in the N.W., and that they penetrated into Babylonia from Mesopotamia (Harran), while the Sumerians, at a very early date, were confined to the extreme S.E. of the Euphrates region; (2) that the Sumerians were the founders of Bab. civilisation, and that in the remotest antiquity they certainly at one time occupied the whole of Babylonia. The Semites not only employed at all times the Sumerian writing, which they accommodated as they best could to their purposes, but for a long time (at least for official records, such as dedicatory inscriptions) they used the Sumer. language as well. It was not till shortly before Sargon of Agade (c. B.C. 3500) that in N. Babylonia inscriptions began to be composed also in Semitic.

At the period to which the oldest hitherto discovered inscriptions belong, the canal running from N. to S. (the modern Shatt-el-Hai), and uniting the Tigris with the Euphrates, formed the boundary between two very ancient kingdoms—the Sumer. kingdom of Sirgulla (Lagash) or Girsu, lying to the E. of the above-named canal, and the Semit. kingdom of Uruk (Erech) and Ur to the W. of the same canal. A part of the latter kingdom, probably the region between Ur, Arabia, and the Persian Gulf, on the right bank of the Euphrates, was already known as Ki-Ingi, i.e. region of Ingi, a name which soon came to be applied to the whole kingdom of Erech, but more especially to that part of it which lay in S. Babylonia, to the W. of Sirgulla. The oldest form of this name appears to have been Imgur or Imgir. From Ki-Imgir arose in course of time, through dialectical pronunciation, Shimīr, Shumīr (from the time of Khammurabi onwards the name for S. Babylonia); while the intermediate form Shingar has been preserved in the Heb. שִׁנָר, Shinar, properly Shingar (Gn 10¹⁰ 11²). The oldest religious centre of the kingdom of Sirgulla was Nun-ki or Uru-dugga (Eridu, see above, p. 215^b), while that of Erech and of the Bab. Semites in general was Nippur, with its sanctuary of Bel of ancient fame. Acc. to Talmudic tradition, the biblical Calneh (Gn 10¹⁰, cf. Is 10⁹ LXX, τὴν χώραν τὴν ἐπὶ τῶν Βαβυλωνίων καὶ Χαλανθῆ, ὃς ὁ πύργος ψεκδομήθη) was only another name for Nippur, and, in point of fact, in an enumeration of the most important cities of Nimrod's kingdom (Babel, Erech, Accad, Calneh), Nippur could scarcely be omitted.

A third kingdom which meets us even in the oldest inscriptions (e.g. in those of king En-shag-sag-anna [Bel-shar-shāme?]) as a rival of Erech, is that of Kis (written Kiš-ki). This name was also borne at a later period by a city that lay some three leagues N.E. of Babel. A close connexion subsisted between this Kis, whose population was also undoubtedly Semitic, and a city on the Tigris called Šabban (written Ud-ban-ki, 'city of the hordes of the bow'), probably the later Opis. In the oldest dedicatory inscriptions found at Nippur, we find mention not only of priest-princes (Patesi, e.g. a certain Utuk), but also of kings of Kis (e.g. En-bil-ugun and Ur-Dun-pa-uddu or Amil-Nabu).

One of the most remarkable of the above-named kings of Erech was Lugal-zag-gi-si (Semit. perhaps Sharru-mali-imūkki-kini, 'the king is full of eternal strength'). He calls himself 'king of Erech, king of the world (kalamma)', while to his father Ukush he gives only the title 'patesi of Gishban' ('bow-city', i.e. Harran in Mesopotamia). Besides Erech, he possessed also Ur, Larsa, Nippur, and Gishban (Harran); Sippar-Agade and Babel appear as yet to have played no part in history, while both in Kis and in Sirgulla their own kings held sway. The date of these old kings of Erech must be fixed at the latest at somewhere before B.C. 4000. Judging from the type of writing, this period included also a certain Lugal-ki-gub-ni-gul-gul (Sem. perhaps Sharru-mushaklil-manzazi) and his son Lugal-si-kisal, both of whom style themselves 'king of Erech, king of Ur.' The kings of Sirgulla, En-ghigalla, and Uru-kaginna must also be assigned to the same era. While the two last-named very ancient monarchs have left us only a few inscriptions, we have all the more monuments of Ur-ghanna (acc. to others to be read Ur-Ninâ), and of his grandson E-dingirra-na-du.* The latter in particular, who by preference styles himself 'patesi,' instead of 'king,' of Sirgulla, must have been a great warrior. The so-called 'Vulture-Stele' (now in Paris), the earliest monument of old Bab. sculpture, and other recently-discovered stones, give us both by word and by picture a detailed account of his great victory over the cities of Gishban (Harran), Kis, Şabban, and Az, and the consequent deliverance of Erech, Ur, and Larsa from the hands of the N. Bab. Semites. It is an interesting circumstance that already at this date there is mention also of a city A-idinna (Semit. Nâdu), in which we may recognise with certainty the 'Nod in front of Eden' of Gn 4¹⁸. It is, perhaps, the same city which meets us some centuries later under the name Agade (Akkad) or Sippar-Anunit. To the nephew of E-dingirra-na-du, the patesi En-timinna, we owe a silver vase, remarkable for the fineness of its execution, with the figures of animals portrayed upon it. As dedicatory inscriptions of this patesi have been found also at Nippur, he must certainly, like his uncle, have had possession also of N. Babylonia.

This hegemony of Sirgulla over Erech and Nippur may have existed about and after B.C. 4000.

During the following centuries, however, we find Nippur again in the hands of Semit. kings, who arrogate to themselves the proud title lugal kish, i.e. 'king of the world.'† To these monarchs (Ma-ishtu-su and Alu-musharshid) we owe the earliest known of Bab. inscriptions composed in Semitic. They resided either at Kis or at Agade. Shortly thereafter (c. B.C. 3500) we meet with the first real kings of Agade (see above, p. 224*), Sargâni-shar-ali (later curtailed to Sargâni) or Sargon, and his son Narâm-Sin, the latter of whom, however, no longer styles himself 'king of Agade,' but 'king of the four quarters of the world' (shar kibrâti arba'i). An omen-tablet, dating from a later period, tells us of great expeditions of Sargon, reaching as far as the coast of the Mediter., which is perfectly credible, for it was the conquest of Syria that led to the introduction of the title 'king of the four quarters of the world,' which was actually assumed by Sargon's son. And the evidence that Narâm-Sin extended his sway far beyond the limits of Babylonia is furnished by the inscription, coupled with a portrait of him, which was found at Diarbekr in N. Mesopotamia, and by the alabaster vase which is entitled 'a piece of booty from the land of Magan,' i.e. Arabia. That at this period the Bab. sway extended over N. Syria, Mesopotamia, Elam, and N. Arabia, may be regarded as certain, and one of the most recent 'finds' of de Sarzec has proved also that amongst the vassals of Narâm-Sin was a patesi of Sirgulla, named Lugal-ushumgal.

Whether the rule of these kings of Agade endured yet longer we know not. On the other hand, the patesi of Sirgulla must have for many centuries maintained their supremacy over S.E. Babylonia. One of these, the famous Gudea, probably extended his sway over even the whole of Babylonia. In his numerous and lengthy inscriptions, all composed entirely in Sumerian, he boasts of having brought the stones and timber for his buildings from the most diverse regions and mountains of the west country (Martu) and Arabia. Moreover, he conquered Elam, especially the part of it known as Anshan ('asses' land'). Special interest is awakened by the mention of the cedar mountain Amanu, the mountain Ibla (for Libla, i.e. Lebanon?), the mountain Tidanu of Martu (Dedan in the E. Jordan district), and the name Martu itself (for Amartu, i.e. land of the Amorites). Of Arabian districts, we find named not only Magan (originally Ma'an?) or E. Arabia, but also Milukh (N.W. Arabia, probably including the Sin. peninsula), Khâkh (near Medina), and Ki-mash ('district of Mash,' the modern Gebel Shammar). Khâkh yielded gold dust, Milukh gold dust and precious stones, Magan and Ki-mash copper. Notwithstanding all this, Gudea nowhere styles himself 'king of the four quarters of the world,' whence it appears plain that he did not actually possess these regions outside Babylonia, but simply ensured by treaties the passage of his caravans through them. Of his predecessors (Ur-Ba'u, Nam-maghâni, Ur-Ninsun, etc.) we know nothing of this kind; their sphere of activity was probably restricted to Sirgulla. Gudea's son, Ur-Ningirsu, was still patesi of Sirgulla, but shortly thereafter a king of Ur named Ur-gur, who was probably of Semit. origin, succeeded in subjugating the greater part of Babylonia. In almost all the cities of Babylonia (Ur, Erech, Larsa, Nippur) we encounter temples built by him, and he was, at the same time, the first to assume the title 'king of Ki-Ingî and Ki-bur-bur (Akkad),' which, at a later period, was rendered 'king of Sumer and Akkad.' But it was his son Dungi who succeeded in dethroning the last patesi of Sirgulla, one Idimmâni (written Gullu-ka-ni). Dungi also built a temple for Nin-Shu-anna (i.e. 'lady of Babel,' to be identified with Zarpanit the wife of Merodach), and for Nergal (Shit-lam-ta-uddu-a) the temple of Shit-lam at Kutha, as well as various temples at Sirgulla and Girsu (Telloh). To what period Ur-gur and Dungi are to be assigned cannot unfortunately be determined with certainty, since we do not know whether the space of time that intervened between them and the kings of Nisin was a long or a short one. The very latest date we can assign to Gudea is c. B.C. 2500, to Ur-gur and Dungi of Ur c. 2400, and to the kings of Nisin c. 2300-2100; but it is quite conceivable that Ur-gur and Dungi reigned as early as c. 2700-2600, and Gudea c. 2800. It must further be mentioned that there are Semit. as well as Sumer. inscriptions, in which Dungi styles himself not 'king of Ki-Ingî and Akkad,' but 'king of the four quarters of the world,' a circumstance which points to the fact that he must have held possession of part of Syria and Elam, and thus, as a matter of course, of Mesopotamia.

About the same period we have to place a certain Mutabil, governor of Dûr-ilu, who calls himself 'breaker of the heads of the people of Anshan (Elam), uprooter of Barakhsi.' Since his special god is Gudi (=Nabû?), and his capital Dûr-ilu, it is certain that the Elamite district of Iamutbal, whose capital was also Dûr-ilu, derived its name from him (Elam. ia=land, and Mutbal=Mutabil). The land of Barakhsi is already mentioned, in conjunction with Elam, by Alu-muârâsid of Kis, as a conquered region; the name reminds one both of Barkhazia (a Median province in time of Tiglath-pileser III.) and of the well-known Barsua (for Barakhsi may be read Bara'si).

Of the same date, in all probability, are the bricks, found by M. Pognon, of the three patesi of Ashnunna (or Umliahi), viz. Ibalpil, Ur-Ningis-

* Or E-dingirra-ginna. The name='bringing (going) into the house of his god.'

† The determinative of place being omitted. 'King of Kis' would be lugal kish-ki; but, at the same time, the title lugal kish contains a play upon the name of the city Kis.

zidda (or Amil-Nusku), and Kullaku. It is different with the inscription of king Anu-banini of Lulub, found in the mountains of Batir (the modern Ser-i-pul near Holvan), and esp. with that of king Lasirab of Guti. The character of the signs used justifies us in assigning these to a much earlier date, about the time of Narâm-Sin of Agade, or shortly thereafter.

The kings of Nisin, of whom we now know a whole series (Ishbi-Nergal, Amil-Nindar [Ur-Nin-ib], Libit-Istar, Bur-Sin, Idin-Dagan, and Ishmf-Dagan), were, as their names show, Semites. They held Nippur (which is always named first in their inscriptions), Ur, Eridu, Erech, and Nisin; and, like the middle kings of Ur (Ur-gur and Dungi), they style themselves 'king of Ki-Ingi and Ki-bur-bur (Sumer and Akkad).' The site of Nisin has not yet been accurately determined; at a later period it was pronounced Isin, and in the time of the so-called Pashi-dynasty (12th cent. B.C.) was the seat of a Bab. governor, on the same footing as Babel itself, Khalvan, Namar, and Ushti.

The last of these monarchs, Ishmf-Dagan, was followed by the so-called younger kings of Ur. The first of these was one Gungunu, probably, as his name suggests, a usurper. Besides him we know of three successive kings, Int-Sin, Bur-Sin (written differently from the king of Nisin of the same name), and Gimil-Sin. In addition to Ur, they held in Babylonia certainly Nippur and Eridu, and styled themselves not 'king of Ki-Ingi and Akkad,' but uniformly 'king of the four quarters of the world.' Numerous contracts of sale, dating from this period, testify not only to the flourishing condition of trade, cattle-breeding, and agriculture, but also to the political importance of the kingdom. These kings of Ur waged successful wars against Zapshali (on the borders of Cilicia and Syria), Elam (Anshan), Lulub (in N.E. of Babylonia), Sabu, and Ki-mash (in N. Arabia), and other territories. Several of these countries became Babylonian vassal-kingdoms, whose princes married Babylonian princesses. This was the case, e.g., with Zapshali, Anshan, and Markhasi.

Nevertheless, these kings of Ur do not appear to have had possession of the whole of Babylonia; for the great astrological work, 'Illumination of Bel,' which originated at this epoch, and which once names even king Int-Sin, makes it plain that besides the kings of Ur there were kings of Kisharra (Sumer. ki-sharra, synonym. with kish, 'world') and Akkad. These are mentioned even as rivals of the Ur monarchs. We hear also of kings of Imgi (cf. Ingi in the name Ki-Ingi). Since Imgi became afterwards the ideogram for Kaidu, 'Chaldees,' this will, at the time of the kings of Ur, have been the designation of the extreme south of Babylonia, the so-called 'sea-land.' The astrological work mentions also foreign enemies, such as Elam and Anshan, Guti, the Sutean nomads, Ishnunna, the island of Bahrein, Nituk or Dilmun, the land of Khattu, and very frequently the land of Martu. If this first mention of the Hittites is highly interesting, still more worthy of our attention is the connexion in which Martu (the west land) is introduced. This implies that at that period Ur exercised supremacy over the whole of Palestine (including the eastern Jordanic territory and Cœle-Syria). For, when the king of Kisharra (N. Babylonia) in passing snatches the sceptre of Ur, Martu at the same time falls into his hands. The name Sab Manda (or Umman Manda, a designation at a later period of the Scythians and Medes) also occurs in the astrological work, where it is applied to the Elamite mountaineers, who carried off the image of Bel (the god of Nippur).

To the same period (c. B.C. 2100-1900 at the latest) ought to be assigned, in all probability, certain kings of Erech, who have left us inscriptions, viz. Sin-gashit (who, like Gišdubar, styles himself son of the moon-goddess Nin-sun, and whose possessions, besides Erech, included the Elamite border-land of Amnanu) and Sin-gamil. A vassal of the latter, named Ilû-ma-ilu (properly Ilû-ma-Gišdubba, but generally called simply Ilû-ma), the son of Nab-shimta, was the founder of the so-called 2nd dynasty in the Bab. list of kings (B.C. 1948-1580). Within the last decades of the younger kings of Ur falls also the attack upon Erech by the Elamite monarch Kudur-nankhundi (see above, p. 224*).

The younger kings of Ur were followed by the kings of Larsa (c. B.C. 1900-1750 at the latest). One of the first of these was Nâr-Kammân, who takes the title 'shepherd of Ur, king of Larsa.' His son Sin-idinna first arrogated to himself the additional title, 'king of Ki-Ingi and Ki-bur-bur (Sumer and Akkad),' which implies that he must have extended his sway from the region of Ur and Larsa as far as N. Babylonia. His successors bore the same title; we know two of them—one whose name also began with Sin, and another the Elamite king's son Iri-Aku, who as king of Larsa took the names also of Rim-Sin and Arad-Sin. (All three forms of the name mean 'servant of the moon-god'.)

About the same time as Sin-idinna assumed the title 'king of Sumer and Akkad,' an Arabian dynasty established itself in Babylon, which now for the first time becomes of political importance. This is dynasty A of the Bab. list of kings. Acc. to the most probable reckoning, it lasted from 1884-1580 B.C.,* and its kings were the following:—

	years		years
Sumu-abi . . .	15	Samsu-ilûna 36 (son of former)
Sumu-la-ilu . . .	35	Abishu'a . . .	25
Zabi'u . . .	14 (son of former)	Ammi-satana	25
Apil-Sin . . .	18	Ammi-zaduga	22
Sin-muballit	30	Samsu-satana	31
Khammu-rabi	55

As we mentioned already, Iri-Aku, the contemporary of Khammurabi, was of Elamite origin. His father Kudur-Mabuk was king of the border-land of Iamutbal (see above, p. 225^b). It was the latter who, under the protection of the Elamite king Kudur-Lagamar (see above, p. 222^b), dethroned the Semite kings of Larsa, and installed his son Iriaku in their place. In an inscription Kudur-Mabuk even calls himself adda (i.e. in W. Semit. malik, 'king') of Martu. This renders perfectly intelligible the account given in Gn 14 of Kudur-Lagamar's (Chedorlaomer's) attack upon the territory extending from Sodom to Elath. King Tudghul (Tidal) of Guti (Goiim), and Khammu-rabi (semiticised Kimtu-rapaltu, hence Amarpal, the Amraphel of Gn 14¹) of Babylon, were vassals of the Elamites. As early as the reign of Simuballit, Iriaku had captured the city of Nisin, as we learn from dates in contract-tablets. An inscription of Iriaku's further mentions the capture of Erech. The later Bab. legend (see above, p. 222^b) could even tell of a plundering of Babylon by Kudur-Lagamar. The energetic Khammurabi (prob. B.C. 1772-1717) succeeded, however, in shaking off the Elamite yoke, and in driving not only Iriaku of Larsa, but also his father Kudur-Mabuk, out of Babylonia. In this way the supremacy over the west land (Martu) came into Khammurabi's hands, as is perfectly established by recently discovered inscriptions, in which not only Khammurabi, but his third successor Ammi-satana, take the title 'king of Martu,' in addition to such Bab. titles as 'king of Babel,' or 'king of Sumer and Akkad.'

* It is certainly no fortuitous circumstance that in Egypt, about the same period, an Arabian dynasty, the so-called Hyksos, held rule.

From the time of Khammurabi onwards, the city of Babel (Bab-ili, 'gate of God,' Sumer. Ka-dingirra and Tin-tir, the latter = 'seat of life') continued to be the residence of the Bab. monarchs. Although the above-named king was of Arabian descent, yet the Babylonians, down to the latest generations, considered him, on account of his expulsion of the Elamites and his canal works, to be the real founder of the Bab. kingdom, which from his time onwards was inseparably associated in men's minds with the metropolis Babel. The prosperity of the country under his rule and that of his successors is witnessed to by a number of contract-tablets. In one of the latter, dating from the reign of Apil-Sin, we encounter Abi-rāmu as a personal name, as the father indeed of one Sha-martu; showing that the biblical name Abraham was current in Babylonia even two generations earlier than Khammurabi. Nearly about the same date falls also the founding of the Assyrian empire (see ASSYRIA). This took its rise probably from Nisin, for Resen of Gn 10¹² is the same name as Nisin (cf. Unuk with Uruk, Erech), and the royal name, Ishmf-Dagan, meets us both at Nisin and at Assur, and that too at the earliest period, c. B.C. 1800.

The Arabian dynasty (A in kings' list) was in all probability succeeded immediately by the so-called Kassite dynasty (C of list, c. B.C. 1580-1180), which derives its name from the ancient designation Kash for Elam. This explanation is to be preferred to that which derives the epithet from Kossaiā, the wild mountaineers who were subdued by Sennacherib, and who by him are certainly called Kaššū. The founders of the Kassite dynasty were natives rather of the extreme south of Babylonia, bordering upon Elam, the region which was called Kardunias, i.e. land of the Kardu (dialectically Kašdu) or Kaldū. In the time of the Kassite dynasty this name was extended to designate the whole of Babylonia.

The first king of this dynasty was Gaddash (in kings' list Gandish), who styles himself 'king of the four quarters of the world, king of Sumer and Akkad, king of Babalam.' We have no very exact details till we come to the seventh king, Agu-kak-rimi (also called simply Agu), the son of Ur-Ziguruvash. He calls himself 'king of the Kassites and Akkadians, king of the wide land of Babel, who causes numerous peoples to settle in the land of Ashnunnak, king of Padan (Mesopotamia, cf. the OT 'Paddan-aram') and Alman (the district E of Mesopotamia and S. of Assyria), king of the land of Gutī, widely extended peoples, the king who rules the four quarters of the world.' He records how he brought back from the land of Khani (N. Syria) the images of Merodach and Zarpanit, which had formerly been carried off. Khani (also called Akhānu, Iakhānu, and Khiana) is the region between Carchemish and 'Azaz, having Arpad for its capital. The proper home of the Hittites was Khani-rabbat, the 'great Kheta-land' of the Egyp. inscriptions, to the N. of the above region, between Mar'ash and Malatiyeh. As the territorial name Khattu was probably originally Khantu, an invasion of Babylonia by the Hittites must have taken place shortly before the reign of Agu-kak-rimi. Now the accession of the latter must be dated c. B.C. 1500, and this mention of predatory incursions of the Hittites into Babylonia thus tallies pretty well with the first mention of the Hittites in the Egyp. inscriptions under Tahutmes III. (B.C. 1503-1449).

With the third or fourth successor of Agu-kak-rimi begin the relations of Babylonia with the aspiring empire of Assyria. (The details have already been fully given in article ASSYRIA, hence in what follows we shall notice only what has no connexion with Assyrian history). The first kings about whom we again possess detailed information are those who had diplomatic relations with the Pharaohs Amenhotep III. and IV., and whose letters have been recovered through the famous 'find' of clay tablets at Tel el-Amarna (see above, p. 223*). The circumstance that at that period (shortly before and after B.C. 1400) Babylonian was the language used for official communications all over W. Asia, is now readily explained as the consequence of the hegemony of Babylon over the western land, which endured for centuries (from the time of the younger kings of Ur till c. B.C. 1600).

From the correspondence between Kallimma-Sin of Kardunias and Nimmurīa (Amenhotep III.) of Egypt, we gather that the father of Kallimma-Sin (probably Kurigalzu I.) had formerly given his daughter in marriage to Amenhotep III., and that a daughter of Kallimma-Sin's is now to be sent to the harem of Amenhotep. The same subject, that of marriage and gifts, is discussed in the letters of king Burnaburias II. (B.C. 1410-1380?) to Napkhuraria (Amenhotep IV.) the son of Nimmurīa. Burnaburias speaks of himself as the son of Kurigalzu, and of the latter as the contemporary and friend of Amenhotep III.; presumably, therefore, B. was a younger brother of Kallimma-Sin, who must have died young. Of the Assyrians B. speaks as his own subjects, but of the land of Kināḥḥu (Canaan) as an Egyp. province through which his ambassadors have to pass. It is also mentioned that the friendly relations between Egypt and Babylonia date from the time of the Bab. king Kara-indas, i.e. the fourth or fifth predecessor of Burnaburias II. Burnaburias II. was probably succeeded by Kudur-Bel (who reigned at least eight years); then came Kara-khardas, the son-in-law of the Assyrian king Assur-uballit, who reigned but a short time, and was succeeded by his son Kadashman-kharbi I. The latter conquered the Sutean nomads, and constructed fortresses for defence against them in the land of Amurrū (Cele-Syria). On account of his relationship, however, to the Assyrian king, he was not regarded as a genuine Kassite, and was assassinated. Shuzigas (or, acc. to another account, Nazibugas) was placed upon the throne, but was immediately deposed by the Assyrians, who installed in his place Assur-uballit's grandson, Kurigalzu II. (1364-1320?) who was still in his minority. It is impossible to say for certain whether the previously mentioned (p. 224*) Shagarakti-burias, the son of Kudur-Bel, was a rival king (perhaps during the minority of Kurigalzu II.), or whether he directly followed Kudur-Bel. The first, however, appears the more likely. In a recently discovered passage of the synchronistic history (RP, new series, v. 108) there is reference to internal complications during part of the reign of Kurigalzu II. The latter, the 'king without an equal,' was a powerful monarch; he conquered the city of Shāsha in Elam, i.e. the well-known Susa, and assumed the title of 'king of Sumer and Akkad, king of the four quarters of the world.' The name of the Elamite king whom he conquered was Khurba-tila. Kurigalzu II. was succeeded by Nazi-maruddas (1320-1295), Kadashman-turgu (1294-1278), Kadashman-burias (1277-1276), an unnamed king (1275-1270), Shagarakti-surias (1269-1257), Bibēas (1256-1249), Bel-sum-idinā (1248-1247), Kadashman-kharbi II. (1247-1246), and Rammān-sum-idinā (1246-1240). See ASSYRIA. Under the last three Babylonia had much to suffer from the inroads of the Elamite king Kidin-khutrutas. An upward movement, however, again took place during the 30 years' reign of Rammān-sum-uzur (1239-1209) and the reigns of his son Meli-šipak (1208-1194) and his grandson Marduk-pal-idinā (1193-1181). To the time of these three kings belong the oldest known boundary-stones with the zodiacal signs portrayed upon them.* (These are fully described by T. G. Pinches, in his Guide to the Nimroud Central Saloon, London, 1886, pp. 44-55). After the last of these Kassite kings Zamama-sum-idina (B.C. 1180) and Bel-sum-idina (1180-1177) there followed a Semitic reaction, which connects itself with the Dynasty of Pashi (1177-1043). Unfortunately, the name of the founder of this new dynasty is unknown. The fourth, in all probability, of its kings was Nabû-kudurri-uzur (Nebuchadrezzar) I., the son of Nindar-nadin-sumi (written Nin-ib-sum-mu). He waged war on the mountaineers of E. Babylonia (including Elam), and also on the land of Martu. Unfortunately, his inscriptions do not make it perfectly clear with what part of Syria he engaged in hostilities, but it appears to have been the district of Antilibanus, for in an inscription which ought probably to be ascribed to him there is mention of a war against the peoples of the land of Khattu and against Ammananu (cf. Lamanan of the Eyp. inscriptions). From an elegiac poem we learn that the statue of Bel had been captured by the enemy, but was then recovered by Nebuchadrezzar. On this occasion the king consulted the ancient oracles of the astrological work 'Illumination of Bel,' where in point of fact there is mention of the return of the statue of Bel from Elam to Nippur in the time of the younger kings of Ur. From all this it is quite plain that when Nebuchadrezzar received the kingdom it was in a dilapidated condition.

Nebuchadrezzar was succeeded by Bel-nadin-apli. Then came Marduk-nadin-akhi (see above, p. 224*), who reigned B.C. 1117-c. 1100, Marduk-sapik-zirim, and Rammân-pal-idina (see ASSYRIA). The next to the last of the eleven Pashi kings was Marduk-akhe-irba (B.C. 1064-1052). To his reign belongs a boundary-stone, on which we read the name of a Khabirite, Kudurra the son of Basish, along with a certain Kašša and one Khirbi-Bel. We know also of a Khabirite, Kharbi-shipak, from another text which treats of campaigns of the Assyrians and Babylonians in Phœnicia (WAI, pl. 34, No. 2). This shows that the Khabiri, who play an important rôle in the Tel el-Amarna correspondence as enemies of Jerusalem, cannot possibly be the Hebrews, but must have been Kassite Babylonians.

The Pashi dynasty was followed by the kings of the Sea-land, i.e. the district in the extreme south of Babylonia. The Kassite nationality of this dynasty, which lasted from B.C. 1043-1022, is evident from the names of its kings—Simmas-shipak, Ea-mukin-ziri, and Kaššû-nadin-akhi.

The next dynasty was that of Bazi, which included three kings who reigned from 1021-1002, viz. E-ulmash-shakin-shumi, Nindar-kudurri-uzur, and Amil-Shukamuna. These were followed by a single Elamite king, whose name has not been preserved (1002-996). This whole period, from the end of the Pashi dynasty, was a stormy one. Shortly before, the temple of Samas at Sippar had been destroyed by the Sutean nomads; then during the reign of Kaššû-nadin-akhi there was a great famine—so that the land had no rest. It was not until the next, once more a Babylonian dynasty, that better conditions were again inaugurated (B.C. 995-732). The first king, Nabû-mukin-apli, to whose reign an extant boundary-record must be assigned, reigned 36 years (B.C. 995-960), and Nabû-pal-idina, who is known from Assyrian history as a contemporary of Assur-nazir-pal, also had a reign of more than 30 years (c. B.C. 885-853). Between these two reigns there is an unfortunate gap, which as yet is represented by only a few names. Only the last four kings of this dynasty are included in the kings' list.

To Nabû-pal-idina we owe the beautiful Cultus-tablet of Sippar, which is adorned with a relief of the sun-god. It was this king that restored the temple of the sun which had lain in ruins since the ravages of the Suteans, and re-established his worship in Sippar. From the reign of his son and successor Marduk-sum-idina down to the rise of the New Babylonian empire under Nabopolassar, the history of Babylon, so far at least as known to us, is connected in the closest fashion with that of ASSYRIA (to which article the reader is referred for details). During this period Babylonia was in complete political dependence upon Assyria. When independent movements show themselves, they proceed almost invariably from the Kaldi (Chaldeans) in S. Babylonia, who were the Semitic successors of the Kassites, and from the nomadic Aramaean tribes between Elam and Babylonia. The best type of these Kaldi princes is Marduk-pal-idina II., the Merodach-baladan of OT, and contemporary of Sargon and Sennacherib (see ASSYRIA). A votive inscription of his (in the Berlin Museum) contains a grandiloquent description of the prosperity of the land under his sway as compared with the misery of the 'rulerless time' that preceded his reign.

Of Chaldean origin were also the founders of the New Babylonian empire, Nabopolassar and his son Nebuchadrezzar II.

Nabû-pal-uzur (B.C. 625-605) wrested his independence from Assyria, and caused himself to be proclaimed king of Babylon. We have inscriptions of his, in which he speaks of building temples at Babel and Sippar, and of constructing a canal at the latter city. Some Bab. cities, however, such as Erech, still belonged to the Assyr. king Sin-šar-iškun. With the view of conquering and dethroning the latter, Nabopolassar allied himself with the Manda king (Arbaces? See ASSYRIA), i.e. with the leader of the Medo-Scythian hordes. While Nabopol. advanced in person with his army against N. Mesopotamia, the Manda hordes burst into Babylonia, where they plundered the cities that still owned the Assyr. sway, and into Assyria itself, where, c. B.C. 607, Nineveh fell into their hands, and was utterly destroyed. In order to help Nabopolassar, who was hard pressed by the Assyrians, the Manda invaded also the territory of Harran. It was upon this occasion that the very ancient temple of the moon, which existed there, was destroyed. Thus, by the aid of the Medes, the Babylonians came once more into possession of Mesopotamia, and so paved the way towards Syria. There, in B.C. 605, at Carchemish, the crown-prince Nebuchadrezzar defeated Necho of Egypt, and in consequence of his victory was acknowledged as sovereign lord by the whole country as far as the S. border of Palestine. Amongst others, homage was done to him by Judah in the person of its king Jehoiakim. The news of his father's death recalled Nebuchadrezzar to Babylon.

Nabû-kudurri-uzur II. (the Nebuchadrezzar of OT), during his long reign of 44 years (B.C. 604-561), contrived to make Babylonia in the fullest sense the heir of the shattered Assyr. empire. At the same time, by his building activity, he converted his capital Babylon into one of the most magnificent and most beautiful cities of antiquity. His chief attention was directed to the Bel-temple Sag-illa at Babylon, and the Nebo-temple Zidda at Borsippa, but he by no means neglected the temples at Sippar, Kutha, Erech, Larsa, and Ur. In addition he constructed in Babylon new streets, embankments, and palaces (cf. the Greek legend of the 'hanging gardens' of Semiramis), and fortified the city by double walls, so strong that it might be deemed impregnable.

As the inscriptions of Nebuch. speak of almost nothing but his buildings, we have to gain information about his numerous wars from various extra-Babylonian sources, such as the OT and the classical writers. We know the course of events in Judah, where, at the instigation of the warlike Pharaoh Hophra (Apries), Zedekiah, a Babylonian vassal, renounced his allegiance, an act to which Nebuch. replied by laying siege to Jerusalem (2 K 25¹). The fall of Jerusalem in B.C. 587 led to the exile of the Jews in Babylon (B.C. 586-537), and made of Judah a Bab. province. A similar fate befell the other states which, in reliance upon Egypt, had withheld their tribute from Babylon, viz. Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, and Sidon. Tyre, however, in spite of a 13 years' siege, could not be taken, but had to resume payment of the former tribute. Hophra, after the defeat of his army by Nebuch. (B.C. 587), ventured on no further attack, and it was not till 568 that Nebuch. again took the field against Egypt (where meanwhile Amasis had dethroned Hophra), and occupied some parts of the Delta. Of a war carried on by Nebuch. against the Arabs of Kedar we know from Jer 49²⁸⁻³³. In the course of the war which the Median king Cyaxares waged with Lydia, Nebuch. used his influence, after the battle on the Halys, B.C. 585, to bring about peace between Lydia and Media. By this politic step he prevented his dangerous rival from becoming too strong. Within the reign of Nebuch. also falls an event, which at a later period under his successors proved to have been charged with fateful issues for the New Bab. empire,—the occupation of Elam by the newly-arisen kings of Anšan in N. Elam. As late as the beginning of Nebuch.'s reign Jeremiah knows of reigning kings of Elam (Jer 25²⁵), whereas in 585 Ezekiel already speaks of the Elamites as dead and gone (Ezk 32²⁴). We know that an Indo-Germanic prince of Pers.-Achæmenidæan origin, named Teispis (Tsheispis), proclaimed himself king of Anšan c. B.C. 600. He was the great-grandfather of the famous Kuras (Cyrus), and he left behind him two sons. The elder, Kuras by name (grandfather of Cyrus), fell heir to the kingdom of Anšan, which he probably enlarged by conquering the rest of Elam; the younger, Ariaramna, founded for himself a kingdom in E. Iran. He was the great-grandfather of 'Darius the Mede,' the future king of Persia. What share Nebuch. had in this conquest of Elam we know not, but some share in it is suggested by a recently-discovered inscription, according to which Nebuch. brought back an image of Istar from Susa to Erech.

The son and successor of Nebuch. was Amil-marduk (the Evil-merodach of OT), who reigned from 561-560. It was he who released the unfortunate Jehoiachin of Judah from his prison (2 K 25²⁷). Failing to establish himself on a right footing with the priests, he was murdered by his own brother-in-law, Nergal-shar-uzur (the Neri-glissar of classical writers), who had the priests upon his side.

Neriglissar (B.C. 559-556) was married to a daughter of Nebuch., and even during the reign of the latter enjoyed the greatest consideration, as is proved by various contract-tablets. Like his father, Bel-sum-iskun, he bore the title rubû imga ('the exalted sage'), a circumstance which proves at the same time that Neriglissar is to be identified with the Rab-mag (= rubû imga) Nergal-sharezer of Jer 39³⁻¹³. Nerigl.'s inscriptions tell us of his building of temples and of the completion of his palace in Babylon. The passage which runs, 'the rival and adversary I destroyed, the foes I exterminated, the insubordinate opposers I consumed,' refers not only to the murder of Amil-Marduk, but also to foreign enemies, in whom we should probably recognise the same Manda hordes whom Nabonidus shortly afterwards drove back from Mesopotamia.

