I. HISTORY OF ST. PETER TILL THE ASCENSION.—1. Names.—The apostle bears the names Συμεών or Σίμων, Κηφᾶς or Πέτρος; sometimes the names are combined—Σίμων Πέτρος. (a) Συμεών, Σίμων. When the Jews were brought into connexion with Greek life, for the old Hebrew name of the patriarch (Gn 29<sup>33</sup>)—יִשְׁמָעֵאל, Συμεών (LXX)—the true Greek name Σίμων was frequently substituted (Sir 50<sup>1</sup>). In 1 Mac the ancestor of the Maccabees is Συμεών (2<sup>1</sup>, cf. Jos. Ant. XII. vi. 1); Simon Macc. himself is once called Συμεών (2<sup>65</sup>). Συμεών is found in Jos. BJ iv. iii. 9, and in the NT (of persons other than the apostle) Lk 2<sup>20a</sup>, Ac 13<sup>1</sup>. Σίμων is often transliterated into Aramaic as ܣܝܡܘܢ (see Dalman, Die Worte Jesu p. 41, Gram. Aram. p. 143; cf. Deissmann, Bibelstudien p. 184; it should, however, be noticed, that in the Syriac versions of the NT the old form, ܣܝܡܘܢ alone is used). The apostle then bore the Hebrew name Symeon, but was much more often (see below) called by the Greek name Simon, which had become its common equivalent. (b) Κηφᾶς, Πέτρος. The plural of the Hebrew substantive (קִרְבָּי = 'rocks') is found in Job 30<sup>6</sup>, Jer 4<sup>29</sup> (LXX πέτρα in both passages). 'In the Targums (Buxtorf, Lexicon Chaldaicum 1032) [the word] occurs as קִרְבָּי, קִרְבָּי, for a rock or a stone (e.g. gems, hail-stones, thunderbolts), or a shore. The same senses recur in the Talmud and Midrashim (Levy-Fleischer, Neuheb. u. Chald. Wörterb. ii. 321 f.), where the word has also the meaning "ring"; apparently the sense "rock" is rare' (Hort, First Ep. of St. Peter p. 152). There seems to be no evidence that the word was in any other case used as a name; it has no connexion with the name Caiaphas (Nestle in Expos. Times x. p. 185). Similarly, with regard to the Greek equivalent Πέτρος, there is little or no evidence of its occurrence as a proper name. Keim (History of Jesus of Nazara iv. p. 265, Eng. tr.) refers to Jos. Ant. XVIII. vi. 3, where a freedman of Berenice, mother of Agrippa I., is in some texts named Πέτρος; but according to a better supported reading the name is Πιῶρος (see Niese). From Rabbinic literature a very few instances of the occurrence of the name Peter are adduced (see Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah i. p. 475 n.; Dalman, Gram. Aram. p. 147).

The usage of NT.—(a) Συμεών. In 2 P 1<sup>1</sup> the reading Συμεών Πέτρος (NAKL P) and the mass of MSS) is perhaps better supported than its rival Σίμων Π. (B curs. circ. 20, verss. pler.), and certainly, as a combination which occurs nowhere else in the NT, it is not likely to be due to copyists. In one passage of the NT the name stands above suspicion. St. James begins his speech in Ac 15<sup>14</sup> with the words "Ἀδελφοί, ἀκούσατέ μου. Συμεὼν ἐξηγήσατο κ.τ.λ. Here the Hebrew name Συμεών completely harmonizes with the intentional antiqueness of the opening appeal (cf. e.g. 2 Ch 20<sup>20</sup> 28<sup>11</sup>). (b) The Greek Σίμων (apart from the combination Σ. Πέτρος) is not found in the narrative of the Gospels after the apostle's call except in connexion with the lists of the apostles (Mt 4<sup>18</sup> 10<sup>2</sup>, Mk 11<sup>6</sup> 29<sup>36</sup> 31<sup>6</sup>, Lk 4<sup>38</sup> 5<sup>34</sup> 10 61<sup>4</sup>, Jn 1<sup>41</sup>). On the other hand, Simon is the name by which our Lord addresses him (Mt 17<sup>28</sup>, Mk 14<sup>37</sup>, Lk 22<sup>31</sup>, and, with his father's name added, Mt 16<sup>17</sup>, Jn 14<sup>2</sup> 21<sup>15a</sup>), the exceptions (see below) being Mt 16<sup>18</sup>, Lk 22<sup>34</sup>; and by which the apostles are introduced as speaking of him (Lk 24<sup>34</sup>; but see Mk 16<sup>7</sup>). Thus it would seem that during the months of discipleship the apostle was still commonly known by his name Simon; and this was the case even in much later days among those who, being outside the Church, could not understand the strange Πέτρος as in itself a sufficient designation (Ac 10<sup>6.18.32</sup> 11<sup>13</sup>). (c) After St. Peter had taken his place as leader in the earliest stages of the Church's history, that name—Κηφᾶς, Πέτρος—which his Master had given him as prophetic of his special functions, superseded, at least in Christian circles, his original name Simon. So late as the time when St. Paul wrote to the Galatians and to the Corinthians, the great Apostle of the Circumcision was recognized among distant Gentile Churches under his Aramaic name Cephas (Gal 1<sup>18</sup> 29. 11. 14.* 1 Co 1<sup>12</sup> 3<sup>22</sup> 9<sup>5</sup> 15<sup>5</sup>)—a fact which suggests that at Jerusalem, where St. Paul first knew him, and whence emissaries came to Corinth and to the Churches of Galatia, the name Cephas at least most frequently was used. At the same time, at any rate in Galatia, the Greek equivalent Πέτρος was not unknown (Gal 2<sup>7f</sup>). At all events, before the time when 1 Peter, the Synoptic Gospels, and the Acts were written, the Greek name Πέτρος was that one by which the apostle was known throughout the Christian Church. As to details, the name Πέτρος predominates in the Synoptic Gospels (narrative)—Mt 19 times, Mk 18 times, Lk 16 times; it is common in Jn (15 times); it is exclusively used in the narrative of the Acts, 51 times. As to the use of Πέτρος in speeches in place of the usual Σίμων (see above)—in Mk 16<sup>7</sup> the evangelist extends his own usage into his report of the angel's message; in Lk 22<sup>34</sup> Πέτρος seems designedly used to bring out the tragic contrast between the typical position of the apostle and his destined failure; in Ac 10<sup>13</sup> 11<sup>7</sup> (the voice from heaven), though it may at first sight seem simplest to suppose that the name was used by which he was then commonly known, yet it must be remembered that this first opening of the door of faith to the Gentiles was one of the occasions in view of which our Lord gave him the name Peter. (d) The combination Σίμων Πέτρος never occurs in Mk. It is found once in Mt (16<sup>18</sup>), once in Lk (5<sup>8</sup>)—both passages recording a turning-point of the apostle's life; in St. John it is used no fewer than 17 times; it is at least a well-supported variant in 2 P 1<sup>1</sup>. The combination then appears to be one which naturally suggested itself to two evangelists in connexion with two events closely bearing on St. Peter's life-work, and which, partly perhaps as uniting current Christian usage with a distant past, was a favourite with St. John. In one part of the Church, as might have been expected, the name Cephas survived. In the Syriac versions of the Gospels and of the Acts the common name for the apostle is Simon Cephas.

2. Family, home, education.—(a) The name of the apostle's father appears as Ἰωῶν in Mt 16<sup>17</sup>, as Ἰωάννης in Jn 14<sup>2</sup> 21<sup>15.16.17</sup>. It is generally supposed that Ἰωῶν is a contraction of Ἰωάννης. It is, however, possible that we have here an instance of a double name, Jona-Jochanan or Jonas-Johannes, see art. JOHN (FATHER OF SIMON PETER). (b) The brother of Simon Peter, like his fellow-townsmen Philip, bears a true Greek name—Ἀνδρέας. It is, perhaps, to be noticed that Andrew, with Philip, appears in connexion with certain Ἕλληνας (the word may mean Gentiles, or, in the stricter sense, Greeks) in Jn 12<sup>20f</sup>. It is certainly significant that both brothers were known by Greek names. (c) That the apostle was married in the earliest days of the gospel history appears from Mt 8<sup>14</sup>, Mk 1<sup>30</sup>, Lk 4<sup>38</sup>. His wife in later years was the companion of his missionary journeys (1 Co 9<sup>5</sup>).

* In each of the four passages in Gal the name Peter is substituted by some inferior authorities.

(d) The Synoptists clearly place 'the house of Simon' (in which it appears that his wife, his brother, and his mother-in-law lived) at Capernaum (Mt 8<sup>14</sup>, Mk 12<sup>1, 20</sup>, Lk 4<sup>31, 38</sup>). With this statement that of St John (144 ἦν δὲ ὁ Φίλιππος ἀπὸ Βηθσαιδά, ἐκ τῆς πόλεως Ἀνδρέου καὶ Πέτρου) is often thought to be at variance. We may, however, suppose that the brothers originally came from Bethsaida, but were now living at Capernaum (so Swete on Mk 1<sup>16</sup>).

It may be questioned, however, whether St. John does not intend to distinguish Bethsaida from 'the city of Andrew and Peter,' the former being the present home (ἀπὸ; so 12<sup>21</sup>), the latter the birthplace (ἐκ), of Philip. A similar question arises as to Jn 11<sup>1</sup> Λάζαρος ἀπὸ Βηθανίας ἐκ τῆς κώμης Μαρίας καὶ Μαρθᾶς. Here it is to be noticed that (1) if the κώμη was Bethany, there seems to be little reason why it should be mentioned at all; (2) Lk 10<sup>38</sup> says that the κώμη where Mary and Martha lived was visited by our Lord 'as they were journeying' (ἐν τῷ παρελθεῖν αὐτοῦ), a notice which appears to distinguish it from Bethany. According to this view Lazarus lived at Bethany (cf. Jn 12<sup>1</sup>), but was a native of the village where his sisters lived, at some distance from Jerusalem. St. John, it may be added, is fond of using ἐκ and ἀπὸ side by side; but a study of the passages where they so stand shows that each preposition retains its proper meaning—see Jn 14<sup>5f</sup>. 6<sup>33, 38, 41</sup> 7<sup>17, 41f</sup>. 16<sup>28, 30</sup> (cf. Rev 21<sup>2</sup>).

(e) St. Peter is described as 'a fisherman' in Mt 4<sup>18</sup> || Mk 1<sup>16</sup> (cf. Lk 5<sup>2</sup>), and the same thing is implied in Jn 21<sup>3</sup>. He owned 'a boat' (Lk 5<sup>3</sup>), which he worked with his brother. The sons of Zebedee were his partners (Lk 5<sup>10</sup>); and thus the four apostles were friends before—probably long before—they followed Jesus. It is not necessary to draw out at length the traits—vigour, courage, resourcefulness—which the life of a fisherman on the lake would necessarily develop in a naturally healthy character. It is more important to ask what was the apostle's relation to the culture of his time and country. Probably the traditional view of him as a rough, uneducated peasant is a considerable exaggeration of one side of the truth. He was, of course, without such a formal training as fell to the lot of St. Paul. But, on the other hand, the influence of a religious home and of the synagogue must have had a foremost place in forming the apostle. A significant phrase of St. Andrew's (Jn 14<sup>1</sup>) suggests that both brothers had felt the spell of the Messianic hope. In these early days St. Peter must have gained his close knowledge of the OT, and it is very far from improbable that he was acquainted with the LXX (see art. on I PETER). It has been already pointed out as a significant fact that the apostle, like his brother, was commonly known by a Greek name. His home was on the thickly populated shore of the lake, where trade brought together representatives of many nationalities, and where (to say the least) Greek must have been to some extent a medium of communication (see e.g. T. K. Abbott, Essays p. 129 ff.; Zahn, Eiml. i. p. 28 f.). But whatever Greek St. Peter learned in Galilee must have been rather of a conversational than of a literary kind; it was nevertheless an important foundation. Two, and (as it would seem) only two, notices are preserved in the Gospels and Acts bearing on this subject: (1) St. Peter was recognized in Jerusalem as a Galilæan by the accent and perhaps the idiom of his Aramaic (see Swete's note on Mk 14<sup>70</sup> with references). (2) The members of the Sanhedrin regarded St. Peter and his companion St. John as, from their point of view, illiterate men (Ac 4<sup>13</sup>).

The words are καταλαβόμενοι ὅτι ἄνθρωποι ἀγράμματοι εἶναι καὶ διδάται. The term ἀγράμματος looks back to the facts of a man's past early life. To a Greek it meant one who was an ἄμωσος (e.g. Plato, Tim. 23 B), one who has had no part in either side of Greek education; to a Jew it meant one who had had no training in the Rabbinic study of Scripture (cf. Jn 7<sup>15</sup>). The term διδάται rather regarded a man's present position. With a Greek it was the antithesis to πολιτικός; in the mouth of a Jew (who transliterated it διδάται) it expressed the contrast between the man who could understand and take part in religion as conceived of by the scribes and one of the ἰσχυροί (Jn 7<sup>49</sup>), an 'am hā-'îreẓ (see especially Weber, Die Lehren des Talmud, § 11, 'Der esoterische Charakter der jüd. Religiosität'). Compare the saying of the Fathers: 'No boor is a sin-fearer, nor is the vulgar (am hā-'îreẓ) pious' (Pirqe Aboth, ed. Taylor, p. 30). Thus the words are strictly relative to the point of view of the high priests. They were probably (see below) specially called forth by the apostle's boldness in expounding a passage of Scripture in the presence of, and in application to, the rulers.

3. The calls of St. Peter.—(i.) The apostle's first meeting with the Lord, and the call to friendship.—The history is recorded only in St. John (1<sup>35-42</sup>). Andrew and John (for he clearly is the unnamed actor in the scene)—one of each of the two pairs of brothers who together were in partnership—are expressly spoken of as belonging to the number (ἐκ) of the Baptist's disciples (vv. 35, 37). Since St. Peter and, as the language (πρῶτον, τὸν ἴδιον, v. 41) seems to imply, St. James were close at hand, it is a natural inference that St. Peter had become a disciple of the Baptist, and through the gate of this discipleship passed into friendship with Jesus of Nazareth. It is more than probable, then, that St. Peter had been a witness of the Lord's baptism (Ac 1<sup>22</sup> 10<sup>37f.</sup>). On this day—which Edersheim (i. p. 344 f.) gives some reason for supposing to have been a Sabbath—after Andrew had heard the Baptist's witness (v. 36f.) and had followed Jesus, he went in quest of Simon, and, telling him that he had found the Messiah, brought him to Jesus. Jesus fixes upon him that piercing, scrutinizing gaze (ἐμβλέψας) which was to rest upon him at a later crisis of his life (Lk 22<sup>61</sup>), and greets him—it does not appear from the narrative whether Jesus had known Simon before or not (cf. v. 48)—Σὺ εἶ Σίμων ὁ υἱὸς Ἰωάννου, σὺ κληθήσῃς Κηφᾶς (for the use of the patronymic on solemn occasions cf. Mt 16<sup>17</sup>, Jn 21<sup>15ff.</sup>). Thus the Lord receives him as being just what he was in himself, as the product and heir of a past over which he had no control, as destined to a peculiar office. In the last clause the Lord does not bestow a new name (see Mt 16<sup>18</sup>); He rather reveals a character which He already claims for future service. As yet no permanent bond united Jesus and the men whom He had gathered round Him. For, after being His companions in His journey to Galilee and again in His visit to Jerusalem at the Passover, St. Peter and the rest resumed, as they did on a much later occasion (Jn 21), their work as fishermen.

(ii.) The call to discipleship.—This call must be placed some time after, as the earlier call some time before, the first Passover of the ministry. It is not possible to decide what is the precise relation of the history of the call as related in Mt 4<sup>18-22</sup> Mk 1<sup>16-20</sup> (clearly based on a common source) to that given in Lk 5<sup>1-11</sup>. The essential points common to the two accounts are that Jesus calls St. Peter while he is at work (see Plummer on Lk 5<sup>1-11</sup>), that he makes the apostle's present work a parable of his future work, and that the apostle's obedience is immediate. As to points of difference, Mt and Mk record the Lord's summons δεῦτε ὀπίσω μου; Lk puts the call in another setting—a miracle of blessing leads up to the act of obedience.

It is possible that Mt and Mk on the one hand, and on the other Lk, give the history of two occasions—one when the apostle followed the Lord then and there, but did not finally leave his occupation; the other when the decisive step of renunciation was taken. In support of this view it may be urged (1) that the two narratives seriously differ; (2) that the Lord certainly did repeat on a later occasion the call ἀκολούθη μου, when added experiences would interpret its deeper meaning (Jn 21<sup>19, 22</sup>). But it is much more probable that Mt and Mk follow a document or a tradition which brought together in a summarized narrative the calling of the four chief apostles, and that thus the story of St. Peter's call is the same as that which Lk, on the strength of fuller information (cf. 416<sup>f.</sup>), narrates in detail. In either case, it is important to notice the vividness of Lk's narrative as itself a witness to its truthfulness—especially the two sayings of St. Peter: (a) v. 9 (cf. Jn 2<sup>25</sup>); (b) v. 9 ἔλαβὲ κ.τ.λ. (an undesigned contrast to Lk 6<sup>28</sup>, and an impulsive cry which has parallels in St. Peter's later history).

In close connexion with this call (assuming that there was but one) to discipleship, on a Sabbath either just before it (Lk 4<sup>38</sup>) or just after it (Mk 1<sup>21, 29</sup>),* we must place the miracle which the Lord wrought in His disciple's home—the healing of Peter's mother-in-law. From the phrase διηκόβει αὐτῷ (αὐτοῖς) in each of the three accounts we may infer that our Lord ate there that day; and it is likely enough that the disciple's home was 'the house' where He regularly stayed when at Capernaum (Mt 17<sup>24</sup>, Mk 9<sup>33</sup>).

(iii.) The call to apostleship.—If the call to discipleship must have been somewhat later than the first Passover of the ministry (Jn 2<sup>13</sup>), the call to apostleship must be placed somewhat earlier than the (presumably) second Passover (see Mk 6<sup>30, 35</sup>, Jn 6<sup>4</sup>). The interval therefore separating the two calls cannot have been much more than six months. The history is given in Mt 10<sup>1</sup>, Mk 3<sup>13</sup>, Lk 6<sup>12</sup>. The details must be passed over here. It must suffice to note that the Twelve were chosen from the whole body, and that the Lord's choice constituted them (1) in an especial sense His companions—ἵνα ὄσω μετ' αὐτοῦ (Mk 3<sup>14</sup>; cf. Lk 22<sup>28</sup>, Jn 15<sup>27</sup>); (2) His envoys, when the occasion came, to Israel, with authority to preach and heal. The primary place in our Lord's purpose was their education for future work. The lists of the Twelve given by the Synoptists vary in many ways, but in each of them St. Peter holds the first place (Mt πρῶτος Σίμων ὁ λεγόμενος Π.; cf. Jn 21<sup>2</sup>, Ac 1<sup>13</sup>). Some time after this selection had been made, the Lord sent out the Twelve to execute their double office as heralds of the kingdom and healers of the sick, two by two, marking as the scope of their mission 'the lost sheep of the house of Israel' (Mt 10<sup>1, 5-42</sup>, Mk 6<sup>7-13</sup>, Lk 9<sup>1-6</sup>); it is clear that Matthew places the mission immediately after the appointment of the Twelve from a characteristic desire to bring together the notices of the selection, the instruction, and the dismissal of the Twelve). As to the use of the name ἀπόστολος in reference to the Twelve in the Gospels (except Lk 17<sup>5</sup> 22<sup>14</sup> 24<sup>10</sup>) only in connexion with this mission, see Hort, Ecclesia, p. 22 ff.

We cannot but ask, Who was St. Peter's companion? The answer is almost certainly St. John. For (1) the Lord sent them together on a peculiarly solemn commission at a later time, Lk 22<sup>8</sup>; (2) they appear as companions in the gospel history, Jn 18<sup>15ff.</sup> 20<sup>3ff.</sup>, and in the apostolic history, Ac 3<sup>1-4</sup> 8<sup>14</sup> (mission to Samaria), Gal 2<sup>9</sup>; (3) they were closely associated in the upper room (Jn 13<sup>23ff.</sup>), and on the occasion of the Lord's appearance by the Lake (Jn 21<sup>20ff.</sup>), and together formed part of an inner circle of the apostles in Jairus' house (Mk 5<sup>27</sup>), on the Mt. of Transfiguration (Mk 9<sup>2</sup>), on the Mt. of Olives (Mk 13<sup>3</sup>), in Gethsemane (Mk 14<sup>33</sup>); and in this connexion the order in Lk 8<sup>51</sup> 9<sup>28</sup> (Πέτρον καὶ Ἰωάννην καὶ Ἰάκωβον) and Ac 1<sup>13</sup> is to be specially noticed.

It is impossible at this point to refrain from remarking that a mere notice of the occasions when St. Peter's name is mentioned in the Gospels is apt to make us forget the all-important fact that it was in daily fellowship with the Lord, in the daily contemplation of His acts and words, public and private, that the real significance and power of this period lay. Without some intimation of this obvious truth, a brief review of the specific evidence of the Gospels as to St. Peter's life during this time may become positively misleading.

It has been convenient to consider the mission of the Twelve in close connexion with their selection. But between the two occasions we must, as it appears, place a miracle with which St. Peter was brought into close relation—the raising of Jairus' daughter (Mt 9<sup>18-26</sup>, Mk 5<sup>22-43</sup>, Lk 8<sup>41-56</sup>). It is the first of three occasions when 'Peter and James and John' were chosen from among the Twelve as witnesses of a μυστήριον—here of a revelation of Christ the Life. It may have been designed as a special preparation for some crisis in their mission soon to follow (Mt 10<sup>8</sup> νεκροὺς ἐγείρετε). It is difficult not to trace the vividness of the narrative in Mk to the influence of St. Peter.