Neriglissar died in 556, leaving a son scarcely come of age, Lâbashi-Marduk, who, according to the judgment of the priests, was not fit to rule on account of 'bad character'; and was consequently deposed the same year. A Babylonian, not a Chaldee, was called to the throne in his room, Nabu-na'id ('the god Nebo is exalted'), the Nabonidus of the classical writers, who reigned from B.C. 555-539. He was more a lover of antiquarian research than an energetic ruler. He rebuilt a whole series of the oldest Bab. temples, e.g. at Sippar, Larsa, and Ur, and at the same time instituted elaborate inquiries into the history of the building (cf. the dates that have been thus recovered, above, p. 224^a). On the other hand, with the most painful shyness he avoided Babylon, even when its situation was one of extreme peril; it was his son Bel-shar-uzur, the Belshazzar of Daniel, who, in the capital, carried on the work of government, without, however, bearing the title of king. Nabonidus' first concern was to rebuild the ancient temple of Sin in Harran. The Manda king Istuvigu (i.e. the Median prince Astyages) had, however, invaded Mesopotamia, and it was only when he had been repelled through the assistance of king Kuras of Anšan (i.e. the well-known Cyrus king of Persia, B.C. 558-530) that Nabonidus was able to prosecute his building design. This repulse of the Manda took place c. B.C. 554 or 553. Through his decisive victory over Astyages (B.C. 550), Cyrus became at the same time king of the Median empire; consequently the Bab. Chronicle now calls him 'king of Parsu,' instead of giving him his official title, 'king of Anšan.' In the year 547 took place the successful campaign of Cyrus against Croesus of Lydia, during which Nabonidus and the king of Egypt had joined the league formed against Cyrus. The latter was now master of the whole of Asia Minor. The punishment of Egypt was deferred till the time of Cyrus' successor Cambyses (B.C. 525), but that of Babylonia came in 539, in which year (16th Tammuz, i.e. about the beginning of July) Cyrus got possession of Babylon, through the treachery of its priests, without drawing a sword. Three and a half months later he made his triumphal entry into the city, and eight days afterwards his general Gubaru (Gobryas) caused the king's son, i.e. Belshazzar, to be put to death (cf. also Dn 5). Nabonidus was spared, and banished to Karmania. This was the end of the independence of Babylonia, and the beginning of the great Persian world-empire. Nevertheless, the kings of Persia did everything possible to mitigate the lot of the Babylonians: they allowed the native form of worship to continue; exalted Babylonian to the rank of one of the three languages of the empire (Persian, Elamite, Babylonian; see above, p. 223^a); and called themselves upon Bab. inscriptions 'king of Babel, king of the countries.' Under the mild rule of Cyrus, the day of return also drew nigh for the Jews who had remained true to the old home. Thus the end of the Bab. empire means at the same time the beginning of the Jewish community, whose real commencement coincides with the rebuilding of the temple predicted in Is 44²⁸. When in the latter passage Cyrus (Koresh) is called by J' 'my shepherd,' there is here an allusion to the Elamite etymology of the name Kuras ('shepherd'). According to Strabo, the Aryan name of Cyrus was Agradates.

The later history of Babylon is bound up with that of Persia, and afterwards of Alexander the Great and his successors, the Seleucid and Arsacid kings. The names of all these rulers occur in connexion with the dating of Bab. contract-tablets and in other inscriptions. There is extant, for instance, a cylinder-inscription of Antiochus Soter from Birs Nimroud, in which also the queen Stratonike (Astartanikku) is commended to the protection of the Bab. gods. Not only so, but the Bab. literature, even bilingual (Sumer.-Semit.) hymns not excepted, was still copied out and cherished as late as the Parthian era. The agricultural impoverishment of the country under the Parthians led, however, to the gradual dying out of the tradition of the priests which had been so long preserved. The knowledge of the ancient writing and speech was utterly lost until in our own century it was recovered through the acuteness and enthusiasm of European scholars, and is now in ever-increasing measure shedding light upon the history of the most ancient civilisation, but above all upon biblical history.

BABYLONISH GARMENT (אֵשָׁרָה, ψάλη ποικίλη, RV Bab. mantle).—The Heb. means, literally, 'mantle of Shinar' (Jos 7²¹), the name by which Bab. was known to the ancient Hebrews. Naturally, it is not an easy matter to decide, even approximately, what kind of garment this can have been. Jos (Ant. v. i. 10) gives rein to his imagination, and describes it as 'a royal garment woven entirely of gold,' or 'all woven with gold.' There is no doubt that a dress of this description would be 'goodly' in the extreme. The probability is that it was a garment of embroidered stuff, such as Babylon was famed for (cf. Pliny, viii. 74, and Martial, Ep. viii. 28); and the statement in the Bereshith Rabba (§ 85, fol. 75. 2), that it was a robe of purple (an opinion which R. Chanina bar R. Isaac also shared; cf. Kimchi on Jos 7²¹), is just as likely to be correct as any other. There were probably many centres of the weaving industry in ancient Babylonia, that of Sippar being most likely the chief. Many tablets referring to woven stuffs have been found on the site of that city, and testify to the extent of the industry; and long lists of dress material and garments bear testimony to the diversity of the work and the patterns used. The common expression lubulti birme is generally taken to mean stuffs woven in patterns of various designs, like embroidery, the weaver of such cloth being called špar (or ušbar) birmi. T. G. PINCHES.

BACA, THE VALLEY OF (בְּקַעַת עֵשָׂרָה).—A valley through which pilgrims pass to Zion (Ps 84⁶ AV; RV has 'weeping, m. 'balsam-trees'). Ancient versions, including LXX and Vulg., render valley of weeping, possibly from confusion between עָרַב ('weeping') and עֵשָׂרָה, whose plural (2 S 5²⁴, 1 Ch 14^{14, 15}) designates a tree, variously identified with the mulberry (AV and RV), the pear tree (LXX 1 Ch 14), the balsam (Gesenius), and the poplar or aspen (Tristram, Nat. Hist.).

If an actual valley (the article is not quite conclusive; see Ec 3¹⁶, where two undoubtedly ideal places have the article), it may be identified either with 'the valley of Achor, i.e. trouble' (Jos 7^{24, 25} etc.); 'the valley of Rephaim' (2 S 5^{18, 22}, Is 17⁶); a Sinaitic valley with a similar name (Burckhardt); or the last station of the caravan route from the north to Jerusalem (Renan, Vie de Jesus, c. iv.).

Perseverance and trust not only overcome difficulties, but turn them into blessings; this is the lesson, whether the valley be real or only (as the Vulg. vallis lacrymarum has become) an emblem of life. A. S. AGLEN.

BACCHIDES (Βακχίδης) is first mentioned as a friend of Antiochus Epiphanes (Jos. Ant. XII. x. 2). Under Demetrius Soter he held the governorship of Mesopotamia, and was sent to establish Alcimus in the high priesthood (see ALCIMUS). Upon the death of Judas he drove Jonathan across the Jordan, garrisoned a number of positions in Judæa, and, having thus pacified the country, returned to Demetrius (B.C. 160), or more probably was recalled by direction of the Romans. Two years later he was sent back in response to an appeal from the Syrian faction, who imagined that Jonathan in his fancied security might be taken unawares. Jonathan, however, threw himself into the fortress of Bethbasi, not far from Jericho. To this B. laid siege; but, when his own peril increased through the success of the sallies against him and the rising of the country in his rear, he accepted Jonathan's proposal for a treaty of peace. Jonathan was invested (B.C. 158) with the governorship of Judæa, and B. covenanted to withdraw the Syrian forces (but not completely, see 1 Mac 10¹²), and he himself finally left the country (1 Mac 7⁸⁻²⁰ 9¹⁻⁷², Jos. Ant. XII. x.-XIII. i.). R. W. MOSS.

BACCHURUS (Βάκχουρος), 1 Es 9²⁴.—One of the 'holy singers' (ιεροψάλται), who put away his 'strange' wife. There is no corresponding name in the list of Ezr 10²⁴, where there are three porters and one singer to answer to two porters and two singers of 1 Es. The name here may be a corruption of Uri (ערי) in Ezra.

H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

BACCHUS.—See DIONYSUS.

BACENOR (Βακένωρ, 2 Mac 12³⁸), a Jewish officer, apparently a captain of horse, in the army of Judas Maccabæus which went to attack Gorgias, the commandant of Idumæa (or Jamnia, 1 Mac 5⁵⁸, Jos. Ant. XII. viii. 6).

BACKBITE.—To bite behind the back. Ps 15⁸ only, 'He that b^eth not with his tongue' (עוֹרֵר, RV 'slandereth'). Backbiter, Ro 1³⁰ only (κατάλαλος); cf. (in Rushw. Hist. Coll. 1659, i. 492) 'Diogenes being asked what beast bit sores, answered, Of wilde beasts, the Back-biter; of tame, the Flatterer.' Backbiting is found as an adj. Pr 25²³ 'The north wind bringeth forth rain; so doth a b. tongue an angry countenance' (תִּרְוֵךְ לִשְׁוֹן, 'a tongue of secrecy'), Sir 28^{14, 15}; and as a subst., Wis 1¹¹, 2 Co 12²⁰ (καταλάλα, tr^d in 1 P 2¹ 'evil speakings').

J. HASTINGS.

BACKSIDE is used in AV as tr. of three words:—1. אָחָר 'ahar, Ex 3¹ 'he led the flock to the b. of the desert'; RV 'back'; but the Heb. is a prep. here, 'behind the desert' (cf. 11⁵ 'the maidservant that is behind the mill'), that is, to the pasturelands on the other side of the desert from the Midianite encampments. 2. אַחֲרֵי 'ahór, Ex 26¹² 'the b. of the tabernacle,' RV 'back'; the Heb. is a subst. in the plu., 'hinder parts,' as in 33²⁸ 'thou shalt see my back parts,' 1 K 7²⁵ (= 2 Ch 4⁴) 'hinder parts,' Ezk 8¹⁶ 'backs.' 3. εἰς ὀπίσθην, Rev 5¹ 'a book written within and on the b.'; RV 'back': but the back of a book is not the same as the reverse side of a roll. St. John was struck, not only with the fact that the roll was sealed, but also with the amount of writing it contained. Like Ezekiel's (21⁰) 'roll of a book . . . written within and without,' it had writing on both sides, which was as unusual with an ancient roll as with modern printer's manuscript.

BADGER, BADGERS' SKINS (עֹרֹת תְּהַשִּׁימ, חֲמֵשׁ עֹרֹת תְּהַשִּׁימ).—LXX. tr. tēhāshīm by βελήθωνα and βάνθωνα, and Vulg. by ianthinae, which signifies sky-blue. Some ancient VSS translate the word black. There is, however, no etymological reason for this.

The badger, Meles taxus, L., is found in moderate numbers throughout Syria and Pal., and possibly in the Sin. desert. But it is not found in sufficient numbers to make it probable that it could furnish material enough for the upper covering of the tabernacle (Ex 25⁵ 26¹⁴ 35^{7, 23} etc.). Such skins would be too light for the purpose, still more so for sandals (Ezk 16¹⁰). In this passage the Heb. has tahāsh alone, without ōrōth. The AV has added 'skins' without italics. The RV has 'sealskins' [m. 'porpoise-skins'] in all the passages). There is, moreover, no philological warrant in Heb. or cognate languages for the translation of the AV badgers' skins. The Arab. for badger is ghurciv, aná-él-ard, and fanzal. None of these names has any connexion with tēhāshīm. The Arab. word tūhas signifies the dolphin. The Arabs of the Sin. desert use the skin of the Halicore Hemprichii, Ehr., a cetacean found in the Red Sea, for making sandals. This is called tún, and the flesh of it is eaten. It is quite likely that the skin of the dolphin would be similarly used. It is no objection to the use of this hide for making ladies' sandals that it was coarse. Its firm texture would fit it for the use intended, and the currier's art would adorn it suitably for the high-born wearers. Such durable and waterproof skins as those of the dolphin and halicore would be eminently appropriate for coverings of the tabernacle. Another species of the same genus, Halicore Tabernaculi, Russ., is also met with in the Red Sea, and could have furnished its quota of skins.

It is clear that the ōrōth tēhāshīm, whatever their colour, were procurable in Sinai in quantities sufficient for making coverings to the tabernacle, and were at the same time suitable for sandals. It is unlikely that seal skins (so the RV) were found in sufficient quantities, if indeed the word tēhāshīm means that animal. It may be, however, that it covers not only the dolphin, but the halicore, porpoise, seal, and other marine animals having a general resemblance to the dolphin type. In any case we may safely reject the badger. (See Davidson on Ezk 16¹⁰ and Dillm. on Ex 25⁵.) G. E. POST.

BEAN (עֹרֹת בָּאָדָר).—The name of a tribe otherwise unknown, which on account of its hostility to the Jews was utterly destroyed by Judas Maccabæus (1 Mac 5⁴).

BAG.—1. סַקְלִי, סַפְרִי לַדָּבָר; סַפְרָא; bag for food, shepherd's wallet, or srip for a journey, made of a kid's skin with a strap fastened to each end so as to hang from the shoulder, and holding one or two days' allowance of bread, raisins, olives, cheese, etc.; one of the emblems of the pastoral and pilgrim life; parent of the hunting-bag and portfolios of higher office. Into it David put the pebbles when going to meet Goliath (1 S 17⁴⁰). The command to dispense with it (Mt 10¹⁰, Mk 6⁸, Lk 9⁸) meant for the disciples complete trust in those visited, in their message, and in their Master.

2. סַקְ (Arab. kiṣ), bag for merchant's weights, made of stout cotton, leather, or in the form of a flexible rush-basket. This bag is still a necessity with the Syrian peasant or trader when selling from house to house his olive-oil, figs, grape-syrup, cheese, etc. The special warning against false weights (Dt 25¹⁸, Pr 20²⁸) was due to the fact that pebbles and odd pieces of metal were doubtless, then as now, used thus as weights, putting the purchaser at the mercy of the seller. Hence the Arab. proverb, 'The hand of an honourable man is a balance.'

3. B. for money, purse. In this connexion we have—

(a) סַקְ kiṣ. Pr 1⁴, Is 46⁶, where the use of the commonest word for bag seems suggestive of waste.

(b) חֲרִית harit (Arab. haritat), 2 K 5²³, into which Naaman's gift was put. The occurrence of the same word in Is 3²² (AV 'crisping pins,' RV 'satchels') would suggest that some kind of ornamentally-woven pouch or satchel was used.

(c) צֵרָרִי zērari (Arab. surrat), something tied, either round about like a parcel, or at the neck like a pouch. The purse of the mod. Syrian peasant is a little bag, sometimes of woven silk thread, but usually of yellow cotton. The open mouth is not drawn close by a string, but is gathered up by one hand, and then by the other the neck of the bag is carefully whipped round.

BAG, PURSE, צָרוֹר.

The ceremony of tying and untying is still a quaintly arresting feature in its use. It was such a purse that was found in the sacks of Joseph's brothers, Gn 42³⁵. Job compares the irrevocable past to the purse with a seal on its string, Job 14¹⁷. Unblessed prosperity is money in a bag with holes, Hag 1⁶. Similar to this zērōr or tied-bag was the βαλλάντιον in Lk 12³³ 22³⁵, and in Jn 12⁹ the γλωσσόκομον, a term derived from the pouch for the mouth-piece of a musical instrument.

(d) In the NT this bag or purse is also expressed by ζώνη (Mt 3⁴ 10⁹, Ac 21¹¹, Rev 1¹³ 15⁸). A modern illustration of this is found in the waist-belt of the Syrian peasant, which is double for a foot and a half from the buckle, thus making a safe and well-guarded purse.

G. M. MACKIE.

BAGGAGE.—In AV Jth 7², 2 Mac 12²¹ 'the women and children and the other b.' (ἀποσκευή). RV gives b. for 'carriage' at 1 S 17²² bis, and for 'carriages' at Is 10²⁸, Ac 21¹⁵; and Amer. RV gives b. for 'stuff' at 1 S 25¹³ 30²⁴. See CARRIAGE and STUFF.

J. HASTINGS.

BAGO (A Bayol, B Borat), 1 Es 8⁴⁰.—The head of a family who returned with Ezra from Babylon, called BAGOI, 1 Es 5¹⁴; BIGVAI, Ezr 2¹⁴.

BAGOAS (Barybas).—A eunuch in the service of Holofernes (Jth 12¹¹. 13. 15 13³ 14¹⁴). The same name appears in Persian history as that of the eunuch who poisoned Artaxerxes Ochus, and according to Pliny (HN XIII. iv. 9) it is the Persian equivalent of the Gr. εὐνούχος.

J. A. SELBIE.

BAGOI (A Bayol, B Borat), 1 Es 5¹⁴.—2066 of his descendants returned from captivity with Zerub. Called BIGVAI (בִּגְוַי), Ezr 2¹⁴ (2056 desc.), Neh 7¹⁹ (2067); BAGO, 1 Es 8⁴⁰.

BAGPIPE.—See MUSIC.

BAHURIM (בְּחֻרִים).—The place where Michal is parted from her husband Phaltiel, as she is being taken back to David at Hebron (2 S 3¹⁶). The village also where Shimei lived; he came out thence to curse David when fleeing from Jerus. towards Jordan (2 S 16⁵). In this village Jonathan and Ahimaaz took refuge when carrying news to David from Jerus.; they concealed themselves in the well of a house, and so managed to elude the servants of Absalom, who had been sent to capture them (2 S 17¹⁸). According to the account of David's flight from Jerus. (ch. 15 ff.), it seems that he did not take the southern and more usual road to Jericho, which passes through Bethany, but adopted the shorter and more difficult route, which runs in a N.E. direction over the Mt. of Olives. The Targ. preserves a tradition which identifies B. with Almon (Jos 21¹⁸), the modern Almit, about 4 miles N.E. of Jerus. and 1 mile beyond Anathoth (Anáta), near the S. boundary of Benjamin. This view, which is accepted by most moderns, agrees with the local details supplied by the narrative of David's flight. After leaving the summit of the Mt. of Olives (15²⁰ 16¹), David made his way down the E. slopes of the range towards Jordan. A 'rib' or ridge of hill apparently ran parallel to this N.

route, from which it was separated by a ravine or gully (16⁹ 'let me go over now'), so that Shimei, running along the top of the hill, could cast stones and dirt at the king with impunity. Bahumite (2 S 23³¹ בְּחֻרִי) is clearly a mistake for Baharumite = a native of Bahurim, which is more correctly given by the Chronicler (1 Ch 11³³ הַבְּחֻרִי; point הַבְּחֻרִי the Bahurimite).

BALAAM (בְּלֵאָם).—Nu 22-24. 31⁸. 16, Dt 23⁴ (Neh 13²), Jos 13²² 24⁹. 10, Mic 6⁵, 2 P 2¹⁵, Jude v. 11, Rev 2¹⁴.

The subject of a very remarkable story in connexion with the wanderings of the Israelites in the wilderness. The present narrative has arisen from the combination of several more or less ancient traditions. According to the latest, embodied in the Priestly Code (P), and contained in Nu 31^{8, 16} (comp. Rev 2¹⁴), Balaam was a Midianitish counsellor, who persuaded his people to seduce the Israelites by means of certain immoral rites. This is probably to be connected with the great sin of Baal-peor (Nu 25), or, to be more accurate, with the affair of Cozbi (25^{9a}), which has been combined with the story of Baal-peor (25¹⁻⁵), the former being connected with the Midianites, the latter with the Moabites. In revenge for this, Balaam was afterwards slain with the princes of Midian (Nu 31⁸, Jos 13²²). It has been conjectured that this story arose partly out of a difficulty on the part of the priestly narrator in conceiving of a heathen being an inspired prophet of God, partly from the need of accounting for the great sin of the Israelites. It is, however, very doubtful whether this story belongs to the earliest form of P, and it is by Kuenen assigned to the very latest redactor. It is significant that Rev 2¹⁴ definitely connects the immorality with sacrificial rites to heathen gods,—a fact implied, but not distinctly stated by P.

The more ancient and far more picturesque story is that contained in Nu 22²⁻²⁴. According to this, Balaam is a prophet from Pethor, which is by the Euphrates, a place otherwise unknown, who is bribed by Balak, king of Moab, to come and pronounce a curse on the Israelites. Balaam earnestly endeavours to carry out Balak's wishes, but by divine inspiration pronounces a blessing instead of a curse. He is dismissed by Balak, and returns to his home, and is heard of no more. It is obvious that this story has no point of contact with that of P, and can be reconciled with it only by modifying or eliminating 24²⁵. If Balaam had returned to his home he could not be in the Midianitish camp immediately afterwards. It is generally admitted that Nu 22²⁻²⁴ belongs to the composite narrative known as JE. But there is some difference of opinion as regards the critical analysis of the passage. Some, having regard to its general unity of purpose and sentiment, have assigned it in its totality to J; others refer only the episode of Balaam's journey to J and the rest to E. It is probable, however, that here, as elsewhere, there has been a more continuous interweaving of the two sources. The sacrificial rites of 22²⁰⁻²³ seem to point to E, and the symmetry of that section seems to require that it should be referred in the main to one source. On the other hand, the episode of Balaam's journey, with little doubt, belongs to J. There are also signs of composite authorship in other parts. Thus 22^{23a} and 22^{23b} are evidently duplicates, so are vv. 2 and 4^b. A helpful criterion is the distinction of divine names in certain verses of ch. 22, esp. 9 and 20; where, as in 23⁴, an anthropomorphic character is assigned to God Himself as contrasted with the angel of J^v of v. 22 etc. It seems therefore right to assign vv. 9, 10, 12 and 20 to E, but these pretty clearly carry with them vv. 8, 13-16. It matters little how we assign the remaining verses, as both accounts must have contained statements of the same kind. But if J is the fundamental account, vv. 4-7 will belong to it. Ch. 24 involves a further question. If the prophecies of ch. 23 belong to E, it is probable that these belong to J. But they are believed to have undergone a very considerable revision and expansion by a later reviser, either before or after the union of J and E. The passage esp. assigned to a late date is vv. 20-24, which refers to the period of Assyrian ascendancy. The insertion of 'the elders of Midian' in 22^{4, 7} is probably the work of a much later reviser, who thereby thought to connect the story more closely with that of P.

If this analysis is in the main correct, there will be found a considerable difference of character in the stories of J and E. According to the first, Balaam makes no difficulty about going, nor does he receive any revelation forbidding it, but of his own accord he intimates to Balak that as a prophet he is entirely under the control of J^v. Balaam discovers his sin in going, only by the intervention of 'the angel of J^v', and at once proposes to return. For the first time he is permitted to go, but only on the condition that he does not attempt to resist the inspiration of God. 22²⁵ is indeed referred by some to the reviser of JE, but some such limited permission is at any rate implied in v. 25. When Balaam arrives at Kiriath-huzoth, he is shown the whole company of the Israelites dwelling according to their tribes. The spirit of God comes upon him, and he bursts into a rhapsody of praise, suggested in its form by the sight before him. The chief thought is the splendour of the huge encampment in its ordered array—

'As gardens by the river side,
As lign-aloes which J^v hath planted,
As cedar trees beside the waters.'

What Balaam, according to the story, foretells, is the increase in the multitude of the people and the power of their king. This provokes Balak's anger; he smites his hands together, and would have dismissed Balaam at once; but with great dignity the latter justifies himself, and, regardless of Balak's wrath, he proceeds to predict the destruction, first of Moab, then of Edom, at the hand of the king of Israel. Balak himself seems overawed by the torrent of inspired rhetoric, and he has nothing more to say to the prophet, who immediately retires. J's narrative is terse and vigorous throughout, full of quaintness, yet always dignified and picturesque without grandiloquence. What remains of E's narrative falls distinctly below it in point of literary merit. It is more ornate, but less really beautiful. There is a tendency to what appears like an artificial repetition of similar incidents. Balak twice appeals to Balaam, who twice in his turn appeals to God, and twice receives an answer from Him. Thrice Balak builds for Balaam seven altars, and offers a bullock and a ram on every altar, and the language in which Balak's command is given and carried out is repeated each time. We might add that thrice Balaam pronounces a blessing instead of a curse, only that the third blessing of E has disappeared in ch. 24 to make way for the blessing of J. There is, moreover, besides its anthropomorphism, a want of spontaneity and naturalness about the story. We feel this in the way that Balaam parleys with God (23⁴). He tells Him that he has prepared the seven altars, and offered a bullock and a ram on every altar, and implies therefrom a hope that He will grant his wish; and there is an almost mechanical view of inspiration in the thought of the word put in Balaam's mouth (23⁵). What a difference between this and the thought of J (24²), that the Spirit so takes possession of him that his whole nature is aglow! Then again, how unnatural comparatively Balak's conduct is! How strange that he should have put up with Balaam's utterances so complacently, and contented himself with a mild remonstrance. (See HEXATEUCH, NUMBERS.)

But the most important difference in the stories is the contrast which they present in the character of Balaam. In J there is nothing reproachful in his conduct. He acts up to his light with perfect consistency. But the Balaam of E is of a much lower order. He has indeed a higher perception of the moral beauty of righteousness. He can say with all sincerity, 'Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his' (23¹⁰). This can hardly at so early a date mean, 'May I in some future state have the rewards, even without the reality, of a righteous life here,' but, 'May I in my last moments have the satisfaction of feeling that I have lived a righteous life to the very end.' But, in spite of such noble sentiments, the Balaam of E is a selfish, grasping man. He covets the rewards of Balak, and is restrained from taking them only by a sordid fear of God, who could make the consequence of so doing worse than losing them. He is not content to know God's will, but tries by every means in his power to cajole God into changing His mind, or, in other words, making wrong right. Five times he attempts to obtain God's consent, and always fails. It may be thought that this estimate of Balaam's character as portrayed in E assumes a higher view of God and morality than E may be supposed to have had. The God of 1 S 15²⁹ was not 'a man, that he should repent.' But could this be said of the God of E? Probably not; but, at any rate, Balaam's persistence is evidently due to selfishness and greed.

Some regret may be felt on the ground that such a critical analysis of Balaam's story destroys its value as the study of an instructively composite character. But this is not so much so as appears at first sight. The great sermon of Bp. Butler, for example, depends almost entirely on the narrative of E. His allusion to P's story as part of Balaam's career does not affect his main argument much more than the words of Micah (6^{6a}) erroneously put by him into Balaam's mouth. The real value of his sermon arises out of his insight into human nature and motive. On the other side, it is only fair to state that the critical process removes at least one very serious moral difficulty, that, as the narrative now stands, God allows Balaam to go on certain conditions, and before the conditions have been violated is angry, and punishes him for acting on this permission.

The date and origin of the Balaam story cannot be determined with certainty. The reference to the subjugation of Moab (24¹⁷), if we suppose that these are prophecies only in a literary sense, seems to point, for the Jahwistic narrative, to a date posterior to David's Moabitish war (2 S 8); and it is hardly likely to be much later—indeed it is highly probable that the story is based on a much earlier legend. The speaking of animals is a common feature of the early folk-lore of many nations, and this incident has its obvious parallel in the Jahwistic story of Paradise. Among some of the Norwegian peasantry the belief that bears could speak, and refrained from doing so only from fear of man, continued down to comparatively recent times.

LITERATURE.—The story and character of Balaam have been the subject of a large number of treatises and sermons. By far the best known, and generally acknowledged to be the most valuable, is the great sermon of Bp. Butler upon the character of Balaam. Among those of more recent date may be mentioned the sermons of F. D. Maurice and Isaac Williams.

BALANCE (מִשְׁכָּלָה, מִשְׁכָּל, ζυγόν).—Weighing was performed from early times in Egypt, and was probably thence borrowed by the Hebrews. All Oriental balances were equal-armed, the principle of leverage in the steelyard having been apparently an Italian invention, carried into the East under Roman influence. In Egypt before the Exodus, balances of all sizes were employed; the larger ones having a fixed pole for support, a beam of several feet in length, and large scale pans hung by cords. To test the evenness of the balance a tongue was attached to it, but instead of observing the tongue against a long vertical sling of the balance, as in modern times, the ancient tongue was below the beam, and the verticality of it (and evenness of the beam) was observed against a plummet. As the plummet was easily set swinging by a lurch of the stand, the characteristic action shown in weighing is for the man to steady the plummet with his hand in order to read its position. Smaller balances were held in the hand, hung by a cord. The beam was a circular bar, tapering to the ends; the suspension was by a hole through it, or sometimes merely by a string tied around it, which would give great opening for fraud; the pans were hung by cords, which passed through slanting holes cut in the beam, emerging in the width of the ends.

In OT the balance appears as a regular article of daily use. Abraham weighs four hundred shekels of silver for the field of Ephron (Gn 23¹⁶); and soon after Eliezer gives weighed jewellery, an earring of half a shekel and two bracelets of ten shekels, to Rebekah. The total weight of the gold, silver, and bronze used for the tabernacle is all stated (Ex 38²⁴⁻²⁹); and the weight of the offerings made at the dedication (Nu 7¹³ etc.). And this is quite in accord with the style of the elaborate summaries of weights which the Egyptian scribes used to reckon up at this period. This preciseness of weighing, however, seems to have been lost to the Hebrews in Pal., as there is no record of the weighing of metal for the temple, and David mentions quantities in the vaguest manner (1 Ch 22²⁴), while the habit of using the balance seems to have revived in the later and more commercial times, to judge by the frequent mention of it in late books.

The falsification of the balance was common among the Hebrews as shown by continual denunciations of the practice. In Leviticus just balances are enjoined (19³⁶), as by Ezekiel (45¹⁰); and Amos (8⁵), Micah (6¹¹), and the Proverbs (11¹) specially inveigh against false balances. The exactness of the balance was even considered a divine matter, as well as the precision of the weights (Pr 16¹¹). For these references to the standards, see WEIGHTS AND MEASURES. W. M. FLINDERS PETRIE.

BALDNESS, loss of the hair.—Two forms are contrasted in Lv 13⁴⁰⁻⁴³, נֶטֶה or crown-baldness (φαλάκρωμα, LXX), and נֶטֶהָא or forehead baldness; the Heb. name referring to the fictitious appearance of height which it gives to the head (ἀναφάλλωραμα, LXX). These forms are also distinguished by Aristotle (Hist. An. iii. 11. 8). Baldness did not render the Israelite ceremonially unclean, and thus differed from the Bahereth zaraath or spot of the contagious parasitic disease Tineatonsurans or ringworm, the condition described by Celsus as ophiasis; while the other form of spot mentioned along with it in Lv 13, Bohak or psoriasis, is not contagious (Lv 13³⁰), and did not therefore make the sufferer unclean. Baldness is not a sign of old age in the Bible, like grey hair; but is regarded as due to excessive labour with exposure to the sun, as in those employed in the siege of Tyre (Ezk 29¹⁸), among whom it may have been induced by the salt water and a salt fish diet, supposed in Shetland to cause baldness. An Arab. poet calls crown-baldness the baldness of slaves, while the other form is called noble baldness, as due to the pressure of a helmet. It was to be a sign of the degradation and servitude of backsliding Israel, that instead of curled and dressed hair they were to show baldness (Is 3²⁴).

'Bald-head' was a term of reproach (2 K 2²³), as was calvus among the Romans, and φαλακρός among the Greeks (see Suetonius in Cæs. 45. 3, and Aristophanes, Nubes, 240; Equites, 550). Synesius wrote a defence of baldness of which an Eng. tr. was published by Fleming in 1579. A more famous defence was Hucbald's remarkable alliterative poem of 136 lines, de laudibus calvitii, each word of which begins with the letter C (Dornavius, Amphitheatro Sapient. Socrat. i. 290).

Baldness seems not to have been common in Bible-lands, nor is it very frequently noticed among the Jews to this day. The name of Kareah, father of Johanan (2 K 25²³), means 'bald-head,' and Korah refers to baldness, as Lat. name Calvus (Gn 36^{8, 18}, Ex 6²¹). Possibly, the frequency of ceremonial shaving of the head may have had some effect in preventing it. This reason is given by Herodotus for its rarity in Egypt (iii. 12). Mummy heads, though often shaven (see Gn 41¹⁴), are seldom bald. I have found only three bald heads out of 500. Egyptians generally concealed baldness by wearing wigs, and one female head in the Camb. Mus. had locks of hair gummed on over the bare scalp. In Papyrus Ebers (c. B.C. 1500) there are eleven prescriptions to prevent baldness. But, although rare in Egypt, Leo Africanus says it is common in Barbary. Many of the Egyp. priests were shaven, and are therefore called Feket or bald-headed; and perhaps it was for contrast that baldness disqualified for the priesthood in Isr. (Lv 21²⁰, LXX), although it did not preclude them from partaking of the sacred food. Even shaving the head was forbidden to the priest (Lv 21⁵). A similar contrast is implied in the prohibition of 'rounding the corners' of the head (Lv 19²⁷) among ordinary Israelites to distinguish them from their heathen neighbours, who cut their hair in a circular form, as that of Dionysus was cut (Herod. iii. 8). The modern Egyptians and Bishari adopt a similar mode of cutting; while the Pal. and Arabian Jews keep the Levitical custom, and, at the halaka or first cutting of the hair at the age of four years, do not cut the corners (Schechter, Jewish Quart. Rev. ii. 16).

Artificial baldness, by shaving, was a sign of mourning, not only among the Jews, but among other races. Bion's comment on its folly, quasi calvitio mæror levetur, is quoted by Cicero (Tusc. Disp. iii. 26). In this manner Mardonius and his army mourned for Masiustus, cutting off not only their own hair, but that of their horses (Herod. ix. 24; see also Patroclus' funeral, Il. xxiii. 46; also Odys. iv. 198; Seneca, Hippol. 1176). Micah bids the women of Mareshah make themselves bald (1¹⁶), and enlarge their baldness as the nesher or neophron (Egyp. vulture), which has a featherless head. Baldness, produced by cutting off the hair, is associated with mourning in Is 15² 22¹², Jer 48³⁷ 16⁸, Ezk 27³¹, and Am 8¹⁰. It is used metaphorically for mourning in Jer 47⁵ and Ezk 7¹⁸.

Symbolical baldness by shaving was the sign of the expiry of the Nazirite's vow (Nu 6¹⁸). At the expiry of his vow St. Paul shaved his head at Cenchreæ, and he fulfilled later the ritual of purification (Ac 18¹⁸ 21²⁴). Shaving in connexion with vows was not peculiar to the Jews; thus the people of Argos shaved their heads in token of their vow to recover Thyrea (Herod. i. 82). Shaving the forehead was not permitted to the Jews (Bechorat 43. 3, and Sifre on Nu). These shavings were essentially representative sacrifices; in the usual heathen form, they were intended to propitiate the deity invoked. The Jewish tonsure was partly thanksgiving, hence the hair was burnt in the fire of the peace-offering (Nu 6¹⁸); it was also partly purificatory, 'as if by this, deficiencies in religious service were cut off' (Rabanus Maur. de Cleric. Inst. i. 3). Shaving was on this account part of the ceremony of the purification of Levites (Nu 8⁷). Among some races partial tonsure is a tribal mark, as, for example, the occipital tonsure of the Philippine Ætas.

The primitive Christian tonsure was votive, and was falsely supposed to have been invented by St. Peter (Greg. Tour. de gloria Martyr. i. 28), but really dates from the 5th cent. The Petrine or Rom. crown-tonsure represented the crown of thorns (Raban. i. 3). The Eastern or Pauline tonsure was total shaving or close cropping of the head, and was derived from Egypt. The Celtic or Johannine tonsure, which was a shaving of the front of the head in front of the ears and vertex, existed in Spain, where it was forbidden by the 4th Council of Toledo (Canon xli.); it was also practised in Celtic Britain (Gildas, Epist. ii.), Ireland, and Scotland (Bede, Hist. Eccl. iv. 1, v. 2), as well as among the Saxons (Apollinaris Sidonius, Epist. ad Lamprid. viii. 9). It was probably the survival of a pre-Christian badge of servitude, as the word Maol, 'bald-headed,' for servant existed in pre-Christian times, as in the names Maolduin and Maoldarach. Lucat-Maol was a heathen antagonist of St. Patrick. Tonsure of women was, in the judgment of St. Paul, shameful (1 Co 11⁵), and the early Church decided at the Council of Gangra that if a woman polled her head she should be excommunicated (Socrates, HE iii. 42). See BARBER, HAIR, SHAVING.

BALM (𐤁𐤌𐤁 zōri, 𐤁𐤌𐤁 zēri; LXX βῆτιλον; resina).—It is impossible to determine, on philological grounds, the substance intended by zōri; and as the ancient translations do not agree on the signification of the word, it must remain uncertain. The substances with which it is mentioned (Gn 37²⁵, cf. 43¹¹) make it probable that it was an aromatic gum or spice. If the substance alluded to by Jeremiah (8²² 46¹¹ 51⁸) be the same, powerful medicinal virtues were attributed to it. It was clearly an article of commerce in Gilead, dealt in by Judah and Israel (Ezk 27¹⁷). No mention is made of a balm tree as growing in Gilead. It is not certain from the expressions, 'Is there no balm in Gilead?' and 'Go up into Gilead and take balm,' that the substance was produced there, any more than from the expression that 'Judah and the land of Israel, they were thy merchants, they traded in balm,' implies that it was produced in their country. Gilead was an indefinite geographical expression for the district stretching eastward from the Jordan to the Euphrates and an unknown extent southward. A portion of the commerce of Arabia passed through it, and spices and balms and incense formed an important part of the wares carried by the Ishmaelites through this territory. Whether the substance was produced in it or not, Gilead would seem to have been an entrepôt for it. This is all we know from Scripture as to the substance or substances intended. Any attempt to identify them must be conjectural, and he who hazards a guess will be largely influenced by his opinion as to whether balm was a product of Gilead or an article of commerce there and in Pal. If we assume that it was a product of Gilead, we have no known tree in that region which produces a medicinal aromatic gum or spice. Mastich has been supposed by some to be the substance. The tree which produces it, however, although abundant along the coast and lower mountains of W. Pal., has not been reported E. of the Jordan. The author searched for it in the forests of Gilead and Bashan without finding it. Moreover, the Ishmaelites (Gn 37²⁶) brought it, with Arabian gums and spices, through Gilead to Dothan on their way to Egypt. Mastich is, and always has been, a leading product of Chios and other islands of the Aegean Sea, and was certainly not a product of Arabia. Pliny (Nat. Hist. xii. 36), indeed, speaks of a mastich produced in India and Arabia, but it was produced by a 'prickly shrub,' and therefore cannot be the gum from Pistacia Lentiscus, L. In other places he calls the true mastich resin of lentisk (xxiv. 22, 28). He attributes to it a long list of virtues, principally astringent and detergent.

Mecca balsam, the product of Balsamodendron Gileadense, Kth., and B. Opobalsamum, Kth., has the weight of tradition in its favour. Jos. (Ant. viii. vi. 6) says that the Jews believe that the queen of Sheba, who doubtless had botanical gardens in many places, gave Solomon a root of it; and we have evidence that it was cultivated in the lower Jordan Valley. Tristram says, 'From Jericho Cleopatra obtained plants for her gardens at Heliopolis; an imperial guard was placed over the gardens, and twice was the balm tree exhibited in triumph in the streets of Rome.' It has, however, now disappeared. The product of these trees is known in Arabic by the name of balasân, from which βάλσαμον, balsamum, balsam, and balm are probably derived. The balasân tree is defined by the Arab. lexicographers as 'a certain kind of tree or shrub, resembling the camphire (henna), having many leaves, inclining to white, in odour resembling the rue, the berry of which has an oil which is more potent than the berry, as the berry is than the wood.' Avicenna speaks of its properties and virtues at length, and quotes Dioscorides to the effect that the tree 'grows only in the country of the Jews, which is Palestine, in the Ghor.' He probably alludes to the plantations in the neighbourhood of Jericho, but is mistaken in supposing that this was the only or the principal station for the tree. That Avicenna does not confound it with the mastich is clear from the fact that he presently says that 'some prefer to mix this unguent (gum) with other unguents (gums), as unguent of the green berry, and unguent of camphire (henna), and unguent (gum) of the mastich tree.' Balm of Gilead was formerly much used even in Europe, but it has now passed out of the pharmacopœias.

The monks of Jericho have adopted the zakkâm, Balanites Aegyptiaca, Del., as the Balm of Gilead. They prepare an oily gum from the fruit of this species, which is sold in tin cases to travellers as the Balm of Gilead. It is said also to be beneficial in the treatment of wounds and sores.

BAMAH (Ezk 20²⁹) is the Heb. name for 'High Place' (wh. see), and is retained by the EV in the second half of this verse on account of the etymology given in the first half. It is obviously a contemptuous derivation that the prophet means to suggest; but the precise point of it cannot be clearly ascertained. The word is resolved into its syllables, and these appear to be identified respectively with two words meaning 'come' and 'what'; thus: 'What (MAH) is the Ba-mah whereunto ye come (BA)?' Ewald and others have supposed that the verb 'come' (or 'enter') is used in an obscene sense, with an allusion to the immoral practices associated with the worship at these sanctuaries (cf. Am 2⁷, Hos 4^{13a}); but this view, even if adopted, does not remove the obscurity of the verse. A parallel may be found in the derivation of the word for 'manna' in Ex 16¹⁵ (see RV).

BAMOTH (במות), Nu 21^{19, 20}, a station in the journey from the Arnon to the Jordan, probably the same as BAMOTH-BAAL, Nu 22⁴¹ RVm ('the high places of Baal' AV, RV), to which Balak brought Balaam. Bamoth-baal is mentioned in the list of cities belonging to Reuben (Jos 13¹⁷) along with Beth-baal-meon, and both being seats of Baal-worship they may be included in 'the high places' of Is 15²; but the reference here is doubtful (cf. Dillmann's note on the verse in his Isaiah). במות, mentioned on the Moabite Stone, l. 27, as restored by Mesha, may be the same as Bamoth. For its position see EXODUS, ROUTE OF.

BAN (A Βάν, B Βαενάρ), 1 Es 5²⁷.—The head of a family which could not trace their descent from Israel at the return under Zerub. The passage is corrupt. The corresp. name in the lists of Ezr 2⁶⁰ Neh 7⁶² is Tobiah; but in both of the can. books some MSS of the LXX insert a name viol Bowd, of which Ban may be the equivalent.

BANAIAS (Βαβαιας) 1 Es 9³⁰ = BENAIAS Ezr 10⁴⁸.

BAND.—Three words of different origin and meaning but the same spelling are all found in AV. 1. Band=anything that binds, whether for confinement or for strengthening. The Heb. words are (a) בָּנָה âbhôth, something twisted or twined. Job 39¹⁰ 'Canst thou bind the unicorn (RV 'wild-ox') with his band?' Hos 11⁴ 'I drew them with cords of a man, with bands of love'; so Ezk 3^{26, 48}; but tr^d 'cords' Jg 15^{13, 14}, Ps 2³ 118^{27, 129}. It is the word tr^d wreathen (work) in Ex 23^{14, 22, 24, 25} 39^{15, 17, 18}. (b) אָסַר esâr (אָסַר esâr, Dn 4^{15, 23}, Ec 7²⁶), anything that will bind, whether a flaxen rope or an iron fetter. Jg 15¹⁴ 'his (Samson's flaxen) bands dropped from off his hands'; Dn 4¹⁵ 'a band of iron and brass,' so Dn 4²³, Ec 7²⁶. (c) הֶבְהֵל hebbel, a rope or cord, not for binding (though Ezk 27²⁴, Job 41¹, Est 1⁶) so much as for use on board ship (Is 33²³), for fastening tents (Is 33²⁰), and especially for measuring, a measuring-line (2 S 8^{2, 7}, Ps 78⁵⁵ etc.). In AV hebbel is tr^d 'bands' only in Ps 119⁶¹ 'the bands of the wicked have robbed me' (where 'bands' no doubt = 'troops,' by mistrans.); RV 'The cords of the wicked have wrapped me round'; and Zec 11^{7, 14}, the name of one of the two staves, 'Bands,' representing the brotherhood between Judah and Israel, the other, 'Beauty,' representing the covenant made with all the people. (d) מוֹתָאֵל môtâh, the pole or chief part of the yoke that binds the oxen together. In AV only Lv 26¹³, Ezk 34²⁷ (RV 'bars'). (e) חַרְזֻבָּה harzubbah only in plu. = bonds, Is 53⁶ 'to loose the bands (RV 'bonds') of wickedness'; or pains, Ps 73⁴ 'there are no bands in their death.' (f) מוֹשֶׁר mosêr, properly something for chastising, hence a bond for curbing, Job 39⁶ 'who hath loosed the bands of the wild ass?', Ps 2³ 'Let us break their bands asunder,' 107¹⁴, Is 28²² 52², Jer 2²⁰. In all these passages Amer. RV gives 'bonds,' but Eng. RV retains 'bands,' and even turns 'bonds' into 'bands' in Jer 5⁵ 27² 30³, where this is the Heb. word (g) מִשְׁחָחָה mōshēkhāh, a rope to draw with, only Job 38²¹ 'or loose the bands of Orion?'

The Greek words are (a) δεσμός, something that binds, Lk 8²³, Ac 16²⁶ 22²⁰; (b) συνδεσμός, something that binds closely, Col 2¹⁹ 'all the body, being supplied and knit together through the joints and bands'; and (c) ζευκτηρία, that which yokes, only in Ac 27⁴⁰ the fastening of the rudder.

In all these places 'bond' would be used in mod. English; and 'bond' is quite frequent in AV as tr^d of some of those words, esp. δεσμός.

2. Band=a flat strip, a ribbon. (In this sense b. is from French bande; but as the strip or strap would be used for binding, it came to be identified with 1. Both come originally from bindan 'to bind'). (a) שָׁפָה sāphāh, 'a lip,' tr^d 'band' only in Ex 39²³ 'there was a hole in the midst of the robe . . . with a band (RV 'binding') round about the hole.' See also HEADBAND (Is 3²⁰ only), and SWADDLINGBAND (Job 38⁸ only). RV gives 'band' for 'girdle,' שָׁפָה hēshēbh, in Ex 28³⁵ 27. 28 29⁶ 39⁶ 20. 21, Lv 8⁷. (b) κλοιός, a dog's collar, then any collar or chain for the neck (frequent in LXX, as Gn 41⁴² '[Pharaoh] put a gold chain about his [Joseph's] neck,' 1 K 12⁴ 'Thy father made our yoke grievous'). κλοιός is tr^d 'band' Sir 6³⁰ 'her bands are purple lace.'

3. Band=troop, company. (Its origin is difficult to trace. Du Cange says that the company of soldiers formed by Alfonso of Castile was called a banda, from the red banda or ribbon worn by them as a sash; but Littré gives late Lat. bandum 'banner' as the original.) The Heb. words so tr^d are (a) אָגַר āgar, only plu. and only in Ezk 12¹⁴ 17²¹ 38^{6b} 5. 22 39⁴. RV keeps 'bands' in 12¹⁴ 17²¹, but gives 'hordes' in the other passages. The word means originally the wing of an army, Assyr. agappu. (b) גָּדְוָה gādhāh, from [גָּדַ] to penetrate, so a band invading a country. Tr^d 'band' in 2 S 4², 1 K 11²⁴, 2 K 6²³ 13²⁰. 21 24^{20b}, 1 Ch 7⁴ 12¹⁸ 21, 2 Ch 22¹. RV retains, except 1 K 11²⁴ 'troop.' (c) חַיִל hayil=strength, a strong army, a force; tr^d 'band' only 1 S 10²⁶ ('a b. of men,' RV 'the host') and Ezr 8²² ('a b. of soldiers,' so RV). (d) חָצַע hōzēz (pcp. of [חָצַ] to divide, hence divided into companies. Only Pr 30²⁷ 'The locusts have no king, yet go they forth all of them by bands.' (e) מַחֲנֵה māhāneh, the ordinary word for a 'camp.' Only Gn 32⁷ 'Jacob . . . divided the people . . . into two bands' (RV 'companies'), and 32¹⁰ 'and now I am become two bands' (RV 'companies'). (f) רֹאשׁ rōsh= 'head,' only 1 Ch 12²⁸ (RV 'heads') and Job 17 'The Chaldeans made out three bands' (so RV). The only Gr. word is σπειρα, which was the usual equivalent of the Lat. cohors, a cohort, which when complete consisted of 600 regular soldiers, being the tenth part of a legion. Cohorts, like regiments, had their distinguishing names, of which we find the 'Italian,' Ac 10¹, and the 'Angustan,' 27¹. In Jn 18³⁻¹² the 'band' would not consist of a whole cohort, so that σπειρα must have had some elasticity of usage; cf. 2 Mac 8²³. 'Band' as an intrans. verb occurs Ac 23¹² 'the Jews banded together' (ποχθάντες συστροφῆν, making a conspiracy; the word is used of the riotous assembly in Ephesus, Ac 19⁴⁰). J. HASTINGS.

BANI (בָּנִי).—1. A Gadite, one of David's heroes (2 S 23³⁶). 2. 3. 4. Levites (1 Ch 6⁴⁶, Neh 3¹⁷, cf. 8⁷ (=Binnui of Ezr 8³³ and Neh 10⁹)). 5. A Judahite (1 Ch 9⁴). 6. Head of a family of returning exiles (Ezr 2¹⁰ = [Binnui of Neh 7¹⁵] 10²⁹, Neh 10¹⁴). 7. One of those who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10³⁸). The utmost uncertainty prevails as to the number of occurrences of the name B. owing to the confusion between it and similar names. See BINNUI. J. A. SELBIE.

BANIAS (B Βανιάς, A Βανί, AV Banid), 1 Es 8⁶.—Ancestor of Salimoth, who returned with Ezra from captivity. The name does not appear in the parallel list Ezr 8¹⁰, having prob. dropped out from its resemblance to the preceding word 'sons' (בָּנִים).

H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

BANISHMENT.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS.

BANK.—1. A raised earthwork from which to storm a city, 2 S 20¹⁵ 'they cast up a b. against the city' (הִלְלָה sōlēlah, from הָלַץ to raise up, RV 'mount'), so 2 K 19³², Is 37³³ (Amer. RV 'mound').

The RV has changed 'thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee,' Lk 19⁴³, into 'thine enemies shall cast up a bank about thee,' although the Revisers did not read παραβαλλούσιν with L marg., T, WH; but accepted παραβάλλουσιν of TR. On the reading see Plummer's Luke.

This meaning, now obsol., is nearer the original sense of 'bank' than the next, but the oldest of all is seen in Ca 5¹³ RV 'banks of sweet herbs.' 2. The margin of a river, Heb. (a) שָׁפָה sāphāh, 'lip,' Gn 41¹⁷, Dt 4⁴⁸, Jos 12¹³ 13¹⁶, 2 K 2¹⁸, Ezk 47⁷⁻¹², Dn 12^{5b} (RV gives 'brink' at Gn 41¹⁷, Dn 12⁵, 'edge' in Dt 4⁴⁸, Jos 12¹³ 13¹⁶, leaving the rest unchanged, and turning 'brink' into 'bank' in Ezk 47⁶). (b) גִּדְוָה gādhāh, perhaps meaning 'cut away,' Jos 3¹⁶ 4¹⁸, Is 8⁷, always of banks overflowed. (c) גִּדְוָה (acc. to kethibh, kerē גִּדְוָה) gidhyah, only 1 Ch 12¹⁵, also of banks overflowed. 3. The table of a money-changer or money-dealer; then his office or shop. It occurs only Lk 19²³ (Gr. τράπεζα, the ordinary word for a table). RV gives bankers for 'exchangers' in Mt 25²⁷ (Gr. τραπεζίτης [-ετης T, WH]). J. HASTINGS.

BANNAS (Βάννος, AV Banuas), 1 Es 5²⁶.—A name occurring among the Levites who returned with Zerub. The names Bannas and Sudias answer to Bene-Hodaviah in Ezr 2⁴⁰, of which they are perhaps a corruption. The corresponding words in Neh 10⁹ are 'Shebaniah, Hodiah' (Σαβαρία, Ὀδοία). H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

BANNEAS (Βαννάς, AV Baanias), 1 Es 9²⁶=BENAIAH (Ezr 10²⁵), which see.

BANNER, ENSIGN, STANDARD.—1. לָגֵל degel, 'banner, standard.' This was to be used to mark the separate place of each tribe in the camp in the wilderness (Nu 2²). The Shulammitte in her beauty, which overcomes the beholder, is compared (Ca 6⁴⁻¹⁰) to forces encamped (or possibly, marching) in order under banners (מִלְחָמָה kannidgālōth). A degel is properly 'that which is meant to be seen'; dagātu in Assyrian being the common word for 'to see.'

2. נֵשׂ nēs, 'ensign,' possibly means either that which shines (נֹשֵׁן=נֹשֵׁן) or that which is lifted up (נֹשֵׁן=נֹשֵׁן). The brazen serpent was put upon a nēs (Nu 21⁹), i.e. possibly upon the degel of one of the tribes. The common use made of the nēs was to set it upon some high hill as a signal to assemble (Is 11¹⁰ and 13²).

In Is 10¹⁸ ('They, i.e. the Assyrians, shall be as when a standard-bearer, nōsēs, fainteth') nearly all modern authorities (not RV text) render, 'As when a sick man pineth away.' The old rendering is, however, defensible, if we may supply the word 'heart'; נֹשֵׁן לֵב נֹשֵׁן, 'as when the heart of a standard-bearer fainteth.' Again in Is 59¹⁹ ('When the enemy shall come in like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against him') modern scholars allow no reference to a standard. Yet the rendering 'the Spirit of the Lord raiseth a standard against him' may be defended by Is 11¹⁰.

On the Assyrian reliefs, standards are shown carried into battle borne on the chariots of the Assyrians. One such standard (of which a good engraving is given in Madame Ragozin's Assyria, p. 252) has the device of an archer, probably the god Asshur, standing above two bulls. The fact that an ensign might thus be a religious symbol gives point to Is 11¹² ['J'] shall set up an ensign for the nations.'

The Roman standards also, since they bore the image of the emperor, had a religious character, owing to the worship paid to the emperors. The Jews regarded them as idols (Jos. Ant. XVIII. iii. 1), and the Roman soldiers, on one occasion at least, sacrificed to them (Jos. War. VI. vi. 1: κομισαντες τας σημαίας εις το ιερὸν καὶ θέμενοι τῆς ἀνατολικῆς πόλης ἀντικρυς ἔθυσαν αὐταῖς αὐτόθι). This sacrifice was offered in honour of Titus, the emperor's son, after the capture of the temple.

BANNUS (Βαννός), 1 Es 9³⁴.—Either BANI or BINNUI in Ezr 10³⁸. (See these names.)

BANQUET.—In the 17th cent. and earlier, b. frequently signified, not the general feast, but the wine that came after; not eating and drinking, but drinking only.

'Bring in the banquet quickly; wine enough
Cleopatra's health to drink.'

Shaks. Ant. and Cleop. i. ii. 11.

'We'll dine in the great room, but let the music
And banquet be prepared here.'

Massinger, Unnat. Comb. iii. 1.

This is the meaning of b. wherever it occurs in AV. The Heb. and Gr. words are—1. מִשְׁתֶּה mishteh, 'a drinking,' from שָׁתַּה 'to drink' (Est 5⁴, 5. 6. 8. 12. 14 6¹⁴ 7². 7. 8. Dn 5¹⁰). 2. שָׁתָה shāthah, Est 7¹ 'So the king and Haman came to b.' (lit. 'to drink'). 3. יַיִן yayin, 'wine,' Ca 2⁴ 'He brought me to the banqueting house' (lit. 'house of wine'). 4. συμπίσιον = 'drinking together,' Sir 32⁵ 49¹ 'a b. of wine'; 1 Mac 16¹⁶, 2 Mac 2²⁷. 5. πότος, 'drinking' [Jth 12¹⁰], 1 Mac 16¹⁵, 1 P 4³ 'banquetings' (RV 'carousings').

The only possible exceptions are Job 41⁶ 'Shall the companions make a b. of him?' (RV 'make traffic of him,' Heb. קָרַח kārah 'to bargain'; and Am 6⁷ 'the b. (RV 'revelry') of them that stretched themselves' (Heb. מִרְזָח mirzāh, from root = to scream, 'here used of yells of joy'—Orelli). But in these passages also, though b. is not the best tr., its meaning was no doubt the same. See FEAST. J. HASTINGS.

V. THE DOCTRINE OF CHRISTIAN BAPTISM.

I. TERMINOLOGY.—(a) In the LXX the simple verb βάπτειν is frequent in the sense of 'dip' (Ex 12²², Lv 4⁶. 17 9⁹ 14⁶. 18. 51 etc.) or 'immerse' (Job 9³¹). The intensive βαπτίζω occurs four times: twice literally, of Naaman dipping in the Jordan (2 K 5¹⁴) and of Judith bathing (12⁷); once metaphorically, ἡ ἀνομιὰ με βαπτίζει (Is 21⁴); and once of ceremonial washing after pollution, βαπτίζομενος ἀπὸ νεκροῦ (Sir 31 [34]²⁵). The usual verb for ceremonial washing is λούεσθαι (Lv 14⁸. 9 15⁵-10. 13. 18-22 16⁴. 24-28 etc.), the middle voice being used because the unclean person performed this cleansing for himself. The active is used of Moses washing Aaron and his sons before they exercised their ministry (Ex 29⁴ 40¹², Lv 8³), and of the Lord washing Jerus. (Ezk 16⁴). But βαπτίζω is never used in the LXX of any initiatory rite.

Of the two cognate substantives βαπτισμός and βάπτισμα, neither is found in the LXX; while λούτρον occurs thrice (Ca 4² 6⁸, Sir 31 [34]²⁵).

(b) In the NT the use of βάπτειν is the same as in the LXX (Lk 16²⁴, Jn 13²⁶, and perhaps Rev 19¹³, where the reading is very uncertain); but the use of βαπτίζω undergoes a great change. As in Sir 31²⁵, it is used of ceremonial purification (Lk 11³⁸, and perhaps Mk 7⁴, where the reading is again uncertain); and, as in Is 21⁴, it is used metaphorically, viz. by Christ of His sufferings (Mk 10³⁸. 39, Lk 12⁵⁰). But, with these few exceptions, βαπτίζω always refers to washing for a religious purpose, the administration of the sacred rite of ablution, 'baptizing' in the technical sense; and in this sense λούω is not used. It is plain from Lk 11³⁸ that in itself βαπτίζω does not necessarily mean immersion, as Calvin (Inst. iv. 15. 19) and others assert. This is its usual meaning, however; Polybius uses it of sinking ships (i. 51. 6, xvi. 6. 2). We find βαπτίζω used both absolutely (Mk 1⁴, Jn 1²⁵. 26 3²². 23. 26 4² etc.) and with an acc. (Jn 4¹, Ac 8³⁸, 1 Co 1¹⁴. 16), and very often in the passive (Mt 3¹³. 14. 16, Mk 16¹⁶, Lk 3²¹, Ac 2⁴¹ etc.). The verb is sometimes followed by a preposition, indicating either the element into which (εις τὸν Ἰορδάνην, Mk 1⁹) or in which (ἐν τῷ Ἰορδάνῃ, Mk 1⁵; ἐν ὕδατι, Mt 3¹¹, Jn 1²⁶. 33) the immersion takes place; or the end or issue of it (εις μεράνοιαν, Mt 3¹¹; εις ἄφεσιν ἁμαρτιῶν, Ac 2³⁸; εις τὸ δοῦμά τως, Mt 28¹⁹, Ac 8¹⁶ 19⁵).

Of the substantives, both βαπτισμός and βάπτισμα are found; and the distinction commonly drawn between them as to NT usage is probably correct; but there are not enough instances for a secure induction. From Mk 7⁴ and He 9¹⁰ we infer that βαπτισμός usually meant lustration or ceremonial washing. Ro 6⁴, with Eph 4⁵ and 1 P 3²¹, would indicate that βάπτισμα was reserved for baptism proper. But in He 6² βαπτισμῶν probably includes Christian baptism, and in Col 2¹² the more difficult reading βαπτισμῶ claims attention. Jos. uses βαπτισμός to designate John's baptism, and βάπτισις of the performance of the rite (Ant. XVIII. v. 2).

The Latin VSS and Fathers make no distinction between baptismus and baptisma. The Vulg. has baptismus penitentiae (Mk 1⁴, Lk 3³, Ac 13²⁴ 19⁴), baptisma Joannis (Ac 1²²), unum baptisma (Eph 4⁵), and even baptismata calicum (Mk 7⁴), and baptismatum doctrinæ (He 6²). A neut. nom. baptismum is found in the best MSS of the Vulg., Mt 21²⁵, and in various other passages in representatives of the Old Latin, e.g. Mk 10³⁸. 39 (a i). In Lk 20⁴ we have baptismum (f Vulg.), baptisma (c d), baptisma (e). See Rönsch, Itala und Vulgata, p. 270. Cyprian sometimes uses both baptisma and baptismus in the same passage without change of meaning, e.g. Ep. lxxiv. 11; comp. Ep. lxxix. 2, lxx. 2, etc. Twice in NT λούτρον is used of baptism: λ. τοῦ ὕδατος (Eph 5²⁶), λ. παλιγγενεσίας (Tit 3⁵); and the word occurs in no other connexion. It and its equivalent lavacrum soon became technical terms in this sense (Just. Mart. Apol. i. 61. 79; Cypr. De Hab. Virg. 2. 23; De Lapsis, 24, etc.).

II. OT TYPES.—We have apostolic authority for finding two types of Christian baptism in OT history, but in neither case are the details of the type quite certain.

St. Paul takes the Israelites being under the cloud and passing through the sea as an image of baptism (1 Co 10¹⁻²); where being under the cloud points to submersion, while passing through the sea may signify emersion; or (less well) the cloud may typify the spiritual element in baptism, and the sea the material element.

Still more expressly St. Peter makes the saving of a few persons through water at the Flood a figure of the Christian rite (1 P 3^{20, 21}); where the water which purged the earth of its wicked inhabitants by floating the Ark saved its inmates. Luther almost inverts this, when he remarks that 'baptism is a greater deluge than that described by Moses, since more are baptized than were drowned by the Deluge.'

Beyond these two we need not go. But patristic writers find baptism typified in a variety of things, some of which are remote enough, e.g. not only in the passage of the Jordan (Jos 3⁷) and the cleansing of Naaman (2 K 5¹⁴), but in the river of Paradise, the well revealed to Hagar, the water from the rock, the water poured upon Elijah's offering, etc. etc. Tertullian asserts that the primeval water 'brought forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life' (Gn 1²⁰), in order that there should be no difficulty in believing that baptismal waters can give life (De Bapt. iii.). In a like spirit prophecies respecting Christian baptism were found with great freedom, not only in Zechariah's fountain . . . 'for sin and for uncleanness' (13¹), in Isaiah's promise that sins red as scarlet shall be white as snow (1¹⁸), and in Ezekiel's, 'I will sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean. . . . A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you' (36^{25, 26}), but even in the hart panting after the water brooks (Ps 42¹), and in the waters breaking out in the desert (Is 35⁶).

Without presuming to determine anything respecting intended types and prophecies, we may safely say that those washings which were required by the Mosaic Law as a means of entering or re-entering the congregation, especially in its closer relations with J^h, had considerable analogy with Christian baptism. But that is a very different thing from Cyprian's sweeping assertion, Quotiescunque aqua sola in scripturis sanctis nominatur, baptismus prædicatur (Ep. lxiii. 8); and this he applies not only to OT (Is 43¹⁶⁻²¹ 48²¹), but to NT (Jn 4^{18, 14} 7²⁷⁻²⁹, Mt 5⁶).

III. PARTIAL ANTICIPATIONS.—When we approach the history of baptism as a rite of religious initiation, we are confronted with the question, Where does the history begin? We may set aside heathen baptisms as having no historic connexion with the subject, except so far as ceremonial ablutions may be common to the human race. But a baptism which prevailed in Iceland and some parts of Norway is worth mentioning as a partial parallel. The father decided whether an infant was to be nurtured or exposed. If he wished to preserve it, water was poured over it and a name given to it; and to kill it after this ceremony of admission to the community was murder. After the introduction of Christianity (c. A.D. 1000) this baptism still continued for some time side by side with Christian baptism. Omitting pagan lustrations, we have three conspicuous examples of the rite, all originating in the same part of the world: proselyte baptism, John's baptism, and Christian baptism. Which of these three is chronologically the first, and therefore the possible suggester of one or both of the others? This question was very hotly debated in the first half of the 18th cent. on controversial grounds, to find arguments for or against infant baptism and sacramental doctrine. In the 19th cent. the question has been examined with less heat, and of late has dropped out of notice. The monograph of Schneckengerber, Ueber das Alter der jüdischen Proselytentaufe, Berlin, 1829, is still quoted as the leading authority on the subject. Massecheth Gerim, the Talmudic authority on proselytes, or Septem Libri Talmudici parvi Hierosolymitani, was published by Kirchheim, Frankfurt a/M. 1851.

(a) Proselyte Baptism.—According to the teaching of later Judaism, a stranger who desired to become a Proselyte of the Covenant, or of Righteousness, i.e. in the fullest sense an Isr., must be circumcised and baptized, and then offer a sacrifice; circumcision alone was not enough. Three of those who had instructed the stranger in the Law became his 'fathers' or sponsors, and took him to a pool, in which he stood up to his neck in water, while the great commandments of the Law were recited to him. These he promised to keep. Then a benediction was pronounced, and he plunged beneath the water, taking care to be entirely submerged. In the case of women, baptism and sacrifice were the things required to admit them to the full privileges of Israel. But for both male and female proselytes sacrifice was abolished after the destruction of the temple.

That this baptism of proselytes is not an original feature in Judaism is manifest. The Rabbis indeed found a trace of it in Jacob's command to his household, 'Put away the strange gods that are among you, and purify yourselves, and change your garments' (Gn 35²); and even in God's command to Moses, 'Go unto the people, and sanctify them to-day and to-morrow, and let them wash their garments' (Ex 19¹⁰), where the people to be sanctified are certainly all Jews. When 'the daughter of Pharaoh came down to bathe at the river' (Ex 2⁵), this also, the Talm. said, is to be regarded as the baptizing of a proselyte. But we may safely assert that there is no mention of proselyte baptism anywhere in OT or in the Apoc. NT is equally silent. And this is by no means all. Josephus, Philo, and the older Targumists are silent also; and there is little more than a probable allusion to it in the Mishna. None of the early Christian writers seem to know anything about it; and this is specially notable in the case of those who have discussed Judaism, or baptism, or both, e.g. Barnabas, Justin Martyr, and Tertullian. Let us admit that the Fourth Book of the Sibylline Oracles is of Jewish origin, and that the line, ἐν ποταμοῖς λούσασθε ὄλον δέμας ἀνόμοιοι (164), refers to proselyte baptism; and that Arrian refers to it also, when he says of one who is a heathen, ὅταν δὲ ἀναλάβῃ τὸ πάθος βεβαμμένον τότε καὶ ἐστὶ τῷ ὄντι καὶ καλεῖται Ἰουδαῖος (Diss. Epict. ii. 9); and that the reading of the Ethiopic VS of Mt 23¹⁵ 'ye compass sea and land to baptize one proselyte,' is beyond question. Nevertheless, these three authorities do not bring us much (if at all) earlier than the 2nd cent.; and that at that time proselytes were baptized on their admission to Judaism, is not in dispute. What is wanted is direct evidence that before John the Baptist made so remarkable a use of the rite, it was the custom to make all proselytes submit to baptism; and such evidence is not forthcoming.

Nevertheless, the fact is not really doubtful. It is not credible that the baptizing of proselytes was instituted and made essential for their admission to Judaism at a period subsequent to the institution of Christian baptism; and the supposition that it was borrowed from the rite enjoined by Christ is monstrous. From the infancy of Christianity the hostility of the synagogue to the Church was such, that the mere fact that baptism was universally known as the rite by which Gentiles were admitted to the Christian community, would have made it impossible for Jews to accept it as the rite for admitting Gentiles to the Jewish community. Against a consideration of this kind the silence of Scripture and of Josephus and Philo is of little weight; it is one more instance of the danger of the argument from silence. No passage has been pointed out in either Josephus or Philo in which it would have been necessary, or even natural, to mention proselyte baptism; and the same may be said of Scripture. The subject is not mentioned, because there was no need to mention it. In the Mishna it is stated that the school of Shammai allowed a Gentile who was circumcised on the eve of the Passover to wash and partake of the paschal lamb, while the school of Hillel did not; and this points to the washing of proselytes as a customary accompaniment of circumcision. But what may be regarded as conclusive is, that the baptizing of proselytes would follow of necessity from the regulations which required a Jew to bathe in order to recover Levitical purity (Lv 11-15, Nu 19). Judæus quotidie lavat, quia quotidie inquinatur, says Tertullian (De Bapt. xv.); and again, Omnibus licet membris lavet quotidie Israel, nunquam tamen mundus est (De Orat. xiv.). If the mere possibility of contact with pollution requires such purification, how much more would one who had lived in heathen pollution require a complete purification before he was admitted to full membership in the House of Israel. Moreover, it should be noted that the authorities quoted above—the Sibylline Oracles, Arrian, and the Ethiopic VS—all mention baptism as the sign of change, and say nothing about circumcision. The reason for which possibly is, that, after the abolition of the sacrifices, baptism was the only rite which was applicable to both sexes; and the large majority of proselytes were women (Kraus, Enc. d. Christ. Alterth. ii. p. 823). Every Gentile, whether man or woman, who became a Jew, was purified from heathen pollution by immersion.

About the other hypothesis there is no difficulty. Assume that baptism for proselytes was a well-established custom when John began to preach, and we have an obvious reason why John adopted the rite. Not that this was his only reason; but that, so far as the custom was of any influence, it was a recommendation and not an objection. And the same argument applies to Christian baptism, which becomes more, and not less, intelligible when we consider that it was preceded by baptism for proselytes and the baptism of John.

LITERATURE.—For the abundant literature on the subject, and for references to the Talm., see Edersheim, Life and Times of the Messiah, ii. App. xii.; Schürer, HJP ii. ii. § 31, p. 319; Herzog, RE xii. p. 250, 1st ed.; less full in 2nd ed. p. 300.