* Mt 8<sup>14</sup> introduces the account without any indication of time. It would appear that at this point he is bringing together typical works of healing (8<sup>1-17</sup>), just as he has brought into a single discourse (5-7; cf. 13) typical utterances of the Lord.

4. St. Peter as the Lord's companion during the (apparently) last year of the ministry.—The Twelve returned to Christ about the time when He received news of the Baptist's murder. The retirement across the Lake and the Feeding of the Five Thousand immediately followed. This whole series of events prepared the way for a period the general character of which is expressed by the words 'the proving of faith' (1 P 1<sup>7</sup>).

(i.) The storm on the Lake (Mt 14<sup>22ff.</sup>, Mk 6<sup>45ff.</sup>, Jn 6<sup>16ff.</sup>).—It is remarkable that Matthew alone preserves the record of St. Peter's boastful challenge (behind which there lay a deep love for His Master, and impatience of separation from Him), his sudden fear and piteous appeal for help. Christ Himself sums up the meaning of the apostle's failure in the word δολιγόπιστε. It would be quite in accordance with the character of St. Peter if, when the boat came to land, he was the spokesman of 'those who were in the ship' in their confession, ἀληθῶς θεοῦ υἱὸς εἶ (Mt).

(ii.) The Lord's hard sayings at Capernaum.—St. John records (6<sup>60ff.</sup>) that the sequel of the Lord's teaching at Capernaum about the bread of life was that many of His disciples left Him. Jesus turns to the Twelve and asks them if they too are intending to go away. Simon Peter at once answers for the rest. His reply brings out the apostle's belief in the Lord (1) as superior to all other teachers (πρὸς τίνα ἀπελ.; cf. Jn 3<sup>2</sup>); (2) as the source of a life-giving revelation (cf. v. 6<sup>3</sup>); (3) as the embodiment of Divine holiness.

This, the last element in the confession, is introduced with the emphatic ἡμεῖς πιστεύομεν καὶ ἠγωνάκομεν. The apostles (ἡμεῖς) with their sure conviction are placed in contrast to the faithless seceders. Their present assured belief is the outcome of past experience deliberately interpreted. What is the meaning of the title ὁ ἅγιος τοῦ θεοῦ? In a wholly independent context it is put into the mouth of the demoniac (Mk 1<sup>24</sup>). It would therefore appear to be a recognized title, probably a title of the Messiah. This is confirmed when we turn to Ac 3<sup>14</sup> (τὸν ἅγιον κ. δίκαιον ἠρῆσαυθῆ), where it is placed beside τὸν . . . δίκαιον (which is certainly used of Messiah; see below, on Theology of St. Peter's Speeches). In this (apparently) Messianic title two lines of thought, as it would seem, converge. (a) Jehovah is 'the Holy One of Israel' (e.g. Is 1<sup>4</sup>). (b) The messengers of Jehovah, the typical priest (τὸν Ἄαρων τὸν ἅγιον κυρίου, Ps 105 (106) 17) and the prophet (2 K 4<sup>9</sup>) are holy; the whole theocratic nation is holy (e.g. Ex 19<sup>6</sup>, Nu 16<sup>3</sup>); note in this connexion the mysterious phrase 'the Saints' apparently of the members of the nation, Zec 14<sup>5</sup>, Dn 7<sup>18</sup>. 22. 25. 27). This holiness is conceived of by current Jewish expectation as actually realized in the Messianic people, Ps-Sol 17<sup>36</sup> (ὅτι πάντες ἅγιοι, κ. βασιλεῖς αὐτῶν χριστὸς κύριος). The Messiah Himself, then, who was regarded at once as the special messenger of Jehovah, and also as the flower and crown of the Messianic nation, was naturally described as 'the Holy One,' 'the Holy One of God.' But just as the Messianic title ὁ δίκαιος was raised to a higher and more absolute meaning by later NT writers (e.g. 1 Jn 2<sup>1</sup>), so it was in the case of ὁ ἅγιος (Rev 3<sup>7</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>20</sup>). To return to St. Peter's use of the phrase at Capernaum, though the words are an official title, yet their ethical and spiritual meaning is not lost here or in Mk 12<sup>4</sup>. Messiah's sinlessness and purity were a magnet to faithful disciples (cf. 1 P 2<sup>22</sup>). And the avowed realization of this, as contrasted with Lk 5<sup>8</sup>, marks a stage in the apostle's spiritual education.

(iii.) The questions at Caesarea Philippi.—There are three stages in the history—(A) The Confession (Mt 16<sup>13-28</sup>, Mk 8<sup>27-38</sup>, Lk 9<sup>18-27</sup>).—The account in Mt is the fullest; on the omission of the promise to St. Peter in Mk see Swete on 8<sup>29</sup>. The Galilean ministry was drawing to a close (see Swete, p. 166). Our Lord was farther from Jerusalem than at any other time of His ministry, and on the borders of the purely Gentile world. The time and place, then, of themselves suggest the question whether Israel, generally and as represented by His immediate disciples, accepted Him, whether the foundation for the great work of the future was being solidly laid. The occasion was felt by the Lord to be a great crisis, and He prepared for it as such by prayer (Lk 9<sup>18</sup>). The confession of St. Peter at Capernaum was the impulsive response of the disciple to the Master's anxious, foreboding question. But now the stage in the education of the Twelve had been reached when it was well that they should deliberately and definitely face the question of the Lord's Person. In the outskirts (Mk 8<sup>27</sup>), therefore, of Caesarea the Lord put two questions to the Twelve—(a) What were men generally saying of Him? Here they all contributed something to the answer. They had seen different sides of Jewish opinion. (b) What was the thought of the Twelve themselves about Him? Here the answer of one is the answer of all, and St. Peter is their natural spokesman. The Twelve regarded Him as the Divine Messiah.

The Gospels vary as to the words— $\Sigma\upsilon\ \epsilon\grave{\iota}\ \delta\ \chi\alpha\iota\tau\acute{\omicron}\varsigma$  (Mk),  $\tau\acute{\omicron}\nu\ \chi\alpha\iota\tau\acute{\omicron}\varsigma\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$  (Lk),  $\Sigma\upsilon\ \epsilon\grave{\iota}\ \delta\ \chi\alpha\iota\tau\acute{\omicron}\varsigma\ \delta\ \nu\iota\omicron\varsigma\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \zeta\omega\tau\omicron\varsigma$  (Mt). The important question arises, Was St. Peter commended for confessing the Divinity of Jesus or His Messiahship? It is probably true that 'the Son of God' was not a common designation of the Messiah, but (1) the language of 2 Es 7<sup>28, 29</sup> ('My Son Messiah') 13<sup>82, 37, 52, 149</sup>; comp. Enoch 105<sup>2</sup>; (2) the language which the evangelists put into the mouths of persons who can hardly be conceived of as one and all rising to the absolute meaning of the title 'Son of God,' but who would naturally use Messianic language (Mt 8<sup>29</sup> || Mk Lk, Mt 14<sup>33</sup> see above, Mt 27<sup>40, 43</sup> [27<sup>54</sup> || Mk], Mk 3<sup>11</sup>, Lk 22<sup>70</sup>, Jn 13<sup>4, 49, 11, 27, 197</sup>); (3) the language of Lk 4<sup>41</sup> ( $\sigma\upsilon\ \epsilon\grave{\iota}\ \delta\ \nu\iota\omicron\varsigma\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon\ \dots\ \zeta\eta\lambda\omicron\upsilon\sigma\alpha\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \chi\alpha\iota\tau\acute{\omicron}\varsigma\ \alpha\upsilon\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \epsilon\iota\sigma\alpha\iota$ ); (4) the language of St. Matthew in the immediate context, v. 20  $\eta\omicron\upsilon\ \mu\eta\delta\epsilon\iota\ \epsilon\iota\pi\alpha\sigma\iota\upsilon\ \delta\tau\iota\ \alpha\upsilon\tau\acute{\omicron}\varsigma\ \epsilon\iota\sigma\iota\upsilon\ \delta\ \chi\alpha\iota\tau\acute{\omicron}\varsigma$ , seem to make it clear that the title 'Son of God' was used as bearing a Messianic meaning in our Lord's day. Hence it matters little whether we consider  $\delta\ \nu\iota\omicron\varsigma\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \zeta\omega\tau\omicron\varsigma$  as part of the original confession, or as an addition of St. Matthew. In either case it is as Messiah that St. Peter confesses Jesus. See especially Dalman, Die Worte Jesu pp. 219-226. Thus the revelation of suffering which follows in each Gospel is the earliest insistence on that side of the true Messiah's work which became the greatest stumbling-block to the Jew.

(B) Our Lord's welcome of the Confession (Mt 16<sup>17-19</sup> only).—It is clear that our Lord regarded the deliberate confession of His Messiahship as marking a crisis in His relations with the Twelve, and as a pledge of the growth of the kingdom. He answers it with a solemn beatitude addressed to St. Peter ( $\mu\alpha\kappa\acute{\alpha}\rho\iota\omicron\varsigma\ \epsilon\grave{\iota}$ —the only occasion when the Lord pronounces a beatitude on an individual), and by a declaration that his confession had no lower source than a revelation from the Father Himself (cf. Gal 1<sup>15</sup>). And then speaking, as it would appear, as King Messiah ( $\kappa\acute{\alpha}\gamma\omega\ \delta\acute{\epsilon}$ —'The Father has revealed Me as Messiah to the disciple; I in turn reveal My disciples' place in the kingdom'), He opens out the future under four metaphors—

(a) St. Peter as the foundation of the new Israel.—Taking the Syriac versions as our guide, we may conclude that our Lord's words, spoken in Aramaic, run thus: 'Thou art Cepha, and upon this Cepha I will build my congregation.' Here there are three points to be briefly considered—(a)  $\tau\eta\eta\ \epsilon\kappa\kappa\lambda\eta\sigma\iota\alpha\ \mu\omicron\upsilon$ . The word is used in its ancient theocratic sense, and the meaning is best represented by the paraphrase, 'I will build my Israel.' It must be sufficient to refer to Hort's The Christian Ecclesia pp. 3-18, esp. p. 10 f. (b)  $\omicron\iota\kappa\omicron\delta\omicron\mu\eta\sigma\omega$ . The metaphor of building, to express the idea of creating and giving unity and permanence to a society of men, is not uncommon in the OT (e.g. Ps 28<sup>3</sup>, Jer 18<sup>3</sup>). It is important to notice that the Lord reserves to Himself the prerogative of activity. He alone is the builder. Compare the Messianic parable in Sibyll. Orac. v. 420 ff. (c) In what sense is Cepha the foundation? Does the word point to the first stone of the building, the foundation-stone, or to the soil, the rock on which the first stones are laid? We may say, in view of our Lord's earlier saying (Mt 7<sup>24</sup>, Lk 6<sup>48</sup>), that almost certainly the latter is the true interpretation.\* Thus the Rock is, so far as the scope of the parable is concerned, separated from the stones reared thereon. This last point helps us to answer the question as to the interpretation of the Rock. It is the apostle who has just made the confession that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah. The parable itself limits its application. When the foundation has been laid, the apostle's function as described by the metaphor will have ceased. He will support the first stones of the ecclesia. The true comment on the Lord's promise is Ac 1-10.

Other interpretations of these famous words can be only briefly noted. (1) The Rock is Christ. This interpretation is excluded by the fact that in the Aramaic there is no variation (Cepha . . . Cepha) as in the Greek ( $\pi\acute{\epsilon}\tau\rho\omicron\varsigma$  . . .  $\pi\acute{\epsilon}\tau\rho\alpha$ ), and that Christ Himself speaks of Himself as the builder. (2) The Rock is St. Peter's confession. This interpretation is excluded by the fact that the confession considered in itself was wholly inadequate. It does not include either the Resurrection or the Divinity of the Lord. Its value was strictly relative to the time when it was made. The same consideration excludes the modification of the above view which explains the Rock of St. Peter's faith. That faith was a quality which varied from time to time. (3) St. Peter as the type of, or in combination with, the other apostles, is the Rock. So Hort (Ecclesia p. 16 f., e.g. 'In virtue of this personal faith vivifying their discipleship, the Apostles became themselves the first little Ecclesia, constituting a living rock upon which, etc.'). But our Lord's words, as reported by St. Matthew, could not be more personal. To suppose that the Lord addresses St. Peter here as a type of his fellow-apostles, is in effect to imply that no words could be personal unless a typical reference were explicitly excluded. See also 'Additional Note' on p. 795<sup>b</sup>.

A clear statement as to the exposition of the words and the lines of patristic interpretation is to be found in Lightfoot, Clement ii. pp. 481-490.

(b) The new Israel as the conqueror.—The  $\epsilon\kappa\kappa\lambda\eta\sigma\iota\alpha$  is an aggressive power. Death—the adversary of Christ—is in possession of his stronghold. But 'his gates' (cf. Ps 9<sup>13</sup> 107<sup>13</sup>, Job 38<sup>7</sup>, Is 38<sup>10</sup>) cannot withstand the attack. The new Israel is victorious against 'walled cities' like the first Israel (cf. e.g. Dt 3<sup>4</sup>). Such appears to be the meaning. The clause, however, has no special bearing on St. Peter's functions.

(c) St. Peter as the steward of the kingdom.— $\delta\acute{\omega}\sigma\omega\ \sigma\omicron\iota\ \tau\alpha\varsigma\ \kappa\lambda\epsilon\iota\delta\alpha\varsigma\ \tau\eta\varsigma\ \beta\alpha\sigma\iota\lambda\epsilon\iota\alpha\varsigma\ \tau\omega\upsilon\ \omicron\upsilon\gamma\alpha\upsilon\omega\upsilon$ . The words seem to be an intentional reminiscence of the message of Jehovah as to Eliakim (Is 22<sup>22</sup>): 'The key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder.' The words are paraphrased in the LXX text represented by B ( $\kappa\alpha\iota\ \delta\acute{\omega}\sigma\omega\ \tau\eta\eta\ \delta\acute{\omicron}\xi\alpha\upsilon\ \Delta\alpha\upsilon\epsilon\iota\delta\ \alpha\upsilon\tau\acute{\omicron}\varsigma$ ), but N\* has  $\kappa\alpha\iota\ \delta\acute{\omega}\sigma\omega\ \kappa\alpha\iota\ \alpha\upsilon\tau\acute{\omicron}\varsigma\ \tau\eta\eta\ \kappa\lambda\epsilon\iota\delta\alpha\ \omicron\iota\kappa\omicron\upsilon\ \Delta$ , and A has a conflate reading.

(d) St. Peter as the scribe who 'binds' and 'looses'.— $\kappa\alpha\iota\ \delta\ \epsilon\acute{\alpha}\nu\ \delta\eta\sigma\eta\varsigma\ \kappa\tau\lambda$ . In this use of 'binding' and 'loosing' there cannot be but a close reference to the current technical use of these words to express the authoritative decision of a scribe on a matter of obligation (cf. Mt 5<sup>19</sup>; cf. Edersheim, Life and Times ii. p. 84 f.). Such decisions on St. Peter's part in the new kingdom shall be the echoes of decisions already promulgated in heaven. On these two verses see especially Dalman, Die Worte Jesu pp. 174-178.

In regard to the essential meaning of this series of metaphors as applied to St. Peter, the following points should be noted: (1) They seem to be all conditioned by the scope of the first of them, the rock-foundation, i.e. our Lord is dealing with the first stage of the history of the new ecclesia. The relation of St. Peter to the new Israel is in some sense to correspond to the relation of Moses and Joshua to the ancient Israel. (2) The promise as to 'binding' and 'loosing' given here to St. Peter is in Mt 18<sup>18</sup> given to the disciples. It would seem, therefore, if the words in the two places are to be understood in precisely the same sense, that St. Peter is, on the former occasion, singled out from the other disciples because he would be the first to exercise, or would be the leader in the exercise of, a power common to all. At the same time it must be noted that (a) the context in ch. 18 (viz. vv. 15-17, 21<sup>ff.</sup>) deals with the forgiveness of sins; (β) Dalman (p. 177) shows that in Jewish Aramaic the word 'to loose' (אָרַךְ), at any rate, is used metaphorically in various senses. It does not then seem certain that the terms must bear the same meaning in both passages. (3) The Bk. of the Acts records the historical fulfilment of the promises to St. Peter. But it must be remembered that in that Book we have not a complete history of the earliest days of the Church, and that the writer is himself familiar rather with somewhat later developments. There may well have been occasions, unnoticed by the author of the Acts, which contributed to the complete fulfilment of the Lord's promises to St. Peter.

\* It is true that the word cepha is not used by the Syriac versions in these two passages. But that the word cepha does mean 'a rock' as well as 'a stone' is clear from the fact that it is used to render  $\pi\acute{\epsilon}\tau\rho\alpha$  in Mt 27<sup>60</sup> (Pesh.) 27<sup>51</sup> (Syr<sup>sin</sup> Pesh.); it may therefore have been used by our Lord in the saying in question. See additional note on the Rabbinical use of Rock in reference to Abraham at end of art. I PETER.

† Compare the remarkable legend preserved in Apoc. Baruch 10<sup>18</sup> and (in a somewhat different form) in the Rest of the Words of Baruch 4, 'Jeremiah took the keys of the sanctuary of God and went out of the city and cast them away before the sun, saying, "To thee I say, O sun, take the keys of the sanctuary of God . . . forasmuch as we were not found worthy to keep them, because we were false stewards."'

(C) The Lord's rebuke of St. Peter.—The confession of St. Peter and our Lord's announcement that He Himself would be the founder of a new Israel form the turning-point in the education of the Twelve. Mt marks the transition by the phrase ἀπὸ τότε ἤρξατο (v. 21), which in 4<sup>17</sup> stands at the beginning of the ministry, and occurs nowhere else. Henceforth the Lord reveals to the apostles the mystery of the Divine purpose (δεῖξ) as to the Messiah—His humiliation in His rejection by the representatives of Israel at Jerusalem (the centre of Israel's life) and His death, His exaltation in the Resurrection. The idea of a suffering Messiah was alien to current Jewish expectations (cf. Schürer, HJP II. ii. p. 184 ff.). St. Peter at once protests against his Master's appropriation of it to Himself. His action (προσλαβόμενος) and his words* alike imply a position of kindly patronage towards the Lord. The Lord turns immediately upon him, and the sight of the other disciples (Mk) necessitates a public and severe rebuke—a reversal for the time of the words of commendation just pronounced—a sentence of rebuff, pronounced as upon an enemy, takes the place of the beatitude; the rock-foundation of Messiah's Israel has become Messiah's stumbling-stone; a temper of mind capable of receiving the revelation of the Father has been succeeded by a temper of mind wholly earthly.

A week after these events at Caesarea (Mk 9<sup>28</sup>, Mt 17<sup>18</sup>, Lk 9<sup>28</sup>), the three disciples, who had been witnesses of a previous revelation of Christ as the Life, are allowed, on the Mount of Transfiguration, to learn the 'mystery' of Christ as the Glory of God. The impulsive and inopportune request of St. Peter sprang from a dread of the withdrawal of the outward signs of revelation (cf. 2 Co 3<sup>7-13</sup>); it was the prayer of a consciously weak and earthly faith. The revelation on the mountain confirmed both elements in the disclosure of the issues of Messiah's life on earth which the Lord gave at Caesarea. The uniqueness of His Person was brought home to the Three by (a) the glory of the Lord Himself; (b) His mysterious converse with the Founder and the Reformer of Israel's polity, in which He is seen to be the mediator between the living and the departed; (c) the voice from heaven attesting His Sonship.

* Syr<sup>ca</sup> in Mk 8<sup>32</sup> reads, 'But Simon Cepha, as if sparing Him, said to Him, (God) spares Thee.' The last words, a formula of deprecation (cf. e.g. Ac 10<sup>14</sup> 11<sup>8</sup>), render the ἰλάσῃ σοι of Mt 16<sup>22</sup> in Syr<sup>ca</sup> Pesh. From this formula the remarkable paraphrase, 'as if sparing Him,' is derived.

In the period between the Transfiguration and the Entry into Jerusalem St. Peter is mentioned on four occasions. At Capernaum, his home, the collectors of the temple dues put to him the question whether his Master did not pay the half-shekel, and St. Peter is made by his Master the means of its payment. The Lord uses the incident to lead up His disciple's mind to the conception of His Divine Sonship (Mt 17<sup>24</sup>ff.). On the three remaining occasions St. Peter is represented as questioning the Lord as to the practical and immediate bearing of His words,—asking as to the scope of the parables of the faithful slaves and the sudden coming of the thief (Lk 12<sup>41</sup>, cf. Mk 13<sup>37</sup>); asking as to the number of times a brother should be forgiven (Mt 18<sup>21</sup>); asking as to the reward in store for the Twelve in view of their absolute self-renunciation, as contrasted with the refusal of the young ruler to surrender his wealth and follow Christ (Mt 19<sup>27</sup>, Mk 10<sup>28</sup>, Lk 18<sup>28</sup>). These questions reveal the apostle's impulsiveness, the practical bent of his character, something perhaps of a lack of reverence towards his Master; while the last of them shows an undue sense of the deserts of himself and his fellow-apostles.