(b) The Baptism of John.—Although there is no doubt that baptism was a Jewish rite of initiation before John began to preach, yet the history of baptism, so far as direct evidence is concerned, begins with him. That he who derived his title from it (ὁ βαπτίζων, Mk 6^{14, 24}; ὁ βαπτιστής, Mt 3¹, Mk 8²⁸, Lk 7²⁹, Jos. Ant. xviii. v. 2) made use of the rite in preparing Israel for the kingdom of God, is an historical fact beyond dispute. And we need not doubt that in using it he was influenced by the levitical purifications enjoined by the Law and by the baptism of proselytes. But his baptism was different from both. It is evident that, if it had not had special characteristics, he would not have received a special name, and his right to administer it would not have been challenged. His baptism differed from the washings prescribed by the Law in these three respects—(1) They were acts of lustration, restoring a man to his normal condition; his was an act of preparation, leading a man to an entirely new condition. (2) The man levitically unclean baptized himself, like Naaman in the Jordan; the penitents who came to John were baptized by him. (3) The legal washings merely cleansed from levitical uncleanness; his was a symbol and seal of moral purification. The moral preparation required by John is pointed out in the τῆς ψυχῆς δικαιοσύνη προεκεκαθαμένῃς of Jos. (Ant. xviii. v. 2) as plainly as in the βάπτισμα μετανοίας of Scripture (Mk 1⁴, Lk 3³). The spirit of repentance was assumed with a view to remission of sins.

John's baptism differed from proselyte baptism in being administered to Jews. The meaning of the challenge, 'Why then baptizest thou?' (Jn 1²⁵) seems to be, 'What right hast thou, who art neither the Messiah nor the Prophet, to treat Israelites as if they were proselytes? Jews are fit for the Messianic kingdom without any such purification.'

And while John's baptism differed from these Jewish rites on the one hand, so it differed from Christian baptism on the other. This difference was clearly pointed out by the Baptist himself. 'I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance . . . he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost' (Mt 3¹¹); 'He that sent me to baptize with water, he said unto me, Upon whomsoever thou shalt see the Spirit descending and abiding upon him, the same is he that baptizeth with the Holy Spirit' (Jn 1³³; comp. our Lord's words, Ac 1⁵ 11¹⁶). And that this difference was regarded as essential, is shown by the fact that Ephesian disciples who had received John's baptism were rebaptized into the name of the Lord Jesus, and then received the Holy Ghost through the laying on of hands by St. Paul (Ac 19³⁻⁵). Cyril of Jerus., in contrasting John's baptism with Christian baptism, says, that the former 'bestowed only the remission of sins' (Catech. xx. 6; comp. iii. 7). But there is nothing in Scripture to show that it bestowed that. Tertullian points out that 'baptism for the remission of sins' refers to a future remission, which was to follow in Christ (De Bapt. x.). And it may be doubted whether, if John's baptism had conferred remission of sins, Jesus would have submitted to it. Its main aspect was preparation for the kingdom of God; and in this aspect it fitted well into the opening of Christ's ministry. To everyone else this preparatory act was a baptism of repentance. The Messiah, who needed no repentance, could yet accept the preparation. By means of this rite the people were consecrated to receive salvation, and He was consecrated to bestow it.

We are told by St. John that the disciples of Jesus baptized many, and that this led to an inaccurate statement that Jesus Himself baptized (3²² 4¹⁻²). As to the nature of this baptism we are told nothing; but, if not identical with the baptism of John, it would be more akin to that than to Christian baptism. It was preparatory and not perfecting, symbolical and not sacramental. The arguments of Tertullian on this point are weighty (De Bapt. x.-xii.). Was Christian baptism possible until Christ had died and risen again? The theory that this early baptism by Christ's disciples was the baptism of the gospel, but that its full effects remained latent until after the resurrection, is not helpful; and to suppose with Peter Lombard that it was In nomine Trinitatis, scilicet in eâ formâ in quâ baptizaverunt postea (Sent. iv. Dist. iii. 7), is utterly unreasonable. When John was put into prison, Jesus Himself continued John's preaching. 'He came into Galilee, preaching the gospel of God, and saying, The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand: repent ye'

(Mk 14¹⁵). Is it improbable that, while Christ continued the preaching of John, His disciples continued the baptism of John? In that case there is no need to raise the question whether they baptized 'into the name of the Lord Jesus'; for John certainly did not do so. In any case it is improbable that, at a time when the disciples had such inadequate views of the office of Jesus, they would baptize into His name. This baptism was certainly not accompanied by the gift of the Spirit: 'for the Spirit was not yet given; because Jesus was not yet glorified' (Jn 7³⁹). And it is to be noted that neither in the mission of the Twelve nor in that of the Seventy is there any command to baptize (Lk 9¹⁻⁵ 10¹⁻¹⁶). That omission is intelligible, if this early baptism, like that of John, was merely preparatory, a symbolical act conferring no grace. But the omission would be strange if there was already in use a rite equal in efficacy to the baptism of the gospel. Until Christ had died and risen again, and sent the Holy Spirit upon His disciples, no such baptism by them was possible.

IV. THE HISTORY OF CHRISTIAN BAPTISM. — This subject, as treated in NT, may be discussed under four heads—(a) the Institution, (b) the Recipients, (c) the Minister, (d) the Rite.

(a) The Institution of Christian baptism is to be dated from Christ's farewell command, 'Go ye and make disciples of all the nations, baptizing them into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost' (Mt 28¹⁹). This command the Twelve do not attempt to carry out until they are free from the earlier charge (Lk 24⁴⁹). But directly they have 'been clothed with power from on high,' Peter begins to exhort the people to 'repent, and be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ unto the remission of their sins' (Ac 2³⁸), and with very great success. But here we are at once struck by the fact that, in spite of Christ's command to baptize into the name of the Trinity, no mention is made of the Trinity, but only of 'the name of Jesus Christ.' And this first and important record of Christian baptisms does not stand alone. The Samaritans who were converted by Philip were 'baptized into the name of the Lord Jesus' (Ac 8¹⁶). Peter at Caesarea commanded that Cornelius and those with him should be 'baptized in the name of Jesus Christ' (10⁴⁸). And the Ephesian disciples, when they were convinced of the insufficiency of John's baptism, were 'baptized into the name of the Lord Jesus' (19⁵). Moreover, there is no mention in NT of any one being baptized into the name of the Trinity; and the expression 'baptized into Christ' (Ro 6³, Gal 3²⁷; comp. 1 Co 1¹³ 6¹¹) is more in harmony with the passages in the Acts than with the divine command as recorded Mt 28¹⁹.*

Various explanations of these statements in the Acts have been suggested.

(1) This baptism into or in the name of Jesus Christ is that which was practised by Christ's disciples during His ministry (Jn 4¹⁻²). Having been accustomed to this form, they continued to use it 'probably through life,' although Christ had expressly ordered the Trinitarian form, and although the Holy Spirit was not always imparted when this imperfect form was employed, whereas the gift of the Spirit always accompanied baptism

* It is worth noting that in all the instances of baptism 'in' or 'into the name' the verb is in the passive. Except in the original charge, the phrase 'to baptize into the name' does not occur; it is always 'to be baptized into the name' or 'in the name.' This holds good of 1 Co 1¹³ also, where eis τὸ ἰμὸν ὀνόματι βαπτισα is a false reading, and ἰσχυρισθῆναι (NABC* Egyptt. Vulg. Arm.) is right. In the Eastern Churches the formula is not 'I baptize thee,' but βαπτίζονται ὁ δούλος τοῦ θεοῦ; and this is probably more ancient than the Western formula familiar to us.

in the name of the Trinity (Dict. of Chr. Biog. i. p. 241). This is scarcely credible. The Ephesian disciples were rebaptized because their original baptism was inadequate. Can we suppose that they then received a baptism that was also defective? And would the disciples have adhered to a form which experience proved to be less uniformly efficacious, even if we allow that they would ignore the express command of Christ? It is admitted that this inferior form of baptism went out of use at an early date—perhaps soon after the First Gospel became current.

(2) Baptism in the name of one Person of the Trinity is virtually baptism in the name of the Trinity, and is valid. This seems to be the view of Ambrose. Quod verbo tacitum fuerat, expressum est fide. Cum enim dicitur: In nomine Domini nostri Jesu Christi, per unitatem nominis impletum mysterium est: nec a Christi baptisate Spiritus separatur. . . . Qui unum dixerit, Trinitatem signavit. Si Christum dicas, et Deum Patrem a quo unctus est Filius, et ipsum qui unctus est Filium, et Spiritum Sanctum quo unctus est designasti (De Spiritu S. i. 4. 43, 44; Migne, xvi. 714, 715, where see note a). Ambrose is here commenting on Ac 19⁵; and it is rash to say that 'he is probably speaking of the confession of the recipient, not of the formula.' Bede understands Ambrose to be writing of the baptismal formula, and accepts the solution that baptism in the name of Jesus Christ is really in the name of the Trinity (Super Acta Exp. x. 48; Migne, xcii. 970). See also Peter Lombard (Sent. iv. Dist. iii. 4), Hugo Victor (De Sacram. i. 13), and Aquinas (Summa, iii. 66. 6). This view was confirmed by the Council of Frejus (A.D. 792), and apparently by Pope Nicholas I. (858-867) in his Responsa ad Bulgaros.

(3) When St. Luke says that people were 'baptized in (or into) the name of the Lord Jesus,' he is not indicating the formula which was used in baptizing, but is merely stating that such persons were baptized as acknowledged Jesus to be the Lord and the Christ; in short, he is simply telling us that the baptism was Christian. When Peter heals the cripple at the Beautiful Gate of the temple, the form of the words used is quoted: 'In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, walk.' No such form of words is quoted in any of the passages in which persons are said to be baptized in or into the name of Jesus Christ. There is no evidence against the supposition that in these and in all other cases the formula used was that which Christ enjoined. This is perhaps what Cyprian means when he says on Ac 2³⁸ Jesu Christi mentionem facit Petrus, non quasi Pater omitteretur, sed ut Patri Filius quoque adjungeretur (Ep. lxxiii. 17). In 1 Co 10², where the Israelites are said to have been 'baptized into Moses' (eis τὸν Μωσῆν), the meaning is that they were baptized into obedience to him and acknowledgment of his authority, not that his name was called over them in some formula. See Lightfoot on 1 Co 1¹³.

(4) The original form of words was 'into the name of Jesus Christ' or 'the Lord Jesus.' Baptism into the name of the Trinity was a later development. After the one mention of it, Mt 28¹⁹, we do not find it again until Justin Martyr, and his formula is not identical with that in the Gospel: ἐπ' ὀνόματος γὰρ τοῦ πατρὸς τῶν δίκων καὶ δεσπότου θεοῦ καὶ τοῦ σωτήρος ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ καὶ πνεύματος ἁγίου τὸ ἐν τῷ ὕδατι τότε λουτρὸν ποιούνται (Apol. i. 61). It is probable that, when the Trinitarian formula had become usual, it was regarded as of divine authority, and was by some attributed to Christ Himself. This tradition is represented in Mt 28¹⁹, and is perhaps an indication that the First Gospel in its extant form is later than the destruction of Jerusalem. That in the apostolic age there was no fixed formula is shown, not only by the difference between Matt. and the Acts, but by the difference between one passage in the Acts and another, and also by traces of other differences in the Epistles. Baptism 'into the name of the Lord Jesus' (Ac 8¹⁶ 19⁵), or 'in the name of Jesus Christ' (2⁸⁸ 10⁴⁸), or 'into Christ Jesus' (Ro 6³), or 'into Christ' (Gal 3²⁷), had sufficed. Comp. πρὶν γὰρ, φησί, φορέσαι τὸν ἀνθρώπον τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ, νεκρὸς ἔστω (Hermas, Sim. ix. 16. 3); where, however, τοῦ υἱοῦ is possibly an insertion (A omits).

Of these four explanations the second and third are far more satisfactory than the other two, and the third seems to be the best. It is a violent hypothesis to suppose that words of such importance as Mt 28¹⁹ were never spoken by Christ, and yet were authoritatively attributed to Him in the First Gospel. The insertion of the doxology after the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6¹³) is not parallel. Not only is the insertion of less importance, being covered by genuine utterances of Christ as well as by 1 Ch 29¹¹, but it is absent from all the most ancient authorities, including all Greek and Latin commentators; whereas the baptismal formula in Mt 28¹⁹ is in all authorities without exception. It is as well attested as any saying of Christ which is recorded in one Gospel only. Nor does the variation of the Trinitarian formula given by Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 61) cause any difficulty. He is not giving the exact words used in baptism, but is paraphrasing them, so as to make them a little more intelligible to the heathen whom he is addressing. It is reasonable to believe that Christ prescribed the Trinitarian formula, and that His command was obeyed.

(b) The Recipients of Christian baptism were required to repent and believe. This is set forth, both in the Lord's commands and also in the first instance of baptism on the Day of Pentecost. 'Peter said unto them, Repent ye, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ unto the remission of your sins' (Ac 2³⁸). Here repentance is expressed and faith in Jesus Christ is implied, as in the farewell charge to the apostles recorded by St. Luke: 'that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in His name unto all the nations' (24⁴⁷). More often it is faith that is expressed and repentance that is implied, as in the charge recorded in the appendix to Mk: 'Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to the whole creation. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that disbelieveth shall be condemned' (16^{15, 16}). So also in the case of the jailer at Philippi (Ac 16^{31, 33}), of the Samaritans (8¹²), of Cornelius and his company (10⁴⁸⁻⁴⁹), and of the Corinthians (18⁸). Compare the Western insertion Ac 8³⁷. Of the two requisites, faith is the one which more needs express statement. Repentance without faith in Christ was possible, as in the case of John's baptism. Faith in Christ without repentance was not possible. Comp. He 10²².

All the instances just quoted (especially those of the converts on the Day of Pentecost, of Cornelius and his friends, and of the Philippian jailer and his household) tend to show that no great amount of instruction or preparation was at first required. But somewhat later, after the apostles, who had been a protection against the admission of unworthy candidates, had died out, and after the Church had had larger experience of unreal converts, much more care was taken to secure definite knowledge and hearty acceptance of the truths of the gospel.

This primitive freedom in admitting converts to baptism is in itself an argument in favour of infant baptism, although no baptism of an infant is expressly mentioned. Whole households were sometimes baptized, as those of Lydia, Crispus, the jailer, and Stephanas; and it is probable that there were children in at least some of these. There may also have been children among the three thousand baptized at Pentecost. According to the ideas then prevalent, the head of the family represented and summed up the family. In some respects the paterfamilias had absolute control of the members of his household (Maine, Ancient Law, ch. v.). And it would have seemed an unnatural thing that the father should make a complete change in his religious condition and that his children should be excluded from it. Moreover, the analogy of circumcision would lead Jewish converts to have their children baptized. Had there been this marked difference between the two rites,—that infants were admitted to the Jewish covenant, but not to the Christian,—the difference would probably have been pointed out; all the more so, because Christianity was the more comprehensive religion of the two. There is therefore prima facie ground for believing that from the first infants were baptized. And this position is strengthened by general declarations of Christ Himself: 'Suffer the little children to come unto Me; forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of God' (Mk 10²⁴). 'Except a man (rus) be born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God' (Jn 3⁵); where there is no intimation that children are exempted. On the contrary, the condition of children is given as the ideal for entrance into the kingdom (Mt 18³).

But there is prima facie evidence on the other side. Not only is there no mention of the baptism of infants, but there is no text from which such baptism can be securely inferred. 'Make disciples of all the nations' (Mt 28¹⁹), implies those who are old enough to receive instruction. That little children may be brought to Christ, and are a type of Christian innocence, does not prove that they are fit to receive baptism. And we cannot be sure that Jn 3⁵ is meant to include infants, because Jesus often states general principles, and leaves His Church to find out the necessary limitations. An ordinance may be generally necessary to salvation, and yet not be suited to infants; which is the Western view of the Lord's Supper. Scripture tells us that repentance and faith are requisite for baptism. Assuming that infants have no need of repentance, can we assume that faith also may be dispensed with? Cyprian slurs this (Ep. lxiv. 5). He points out that adults must have faith, which includes repentance, and that infants have no sins of their own to repent of; but he is silent about infants' lack of faith. Those who maintain that the infantine state is a substitute for faith and repentance, must remember that faith and repentance are the conditions given in Scripture, and that the infantine state is not mentioned as an equivalent. It is probable that all that is said in Scripture about baptism refers to the baptism of adults. Until there were many Christian parents to whom children were born, the question of baptizing infants would be exceptional; and perhaps evangelists used their own discretion; for infant baptism is, at any rate, nowhere forbidden in Scripture.

(c) The Minister in baptism is not determined; and lay baptism is in much the same position as infant baptism. It can be neither proved nor disproved from Scripture. The commission to baptize was given in the first instance to the Eleven (Mt 28¹⁹⁻²⁰), but we are not sure that no others were present. Moreover, it is in virtue of Christ's presence ('Lo, I am with you always') that they have the right to baptize; and this presence cannot be confined to the apostles. We are not told who baptized the three thousand at Pentecost; and the apostles, if they baptized any, can hardly have baptized them all. Apparently, Ananias baptized St. Paul, but this is not clear (Ac 22¹⁶). He was 'a certain disciple' (9¹⁰), and 'a devout man according to the law' (22¹²), and presumably a layman. Peter commanded Cornelius and his company to be baptized (10⁴⁸); and we assume that it was done by the brethren from Joppa, who are not said to be presbyters or deacons. From the silence of Scripture respecting the minister on these and other occasions, we may infer that an ordained minister is not essential.

(d) The Rite is nowhere described in detail; but the element was always water, and the mode of using it was commonly immersion. The symbolism of the ordinance required this. It was an act of purification; and hence the need of water. A death to sin was expressed by the plunge beneath the water, and a rising again to a life of righteousness by the return to light and air; and hence the appropriateness of immersion. Water is mentioned in Ac 8³⁸ 10⁴⁷, Eph 5²⁶, He 10²²; and there is no mention of any other element. Immersion is implied in Ro 6⁴ and Col 2¹². But immersion is a desirable symbol rather than an essential. In the prison at Philippi it can hardly have been possible; and it is not very probable in the house of Cornelius. Wherever large numbers of both sexes were baptized, the difficulty of total immersion in each case must have been great. And if immersion better expresses the cleansing of the whole man, pouring better expresses the outpouring of the Spirit, whose operation is not dependent upon the amount of water, nor upon the manner of its application. Comp. Cyprian, Ep. lxi. 12.

As to the form of words used in baptizing, what has been said above may almost suffice. If from the first there was only one form, that form was Trinitarian; from the 2nd century it was certainly the only form. Justin's evidence (Apol. i. 61) has been quoted, and Tertullian describes the practice in his day: nec semel, sed ter, ad singula nomina in personas singulas tingimur (Adv. Prax. xxvi.).* Wherever St. Matthew's Gospel was received the Trinitarian formula would become obligatory; and that carries us back long before Justin Martyr. But it is possible that for a time the form of words varied.

The 'anointing' (2 Co 1²¹, 1 Jn 2²⁷) probably refers to baptism; but to anointing with the Spirit, not with oil. Yet unction at baptism is as old as Tertullian (De Bapt. vii.). The 'sealing' (2 Co 1²², Eph 1¹³ 4³⁰) also may refer to baptism, but not to signing with the cross: ἡ σφραγίς οὖν τὸ ὕδωρ ἔστιν (Hermas, Sim. ix. 16. 4). Whether 'the good confession in the sight of many witnesses' (1 Ti 6¹²) refers to a profession of faith at Timothy's baptism (Ewald, Hausrath, Pfeiderer), is uncertain; the many witnesses point rather to ordination (Holtzmann). That the difficult passage 1 P 3²¹ refers to the answers or pledges made by the candidates at baptism, is very doubtful.

V. THE DOCTRINE OF CHRISTIAN BAPTISM.—Scripture teaches that baptism, rightly administered to those who are qualified by repentance and faith to receive it, has various beneficial results. These are closely connected, either as cause and effect, or as joint effects, or as different aspects of the same fact. But they are capable of analysis and of separate treatment. They are mainly (1) Regeneration or New Birth, (2) Divine Affiliation, (3) Cleansing from Sin, (4) Admission to the Church, (5) Union with Christ, (6) Gift of the Spirit, (7) Salvation.

* In the Eastern Churches trine immersion is regarded as the only valid form of baptism; and the Catechism explains that 'this trine immersion is a figure of the three days' burial of our Saviour, and of His resurrection' (Moschake, p. 42).

(1) Christ Himself said, 'Except a man be born anew (γεννηθῆν ἄνωθεν), he cannot see the kingdom of God'; and He explained this as meaning, 'Except a man be born of water and the Spirit' (Jn 3^{3, 5}), which until Calvin's day had universally been interpreted as referring to baptism. The metaphor was not new. Jews spoke of the admission of proselytes to Israel as a 'new birth.' 'Art thou the teacher of Israel, and understandest not these things?' (Jn 3¹⁰), perhaps refers to this common use of the phrase. But in any case 'water and Spirit' refer to the outward sign and inward gift at baptism as effecting a new birth. This is confirmed by St. Paul's 'laver of regeneration (λουτήριον παλουργεσίας) and renewing of the Holy Spirit' (Tit 3⁵), which also was universally understood as meaning baptism. And baptism is called 'washing of regeneration,' not merely because it symbolizes it, or pledges a man to it, but also, and chiefly, because it effects it (Holtzmann, Huther, Pfeiderer, Weiss).

(2) This new birth brings us into a new relationship to God: the baptized are made His children or sons. 'For ye are all sons of God, through faith in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as were baptized into Christ did put on Christ' (Gal 3^{26, 27}). 'To them gave he the right to become children of God' (Jn 1¹²; comp. 1 Jn 4⁷). That being 'begotten of God' (1 Jn 3⁹ 4⁷ 5¹⁸), or becoming a 'child of God' (1 Jn 3^{1, 2, 10} 5²), or a 'son of God' (Ro 8^{14, 19}, Gal 3²⁶), is synonymous with being 'born anew,' need not be doubted. The first birth is of man; the second or new birth is of God. So that it makes little matter whether we translate ἄνωθεν (Jn 3³) 'anew' with Justin (Apol. i. 61) and the Lat. and Eth. VSS, or 'from above' with Origen and most of the Greek Fathers. A new birth is a birth from above, and vice versa. And the passages in which these expressions occur show that regeneration or being begotten by God does not mean merely a new capacity for change in the direction of goodness, but an actual change. The legal washings were actual external purifications. Baptism is actual internal purification.

(3) John's baptism was 'unto remission of sins,' εἰς ἀφεσιν ἁμαρτιῶν (Mk 1⁴, Lk 3³). Christian baptism is not only this (Ac 2³⁸, Lk 24⁴⁷, where eis and not kai is the better reading), but it confers remission of sins. Ananias says to Saul: 'Arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins' (Ac 22¹⁶; comp. 10⁴⁸ 13³⁸, He 10²²). St. Paul, after glancing at the sinful past of the Corinthians in the days of their heathenism, continues: 'But ye were washed, but ye were sanctified,' etc. (1 Co 6¹¹). And the same is said of all Christians; for 'Christ loved the Church, and gave himself up for it; that he might sanctify it, having cleansed it by the washing of water with the word' (Eph 5^{25, 26}).

(4) That baptism involved admission to the Church hardly needs to be more than stated. It was an instrument for this very purpose, analogous to circumcision. The recipient of baptism, like the recipient of circumcision, is admitted to a new external covenant and new spiritual privileges, and is thereby pledged to new duties. To say that a person is baptized, is to say that he has been admitted to the Christian communion. 'They then that received his word were baptized: and there were added unto them in that day about three thousand souls' (Ac 2⁴¹; comp. 1 Co 12¹³).

(5) As the Church is the body of Christ (Col 1¹⁸), to be admitted to the Church is to be united with Christ, and to become one of His members (1 Co 12²⁷). 'For as many of you as were baptized into Christ did put on Christ' (Gal 3²⁷); and Christians' 'bodies are members of Christ' (1 Co 6¹⁵; comp. Eph 4^{15, 16}). This is not only true in general, but in a special way baptism makes us partakers in the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ. 'We who were baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into his death. We were buried therefore with him through baptism into death: that like as Christ was raised from the dead . . . so we also might walk in newness of life' (Ro 6³⁻⁴; comp. Col 2^{12, 20 31}). This great change is always spoken of as past, not as continuing (Ro 6^{8, 18, 22 8^{2, 15}} etc.). The reference is to some definite occasion when it took place.

(6) That Christian baptism confers the gift of the Spirit, whereas John's baptism did not, was one of the most marked points of difference between them (Mt 3¹¹, Mk 1⁸, Lk 3¹⁶, Jn 1²⁶, Ac 19²⁻⁶). 'In one Spirit were we all baptized into one body . . . and were all made to drink of one Spirit' (1 Co 12¹³). And hence not only is the whole Church 'a habitation of God in the Spirit' (Eph 2²²; comp. 2 Co 6¹⁶, 1 P 2⁵), but each individual Christian is a temple of the Holy Ghost (1 Co 6^{19 316}). And 'the Spirit himself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are children of God: and if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ' (Ro 8^{16, 17}).

(7) This involves one more result. Those who are 'joint heirs with Christ' have a pledge that they will one day enter into that inheritance which He now enjoys. It has various names. It is salvation. 'He that believeth, and is baptized, shall be saved' ([Mk] 16¹⁶). Those who were added to the Church were 'those that were being saved' (Ac 2⁴⁷; comp. 16³⁰, 1 P 1^{3, 4 321}). It is the kingdom of God. 'Except a man be born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God' (Jn 3⁵). It is eternal life. After speaking to Nicodemus of the necessity of being born anew of the Spirit, Christ says that God has sent Him into the world, 'that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have eternal life' (3¹⁵⁻¹⁷). By baptism we are grafted into Him who is the life (14⁶), and he that hath the Son hath the life (1 Jn 5¹²). Those Jews who refused to be admitted into the Church 'judged themselves unworthy of eternal life' (Ac 13⁴⁶). In writing to Titus, St. Paul sums up several of these aspects of baptism (3⁵⁻⁷).

These are the chief effects when valid baptism has been administered to those who are duly qualified by repentance and faith to receive it. But what is the result when these two sets of conditions are separated? There is the case of those who are qualified, but are not baptized. And there is the case of those who are baptized, but are not qualified. Simon Magus is an example of the latter. In Scripture there is no certain instance of the former, nor any express statement respecting such. But the solution afterwards reached throws light on scriptural language, and may be briefly mentioned here.

It was universally held that a catechumen who was martyred before baptism was a member of Christ. His 'baptism of blood' supplied the deficiency. But a catechumen who was willing to suffer for the faith, and yet died without martyrdom or baptism, seemed to be equally a member of Christ; as Ambrose contends (De obitu Valent. Consol. 52; Migne, xvi. 1375). This led to a general concession that the faithful unbaptized may possess the substance of regeneration before baptism; and this involved a modification of the doctrine as to the actual effect of baptism upon the faithful recipient. As early as Tertullian we find the admission: Lavacrum illud est obsecratio fidei; quæ fides a penitentia fide incipitur et commendatur. Non ideo abluimur ut delinquere desinamus, quoniam jam corde loti sumus (De Pæn. vi.). Baptism is a seal (σφραγίς, signaculum). The metaphor was used of circumcision (Ro 4¹¹), and was very early transferred to baptism (? 2 Co 1², ? Rev 9⁴): see reff. in Suicer, s.v., and in Lightfoot, Clem. Rom. ii.

226. A seal makes a document formally complete; but the document may be binding without it. And if before baptism jam corde loti sumus, what is this but regeneration? Nevertheless, to regard baptism as a mere form which may be neglected with impunity would be arrogant disobedience, like the first attitude of Naaman towards Elisha; and such disobedience would be evidence that the inward justification had not taken place. An unbaptized believer is like a testator who has made a will but has not signed it. He may die without signing it. If it is clear that he had full intention of signing, and was merely waiting for suitable witnesses, the will may be accepted as a valid expression of his wishes. But if he has postponed the signature indefinitely, the presumption is that he was not decided as to his intentions. It is the contempt of baptism when it may be had, not the lack of it when it may not, that is perilous.

The case of Simon Magus is very different. He was baptized without repentance and faith. Was that a mere empty form? By no means. He was admitted to the Christian body, and received the baptismal character. The technical name for such a person was Fictus, i.e. one who received baptism unworthily. And it was held from the first that God always does His part in the baptismal contract, whether the baptized can avail himself of it or no. The grace which the Fictus, through unworthiness, could not receive at the time of baptism, was always ready for him when repentance and faith made him worthy. He had ceased to be a heathen, and had received a Christian title, which could be made good by change of heart. This doctrine follows of necessity from the doctrine that baptism is generally necessary, and yet may not be repeated. Otherwise, the case of the unworthy recipient would be hopeless. His first baptism would be without effect; and he may not have a second. But it is because his baptism has done all that is required, if only he makes himself capable of profiting by it, that he may not have it repeated. Simon is exhorted to repent, not with a view to a second baptism, but to the forgiveness which would have been his had his baptism been worthily received, and which may still be won (Ac 8²²). When whole tribes were baptized at once, baptism without the necessary repentance and faith must have been common. But this defect was not irreparable; and meanwhile the baptized had a title to spiritual blessings which could be appropriated by change of heart.

Mutatis mutandis the same principle may hold respecting the baptism of infants. At baptism the infant receives remission of the guilt of original sin, admission to the Christian community, and a title to heavenly gifts to be appropriated afterwards. Scriptural doctrine refers to the baptism of adults who are qualified by repentance and faith. The application of that doctrine to infants is an uncertain inference; and we must be cautious in drawing it. Caution is also required in estimating the statements of Christian writers of the first three centuries respecting baptismal regeneration. We must consider two points especially. (1) Is the writer speaking of the baptism of adults or of that of infants? With us, if nothing is said to the contrary, baptism commonly means infant baptism. Early Christian writers would almost always have the baptism of adults in their minds. (2) In what sense does he use the word 'regeneration'? Sometimes it is a mere synonym for the fact of baptism. In Scripture every Christian is hypothetically a saint: and so every baptized person is hypothetically regenerate. It is assumed that the baptism has been in all respects complete. In this sense, to call an infant 'regenerate' may mean no more than that it has been baptized, and may be no evidence of the writer's convictions as to the immediate effect of baptism on infants.

BAPTISM FOR THE DEAD.—The expression of βαπτίζομενοι ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν, 'those who are baptized for the dead,' has from early times been a perplexity to expositors, and with our present knowledge it is impossible to do more than determine the direction in which a correct solution may be found. It is possible to show what kind of interpretation the language of 1 Co 15²⁹ requires; and, when this is done, other kinds of interpretation are excluded as impossible.

The interpretations are very numerous. Horsley (see below) has collected thirty-six, and it would perhaps be possible to add to the number. It is well that such collections should be made for reference, but it is not necessary to multiply them. The thirty-six are classified under three heads: four explain the text by a reference to legal purifications; three of metaphorical baptism, e.g. being baptized in calamity; twenty-nine of sacramental baptism. A more simple and useful classification is that into those which explain οἱ βαπτίζομενοι ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν as referring to ordinary Christian baptism, and those which make it refer to something abnormal.

1. The ablest exposition of the first kind of explanation in its best form is probably that of T. S. Evans in the Speaker's Commentary (iii. pp. 372, 373). He contends that the view of the Greek expositors is unquestionably right, and that ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν means, 'with an interest in the resurrection of the dead,' i.e. 'in expectation of the resurrection.' The objections to this kind of interpretation are three. (1) οἱ βαπτ. ὑπὲρ τ. ν. seem to be a special class, and not all Christians in general. (2) There is no instance in NT, if anywhere at all, of this use of ὑπὲρ. (3) The ellipse of τῆς ἀναστάσεως is very violent. If St. Paul had wanted to abbreviate τῆς ἀναστάσεως τῶν νεκρῶν, he would have omitted τῶν νεκρῶν, which is superfluous, rather than τῆς ἀναστάσεως, which is vital.

2. The reference is clearly to something abnormal. There was some baptismal rite known to the Corinthians which would be meaningless without a belief in the resurrection. The passage does not imply that St. Paul approves of this abnormal rite, but simply that it exists and implies the doctrine of the resurrection. And here all certainty ends. We cannot determine what this rite was. The practice of vicarious baptism, i.e. of baptizing living proxies in place of those who had died unbaptized, unquestionably existed in some quarters in Tertullian's time (De Resur. 48; Adv. Marcion, v. 10), but probably only among heretics. And the practice may easily have grown out of an ignorant 'wresting' of this 'hard to be understood' (2 P 3¹⁶) saying of St. Paul. We have no knowledge that this vicarious baptism was practised by any religious body in St. Paul's day.

BAPTIST.—See JOHN THE BAPTIST.

BAR.—The Aram. word for 'son'; in Aram. parts of Ezr and Dn constantly; four times in Heb. (Pr 31^{2 ter}, Ps 2¹² [if text correct]). It is used, especially in NT times, as the first component part of several names of persons, as Barabbas, Barjesus, Bar-jonah, Barnabas, Barsabbas, Bartholomew, Bartimæus,—which see in their places.

J. H. THAYER.

BARABBAS.—The Greek form of the name Βαπαββᾶς represents the Aramaic Bar-abbā = 'son of the teacher' or 'of the master.' The name is not rare in the Talm. (Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. on Mt 27¹⁶), and one instance indicates that Abba may sometimes have been a proper name. Renan (Vie de Jésus, p. 406) prefers Bar-rabban (the form preserved in the Hareclean Syr.), which would mean 'son of a Rabbi.' So also Éwald. All four evangelists mention Barabbas as the criminal whom the hierarchy urged the multitude to demand in preference to Jesus Christ, whom Pilate offered to release in honour of the Passover. We are told that Barabbas was 'a notable prisoner' (Mt 27¹⁶), 'who for a certain insurrection made in the city, and for murder' (Lk 23¹⁹), 'was lying bound with them that had made insurrection' (Mk 15⁷), and that he was a 'robber' or brigand (Jn 18⁴⁰). He may have been connected with the two 'robbers' who were crucified with Jesus; but we cannot be sure that the στασιασται of Mk 15⁷ include the two robbers. The στάσις, or 'insurrection,' in which Barabbas took part was perhaps a looting of houses rather than a popular uprising.

The name 'Jesus' before that of Barabbas in Mt 27^{16, 17} is an interesting reading found in a few cursives, in the Armenian Version, and in some copies of the Jerusalem Syriac. With this insertion Pilate's question runs thus: 'Whom will ye that I release unto you? Jesus Barabbas, or Jesus which is called Christ?' This reading was known to Origen; and he does not condemn it, although he thinks that the many MSS which omit the 'Jesus' are probably right. Éwald (Life of Christ, p. 241), Renan (Vie de Jésus, p. 406), Trench (Studies in the Gospels, p. 296), and others defend the reading; and Meyer conjectures that the common name suggested the substitution of one Jesus for another. But the reading is rejected by all the best critics. It would be amazing that the true reading should be lost from all uncials, nearly all cursives, and all the more ancient versions. The words of Jerome, ad loc., do not necessarily imply that 'Jesus Barabbas' was the reading in the Gospel according to the Hebrews. He says: Iste in evangelio quod scribitur juxta Hebræos filius magistri eorum interpretatur; which may mean that this document contained the words, 'Barabbas, which being interpreted is, Son of their Master.' But if the Gospel according to the Hebrews had 'Jesus, Son of their Master' for 'Jesus Barabbas,' then this may be the source from which the name 'Jesus' got into some copies of St. Matthew. If the name was not in the Gospel according to the Hebrews, then we may adopt Tregelles' conjecture, that the interpolation arose first in v. 17 through accidental repetition of the last two letters of ἡμῶν, the second ΙΝ being afterwards interpreted as an abbreviation of Ἰησοῦν. The copies known to Origen seem to have had the Ἰησοῦν in v. 17 only. That Barabbas had this name, and that the evangelists missed the startling coincidence, is not probable. A. PLUMMER.