5. The week before the Passion.—Nothing is told us of St. Peter in connexion with the Triumphal Entry. Mk preserves two words of his addressed to Christ on the Tuesday. To St. Peter the sight of the withered fig-tree recalls (ἀναμνησθεῖς) the incident of the previous day, and he points his Master to the effect of His prophecy (Mk 11<sup>21</sup>, cf. Mt 21<sup>20</sup>). Again, after the Lord that same day had left the temple and crossed the Kidron on His way to Bethany, He sat down on the Mt. of Olives. The main body of the apostles apparently continued their way. Four of their number—Peter, James, John, and Andrew—possibly deputed by the rest, asked Him privately a question as to the time when His prophecy just spoken should have its fulfilment, and as to the events which should herald it (Mk 13<sup>3</sup>; cf. Mt 24<sup>2</sup>, Lk 21<sup>7</sup>). The form of the sentence (ἐπιρώτα αὐτὸν . . . Πέτρος καὶ Ἰάκωβος κ.τ.λ.) suggests that St. Peter was the spokesman. Luke preserves the detail that on the Thursday it was St. Peter and St. John whom the Lord sent to 'prepare the passover' (22<sup>8</sup>; cf. Mt 26<sup>18</sup>, Mk 14<sup>13</sup>). In the Upper Room and in the events which followed St. Peter took a prominent part. It appears that at the Paschal meal the Lord took the place of host, St. Peter the second place, reclining on Christ's left, St. John the third, on the Lord's right hand (Westcott on Jn 13<sup>28</sup>). When, then, Christ washed the disciples' feet (Jn 13<sup>4</sup>), St. Peter must have been either the first or the last to whom He came. The former alternative is the more probable, Jn's favourite οὐν here (v. 6) as elsewhere simply denoting immediate sequence. In the dialogue which follows, different traits of the apostle's character are vividly brought out in his question expressing startled humility (v. 6 Κύριε, σὺ μου . . .); in his emphatic refusal (οὐ μή . . . εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα) to allow Christ to wash his feet, in his sudden change of mind and the eager prayer in which, giving a material meaning to Christ's words, he asks for what he considers a larger blessing. Later on in the meal, when the Lord speaks of the presence of the traitor (v. 21), St. Peter, assuming that He had whispered the secret to St. John, abruptly asks the latter to tell it openly to the rest. Later still, when the traitor had gone out, St. Peter, taking up Christ's words (v. 28) about His 'going,' inquires with his old literalness whither He is going; and again, asserting his absolute devotion, why he cannot at once follow his Master in His mysterious journey (v. 36<sup>ff.</sup>). At this point Jn inserts the prophecy of the three denials. Lk (22<sup>28ff.</sup>) also puts the warning at this time, though his version of the Lord's words is different from that in Jn. In Lk Christ solemnly addresses Peter and unveils the world of spiritual conflict. Satan had demanded the surrender to himself of all the apostles, as he had demanded Job (Job 1<sup>12-29</sup>), that he might sift them all—the metaphor bringing out their weakness and their separation (cf. e.g. Ps 14). But Peter had been the subject of urgent supplication on his Master's part that his faith might not wholly and finally fail (ἐκλήπη). It is implied that the apostle would not pass through the trial unscathed. But beyond the trial a return to former spiritual relationships is promised—a return which would bring with it the duty of 'stablishing his brethren.' In answer to Peter's protestation of absolute fidelity, Christ explicitly foretells that before the cock crowed (twice, Mk) the next morning, Peter would thrice deny Him.* It is remarkable that in Jn, though three other of the Twelve (14<sup>5, 8, 22</sup>) interrupt the Lord's words with questions, St. Peter remains silent, perplexed and saddened, it would seem, by his Master's unexpected doubt of his loyalty. At length Christ and the Eleven go out into the Mount of Olives. It is at this point that, according to Mt (26<sup>31ff.</sup>) and Mk (14<sup>27ff.</sup>), the Lord warned them that they all would 'be made to stumble,' and foretold in detail Peter's faithlessness—a prophecy prefaced and followed by passionate protestations on the apostle's part. Thus it appears that we have three different accounts—Mt || Mk, Lk, Jn—of Christ's words to Peter as to the denial. A not improbable solution of the difficulty is that Christ warned His followers several times that night that their loyalty towards Himself would be sorely tested; that He only once explicitly foretold Peter's fall; but that the several evangelists connected that prophecy with different words of warning. When the Lord and His apostles reached Gethsemane (Mt 26<sup>36ff.</sup>, Mk 14<sup>32ff.</sup>), He took Peter and James and John aside from the rest and admitted them to a knowledge of the μυστήριον of His human sorrow and perfected obedience, the last of the three revelations which were crises in their spiritual education. On His return to them the first time, finding them sleeping, He singles out Peter for rebuke, tacitly contrasting his inability to 'watch one hour' with his earlier boast. One other detail is preserved as to Peter's conduct in the garden, at the moment of the Lord's arrest (Mt 26<sup>51ff.</sup>, Mk 14<sup>37ff.</sup>, Lk 22<sup>50ff.</sup>, Jn 18<sup>10ff.</sup>). Not waiting for an answer to the question, 'Lord, shall we smite with the sword?' (Lk, cf. 22<sup>38</sup>), and going near to frustrate the Lord's care for His followers' safety (Jn 18<sup>8</sup>), he snatches his sword out of its sheath and, striking at the head of a slave of the high priest who had, as we may suppose, taken hold of Christ, he wounds him. Christ's last miracle secures the safety of the apostles by undoing the misdoing of His impetuous follower. Jn, when all reasons for reticence were over, gives us the names, 'Simon Peter,' 'Malchus'; Lk alone records the healing. When Christ was led away to the high priest's official residence, St. Peter, striking a balance between his fears for himself and his love for his Master, 'followed afar off' (Mt, Mk, Lk). Apparently, as he drew near the high priest's palace, he overtook St. John (Jn 18<sup>15</sup>), and was by him brought into the court. The latter, it would seem, passed on into the audience-chamber. Then follow the three denials, the whole group of incidents taking up about an hour (Lk 22<sup>59</sup>). On the relation to each other of the narratives in the four Gospels see Westcott, Additional Notes to Jn 18. The second cock-crow (Mk) and the sudden piercing gaze of the Lord (ἐπέβλεψεν, Lk) recalled to Peter's mind the prophecy of Christ, 'and he went out and wept bitterly' (Mt, Lk; on Mk's ἐπιβαλὼν see Field's interesting note in Notes on the Translation of the NT p. 41). There is no further reference to St. Peter in the history of the Passion.

6. The period between the Resurrection and the Ascension.—In the accounts of the day of the Resurrection St. Peter is twice mentioned. From these notices it appears that after his fall he did not separate himself from the other apostles, and that he was still regarded as their natural leader. (i.) Early on that morning Mary Magdalene hurried from the garden to Simon Peter and to John, to tell them that the tomb was empty. The two apostles went together to the tomb, as they had gone together to the high priest's court three days before. They both ran, but St. Peter, the older man, fell behind. St. John came first to the sepulchre, but did not enter. St. Peter, practical and impetuous, went into the sepulchre, and took note (θεωρεῖ) of the orderly arrangement of the cloths and the napkin. Then they returned, still (it would seem*) perplexed, to their own homes (Jn 20<sup>1-10</sup>). (ii.) Later in the day, some time before the evening, the Lord appeared to St. Peter—alone—to seal his repentance with forgiveness (Lk 24<sup>34</sup>; cf. 1 Co 15<sup>5</sup>, where the appearance to Cephas has the first place). (iii.) In the third appearance of Christ to the apostles as a body (Jn 21; cf. 20<sup>19, 26</sup>), at the Lake of Tiberias, Peter takes a conspicuous part. The quick intuition of faith is characteristic of John (v. 7; cf. 20<sup>8</sup>). But when another has discerned the Lord, the rapid act of preparation, the leap into the sea that he may reach his Master the quicker, then, when all have landed, the return to the ship that he may begin the necessary work of bringing the net to land,—all these acts belong to a lifelike portrait of St. Peter. After the meal, provided by Christ, there follows St. Peter's public restoration, corresponding to the private assurance of forgiveness given him on the day of the Resurrection.† To the thrice-repeated denial there answers the thrice-repeated question as to his love towards Christ and the thrice-repeated charge, covering the whole sphere of pastoral activity. So far the official and the personal have been blended together. Now in a solemn 'oracle' (ἀμὴν, ἀμὴν) the Lord deals with the personal issue of the apostle's life of service—the helplessness and the devotion of a martyr's death. The last recorded word of St. Peter addressed to Christ is an impulsive, unselfish question (v. 21). The last word of Christ to St. Peter is an echo of the earliest call interpreted in the light of the cross—ἀκολούθει μοι . . . σύ μοι ἀκολούθει (vv. 19, 22).

II. HISTORY OF ST. PETER AFTER THE ASCENSION, IN THE NT.—The three periods of the growth of the Church, treated of in the Acts,‡ are clearly

* To one who hesitates to accept Hort's theory of 'Western non-interpolations' (see the writer's Syro-Latin Text p. 130 n.) the external evidence against the authenticity of Lk 24<sup>12</sup> must seem of very little weight. On the other hand, the linguistic similarity to Jn is curious, and cannot be accidental. It would be rash to assert that we have not here a sign of cross-currents of apostolic tradition, which the available evidence will perhaps never enable us to follow out.

† On the subtle variation of words in Jn 21<sup>15-17</sup> see Westcott's notes.

‡ The theory of Blass, that the common and the 'Western' texts of the Lucan Books represent two editions by St. Luke, is well known. The present writer has criticised it in The Syro-Latin Text of the Gospels p. 133 n. In that book and in The Old Syriac Element in Cod. Bezae he has given reasons for his belief that the 'Western' text is largely due to (1) assimilation to scriptural passages; (2) the influence of Old Syriac texts. 'Western' readings of exceptional interest in parts of the Acts dealing with St. Peter are to be found in 10<sup>26</sup> 11<sup>2</sup> (a mosaic of phrases used in Ac and Epistles about St. Paul) 12<sup>10</sup> described in 1<sup>8</sup>—the Church of Jerusalem, the Church of Palestine, the Church of the World.

1. The Church of Jerusalem (1<sup>1</sup>-8<sup>1</sup>).—During this period St. Peter stands alone as the leader and spokesman of the disciples.

(a) In the days which passed between the Ascension and the day of Pentecost, St. Peter in the first apostolic speech urged the appointment of a disciple to fill the apostolate of Judas. Into the problems suggested by Lk's record of the speech (including the insertion, v. 18<sup>1</sup>.) it is unnecessary to enter. It is sufficient to notice (i.) that St. Peter bases his argument on an appeal to the OT, i.e. to two passages of the Psalms (68 (69)<sup>28</sup> 108 (109)<sup>8</sup> LXX), prefiguring respectively the vacancy of the traitor's pastoral office and the duty of appointing a successor; (ii.) that St. Peter defines the essential function of an apostle as being 'a witness of the Resurrection [of the Lord Jesus].'

(b) On the early morning of Pentecost the disciples were all gathered together in one of the many chambers (οἶκος) of the temple (v. 2; for this sense of οἶκος cf. e.g. Jer 42 (35)<sup>4</sup> 43 (36)<sup>10, 12</sup>; Jos. Ant. VIII. iii. 2). The chambers and courts of the temple were crowded with worshippers from among 'the dwellers at Jerusalem' (v. 6 τὸ πλῆθος; cf. 21<sup>36</sup>, Lk 1<sup>40</sup>), to whom 'immediately after midnight the Temple gates [had been] thrown open' (Edersheim, The Temple p. 223). Such in all probability was the place* and such the audience of St. Peter's speech, after the Spirit had been given and His presence attested by the gift of tongues. A strong case can be made out for the opinion that St. Peter spoke in Greek (T. K. Abbott, Essays p. 129 ff.; Salmon, Introduction<sup>6</sup> p. 172 f.; on the other side see Neubauer in Studia Biblica i. p. 62 ff.).† The speech begins as an apologia (v. 15); it ends with a proclamation of the crucified Jesus of Nazareth as the Sovereign Messiah (v. 36).

Ac 2<sup>14-36</sup>. Jesus, the enthroned Messiah.

(1) Vv. 14-21. The charge of drunkenness is disproved (a) by the circumstances, 'the third hour of the day'; (b) by the fact that the phenomena correspond to Joel's prophecy (Jl 2<sup>28-32</sup> (31-5)).

(2) Vv. 22-24. Jesus of Nazareth was accredited as God's messenger to Israel by Divine miracles; according to God's eternal counsel He was surrendered to the Jews, murdered by them through the instrumentality of Gentiles, raised from death by God Himself—the necessary issue.

The Divine purpose and action are throughout emphasized.

(3) Vv. 25-32. This necessity was foreshadowed in David's prophecy (Ps 15 (16)<sup>8-11</sup>). His words could not apply to himself. Therefore, as a prophet, in view of the promised dynasty (Ps 131 (132)<sup>11</sup>, 2 S 7<sup>12</sup>), he foresaw and spoke of 'the raising up of the anointed one'—a prophecy finally fulfilled in the Resurrection.

(4) Vv. 33-35. The Resurrection involved the exaltation through the Divine action. The exalted Messiah receives from the Father, and gives, the promised Spirit.

It is impossible that the exaltation should be interpreted of David; for David spoke of 'his lord,' seated at God's right hand (Ps 109 (110)<sup>1</sup>).

(5) V. 36. The duty, therefore, of all Israel (the 'Dispersion' and the dwellers at Jerusalem alike) is to acknowledge God's action in constituting the victim of their malice the Anointed One and the Sovereign King—Κύριος Ἰησοῦς Χριστός.

The result of St. Peter's speech was the conviction of his hearers. In answer to their question, 'What shall we do?' (cf. Lk 3<sup>10, 12</sup>), he urges—(1)

* The supposition that the events described in Ac 2 took place in the temple is in itself natural; it explains several details of the history; and it is in complete harmony, it is believed, with Lk's language.

† The internal evidence of the speeches in the Acts (see below, p. 766) appears to the present writer a complete refutation of the theory which regards them as the simple invention of the author of the book, and a proof that with varying accuracy they represent what was said on the several occasions. That the author of the Acts, however, is responsible for their present literary form and for much of their language is a view quite consistent with a belief in their substantial fidelity. It is quite possible that St. Peter and St. Luke met at Rome—an important point for the criticism of the Gospel and the Acts.

that they should repent, i.e. of the great national sin of rejecting the Messiah; (2) that each should be baptized in the name of Jesus Messiah; (3) such baptism having as its result forgiveness, (4) and leading on to the bestowal of the special gift of the Spirit.

With the day of Pentecost the life of the Church as a society, quickened and endowed with the gifts of the Spirit, began.

(c) How long a time elapsed between the day of Pentecost and the evening when St. Peter worked the 'notable sign' on the cripple at the Beautiful Gate there is no evidence. The miracle was wrought 'in the name of Jesus Messiah, the Nazarene.' The man healed was a well-known object of pity, and his restoration at once drew 'all the people' round him and Peter and John in the great eastern portico of the temple. To them St. Peter proclaims Jesus as the Restorer.

Ac 3<sup>12-26</sup>. Jesus, the glorified Servant, the Restorer.

(1) Vv. 12-16. The miracle was not the work of the apostles; it was an incident in the unbroken history of Redemption. For the name of Jesus, the Servant of the God of the Fathers, rejected and slain by Israel, raised and glorified by God, was the source of restoration.

(2) Vv. 17-26. Israel's present position, duty, and hope. (a) The 'sufferings of the Messiah' were due, on the human side, to the crime of Israel's ignorance, on the Divine side to the action of God in fulfilment of His utterances through the prophets. (b) Consequently (αὐτῶ) there is a present call to national repentance, such repentance issuing in (1) forgiveness; (2) the advent of 'seasons of refreshing'; (3) the final mission of the Messiah as the Restorer of all things. (c) Israel's present opportunity was foretold by Moses and all the prophets. Of this prophetic line and of the first covenant those present are the heirs. To them belongs a priority in the blessings which spring from God's act in raising up and sending His Servant, whose work reaches to the conversion of each Israelite.

The action and the words of St. Peter were a double challenge. The officials in charge of the temple resented the assumption of the position of 'teachers' on the part of men whom they despised as 'am hā-āreḥ'. The Sadducees were provoked by the proclamation of the Resurrection. The two apostles were therefore put in prison, and the next morning brought before the Sanhedrin. In answer to the formal question as to their authority or commission, St. Peter answered that the cripple was healed 'by the name of Jesus Messiah, the Nazarene,' whom the rulers to whom he speaks had crucified, whom God had raised. He then brings together the three thoughts—Messiah's rejection, the apparent triumph of the rulers, the reversal of their judgment and the exaltation of the rejected One—in the words of Ps 117 (118)<sup>22</sup>, and declares that in this Name only is there salvation. It is to be noticed that, the first time that St. Peter appears before the high priests, he appeals to that verse of the Psalms by a reference to which (after the parable of the Wicked Husbandmen) our Lord a few weeks before had roused their vain resentment (Mt 21<sup>42ff.</sup> || Mk, Lk). It was this, doubtless, which led them to recognize the apostles as the companions of Jesus. At length, in spite of their refusal to be silent as to the facts of their experience (4<sup>20</sup>; cf. 1 Jn 1<sup>14</sup>), the apostles are set at liberty by the chief priests.

(d) In the next subsection (4<sup>32-5</sup><sup>16</sup>) the Acts turns from the external dangers and triumphs to the inner life of the Church. Two contrasted cases of the action of the members of the brotherhood in regard to property are narrated—the case of Barnabas, and the case of Ananias and Sapphira. In dealing with Ananias, St. Peter exercises the χάρισμα of 'discernment of spirits.' When the guilt of Ananias has been proved by his fate, and Sapphira comes before him, St. Peter is represented as foretelling her doom. The apostle is the Joshua of the new Israel (Jos 7<sup>10ff.</sup>; cf. 2 K 5<sup>20ff.</sup>). With this history the words of St. Paul (1 Co 5<sup>5</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>20</sup>) should be compared.

Shortly afterwards there ensued among the apostles a fresh activity of the 'gift of healing.' In particular, St. Peter became an object of almost superstitious regard to the populace at Jerusalem. And the fame of these miracles spread through the neighbouring districts.

(e) This outburst of popular feeling awoke the envy of the Sadducean faction (5<sup>17-42</sup>). They now, in order to ensure the destruction of this new insurrection against their materializing views, imprison all the apostles. The latter, delivered from prison, resume in the temple their work of public teaching. Brought by the chief officer of the temple before the Sanhedrin, the apostles by the mouth of St. Peter (1) affirm that they are acting according to a Divine command, which they have no choice but to obey. (2) They affirm the continuity of national redemption. God, who had 'raised up' judges (cf. e.g. Jg 2<sup>16, 18, 39</sup>), had 'raised up Jesus.' The action of the rulers in putting Him to a cruel death, which seemed to mark Him out as cursed of God (cf. Dt 21<sup>23</sup>), had been reversed by God's action in exalting Him both to rule and to deliver, in order that Israel might receive the gifts of national repentance and national forgiveness. (3) They affirm that their witness to this message was inspired by the Spirit, a Divine gift bestowed, not on Israel's worldly rulers, but on faithful Israelites who obeyed God's revelation. By these words the Sadducean party was kindled to a frenzy of murderous hatred. But in a private conference the Pharisee Gamaliel persuaded them to follow a more prudent policy. They recall the apostles, scourge them, and dismiss them with a command that they should no more 'speak in the name of Jesus.'

St. Peter's name does not occur in the history either of the appointment of the Seven or of the trial of Stephen. When, after the murder of the latter, 'a great persecution' arose and the brethren 'were scattered,' St. Peter, with the other apostles, remained in Jerusalem.

Thus, during the earliest period of the Church's life at Jerusalem, St. Peter vindicates the primacy with which the Lord entrusted him. He is never, indeed, represented as independent of the other apostles. But he is throughout the history the leader and spokesman of the rest—within the society of the brethren (1<sup>5ff.</sup> 5<sup>1ff.</sup>); itself, before the crowds of listening and inquiring Jews (2<sup>14ff.</sup> 2<sup>37ff.</sup> 3<sup>15ff.</sup>; cf. 5<sup>15</sup>), before the Sanhedrin (4<sup>8ff.</sup> 5<sup>29ff.</sup>).

2. The Church of Palestine (8<sup>1-9<sup>31</sup></sup>).—(a) After the outbreak of the persecution, the new, like the old, Israel became a διασπορά (διασπάρησαν, διασπαρῆτες, 8<sup>1-4</sup> 11<sup>19</sup>). The story of what seems to have been the most important of these enforced evangelistic journeys is given in detail. Philip, one of the Seven, instructs and baptizes many converts in 'the city of Samaria.' The step was an important one. It involved the admission that pure Israelitish blood was not a necessary qualification for admission to the Christian society. The apostles, acting together (8<sup>14</sup>), sent the two most prominent members of their body, Peter and John, to review and to confirm the work of the evangelist. An outpouring of the Holy Spirit in this second stage of the Church's history answers to the day of Pentecost in the first period. But the gift is not spontaneous. It is the Divine response to the prayer of the two apostles, and it is bestowed through their act of ministry. In the sequel St. Peter appears as the sole actor. Simon Magus regards the whole transaction as an exhibition of magical dexterity, and offers to pay liberally for the impartment to himself of the apostles' secret power. He stands out thus early in the history of the Church as the type of the degrading influence on Christianity of paganizing associations. Peter pronounces him to be at present an alien from the gospel, but holds out hope of the purifying influence of repentance and prayer for forgiveness. The apostles, after some further work, returned to Jerusalem, and on their way 'evangelized many villages of the Samaritans.' Thus, in this first effort to extend the gospel beyond its earliest limits, the initiation does not rest with St. Peter. The function which belongs to him, as one of the delegates of the apostolic college, is to set upon the work the seal of authoritative approval, and to deal decisively with a new danger inseparable from the contact of the Church with outside habits of thought and life.