BARACHEL (בָּרַחֵל 'he whom God blesses').—Only in Job 32⁶. The father of Elihu, described as 'the Buzite,' probably a descendant of Buz, second son of Milcah and Nahor, Gn 22²¹. See BUZ.
W. T. DAVISON.

BARAK (בָּרַק, Βαράκ, 'lightning-flash.' The name is found in Punic, Barcas, surname of Hamilcar; Sabæan, בָּרַק; Palmyrene, בָּרַק; de Vogüé, Syrie Centrale, lxxvi. 2; Ledrain, Dict. des Noms Propres Palmyr. 1887, s.v.), son of Abinoam; his history is recorded in Jg 4 and 5. He was summoned by Deborah to be her ally in the struggle against the Canaanites. He dwelt in Kedesh-naphtali (Jg 4⁶), and was probably a member of the tribe of Issachar (5¹⁵). Hence he belonged to the district which had suffered most at the hands of the Canaanites: perhaps he had been actually their prisoner.* He receives from Deborah the plan of the campaign; he is to move his troops, 10,000 men of Naphtali and Zebulun, in the direction of Mt. Tabor, while she undertakes to attract Sisera's army towards the same place, and promises to deliver Sisera himself into his hands (4⁶⁻⁷). The writer does not regard B.'s urgent request that Deborah should go with him as worthy of blame; nor is it necessary to interpret the prophetess' announcement that the honour of the expedition will not be his but a woman's, as a punishment for his hesitation (see Moore, Judges, p. 117). B. collects his forces at Kedesh, moves to Tabor, and opens the engagement by a rush down the mountain (4^{10-12, 14}, cf. 5¹⁵); the battle is fought out at the foot. In ch. 5, on the other hand, the battle takes place along the right bank of the Kishon (vv. 19-21). The Canaanites routed, B. pursues them to Harosheth, and then follows Sisera on foot, and comes up to the tent of Jael to find him lying dead, with a tent-peg through his temples. According to 5¹, B. joined Deborah in singing the Ode of Triumph in ch. 5.

In 1 S 12¹¹ the LXX, Pesh., and many moderns read Barak for Bedan. B. thus becomes a representative leader along with Jerubbaal, Jephthah, and Samson (?). This agrees with the impression as to B.'s position which we gain from Jg 5.

BARBARIAN.—St. Paul (1 Co 14¹¹), wishing to emphasize the fact that the tongues with which those possessed of the Holy Ghost spoke were not any intelligible forms of speech, and that hence they required an interpreter also inspired, says, 'If then I know not the meaning of the voice, I shall be to him that speaketh a barbarian, and he that speaketh will be a barbarian unto me.' Here he uses the word in its proper sense as one who spoke unintelligibly. So Homer, in whom the word first occurs, speaks of the Kâpes βαρβαρῶν (Il. ii. 867), the Carians who spoke in a strange tongue. Since the word Barbarh means in the earliest Arm. the language of a race or people, Homer may have meant the Carians who spoke a barbarh, that having been the Carian word for their national language. However this be, the word Barbarian means all through Gr. literature a man who did not speak Greek, especially the Medes, Persians, and Orientals generally. The Romans or Latins were called Barbarians by the Greeks even to the latest days of the Byzantine Empire, and at first even called their own tongue Barbarian; though from the Augustan age onward they excepted their own tongue. In the same way Philo, a Hellenized Jew, calls his native Heb. a barbarian tongue, and states (Vita Moses, § 5, vol. ii. p. 138) that the Law was translated from Chaldaic into Greek because it was too valuable a treasure to be enjoyed by only the Barbaric half of the human race.

In Col 3¹¹ St. Paul speaks of 'Greek and Jew, . . . barbarian, Scythian.' Yet the Scythians were typical barbarians. But the context proves that St. Paul is not here aiming at a scientific division of the human race. Elsewhere (e.g. Ro 1¹⁴) he adopts the current phraseology: 'I am debtor both to Greeks and to Barbarians,' where the later phrase (v. 16), 'to the Jew first, and also to the Greek,' proves that, like Philo, St. Paul conventionally called his own countrymen barbarians. The barbarous people in Malta (Ac 28²) were probably old Phœnician settlers, and the epithet only means that they were not a Greek-speaking population.

BARBER (בָּרַב, Ezk 5¹ only).—Shaving the head is a very common custom in Eastern countries. In India, many of the religious sects are distinguished by the manner in which the head is shaved. Some leave a tuft of hair on the crown of the head, others a tuft above each ear. In Syria, old men frequently have the whole head shaved and allow the beard to grow. Young men shave the cheeks and the chin, and cut the hair of the head short. The upper lip is never shaved except in S. India, where it is done as a sign of mourning. Absence of the moustache is looked upon, in Syria, as a sign of the want of virility. The barber plies his trade in any convenient place—by the roadside, or in the courtyard of a khan. The ground serves as a seat both for the operator and the person operated on; a tin or copper basin holds the water required; and the hands of the patient, passed over the head or the chin, tell him whether the work has been done satisfactorily or not. The barber also eradicates superfluous hairs from the nose, ears, and other parts of the body; removes accumulations of wax from the ears; and performs the operations of tooth-extraction and blood-letting.

BARCHUS (B Βαρχός, A Βαρχοῦε, AV Charchus, 1 Es 5³²) = BARKOS, Ezr 2⁵³, Neh 7⁵⁵. The AV form is taken from the Aldine ed. (Χαρκός).

BARIAH (בָּרִיָּה 'fleeing').—A son of Shemaiah (1 Ch 3²²). See GENEALOGY.

BARJESUS (Βαρῆσου), a man described in Ac 13⁶ as 'magian, prophet of lies, Jew,' whom Paul and Barnabas, travelling in Cyprus, found in the train of the proconsul Sergius Paulus, as one of the amici or comites who always accompanied a Rom. governor. In Jos. Ant. xx. vii. 2 we find a similar case: Simon, 'a Jew, by birth a Cypriot, and pretending to be a magian' (observe the striking, though not exact, similarity of the triplet), was one of the 'friends' of Felix, the procurator of Judæa, and was used by him to seduce Drusilla from her husband Azizus, king of Emesa. Such men, probably Bab. Jews, 'skilled in the lore and uncanny arts and strange powers of the Median priests' (cf. Mt 27¹⁶),—not simply sorcerers and fortune-tellers, but 'men of science,' as they would now be called (being then beyond their age in acquaintance with the powers and processes of nature), and not mere isolated self-constituted pretenders, but representatives of an Oriental system and religion,—appear to have been numerous at that period, and to have exerted considerable influence on the Rom. world. It was with a system, therefore, rather than with a man, that the representatives of the system ('the way') of Christ, also struggling for influence in the Rom. empire, came here into conflict. The proconsul, 'a man of practical ability' (συνερός), interested, we may suppose, in nature and philosophy, but, as συνερός, not to be thought of as under ascendancy, enjoyed the society of this man. But, hearing that there were just now two travelling teachers in Cyprus, and taking them to be of the class that went about giving demonstrations in rhetoric and moral philosophy, and sometimes ended by settling down as professors in the great universities, he invited, or 'commanded,' their presence at his court. The exposition of Christianity then given by Paul and Barnabas clearly produced upon Sergius Paulus a considerable impression; for Barjesus found it necessary to oppose them openly, and divert the proconsul from the faith by 'perverting the ways of the Lord,' lest he should be supplanted in his position, his power and his gains; because (according to the apt and interesting expansion of the Codex Bezae) the proconsul 'was listening with much pleasure to them.' Then 'Saul, who was also Paul,'—i.e. standing forth (for the first time in the narrative), suitably to the occasion, as a Rom. citizen named Paul,—faced the wonder-worker in a manner, so to say, after his own kind, yet surpassing it, and wrought a wonder upon the worker himself, proving to the proconsul, already deeply impressed, that behind Paul stood a divine power.

In ver. 8 the phrase 'Elymas, the magician, for so is his name translated,' is somewhat perplexing. It certainly looks, at the outset, as though Elymas (now first introduced as a second appellation of Barjesus) ought to be a tr. of that name; but this cannot be. Elymas—which is the Gr. form either of an Aram. word alimā=strong, or, as is more probable, of an Arab. word alim, wise (cf. the Arab. plural ulema, the order of the learned, and the 'wise men' and 'wise women' of our folklore)—is here more reasonably (though this solution of the difficulty is not quite satisfactory) tr. by μάγος. Codex D (Bezae), with its Latin d, alone differs from other uncials, and reads 'Ερωμάς, son of the ready, a reading strangely accepted by Klostermann, Blass, and Ramsay (to whose St. Paul the Traveller this article is under special obligation; see pp. 73 ff.). But neither will this do as a synonym for Barjesus, or for the Syr. Barshemā, son of the Name (i.e. Jesus). The origin of the variant 'Ερωμάς is a mystery; perhaps it was itacism, oi = u. But the versional and patristic variants for Barjesus, such as Bariesouan (or -am), Bariesubam, and Barieue (maleficus, Jerome), appear to be due to a desire of copyists to avoid associating the name of Jesus with one whom St. Paul calls son of the devil.

BARKOS (בָּרְכֻס, cf. Bab. Barkûsu).—Ancestor of certain Nethinim who returned with Zerub. (Ezr 2⁶³, Neh 7⁶⁰=Barchus, 1 Es 5²²). See GENEALOGY.

BARLEY (בָּרֵיב sè'ôrâh, κριθή, hordeum).—Barley (Arab. sha'ir) is a well-known grain, of which several varieties are cultivated, Hordeum distichum, H. tetrastichum, and H. hexastichum, the wild originals of which are not known. One of the wild species of the genus Hordeum in Pal., however, approaches the cultivated species near enough to make it possible that it may be the stock, or a partial reversion of cultivated barley to type. It is H. ithaburense, Boiss (H. spontaneum, Koch), which grows abundantly in Galilee, in the region of Merj' Ayûn, and in places in the Syrian desert between Palmyra and Hamath. It differs from H. distichum by the smaller size of its spikes and grains, and the great length of its awns, which are sometimes a foot long.

Barley is cultivated everywhere in Palestine, principally as provender for horses (1 K 4²⁸) and asses. It takes the place of oats in Europe and America, as the cut straw of barley and wheat takes the place of hay. It is also used among the poor for bread, as in ancient times (Jg 7¹³, 2 K 4⁴², Jn 6^{9, 13}, and cakes Ezk 4¹²). It was mixed with other cheap grains for the same purpose (Ezk 4⁹). When any one wishes to express the extremity of his poverty, he will say, 'I have not barley bread to eat.' This fact illustrates several allusions to barley in Scripture. Barley meal was the jealousy offering (Nu 5¹⁵); it is mentioned by Ezekiel as the fee paid to false prophetesses by people who consulted them (Ezk 13¹⁹); it was the symbol of the poverty of Gideon's family, and his own low estate in that family; by a 'barley cake' Midian's great host was to be overthrown (Jg 7¹³).

The barley harvest begins in April in the depth of the Jordan Valley, and continues to be later as we ascend to the higher mountains, till, at an altitude of 6500 ft., it takes place in July and August. It was probably the time of the barley harvest when the Israelites crossed the Jordan (Jos 3¹⁵). It is earlier than the wheat harvest (Ex 9^{21, 32}). The barley harvest was a recognised date (Ru 1²², 2 S 21^{9, 10}), varying, of course, with the altitude. Barley is sown in Oct. and Nov. That which is sown in the districts below the frost level continues to grow through the rainy season till the harvest. That which is sown on the high mountain levels springs up, the top dies under the snow, and then the biennial stalk springs up when the snow melts, and grows with great rapidity and vigour. Barley is not sown in the spring in Pal. and Syria.

BARNABAS (Βαρνάβας, בְּרִנְיָבָא 'the son of exhortation').—A name given by the disciples to Joseph, a Levite of Cyprus (Ac 4³⁶). He is clearly to be distinguished from 'Joseph called Barsabbas' (Ac 1²³), though there is ancient authority for identifying him with one of the seventy disciples of our Lord (Euseb. HE i. 12; Clem. Alex. Misc. ii. 20). When we first hear of B., it is as selling a field,—for the old Mosaic enactments forbidding Levites to possess land (Nu 18^{20, 23}, Dt 10⁹) had long since fallen into abeyance (see Jer 32⁷),—and laying the price at the apostles' feet (Ac 4^{36, 37}). The general esteem in which he was held is proved by the influence which he exerted in commending the young convert Saul to the apostles at Jerus. (Ac 9²⁷). The way in which the two are introduced inclines one to the belief that B. and Saul must have met before—a belief which is rendered the more probable by the near proximity of Cyprus to Tarsus, and the natural wish of B. as a Hellenist to visit the university there. In any case, B. seems from the first to have formed a high idea of Saul's ability and energy; for when despatched to Antioch on a delicate mission, he had no sooner discovered the growing capabilities of the work there than he 'went forth to Tarsus to seek for Saul'; and when he had brought him to Antioch, 'for a whole year they were gathered together with the Church, and taught much people' (Ac 11^{25, 26}, A.D. 42). 'Thus, twice over, did B. save Saul for the work of Christianity' (Farrar). A practical proof of the success of their joint labours was afforded by the relief which the Church at Antioch despatched by their hands to the elders at Jerus. on the prophetic intimation of a coming famine (Ac 11²⁷⁻³⁰). On their return to Antioch the two friends were, at the bidding of the Holy Ghost, solemnly separated and ordained for the work of the Church (Ac 13^{2, 3}); and from this time, though not of the number of the twelve, they enjoyed the title of apostle (Ac 14¹⁴. On the significance of the title, see Lightfoot, Gal. 92 ff. and art. APOSTLE). Accordingly, B. accompanied Saul (or, as he was now to be known, Paul) on his first missionary journey, visiting first of all his native Cyprus (A.D. 45). Later at Lystra, perhaps from his tall and venerable appearance, he was identified with Jupiter, while Paul, as the chief speaker, passed for Mercury (Ac 14¹²). The journey ended, as it had begun, at Antioch, and from this city B. once more accompanied Paul and certain other brethren to Jerus. to consult with the apostles and elders regarding the necessity of circumcision for Gentile converts (Ac 15¹⁷). It is remarkable that in this narrative B. is mentioned before Paul (v. 12), contrary to the usual order of the names since Ac 13⁴⁵ (cf. however Ac 14¹⁴). He may perhaps have spoken first as the better-known of the two, and also as the one to whom the judaizing section of the assembly would take less exception. After the conference the two apostles returned to their old task of teaching and preaching in Antioch (Ac 15³⁵), and in A.D. 49 planned a second missionary journey to revisit the scenes of their former labours (Ac 15³⁶). But they were unable to agree upon taking with them John Mark, who had formerly deserted them, and the contention was so sharp 'that they parted asunder one from the other.' B. took Mark, who was his cousin, and sailed to Cyprus; while Paul chose Silas, and journeyed through Syria and Cilicia. From the fact of Paul's being specially 'commended by the brethren to the grace of God,' it would seem as if the general feeling of the Church were on his side rather than on the side of Barnabas. B. is not again mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles; but from the respect and sympathy with which St. Paul subsequently refers to him in his Epp. (1 Co 9⁶, Gal 2¹³ 'even Barnabas,' Col 4¹⁰), we are entitled to infer that though they did not again actually work together, the old friendship was not forgotten. There is no hist. ground for identifying B., as some are inclined to do, with 'the brother' whom St. Paul sent on a mission to the Corinthians (2 Co 8¹⁸); but from 1 Co 9⁶ we learn that B., like Paul, earned his livelihood by the work of his hands, while Col 4¹⁰ has been taken as proving that by this time (about A.D. 63) B. must have been dead, else Mark would not have rejoined Paul (cf. 2 Ti 4¹¹, 1 P 5¹³). For an account of B.'s further labours and death we are dependent upon untrustworthy tradition.

It is interesting, however, to notice that the authorship of the Ep. to the Hebrews is attributed to B. by Tertullian (see HEBREWS, EPISTLE TO), while there is still extant an Epistle of B. which, acc. to external evidence, is the work of this B., but on internal grounds this conclusion is now generally disputed. (See the arguments briefly stated in Hefele, Patrum Apostolicorum Opera, p. ix ff., and more fully in the same writer's Das Sendschreiben des Apostels Barnabas aufs neue untersucht, übersetzt, und erklärt, Tüb. 1840. Cf. also Lightfoot, The Apostolic Fathers.)

BARODIS (Bapwδελς), 1 Es 5³⁴.—There is no corresponding name in the lists of Ezra and Nehemiah.

BARRENESS.—As parental authority was the germ and mould of patriarchal social life, it followed that to be without offspring was to exist in name only. To have had children and to have lost them was the strongest possible claim upon sympathy. With Jacob it was the crown of sorrow (Gn 42²⁶ 43¹⁴). It was this desolation in its most distressing form which the Lord Jesus met in the funeral procession at Nain (Lk 7¹²).

But to be a wife without motherhood has always been regarded in the East not merely as a matter of regret, but as a reproach, a humiliation that might easily lead to divorce. It is a constant source of embarrassment, as the welfare of the children is a never-omitted subject of inquiry in Oriental salutation. Courtesy sometimes gives the dignity of fatherhood, the name Abu-Abdullah (father-of-Abdullah) to a man advancing in years without children to bear his name. Sarah's sad laughter of despair (Gn 18¹²), Hannah's silent pleading (1 S 1^{10ff.}), Rachel's passionate alternative of children or death (Gn 30¹),—all this and such-like wretchedness of spirit may be found familiarly repeated in the homes of modern Syria (see CHILDREN). The fruitfulness or sterility of land are, much in the same way, regarded as bringing satisfaction or disappointment to man, and as implying the blessing or curse of God (Dt 7¹³, Ps 107^{24ff.}).

BARTACUS (Βάρτακος, Jos. 'Ραβεζάκης, Vulg. Bezaces, O.L. Bezaces, Bezzechus).—The father of Apame, the concubine of Darius (1 Es 4²⁹). The epithet attaching to him, 'the illustrious' (ὁ θαυμαστός), was probably an official title. The name Bartacus (which appears as βάρτακος in the Syriac) recalls that of Artachæas (Ἀρταχάης), mentioned by Herod. (vii. 22. 117) as a person of high position in the Persian army of Xerxes.

BARTHOLOMEW (Βαρθολομαῖος).—One of the apostles, according to the lists of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and Acts (1¹³). Both by the early Church and in modern times Bartholomew has been generally identified with Nathanael of the Fourth Gospel, although important authorities can be cited in opposition to this view. The strongest arguments in favour of the identification are—(1) that Bartholomew is never mentioned by St. John, nor Nathanael by the Synoptists; (2) that in the lists of the Synoptists, Bartholomew is coupled with Philip, which tallies with St. John's statement that it was Philip that brought Nathanael to Jesus. It is easy to understand how St. John, with his fondness for symbolism, should have preferred the name Nathanael (=God has given it) to the mere patronymic Bartholomew (=son of Talmai). Supposing the identity established, we know nothing of Nathanael Bar-Talmai further than is recorded in Jn 1⁴⁵⁻⁵¹ 21² (see NATHANAEL). The traditions as to his preaching the gospel in India and his martyrdom are entitled to no credit.

BARTIMÆUS (Βαρτιμαῖος, i.e. the son of Timæus, a name variously derived from the Gr. τιμαῖος, honourable; or from the Arab. azamm, blind; or from Aram. zamyā, unclean, polluted).—One of two blind beggars healed by our Lord at the gate of Jericho, and whose name alone is given, apparently from his having been the spokesman (Mk 10⁴⁶⁻⁵², cf. Mt 20²⁹⁻³⁴, Lk 18³⁵⁻⁴³). St. Luke speaks of the healing as taking place as Jesus came nigh unto Jericho, while St. Matt. and St. Mark say that it was as He went out. Various explanations have been offered, as that one blind man was healed at the entrance to old Jericho, and the other, B., as Jesus left the new town which had sprung up at some little distance from it. Perhaps what actually happened was that B., begging at the gate of Jericho, was told that Jesus with His company had entered the city, and having heard of His power, sought out a blind companion, along with whom he intercepted Jesus as He left the city the next day, and then was healed (so substantially Bengel, Stier, Trench, Ellicott, Wordsworth, McClellan). If this be so, we have fresh evidence of the persistence of purpose which throughout the incident B. displayed; while the strong faith which led him to address Jesus by His Messianic title, 'Thou Son of David,' ought not to pass unnoticed.

BARUCH (ברוך 'blessed'), son of Neriah, was of a very illustrious family (Jos. Ant. x. ix. 1), his brother Seraiah being chief chamberlain (שר כניסה) to Zedekiah (Jer 51⁵⁹). His chief honour, however, lay in his being the devoted friend and secretary of the prophet Jeremiah. Every great soul has, in degree, its Gethsemane: and this event came to Baruch (Jer 45) while writing (LXX ἔγραψεν) at Jeremiah's dictation a number of minatory prophecies against Jerusalem, which he was charged to read on a fast day in the courts of the temple (Jer 36¹⁻⁹). The stern words, 'Seekest thou great things for thyself? Seek them not,' braced the young nobleman to 'drink the cup'—to face the wrathful multitude, and to read the prophecies of desolation and woe, which king Jehoiakim afterwards burned (Jer 36²⁶). We next find Baruch (Jer 32) as witness to the purchase by Jeremiah of a field in Anathoth, at a time when the prophet was in prison and the Chaldeans had been for months besieging Jerusalem. When the city fell during the following year, B.C. 586, Baruch resided with the prophet at Maspitha (Jos. Ant. x. ix. 1). But after the murder of Gedaliah by Ishmael, the people, afraid of the wrath of the Chaldeans, and imputing the advice of Jeremiah to remain in Judæa (Jer 42) to the undue influence of Baruch over him (Jer 43²), compelled both of them to go with them to Egypt (Jer 43⁴⁻⁷). How long he resided in Egypt is uncertain. Jerome gives as the Heb. tradition that he and Jeremiah died there almost at once (Comment. in Is. xxx. 6, 7). Josephus implies that they were both taken to Babylon by Nebuchadrezzar after he had conquered Egypt, B.C. 583 (Ant. x. ix. 7). Another tradition states that he remained in Egypt till the death of Jeremiah, and then went to Babylon, where he died twelve years after the fall of Jerusalem (Hitzig on Nah 3⁸⁻¹¹). With strange disregard of chronology, Midrash rabba on Ca 5^o speaks of Baruch as teacher of Ezra in B.C. 458, and thus as forming the link of connexion between the prophets and the scribes.

BARUCH, APOCALYPSE OF.—The discovery of the long lost Apocalypse of Baruch is due to Ceriani. This book has survived only in the Syr. version, of which Ceriani had the good fortune to discover a 6th cent. MS in the Milan Library. Of this MS he published a Latin tr. in 1866 (Mon. Sacr. i. ii. 73-98), which Fritzsche reproduced with some changes in 1871 (Libri Apocryphi V.T. pp. 654-699). The Syr. text appeared in 1871 (Mon. Sacr. v. ii. 113-180), and a photo-lithographical facsimile of the MS in 1883. A fragment of this book has long been known to the world, viz. chs. lxxviii.-lxxxvii., which constitute Baruch's Epistle to the nine and a half tribes that had been carried away captive. This letter is to be found in the London and Paris Polyglots in Syr. with a Latin rendering; in Syr. alone in Lagarde's Libri V.T. Apocryphi Syriace, 1861. The Latin tr. is also found in Fabricius' Cod. Pseudepig. V.T., and the English in Whiston's Authentic Records.

i. THE SYRIAC VERSION IS DERIVED FROM THE GREEK.—That this is so is to be inferred on various grounds. First, this statement is actually made on the Syr. MS. In the next place, we find that Gr. words are occasionally transliterated. Finally, some passages admit of explanation only on the hypothesis that the wrong alternative meanings of certain Gr. words were followed by the translator.

ii. THE GREEK VERSION WAS DERIVED FROM THE HEBREW.—For (1) the quotations from OT agree in all cases but one with the Massoretic text against the LXX. (2) Unintelligible expressions in the Syriac can be explained and the text restored by retrans. into Hebrew. (3) Certain anomalies in the Syriac can be accounted for as survivals of Heb. idiom. (4) Many paronomasiae discover themselves on retrans. into Hebrew. (This and all other questions affecting our Apoc. are fully dealt with in Charles' Apoc. of Baruch, 1896.)

iii. ANALYSIS OF THE BOOK.—The author, or rather authors, of this book write in the name of Baruch, the son of Neriah, for literary purposes. The scene is laid in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, and the time embraces the period immediately preceding and subsequent to the capture of the city by the Chaldeans. Baruch speaks throughout in the first person. He begins by declaring that in the twenty-fifth year of Jeconiah, king of Judah, the word of the Lord came unto him. It is noteworthy that the book thus opens with a gross chronological error; for Jeconiah reigned in reality only three months, and had been already eleven years a captive in Babylon before the fall of Jerusalem. If we include in our consideration the letter to the tribes in the Captivity, the book naturally falls into seven sections, divided in all but the last case by fasts, the fasts being of seven days in all instances save the first. This artificial division is due to the final editor of the book. The grounds for regarding the work as composite will be given later.

The first section (1-5) opens with God's condemnation of the wickedness of the kingdom of Judah, and the announcement of the coming destruction of Jerusalem for a time and the captivity of its people. But Jeremiah and those who are like him are bidden to retire, first because 'their works are to the city as a firm pillar, and their prayers as a strong wall' (2). Baruch thereupon asks what will be the future destinies of Israel, mankind, and the world. Will Israel no longer exist, mankind cease to be, and the world return to its primeval silence (3)? God replies that the city and people will be chastised only for a time (4¹); that the city of which it was said, 'On the palm of my hands have I written thee,' is not the earthly but the heavenly Jerusalem prepared aforetime in heaven, and already manifested in vision to Adam, Abraham, and Moses (4²⁻⁷). Baruch replies that the enemy will destroy Zion or pollute the sanctuary, and boast thereof before their idols. Not so, God rejoins: the enemy will not overthrow Zion nor burn Jerusalem, and thou thyself wilt witness this. Baruch thereupon fasts till the evening (5). In the next section (6-9) the Chaldeans encompass Jerusalem on the following day. It is not they, however, but angels who overthrow the walls, having first hidden the sacred vessels of the temple in the earth till the last times. The Chaldeans then enter and carry the people away captive. Jerusalem is delivered up for a time. Baruch fasts seven days. In the third section (10-12) Jeremiah is bidden to accompany captive Judah to Babylon, and Baruch to remain in Jerusalem to receive disclosures on the things that should be hereafter. Baruch now despairs of all things: 'Blessed is he who was not born, or, being born, has died.' Let nature henceforth withhold her increase, and the joy of the bridegroom and the bride be no more. 'Wherefore should woman bear in pain and bury in grief?' Let the priests, moreover, return to God the temple keys, confessing: 'We have been found false stewards.' 'Oh that there were ears unto thee, O earth, and a heart unto thee, O dust, and go and announce in Sheol, and say to the dead: "Blessed are ye more than are we the living."' Baruch then fasts seven days. In section four (13-21¹) Baruch is told that he 'will be preserved till the consummation of the times' to bear testimony. When Baruch complains of the prosperity of the wicked and the sufferings of the righteous, God declares that it is the future world that is made on account of the righteous, and that blessedness standeth, not in length of days, but in their quality and end. Baruch fasts seven days. In the fifth section (21²-47) Baruch deplores the vanity and vexation of this life: 'If there were this life only . . . nothing could be more bitter'; he supplicates God to bring about the promised consummation, 'that his strength might become known to those who esteem his long-suffering weakness.' In answer thereto God reproves him for his trouble over that which he knows not, and his intrusion into things in which he has no part, and declares that until the preordained number of souls is born, the end, though at hand, cannot yet be: nevertheless, 'My coming redemption . . . is not far distant as aforesaid; for, lo! the days come when the books will be opened in which are written the sins of all those who have sinned, and again also the treasures into which the righteousness of all those who are justified in creation is gathered.' Furthermore, when Baruch asks regarding the nature and duration of the punishment of the wicked, it is revealed that the coming time will be one of tribulation, divided into twelve parts, at the close of which the Messiah will be revealed (29-30). Thereupon Baruch summons a meeting of the elders into the valley of Kidron, and announces the coming glories of Zion. Soon after follows his vision of the cedar and the vine, by which the destinies of Rome and the triumph of the Messiah are respectively symbolised (36-40). The Messiah will rule till this world of corruption is at an end. When Baruch asks who shall share in the future blessedness, the answer is: 'Those who have believed.' Thereupon Baruch (44-47) summons his eldest son, his friends, and seven of the elders, and acquaints them with his approaching end. He exhorts them to keep the law; to teach the people; for such teaching will give them life, and 'a wise man shall not be wanting to Israel, nor a son of the law to the race of Jacob.' After another fast of seven days, Baruch, in the sixth section (48-76), prays on behalf of Israel. Then follows a revelation of the coming woes, and Baruch's lamentation over Adam's fall and its sad effects (48). Baruch, in answer to his prayer, is instructed as to the nature of the resurrection bodies (52). Then follows an account of the cloud vision (53-74). In this vision Baruch sees a cloud ascending from the sea and covering the whole earth. And it was full of black and clear waters, and a mass of lightning appeared on its summit. And it began to discharge first black and then bright waters, and again black and then bright waters, and so on for twelve times in succession. And finally it rained black waters, darker than all that had been before. And after this the lightning flashed forth, and healed the earth where the last waters had fallen, and twelve streams came up from the sea and became subject to that lightning (53). In the subsequent chapters the interpretation is given. The cloud is the world, and the twelve successive discharges of black and bright waters symbolise twelve evil and good periods in the history of the world. The eleventh period, symbolised by the dark waters, referred to the capture of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, and the twelfth, bright waters, to the renewed prosperity of Israel and the rebuilding of Jerusalem (54-68). The last black waters pointed to wars, earthquakes, fires, famines; and such as escaped these were to be slain by the Messiah. But these last black waters were to be followed by clear, which symbolised the blessedness of the Messianic kingdom which should form the intervening period between corruption and incorruption

(69-74). Baruch then expresses his wonder over God's wisdom and mercy, and receives a fresh revelation as to his coming departure from the earth. First, however, he is to summon the people together and instruct them (75-76). This Baruch does, and admonishes the people to be faithful; for though teacher and prophet may pass away, yet the law ever standeth. At the request of the people Baruch writes two epistles—one to their brethren in Babylon, and the other to the tribes beyond the Euphrates. The latter is given in 78-87, but the former is lost.

iv. DIFFERENT ELEMENTS IN THE BOOK, AND THEIR DATES.—This question cannot be discussed here save in the briefest manner; but no treatment of the book is adequate without some consideration of it. Till 1891 this book was taken to be the work of one author. In that year, however, Kabisch, in an article entitled, 'Die Quellen der Apokalypse Baruchs' (Jahrbücher f. protestantische Theologie, 1891, pp. 66-107), showed on several grounds that the book is sprung from at least three or four authors. Thus he distinguishes 1-23, 31²-35, 41-52, 77-87 as the groundwork written subsequent to A. D. 70, since the destruction of the temple is implied throughout these chapters. Further, these sections are marked by a boundless world-despair which, looking for nothing of peace or happiness in this corruptible world, fixes its regard on the afterworld of incorruption. In the remaining sections of the book, however, there is a faith in Israel's ultimate triumph here, and an optimism which looks to an earthly Messianic kingdom of sensuous delights. In these sections, moreover, the integrity of Jerusalem is throughout assumed. Kabisch, therefore, rightly takes these constituents of the book to be prior to A. D. 70. These sections, however, are not the work of one writer, but of three, two of them being un mutilated productions, i.e. the Vine and Cedar Vision, 36-40, and the Cloud Vision, 53-74, but the third a fragmentary Apocalypse, 24²-29. From the bulk of this criticism there is no ground for variance. By independent study, and frequently on different grounds, I have arrived at several of Kabisch's conclusions. Other parts of his theory, however, call for modification. As the result of an exhaustive study of the book, I offer the following analysis, for the grounds of which the reader must refer to my recent book, The Apocalypse of Baruch. The main part of the book was written after the fall of Jerusalem, i.e. 1-26, 31-35, 41-52, 75-87. All these chapters are derived from one writer, save 1-8, 44¹⁻⁷, 77-87. These must be discriminated from the rest, as their diction and their outlook as to the future of Jerusalem differ from those adopted in the rest of these chapters. The rest of the book was written prior to the fall of Jerusalem. It consists of the two visions mentioned above, i.e. 36-40 and 53-74, and a fragmentary Apocalypse, 27-30. Jewish religious thought busied itself mainly with two subjects, the Messianic Hope and the Law, and, in proportion as the one was emphasized, the other fell into the background. It is noteworthy that the parts of this book written prior to the fall of Jerusalem are mainly Messianic, and only mention the law incidentally, whereas in the sections written after its fall all the thought and the hopes of the writers centre in the law, and the law alone. Moreover, whereas the earlier sections are optimistic as regards the destinies of Jerusalem, the later are permeated with the spirit of an infinite despair. The different elements of the book were combined not earlier than A. D. 100, and not later than A. D. 130. The grounds for this determination cannot be given here. It should be observed that a portion of the short Apocalypse, 27-30, is quoted by Papias, and attributed by him to our Lord. See Irenæus, Adv. Hær. v. 33. 3.

v. AUTHORSHIP.—All the writers from whom this book is derived were Pharisees. They all agree in teaching the doctrine of works. Jeremiah's works are a strong tower to the city, 2²; the righteous have no fear by reason of their good works, 14⁷; they are justified thereby, 21⁹ 24¹⁻² 51⁷; they trusted in their works, and therefore God heard them, 63⁵ 85²; righteousness is by the law, 67⁶.