In the earlier chapters of the Acts there is not one clear indication of date. But it is possible to ascertain approximately the time which elapsed between the Ascension and the visit of Peter and John to Samaria. It appears tolerably certain that Damascus was not included in the kingdom of Aretas before the beginning of the reign of Galus (Schürer, HJP i. ii. p. 357 f.; Turner, art. CHRONOLOGY OF NT in vol. i. pp. 416, 424), and that therefore St. Paul's flight from Damascus (2 Co 11<sup>32</sup>) cannot have been earlier than A.D. 37, nor his conversion earlier than 35 (Gal 1<sup>18</sup>; cf. Ac 9<sup>23</sup>). Some weeks, perhaps months, must have elapsed between the conversion of St. Paul and the martyrdom of St. Stephen (Ac 8<sup>3</sup> 9<sup>18</sup> 22<sup>4f.</sup> 26<sup>10ff.</sup> εἰς τὰς ἡμέρας πέντε, Gal 1<sup>18</sup>). Hence the apostles' visit to Samaria must have taken place about five years after the Ascension (A.D. 29).

3. The Church of the World (9<sup>32</sup>-end).—After his return from Samaria, it seems that St. Peter continued at Jerusalem during the remainder of the persecution. But the conversion of Saul of Tarsus and the consequent peace of the Church were the signal for an important change in the apostolic policy. St. Peter starts alone on a journey of visitation and evangelization—vaguely described in Ac 9<sup>32</sup> by the words διερχόμενον διὰ πάντων. It is followed by a more or less protracted sojourn at Lydda and Joppa, where Christian communities had already been founded, and later at Caesarea. The significance of this notice is appreciated only when it is observed that throughout the earlier period of the history Luke has been at pains to emphasize the solidarity of the apostolic body at Jerusalem (8<sup>1-14</sup> 6<sup>2</sup> 5<sup>18, 40ff.</sup>). We are therefore led to the conclusion that this is the time when the apostolic college at Jerusalem, with St. Peter as its natural leader and spokesman, separated, and when James became the acknowledged head of the Church there. Luke sketches the history only of St. Peter at this important crisis, partly because of his primacy among the apostles, partly because his divinely guided action had an important bearing on the extension of the Church to the Gentiles.

The apostle's journey ended at Lydda, where the miraculous restoration of the cripple Aeneas had a wide influence through Lydda and 'the Sharon.' From Lydda St. Peter is summoned to Joppa, and there restores Tabitha to life. Lk in his account of the miracle seems desirous of suggesting that with one significant exception—'he kneeled down and prayed'—St. Peter in action and in words imitated the example of the Lord in the house of Jairus. The miracle was the means of the conversion of many in Joppa. There Peter prolonged his sojourn, in the house of a certain Simon, a tanner, near the shore (10<sup>6</sup>). The place was doubly significant. On the one hand, since the trade of a tanner was considered among the Jews as almost unclean (see Schoettgen and Wetstein on Ac 9<sup>45</sup>), the choice of this house as a lodging may indicate that the apostle's Jewish prejudices were becoming weaker. On the other hand, Joppa, looking out over the waters of the Mediterranean, was to a Jew 'an entrance for the isles of the sea' (1 Mac 14<sup>5</sup>), and by its very position suggested the problem of those 'afar off.' Thus the apostle's mind was in a sense prepared for the thrice-repeated vision, and for the divinely given interpretation of it—'What God hath cleansed, make not thou common'—overruling scruples which held him back from 'killing and eating' what to him as a Jew was 'common and unclean';* and in turn this 'voice from heaven' prepared him to receive the monition of the Spirit that he should go with the messengers of the Roman centurion, 'nothing doubting.' In regard, then, to the evangelization of a Gentile, distinct supernatural direction was given to the Hebrew apostle as it had earlier been vouchsafed to the Hellenistic evangelist (8<sup>29</sup>). St. Peter at once with six brethren (11<sup>12</sup>), whose devotion to Judaism was beyond suspicion (10<sup>45</sup>), went with Cornelius' messengers to Caesarea. The entrance of the leader of the apostles into the Roman capital of Judæa, the noted seaport, predominantly Gentile in character, was in itself a crisis in the progress of the gospel. The sequel increased the significance of the visit. On his first meeting with Cornelius the apostle refuses the Roman's unexpected act of reverence, and entering the house begins with an emphatic statement as to the position of a religious Jew towards Gentiles, and as to the way in which God had Himself taught him to regard no human being as 'common or unclean.' This was the only explanation of his ready response to Cornelius' invitation. Then, in answer to Cornelius' story of the Divine direction granted to him, St. Peter begins his solemn address to his Gentile hearers.

It is clear that in 10<sup>34-43</sup> we have a summary of a speech which was early interrupted (11<sup>15</sup>; cf. 41 7<sup>54</sup> 23<sup>22</sup>).

(1) V. 34<sup>f</sup>. The apostle declares that now he grasps the truth that God is the moral ruler (not of Israel only, but) of men belonging to every nation.

(2) Vv. 36-41. There follows a historical statement as to the Divine message through Christ, the sovereign of all men, primarily addressed to Israel, His unction by the Holy Spirit, His ministry of miracles attested by witnesses, His shameful death, His Resurrection and manifestation through God's direct action to witnesses chosen by God, who by clear proofs were convinced that He was alive.

(3) Vv. 42, 43. He Himself commanded the apostles to proclaim to Israel His appointment by God as Judge of living and dead. The prophets' universal witness to Him implies the truth that every man (Gentile as well as Jew) may have through faith in Him the gift of forgiveness.

Doubtless, the prophets' witness was meant to be the preface to a statement of our Lord's commands as to 'all the nations.' Throughout the speech we notice two contrasted lines of thought—(1) the wider scope of revelation: ἐν παντί ἔθνεσι, v. 35, πάντων κυρίως, v. 36, πάντα τὸν πιστεύοντα, v. 43; (2) the insistence on Israel's being the primary destination of the gospel (vv. 36, 38, 42). It is significant that in regard to the universality of the Divine gifts an appeal is made to the witness of the prophets (v. 43). The reference to Israel's priority in blessing and to the prophets is very natural in the Jewish apostle, to whom the reconciliation of the old revelation and this new manifestation of God's purposes was a fresh problem. It probably had also an apologetic meaning in reference to the Jewish companions of St. Peter (v. 45).

As the apostle was speaking, the Holy Spirit fell upon his hearers, His presence being attested by the gift of tongues. The apostle at once interprets this miraculous endowment as a Divine sign of their admission within the Christian body, and directs their baptism.

Thus the Spirit at Caesarea, as at Jerusalem at the first, was bestowed apart from any act of human ministry. The occasion is marked as the Gentile Pentecost.† It will be noticed that the three outpourings of the Spirit signalize the commencement of the three stages of the progress of the gospel—Jerusalem, Samaria, the Gentile world—and that with each of them St. Peter is intimately connected.

News of the events at Caesarea soon reached Jerusalem, and the circumcised Christians complained of St. Peter's conduct in eating with uncircumcised Gentiles. Apparently a formal assembly of those in authority was held, and the apostle answered the charge brought against him by a simple narrative of what had taken place. The gainsayers were convinced. They confessed that 'God had granted to the Gentiles also repentance unto life' (11<sup>18</sup>)—a confession clearly falling very far short of an acknowledgment of the equal standing of Jew and Gentile in the Christian society.

These events took place in the months succeeding St. Paul's conversion. At the end of three years (i.e. A.D. 37 or 38 probably), St. Paul went up to Jerusalem (Gal 1<sup>18</sup>, cf. Ac 9<sup>26</sup>, 22<sup>17</sup>, 26<sup>20</sup>). His special object was 'to visit Cephas,' whose guest he was for fifteen days. His reference to this visit seems to show that St. Peter alone of the Twelve was at Jerusalem at this time.

Of St. Peter's life during the next six or seven years no notice is preserved. Shortly, however, before the death of Herod Agrippa, in the spring of 44, that king, whose policy it was to conciliate the Pharisaic party (Jos. Ant. xix. vii. 3), made an attack on the Church. It would appear that the growth of the Christian body had excited the envy of the Jews (12<sup>3, 11</sup>), and the enthusiasm with which they welcomed the execution of one of the apostles encouraged the king to throw St. Peter into prison. On the night before the great popular spectacle of which the apostle's trial was to be the occasion, he was miraculously freed from his chains and led by an angel out of the prison. At length, roused completely from sleep and conscious of the situation, he goes to the house of Mary, the mother of John Mark. With difficulty gaining admission, he tells those who had gathered there to intercede for him of his wonderful escape, and bidding them inform 'James and the brethren of these things' 'he went to another place.'

In this narrative three points call for a brief notice. (1) The fact that St. Peter so immediately and naturally hastens to 'the house of Mary,' coupled with the fact that he was obviously well known there, and that it was the place where many met together to pray for him, suggests that this house was his home when he was in Jerusalem. The guest had become in a sense the head of the household, and hence his expression of fatherly regard towards John Mark (1 P 5<sup>13</sup>). (2) The reference to James confirms the conjecture (see above) that he was already in a position of official leadership. (3) There is no word added to define the ἕτερος τόπος to which the apostle retired. Conjecture has been busy: Antioch, Caesarea, Rome have all been named. With the last guess we may connect the belief that St. Peter went to Rome in the reign of Claudius (e.g. Eus. HE II. xiv. 6; see below).

About two years later St. Paul, with Barnabas, visited Jerusalem in connexion with the famine. His stay there was, from the nature of his mission, a short one. The historian's mention simply of 'the elders' (Ac 11<sup>30</sup>) at Jerusalem and St. Paul's silence as to this visit in Gal 1. 2 appear to show that neither St. Peter nor any other of the Twelve was then at Jerusalem.

At the end of the decade—probably A.D. 49—Paul and Barnabas, as the envoys of the Antiochene Church, went up to Jerusalem about the question of the circumcision of Gentile converts (Ac 15<sup>1</sup>). James, the President of the Church there, and (of the Twelve) Peter and John were at Jerusalem. Whether the two latter had been specially summoned, or whether they were for a time living in the Holy City, there is no evidence to show. Even in the calm narrative of the Acts, much more in the broken sentences of the Epistle to the

Galatians, there are signs that the controversy was not without its bitter and painful side. St. Paul appears to imply, though he does not state, that the older apostles favoured some kind of compromise (cf. Ac 21<sup>20ff.</sup>)—the circumcision, perhaps, of Titus, as a qualification for his position as teacher and as the companion of an apostle. In a private conference between the three 'Apostles of the Circumcision' and St. Paul, it was agreed that they should all follow the general lines of their earlier work, the latter aiming primarily at the evangelization of the Gentiles, the three former continuing to work among those of the circumcision. The subsequent history of St. Paul shows how far he was from regarding this understanding as laying down rigid and cramping limits for his activity. As he felt free to teach the Jews at Thessalonica, Athens, Corinth, and Ephesus, so, we may be sure, St. Peter would not consider that he was precluded from teaching Gentiles, whether by word or by letter. Neither side could alter or could wish to alter the terms in which the commission from the Lord had severally come to them. St. Paul had been sent to Israel as well as to the Gentiles (Ac 9<sup>15</sup> 26<sup>17</sup>), the older apostles to the Gentiles as well as to Israel (Mt 28<sup>19</sup> [Mk] 16<sup>15</sup>, Lk 24<sup>47</sup>, Ac 1<sup>8</sup>). At the same time, St. Paul's language in Gal 2<sup>8</sup>, drawing a comparison between his own activity in the Gentile world and St. Peter's among the Jews, implies that the years of St. Peter's life, of which the Acts preserves no record, were marked by successful work among his own people. The private conference prepared the way for the assembly of 'the apostles and the elders,' of which the Acts gives an account. After long discussion, St. Peter addressed those gathered together.

(1) Vv. 7-9. (a) Those present remembered that, in the early days of the gospel, Peter, a staunch Jew, was fixed upon, not by any human arrangement, but by a Divine choice, as the means whereby the Gentiles should hear and believe. (b) And, further, God confirmed the step itself, taken under His guidance, by giving His Spirit to these Gentiles as He had given it at Pentecost to Jews; and, purifying (not their flesh by circumcision but) their hearts by the gift of faith, He put Jew and Gentile on a level. (2) Vv. 10-11. The history of the past points to the duty of the present (ὡς εἶπεν). Those present had no right to tempt God by putting a yoke on the neck of Gentile disciples, the hopeless weight of which was proved by the experience of generations of Jews. On the contrary, so far from bearing this burden, and so having any justification for imposing it on others, Jewish disciples had put themselves on a level with Gentile disciples by their belief that (not circumcision but) the 'grace of the Lord Jesus' was the means of salvation for Jew and Gentile alike.

St. Peter's words, it appears, calmed the excitement of the whole assembly (ἐσίγησεν δὲ πᾶν τὸ πλῆθος), which had been aroused in the 'long discussion,' so that they listened quietly to the statement of 'Barnabas and Paul.' The reference of St. James' speech to 'Symeon's' narrative, and to the agreement of its drift with the words of the prophets, is the last mention of St. Peter in the Acts.

The Church at Jerusalem decided to send to Antioch with Barnabas and Paul two delegates, viz. Judas Barsabbas and Silas. They in due time returned to Jerusalem, while Paul and Barnabas remained behind. It was natural that the official messengers of the mother Church should in time be followed by the chief of the apostles. St. Paul, under the stress of a later controversy, raises for a moment the veil which hid the history of St. Peter's sojourn at Antioch (Gal 2<sup>11</sup>).* At first, he tells us, St. Peter ate with the Gentile disciples, treating them as on an equality with their Jewish brethren. Afterwards certain members of the Church at Jerusalem came from James. These men had been for the moment silenced by the decision of the conference, but they had not been satisfied with its spirit. Perhaps in Jerusalem under the strong rule of St. James they had hidden their discontent. Perhaps also in Jerusalem it was not necessary for them to be often brought into contact with Gentile Christians. At Antioch they saw what a predominantly Gentile Church was. How far they went in practical disloyalty to the decision of the 'Council' we are not told. But the spirit of these malcontents had a disastrous effect on the conduct of St. Peter.* Under their influence he withdrew from the society of, perhaps even from full fellowship in worship with, the Gentile Christians, not probably receding from his former doctrinal position, but practically treating these Gentiles as on a lower level than Jewish believers. He was guilty, not of false doctrine, but (as once before) of moral cowardice. But the effect of his example was disastrous. All the Jewish Christians at Antioch acted the same part as he did (see art. MARK). St. Paul saw that no less an issue was at stake than the real unity of the Church. He felt it his duty publicly to rebuke St. Peter.

* On St. Paul's journeys to Jerusalem as given in the Acts and in Galatians see art. on CHRONOLOGY or NT in vol. i. p. 423 f. The present writer, however, is quite unable to accept the interpretation of Gal 2<sup>11ff.</sup> suggested on p. 424, viz. that that passage precedes in time Gal 2<sup>1-10</sup>. In plain narrative the simple ἐτι δὲ (with aor.) must surely express sequence; cf. Gal 1<sup>15</sup> 2<sup>12</sup> 4<sup>4</sup>. The paraphrase given to justify the interpretation alters the setting of 2<sup>11</sup> and supplies just the word which must have been expressed in Greek had the passage borne the suggested meaning—'So far from simply submitting to them, I once [sic] publicly rebuked their chief.'

St. Paul, in writing to the Corinthians (prob. A.D. 55), mentions the existence at Corinth of a party who called themselves by the name of Cephas (1 Co 1<sup>12</sup> 3<sup>22</sup>). There is not the least reason, however, why St. Peter should be made responsible for their 'heresy' any more than St. Paul for the folly of those who assumed his name. Nor does the existence of a Cephas party at Corinth imply that St. Peter ever visited Corinth. The statement of Dionysius of Corinth (c. A.D. 170, ap. Eus. HE II. xxv. 8), that St. Peter and St. Paul together planted the Church at Corinth and taught there, seems to be simply a mistaken inference from St. Paul's language in 1 Corinthians. There does not appear to be any other trace of a tradition that St. Peter worked in Greece.

The evidence supplied by 1 Peter as to the history of the apostle will be examined in the art. on that Epistle.

The invitation in Rev 18<sup>20</sup> to 'the saints and the apostles and the prophets' to rejoice over the judgment of Babylon, i.e. Rome, ὅτι ἔκρινεν ὁ θεὸς τὸ κρίμα ὑμῶν ἐξ αὐτῆς (cf. 19<sup>2</sup>), may not unreasonably be considered as an allusion to the martyrdom of St. Peter and St. Paul under Nero. If it is urged that the juxtaposition of 'the apostles' and 'the prophets' points to a wider use of the former term, such as we find in the Didaché, it may be answered that the word 'apostle' is used in its strictest sense in Rev 21<sup>14</sup>.

* Hort, Judaistic Christianity p. 80 f., supposes that 'James may have thought it most prudent to send cautions to Peter' (i.e. as to the offending of Jewish susceptibilities), and that the persons mentioned in Gal 2<sup>12</sup> were the bearers of this message.

The present writer would hazard the conjecture that these messengers of James were the bearers of his Epistle. We have in this supposition an adequate explanation of their mission. The date of St. James' Epistle is commonly placed about this time (Mayor, p. cxxiv, gives A.D. 40-50; Zahn, Eintl. i. p. 92, gives c. A.D. 50). It would be very natural that, after the Council at Jerusalem, the President of the Church there should address a letter to the Jewish converts in the Dispersion, to whom recent events must have been a trial of faith; not less natural that he should not directly allude to those events. But at least in two points the Epistle may be thought to have an indirect bearing on the temptations and anxieties of the time. (1) It deals especially with sins of temper and of speech—sins which would inevitably characterize a crisis of keen controversy. (2) It condemns a perversion of St. Paul's doctrine of faith. It might be well for St. James (without touching on personal matters) to reassure Jewish converts by showing them that the acceptance of St. Paul's position in regard to the Gentiles did not involve the acceptance of doctrines which they, however mistakenly, were accustomed to associate with St. Paul's name.

4. The doctrinal position of the Petrine speeches in the Acts.—(i.) The historical witness.—(a) The Lord's ministry fills only a little space in St. Peter's speeches at Jerusalem (2<sup>22</sup>). It was well known to his hearers, and it was overshadowed by more recent events. Its significance, however, is briefly indicated. The Lord's miracles were works of God wrought through Him (e.g. Jn 14<sup>10</sup>). They therefore not only answered to the general Messianic expectation (cf. Jn 7<sup>31</sup>), but were proofs of His mission as God's messenger to Israel (ἀποδεδειγμένον ἀπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ εἰς ὑμᾶς). At Jerusalem, St. Peter appeals to the knowledge of his hearers; at Caesarea, speaking before Gentiles, to the witness of himself and his Jewish companions (10<sup>39</sup>). (b) The crucifixion had its assured place in the Divine counsels (2<sup>23</sup> 3<sup>18</sup>; cf. 4<sup>28</sup>), and was not therefore the chance triumph of the Lord's foes. But on the human side it was the act of Israel (2<sup>23</sup>, 3<sup>17</sup> 4<sup>11</sup> 5<sup>30</sup>), though done in ignorance (3<sup>17</sup>). It involved absolute humiliation (e.g. 2<sup>23</sup> ἐκδοσον . . . προσπήξαιτες), scornful rejection by Israel (e.g. 3<sup>14</sup> 4<sup>11</sup>), and to Jewish eyes the curse of God (5<sup>30</sup> κρεμύσαντες ἐπὶ ξύλου; cf. Dt 21<sup>23</sup>). The last point is important. It suggests that in the earliest as in later times the Jews urged the words of Dt as a final proof of the Divine rejection of Jesus the Nazarene (hence probably the blasphemous creed ἀνάθεμα Ἰησοῦς, 1 Co 12<sup>3</sup>), and that St. Peter directly met the Jewish position. (c) The Resurrection was the immediate act of God the Father (2<sup>24</sup>, 3<sup>15</sup> 4<sup>10</sup> 5<sup>31</sup> 10<sup>40</sup>). It was the Divine refutation of Israel's blasphemy, because it was the Divine reversal of Israel's act of rejection. But a revelation of the risen Messiah had not been given to all (10<sup>41</sup>). It was therefore the primary duty of the apostles to bear witness to the things which 'they saw and heard' (4<sup>20</sup> 10<sup>41</sup>; cf. 1 Jn 1<sup>17</sup>), as proof of the fact of the Resurrection (2<sup>22</sup> 3<sup>15</sup> 4<sup>20</sup> 5<sup>32</sup> 10<sup>41</sup>). Further, the Resurrection involved the Exaltation—the session of 'Jesus Messiah' at God's right hand as κύριος (2<sup>23</sup>, 3<sup>21</sup> 5<sup>31</sup>). Thus the confession Κύριος Ἰησοῦς Χριστός (2<sup>36</sup>; cf. 1 Co 12<sup>3</sup>, Ro 10<sup>9</sup>, Ph 2<sup>11</sup>) is the direct antithesis of the Jewish blasphemy ἀνάθεμα Ἰησοῦς, and an appeal to Israel to make it their own is the solemn conclusion of St. Peter's first address to the Jews. The activity of the exalted Jesus is manifested in the gift of the Holy Spirit (2<sup>33</sup>) and in miracles of healing (3<sup>16</sup> 4<sup>10</sup>; cf. 4<sup>30</sup>).