Again, as regards the law, the teaching is likewise Pharisaic. It was given to Israel, 17³ 19³ 59² 77³; the one law was given by One, 48²⁴; it will protect those who receive it, 32¹, and requite those who transgress it, 48⁴⁷; so long as Israel observes the law it cannot fall, 48²²; God's law is life, 38². Again, the carnal sensuous nature of the Messiah and His kingdom, which are described only in the earlier portions, 28-30, 39⁷⁻⁴⁰, 72-74, is essentially Pharisaic. The future world is created on behalf of Israel, according to one of the later writers, 15⁷; according to the earlier writers the present world was ultimately for Israel, and their enemies would suffer destruction, 27, 40, 72.

vi. RELATION TO 4 EZRA (2 ESDRAS).—The affinities of this book with 4 Ezr are both striking and numerous. (1) They have one and the same object—to deplore Israel's present calamities and to awake hope either of the coming Messianic kingdom on earth, or of the bliss of the righteous in the world to come. (2) In both, the speaker is a notable figure in the time of the Babylonian Captivity. (3) In both there is a sevenfold division of the work, and an interval (generally of seven days) between each division; and as in the one Ezra devotes forty days to the restoration of the Scriptures, in the other Baruch is bidden to spend forty days in teaching Israel before his departure from the earth. (4) They have many doctrinal peculiarities in common: man is saved by his works, 2 Es [6⁵⁰] 8³³ 9⁷, Apoc Bar 2² 14²² etc.; the world was created on behalf of Israel, 2 Es 6⁵⁵ 7¹¹ 9³, Apoc Bar 14¹⁹ 15⁷; man came not into the world of his own will, 2 Es 8⁵, Apoc Bar 14¹¹ 48¹³; a predetermined number of men must be born before the end, 2 Es 4³⁶⁻³⁷, Apoc Bar 23⁴⁻⁵; Adam's sin was the cause of physical death, 2 Es 3⁷, Apoc Bar 23⁴; the souls of the good are kept safe in treasures till the resurrection, 2 Es 4³⁵⁻⁴¹ 7³² [6⁵⁴⁻⁶⁰], Apoc Bar 30². But the points of disagreement are just as clearly marked. In 2 Es the Messianic reign is limited to 400 years, 7²⁸⁻²⁹, whereas in Baruch this period is indeterminate. Again, in 2 Es the Messiah is to die, 7²⁹, and His reign to close with the death of all living things; whereas according to Apoc Bar 30¹ the Messiah is to return in glory to heaven at the close of His reign, and according to 73, 74 this reign is to be an eternal one. Again, in 2 Es the writer urges that God's people should be punished by God's own hands and not by the hands of their enemies, 5²⁹⁻³⁰; for these have overthrown the altar and destroyed the temple, 10²¹⁻²²; but in Baruch it is told how angels removed the holy vessels and demolished the walls of Jerusalem before the enemy drew nigh, 6-8. On the question of original sin, likewise, these two books are at variance. While in 2 Es the entire stream of physical and ethical death is traced to Adam, 37²¹⁻²² 4³⁰ 7⁴⁸, and the guilt of his descendants minimised at the cost of their first parent (yet see 8⁵³⁻⁶⁰), Baruch derives physical death indeed from Adam's transgression, 17³ 23¹ 54¹⁵, but as to ethical death declares that 'each man is the Adam of his own soul,' 54¹⁹ (yet see 48¹²).

BARUCH, BOOK OF.—One of the deutero-canonical books of OT found in LXX between Jer and La, in the Lat. Vulg. after La, and in the Syr. as the second Letter of Baruch—the first Letter having been recently ascertained to be part of the Apoc. of Baruch (wh. see). The book claims to have been written by Baruch, the friend and secretary of Jeremiah; but in reality it consists of four portions so distinct that they have probably come from four different authors.

11-14. Historical preface, giving a description of the origin and purpose of the book.

15-38. A confession of the sins which led to the Captivity, and a prayer for restoration to divine favour, largely in Deuteronomic phraseology.

39-44. A panegyric on Wisdom, and an identification of Wisdom with Torah, after the manner of the later Hekhmie school.

45-59. Consolation and encouragement to the exiles, with such rich personification as to recall some of the most poetical passages in Deutero-Isaiah.

We will describe and comment on these parts in the order in which we conceive that they came into existence.

i. The second section, 1⁵-3⁸, will thus claim our first consideration, and it may be subdivided into two parts—

(1) 1⁵-2². This we designate AN ANCIENT FORM OF CONFESSION OF SIN USED BY THE PAL. REMNANT. It professes to have been sent from Babylon to Jerus., to be read in the house of God 'on the day of the feast and on the days of solemn assembly' (1¹⁴ RV). It opens with words found also Dn 9⁷ 'To the Lord our God belongeth righteousness, but to us confusion . . . to the men of Judah and to the inhabitants of Jerus.:' and its restricted design for the use of the home remnant is intimated in the non-occurrence of the words of Dn 'and to all Isr. that are near and that are afar off,' etc.; as well as by the words Bar 2⁴⁻⁵, 'He hath given them to be in subjection to all the kingdoms that are round about us . . . where the Lord has scattered them: and they have become "beneath and not above," because we sinned.' The confession of sins is national, embracing the whole period from the Exodus, and recognising in the Exile the righteous fulfilment of repeated warnings.

(2) 2⁴-3⁸. THE EXILES' CONFESSION, 2⁶⁻¹³, AND PRAYER, 2¹⁴⁻³⁸. The confession of the exiles opens as the above (cf. also Dn 9⁷) with the words, 'To the Lord our God belongeth righteousness,' etc., but the suppliants do not describe themselves as 'men of Judah.' Indeed we would submit—though it seems to have escaped notice hitherto—that this penitential prayer was not meant for the same persons as the foregoing. This is evident from 2¹³ 'We are left a few among the nations where thou hast scattered us' (contrast this with 2⁴ 'The Lord hath scattered them'), v. 1⁴ 'Give us favour before those who have led us captive.' So also vv. 2⁹⁻³⁰. Further, the confession, 2⁶⁻¹³, is little more than a repetition in different order of phrases found in 1¹⁵⁻²⁵; only, that in the second confession the suppliants do not (as we have seen) identify themselves with Judah; and the divine threat realised in their experience is captivity, 2⁷⁻¹⁵; whereas, in the first confession, it was that they had eaten the flesh of their children, 2¹⁻³. At 2¹³ the confession turns to prayer for pardon and blessing, pleading the divine election of Isr., the divine compassion and the divine glory. They acknowledge the error of not obeying the warnings of Jer (7³⁴ 8² 27¹¹ 29⁵⁻²³) to be submissive to the king of Babylon, and regard that as the cause of the national ruin. In 2²⁷ the suppliants admit that to them personally God has manifested 'leniency and compassion.' They quote several passages from Dt (collected Kneucker, p. 30) which threaten divine wrath on their sins, but which also promise that if in captivity they repent, God will renew His covenant, and restore them. They virtually express their faithful allegiance, and claim the promises.

Ch. 3¹⁻⁸ is regarded by Bertholdt and Reusch as a separate psalm; but, as shown by Kneucker (p. 263) and Gifford (in Speaker's Apocr. ii. 267), the links of connexion between this portion and the foregoing are beyond dispute. Here the absence of the sense of personal demerit is still more apparent. True they say, 'We have sinned,' but the 'we' denotes the solidarity of Isr.; for in 3⁴ they say 'Hear the prayer of the sons of those who sinned against Thee, for they were disobedient, and the evils cleave to us.' 'We have put away from our hearts every iniquity of our fathers who sinned against Thee.' 'Lo! we are to-day in our captivity,' 3⁸.

Date of Composition.—The foregoing analysis helps materially in this decision. First, it shows Reusch, Welte, and other Romanists to be mistaken in claiming that 1¹⁵⁻³⁸ is the work of the historical Baruch in B.C. 583: for (a) if so, there would be in the suppliants the sense of personal demerit; and (b) their description of themselves as 'sons of those who sinned' would be quite out of place. Again, our analysis serves to render still more untenable the theory of Hitzig, Kneucker, Schürer, and some recent English writers, that our section was composed after the destruction of Jerus. by Titus. (1) We would ask, Could the Jews of A.D. 80 acquit themselves of personal blame? and could they speak of themselves as the unfortunate sons of the real culprits? (2) In 2⁷ we have the same hopeless view of death as appears in Ps 6⁵ and Is 38¹⁸. As Reuss says, it indicates 'a time when the belief in a resurrection did not yet exist.' (3) There is in the section before us no clear indication that Jerus. and the temple were at the time in ruins. The only allusion to the state of Jerus. is in 2²⁶ 'Thou hast made (ἐθηκας) thy house as it is this day,' but this may refer to a low condition or desecration of the temple. Had the city been in ruins, surely the poignant grief of the patriotic Jew could not have failed to express itself. (4) There is a very close resemblance between Bar 1¹⁵⁻²¹² and Dn 9⁴⁻¹⁹; in fact there are only three important variations, and these all refer to the condition of Jerusalem. Daniel's prayer is stated to have been uttered in the first year of Darius, at the close of the Captivity, and three times the desolate state of Jerus. is referred to, Dn 9^{16, 17, 18}; but in Bar all are omitted. On any theory as to the relative priority of Dn and Bar this is significant; but on Schürer's theory it amounts to this, that a man writing about A.D. 80, while slavishly imitating Dn 9, abruptly and intentionally selects for omission those parts only which refer to the desolate sanctuary. This we consider highly improbable.

We are thus drawn to the theory of Ewald, who assigns our section to the times after the conquest of Jerus. by Ptolemy I. in B.C. 320 (Die Jüngsten Propheten, 269), or of Reuss, who assigns it to the times of the first Ptolemies. Its origin may be even earlier. At all events there does not seem valid reason, with Fritzsche, to assign our section to the Maccab. period (Hb. z. d. Apocr. i. 173) on the ground of its dependence on Dn 9. The dependence is by no means self-evident. But if it were so, and if the Book of Dn in its present form be late, this does not preclude the use of pre-existent materials; and it is surely conceivable that in Dn 9 we have an ancient form of prayer traditionally associated with the name of Daniel, as the confession and prayer before us were associated with the name of Baruch. Bissell (Lange's Apocr. 417) and Gifford (Speaker's Apocr. 250) are also in favour of the early authorship of our section.

Original Language.—It is highly probable that 1¹⁵⁻³⁸ was first composed in Heb.; though the Gr. text and VSS that have been tr. from the Gr. are all that survive. The very fact that the two prayers were designed for religious assemblies—the former one for the temple—is strong presumptive proof of Heb. authorship (so Bissell, 417). In the margin of the Milan MS of the Syr. Hexap. text these words occur on 1¹⁷ and 2²: 'This is not in the Heb.' (Zöckler blunders twice in stating this.) But, apart from this, the linguistic evidence alone seems conclusive.

1. There are cases in which an awkward word in the Gr. can be shown to possess one of two meanings of a Heb. word, and the other meaning is that required by the context—

1 ²² ἐργάζεσθαι, to work,	for serve.	So כָּרַךְ
2 ⁴ ἄβατον, wilderness,	astonishment.	שִׁמְהָ
2 ⁸ ἀνθρωπος, man,	each.	אִישׁ
2 ²³ ἔξωθεν, outside,	streets.	חוּצוֹת
2 ²⁹ βόμβησις, buzzing,	crowd.	קְבוּצָה
1 ⁹ δεσμώτης, prisoner,	locksmith.	קַסָּר

2. Cases in which the unsuitable word suggests its own corrective, if we tr. it into Heb. and substitute different vowels or change one consonant.

1 ¹⁰ μάννα, wrong translit. of	מָנָה.
2 ²⁵ ἀποστόλη = רָךְ for רָךְ	plague.
3 ⁴ τεθνηκότων = תָּקָה	men.
3 ⁸ δφλησιον = אַהֲרָה	astonishment.

3. Cases of slavish imitation of Heb. idiom in violation of the Greek. The word καί occurs 120 times; four times in the sense of 'but,' like Heb. וְ, 2^{24, 27, 30} 3⁸. Then we have οὐ . . . ἐκεῖ = אֵין שָׁמָּה, and οὐ . . . ἐπ' αὐτῶ = עַל־יְצֵאָה. But, to appreciate the full force of the evidence, one has simply to attempt to retranslate the section. The idioms are Hebraistic everywhere. The Heb. seems, as Fritzsche says, to gleam through so plainly that one cannot doubt that the Gr. is a tr. Kneucker has, on the whole, given an admirable rendering of our section into the original Hebrew.

It is a remarkable fact that most of the above awkward renderings occur in the LXX Gr. of Jer. There can be little doubt that he who translated Jer also translated Bar 1¹⁵⁻³⁸, and probably found it in Heb. attached to Jer. (So Westcott in Smith DB.) The Greek of the rest of Baruch is almost certainly from another hand. We have here a further evidence of the antiquity of our section.

ii. THE HISTORICAL INTRODUCTION, 1¹⁻¹⁴.—This is probably from a later author, because of the discrepancies between it and 1¹⁵⁻³⁸. We conceive the matter thus: There were in existence two penitential prayers—one for the remnant, one for the exiles—both associated with the name of Baruch, and the problem was to find a suitable historic origin for them. The solution is: Baruch is in Babylon, and reads a form of confession and prayer, 2²⁻³⁸, to king Jeconiah and the exiles. They listen, weep, and fast, and long that their brethren in Judah should also turn to the Lord. B. writes a confession suited to the Judæans, 1¹⁵⁻²⁵, and the exiles send it to Judah by him. Thus does the would-be historian explain the duality of 1¹⁵⁻³⁸. His historic locus now calls for explanation. The book was written in the 5th year on the 7th of the month, at the time of the year when the Chaldeans took Jerus., i.e. on the fifth anniversary of the first fall of Jerus., B.C. 597—the era from which Jer, Ezk, and Dn reckon. In B.C. 593 Seraiah, brother of Bar., was in Babylon with king Zedekiah (Jer 51⁵⁹). The nature of their mission is uncertain, but it was such as to rouse expectation; for at the same time prophets in Babylon, Jer 27¹⁸, and Hananiah in Judah, Jer 28³, foretold that within two years the sacred vessels would be restored, and Jeconiah and the exiles allowed to return; but Jer.

sternly contradicts this (Jer 29). These are the circumstances, shortly after which our author says that B. composed his book. The effect of the reading of it we have described. In penitence the people send to Joakim the priest—probably the Sagan—money with which to purchase sacrifices and incense to offer on the altar of J'. Thus far there is verisimilitude in the story. Jeconiah might well be present, for the first exiles, 'the good figs,' were treated far more leniently than the second. The hoof of ignorance and late authorship shows itself, however, (1) in the statement that Jerus. was burnt with fire in Jeconiah's reign; (2) that the exiles asked the Judæans to 'pray for Nebuchad. and his son Baltasar.' The monuments show that Belshazzar was the son of Nabonidus, who usurped the throne of Babylon; and though Belshazzar might claim to be 'son' of Nebuchad. to add to his dignity, the title could not be given by one living years before. (3) The restoration of the silver vessels made by Zedekiah after the deportation of Jeconiah (1st 9) is a hopeless tangle. The passage has probably been worked over by a later hand, who conceived of the locus as five years after the final destruction of the city and temple.

iii. A HOKHMIST'S MESSAGE TO THE EXILES, 3rd-4th.—'O Isr. why art thou in the land of thy foes? and grown old in a foreign land?' The reason is, 'Thou hast forsaken the fountain of Wisdom.' Learn where Wisdom is, and there thou wilt find life and joy and peace. But where does Wisdom dwell? Have kings found her in the thickets of the forests hunting the boar? Have birds stored in royal aviaries seen her on high? Have silver-workers mining under the earth seen her? Young men, with vision unbedimmed by sin, can they give no clue? Merchants of Phœnicia and Teman, have they not seen her by sea or land? The heroes of the hoary past,—the giants,—can they help? No. God only knows her abode—the Creator of the beasts, the lightning, and the stars. He has embodied Wisdom in the Law, and given it to Jacob. And in this guise Wisdom appears on the earth and is accessible to man. The eternal Law is Wisdom incarnate. Walk in her light, O Israel! and give not thy glory to another, nor thy advantages to a strange nation.

Date.—Much of this section (3rd-3rd) is a close imitation of Job 28 and 38; yet it possesses as much poetic fervour as an imitation can well do. It has nothing in common with 1st-3rd except the exile. The part which is truly original is 3rd-4th, and therefore here we must seek for the date of composition. Israel is 'God's beloved,' 'having (Ro 2nd) in the Law the form (μὲρφωσις) of knowledge and of truth'; and she is charged not to give her glory to another, nor her advantages (συμφέροντα, cf. Ro 3rd) to a foreign people, but to walk in the light of the law, cf. Bar 4th, Ro 2nd. Evidently, the privileges referred to are spiritual ones; and Kneucker can hardly be incorrect in maintaining that Gentile Christians, the נְיָיִם, are the ἀλλότριον ἔθνος, of whom the rigorous Jew bids his co-religionists beware. There is no reference to recent calamities. Israel has 'grown old in a foreign land.' Therefore I should place this section a few years before, or some years after, the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70.

Original Language.—We would submit that 3rd-4th was first composed in Aramaic. The evidence we offer is based on a comparison of the Greek with the versions—the Peshitta and Syr. Hexapla. When the various readings are tr. into Aramaic we obtain either one Aramaic word with the two desiderated meanings, or two words so nearly alike as easily to be mistaken for one another.

31 ⁶ peoples,	עממא	Pesh. world,	עלמא
18 fabricators,	קייאן	Pesh. who acquire,	קנין
19 disappeared,	אסתרתו	Hex. sinned,	אסתרתו
21 laid hold,	צדו	Hex. cared for,	צדו
23 remembered,	אדכרו	Pesh. trod,	אדרכו
31 meditates on,	כתרעא	Vulg. seeks out,	כתרעא
34 watches,	בככותהון	Pesh. places,	ברוכתהון
37 appeared,	אתגלו	Pesh. was revealed,	אתגלו
43 advantage,	יתרון	Vulg. dignity.	יקרא

It will be observed that the words are uniformly Pal. Aramaic—in some cases peculiar to that dialect. The author, therefore, was of the school of Sirach and not of Philo.

iv. A HELLENIST'S ENCOURAGEMENT FOR THE EXILES, 4th-5th.—This section is clearly divisible into four odes, each commencing with some form of the verb θαπεῖν, and to these is appended a Ps closely related to the 11th of the Ps of Sol. 4th-8 is drawn entirely from the Song of Moses in Dt 32. After this, in a passage of some beauty and originality (4th-10), Jerus. is personified as a woman, narrating her troubles to the neighbours of Zion; then (v. 10th), as if on the eve of captivity, she bids her children shorten their adieux, as she has put on the sack-cloth of prayer. The prayer is not in vain. Joy comes to her from the Holy One (v. 22). The mother (v. 25) again addresses her children, but now in terms of hopefulness, begging them to be patient and intensely prayerful, since the hour of deliverance is at hand. At 4th the author assumes the rôle of the prophet, and foretells the doom of Israel's foes, and then (4th-5th) he announces the future prosperity of Zion in a passage of remarkable beauty, but too closely copied from Ps-Sol 11.

Date.—We unhesitatingly place the composition of this section after the destruction of Jerus. by Titus. Ryle and James have certainly proved the dependence of Bar on the Psalter (Psalms of Sol. lxxii.-lxxvii.); and there is little reason to suspect that it ever existed except in Greek. The Gr. moves so easily and is fairly idiomatic. Its Hebraisms are due to quotations from books themselves tr. from Sem. sources. The fall of the city is still within the memory of the writer; the desolation is complete; its captives have gone forth with wailing and woe. The increasingly joyful tone can hardly have arisen within ten years of the destruction of the city, as Kneucker holds. Hope must again have kindled in the Jewish breast, and possibly the events in the reign of Hadrian, A.D. 118, are those to which the writer looks forward; though all through this interval most of the Jews never doubted that the temple would be rebuilt. The author of 4th-5th was probably the translator of 3rd-4th.

Canonical Standing.—Though there is strong evidence that 1st-3rd was composed in Heb., and some evidence that it once followed Jer in the Canon, it was dropped before the time of Jerome; so that he says (Præf. in Jer), 'nec legitur nec habetur apud Hebræos,' and Epiph. (de mens.) bears the same testimony. In the Gr. of the Apost. Const. v. 20 it is, however, said to be used by the Jews (? of the Dispersion) on the 10th of Gorpiaeus, i.e. on the Day of Atonement. The reference is wanting in the Syr. text, and has no confirmation whatever. Our book is not mentioned by any NT writer or apost. Father, but from Athenagoras (fl. 176) onwards for centuries it is quoted as canonical by almost every Christian writer of eminence. This remark applies especially to 3rd-38 'This is our God. . . . He hath found out the way of knowledge. . . . Afterward did she (i.e. Wisdom) appear on earth and was conversant with men.' Kneucker and Schürer regard v. 38 (EV 37) as a Christian interpolation; but without sufficient reason. The writer personifies Wisdom, and identifies her with the Law; as we see from 4th (which ought never to have been separated by a chapter-division) 'This is the book of the commands of God, even the Law which abides for ever.' Christian writers tenaciously claimed this as a proof-text for the divinity of the Wisdom-Logos, and therefore firmly retained Bar in the Canon. Jerome was the first for two centuries to call its canonicity in question, and hence Bar is wanting in Codex Amiatinus; but his criticisms produced no apparent result on the beliefs of his age.

Reusch, a Romanist commentator, gives an exhaustive account of the citations from Bar by early Christian writers, and devotes an appendix to their explanations of 3²⁶⁻³³. From these citations I compute that, of the 75 verses from 3²⁻⁵⁹, 43 are found, cited as canonical, in the pages of Christian writers.

It is also interesting to note that in every extant List of Canonical Books, Bar either is named or can be proved to be included under Jer—the only doubtful exception being that of Melito. Didymus Alex. †395 distinctly says that Jer and Bar form one book.

From the last quarter of the 2nd cent. to the time of the Reformation, Jerome's is almost the only discordant note in the harmony of universal acceptance in the Christian Church. Wyclif in the preface to his Bible inserted the statement from Jerome, that in OT nothing but the Heb. Canon is of divine authority, but published all the Apocr. Luther and the other Reformers removed Bar from the Canon; but, though Ximenes and Erasmus were both disposed to draw a line of demarcation between canon. and apocr. books, the Council of Trent peremptorily included Bar and the rest of the Apocr. among the sacred books of Scripture.

LITERATURE.—CODICES AND VERSIONS.—Of Gr. uncials Bar is found in A, B, C, otherwise known as iii., ii., xii. The palimpsest T contains 112-23 and 312-48. (See, for description of these MSS, Swete's OT in Gr. iii., Intro.) There are also 22 Gr. cursives, named and classified by Kneucker, pp. 91-97. Further, there are two Lat. VSS, a and b. a is that found in Clementine edd. of the Vulg., of which Vercellone's is perhaps the most accurate. Bar is really the old Lat. unrevised by Jerome, for he himself says 'Librum Baruch . . . prætermisimus.' b is a recension of a, improving its Latinity, altering some of its readings to agree with B, and indulging in explanatory comments (Kneucker 141-163). b was edited by Jos. Caro, Rome, 1688, and by Sabatier in Bibliotheca Casinensis, vol. 1. (1873). There are also two Syr. VSS: (1) The Peshitta, which is most accessible in Lagarde's Libr. Apocr. Syr., and (2) the Syr. -Hexap. My ed. is the one in Ceriani's Mon. sac. et prof. tom. 1. fasc. 1. 1861. Since then, however, the work has been reproduced by photo-lithography. (Swete, op. cit. xiii.)

EXEGETICAL HELPS.—The most thorough comm. is Kneucker's Das Buch Baruch, Leipzig, 1879. Other useful works are: Gifford in Speaker's Apocr. vol. ii.; Bissell in Lange's series; Zöckler, Apok. in the Kgf. Kom. 1891; Ewald, Die jüngsten Propheten, 1868; Fritzsche, Handbuch z. d. Apocr. vol. 1. Leipzig, 1851; Reusch, Erklär. d. Buchs Baruch, Freiburg, 1853; Reuss, AT, vol. vi. 1894; Hävernick, De lib. Bar., Königsberg, 1861. Isagogic material is also to be found in Schürer, HJP ii. iii. 188 f., and Hilgenfeld's Zeitschrift for 1860, where Hitzig deals with Bar, p. 262 ff., Kneucker in 1880, and Hilgenfeld in 1879-80.

BARZILLAI (בָּרְזַי 'man of iron', Βερζελλαι).—1. A wealthy Gileadite of Rogelim, who came to David's aid during his flight from Absalom (2 S 17^{27a}). He refused to accompany the king to Jerusalem on his return, on the plea of his great age and unsuitability for the life of the court, but sent his son Chimham in his stead (19^{31a}). And to him, in gratitude for his father's services, David would seem to have granted a 'lodging place,' or caravanserai for travellers, out of his own patrimony in Bethlehem, which 400 years later still bore his name (Jer 41¹⁷). Dean Stanley even favours the conjecture that, in accordance with the immovable usages of the East, it was probably the same whose stable at the time of the Christian era furnished shelter for two travellers with their infant child, when 'there was no room in the inn' (Hist. of the Jew. Ch. vol. ii. p. 154). Other sons of B. must have followed, if they did not accompany, Chimham over Jordan, and all were specially commended by David, on his deathbed, to the care of Solomon (1 K 2⁷). Of B. himself we hear nothing further beyond the mention, so late as the return from the Captivity in Babylon, of a family of priests who traced their descent to a marriage with the Gileadite's daughter (Ezr 2⁶¹, Neh 7⁶³). 2. A Meholathite whose son Adriel married Michal the daughter of Saul (2 S 21⁸). G. MILLIGAN.

BASALOTH (Α Βααλώθ, Β Βασαλέμ), 1 Es 5²¹.—BAZLUTH, Ezr 2⁵²; BAZLITH, Neh 7⁵⁴.

BASCAMA (ἡ Βασκαμά), 1 Mac 13²³.—An unknown town of Gilead.

BASE (see also ABASE, DEBASE).—The adj. 'base' (from Fr. bas, 'shallow,' 'low,' but prob. of Celtic origin) is used to express—1. That which is literally 'low,' not high, as Spenser, FQ I. v. 31, 'An entrance, dark and base . . . Descends to Hell.' Of this use we still have 'base' of sounds (though we spell it 'bass'); cf. Shaks., 1 Hen. IV. II. iv. 5, 'I have sounded the very base string of humility.' There is no example of this meaning in the Bible. 2. Figuratively, low in the social scale, of lowly birth or station, then unassuming, humble. This is the meaning of b. in AV: Is 3⁹ 'the b. against the honourable' (i.e. the low-born against the nobles); Ezk 17¹⁴ 'that the kingdom might be b., that it might not lift itself up' (Heb. בָּזוּ; so 29^{14, 15}, 2 S 6²², Mal 2⁹, Dn 4¹⁷ 'the most High . . . setteth up . . . the basest of men'); Job 30⁸ 'children of b. men' (בְּנֵי לֵבָיִם, lit. 'sons of no name,' i.e. sons of him who has no name=the ignoble). In NT: 1 Co 1²⁸ 'b. things of the world, and things which are despised, hath God chosen' (ἀγενής, 'of low birth'); 2 Co 10¹ 'Now I Paul myself beseech you by the meekness and gentleness of Christ, who in presence am b. among you' (RV 'in your presence am lowly'; the Gr. is ταπεινός, which in NT signifies 'lowly, either in position, as Ja 1⁹ 'let the brother of low degree glory in his high estate'; or in heart, as Mt 11²⁹ 'I am meek and lowly in heart'). 3. Morally low, mean, contemptible, the meaning of the word in mod. English. This meaning was known in 1611, and it is probable that there is at least some moral reprobation in Ac 17⁵ 'certain lewd fellows of the baser sort' (RV 'certain vile fellows of the rabble'; Gr. ἀγοραῖοι, lit. 'of the market place,' i.e. loungers). RV has introduced 'base' in this sense in Wis 2¹⁶ 'We were accounted by him as b. metal' (AV 'counterfeits,' Gr. κίβδηλος); and Dt 13³ 'Certain b. fellows are gone out' (AV 'certain men, the children of Belial,' Heb. בְּנֵי בְּזוּת = 'men, sons of worthlessness'; elsewhere Eng. RV retains the AV rendering of this phrase, 'son of Belial,' 'man of Belial,' etc., though belial (wh. see) is not a proper name; but Amer. RV always changes it into 'base fellow,' except 1 S 1¹⁶ 'wicked woman' (AV 'daughter of Belial').

Base, as subst. (from Lat. basis after Gr. βάσις, 'a stepping,' then 'that on which one steps, or anything stands') is distinct from the adj. in origin and meaning, and once was distinct in pronunciation. It occurs freq. in AV as tr. of (1) mekhônâh

(esp. in 1 K 7 of the stands for the lavers of brass in Solomon's temple); (2) kén, 1 K 7²⁹⁻³¹ (RV 'pedestal,' which had better, perhaps, been given as tr. of mékhnah, the kén being apparently not the stand of the lavers, but the upright projections which kept them in their place*); and in RV (3) yésódh (AV 'bottom'); (4) yárek (AV 'shaft'); (5) gabh, Ezk 43¹³ (AV 'higher place,' where the difference between 'base' as pedestal and 'base' the adj. is well seen; the gabh being a raised place, a mound, and so here the elevated base of the altar.

J. HASTINGS.

BASEMATH (בשמת 'fragrant'; AV Bashemath).

—1. One of the wives of Esau. In Gn 26³⁴ (P) she is called the daughter of Elon the Hittite, while in Gn 36³ (prob. R) she is said to have been Ishmael's daughter, and sister of Nebaioth. But in Gn 28⁹ (P) Esau is said to have taken Mahalath, the daughter of Ishmael, the sister of Nebaioth, to be his wife; and in Gn 36² the first mentioned of Esau's wives is Adah, the daughter of Elon the Hittite. There is manifestly a confusion of names in the text, which cannot be satisfactorily explained. The Sam. text reads Mahalath instead of Basemath throughout Gn 36, and on the whole it seems most probable that these are different names for the same person. 2. (1 K 4⁵, in AV Basmath) A daughter of Solomon, who became the wife of Ahimaz, one of the king's officers who was purveyor for the royal household in the district of Naphtali.

R. M. BOYD.

BASHAN [בשן 'The Bashan'; perhaps, like the modern Arab. Bathaniyeh, it means 'soft earth.' With the def. article in all hist. statements except 1 Ch 5²³; also sometimes in poetry (Dt 33²², Ps 135¹¹ 136²⁰), and prophecy (Is 2¹³, Jer 22²⁰ 50¹⁹, Am 4¹); but in prophecy and poetry the art. is more often omitted (Is 33³, Ezk 27⁶ 39¹⁸, Mic 7¹⁴, Nah 1⁴, Zec 11², Ps 22¹³ (Eng.¹²) 68^{16, 23} (Eng.^{15, 22})).—In a region where all place-names were used more or less loosely, it is difficult to define the limits of Bashan, but the name was applied to territory N. of Gilead, and seems generally to have meant the whole of the most northerly of the three great divisions of E. Pal.,—Bashan, Gilead, Moab. It first appears as the kingdom of Og (Nu 21³³, Dt 1⁴ etc.), extending as far E. as Salecah, the present Salkhat, the last great town towards the Arabian desert, and including Edrei, Ashtaroth, and Golan (Dt 1⁴ 3¹⁰ 4⁸, Jos 9¹⁰ 12⁴ 13^{11, 12, 31} 20⁸ 21²⁷). If Ashtaroth be the present Tell Ashtera, and the city Golan lay within the present Jaulan, this would mean that B. proper covered all the S. of Hauran, including the region known to-day as En-nukra. It is the same expanse, between the Lejá and Gilead, which seems to have been covered in Gr. times by the name Batanaea (Jos. Ant. xv. x. 1, xvii. ii. 1; Vita 11, etc.; Euseb. Onom. art. Basar). Whether in this, its more proper sense, the name extended to the Jordan Valley it is impossible to say, till we know where Geshur and Maacah lay. Indeed, Jos 12⁴ 13^{11, 12} seem to imply that the latter came between B. and the Jordan Valley (cf. Guthe, ZDPV xii. 232). If the opinion were correct which identifies Argob with the Lejá, then B. must have extended to the N. and E. of the latter; but for that identification there is no real evidence. The kingdom of Og is said to have contained a large number of cities, and these have been alleged by Porter (Giant Cities of Bashan) to be the large basalt ruins so thickly strewn across Hauran; yet none of the latter, with one or two trifling exceptions, bear any proof of a date earlier than the rise of Gr. civilisation in these parts under the protection of the Rom. Empire.

In a general sense the name B. was attached to the long edge of the E. plateau, as seen across Jordan from W. Pal., and the name is frequently joined with Carmel and Lebanon as one of the most prominent features in view of N. Israel (see CARMEL). Another verse, 'Dan is a lion's whelp, he leaps from B.' (Dt 33²²), carries the name up to the foot of Hermon, where the position of the city of Dan is to be looked for, not at Tel el-Kadi on the defenceless floor of the Jordan Valley, but rather at Banias, actually on the E. hills, and therefore a site from which Dan could justly be said 'to leap from B.' Again, the term 'mount' or 'mountains of B.' is uncertain, but prob. depends on the interpretation to be given to the description of them in Ps 68¹⁵ as 'mountains of humps' or 'protuberances' or 'bold heights.' This can hardly be the triple summits of Hermon to which it has been applied both by Olshausen and Baethgen. It suits far better the many broken cones of extinct craters which are scattered over B. (Delitzsch). Wetzstein proposes the Jebel Hauran or Druz; but this appears unlikely, even though it were proved that the Mt. Salmon of the previous verse were the same name as that which Ptolemy gave the Jebel Hauran, viz. Asalmanus (cf. Guthe, ZDPV xii. 231).

B. was celebrated for its breed of cattle (Dt 32¹⁴), which are also the types throughout OT of cruel and loud-mouthed oppressors; similarly, Amos calls the censorious and tyrannical matrons of Samaria 'kine of B.' (4¹).

The name B. survived in Gr. times as Batanaea (as described above). Batanaea was part of Philip's tetrarchy. Conder thinks it appears in NT as the 'Bethany beyond Jordan' (the most probable reading of Jn 1²⁸, see Westcott and Hort); but if so well known a province as Batanaea had been intended, and not rather some town, the epithet 'beyond Jordan' would hardly have been added. To-day the name survives, Ard el-Bathaniyeh; but since the 10th cent., when, according to Idrisi, it was still the province in which Edrei stood, it has drifted round to the E. of the Lejá, where it will be found in the most recent maps.

BASILISK.—See SERPENT.

BASKET, a vessel made of plaited reeds, twigs, palm-leaves, or other material. The word is used in EV as the equivalent of five Heb. and three Gr. words.

1. בַּסְתָּ basal, a bag of flexible interwoven twigs, probably similar in shape to the basket in which a carpenter carries his tools. Three such baskets the chief baker of Pharaoh dreamt he carried on his head (Gn 40^{16, 17, 18}), probably in the manner represented on the tomb of Ramses III. (Wilkinson i. 401). These were baskets of white bread (RV), not white baskets as in AV, or openwork baskets, as Symmachus. Similar baskets were used to carry the unleavened bread and the oiled cakes and wafers for the offering of consecration of the priests (Ex 29²⁻²³; also Lv 8²⁻²⁶); hence in Lv 8³¹ it is called the basket of consecration. Such baskets were also used for the Nazirite's offering (Nu 6^{15, 17, 19}). Gideon carried the flesh of the kid and the unleavened cakes of his provision for the angel in a basket of this sort (Jg 6¹⁹). The name Sallai in Neh 11⁸ 12²⁰ has been fancifully supposed to refer to a family of basket-makers, but this is highly improbable on etymological grounds.

2. בַּסְתֵּי basstiloth, in Jer 6⁹, is translated 'grape-gatherer's baskets,' the taltalah of the Arabs. Such baskets are represented in the Egyptian tomb-pictures (Wilkinson, i. 383). The context, however, makes it probable that the word is connected with zalzallim, used in Is 18⁵, meaning young shoots or tendrils, for the idea in the verse is the gleaning of an already stripped vine. Tallim is used in Ca 5¹¹ for twisted locks of hair.

3. קָבֵץ qēne', a basket for ordinary household or agricultural use, employed for carrying the first-fruits (Dt 26²⁻⁴). LXX renders it κάρβαλλος, which, like the Roman corbis, was a basket tapering downwards. National prosperity, consequent on well-doing, was typified by the blessing of the basket (qēne') and the store (Dt 28⁵). The opposite condition was attended with a curse on the basket (v. 17).

Tenā and tennu are common Egypt. names for a basket. In line 2 of the Canopic decree the Arsinoite basket-bearing priest is called tenā n met Arsinati. This is rendered in the Gr. version canephorus, the name given to the Athenian basket-bearing girls at the feasts of Dionysus and Demeter. The basket-bearing priest is a conspicuous feature in the Assyrian sculptures.

4. קָבֵץ dūdā, the κάλυβος of the LXX, was probably also a tapering basket, like that used by the Romans for wool (Virg. Aeneid, vii. 805) or by the Greeks for fruit (Aristoph. Lysistr. 579). In it were contained the figs of Jeremiah's vision (24¹⁻²). Large baskets of this kind were used for carrying clay to the brick-kilns; these are referred to in Ps 81⁶ (RV; not 'pots' as in AV). They are represented in Egypt. paintings as carried on the back, over one shoulder, as in most Ushabti figures, or else they were borne between two on a pole, or two were carried by a yoke resting on the shoulders, as shown in a painting at Beni-hassan. In any case the deliverance of the Israelites is well expressed by the removal of their shoulders from the burden. In baskets of this kind the heads of Ahab's sons were sent to Jehu at Jezreel (2 K 10⁷). This word is also translated 'kettle' in 1 S 2¹⁴, as in Job 41²⁰ (see Kettle in art. FOOD).

5. קַלְבִּיב kēlūbbh, rendered by LXX ἀγγος, is used in Am 8¹⁻² for a basket containing summer fruits. The same word in Jer 5²⁷ signifies a bird-cage, probably of basketwork, in which sense the word occurs in Phœnician and Syriac. Compare κλωβός in Antipater's epigram (Anthol. Palat. vi. 109. 3).

The קַבֵּץ tēbbah of papyrus reeds, in which the infant Moses was exposed, was a sort of basket. Teb is the Egyptian name of a mummy-case. Other Egyptian baskets were mesen, a fruit basket of palm leaves and rushes for carrying dates; hotep, a basket for carrying meat (Pap. Anastasi) or flowers (Dümichen), senab, seq, and χαχα, a basket for catching fish, such as that figured on the tomb of Ti; compare the hākkah of Hab 1¹⁵.

In the NT three words are used which are translated basket—

1. kóphinos, used in all the accounts of the miracle of feeding the 5000, for the baskets in which the fragments were gathered, Mt 14²⁰, Mk 6⁴², Lk 9¹⁷, Jn 6¹³. According to Juvenal (Sat. iii. 14, vi. 541) the Jews carried about with them these wicker baskets for their food in Gentile countries to prevent defilement. Kophinói were used to carry agricultural produce (Columella, xi. 3). Their sizes were probably variable, but the word is used for a Bœotian measure of capacity equal to two gallons (CIG 1625, 46).

2. σφύρις, the kind of basket in which the fragments were gathered after the feeding of the 4000, Mt 15³⁷, Mk 8⁸. It was probably a large provision basket, possibly of ropework, such as those which the lake-dwelling Pæonians used for fishing with (Herodot. v. 16). In such a spuris the disciples let down St. Paul from the walls of Damascus, Ac 9²⁵. The spuris and kophinos are contrasted in Mt 16^{9, 10}, Mk 8^{19, 20}, the former being probably the larger. The mediæval commentators fancifully allegorized these baskets (see Rabanus Maurus, Alleg. in Script. ed. Migne, 898; and for references to the sportulæ of the clergy and others, see Chrysost. Ep. to Valentinus, ed. Migne, iii. 731; and Cyprian's Ep. ad clerum et plebem, p. 324).

3. σαργάνη, used only in 2 Co 11³³ in reference to the basket by which St. Paul escaped from Damascus. The word means anything plaited, as in Æschyl. Suppl. 769, but is used of a fish basket by Timokles (Ἀθη. i.). See Pollux, Onomast. vii. 27.

The other receptacles mentioned in the NT, πήρα or wallet; γλωσσόκομον, Judas's bag; and βαλλάντιον, used thrice in Luke, were probably of leather. The πίτραξ, on which John the Baptist's head was brought to Salome, was probably a wooden platter.

In the early Church, cophini or canistra, wicker baskets, were used for carrying the eulogia or consecrated bread and wine to those not present at the Eucharist (Jerome, Ep. ad Rusticum, ed. Migne, cxxv. 1078). Illustrations of these baskets are referred to in Martigny's Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. p. 246. The word basket is of Celtic origin, from a root which signifies to twist round. Its British source, which has been questioned on dubious grounds by recent etymologists, is referred to by Martial, xiv. 99. From the Schol. on Juv. xii. 46, we learn that baskets were used to hold cups and pots when they were being washed in running water. (See Bulenger. de Conviviis, iv. 10, 11).

A. MACALISTER.

BASON.—1. Bason* is the rendering in EV of various Heb. words, and of the Gr. πιπτήρ (Jn 13⁵). Of the former the most frequently used is קַבֵּץ (LXX φιάλη, σπονδεῖον, cf. Jos. l.c. inf.), which denotes a bowl or basin used in the sacrificial ritual of tabernacle and temple. The officiating priest or priests caught the warm blood, as it streamed from the victim, in the basin, from which it was dashed against the altar (Ex 29¹⁶ etc.), or otherwise manipulated as the ritual required (see SACRIFICE). The basins used for this purpose were of bronze (Ex 27³, 1 K 7⁴⁵). About their size and shape we have no further information. They probably resembled somewhat the basin of bronze presented by 'a servant of Hiram' to the Phœn. deity Baal-Lebanon, of which a reconstruction from the remaining fragments is given in the CIS i. i. 23. The same term (קַבֵּץ) is applied to the silver bowls or basins presented by the princes of the congregation with a meal-offering (Nu 7¹³ⁿ). The weight of each basin, 70 shekels,—prob. about 32 oz. troy,—shows that the קַבֵּץ was not of very large dimensions. Among the furniture of the temple of Solomon, basins of gold are repeatedly mentioned (1 K 7⁵⁰, 2 K 12¹³, Jer 52¹⁹ etc.). The number of these made by Hiram is given as 100 in 2 Ch 4³ (with wh. cf. the statements Ezr 1⁹⁻¹¹, and contrast the exaggerations of Jos. Ant. viii. iii. 7, 8). Fifty such golden basins were presented by 'the Tirshatha' to the second temple (Neh 7⁷⁰).

2. Bason is also in a few places the rendering of קַבֵּץ , which, if the reading of 2 S 17²⁸ be correct (cf. Klosterm. in loc.), was the name for a basin as a common article of household furniture, such as is denoted by πιπτήρ (Jn 13⁵) With this agrees its use by JE in the account of the institution of the Passover (Ex 12²² by the LXX mistranslated πὰρ τὴν θύραν). In some passages the word is translated 'cup' by RV.

3. A third term (קַבֵּץ) occurs only in the late book of Ch-Ezr-Neh (1 Ch 28¹⁷, Ezr 1¹⁰ 8²⁷), and may be considered as a word of later origin than the others. It occurs alongside of בָּרַךְ, and must therefore have differed from it; but in what respect we do not know. It is rendered in RV uniformly by 'bowl' (which see). מִבְּרִיחַ 'basins,' occurs only Ex 24⁶.

* The Amer. Revisers prefer throughout the more modern spelling 'basin.'

BASSAI (B Βασσαι, A Βασσά, AV Bassa), 1 Es 5¹⁶ = BEZAI, Ezr 2¹⁷, Neh 7²³.

BASTARD is one born out of wedlock; and that is the meaning in He 12⁹ 'then are ye bastards (υβουοι) and not sons,' its only occurrence in NT; but in OT it is probable that מַמְזֵר mamzér, of which b. is the tr. where it occurs (Dt 23², Zec 9⁶, only), means a child of incest, not simply an illegitimate child. See Driver on Dt 23². Wis 4 (heading) has 'Bastard slips shall not thrive' as a paraphrase of 4³ 'But the multiplying brood of the ungodly shall not thrive,' where the meaning is probably general' = 'base,' as in Spenser, F. Q. i. 24—

'For all he taught the tender ymp was but
To banish cowardize and bastard feare.'

BAT (אֲתַלְפֵּה 'atalléph, νυκτερίη, vespertilio).—The bat is placed at the end of the unclean fowls (Lv 11¹⁸, Dt 14¹⁸), but in Lv 11²⁰ the explanatory clause, 'all winged creeping things that go upon all four,' makes it perfectly plain that the bat is intended. The Arab. popular name for the bat is witwát, and the classical name is khuffásh. The Heb. name, 'atalléph, signifies the night-flier, in allusion to the habits of the animal. The Arab. name signifies the weak-sighted, referring to the fact of the small eyes of bats, which see poorly by day. A man who has day-blindness is called akhfásh, i.e. bat-eyed, from this circumstance. Bats are mammals, with a very light skeleton and body, and large membranous wings, spread between the elongated phalanges, and from them and the bones of the forearm and arm to the body and legs. They are nocturnal in their habits, spending their day in sleep, with their wings folded up, and suspended by a hook at the tip of the forearm, caught in some crevice of the roof of the cavern, or the ceiling of the tomb or ruin (Is 21⁹⁻²¹) where they have made their home, or fixed to the branch of a tree. The mousy smell of their haunts is overpowering where they are numerous. When not asleep, they are constantly squeaking like mice and rats. When disturbed they fly in rapid circles around their dark abode, or sweep in a cloud out of its exit. At night they fly forth noiselessly, and circle around houses and gardens. They pluck large quantities of apricots, dates, and other fruits, and bring them to the porches of houses and devour them, leaving quantities of the seeds and skins on the pavements, and spotting with their ordure the walls of the house as they fly. It is customary to protect the clusters of dates, and of many other fruits, by a sort of basket or bag tied over them, and sometimes the whole tree by a net, lest all the fruit should be eaten by these rapacious feeders. The bats of the Holy Land vary from the size of a mouse to that of a rat. They swarm everywhere in the caves, tombs, and ruins. When a cavern or tomb is being explored the bats often extinguish the torch or candle as the traveller passes through a narrow opening. Tristram gives a list of fifteen bats found in Palestine. The bats of the coast and mountains hibernate. But Tristram says that those of the Jordan Valley seem to be always active.

BATH.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.
VOL. I.—17

BATH, BATHING.—1. In contradistinction to the washing (wh. see) of particular parts of the body, hands, feet, etc., bathing is used in this article of the washing of the whole body,* and that either by the application of water, by pouring or otherwise, to the body, or by the immersion of the body in water, which alone is bathing in the strict sense of the term. The Heb. of the OT does not distinguish between the processes, both of which are expressed by בָּרַךְ to wash (the body, as opp. to שָׁטַף to wash clothes); for washing by immersion בָּרַךְ is once employed in OT (2 K 5¹⁴, AV 'dipped himself,' but בָּרַךְ in 5¹⁰). In later times it became the usual expression for bathing. The new-born infant among the Hebrews was bathed in water (Ezk 16⁴) before being dressed. Some scholars have seen a reference to this custom in Ex 1⁸, where they detect in the mysterious word מִבְּרִיחַ the name of the stone basin or bath in which the infants were bathed (Ges. Theol.; Siegfried and Stade's Lex. s.v.; also Kalisch, Comm. in loc.). With this very doubtful exception, there is no mention in OT of a bath, for which later Heb. used בָּרַךְ, בָּרַךְ, etc. (see below). In the everyday life of the ordinary Heb. there would be neither the water nor the privacy—nor, for that matter, the inclination—necessary for bathing in the ordinary sense. The few instances of bathing in Scripture are in connexion with a river, as in the case of Pharaoh's daughter (Ex 2⁵), and Naaman (2 K 5¹⁴, LXX ἐβαπτισατο); a fountain (Jth 12⁷); or a pool (birket), as at Samaria (1 K 22³⁸), Bethesda (Jn 5²), and in Joakim's garden (Sus 15). No doubt in the palaces of royalty and the houses of the wealthy there were, even in ancient times, as at Nineveh, Tiryms, and elsewhere, arrangements for the bath, but no reference to such arrangements is found in OT or Apocrypha.

2. In the cases, other than those already cited, where 'bathe' occurs in AV and RV (in the latter more frequently), the process referred to must be understood as the ablution of the body by the application of water, not by bathing in the ordinary sense of the word.†

The prescription Lv 15¹³ 'he shall bathe his flesh in running (Heb. living) water' seems at first sight fatal to the proposition just laid down, that purification from ceremonial and other defilement was originally by a process of ablution and not of immersion; but it is evident from the context that the words in question are a euphemism for lavabit genitalia sua (see Dillm., Strack in loc.). Such ablutions were also practised on the ground of ordinary cleanliness (2 S 11², Sus 15⁴), and, in particular, before appearing in the presence of superiors (Ru 3³, Jth 10³ περικλίσσατο, but 12¹ ἐβαπτισατο, 'bathed,' as above), and à fortiori in the presence of God for worship (see Dillmann on Gn 35³ for parallel passages).

3. The cleansing properties of water were increased, as among other nations, by the use of a

* This simple distinction gives the key to the often misunderstood passage Jn 13¹⁰ (see Westcott in Speaker's Com.).

† It is therefore somewhat misleading to apply such expressions as 'bathe himself in the water' (Lv passim) to the ablutions required by the Levitical legislation in certain specified cases (see PURIFICATION). The preposition in בָּרַךְ has in these ordinances throughout the meaning of 'with,' not 'in,' as in שָׁטַף 'with fire,' 'washed with milk,' בָּרַךְ (see below). In a few passages AV gives the correct rendering 'he shall wash his flesh with water,' which has been unwarrantably departed from in RV (see Lv 23⁶, Dt 23¹¹). Even in the ritual of the Day of Atonement there was no provision in 'the holy place' of the tabernacle for the high priest 'bathing his flesh in water' (Lv 16⁴, 24 RV), the process in question being ablution by applying water from a basin or other vessel, as may be seen in various representations on Greek vases. See illustration in Gardner and Jevons' Manual of Gr. Antiquities, 1894, p. 315 (from Gerhard's Auserles. Vasenbilder, pl. 277). Cf. also Wilkinson's woodcut of an Egyptian lady at her ablutions, vol. ii. (pop. ed. 1854) p. 349.

vegetable alkali (סֹבֵן Jer 2²², RV 'soap'), natron, a mineral alkali (רֹחַ Jer 2²², RV 'lye'), and 'washing-balls' (Sus¹⁷ σμύγματα, on which see ref. in Iw. Müller's Hdbuch d. klass. Alterth. etc., bd. iv. p. 444c). To wash with milk was considered, as at the present day, highly beneficial to the complexion (Ca 5¹²); and it seems to have been a popular superstition that royal blood possessed similar properties, which explains the curious note (1 K 22³⁸) that the harlots of Samaria bathed in the pool in which Ahab's chariot had been washed (so RV, see Speaker's Commentary in loc. and Additional Note B, p. 624).

4. Public baths are first met with in the Greek period. The γυμνάσιον erected by the Hellenizing party in Jerus. in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Mac 1¹⁴, 2 Mac 4^{9, 12}) must have contained the usual hot and cold baths. Remains of baths from the Roman period exist in various parts of the country. In 1895 a Roman bath was discovered a short distance from the Pool of Siloam (PEFSt, Oct. 1895, p. 306 ff.). That some even of the most respected Jewish doctors frequented the public baths (רִיבּוֹסִין, רִיבּוֹסִין, * pl. רִיבּוֹסִין Abod. Zar. i. 7) is shown by the anecdote told of Gamaliel bathing in the bath (רִיבּוֹסִין, pl. רִיבּוֹסִין) of Aphrodite in Aco (Acre, Abod. Zar. iii. 4, Strack's ed.). In Herod's temple, as we might expect, there was a bath-room (בַּת הַרְבֵּי הַקֹּהֲנִים) for the priests (Yoma iii. 2). With the increasing stringency in the observation of the ceremonial requirements of the law (cf. Mk 7⁴), the bath became, for the laity as well, an all-important factor in the religious life of the community, as may be seen from the number of treatises of the Talm. devoted to the various aspects of this subject (see PURIFICATION).

5. In the Roman period, also, we first find a reference to the medicinal value of the hot springs in various localities. Thus Herod the Great, near the end of his life, was sent to take the warm baths at Callirrhoe, E. of the Dead Sea (Jos. Ant. xvii. vi. 5). Those of Tiberias (Ant. xviii. ii. 3) and Gadara were also celebrated. On this part of the subject see Hamburger, RE. f. Bibel u. Tal. vol. ii. 'Heilbäder'; Leop. Löw, Zur Medizin, etc., in Gesammelte Schriften, iii. 1893, p. 367 ff.

BATH-RABBIM (בַּת־רַבִּימִים 'daughter of multitudes,' Ca 7⁴).—A gate of Heshbon near fish pools. Perhaps the rock cutting on the edge of the slope, above the stream west of Heshbon, by which the main road approaches the city on the plateau immediately to the east. The stream is full of small fish. See SEP vol. i. s.v. Heshbon.

C. R. CONDER.

BATHSHEBA (בַּת־שֶׁבַע).—The wife of Uriah the Hittite, and afterwards of David, and the mother of Solomon. The tragic story of David's adultery with her, and of his treachery towards her husband, is recounted in 2 S 11. Bathsheba is variously described as the daughter of Eliam (2 S 11³), or of Ammiel (1 Ch 3³, where, moreover, her name is written Bathshua). It has been suggested with some probability that the father of Bathsheba is to be identified with the Eliam of 2 S 23³⁴, who was a son of Ahithophel the Gilonite. This might explain the latter's desertion of David as an act of revenge for the seduction of his granddaughter and the murder of her husband. Once introduced into the palace as the wife of David, Bathsheba seems to have quickly accommodated herself to her new rank, and to have gained a commanding influence at court. She displayed considerable skill and not a little ambition upon the occasion when, in conjunction with Nathan the prophet, she bent the aged David to her will, and secured the succession to the throne for her son Solomon (1 K 1¹¹⁻³¹).

BATHSHUA (1 Ch 2³⁵).—See BATHSHEBA, SHUA.

BATTERING-RAM.—This instrument is first clearly mentioned in Ezk (4² 21²² 'rams' = רָמִים kārim). The Hebrews probably adopted it from the Assyrians, the great takers of cities. In its essence it was a stout pole, probably with a metal ferule or head, worked with a motion which was half a fall half a thrust against the wall. Protection for the workers was supplied by placing it under a roofed shed or in a tower. The whole machine was often brought forward on wheels.

Perhaps, however, some rough machine was known in earlier times, and its use may be referred to in 1 K 20¹² ('place [the engines], RVm) and in 2 S 20¹² ('all the people battered [מַטְרִימִים] the wall to throw it down').

W. E. BARNES.

BATTLE.—See WAR; and for the various battles, consult their place-names, and the art. ISRAEL.

BATTLE-AXE (מַטְרֵץ mappeç, Jer 51²⁰).—Perhaps the same weapon as the [battle]-hammer (מַטְרֵץ) of Jer 50²². The head of such a weapon made of copper has been found at Tell el-Hesi, the ancient Lachish, among the ruins of the 'First' city. (It is figured in art. AXE, second fig. on p. 206^a.) On the Assyrian relief in the British Museum, representing the battle against the Elamites in which their king, Te-umman, was killed, an Assyrian soldier is shown using a weapon which might be a double hammer or a double axe, or a combination of hammer and axe, no doubt a mappeç.

The word מַטְרֵץ segor, in Ps 35², which is tr. RVm 'battle-axe,' is rather to be taken after AV and RV (text) as a verb. The marg. reading supposes a pointing מַטְרֵץ, and an identification with the Pers. weapon σάγαρις mentioned by Herodotus and Xenophon. Cheyne, however (in loco), gives מַטְרֵץ = σάγαρις = 'dirk.'

BATTLE-BOW (Zec 9¹⁰ 10⁴).—See BOW.

BATTLEMENT.—See HOUSE, WAR.

BAVVAI (בַּבְּוַי, AV Bavai, Neh 3¹⁸).—In the days of Nehemiah, Bavvai, the son of Henadad, the ruler of half the district of Kellah, rebuilt a portion of the wall of Jerusalem, on the south-east of the city. He was of a Levitical family (their brethren, cf. v. 17). In v. 24 he appears as Binnui the son of Henadad, and this is probably the correct form (Smend, Listen, p. 12). In LXX Bavel A, Bebel B.

H. A. WHITE.

BAY, the colour, occurs Zec 6^{3,7}. See COLOURS. 'Bay' of the sea, Jos 15^{2,5} 18¹⁹ (lāshōn, lit. 'tongue'); and RV turns 'creek' into 'bay' Ac 27³⁹ (κόπος, 'bosom,' 'lap'). J. HASTINGS.

BAY TREE (תָּרֵשֶׁת 'ezrāh).—The proper translation of the only passage where this word occurs (Ps 37³⁵) would seem to be that of RV, 'like a green tree in its native soil.' The rendering of the LXX, κέρπος τοῦ Λιβάνου, assumes that תָּרֵשֶׁת is a clerical mistake for תְּרֵשֶׁת, a wholly unnecessary assumption. The guess, bay tree, of AV is still wider of the mark. G. E. POST.

BAYITH (בַּיִת).—The Heb. and cognate word in Sem. for the general term 'house.' Its etymology is doubtful, though referred (by Ges. Theol.) to a root בָּת. Cf. Assy. bitu, house; Sab. בית, בַּת, a fortress, temple; Palmyr. בית כקברא, is sepulchre (de Vogüé, Syrie centrale, 32, 64). In Aram. בית is rendered spend the night. This word is found with construct relation (Beth) in freq. combination in proper names of places: Beth-el, Beth-barah, etc. (see sep. artt.) It is also used as inclusive of a country or condition; e.g. house of bondage (Dt 5⁶), house of meeting (in Sheol, Job 30²³); also in fig. expressions which do not appear in the Eng. version, for example Is 3²⁰, Ex 36³⁴. It also designates 'family' in such passages as house of Pharaoh (Gn 50⁴), house of Levi (Ex 2¹), house of Israel (Ru 4¹¹). A few times it refers to the land of Israel as house of J' (Hos 8¹). Its principal meanings seem to be (1) a place for halting, resting, or living; (2) a family or tribe not necessarily connected with any spot or place; (3) a place and a family as closely related under the one term.

Bayith (AV Bajith) occurs as a proper name in Is 15² 'He is gone up to B.' or (marg.) 'B. is gone up to the high places.' LXX gives us no help, reading λυπέσθη ἐφ' ἑαυτοῦ, ἀπολείπει γὰρ καὶ Διὸς οἶκον. It is not improbable that בית here is to be taken in its common sense, and not as a proper name. In that case we should render, with Delitzsch, 'They go up to the temple house.' IRA M. PRICE.

BAZLITH (בַּזְלִית Neh 7⁶⁴), Bazluth (בַּזְלִיּוֹת Ezr 2⁶² 'stripping' = Basaloth, 1 Es 5³¹).—Founder of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel.

BDELLIUM (בְּדֵלְיָה bēdōlah, Gn 2¹², Nu 11⁷).—Bēdōlah is a word of exceedingly doubtful signification: by some being interpreted a gum; * by others, a precious stone.† We are not, however, concerned with the translation, but with the original Heb. word. It seems improbable that a vegetable product should be associated in the account of Eden with 'gold' and the 'onyx' (or 'beryl' in margin). The reference to the word in Nu 11⁷ helps to throw some light upon the nature of bēdōlah; the 'eye' of the manna is said to be like the 'eye' of bēdōlah; and, as suggested by Sir J. W. Dawson, the substance must have been known to the Hebrews of the Exodus as having a peculiar lustre, and occurring in rounded grains of a greyish colour 'like coriander seed' (Ex 16³¹).‡ These illustrations at once suggest the pearl, which, though not a mineral, is a hard, stony substance, round in form, and with special lustre, much prized by the ancients as an ornament, abundant in the waters of the Persian Gulf,§ and in all probability

* If bdeillum be the correct translation for bēdōlah, then, according to Josephus, it was 'one of the sweet spices,' Ant. iii. i. 6.

† The LXX renders it by ἐνθραξ in Gn and by πρίσκαλλος in Nu. The translators, therefore, considered it to be a precious stone, but leave the reader a choice between two very different species. This view is opposed by Bochart (Hieroz. ii. 674-683, iii. 592).

in those of the rivers entering from the north, such as the Euphrates, Tigris (Hiddekel), and the two other streams descending from the highlands of Persia. Probably those obtained from the Pison (the modern Karun?) were of peculiar beauty and value. Fresh-water mussels producing pearls frequent many rivers in both hemispheres, as for example those of the British Isles, Saxony, Bohemia, Bavaria, United States and Canada, Japan and China; the rivers in which the pearl mussels breed are chiefly those descending from mountainous regions in temperate and sub-tropical climates; in the case of the Pison the waters descending from the mountains at high altitudes would have afforded the conditions of temperature required for their vitality.

BE is frequent for 'are' in the pres. indic. pl. of all persons, but not invariably, nor can any system be discovered: cf. Ps 107³⁰ 'Then are they glad because they be quiet'; and Mt 9^{2,5} 'thy sins be forgiven thee' with the parallel passage Lk 5²⁰ 'thy sins are forgiven thee.'* Eng. RV occasionally, Amer. RV always, gives 'are' for 'be.'

The verb 'to be,' in one or other of its parts, translates a great variety of Heb. and Gr. expressions, some of which are highly idiomatic, and should be attended to. In NT the commonest word, after eipul, is γίνομαι, which is probably never identical with eipul, since it expresses coming into the state rather than being in it, but cannot always be distinguished from it in English. (It is precisely the distinction between sein and werden.) RV wherever possible gives 'become,' as Jn 10¹⁶ 'they shall become one flock' for AV 'there shall be one fold.'

Observe also—1. 'To be' in its primal sense of 'to exist,' as in Hamlet's famous line—

'To be, or not to be, that is the question.'

Gn 5²⁴ 'And Enoch walked with God; and he was not, for God took him'; Wis 13¹ 'out of the good things that are seen know him that is'; He 11⁶ 'he that cometh to God must believe that he is.' 2. 'To be the case,' esp. in the phrase 'be it that,' Job 19⁴ 'And be it indeed that I have erred.' 3. 'To belong to,' esp. in 'peace be to,' 'grace be to,' etc., Sir 25⁹ 'Well is him that hath found prudence.' 4. 'To happen,' Ac 21³⁵ 'So it was (συνέβη) that he was borne of the soldiers.'

BEACH.—In Mt 13^{2,48}, Jn 21⁴, Ac 21⁵ 27^{39,40}, that is, wherever the Gr. in NT is αἰγιαλός, RV changes 'shore' into 'beach,' leaving 'shore' for χέλος (= ἡψῶ = 'lip'). The beach is properly the part of the shore washed by the tide.

BEAM is the tr. of several Heb. words, as—1. עֵרֶגְחַ 'eregh, Jg 16¹⁴, a weaver's hand-loom (to which Samson's hair was fastened), not simply

* In 1611 the two forms seem to be still equally acceptable, and for the most part AV follows previous versions. The previous versions do not always agree, however. Thus in Mt 22¹⁴ Tindale has, 'For many are called, but few are chosen'; but the Great Bible, 'For many be called, but few are chosen.' About the middle of the 17th cent. 'are' generally replaces 'be,' as may be seen by comparing the Prayer-Books of 1604 and of 1662 (e.g. Keeling's Liturgicæ Britannicæ, pp. xxii, 6, 38, 93, etc.).

the beam. The same word is tr^d 'shuttle' Job 7⁶. 2. מִנְדֹר mānōr, a weaver's beam, to which the web is attached. Goliath's spear handle is compared to it, 1 S 17⁷ and 2 S 21¹⁹; his brother Lahmi's, 1 Ch 20⁶; and that of an Egyptian slain by Benaiah, 1 Ch 11²³. 3. קִרְיָה kōrah, 2 K 6²⁻⁵, 2 Ch 3⁷, Ca 1¹⁷, a beam to be used as the rafter of a house; hence the roof itself used fig. for the house, Gn 19⁸ 'they are come under the shadow of my roof.' 'Beam' in older Eng. was used for the tree before it was squared into a beam; this use is found in 2 K 6²⁻⁵ 'as one was felling a b.' 4. גִּבְהִים gēbh, 1 K 6⁹ for the beams supporting the roof of Solomon's temple; but the meaning (perhaps the reading) is uncertain. 5. עֲלֵי ēlā, 1 K 7⁸ in ref. to Solomon's own house. In 6⁵ the same word is tr^d 'chambers,' which seems to be its meaning in 7⁸ also. See RVm. 6. סִפְּתַי kāphās, Hab 2¹¹ 'the stone shall cry out of the wall, and the b. out of the timber shall answer it'—a girder probably (a connectendo, says Ges. Thes. s.v.). In NT, only δοκός, Mt 7³, 4⁵, Lk 6¹¹, 42⁶ of the beam in the eye: a common classical word for a beam of wood, esp. for roofing. LXX uses it for tr^d of kōrah, Gn 19⁸, 1 K 6²⁻⁵, Ca 1¹⁷. J. BEANS (בִּיל pōl, κύβος, fabā).—There is no reason to doubt that the vegetable alluded to is the horse-bean, Faba vulgaris, L. It is still known by the Arabs as fūl, which is the same word as the Heb. pōl. It is extensively cultivated in the East, and furnishes a coarse cheap article of diet, which is, however, eaten by the rich as well as the poor. There are several other kinds of beans grown in Palestine, as the string bean, Vigna Sinensis, L., var. sesquipedalis, L., which is known as lūbiyeh belediyeh, and the kidney bean, Phaseolus vulgaris, L., lūbiyeh ifrangiyeh, and a climbing bean known as lūbiyeh kusās, which is probably a variety of Phaseolus multiflorus, L. The fūl (horse-bean) is used in two stages of its development: one, the pods in the unripe state, like string beans; the other, the ripe beans, which are boiled as the ordinary white beans. In both these stages they are made into a stew with meat, and a large proportion of fat, or with oil alone, and often flavoured with onion or garlic. Fūl is sown in Oct. or Nov., after the early rains, and harvested earlier or later in the spring, according to the stage in which it is to be used. When harvested for the seed, it is plucked up by the roots, the stalks are trodden and cut to pieces on the threshing-floors, and the seeds extracted and winnowed, as in the case of other grains. It was the seeds that were ground with barley, lentiles, millet, and fitches to make bread (Ezk 4⁹). It is mentioned only once more as part of the supplies brought by the trans-Jordanic friends of David when he had fled to Mahanaim (2 S 17²⁸). This, with the other supplies, would be just what would be needed and available to-day in the same region and under similar circumstances. G. E. POST.

BEAR (דָּב or דִּבּ dōb, ἀρκτος, arkos, ursus, ursa).—There is but one species of bear in Syria, Ursus Syriacus, Ehr. It is known to the natives by the name dubb, which is the Arab. form of dōb. It closely resembles the brown bear, Ursus arctos, L., of Europe. It has, however, a greyish brown fur. Tristram says that it is closely allied to Ursus isabellinus, Horsf., of India. The bear is found in all the wilder regions of alpine Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, far more abundantly in the latter range, esp. its more unfrequented northern solitudes, than in the former. During the cold weather of winter, esp. in exceptionally rigorous seasons, it comes down to the lower mountains in search of food. It is found sparingly in the mountains of Bashan, Gilead, and Moab. Very rarely is it seen in Western Palestine.

The bear feeds principally on roots, bulbs, fruits, and other vegetable products. It is fond of the chick pea, which is much cultivated on the higher levels, where the farmer often suffers serious losses from the bear's voracity. When not abundantly supplied with vegetable food, it will attack sheep and other animals. It rarely attacks man, but, on the contrary, usually runs away from him as fast as possible.

It is clear that bears were once abundant in Palestine, when that country was more wooded than it is now. David killed one in Judæa (1 S 17³⁴⁻³⁶). Two she-bears are said to have torn forty-two children between Jericho and Bethel (2 K 2²⁴). There are a number of allusions to the characteristics of bears in OT. The bear lies in wait (La 3¹⁰). The she-bear, 'robbed of her whelps,' is described as specially ferocious (2 S 17⁸, Pr 17¹², Hos 13⁸). It is spoken of as second to the lion in danger to man (1 S 17³⁴⁻³⁶, Am 5¹⁹). A graphic picture of the peaceful reign of the Messiah is the cow and the bear feeding together, and their young lying down together (Is 11⁷).

There is not the slightest warrant for the LXX rendering, λύκος (wolf, Pr 28¹⁵), nor μέριμνα (anxious thought, Pr 17¹²), for dōb. In both passages the bear is undoubtedly meant.

BEARD.—The Egyptians strongly disliked hair on the face: they shaved themselves, and compelled their slaves also to do so. Joseph, coming from prison, had to shave before appearing to the king (Gn 41¹⁴). The unshaven face betokened grief. False beards, however, were worn, varying in size and shape with the rank of the individual. Those of the common people were short—that of the monarch, long and square-bottomed: deities are represented with beards curled up at the end. The Jews and kindred peoples have always attached extreme importance to the beard. The leper alone was bound to shave (Lv 14⁹). The Jews appear with beards in the Assyrian sculptures of the taking of Lachish. They had no special rule for their slaves; unlike the Romans, who, when they took to shaving, compelled their slaves to wear beards. 'Cutting off the corners of the beard,' and making cuttings in the flesh, are prohibited (Lv 19²⁶⁻²⁸). These practices are marks of idolatry (Jer 41⁵), and the peoples of the 'pooled corners' are to drink the wine-cup of God's wrath (Jer 9²⁶ 25²³ 49³²). Certain neighbouring nations cut off the hair between the ear and the eye in honour of the god Orotal. The prohibition distinguished Israel from idolaters. In time the Jews came to regard the hairs on this part as sacred; hence the long grotesque love-locks of the modern Ashkenazim.

A large graceful beard is a coveted distinction in the East, often securing respect for its possessor. Carefully tended, it may yet in grief be neglected, and actually plucked (2 S 19²⁴). The Arab who shaves disgraces his family, who for generations are called 'sons of the shaven one.' To injure a man's beard is a deep insult (2 S 10⁴ etc.). When a Greek priest is deposed, the heaviest humiliation is the cutting of his beard. Deliberate defilement of the beard would be accepted as clear proof of madness (1 S 21¹³). It is common to swear by the beard; and in pressing a suit, success is greatly facilitated by placing a hand, if possible, under the beard of him who is addressed.

BEAST.—Three words in Heb. are so translated in AV and RV. 1. בְּהֵמָה bēhēmāh, the Arab. bēhīmah, which is defined as 'any quadruped, even if it live in water, or any animal not endowed with reason.' In the sense of a quadruped, we have clean beasts (Gn 7²); in contradistinction to man (Gn 6⁷, Ex 9^{9, 10, 25}); animals to be eaten (Lv 11²); mammalia, as constituting one of the four principal classes of the vertebrates, beasts, fowls, creeping things, and fishes (1 K 4²³); in the sense of the animal kingdom (Pr 30³⁰); of domestic animals (1 K 18⁵), esp. riding animals (Neh 2¹²); of wild animals (Dt 32²⁴). This word is arbitrarily tr. in both AV and RV cattle (Gn 1²⁴⁻²⁶ 2²⁰ 3¹⁴ 7¹⁴. 21 9¹⁰ Ps 50¹⁰ etc.). See CATTLE.