(ii.) The continuity of revelation and redemption.—The doctrine of a Messiah who had suffered, and who by definite acts of God had been raised from the dead and exalted to supreme sovereignty, was new. But in various ways St. Peter insists that these facts of redemption were the development of the whole history of the people. He who thus worked out His purpose is 'the God of our fathers' (3<sup>13</sup> 5<sup>30</sup>; cf. Shemoneh Esreh 1, * 'Blessed art Thou, Jehovah, our God and the God of our fathers . . . our shield and the shield of our fathers'). This consummation of the Divine action was the burden of all prophecy (3<sup>18</sup>, 24 10<sup>43</sup>; cf. 4 Es 9<sup>4</sup>, and see Weber, Die Lehren des Talmud p. 355). Those to whom St. Peter spoke were 'the sons of the prophets and of the covenant' (3<sup>25</sup>; cf. υἱοὶ τῆς διαθήκης, Ps-Sol 17<sup>17</sup>; 'a son of the law,' Apoc. Bar 46<sup>4</sup>; and see Wetstein in loc.). It should be noticed that Lk, who records St. Peter's applications of prophecy, tells us the source whence he learned them (Lk 24<sup>44</sup>; cf. v. 27).

(iii.) The doctrine of the Messiah.—'Jesus the Nazarene' was declared by God to be Messiah (2<sup>36</sup>). The person of the Lord is here presented from the point of view of His Messiahship. (a) Messianic titles.—(a) The Messiah (ὁ χριστός, Χριστός). The anointing is specially referred to in 4<sup>27</sup> 10<sup>38</sup>; cf. Is 61<sup>1</sup> (Lk 4<sup>18</sup>), Ps 44 (45)<sup>8</sup>. With 10<sup>38</sup> (ἐχρίσεν αὐτὸν ὁ θεὸς πν. ἀγίω καὶ δυνάμει) cf. Ps-Sol 17<sup>42</sup> (ὁ θεὸς καθήργασατο αὐτὸν δυνατὸν ἐν πνεύματι ἀγίω). (β) The Servant (παῖς), 3<sup>13</sup>, 26, comp. (the prayer of the apostles) 4<sup>27</sup>, 30. The phrase is derived from a series of passages in Deutero-Isaiah. Its current Messianic application is certified by Apoc. Bar 70<sup>9</sup> 'My servant Messiah.' On the Rabbinic interpretation of the passages in Isaiah see Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah ii. p. 726. When, through the influence of the controversy with the Ebionites, the meaning of Christological phrases was more keenly analyzed by the Church, it became customary, when the ancient phrase was used of our Lord, to indicate, e.g., by the addition of ἡγαπημένος, that παῖς was to be taken as an equivalent of υἱός (e.g. Clem. *59 (thrice), Ep. ad Diog. 8, Mart. Polyc. *14, Acta Thecla *24; cf. Wis 2<sup>13</sup>, 15). The phrase, however, is used in its original meaning in Did. *ix. 2 (εὐχαριστοῦμεν . . . ὑπὲρ τῆς ἀγίας ἀμύλου Δαυεὶδ τοῦ παιδὸς σου, ἢ ἐγγνώσας ἡμῶν διὰ Ἰησοῦ τοῦ παιδὸς σου), *ix. 3, *x. 2. The simple use, therefore, of this pre-Christian Messianic title, which in sub-apostolic times was avoided or guarded, is very primitive.† It should further be noticed that most of the earliest Christian passages where the phrase occurs (marked above with *) are liturgical, and that it twice occurs in the apostles' prayer (Ac 4). Hence it seems probable that it was characteristic of Jewish prayers, that thence it passed into the primitive vocabulary of the Church, and that, having liturgical associations, it long maintained its place in Christian prayers, though now it received a higher doctrinal connotation. Comp. Lock in Expositor, series iv. vol. iv. p. 178 ff.; Dalman, Die Worte Jesu p. 226 ff. (γ) ὁ ἅγιος καὶ δίκαιος, 3<sup>14</sup>; cf. 4<sup>27</sup>, 30 7<sup>52</sup> 22<sup>14</sup>. Righteousness and holiness are the characteristics of Messiah's time; see e.g. Ps-Sol 17<sup>36</sup>, Enoch 38<sup>2</sup> 'when the righteous One shall appear before the eyes of the elect righteous,' where, as in 53<sup>6</sup> (cf. 46<sup>3</sup>), 'the righteous One' is a designation of the Messiah (cf. Weber, Die Lehren d. T. p. 344). For the holiness of Messiah cf. e.g. Ps-Sol 17<sup>36</sup>. (δ) There is a group of expressions which may be called archaic, being derived from the record of the earliest period of Israel's history. Such expressions are ἀναστήσας (3<sup>26</sup>; cf. v. 22) and ἤγειρεν (5<sup>30</sup>) in the sense of 'God raised up, brought upon the scene,' ἀρχηγὸν καὶ σωτῆρα ὑψώσεν (5<sup>31</sup>; cf. 13<sup>23</sup>), comp. e.g. Jg 3<sup>9</sup>, 15. But phraseology of this kind was not simply archaic. It had been adopted into the devotional and liturgical language of the Messianic hope; cf. e.g. Ps-Sol 17<sup>33</sup>, 47, Apoc. Bar 39<sup>7</sup> 40<sup>3</sup>, Shemoneh Esreh 11.

(b) The issues of Messiah's advent.—The horizon is bounded by the limits of the national hope. 'The promise' (2<sup>39</sup>, cf. Ps-Sol 12<sup>9</sup>) is primarily for Israel. There are in the speeches at Jerusalem but three hints of a wider blessing—ἐπὶ πᾶσαν σάρκα (2<sup>7</sup>, from Jl 2<sup>28</sup>), καὶ πᾶσι τοῖς εἰς μακρὰν θούου ἂν προσκαλέσθαι Κύριος ὁ θεὸς ἡμῶν (2<sup>39</sup>, from Is 57<sup>19</sup>, Jl 2<sup>32</sup>), ὑμῶν πρῶτον (3<sup>26</sup>, cf. Mk 7<sup>27</sup>). But how through the agency of a restored Israel this extension of Messianic redemption is to be brought about is in no way defined. Thus the forecast, while it insists upon, does not go beyond, the more generous Jewish expectation as to the nations, such as finds expression in, e.g., Ps-Sol 17<sup>38</sup> (ἐλεήσει πάντα τὰ ἔθνη ἐνώπιον αὐτοῦ ἐν φόβῳ). It will be noted that in these speeches the phrase τὰ ἔθνη is conspicuously absent.

† It should be remembered that the LXX often represents 727 in Isaiah and elsewhere by δώδεκα (e.g. Is 42<sup>19</sup> 43<sup>20</sup> 49<sup>3</sup>, 5). It is therefore not improbable that St. Paul's words μαρτύριον δόξα λαβῶν in Ph 27 allude to the prophecies in Deutero-Isaiah. But in Ph 2 the preceding and the succeeding context alike guard against any misconception.

* The Benedictions (in the original) are given in the Palestinian and Babylonian recensions in Dalman, Die Worte Jesu p. 299 ff. An English rendering will be found in Schrürer, HJP ii. ii. p. 83 ff.; see also Westcott, Hebrews p. 206 ff.

To Israel three blessings are offered through the work of Jesus Messiah: (1) national repentance and forgiveness (2<sup>38</sup> 3<sup>19</sup> 5<sup>21</sup>; cf. e.g. Ps-Sol 18<sup>38</sup>, Lk 1<sup>77</sup>), chiefly in reference to the great national sin of rejecting 'the Lord's Anointed'; cf. e.g. Ps-Sol 18<sup>38</sup>, Shemoneh Esreh 5, 6 (especially in the Babylonian recension, which must be of Palestinian origin, Dalman, Die Worte p. 301 n.); (2) national rest and peace (καὶ οἰοὶ ἀναψύξεως, 3<sup>19</sup>); cf. e.g. Enoch 50<sup>1</sup>, Ps-Sol 10<sup>38</sup>. ἐν εὐφροσύνῃ Ἰσραὴλ, 14<sup>6</sup> 17<sup>50</sup> 18<sup>7</sup>; (3) the mission of Messiah from heaven, and the coming of 'times of the restoration of all things (ἀποκαταστάσεως πάντων, 3<sup>21</sup>)'; cf. the Rabbinic passages quoted in Weber (p. 333 f.) as to the necessity of repentance for the coming of Messiah and its attendant blessings; for 'the restoration' see, e.g., Enoch 45<sup>44</sup>, Apoc. Bar 73 f.*

It must be observed that in 4<sup>2</sup> the Sadducees are represented as 'sore troubled' because the apostles 'proclaimed in Jesus the resurrection from among the dead' (τὴν ἐκ νεκρῶν), i.e. a resurrection of the righteous. The reference may be to some words of the apostles unrecorded in Lk's brief summary, or to an interpretation which the Sadducees put on their teaching about the Resurrection of Jesus. On the Jewish doctrine of the Resurrection see e.g. Ps-Sol 3<sup>16</sup>, Shemoneh Esreh 2; see also Charles, Eschatology p. 302 f.

In reviewing the doctrine of St. Peter's early speeches we note that the new facts of the ministry of Jesus, His death, His Resurrection and Exaltation, are stated with absolute precision and emphasis. But the theological interpretation of these facts is inchoate. The predestination of the Messiah is spoken of (2<sup>38</sup> 3<sup>18</sup>, cf. 4<sup>28</sup>), but His pre-existence is not affirmed, nor is anything said of His unique relation to the Father. The death of Christ is not contemplated in a sacrificial aspect, nor is it brought into connexion with the problem of justification. There is no allusion to the moral and spiritual power of the Resurrection through the union of the believer with the Risen Lord, nor to the sanctifying influence of the Holy Spirit. The convictions and hopes created or quickened in the apostle's mind are expressed in terms of the religion of a devout Israelite. If we compare St. Peter's speeches with any one of the apostolic Epistles (except that of St. James, which deals almost wholly with questions of conduct), we see the difference between an immediate interpretation of the Christian facts in their bearing on Israel, and a matured apprehension and exposition of these facts in their universal and absolute significance.

III. ST. PETER IN CHRISTIAN TRADITION.—1. St. Peter's early life.—Epiphanius, a monk of Jerusalem of the 9th cent., in his 'Acts and end of . . . Andrew,' relates (ed. Dressel p. 45 f.) that 'in the days of Hyrcanus, the priest and king of the Hebrews, there was a certain Jonas of the tribe of Symeon. He was a poor man, and at his death left his two sons, Simon and Andrew, in great poverty. They hired themselves out. Andrew devoted himself to a life of absolute continence. Simon married the daughter of Aristobulus, brother of the Apostle Barnabas, and, as it is said, had a son and a daughter. . . . After the death of his mother-in-law he committed his wife to the Theotokos' (cf. for other authorities Lipsius * p. 7). In the Book of the Bee of Solomon, a writer of the first half of the 13th cent., who, according to Lipsius (Die Apokr. Ap., Ergänzungsheft p. 19), constantly depends on older sources, the apostle belonged to the tribe of Naphtali (Oxford Semitic Series, I. pt. ii. p. 104). Clement (Strom. iii. 6, p. 535 ed. Potter, quoted in Eus. HE III. xxx.) says that the apostles Peter and Philip had children;† and Jerome (adv. Jovinian. i. 26) states that the περιόδοι mentions a son and a daughter of St. Peter; while he himself, arguing apparently from the silence of Scripture (Mk 1<sup>29a</sup>), supposes that his wife had died before his call to follow Christ. Clement in the passage just quoted asserts that the apostles travelled with their wives οὐχ ὡς γαμεράς ἀλλ' ὡς ἀδελφάς, and employed them in ministrations to women (cf. Clem. Recog. ii. 1, vii. 25, 36; Hom. xiii. 1, 11). Clement further preserves a tradition (Strom. vii. 11, p. 868 ed. Potter, quoted in Eus. HE III. xxx.), to which, it seems, no independent writer alludes, that St. Peter's wife suffered a martyr's death, and that the apostle, when he saw her led away, encouraged her with the words μέμνησο, ὡς αὐτῆ, τοῦ κυρίου (as Eus. gives the phrase),—words which may imply that she too had known the Lord. There is nothing improbable in the supposition that she was one of the women who suffered in the Neronian persecution (Clem. Rom. vi.).

The story of Petronilla, the supposed daughter of St. Peter, is given in Acta Nerei et Achillei 15 (ed. Achelis p. 14 f.), and in Acta Philippi, in Tischendorf, Apoc. Apocr. pp. 149, 155. Augustine (contr. Adimant. 17; Migne, Pat. Lat. 42, 161) also mentions the fact that the story had a place in the apocryphal books in use among the Manichaeans. The beauty of the daughter, so the story runs, was a trouble to the apostle, who therefore prayed that she might be paralyzed. He afterwards, in answer to the challenge of Titus, bade her rise and minister to them. After her restoration she was sought in marriage by 'Flaccus the Count.' She puts him off for three days, and on the third day dies after receiving the Eucharist. The Encratite element in the story connects it with the Gnostic Ἠράξεις Πέτρον (see below), from which it was doubtless originally derived (see Lipsius pp. 81, 203 ff.). The saint's memorial day is May 31. Over her tomb in the Ardeatine Way pope Siricius, about 390, erected a basilica. The inscription on the tomb was AVR · PETRONILLÆ · FILIÆ · DVLCISSIMÆ. The name Petronilla is to be connected, not with Peter but with Petronius. The founder of the Flavian house bore the name of Petro. The catacomb in which Petronilla was buried was closely connected with the Flavian gens, being the 'Cemetery of Domitilla,' the wife of Flavius Clemens. Doubtless the story arose from a mistaken etymology. Petronilla, an early convert to Christianity and a member of the Flavian family, was in later days assumed to be a daughter of the Apostle Peter (see Lightfoot, Clement i. p. 37 ff., who gives references to de Rossi's articles; Lanciani, Pagan and Christian Rome p. 340 ff.).

As to (late) traditions respecting the personal appearance of the apostle, it must suffice to refer to Lipsius p. 213. As the tonsure was supposed to be due to St. Peter's example, it is of interest to notice that Jerome (Comm. in Gal. i. 18) refers to a statement of the Periōdi that he was bald.

Among the sayings of our Lord preserved in extra-canonical authorities a few are addressed to St. Peter. (1) Ignatius, Smyr. 3, 'When [after the Resurrection] He came to Peter and his company, He said to them, Lay hold and handle Me, and see that I am not a demon without body.' Cf. Lk 24<sup>36f.</sup> On the question whether this saying had a place in 'the Gospel according to the Hebrews,' see Lightfoot in loco. (2) '2 Clem.' 5, 'The Lord saith, Ye shall be as lambs in the midst of wolves. But Peter answered and said unto Him, What then if the wolves should tear the lambs? Jesus said unto Peter, Let not the lambs fear the wolves after they are dead,' etc. Cf. Mt 10<sup>28</sup>, Lk 12<sup>4f.</sup>. See Lightfoot's note. (3) 'The Gospel according to the Hebrews' (ap. Jerome, adv. Pelag. iii. 2), 'Si peccauerit, inquit, frater tuus in verbo et satis tibi fecerit, septies in die suscipe eum. Dixit illi Simon discipulus eius, Septies in die? Respondit Dominus et dixit ei, Etiam ego dico tibi, Usque septuagies septies.' Cf. Mt 18<sup>22</sup>, Lk 17<sup>4</sup>. See Westcott, Introduction p. 456; Hilgenfeld, NT extra Canon. iv. pp. 16, 23. (4) 'The Gospel according to the Hebrews' (ap. Origen in Matth. tom. xv. 14), 'Conuersus dixit Simoni discipulo suo sedenti apud se, Simon fili Johanne, facilius est camelum intrare per foramen acus, quam diuitem in regnum caelorum.' Cf. Mt 19<sup>16</sup>. See Westcott p. 463; Hilgenfeld p. 16. (5) 'The Gospel of the Ebionites' (ap. Epiph. Hæc. xxx. 13), 'And when He came to Capernaum, He entered into the house of Simon, surnamed Peter; and He opened His mouth and said, As I passed along the Lake of Tiberias I chose John and James, sons of Zebedee, and Simon and Andrew . . . you then I wish to be twelve apostles for a testimony to Israel.' See Westcott p. 466; Hilgenfeld pp. 33, 36. On the Gospel and the Apocalypse of Peter see below, p. 776 f.

2. St. Peter in connexion with the Syrian Antioch.—According to a very widespread tradition, St. Peter was the founder and organizer of the Church in Antioch. The Clementine Romance, which must date back at least to the beginning of the 3rd cent., makes the apostle's entry into Antioch and his success there the happy conclusion of the story (Hom. xx. 23; Recog. x. 68 ff.). Baseless as most of its details are, in such a matter as this it would be likely to reflect current tradition, especially as it probably originated in Syria (see below). Origen (Hom. vi. in Luc., ed. Lomm. v. p. 104) calls Ignatius 'the second Bishop of Antioch after the blessed Peter.' This statement was not improbably derived from an earlier list of Antiochene bishops. Such a list Lipsius (p. 25, cf. Lightfoot, Clement i. p. 333 f.) thinks can be assigned to the time of Victor of Rome. Other important notices of St. Peter's connexion with the Church of Antioch preserved in Christian literature are: (1) Greek: (a) Apost. Const. vii. 46; (b) Euseb. HE III. xxxvi. 2, Chron. (see below); (c) Chrys. Hom. in Ign. Mart. (Migne, Pat. Gr. i. 591); (d) Theodoret, Dial. Inmut. (Migne, Pat. Gr. lxxxiii. 81); (e) Chron. Paschale (Migne, Pat. Gr. xcii. 557). In the last document we are told that in the fourth year after the Ascension Peter went to Antioch, that at the request of the Jewish Christians he enthroned himself as bishop, that he did not receive or regard any Gentile Christians, and that so leaving them to themselves he departed thence—a story which must be derived from some early Ebionite romance cognate to the Letter of Peter to James prefixed to the Clem. Homilies. (2) Latin: (a) Jerome, de Virr. Illustr. 1; (b) Leo, Epp. 106, 119 (Migne, Pat. Lat. liv. 1007, 1042); (c) Liber Pontificalis (in all the several forms, ed. Duchesne pp. 50 f., 118), see below; (d) Gregory the Great, Ep. vii. 40 (Migne, Pat. Lat. lxxvii. 899), 'ipse firmavit sedem [in Antiochia] in qua septem annis, quamuis discessurus, sedit.' The festival of 'Cathedra Petri in Antiochia' was on Feb. 22 (see below, p. 773). (3) Syriac: Doctr. Apost. (Cureton, Anc. Syr. Documents, p. 33).

To pass to the date and length of Peter's sojourn at Antioch. The Lib. Pontificalis, both in the original form as restored by Duchesne (p. 51), and in the later recension (p. 118), gives seven years (so Greg.) as the length of Peter's Antiochene episcopate. This evidence probably represents the Roman tradition of the earlier years of the 6th century. The Felician abridgment (c. A.D. 530), however, has 'annos x.' (p. 50). It would not be difficult in a reconstruction of St. Peter's life to find a place for an Antiochene ministry of seven or ten years' duration. But the evidence is too late to claim serious attention. The dates given in the two chief versions of Eusebius' Chronicon are conflicting (ed. Schoene, p. 150 ff.). The Armenian version places the apostle's departure for Rome, 'when he had first founded the Church of Antioch,' in the third year of Gaius (39-40), and the appointment of Euodius in the second year of Claudius (42-43). Jerome (so also Syriac epitome, ed. Schoene p. 211) gives the departure for Rome in the second year of Claudius, and the appointment of Euodius two years later. The arrangement in Jerome seems artificial, for he places in three consecutive years three important events connected with the three great Churches—Rome, Alexandria, Antioch. Moreover, the Petrine dates in the Chronicon are connected with what appears to be the impossible assumption of a 25 years' episcopate at Rome. The simple tradition, however, which associates St. Peter with the early period of the Church at Antioch, seems to go back to the 2nd cent., and is intrinsically probable.

3. St. Peter in connexion with Pontus and the provinces of Asia Minor.—Origen (ap. Eus. HE III. 1) is the earliest authority—Ἡέρπος δὲ ἐν Πόντῳ καὶ Γαλατῖα καὶ Βιθυνία Καππαδοκία τε καὶ Ἀσία κεκηρυχέναι τοῖς ἐκ διασπορᾶς Ἰουδαίοις εὐκριν. The last word shows that the statement is an inference; the enumeration of provinces and the reference to the διασπορά make it plain that the source of the inference is the salutation of 1 P. Epiphanius (Hæc. xxvii. vi. p. 107 ed. Petav.) goes a step further, and states that the apostle often visited Pontus and Bithynia. Jerome (de Virr. Illustr. 1) places this missionary journey between the apostle's episcopate at Antioch and his journey to Rome in the second year of Claudius. The Syriac Doctrine of the Apostles (Cureton, Ancient Syriac Documents p. 33) informs us that 'Antioch and Syria and Cilicia and Galatia, even to Pontus, received the apostles' hand of priesthood from Simon Cephas, who himself laid the foundation of the Church there, and was priest and ministered there up to the time when he went from thence to Rome.' In this missionary journey Andrew was traditionally associated with Peter. Thus, in the catholic Acts of Andrew as given by Epiphanius (ed. Dressel pp. 45-82), a monk of Jerusalem of the 9th cent., the story is told how the two brothers journey from the Syrian Antioch to Tyana in Cappadocia, and from thence to Sinope in Pontus. Epiphanius himself visited Sinope, and found there traditions of the apostles' visit. The inhabitants pointed out a spot on a desert island some six miles from the city where the apostles dwelt, and the chairs on which they sat to teach (pp. 47, 50). There are, however, indications that in this tradition there has been a confusion between the obscure Simon Zelotes and his well-known brother-apostle Simon Peter (Lipsius, Apokr. Apostelg. i. p. 612, II. i. p. 6). Photius (Cod. cxiv.; Migne, Pat. Gr. ciii. 389) among the Leucian Acts mentions Acts of Andrew. We may infer, therefore, that the kernel of the later Acts of Andrew was supplied by this 2nd cent. romance. On the Acts of Andrew in their different forms see Lipsius, Apokr. Apostelg. I. 543-622; James, Apocr. Anecdota ii. p. xxix ff.; Bonnet, Passio Andree (Acta Ap. Apoc. ii.). On the tradition as to St. Peter's work in Pontus, etc., see Lipsius, Apokr. Apostelg. II. i. p. 4 ff. There is no reason to regard it as anything but an inference from the salutation of the Epistle.

4. St. Peter in connexion with Babylon.—Lipsius adduces two pieces of evidence to show that St. Peter visited Babylon. (1) He refers to two Nestorian writers (Assemani, Bibl. Orient. iii. 2, p. vi) who make this assertion. But, apart from the lateness of their date, their statement is avowedly based on a literal interpretation of 1 P 5<sup>18</sup>. And, again, the earlier Syriac tradition as given in the Doctrine of Addai (p. 44 ed. Phillips) and in the Doctrine of Simon Cephas (Cureton, Ancient Syriac Documents p. 35) knows nothing of Babylon, and makes the apostle visit Rome. (2) Lipsius argues that, when the Acts of Simon and Jude (Fabricius, Cod. Apocr. NT ii. p. 608 ff.) make Simon the Cananean go to Babylon, the obscure Simon has taken the place of his famous namesake, and that therefore these Acts supply an argument for Simon Peter's visit to Babylon. It can only be said that such a conclusion rests on an inversion of probability. In short, there is no evidence for the theory that St. Peter worked at Babylon (see Lipsius, Die Apokr. Apostelg. II. ii. pp. 145 f., 175, Ergänzungsheft p. 32; and, on the other side, Zahn, Eint. ii. p. 21).

5. St. Peter in connexion with Rome.—The chief points at issue are, whether St. Peter visited Rome; if he did, how long he worked there; whether he suffered martyrdom there; and if so, at what date. It will be most convenient to arrange the evidence under the several Churches.

(1) Rome.—(a) Clement (c. A. D. 96) v. vi. In the previous chapters Clement has spoken of the evils which have sprung from 'jealousy and envy.' He has taken examples from Scripture in chronological order, ending with David. 'Let us,' he continues, 'come to the athletes who lived but lately (τοὺς ἔγγιστα γενομένους, i.e. as compared with the OT heroes), the noble examples of our own generation. Because of envy the great and righteous pillars (of the Church) were persecuted and contended unto death. Let us set before our eyes the good apostles—Peter, who endured many labours and, having borne his witness (μαρτυρήσας), went to the appointed place of glory; Paul (who suffered much and journeyed far and), having borne his witness before the rulers, departed thus from the world and went to the holy place. . . . To these men . . . there was gathered a great company of the elect, who, being the victims of jealousy, by reason of many outrages and tortures became a noble example among us.' The main points are these: (i.) The most reasonable explanation of the fact that the examples of the other apostles are passed over and Peter and Paul alone mentioned, is that Clement points to those two apostles whose examples of heroism were best known to the Church in whose name he writes (cf. Ignatius, below). (ii.) That St. Paul suffered at Rome is universally allowed. The language is carefully chosen to emphasize the likeness between the experiences of the two apostles. (iii.) If the passage, when naturally interpreted, discloses the place of St. Peter's martyrdom, what of the time? We have seen that in the preceding context Clement followed the order of time. It is unlikely that he would desert that order in regard to events within his own knowledge and that of his readers. Since, then, 'the great company of the elect' who suffered were plainly Nero's victims, it seems to follow that the two apostles perished either before or during the Neronian persecution. The former alternative may be put aside as unsupported by any evidence. Further, a close association of the apostles and 'the great company' seems implied in the phrase τοῖς . . . συναθροίσθη. Indeed, a strict interpretation of these words appears to justify us in going a step further. They mean 'to these' rather than 'with these' 'there was gathered,'* and thus seem to imply that the apostles were among those 'who were seized first' (Tac. Ann. xv. 44), the first-fruits of a too abundant harvest. Thus the obvious interpretation of Clement's words is that St. Peter and St. Paul were martyred in the Neronian persecution; while the language is not explicit enough to have created the tradition. (b) Caius, a Roman presbyter, a contemporary of Zephyrinus and Hippolytus. Eus. HE II. xxv. quotes the following words from the treatise of Caius against Proclus the Montanist: ἐγὼ δὲ τὰ πρόπαια τῶν ἀποστόλων ἐξωδείξαι· ἐάν γὰρ θελήσης ἀπελθεῖν ἐπὶ τὸν Βατικανὸν ἢ ἐπὶ τὴν ὁδὸν τὴν Ἰσταν, εἰρήσεις τὰ πρόπαια τῶν ταύτην ἰδρυσάμενων τὴν ἐκκλησίαν. The words of Caius are an explicit statement (1) that both the apostles worked for some time at Rome; (2) that they died a martyr's death at Rome. But the question remains—Did τὰ πρόπαια mark the place of execution (so Lipsius) or of burial (so Zahn)? There are strong reasons for choosing the latter alternative. The ἐγὼ δὲ of Caius suggests that he at Rome claims to eclipse what Proclus appealed to in Asia Minor, i.e. the tombs of Philip and his daughters at Hierapolis (Eus. HE III. xxxi. 4). This clearly was the meaning which Eusebius himself put upon the words (cf. III. xxxi. 1). Thus we can draw another inference from Caius' words, viz. that at the beginning of the 3rd cent. the Roman Church thought that it possessed the bodies of the two apostles. No certain answer can be given to the further question—Of what did these πρόπαια consist? The word may imply the erection on the spot of a building of some kind, a memoria such as the Liber Pontificalis (ed. Duchesne pp. 55, 125) says that Anencletus built. Or it may point to some natural or other object which identified the spot, such as the catholic Acts† speak of (see below, p. 772). (c) Hippolytus. In the Refutatio (vi. 20) this writer speaks of the conflict between Simon Magus and 'the apostles' at Rome, and in particular of Peter's opposition to him. It appears, however, that Hippolytus used the apocryphal Acts (Bonwetsch, Studien zu den Komm. Hippolyts p. 27), and we cannot be sure, therefore, that his statement is independent evidence. Yet the end of Simon as described by him differs from his end according to the extant Acts. (d) The Muratorian Canon. The fragment speaks of the 'passion of Peter' in close connexion with St. Paul's journey to Spain. As these two events are mentioned together in the Acts of Peter, it is probable that the writer (very probably Hippolytus) has these Acts in his mind (James, Apocr. Anecdota ii. p. x f.), and we are not entitled to infer more than that he does not question the truthfulness of the Acts in these matters. (e) The notice in the Depositio Martyrum (see below, p. 772) as to the translation of the apostles' bodies in 258 confirms the evidence of Caius.

(2) Syria.—(a) Ignatius of Antioch (c. 115). He writes to the Romans (c. iv.) thus: οὐχ ὡς Πέτρος καὶ Παῦλος διατάσσομαι ὑμῖν. Contrast the similar but studiously general language addressed to the

† Ed. Lipsius pp. 172, 216: ἴθνησαν [τὸ σῆμα αὐτῶν] ὑπὸ τὴν περιβύθον πλῆθειν τοῦ ναυμαχίου εἰς τόπον καλοῦμενον Βατικανόν.

Trallians (c. iii.): ἡ αὐτὴ κατὰ κριτος ὡς ἀπόστολος ὑμῶν διατάσσεται. In the letter to the Romans St. Peter and St. Paul are mentioned—such is the natural explanation—because they had actually given commandments to the Roman Church (see Lightfoot in loc.). (b) Clementine literature (Recog., Hom.). The Grundschrift had its origin probably in Syria before the close of the 2nd cent. In the documents now extant there are a few allusions to Peter's visit to Rome. But it is not certain that they are not due to later editing (see below, p. 775). (c) Documents of the Syriac-speaking Church: The Doctrine of Addai, 'in its present shape a work of the latter half of the 4th cent.' (Wright, Short Hist. of Syriac Literature p. 9), speaks of 'the Epistles of Paul, which Simon Peter sent us from the city of Rome' (ed. Phillips p. 44); so Doctr. of the Apostles (Cureton, Ancient Syriac Documents p. 33).

(3) Corinth.—Dionysius, bishop of Corinth (c. 170), addressed a letter to Soter, bishop of Rome, a fragment of which is preserved in Eus. HE II. xxv. 8. After speaking of the common work of St. Peter and St. Paul at Corinth, he continues: ὁμοίως δὲ καὶ εἰς τὴν Ἰταλίαν ὁμοίως διδάξαντες ἐμαρτύρησαν κατὰ τὸν αὐτὸν καιρὸν. The reference to the common work of the two apostles in Corinth is probably a mere inference from 1 Co. But there is nothing in the NT which can account for the assertion of their common activity in Italy. Dionysius must therefore here refer to a tradition, which may have come to him through the medium of the Petrine Acts, but which, however it reached him, he accepted. It matters little whether ὁμοίως is taken loosely to mean 'together,' or more strictly ' (going to) the same place,' i.e. in Italy. Dionysius can have only Rome in his mind. The last words of the extract imply that the apostles suffered, not necessarily on the same day, but during the same persecution.

(4) Asia Minor.—(a) Papias (c. 130). It is a reasonable inference from the language of Eusebius (HE II. xv. 2, III. xxxix. 15, 16) that Papias interpreted Babylon in 1 P 5th of Rome, and is therefore a witness for the Roman visit. (b) The Gnostic Acts of Peter were probably the work of Leucius Charinus in the second half of the 2nd cent. As Leucius lived in Asia Minor, it is clear that he did not place the scene of Peter's conflict with Simon Magus at Rome from motives of ecclesiastical patriotism. It is natural to suppose that he built up the romance on a current tradition of Peter's visit to Rome (see below, p. 774).

(5) South Gaul.—Irenæus (c. 190) gained his knowledge of earlier times from many sources. As the pupil of Polycarp in Asia, he was acquainted with the traditions of 'the school of St. John.' He himself visited Rome, probably on more than one occasion, and, it would appear, he resided there for some time (Lightfoot, Essays on 'Supernatural Religion' p. 267). His list of Roman bishops makes it probable that he had had access to the records preserved in the Roman Church. He writes thus (III. i. 1): 'Matthew . . . published his Gospel while Peter and Paul were preaching at Rome and founding the Church there. And after their departure (ἐξόδου) Mark, the disciple and interpreter of Peter, he too handed on to us in writing what Peter preached.' Irenæus, it will be noticed, speaks of the joint work of the apostles at Rome as belonging to a period so well known that it supplies a means of dating another event. Further, it is natural to take the word ἐξόδος as referring to the apostles' death; for (independently of other notices) this interpretation is favoured by (1) the use of the word, cf. Wis 3<sup>d</sup> 7<sup>s</sup>, Lk 9th, 2 P 1st; Clem. Alex. pp. 570, 882, ed. Potter, and the frequent use of exitus in Tertullian (Oehler on Scorp. 9); (2) the context—to say that Mark recorded the substance of Peter's preaching after his death defines not only the date but the reason of the composition of the Gospel.

(6) Alexandria.—(a) Clement (c. 200), in a fragment of the Hypotyposeis, preserved by Eusebius (HE VI. xiv.), and in the commentary on 1 Peter contained in the same treatise and now extant in a Latin translation (ed. Potter p. 997), in connexion with the composition of St. Mark's Gospel speaks of St. Peter's preaching at Rome. (b) Origen (c. 250). In the passage quoted above (p. 768), Origen, after speaking of St. Peter's journeys in Asia Minor, adds that 'at last, having arrived in Rome, he was crucified head downwards, having himself requested that he might so suffer.' (c) Peter of Alexandria. The date of the Epistola Canonica is apparently A.D. 306 (Dict. Chr. Biog. iv. p. 331). In it (Can. 9, Routh, Rel. Sacr. iv. p. 34) mention is made of St. Peter's crucifixion at Rome.

(7) North Africa.—(a) Tertullian (c. 200). The passages in Tertullian's writings are—Scorp. 15: 'Orientem fidem Romæ primus Nero cruentavit. Tunc Petrus ab altero cingitur, cum cruci adstrigitur'; de Bapt. 4: 'quos P. in Tiberi tinxit'; de Præscr. Hæret. 32: 'Romanorum [ecclesiam refert] Clementem a Petro ordinatum'; ib. 36: 'Ista quam felix ecclesia [sc. Romæ] . . . ubi Petrus passioni dominicæ adæquatur.' Thus Tertullian is the earliest writer who (1) speaks of the manner of St. Peter's death—by crucifixion; (2) and explicitly states that it took place in Nero's reign. (b) Commodian. This earliest Christian poet, probably of African extraction, writing about A.D. 250 (see Dict. Chr. Biog. i. p. 610), speaks in the Carmen Apologeticum 820 f. of Peter and Paul suffering in Rome under Nero.

(8) This Catena will best be ended with a reference to the two historians of the first part of the 4th cent., Lactantius and Eusebius. Lactantius in Instit. Div. iv. 21 speaks of Peter and Paul preaching in Rome, adding, 'ea prædicatio in memoriam scripta permansit'—which Zahn (Ges. Kan. ii. p. 884) considers to be a reference to the Pauli prædicatio (cf. pseudo-Cyprian, de Rebapt. 17); and in de Mort. Persec. 2 he says of Nero: 'Petrum cruci affixit et Paulum interfecit.' The following passages from Eusebius are to the point:—HE II. xiv. (Peter's conflict at Rome with Simon Magus in Claudius' reign), xv. (Peter and the composition of Mark's Gospel at Rome), xvii. (in the reign of Claudius, Philo became acquainted with Peter at Rome; cf. Jerome, de Virr. Illustr. xi.; Photius, Cod. 105), xxv. (Paul beheaded, Peter crucified at Rome), III. xxi. (Clement third in succession 'after Peter and Paul'), xxxi. 1; Demons. Evang. iii. 5. 65 (St. Peter crucified at Rome head downwards); Theophania iv. 7 (ed. Lee p. 221; Peter's 'honourable sepulchre in the very front of their city,' i.e. Rome), v. 31 (ed. Lee p. 315; Peter crucified at Rome). See just below on the Chronicon. Passages from later writers are collected by Lipsius p. 236 ff. For a summing up of this evidence see below, p. 777.

6. Chronological notices in the Chronicon of Eusebius and in the Liber Pontificalis.—(i.) The Chronicon.—(a) St. Peter's arrival in Rome. The Armenian version assigns St. Peter's arrival at Rome, after founding the Church at Antioch, to the 3rd year of Caius, i.e. 39–40, adding, 'commoratur illic antistes ecclesie annis viginti.' The appointment of Euodius as bishop of Antioch is placed in the 2nd year of Claudius, i.e. 42–43. Jerome puts the appointment of Euodius in the 4th year of Claudius, i.e. 44–45, and the arrival of St. Peter at Rome, after founding the Antiochene Church, in the 2nd year of Claudius, i.e. 42–43. He adds

'xxv annis eiusdem urbis episcopus perseuerat.*' (b) St. Peter's death. The Armenian version puts the Neronian persecution, 'when the apostles Peter and Paul suffered martyrdom at Rome,' in the 13th year of Nero, i.e. 67-68, and perhaps by a pure mistake the beginning of Linus' episcopate 'post Petrum' is assigned to the previous year.† Jerome places the persecution, the martyrdom of the two apostles, and the accession of Linus to the episcopate in the last—the 14th—year of Nero. It may be noticed that the date in the Armenian version for Peter's arrival at Rome seems to be a revision of the Eusebian date, and was perhaps attained thus. It is said in this version that Peter continued at Rome 20 years: this brings us to 59-60—an absurd date for the apostle's death. But if we suppose that in the processes of translation and revision 'twenty' was substituted for 'twenty-five,' then we get a date assigned to Peter's death very shortly after the fire in July 64. It seems likely, then, that the Armenian version, assuming 25 years' episcopate, worked back from the summer or autumn of 64, and so gave the early date for Peter's arrival in Rome. If this be so, we have here indirect evidence of the survival of the tradition that Peter's martyrdom took place in 64. The date, however, of the apostle's death is unrevised, and retains its Eusebian position at the end of Nero's reign. Two other passages dealing with the date of St. Peter's arrival at Rome must be quoted: (1) Eus. HE II. xiv., where, after an account of Simon's mischievous doings at Rome, Eusebius adds that Providence brought Peter also thither ἐπι τῆς αὐτῆς Κλαυδίου βασιλείας. (2) Jerome (de Virr. Illustr. 1): 'Romam pergit ibique viginti quinque annis cathedram sacerdotalem tenuit usque ad ultimum annum Neronis, id est, quartum decimum' (cf. v.). Harnack (Die Chronol. p. 124 n.) points out that Eusebius in the History does not refer to a 25 years' episcopate, and puts Peter's arrival at Rome simply in the reign of Claudius, and that it is therefore possible that the reference to the 25 years and the location of the commencement of that period in the 2nd year of Claudius may be due to Jerome. This may be so; but the fact that both the versions of the Chronicon, the Armenian and Jerome, mention the length of Peter's stay at Rome (the original number of years in the Arm. as in Jerome having probably been 25), and that they both place his martyrdom there near the end of Nero's reign, points to the dates and the 25 years' episcopate having been derived from the original statement of the Eusebian Chronicon. It is probable (Lightfoot, Clement i. p. 339; Harnack, Chronol. p. 123) that Eusebius derived his early papal chronology from Julius Africanus; and the latter may in his turn have used earlier documents, e.g. the lists of Hegesippus. But (assuming that it had a place in the Chronicon of Eusebius) there is no evidence to show whether the 25 years' episcopate was the invention of Eusebius or whether he inherited it from one of his predecessors. It will appear in a moment that it is probably the result of an artificial arrangement of dates. We turn to the date of the martyrdom, which is put in the last year of Nero's reign. It is to be noticed that the catholic Acts of Peter (ed. Lipsius p. 172 f.) connect with the apostle's death a prophecy that 'Nero should be destroyed not many days hence'

* The Syriac Epitome (Schoene p. 211) puts the foundation of the Church at Antioch and St. Peter's arrival at Rome ('et preluit ecclesie illi annos xxv') in Anno Abr. 2058 (= A.D. 42-43), the appointment of Eudius two years later; but under An. Abr. 2064 (= A.D. 48-49) it has the entry, 'Petrus apostolus moderator eccl. Romane factus est.'

† It is, however, possible that we should connect this appointment of Linus with what there are some reasons for thinking to be the fact that Peter left Rome for a time about a year before his martyrdom there (see below, p. 778).

and relate its speedy fulfilment. Eusebius' words, preserved by Syncellus, are: ἐπι πᾶσι δ' αὐτοῦ τοῖς ἀδικήμασι [ἀνυχήμασι Codd.] καὶ τὸν πρῶτον κατὰ Χριστιανῶν ἐνεδέξατο διωγμὸν, ἥρκα Πέτρος καὶ Παῦλος κ.τ.λ. It does not appear that Eusebius was acquainted with Tacitus, and, if he did not connect the persecution with the great fire, it was very natural that, whether he followed the catholic Acts or no, he should regard the attack on the Church as the filling up of Nero's iniquities (cf. Ac 12<sup>1-23</sup>). On the other hand, the evidence of Tacitus is decisive that the persecution followed immediately upon the fire; and the Chronicon records under the year 63-64 'many conflagrations at Rome.' We have still to account for the legend of the 25 years' episcopate at Rome. If the terminus ad quem of Peter's sojourn at Rome was determined as suggested above, we may conjecture that (the ministry at Antioch being regarded as a mere offshoot of the ministry at Jerusalem) Peter's departure for Rome was placed at the expiration of the 12 years, after which, according to the tradition which had a place in the Κήρυγμα Πέτρον (ap. Clement, Strom. vi. 5) and the Gnostic Acts of Peter (ed. Lipsius p. 49; for other references see Harnack, Die Chronol. p. 243), the Lord commanded the apostles to go forth into the world (cf. Ac 12<sup>17</sup>). If the Passion was placed in the year 30, then the sojourn of Peter at Rome would be considered to commence about the year 42, and just about a quarter of a century would elapse between that date and the martyrdom at the end of Nero's reign.*

(ii.) The Liber Pontificalis.—We turn now to the later catalogues of Roman bishops. (1) The Liberian catalogue (Duchesne p. 2) has the notice, 'Petrus ann. xxv mens. uno d. viiii.† Fuit temporibus Tiberii Cesaris et Gai et Tiberi Claudii et Neronis, a cons. Minuci [lege Vinici] et Longini usque Nerine et Vero [lege Vetere]. Passus autem cum Paulo die iii kl. iulias, cons. ss., imperante Nerone.' The date of this catalogue is 354. It gives the date of Peter's 25 years' Roman episcopate as A.D. 30-55. The notice immediately preceding puts the date of the crucifixion as A.D. 29 ('duobus Geminis cons.'). and then adds: 'et post ascensum eius beatissimus Petrus episcopatum suscepit.' The singular date of Peter's episcopate, therefore, seems based on the assumption that Christ made the apostle a bishop, and that his see must have been Rome. (2) The Liber Pontificalis in the earlier form (as restored from the Felician and Cononian abridgments) puts side by side the following statements:—(a) 'Primum sedit cathedra episcopatus in Antiochia ann. vii.' (b) 'Ingressus in urbe Roma Nerone Cesare ibique sedit cathedra episcopatus ann. xxv mens. ii dies iii.' (c) 'Fuit temporibus Tiberii Cesaris et Gaii et Tiberii Claudii et Neronis.' To these statements (Duchesne p. 50 f.) the later recension (Duchesne p. 118) adds another, 'martyrio cum Paulo coronatur, post passionem Domini anno xxxviii.' According to this statement the date of the martyrdom is 67 (cf. Jer. de Virr. Illustr.). It is unnecessary to examine the different parts of the above mosaic. But however the chronological context varies, the xxv years' episcopate is preserved.