2. בְּעִיר be'ir (Ex 22⁵, Nu 20^{8, 11} AV 'beasts,' but v. 4 of the same chapter 'cattle.' 'Cattle' is read by RV in Nu 20^{4, 8, 11}, and by AV, RV in Ps 78⁴⁸. Both give 'beasts' in Gn 45¹⁷, the only other occurrence of the word.

3. חַיִּיָּה hayyah (haytho, poetic form, with old case ending, Gn 1²⁴, Ps 50¹⁰ 79² etc.). It is used (1) of animals in general (Gn 8¹⁷, Lv 11² etc.); (2) in contradistinction to bēhēmāh, i.e. wild b. (Gn 7¹⁴ 8¹ 9² etc.), specialised in the b. of the reed (marg. AV, text RV Ps 68³⁰); evil b. (Gn 37^{20, 23} etc.); b. of the field (Ex 23¹¹ etc.); ravenous b. (Is 35⁹). The word hayyah is tr. in other places living creatures (Ezk 1⁵ etc.); life (Ps 143³, Is 57¹⁰, RV quickening, etc.); appetite (Job 38³⁹); living thing (Gn 1²⁸ etc.) = Arab. hayawdn, 'animal.'

The words for beast in NT are chiefly: 1. θήλον, Ac 28⁴ of a viper; Tit 1¹² of the Cretans; more generally in He 12³⁰, Ja 3⁷. It is the word used more than 30 times in Rev for the Beast of the Apocalypse (on which see NUMBER, REVELATION). 2. The word ζῶον is used in Rev 4⁹ foll. of the 'living ones' who were round about the throne (AV 'beasts,' RV more suitably 'living creatures').

BEATING.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS.

BEATITUDE.—The word 'beatitude' does not occur in the English Bible. In Biblical Theology it signifies either (1) the joys of heaven, or (2) one of the declarations of blessedness made by Christ as attached to certain virtues, or conditions, or persons. The word in this latter sense is the subject of this article.*

Several of Christ's declarations of blessedness are isolated beatitudes, called forth by special circumstances: Mt 11⁶ = Lk 7²³, Mt 13¹⁶ = Lk 10²³, Mt 24⁴⁶ = Lk 12⁴⁸, Mt 16¹⁷, Lk 11²⁸ 12²⁷, Jn 13¹⁷ 20²⁹. There are no beatitudes in St. Mark, and the word μακάριος does not occur in his Gospel, but in the Catholic Epistles and the Apoc. there are several: 1 P 3¹⁴ 4¹⁴, Ja 1^{12, 25}, Rev 1³ 14¹³ 16¹⁵ 19⁹ 20⁶ 22^{7, 14}.

But the term is most commonly used of those general declarations of blessedness made by Christ in the discourses recorded by St. Matthew (v. 3-11) and St. Luke (6²⁰⁻²²), which are sometimes distinguished as the 'Sermon on the Mount' and the 'Sermon on the Plain.' The question whether the two evangelists give us divergent records of the same discourse or records of two different but similar discourses, will probably never cease to be discussed, for proof is impossible. But the beatitudes as recorded by each are a considerable element in the evidence. In Mt we have eight beatitudes and no woes; in Lk four beatitudes and four corresponding woes. Moreover, in the beatitudes which are common to both there are important differences. (1) Those in Mt are in the third person, and apply to all mankind: 'for theirs is,' 'for they shall,' etc. Those in Lk are in the second person, and apply primarily to those present: 'for yours is,' 'for ye shall,' etc. (2) In Lk the more spiritual words which occur in Mt are omitted, and the blessings are assigned to external conditions. Actual poverty, sorrow, and hunger are declared to be blessed,—no doubt as opportunities of internal graces; and the corresponding woes are uttered against actual wealth, jollity, and fulness of bread,—as sources of grievous temptation. In the last beatitude there is less difference between the two. In Lk there is no blessedness assigned to unpopularity, unless it is incurred for the Son of Man's sake; and there is no woe on popularity for His sake.

* Beatitudo is used in this sense as early as Ambrose: Quatuor tantum beatitudines sanctus Lucas Dominicus posuit, octo vero sanctus Matthaeus: sed in his octo illae quatuor sunt, et in istis quatuor illae octo. Hic enim quatuor velut virtutes amplexus est cardinales (Expos. Evang. sec. Luc. v. 49, Migne, xiv. xv. 1649). In Gr. μακαριστός has this meaning in the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom and elsewhere; the μακαριστοί are sung on Sundays instead of the third antiphon. In English this use of 'beatitudo' is perhaps not earlier than 1500.

The first difference explains the second. The universal declarations in Mt require the spiritual conditions. The special declarations in Lk, being addressed to disciples, do not. Even for pagans, to be poor in spirit and to hunger after righteousness are blessed things: but it is only to the faithful Christian that actual poverty and actual hunger are sure to be blessings. To others these trials may be barren suffering, or may harden rather than chasten. The beatitudes omitted in Lk are the third, fifth, sixth, and seventh of Mt, viz. those relating to the meek, the merciful, the pure in heart, and the peacemakers.

The eight beatitudes may be regarded as an analysis of perfect spiritual wellbeing; and nowhere in non-Christian literature shall we find so sublime a summary of the best elements in the felicity attainable by man. They correct all low and carnal views of human happiness. But it is fanciful to find a gradation in the order in which they are recorded, e.g. that poverty of spirit is the death of self-righteousness; mourning the burial of self-righteousness; meekness the virtue that takes the place of self-righteousness, etc.

It is more to the point to notice that they do not describe eight different classes of people, but eight different elements of excellence, which may all be combined in one and the same man. Some of them, indeed, are almost certain to be so combined, e.g. being poor in spirit with meekness, and endurance of persecution with mourning. And perhaps it is not untrue to say with Ambrose that the four given by St. Luke virtually include the whole eight; but to make each of the four correspond to one of the four cardinal virtues is to force the meaning of one or the other.

The following table will show in a clear way the difference between Mt and Lk in the four beatitudes which they have in common:—

ST. MATTHEW.	ST. LUKE.	ST. LUKE.
Blessed	Blessed	Woe

BECAUSE was formerly used (and is still used locally) to express the purpose. Thus Burton, *Anat. There are two examples in AV, Wis 11²⁸ 'And winkest at the sins of men b. they should amend' (RV 'to the end they may repent'); Mt 20²¹ 'And the multitude rebuked them b. (RV 'that') they should hold their peace.'

Son of Benjamin, Gn 46²¹, 1 Ch 7⁶⁻⁸ and implicitly in 1 Ch 8¹ where for MT, בכורו אשבל = his first-born, Ashbel, we should probably read בכר בכורו = Becher and Ashbel.

BECHORATH (בכורח).—One of Saul's ancestors (1 S 9¹, 1 Ch 7⁹).

BECK (from verb 'beck,' which is a short form of beckon), now nearly displaced by 'nod,' occurs 2 Mac 8¹⁸ AV and RV, 'Almighty God, who at a beck can cast down both them that come against us and all the world' (Gr. ἐν νεύματι).

Beckon occurs more frequently, but only in NT. It deserves attention on account of the precision of the Greek words.

1. There is the simple νεύω, to nod, to make signs with the head, Jn 13²⁴ of Simon Peter's nod to John to ask who was to be the betrayer; Ac 24¹⁰ of Felix's nod to Paul to speak.

2. Διανεύω, lit. 'to nod through,' Lk 12² of Zacharias' beckoning (RV 'making signs') to the people, δια perhaps expressing the range—not to one, but to many.

3. Κατανεύω, lit. 'to nod down to,' Lk 5⁷ 'they beckoned unto their partners in the other boat.'

Other compounds of νεύω found in NT, but not tr^d 'beckon,' are (1) ἀνεύω, Jn 5¹³ 'Jesus had conveyed himself away'; (2) ἐνεύω, Lk 13² 'they made signs to his father'; and (3) ἱστεύω, Ac 18²⁰ 'he consented not.'

4. Then there is σείω 'to shake,' with its compounds ἀνασείω, διασείω, κατασείω, of which only the last is tr^d 'beckon,' to make signs with the hand, esp. before beginning to address an audience, Ac 12¹⁷ 13¹⁶ 19²⁸ 21⁴⁰.

BECOME.—1. As tr. of γένηται 'to be seemly,' 'appropriate,' 'b.' is found Mt 3¹⁵, Eph 5³, 1 Ti 2¹⁰, Tit 2¹ (RV 'befit'), He 2¹⁰ 7²⁶ 'such an high priest became us.' In Tit 2⁸ 'in behaviour as becometh holiness' (RV 'reverent in demeanour'), the Gr. is one word ἱεροπρεπής, from ἱερός 'sacred' and πρέπει 'it is becoming.' In Ro 16⁷ 'as becometh saints' the Gr. is ἀξίως τῶν ἁγίων 'worthily of the saints'; so in Ph 1²⁷ 'as it becometh the gospel of Christ' (RV 'worthy of'). 2. In Bar 3¹⁶ occurs the obsolete phrase 'where is become,' for 'what is become of?'; 'Where are the princes of the heathen become?' (RV omits 'become'). Cf. Wither (1628), 'Why should the wicked . . . say, Where is their God become?'

BED (for which RV substitutes 'couch' in 1 Ch 5¹, Est 1⁶ 7⁸, Job 17¹³, Ps 41³, Pr 7¹⁶, Ca 1¹⁶, and 'litter' in Ca 3⁷) is AV tr. of the following Heb. words:—1. קשקש (fr. קשב 'lie down') 40 times. 2. נצנץ (fr. נצ, 'spread out') poet. 1 Ch 5¹ (fr. Gn 49⁴), Job 17¹³, Ps 63⁶ 132². 3. קמץ (fr. same root) Is 28²⁸. 4. ערניה ('flower-bed') twice, Ca 5¹³ 6², to which RV adds Ezk 17⁷⁻¹⁰. 5. קמץ (fr. קמץ 'stretch out') 26 times. 6. ערש (a four-post bed?) 4 times, Job 7¹³, Ps 41³, Pr 7¹⁶, Ca 1¹⁶. The last two words appear to be parallel in meaning in Am 6⁴, 'that lie upon beds (ערושות) of ivory, and stretch themselves upon their couches (ערושות).' Both are used also in the sense of 'bier,' קמץ in 2 S 3²¹, ערש in Syr. (comp. 'arsā' in Lk 7¹⁴), while קשקש is applied in 2 Ch 16¹⁴ to Asa's resting-place in his tomb. All this lends support to the opinion of those who interpret the 'bedstead' of Og (Dt 3¹¹) of a sarcophagus (see Driver, ad loc.). The word ערש, written without vowel points, might be read either ערש 'bed' or ערש 'staff.' Hence in Gn 47³¹ we find, 'Israel bowed himself upon the bed's head, the tr. following MT (על ראש ערשתי), while in He 11²¹ we have 'Jacob worshipped, leaning upon the top of his staff,' which adopts the LXX ἐπὶ τὸ ἄκρον τῆς ῥάβδου αὐτοῦ. See next article. J. A. SELBIE.

BED.—The bed of the Hebrews did not differ in essential respects from that of other Oriental peoples. It consisted of a mat and quilt to lie upon, and a covering or coverlet. 'For the bed is shorter than a man can stretch himself on it; and the covering narrower than that he can wrap himself in it' (Is 28²⁰). The adjuncts were the pillow and the bedstead and its ornaments. Amongst all classes the custom was to sleep in the day-clothes without any material change of garments; sheets were therefore superfluous. In its simplest form the bed consisted only of the day-clothes and the outer garment or cloak. 'If thou at all take thy neighbour's garment to pledge, thou shalt restore it to him by that the sun goeth down: for that is his only covering; it is his garment for his skin: wherein shall he sleep?' (Ex 22²⁷).

The ordinary bedding used throughout the East at the present day is probably similar in character to that which has been in use for centuries, and consists of (1) a mat of rushes or straw; (2) skins, or a cloak or a quilt stuffed with dry herbs, hair, or vegetable fibre to lie upon; (3) a covering of light stuff in summer, or of skins or quilted stuff in winter. The bedding is rolled up (Pr 22²⁷) in the morning, and, after being aired in the sun, is put away in a chamber or closet. Many of these beds are kept in a house, and, when the inmates are few, they are sometimes stacked one on another and form a temporary bedstead. There is little difference between the bed for sleeping on and the divan or couch for resting on during the day. The bed is essentially an article that can be moved about readily from place to place. 'Bring him up to me in the bed, that I may slay him (1 S 19¹⁵). 'Behold, men bring on a bed a man that was palsied' (Lk 5¹⁸⁻²²).

There is usually some portion of the house set apart as a room where the whole family may sleep. 'My children are with me in bed, I cannot rise and give thee' (Lk 11⁵⁻⁸). Among the very poorest a portion of the floor is set apart, and this is often somewhat raised up above the surrounding floor so as to serve as a bedstead. When there are two storeys, the beds are on the upper floor, and during the summer time they are usually on the flat roof. Thus references are constantly made to going up to bed, which may indicate either a bed raised up on a bedstead, or situated in an upper chamber, or on the roof (Gn 49²⁸). 'Thou shalt not come down from the bed whither thou art gone up' (2 K 1⁴); 'nor go up into my bed' (Ps 132³; cf. 1 S 28²³).

The bed is usually placed near the wall of the chamber, and there are indications that it was placed alongside the wall. 'Then he turned his face to the wall and prayed unto the Lord' (2 K 20²).

The bed used by watchmen, both when in the fields watching for marauders and when acting as doorkeepers, is of the simplest form, and requires no description: 'A booth in a vineyard, as a lodge in a garden of cucumbers' (Is 1⁸. See CUCUMBER).

In accordance with the wealth of the house or family, the bed is enriched and embroidered. This is so also among the Bedawin and dwellers in tents. 'I have spread my couch with carpets of tapestry, with striped cloths of the yarn of Egypt; I have perfumed my bed with myrrh, aloes, and cinnamon' (Pr 7^{16,17}); 'the couches were of gold and silver' (Est 1⁶).

Pillows and cushions are the usual adjuncts of beds in the East at the present day, and it may be assumed that they were as generally used in early days in Palestine as they were among the Greeks after the Homeric age. A piece of stone such as that used by Jacob (Gn 28¹¹) at Bethel would be naturally accepted as a pillow by a native of Palestine on the line of march at the present day. The quilt or pillow of goats' hair placed by Michal (1 S 19¹²) in David's bed, though only a makeshift hastily put together, indicates the use of pillows at that time. Those mentioned Ezk 13¹⁸ do not necessarily appear to be bed pillows. Pillows at the present day are usually made of the same stuff as the bedding, but more profusely ornamented and embossed, and in wealthy houses covered with satin, silk, and embroidery. 'The silken cushions of a bed' (Am 3¹²). Sometimes the finest linen is lightly tacked on the embroidery, probably to protect the face from the roughness of the work.

Among the poorer classes, bedsteads, when used, were probably light portable frames for keeping the bedding off the ground, and for carrying sick persons, as on a litter. Although there is no direct allusion to a bedstead except perhaps that of Og, king of Bashan, there are several references which indicate that beds were raised above the floor. In the passage relating to Jacob's 'bed of sickness' (Gn 47³¹), the 'bed's head' is referred to. See also 1 S 19¹⁵, 2 S 3³¹, Lk 5¹⁸⁻²⁵. In whatever sense the passage referring to Og, 'behold his bedstead was a bedstead of iron' (Dt 3¹¹), is to be understood, the hard black basalt so common in Bashan is probably referred to.

There are numerous indications that in the houses of the wealthy, and in the palaces, there were bedsteads highly ornamented, and that the richness and magnificence of the beds and bedsteads among the Asiatics was at least equal to that which obtained among the Greeks and Romans. The bedsteads in the most wealthy houses were of costly kinds of wood, veneered with tortoise-shell and ivory, and ornamented with gold and silver. The couches of 'gold and silver' (Est 1⁶) probably included the bedstead. The same may be said of the 'beds of ivory' (Am 6⁴ 3¹⁵). The ten beds with feet of silver, and the furniture belonging to them, sent to Eleazar the high priest (Jos. Ant. XII. ii. 15), evidently included the bedsteads.

The ornaments of the bedstead included the canopy and pillars. 'King Solomon made himself a palanquin of the wood of Lebanon. He made the pillars thereof of silver, the bottom thereof of gold, the seat of it of purple' (Ca 3¹⁰). 'There were hangings of white cloth, of green, and of blue, fastened with cords of fine linen and purple to silver rings and pillars of marble; the couches were of gold and silver upon a pavement of porphyry and white marble, and alabaster and stone of blue colour' (Est 1⁶). 'Now Holofernes rested upon his bed under a canopy, which was of purple, and gold, and emeralds, and precious stones inwoven' (Jth 10²¹).

BEDCHAMBER.—See HOUSE.

BEDAD (בָּדָד).—The father of Hadad, king of Edom (Gn 36³⁵=1 Ch 1⁴⁶).

BEDAN (בְּדָן).—1. Mentioned with Jerubbaal, Jephthah, and Samuel as one of the deliverers of Israel (1 S 12¹¹). The name does not occur in Jg, and it is probably a corruption for Barak (so LXX and Pesh.). Chronologically Barak should precede Gideon, but the order cannot be pressed (cf. v. 9). The Jews explain בְּדָן as=בְּדָן 'a son of Dan,' i.e. Samson; this is impossible. The more obvious emendation, 'Abdon (אֲבֹדֹן, Ewald), is unsuitable, since little is known of this hero. 2. A Manassite (1 Ch 7¹⁷).

BEDEIAH (בְּדַיָּה=בְּדַיָּה 'servant of J').—One of those who had taken foreign wives (Ezr 10²⁵): in 1 Es 9³⁴ apparently Pedias.

BEE (דְּבַר דְּבָרָה dēbārāh, μέλισσα, apis).—The bee is known in Arab. as nahl, but dabr is a swarm of bees, pl. dabūr. The common term for wasp or hornet is dabbār, which is a corruption of zenbūr.

The bee is an insect found in large numbers in Syria and Pal., both wild and hived. The wild bee is most common in lonely ravines, where it makes its nest in the clefts of the precipitous rocks, often with great difficulty accessible to man. They also make their hives in hollow trees (1 S 14^{25, 26}); but as the forests are few in these lands, they are a less natural refuge for the bees than the rocks (cf. Dt 32¹⁸, Ps 81¹⁶). Tristram says that they are specially abundant in the wilderness of Judea, and that most of the honey sold in S. Pal. comes from these wild hives. This explains the allusion (Mt 3⁴), 'and his meat was locusts and wild honey.' It also explains the sentence (Dt 1⁴), 'The Amorites, which dwelt in the mountain, came out against you, and chased you, as bees do.' When tame bees are disturbed, it is well known how furiously they will attack their disturber. But their vehemence is as nothing to that of the wild bees, which are unaccustomed to man. Dr. Thomson (Land and Book, p. 299) says, 'The people of Ma'alia (in Wady Ḳarn) several years ago let a man down the face of the rock by ropes. He was entirely protected from the attacks of the bees, and extracted a large amount of honey; but he was so terrified by the prodigious swarms of bees that he could not be induced to repeat the exploit.' The Psalmist says (Ps 118¹²), 'They compassed me about like bees,' alluding to the threatening attacks of these insects.

It was said of the land of promise that it was a 'land flowing with milk and honey.' This is partly justified by the wild bees and honey, but still more so by the large numbers of domesticated bees. Every peasant's house has its beehives. Sometimes they are boxes, as with us; sometimes a broken water jar is made to serve; but more usually they are wicker cylinders, about 4 ft. long and 10 in. in diameter, plastered over with cow-dung, and stopped with the same material at either end, except a few holes for the entry and exit of the bees. These hives are often piled in a pyramidal shape, with four or more at the base, and plastered together with cow-dung to protect them from the heat, and shaded with branches of trees.

For hiving bees, manœuvres are used similar to those so common in the West. The superior of a convent near Beirût had a chest partially filled with figs, through the keyhole of which a swarm of bees entered. The following day four jars, with a little grape honey smeared inside, were put in succession to the keyhole, and filled with bees.

It is certainly not customary for the people in Bible lands to hiss to their bees (Is 7¹⁸). It might have been in Bible days. It is, however, universal to whistle to pigeons in order to recall them from their flight. Hundreds of persons can be seen on the flat roofs of the houses in the large cities amusing themselves in this manner a little before sunset. Sir John Lubbock believes that bees lack the sense of hearing.

The honey is usually extracted about the time of the Feast of the Cross, in the middle of Sept. A man with his face masked with iron gauze and his hands protected with mittens, simply puts his hands into the hive and extracts the combs, leaving a little for the bees. The honey is usually squeezed out of the combs, and packed in jars (bottle, marg. 1 K 14³) or tins, and sometimes in skins. The people of the Antilebanon plateau, north of Damascus, raise large quantities of honey.

A bee cultivator from America settled some years ago in Beirût to raise bees. He spoke of the Syrian bee as superior to the usual breeds of Europe. It is somewhat smaller than the Apis mellifica of Europe, and of a lighter colour. It is the Apis fasciata, Lat.

As many of the plants to which the bees resort are aromatics, much of the honey has a decided flavour, often very agreeable, sometimes a little rank. The wax is principally used in making tapers for religious purposes. There is no evidence that candles were known in ancient times. The people are very fond of honey. They dip their bread in it. They make certain kinds of cakes (Ex 16²¹) and pastry with it. They sometimes preserve fruit in it. They eat it in quantities surprising to Occidentals. It is seldom eaten direct from the comb. It has been from the earliest times an article of commerce in Bible lands. Jacob sent some of it to his son Joseph (Gn 43¹¹). Judah and Israel sold it to Tyrian merchants for export (Ezk 27¹⁷). Stores of honey were collected for this purpose, as at Mizpah (Jer 41⁸). Considering the large quantities of honey produced in Pal. there is no occasion for supposing that דְּבַשׁ dēbāsh signifies the dibs, the grape honey of our time.

Much controversy has taken place over the swarm of bees in the carcass of the lion (Jg 14⁸). The simple fact is, that in a few hours after an animal is dead, jackals, dogs, and vultures often reduce the carcass to a ligamentous skeleton, which is soon dried in the fierce heat, and would make as savoury a hive as the cow-dung-plastered baskets which are used for raising bees, and the cow-dung trays on which silk-worms are developed.

Honey, דְּבַשׁ dēbāsh, could not be used in burnt-offerings (Lv 2¹¹).

Honey is used to illustrate moral teachings. A man is exhorted to eat honey and the honey comb (Pr 24¹³), but warned against surfeit (Pr 25^{16, 27}). It was a simile for moral sweetness (Ezk 3⁸), and for the excellence of the law (Ps 19¹⁰), of pleasant words (Pr 16²⁴), and of the lips (Ca 4¹¹), and as a figure for love (Ca 5¹).

The LXX adds to Pr 6⁸ 'Go to the bee, and learn how diligent she is, and what a noble work she produces; whose labour kings and private men use for their health. She is desired and honoured by all, and, though weak in strength, yet since she values wisdom she prevails.' This passage exists in the Arabic version, and is quoted by ancient writers.

BEELIADA (בְּעִילָאָדָא 'Baal knows').—A son of David, 1 Ch 14⁷, changed in conformity with later usage (see ISHBOSHETH) into Eliada (עִילָאָדָא 'El knows') in 2 S 5¹⁶.

BEELSARUS (Βεέλσαρος), 1 Es 5⁸.—One of the leaders (προηγούμενοι) of those Jews who returned to Jerus. with Zerub., called BILSHAN, Ezr 2², Neh 7⁷. The form in 1 Es appears not to have come through the Gr. of the canonical books, but to be due to a confusion of ב and פ in the Heb.

BEELTETHMUS (Βεέλτεθμος).—An officer of Artaxerxes residing in Pal., 1 Es 2^{16, 25} (LXX 15, 21). It is not a proper name, but a title of Rehum, the name immediately preceding it in Ezr 4⁸ (Α βααλθράμυ). It is a corruption of מַלְאָךְ מִשְׁפָּט = 'lord of judgment,' and is rendered 'chancellor' by AV and RV in Ezr, 'story-writer' in 1 Es 2¹⁷ (ὁ τὰ προσπιπτοντα, LXX). The title has been explained by the Assy. inscriptions, and signifies 'lord of official intelligence' or 'postmaster' (Sayce, Introd. to Ezr., Neh., and Est. p. 27). See CHANCELLOR.

BEER (בְּאֵר 'a well').—1. A station in the journey from Arnon to the Jordan, mentioned Nu 21¹⁸, with a poetical extract commemorating the digging of a well at this spot. The context indicates the neighbourhood, but further identification of the station is wanting. Perhaps the words translated 'and from the wilderness,' which immediately follow this extract (Nu 21¹⁸), should be translated (following the LXX ἀπὸ φέαρτος), 'and from Beer,' or 'the well.' It is generally identified with Beer-Elim ('well of mighty men'), mentioned Is 15⁸, and in the second part of the compound name it may be conjectured that there is reference to the event commemorated in the song, Nu 21^{17, 18}. See Budde in New World, Mar. 1895, p. 136 ff.

2. The place to which Jotham ran away after uttering his parable (Jg 9²¹). Its position is unknown. If, as some suppose, it is the same as Beeroth (Jos 9¹⁷), its site is fixed (see BEEROTH). But Beeroth is in Benjamin, and it seems probable that Jotham fled to his own people in Manasseh, and not southward.

BEER-LAHAI-ROI (בְּעַר לַחַי רֹאִי 'Well of the Living One that seeth me,' Gn 16^{7, 14} 24⁶² 25¹¹).—It is expressly described as 'the fountain in the way to Shur,' signifying that it was well known, on the way to Egypt whither the Egyptian Hagar was naturally fleeing. It is placed between Kadesh and Bered; but the site of neither is certain. Bered has been located at El-Khalasah, 13 miles S.W. of Beersheba. When Abraham dwelt between Kadesh and Shur, he is said (Gn 20¹) to have sojourned in Gerar at the same time or shortly after. Gn 25¹¹ and 26¹ also imply that the well, Beer-lahai-roi, was not very far from Gerar. Rowland claims to have found the true site at 'Ain Moillāhhi, some 50 miles S. of Beersheba, and 10 or 12 miles W. of 'Ain Kadis (PEFFST, 1884, p. 177). (See BERED, HAGAR, ISAAC, SHUR.)

A. HENDERSON.

BEEROTH (בְּעֵרוֹת 'Wells').—One of the confederate Hivite cities which wilyly made alliance with Joshua after the overthrow of Ai (Jos 9¹⁷). It was afterwards in the territory of Benjamin (Jos 18²⁵). The Beerothites, like the Gibeonites, maintained their independence as a tribe in Israel even after the return from the Exile (Ezr 2²⁵, Neh 7²⁹). The occasion of their flight to Gittaim (2 S 4³) is not mentioned; and it is uncertain if that is the town named (Neh 11³³). Rimmon, the father of the murderers of Ishbosheth, and Naharai, Joab's armour-bearer (2 S 23³⁷ RVm, 1 Ch 11³⁹), were Beerothites. It is identified with Bireh, 8 miles N. of Jerusalem on the great northern road, the usual halting place on the first night from Jerusalem. Tradition connects it with the story of Lk 2^{43, 45} as the place whence Mary and Joseph returned to Jerusalem. There is no reason to doubt the correctness of this tradition, as the distance is convenient, and the usage of Eastern caravans seldom changes.

A. HENDERSON.

BEEROTH-BENE-JAAKAN (בְּעֵרוֹת בְּנֵי יַאקָן), in Dt 10⁶ RV; 'Beeroth of the children of Jaakan,' AV, LXX Βηροθ. The place is called Bene-jaakan in the list of stations, Nu 33^{31, 32}. From Gn 36²⁷, 1 Ch 1⁴² the Bene-jaakan are descendants of Seir the Horite, and the name of the adjacent station, Hor-haggidgad (which see), contains הַר. The border of Seir or Edom is the probable situation of this unidentified spot.

BEER-SHEBA (בְּעֵשֶׂבָרָה, Arab. Bir es Sebá).—A village, or settlement, on the N. bank of the Wady es-Sebá, deriving its special interest from its connexion with the patriarchs. It was the residence successively of Abraham (Gn 21³¹), of Isaac (Gn 26²³), and of Jacob (Gn 28¹⁰), and received its name ('Well of the oath') as having been the place, marked by a well, where Abraham entered into covenant with Abimelech, king of Gerar (Gn 21³¹ E). (A different derivation is adopted in Gn 26³³ J.) It was afterwards visited by Elijah when fleeing from the wrath of Jezebel on his way to Horeb (1 K 19³). Beer-sheba fell within the lot of the tribe of Simeon (Jos 19²), though included in the wider boundaries of Judah. It was bounded on the S. by the Negeb or 'South Country,' a spacious tract of undulating chalky downs, wide pastures, and generally waterless brook courses. Its position in the extreme south gave rise to the phrase 'from Dan to Beersheba' (Jg 20¹, 1 S 3²⁰ etc.)=all the territory of Israel. The converse 'from B. to Dan' occurs in 1 Ch 21², 2 Ch 30⁶. The soil in the valleys where there is some moisture is exceedingly rich, and is rudely cultivated by the fellahin, who succeed in producing fine crops of wheat and barley. In the tracts around Beer-sheba the Bedawin find ample pasturage for their flocks and herds, which towards evening assemble in crowds around the wells as they did three thousand years ago. That the district was once thickly inhabited, probably in the early Christian centuries before the Mohammedan irruption, is shown by ruined walls and foundations which are visible at intervals for several miles between Bir es-Sebá and el-Tel Milh. The position of Bir es-Sebá is marked by lines of foundations along some rising ground above the N. bank of the river, amongst which is the foundation of a Greek church, with apse, sacristy, and aisles; and in the valley below are the celebrated wells sunk through alluvial deposits into the limestone rock. These are five or six in number; and of the two principal ones the larger is regarded with confidence as coming down from the time of Abraham. This (according to Tristram) is the tradition of the Arabs, who point to it as the work of Ibrahim el-Khalil (Abraham the Friend). Conder, who carried out the Ordnance Survey of this part of Pal., states that the depth of the well is 45 ft., and that it is lined with rings of masonry to a depth of 28 ft. That some of the stones are not very ancient is shown by his discovery of a tablet dated 505 A.H., at a depth of 15 courses. This, however, does not throw any doubt on the extreme age of the well itself, but only suggests that it had been repaired during the 12th cent. The marble blocks which form the rim of the well are deeply cut by the ropes used for drawing water; and rude marble troughs of circular form are arranged round the well for the use of the cattle. A second well, 5 ft. in diameter, is found at about 300 yds. to the W. of that just described, and in the opposite direction is a third, 23 ft. deep, which is dry.

The desert of Beer-sheba is very beautiful in spring and early summer when the surface is carpeted with herbage and flowers; but later in the year it is parched and desolate in the extreme, not a tree breaking the monotony of the landscape or the rays of the sun.

Tell es-Sebá is the site of a village at the junction of the W. el-Khalil, which comes down from Hebron on the north, with the W. es-Sebá, and is 2½ miles from Bir es-Sebá. From its summit, 950 ft. above the Mediterranean, a commanding view is obtained of the country around, terminating along the E. in the deep ravines and rocky slopes which lead down to the basin of the Dead Sea.

BETLE.—The word rendered beetle in the AV and cricket in the RV (Lv 11²²) is חַרְגֹּל hargól. It is an insect of the grasshopper kind, having 'legs above its feet' to leap with. The Heb. root חַרְגַל hargal, as its cognate harjal in Arab., signifies to leap. The Arab. word harjalet signifies a flight of locusts, and harjuwan, the l and n being interchangeable, a sort of grasshopper or locust that leaps without flying. See LOCUST. G. E. POST.

BEEVES, the pl. of 'beef,' is used in Lv 22^{19, 21}, Nu 31^{28, 30, 33, 44} for the animals themselves, not their flesh. Cf.—

'A pound of man's flesh, taken from a man,
Is not so estimable, profitable neither,
As flesh of muttons, beefs, or goats.'
Shaks. M. of V. i. iii. 68.

RV retains all but Lv 22²¹, AV 'a free-will offering in beeves or sheep,' RV 'a free-will offering of the herd or of the flock.' The sing. does not occur in AV or RV, but the Douay Bible (1609) renders Dt 14⁵ 'the pygargue, the wilde beefe (AV 'wild ox'), the cameloparde.' J. HASTINGS.

BEFORE, meaning 'in the presence of,' occurs frequently, and as the trⁿ of a great variety of Heb. and Gr. words. Notice Gn 11²⁸ 'Haran died before his father Terah' (בְּפָנָיו 'before the face of,' RV 'in the presence of'); Sir 36⁴ 'As thou wast sanctified in us before them, so be thou magnified among them before us'; 39²⁰ 'He seeth from everlasting to everlasting, and there is nothing wonderful before him'; Bar 2⁸ 'Yet have we not prayed before the Lord.' In Gal 3⁸ 'the Scripture . . . preached before the gospel unto Abraham,' the words are a lit. tr. of the Greek (προεγγηλιαστο) and b. = 'beforehand,' as RV. See AFORE.

J. HASTINGS.

BEGOTTEN.—Only begotten is the trⁿ in AV and RV of μονογενής at To 8¹⁷, Jn 1^{14, 18} 3^{16, 18}, He 11¹⁷

1 Jn 4⁹, all (except To 8¹⁷, He 11¹⁷ 'Abraham . . . offered up his only b. son') in ref. to Christ. The same Gr. word is found in Lk 7¹² 'the only son of his mother,' 8⁴² 'he had one (RV 'an') only daughter,' and 9⁸⁸ 'he is mine only child.'

Firstbegotten is the tr. of πρωτότοκος in He 1⁶, and in Rev 1⁵ (both in reference to Christ), a word which is here by RV and elsewhere by AV and RV tr^d 'firstborn.' It would have been more accurate if 'first-begotten' had been given as the trⁿ of πρωτ., and 'only-born' of μωυ. The meaning of the latter is indeed, as Westcott points out, obscured under the trⁿ 'only-begotten,' since in its reference to Christ it is the Son's personal Being, not His generation, that is the thought. Both words express the Son of Man's uniqueness among the sons of men, μωυ more absolutely than πρωτ., and more directly in relation to the Father. See Thayer, NT Lex.; and Cremer, Bibl.-Theol. Lex. of NT Greek, s.vv., and (esp. for πρωτ.), Lightfoot on Col 1¹⁵. J. HASTINGS.

BEGUILE.—'To beguile' is to act with guile, to deceive; but (like 'amuse,' which originally meant 'to bewilder') it is mostly employed now in the sense of 'to charm away' (care or time). This meaning, though as old as 1611, does not occur in AV, where on the contrary we find the word signifying directly to cheat, as Col 2¹⁸ 'Let no man b. you of your reward' (Gr. καταβραβεύω, from βραβεῖον 'a prize,' RV 'rob you of your prize.' See the criticism of this tr. by T. S. Evans in Lat. and Gr. Verse, p. xlix). J. HASTINGS.