7. The burial-places of St. Peter.—The Ambrosian hymn connects the festival of St. Peter and St. Paul with three spots in Rome—'Trinis celebratur uis Festum sacrorum martyrum' (Daniel, Thes. Hymn. i. xc.). These vis are the

* In the Eastern and Oriental lists given in Duchesne, Lib. Pontif. p. 34 ff., there are variations from 25 years—(i.) The Short Chronography of 853 gives 22 years; (ii.) Nicephorus 2 years; (iii.) Syncellus leaves a blank; (iv.) Eutychius 22 years; (v.) Elias of Nisibis 28 years.

† For a possible explanation of the variations of the number of months and days see Duchesne, Lib. Pontif. p. xx n.

Ostian, the place of St. Paul's death and burial; the Aurelian, the resting-place of St. Peter; and the Appian, where the bodies of both apostles were laid for a time. The facts are briefly these:

(1) The Vatican.—The belief that the apostle was buried on the Vatican goes back to the time of Caius (see above); so Jerome, de Virr. Illustr. 1: 'Sepultus Romæ in Vaticano iuxta uiam triumphalem' (this via runs N.E. of the Vatican); Acta Petri et Pauli, 84 (ed. Lipsius p. 216, cf. p. 172), ἔθηκαν αὐτὸ ὑπὸ τῆν περὲβυθον [cf. Pliny, Hist. Nat. xvi. 44] πλησίον τοῦ ναυμαχίου [cf. Martyr. a Lino consecr. x., ed. Lipsius p. 11; see above] εἰς τόπον καλούμενον Βατικανόν; Lib. Pontif. (ed. Duchesne pp. 52 f., 118 ff.): 'Sepultus est uia Aurelia, in templum Apollonis, iuxta locum ubi crucifixus est, iuxta palatium Neronianum in Vaticanum, in territorium Triumphale, uia Aurelia, iii Kal. iul.' In the last notice the temple of Apollo probably refers to a temple of Cybele (Duchesne p. 120; Lipsius p. 401) on this site; by the palatium Neronianum is meant either Nero's gardens or the Circus (probably to be identified with the Naumachia). It was apparently on this spot that Anencletus, according to the Liber Pontificalis (ed. Duchesne pp. 55, 125), built a memoria beati Petri, where tradition said that all the Roman bishops till the time of Zephyrinus (except Clement and Alexander) were buried. The Church of San Pietro in Montorio is the outcome of another and later tradition that the apostle suffered on the Janiculum—a tradition which possibly arose from a confusion between the via Aurelia on the Vatican and the older via Aurelia with the porta Aurelia on the Janiculum.*

(2) The Ad Catacumbas.—In the Depositio Martyrum, one of the tracts which form the collection called by the general name of the Liberian Catalogue, and which were possibly edited in 354 by Furius Filocalus, who certainly illuminated them and who executed the inscriptions of Damasus in the catacombs (Lightfoot, Clement i. p. 249), we find the notice: 'iii Kal. iul. Petri in Catacumbas et Pauli Ostense Tusco et Basso cons.' There can be no doubt that this is a blundering revision of an original notice running thus: 'iii Kal. iul. Petri et Pauli in Catacumbas Tusco et Basso cons.', the reviser, whoever he may have been, interpreting the statement as referring to the martyrdom of the apostles. This misinterpretation of the original notice is still more flagrant in the Martyr. Hieronymianum: 'iii Kl. iul. Romæ natale apostolorum Petri et Pauli: Petri in Vaticano uia Aurelia: Pauli uero in uia Ostensi: utrumque in Catacumbas: passi sub Nerone, Basso et Tusco consulibus.' In reality the year indicated is A.D. 258, and the reference is to the transference of the apostles' remains from their respective resting-places on the Ostian and Aurelian roads to the Catacumbas on the Appian road, i.e. the Church of St. Sebastian, during the Valerian persecution, a few weeks before the martyrdom of pope Xystus in August. Damasus, as we learn from the Lib. Pontif. (ed. Duchesne pp. 84 f., 212; cf. p. civ), decorated the chamber, and placed over the locus bisomus the inscription—

'Hic habitasse prius sanctos cognoscere debes, Nomina quisque Petri pariter Paulique requirias.
Discipulos oriens misit, quod sponte fatemur. . . .
Roma suos potius meruit defendere ciues.'

A misunderstanding of the common memorial day of the two apostles, which finds definite expression in the blundering notice of the Depositio, gave rise, it appears, to the legend that the two apostles suffered on the same day—a statement which first occurs in Jerome, de Virr. Illustr. 5: [Paulus]

* Lanciani (Pagan and Christian Rome p. 127 f.) supposes that the erection of this church on the Janiculum to commemorate the martyrdom is due to a misinterpretation of the tradition that St. Peter suffered inter duas metas.

'quarto decimo Neronis anno eodem die quo Petrus Romæ pro Christo capite truncatur, sepultusque est in uia Ostiensi.' The historical fact that the apostles' remains were supposed to have lain at one time near the place of their death and again in the Catacumbas, and then (see below) to have been restored to their original resting-places, gave rise to two stories. (a) The reference to the East in the verses of Damasus suggested the legend found in the Acta Petri et Pauli (ed. Lipsius p. 220) of Eastern Christians attempting to steal the bodies. These Acts assert that the bodies rested in the Catacumbas a year and seven months; a later tradition, found in the Salzburg Itinerary, makes the period 40 years (Duchesne p. cv; Benson, Cyprian p. 482 f.). (b) According to the Liber Pontificalis (ed. Duchesne pp. 65 ff., 150 ff.), Cornelius, bishop of Rome 251–253, at the request of a certain matron named Lucina, removed the bodies of the apostles by night from the Catacumbas. The body of Paul Lucina buried in her own grounds on the Ostian road. 'Beati Petri accepit corpus beatus Cornelius episcopus et posuit iuxta locum ubi crucifixus est, inter corpora sanctorum episcoporum, in templum Apollonis, in monte Aureo, in Vaticanum palatii Neroniani, iii Kal. iul.' The epithet aureus has probably arisen from the word Aurelius.

(3) The Vatican.—The Liber Pontificalis (ed. Duchesne pp. 78 f., 176; cf. the addition in one MS of the Passio Sanctorum App., ed. Lipsius p. 176) gives the legend, derived originally from the Acta Silvestri, extant only in later recensions, that Constantine was baptized by Silvester, and thereby cured of leprosy; that at the request of the bishop he built a basilica in honour of St. Peter on the site of a temple of Apollo; that he placed the apostle's body there in a tomb of bronze surmounted by a golden cross. It is likely enough that the basilica was begun at the end of Constantine's reign. But the body of the apostle cannot have been removed there before 354, since that is the date of the Liberian Depositio, where it is implied that the body still rested ad Catacumbas. The translation therefore must have taken place between 354 and the time when Damasus (366–384) placed in the Catacumbas the inscription quoted above. On the whole subject see Duchesne, Lib. Pontificalis pp. civ ff., 119 f., 125, 152, 193 ff., 214; Lipsius, Die Apokr. Apostelg. II. i. p. 391 ff. (with ref. to his earlier works); Lightfoot, Clement II. p. 499 f.; Benson, Cyprian p. 481 ff.; Erbes, 'Das Alter der Gräber u. Kirchen des Paulus u. Petrus in Rom,' in Brieger's Zeitschr. f. Kirchengesch. VII. p. 1 ff. (1885); Lanciani, Pagan and Christian Rome pp. 122 ff., 345 ff. (1892); de Waal, Die Apostelgruft ad Catacumbas (1894); Erbes, 'Die Todestage der Apostel Paulus u. Petrus,' 1899 (Texte u. Untersuch. NF IV. 1).

There are five memorial days which claim notice. (i.) June 29. The origin of the observance of this day as a festival of St. Peter and St. Paul has been pointed out above, and it has been shown that probably as early as Jerome, certainly before the Mart. Hieronymianum, compiled early in the 7th cent., the day was regarded as the anniversary of the death of the apostles. In the Gelasian Sacramentary there are three sets of 'Orationes et Preces' for the festival: 'In natali S. Petri proprie,' 'In natali apostolorum Petri et Pauli,' 'In natali S. Pauli proprie.' When in the Gregorian Sacramentary a further step was taken, and the 'natalis S. Pauli' was transferred to the next day, June 29 became the memorial day of St. Peter alone. This common festival of the two apostles passed into the Greek Church, though it is uncertain at what date, and has a place also in the Coptic, Ethiopic, Syrian, and Armenian calendars. A Syriac Martyrology of the year 412, published by Wright in the Journal of Sacred Literature for Oct. 1865, Jan. 1866, places this festival on Dec. 28. (ii.) Feb. 22. In the Liberian Depositio Martyrum there is the entry: 'viii Kal. Mart. natale Petri de cathedra.' In the Martyr. Hieronymianum the corresponding notice is 'viii Kl. Mart. cathedra Petri in Antiochia.' (iii.) Jan. 18. In the same Martyrologium we have 'xv Kal. Feb. dedicatio cathedrae S. Petri apostoli qui [qua] primo Romae sedit.' (iv.) Aug. 1. The Roman Martyrologium has 'Kal. Aug. Romae ad uincula catenas S. Petri osculandas,' or, according to some MSS, 'Kal. Aug. Romae dedicatio primae ecclesiae a b. Petro constructae [et consecratae].' Since the church S. Petri ad uincula was probably built under Sixtus III. (432-440), the origin of the festival may be as early as the time of this pope. The original reference of the festival was to the miracle recorded in Ac 12<sup>7</sup>. The corresponding festival in the Greek Church was on Jan. 16, in the Armenian Church on Jan. 22. For further information see Sinkler's article in Dict. Chr. Antiq. ii. p. 1623 ff.; Lipsius, Dis. Apokr. Apostelg. II. i. p. 404 ff.

8. The Acts of Peter.—These Acts are collected and edited by Lipsius (1891) in the first vol. of the Acta Apost. Apocrypha, edited by himself and Bonnet.

(1) The Gnostic Acts.—(i.) The documents. These are: (a) Martyrium b. Petri Ap. a Lino ep. conscriptum. This martyrium is contained in several MSS. The name of Linus is found only in the title. (b) Actus Petri cum Simone. The sole authority for this text is the Codex Vercellensis, a 7th cent. MS. (c) μαρτύριον τοῦ ἁγίου ἀποστόλου Πέτρου. This document corresponds with the closing portion of the Actus (xxx-end). The authorities for this text are a 9th cent. MS at Patmos, and a MS of later date at Mt. Athos. There exist also a Slavonic and an Æthiopic version (the latter is translated in Malan's Conflicts of the Holy Apostles), and some fragments of a Sahidic version. It appears certain that the two first-named Latin texts are independent, and rest ultimately on a common Greek text. The complicated problem of the relation of these texts is discussed by Lipsius, Apokr. Apostelg. II. i. p. 109 ff.; Zahn, Ges. Kan. ii. p. 834 ff.

(ii.) Substance. The following is a brief summary of the story. (a) Paul in obedience to a vision departs from Rome on his journey to Spain. (b) Simon Magus arrives in Rome and gains adherents. The brethren are distressed that Paul has left them, and that they have no leader to help them against Simon. Just at this time, however, the twelve years after the Ascension being past, Christ appears to Peter in a vision and bids him go to Rome. (c) Peter arrives in Rome. After preaching to the brethren, at their request he goes from the synagogue to the house of Marcellus (formerly a disciple of St. Paul), where Simon is. At this point there ensues the episode of the speaking dog which takes Peter's message to Simon. Marcellus, who had been so much under Simon's influence that he had erected in his honour a statue with the inscription Simoni iuueni deo, repents. In course of time it is arranged that there should be a public encounter between Peter and Simon in the Forum. Peter's power of truly raising the dead proves him to be superior to Simon. [At this stage in the story the Athos MS begins]. Simon undertakes to fly to heaven. This he attempts to do before a great crowd in the Via Sacra.* Under the influence, however, of Peter's prayers he falls and breaks his thigh. He is stoned by the crowd, leaves Rome, and shortly afterwards dies at Terracina. (d) [At this point the Linus-Martyrium and the Patmos MS begin]. The prefect Agrippa [note that the minister of Augustus is transferred to Nero's reign] has four concubines, who are persuaded by Peter to refuse Agrippa any further intercourse. Xanthippe similarly withdraws from her husband Albinus, a friend of the emperor's [in the Acta Xanthippæ (James, Apocr. Anecdota p. 58 ff.) the husband's name is Probus]. Albinus, therefore, and Agrippa make common cause against Peter. (e) At the request of Xanthippe and the brethren, Peter consents to leave Rome. As he is passing through the gate of the city he sees Christ entering. The well-known conversation between the Lord and the apostle takes place (see below), and he returns to the city knowing that the Lord would suffer in him. St. Peter is brought before Agrippa, who condemns him to be crucified. When he is brought near the cross he addresses it in mystic language—ὁ βρομα σταυροῦ, μυστήριον ἀπόκρυφον κ.τ.λ. He asks that he may be fixed to it head downwards, and in mystical language he explains the significance of that position.* At the burial, Marcellus acts the part of Joseph of Arimathæa. Peter, however, appears to him in a vision and reminds him of the Lord's saying, 'Let the dead be buried by their own dead.' So Marcellus awaits Paul's return to Rome. The romance ends with a notice of Nero first determining to persecute the converts of Peter and afterwards being restrained by a vision (one text says 'of Peter,' another 'of an angel,' another of 'a certain one') of one who chastised him, and warned him to 'refrain his hands from the servants of Christ.'

(iii.) History and date. At the end of the 4th cent. and onwards apocryphal Acts of Peter are spoken of as being in authoritative use among heretics, especially the Manichæans; cf. Augustine, c. Faust. xxx. 4, adv. Adimant. Manich. 17; and (somewhat earlier) Philaster, Hær. 88. At the same time these Acts were not infrequently alluded to without note of suspicion, and occasionally even definitely cited, by catholic writers. Thus Isidore of Pelusium (Ep. ii. 99; Migne, Pat. Gr. lxxviii. 544) adduces a saying taken from the discourse of Peter in the house of Marcellus (Actus Petri cum Simone xx., ed. Lipsius p. 67)—καθὼς Πέτρος ὁ κορυφαῖος τοῦ χόρου ἐν ταῖς ἑαυτοῦ πράξεσι σαφῶς ἀπεφίηται "Ἀ ἐχωρήσαμεν ἐγράψαμεν. The earliest writer who refers to these Acts by name is Eusebius, HE III. iii. 2. Classing them with the Gospel, the Preaching, and the Apocalypse of Peter, he says 'we do not own these writings as handed down among the catholic (books), because no Church writer, either among the ancients or among our own contemporaries, has ever used the testimonies to be derived from them' (cf. Jerome, de Virr. Illustr. i.). The earliest writer who certainly refers to these Acts—he does not quote them by name—is the African poet Commodian, about A.D. 250, who, in Carmen Apologeticum 615 ff., writes: 'Et canem [fecit] ut Simoni diceret: clamaris a Petro . . . Infantem fecit quinto mense proloqui uoigo.' Commodian, then, supplies a terminus ad quem for the composition of these Petrine Acts. Harnack, indeed (Chronologie p. 552 ff.), argues that they were actually written about the middle of the 3rd century. He lays special stress on the fact that Hippolytus (Refut. Hær. vi. 20) gives an account of Peter's triumph over Simon, and of the latter's death, quite different from that contained in the Acts, and he concludes that Hippolytus did not know our Acts, and that therefore they could not have been then written. To this line of argument it may be replied: (a) that Hippolytus' ignorance of them would not prove their non-existence; (b) that ignorance of them on his part cannot be deduced from the fact that he follows quite another story; for Hippolytus, a malleus haereticorum, would naturally avoid a story which he found in a heretical book. Harnack further insists that allusions in these Acts to, e.g., the emperor and to details of Church life point to the 3rd cent., while, in opposition to Lipsius and Zahn, he altogether denies that the Acts bear a Gnostic character. It is quite possible that some of the allusions to which Harnack appeals as proving the later date of the Acts as a whole point to interpolations on the part of an editor or a translator. But there are strong reasons for assigning the Grundschrift to the 2nd cent. Lipsius (p. 266) and Zahn (Ges. Kan. ii. p. 861) have both noted the resemblance in ideas and modes of expression between the Acts of Peter and the Leucian Acts of John. The fragment of the last-named Acts printed for the first time in James' Apocr. Anecdota ii. brings to light still further points of likeness. James (p. xxiv ff.) has collected a number of parallels between the fragment of the Johannine Acts and the Actus Petri cum Simone, and is justified in concluding 'that they show as clearly as any evidence of this kind could, that whoever wrote the Acts of John wrote the Acts of Peter' (p. xxiv). 'Acts of Peter' were among 'the Acts' which, according to Photius (Biblioth. Cod. cxiv.), were contained in αὐτὸς τῶν ἀποστόλων περὶ τοῦ Λευκίου—the work of Leucius Charinus. This Leucius (see Lipsius, Apokr. Apostelg. i. p. 83 ff.), a somewhat shadowy personage, seems to have belonged to Asia Minor, and to have written during the 2nd cent., about 160 as Zahn thinks (ib. p. 864). Thus the original Gnostic Acts were a 2nd cent. romance, and had their origin in Asia Minor.

(2) From the Gnostic we turn to the catholic Acts. These are often distinguished by the name Marcellus, who in some Latin MSS appears (in a superscription) as the author. (i.) Documents. These Acts are found in two chief forms, which Tischendorf (Acta Apost. Apocr. pp. 1-39) has somewhat disastrously endeavoured to weave into a single whole. The one, which may be designated as A, is found in Latin MSS, and in one Venice Greek MS (which Lipsius represents by the symbol E); the other, which may be designated as B, is found in the majority of Greek MSS. The most important difference between the two forms is that B begins with a long account (§§ 1-21) of the fear caused by Paul's appeal to Caesar among the Jews at Rome (who had already had trouble enough through Peter's presence there), and of the closing stages of Paul's journey to the city. This section seems to be quite late, and is attributed by Lipsius (Prolegom. p. lxi) 'insipido cuidam saeculi ix monacho qui Siciliae uel Magnae Graeciae nescio quod monasterium incolebat.' Of the common Greek text there exists a Slavonic version.

(ii.) Substance. The outline of the story is as follows: (a) Paul arrives in Rome (Cod. E alone adds ἀπὸ τῶν Στρατιῶν). The two apostles meet with great joy. Paul stills a dispute between Gentile and Jewish Christians. The preaching of the apostles converts multitudes, and in particular 'Livia the wife of Nero and Agrippina the wife of Agrippa' [note the confusion] leave their husbands, while not a few soldiers withdraw from military service. (b) Simon Magus now begins to traduce Peter, and performs magical tricks. He is summoned before Nero, and claims to be the Son of God. The two great apostles and Simon hold a disputation and a trial of strength in miracles before Nero. At length Simon requests that a wooden tower may be erected, from which he undertakes to throw himself, that his angels may bear him to heaven. When the day arrives, Simon begins to fly, to the great distress of Paul. Peter, however, adjures the angels of Satan to help him no longer. Simon falls in the Via Sacra and dies. (c) Nero thereupon commands that the apostles should be thrown into prison. At Agrippa's suggestion Paul is beheaded in the Via Ostiensis. Peter, when he is brought to the cross, asks that, being unworthy to hang as his Lord hung, he may be crucified head downwards. He then relates to the people the Quo vadis story, and, after having prayed to the Good Shepherd, he gives up the spirit. (d) Three legends follow: (α) The legend of Perpetua, the three executioners, and Potentiana—in part closely akin to the Veronica legend—is rather Pauline than Petrine (comp. the Plautilla story in the Passio S. Pauli, ed. Lipsius p. 38 ff.). (β) Certain holy men appear, saying that they have come from Jerusalem; they, with Marcellus, bury the apostle's body 'under the terebinth near the Naumachia, at the place called the Vatican.' (γ) Certain men from the East carried off the bodies of the two apostles. They were overtaken at a place called Catacumbas at the third milestone along the Appian Way. There the saints' bodies were kept for a year and a half. Then the body of Peter was transferred to a tomb on the Vatican near the Naumachia, that of Paul to the Ostian Way. At their tombs great benefits were granted to the faithful through their prayers. The day of their martyrdom was June 29.

(iii.) History and date. The story of the men from the East who endeavoured to carry off the apostles' bodies arose, as is now generally agreed (see, e.g. Lipsius, Apokr. Apostelg. p. 312; Lightfoot, Clement ii. p. 500), from a misunderstanding of the inscription of pope Damasus (366-384); see above, p. 772. Thus we must allow time for the circumstances which Damasus commemorates to have been forgotten, and for the meaning of his lines to have become obscure. The Acts, therefore, in their present form can hardly be much earlier than the middle of the 5th cent. On the other hand, many indications (e.g. the relics of early confessions of faith embedded in the Acts, chs. 58. 69) point to the conclusion that the Grundschrift, on which interpolations from other sources have been grafted, was a document similar to the Prædicatio Petri, and, with it, is to be assigned to the middle of the 2nd cent. (Lipsius p. 333 ff.). The further problem as to the relation of the Grundschrift of the catholic Acts to the Grundschrift of the Gnostic Acts appears to elude criticism.

A Latin Passio Apostolorum Petri et Pauli (Lipsius, Acta pp. 223-234) need not be discussed at any length. It gives an account of the conflict between the apostles and Simon Magus, dealing rather with miracles than with theology. Clement (not Agrippa) appears as the praefectus urbis. The date, according to Lipsius, is the end of the 6th or the beginning of the 7th century.

The Quo vadis legend. The story is found in the Gnostic Acts—in the Linus-text (vi) and in the μαρτύριον (vi); there is a lacuna here in the Cod. Vercellensis. It runs thus in the Linus-text, the important words in the Greek text being added: 'Ut autem portam ciuitatis uoluit egredi, uidit sibi Christum occurrere. Et adorans eum ait: Domine quo uadis? (Κύριε, ποῦ ἕδεις). Respondit ei Christus: Romam uenio iterum crucifigi (εἰσέρχομαι εἰς τὴν Ῥώμην σταυρωθῆναι). Et ait ad eum Petrus: Domine, iterum crucifigeris? (Κύριε, πάλιν σταυρῶσαι). Et dixit ad eum dominus: Etiam iterum crucifigar. Petrus autem dixit: Domine, reuertar et sequar te. Et his dictis dominus ascendit in caelum.' In the catholic Acts Peter relates the story after he has been nailed to the cross. The Latin (61) is: 'Dixi: Domine, quo uadis? Et dixit mihi: Sequere me, quia uado Romam iterum crucifigi. Et dum sequer eum, redii Romam. Et dixit mihi: Noli timere, quia ego tecum sum, quousque introducam te in domum patris mei.' In pseudo-Ambrose (Serm. contr. Auuz. ii. 867, ed. Bened.) the words are: 'Domine, quo uadis?' 'Venio iterum crucifigi.' It seems probable that the story had its origin in a reminiscence of the conversation recorded in Jn 13<sup>36-38</sup> (Κίριε, πού ὑπάγεις; Latt. Domine, quo uadis?) and an agraphon preserved by Origen (in Joan xx. 12, ed. Brooke ii. p. 51)—'If any one will accept the saying recorded in the Acts of Paul as spoken by the Saviour, ἀποθνήσκω μίλλον στανυροσθαι.' The Acts of Paul is apparently an early 2nd cent. document of orthodox origin, and belongs to a different group of writings from the Gnostic Acts of Peter (Zahn, Ges. Kan. ii. ii. p. 865 ff.). It is plain from the context in Origen that in the Acts of Paul the saying had no application to St. Peter. Origen quotes in the context He 6<sup>5f</sup>, Gal 2<sup>19</sup>. Possibly the Acts of Peter and the Acts of Paul alike derived the saying from 'an earlier document, probably the Preaching of Peter' (Zahn, Eintl. ii. p. 25). It seems probable, then, that the conversation of our Lord and St. Peter in Jn 13 suggested a scene in which this saying was dramatized. Further, Zahn (ib.) is inclined to think that the ambiguous word ἀνοθεν (= denuo, desuper) suggested the story that Peter was crucified head downwards. The explanation does not seem a natural one. It is far more likely that the mode of death was one of the 'addita ludibria' of which Tacitus speaks.

9. The Clementine Literature.—(i.) Documents. These are three in number. (a) The Homilies in Greek. Two MSS only are known to exist—the one at Paris, the other at the Vatican. (b) The Recognitions. The Greek original has perished. The Latin rendering by Rufinus, preserved in a large number of MSS, a Syriac translation of part of the work, and an Arabic abridgment printed in Studia Sinaitica v., form the extant authorities for the text. Rufinus, in the preface to his translation, notes incidentally that the Greek original was extant in two forms. He further tells us that, while he had deliberately omitted some passages as obscure, he had aimed at a close, if bald, rendering. It may be added that a comparison between his version and the Syriac version generally confirms his statement. (c) Of far less importance than the two documents just mentioned is the Epitome—a late abridgment of the Homilies. The three Clementine works may be conveniently studied in Migne's Patrologia Graeca, vols. i., ii.

(ii.) Substance. The romance of Clement's life—his early separation from his family and his ultimate discovery of them—need not detain us. Peter is the great opponent of Simon Magus, and long discourses addressed to his own disciples or to inquirers, or directed against Simon, are put into his mouth. The story in regard to Peter is, in outline, as follows. In the seventh year after the Passion, Clement finds Peter at Caesarea, where the latter, having been sent thither by James, is about to hold a disputation with Simon Magus. After three days' discussion Simon is driven away by the populace. Peter follows Simon to Tripolis, according to the Recognitions; according to the Homilies, to Tyre, and thence to Sidon, Berytus, Byblus, and so to Tripolis. At Antioch Simon meets with great success, but is at length driven thence by a report that Cornelius the centurion had arrived armed with an imperial commission to destroy all sorcerers. Simon flies to the neighbouring town of Laodicea, where in the Homilies the scene of the great disputation between Peter and Simon is laid. In the Homilies the story ends with Peter's departure for Antioch; in the Recognitions, with his enthusiastic reception by the people there after the expulsion of Simon.

(iii.) Date and character. The documents which we possess exhibit different forms of a religious romance, written in the interests of a philosophical Ebionitism. The anti-Pauline element is strong in the Homilies. Under the character of Simon Magus, St. Paul is attacked (e.g. xvii. 19). The same tone of hostility to the work and teaching of St. Paul dominates the letter of Peter to James, § 2, which is prefixed to the Homilies. In the Recognitions this controversial element is omitted or softened down, the invective dealing only with St. Paul's action before his conversion (i. 70 f.). The doctrine of the Homilies is akin to that of the Elchasaite sect, which, according to

Hippolytus (Ref. Hær. ix. 13), established itself at Rome during the episcopate of Callistus. The Recognitions is quoted by Origen (Comm. in Genesim ap. Philoc. xxiii. 21, and Comm. in Matth. xxvi. 6 f., ed. Lommatzsch iv. p. 401). The evidence, though slight, points to the first quarter of the 3rd cent. as the period to which the Clementine literature as we possess it should probably be assigned. From what place did it emanate? The claim of Rome is negated by the almost entire absence of any reference to a visit of Simon to the city, and his conflict with the apostle there. The allusions to Rome as the final scene of the controversy (Recog. i. 13, 74, iii. 64; Hom. i. 16) are so incidental in character that they may well be the interpolation of a later editor, the writer, for example, who composed the Epistle of Clement to James, prefixed to the Homilies, in which an account of Clement's ordination at Rome as bishop by Peter is given. The scene of the story is confined within the boundaries of Syria, and it is therefore antecedently probable that Syria was the region in which the Clementine literature had its first home. This conclusion is confirmed by the character of the NT quotations, which appear to be derived from a Semitic document, whether an Aramaic Gospel or a Syriac version of the Gospels. One point, however, seems clear, viz. that the Recognitions and the Homilies are independent recastings of a common original, or of (closely related) common original documents. The relation of this document or these documents to the Periodi Clementis, to which Jerome (adv. Jovin. i. 26; in Gal. i. 18) refers for details about Peter which are not found in our Clementines, and to the κήρυγμα Πέτρου (see below), must remain with our present evidence an unsolved problem. The question of primary interest is: What did the original story or document on which the Clementines are based include? Was its subject the conflict between Peter and Simon in Syria only? Or did it relate an earlier conflict in Syria and a final conflict at Rome? In other words, do the Clementines and the Petrine Acts respectively depend on independent documents, the one narrating the conflict between Peter and Simon in the East, the other dealing with their final meeting in the West? or do they severally elaborate two parts of one common history? The former is the opinion of Salmon (Dict. Chr. Biog. iv. p. 685), the latter that to which Lipsius inclines (Apokr. Apostelg. II. i. p. 38 f.). It may be noticed that, while there are in the Clementines (see above) a few references to the Roman episode, on the other hand allusions are to be found in the Petrine Acts (Actus Petr. cum Simone v., Martyr. Petri et Pauli 17) to the Syrian conflict; but all these allusions are too slight to bear the weight of any conclusions. The Apostolic Constitutions (vi. 8, 9) contains the whole story of Peter and Simon,—the story of a conflict in Syria with points of contact with the Clementine history, and the story of a conflict in Rome with points of contact with that of the Acts. It seems less unlikely that here we come upon a relic of a complete story than that we have here a piecing together of two stories, which were originally independent. Of the precise doctrinal position of the original document it is vain to speculate. If the original story did follow St. Peter to Rome, there is a doctrinal reason why the Ebionite Clementine writers should refuse to acquiesce in the tradition that St. Paul and St. Peter worked at Rome together. That the original romance was early, there can be no doubt. Bishop Lightfoot held (Clement i. 361) that it 'cannot well be placed later than the middle of the 2nd century.'

10. Non-Canonical writings ascribed to St. Peter.—Eusebius (HE III. iii.), after mentioning the two Epistles which have a place in the Canon (see separate articles), proceeds to speak of other writings connected with Peter's name—the Acts of Peter (see above), the Gospel according to Peter, the Preaching of Peter, and the Apocalypse. These, he adds, 'we do not acknowledge as handed down to us among the Catholic writings, for no Church writer, either in ancient times or in our own, ever made use of the testimonies they supply' (cf. III. xxv.). To this list Jerome (de Virr. Illustr. 1) adds the Judicium.

(1) The Gospel of Peter.—A portion of what is universally agreed to have been the Petrine Gospel mentioned by Eusebius was found among the Akhmim fragments, and published by M. Bouriant in Nov. 1892. The fragment begins with a reference to our Lord's trial before Pilate and Herod, and then gives an account of the mockery, the crucifixion, the burial, and the resurrection. The author writes in the first person (cc. vii. xii.), and identifies himself with Peter: 'But I Simon Peter and Andrew my brother' (c. xiv.). The Gospel is the subject of a letter written by Serapion, who was bishop of Antioch during the last decade of the 2nd cent., and preserved by Eusebius (HE vi. 12). Serapion had found the Gospel at Rhosus on the Bay of Issus, and had at first approved it. Further knowledge, however, led him to condemn it on the double ground that it owed its origin to the Docetae, and that it contained additions to 'the true teaching about the Saviour.' The fact that Serapion, a man of literary and controversial activity, did not know of the Gospel before his accidental discovery of it, that no other 2nd cent. writer is proved to have used it, and that few later writers were acquainted with it, and these only men in some way connected with Syria, shows that its circulation and influence were confined within narrow limits. As to its date, Harnack holds that in the fragment the four Gospels are not placed on the same level, Mt probably not being used at all, and that the Petrine Gospel was used by Justin. These considerations seem to him to point to the beginning of the 2nd cent. (cf. Sanday, Inspiration (1893) p. 310, 'hardly later than the end of the first quarter of the 2nd cent.'). On the other hand, it is by no means certain that Justin used the Gospel; their undoubted connexion can be explained in other ways. And, further, the text of the Gospels had already had a history before it was used by the author of the Petrine Gospel; indeed there is strong reason to think that he used a harmony of the Gospels, that of Tatian or some earlier harmony, at least for the portion of the history covered by the extant fragment.* The implied text, then, of the Gospels suggests that the date can hardly be much before 150 (so Swete: Zahn 130), while a limit in the other direction is supplied by the fact that the Gospel had been in existence some time before Serapion discovered it. See the editions of Bouriant, Lods, Robinson (1892), Harnack, Zahn, Swete (1893); also von Schubert, Die Composition des pseudopetrinischen Evangelienfragments, 1893; Salmon, Introduction, Appendix (1894) p. 581 ff.

(2) The Preaching of Peter (κήρυγμα Πέτρου).—It is probable that this document is quoted by Origen (de Princ. Præf. 8) under the title 'Petri doctrina'†; it is possible that it is to be identified with the 'Prædicatio Petri et Pauli,' quoted by Lact. Instit. Div. iv. 21, comp. pseudo-Cyprian

* The present writer has elsewhere (The Old Syriac Element in the Text of Cod. Bezae p. 121 ff.) given reasons for thinking that 'behind those parts of the fragment which are based on the Canonical Gospels there lie the corresponding sentences of the Syriac Diatessaron.'

† This is to be distinguished from the διδασκαλία Πέτρου referred to by later Greek Fathers. Von Dobschütz (p. 107) identifies this Peter with Peter of Alexandria.

de Rebapt. 17. The extant fragments of the Preaching are collected in Hilgenfeld's NT extra Canonem (1884) iv. p. 51 ff., and in von Dobschütz, 'Das Kerygma Petri kritisch untersucht' (1893; Texte u. Unters. xi. 1).* It is clear from what has come down to us that the book gave—not a single discourse, but—the substance of discourses by one speaking in the name of the apostles (the first person plural is always used †). It deals with the τριτόν γένος among Jews and Gentiles, insisting on a pure monotheism as opposed to the errors of Judaism and of heathenism alike, and incorporating directions of our Lord in reference to the evangelization of the Gentiles. Clement of Alexandria (ap. Eus. Tom. xiii. 17) regards the spokesman of the apostles throughout as Peter; and further, having the whole book before him, he implies that it claimed to be written by Peter—ὁ Πέτρος γράφει (Strom. vi. 7, p. 769 ed. Potter; comp. Origen's question in the passage just referred to—πότερον ποτε γρησίον ἔστιν ἢ νόθον ἢ μικτόν). The Preaching exercised a wide influence. It was apparently used among others by Apollonius of Asia Minor (ap. Eus. HE v. xviii. 14) at the end of the 2nd cent., Heracleon, the author of the Epistle to Diognetus, Justin, Aristides (Robinson in Texts and Studies i. 1, p. 86 ff.). Its date must therefore be very early. Harnack, holding that Egypt was the birthplace of the book, gives its date as 110–130 (140); Zahn as 90–100. Von Dobschütz suggests that in the first decade of the 2nd cent. a Christian at Alexandria felt that St. Mark's Gospel (ending at 16<sup>a</sup>) needed a supplement, and wrote the Preaching as a δεύτερος λόγος, and further that from it the 'shorter ending' of Cod. L (Swete, St. Mark p. xvii ff.) is derived. For further information see von Dobschütz, 'Das Kerygma Petri' (Texte u. Untersuch. xi. 1, 1893); Harnack, Die Chronologie, 1897, pp. 472–474; Zahn, Geschichte des NT Kanons, 1892, II. ii. pp. 820–832; Salmon, art. 'Preaching of Peter,' in Dict. Chr. Biog. (vol. iv. 1887); Hilgenfeld, NT extra Can. Rec., ed. altera, 1884, iv. pp. 50–65.

(3) The Apocalypse of Peter.—A considerable fragment of the Apocalypse of Peter was discovered and published with the fragment of the Gospel. Before 1892 only some half dozen small fragments were known to exist (see, e.g., Zahn, Ges. Kan. II. ii. p. 818). The Akhmim fragment begins in the middle of a sentence containing apocalyptic words put into our Lord's mouth. The apostles—'we, the twelve disciples'—then go into the 'mountain' with the Lord to pray, and ask to see one of the righteous who had 'departed from the world,' 'in order that . . . being encouraged we may encourage also the men who hear us.' In answer to Peter's questions the Lord reveals the place of happiness and the place of torment, in which punishments are meted out to various classes of sinners. It appears from the reference to the apostles' hearers that they had received a command to teach; but a time during the Lord's ministry is perhaps less in harmony with the supposed situation than a time after the resurrection. The Apocalypse of Peter is mentioned in the Muratorian fragment (unless the passage is corrupt; see p. 780). Clement of Alexandria quotes it three or four times, once as Scripture (Ecl. ex Scrip. Proph. xli.); and, according to Eusebius, he commented on it. Thus there is good ground for regarding the Apocalypse as a 2nd cent. document, especially if it is allowed that it was used in the

* The 'Preaching of Peter' in an Arabic MS, published by Mrs. Gibson in Studia Sinaitica No. v., has no connexion with the Preaching under discussion.

† The first person singular is used in one fragment (Hilgenfeld p. 57, l. 23); but this fragment is derived ex tunc didascalibus Πέτρου (von Dobschütz p. 118; cf. Holl, Fragmente vortican. Kirchenväter (1890) p. 234).

Acts of Thomas (ed. Bonnet, p. 39) and in the Passion of St. Perpetua (James, p. 60 f.). Zahn, writing before the publication of the Akhmim fragment, lays stress on the fact that Origen shows no sign of having known the Apocalypse, that Clement may have derived his knowledge of it from his Hebrew teacher, that several notices of it seem to connect it with Palestine, and he therefore thinks that Palestine was its birthplace. On the other hand, the coincidences with the Pistis Sophia, both in vocabulary and matter, seem to make an Egyptian origin more probable. The text has been edited by Bouriant, James, Lods (1892), Harnack (1893); see Zahn, Ges. Kan. II. ii. p. 810 ff.; Salmon, Introduction to NT, Appendix (1894) p. 589 f.

(4) Jerome in de Virr. Illustr. i. 5 mentions the Judicium among the apocryphal books which bear St. Peter's name. Rufinus, in Symb. Apost. 38, gives the Libri Ecclesiastici which belong to the NT as 'libellus qui dicitur Pastoris sive Hermes, qui appellatur Duce Vix uel Judicium Petri.' It seems probable that Jerome and Rufinus have the same document in mind. Further, the whole list of books in Rufinus appears to be based upon the list given in the Festal Epistle of Athanasius, who couples together 'the so-called Teaching of the Apostles and the Shepherd.' It is probable that the Judicium Petri was a Latin document, in which Peter alone was represented as the speaker, corresponding to the Greek document αι διαγραφαί αι δια Κλημεντος και κανόνες εκκλησιαστικολ των αγλων αποστόλων. See Hilgenfeld, NT extra Can. Rec. iv. p. 111 ff.; Salmon, Introduction p. 554; Harnack, Die Lehre der zwölf Apostel p. 193 ff.

(5) An 'Epistle of Peter to James' is prefixed to the Clementine Homilies, and is thoroughly Ebionite in its teaching.

IV. RECONSTRUCTION OF THE LATER HISTORY OF ST. PETER.—Except the testimony of 1 Peter, we have in the NT no clear evidence as to the apostle's movements after St. Paul's notice in Gal 2. What evidence the NT supplies as to later times is negative. But the tradition of the Church and the statements of early writers, together with the evidence of 1 Peter, give a basis for conclusions which reach a very high degree of probability. An endeavour will now be made to interpret the evidence as to the three following points—(1) St. Peter's visit to Rome; (2) the Simonian legend; (3) the period which succeeded the 'Council' at Jerusalem.

1. St. Peter's visit to Rome.—Of those who deny that St. Peter visited Rome, Lipsius may be taken as the type. His interpretation of the evidence is given in his great work, Die Apokr. Apostelgeschichten II. ii. pp. 1-69 (1887), where he embodies the results of his previous investigations—Quellen der römischen Petrusage, arts. in Schenkel's Bibellezikon, arts. in Jarhrb. f. protest. Theologie (1876). His theory is briefly as follows. The tradition of St. Peter's presence at Rome takes two forms. The one brings St. Peter and St. Paul together at Rome; together they found the Church there, and together they suffer. The other represents St. Peter as the opponent of the false apostle, Simon Magus, who is St. Paul under a thin disguise; as pursuing him from land to land and finally in Rome triumphing over him, and then dying a martyr's death. The first form of the legend may be called the Petro-Pauline legend, the second the Simonian. Since the two agree in bringing the apostle to Rome, they cannot be independent; and the question at once arises—Which is the original form? The Petro-Pauline legend corresponds to the Gentile view of the relation of the two apostles: they are friends and fellow-workers. The Simonian legend answers to the Jewish conception, according to which St. Paul is 'the enemy.' Now the latter view is historically prior to the former. It follows, therefore, that the Simonian legend is the earlier, and that it is the parent of the Petro-Pauline tradition. The one historical basis of the whole structure of romance is the visit of St. Paul to Rome. On this is built up the fabric of St. Peter's visit to Rome; and, since the first builders were Ebionites, St. Paul becomes Simon Magus. This anti-Pauline legend is alone responsible for the tradition that Simon Magus taught in Rome, and further fixed the date of his arrival there under Claudius. For St. Peter went there after the twelve years' of preaching at Jerusalem were over, and with his arrival that of his opponent was made to coincide. Such is the theory. It is open to attack from many quarters. It is blind to the many-sidedness and unanimity of early testimony, and in particular it is driven to explain away the evidence of Clement, while it rejects the authenticity of 1 Peter. On the other hand, it accounts for this general concurrence of witnesses by the hypothesis of a romance whose genesis was a complex and highly artificial process. But, in fact, Lipsius' theory is really an offshoot of the Tübingen theory of the apostolic age. The main trunk is now seen to be lifeless. The branch cannot but share its decay.

The strength of the case for St. Peter's visit to, and martyrdom at, Rome lies not only in the absence of any rival tradition, but also in the fact that many streams of evidence converge to this result. We have the evidence of official lists and documents of the Roman Church, which prove the strength of the tradition in later times, and which, at least in some cases, must rest on earlier documents. The notice of the transference of the apostle's body to a new resting-place in 258, and the words of Caius, show that the tradition was definite and unquestioned at Rome in the first half of the 3rd cent. The fact that Caius in the passage referred to is arguing with an Asiatic opponent, the evidence of the (Gnostic) Acts of Peter, the passages quoted from Origen, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian, show that at the same period the tradition was accepted in the Churches of Asia, of Alexandria, and of Carthage. The passage of Irenaeus carries the evidence backward well within the 2nd cent., and is of special importance as coming from one who had visited Rome, whose list of Roman bishops suggests that he had had access to official documents, and who, through Polycarp, was in contact with the personal knowledge of St. John and his companions. The testimony of Clement of Rome seems clear when his words are examined, while at the same time it is not definite and circumstantial enough to have created a legendary history. This concurrence of apparently independent testimony becomes much more impressive when it is remembered that the NT supplies nothing which could give rise to a legend that St. Peter visited Rome. On the contrary, the narrative of the Acts and the notices in St. Paul's later Epistles seem to make such a visit improbable. Moreover, the one clear statement as to place in 1 P literally interpreted becomes a conclusive argument that the apostle's work in his later years lay in a region far from Rome. It is only when the words of 1 P 5<sup>13</sup> receive the less obvious, but in reality more natural, interpretation that they are seen to be a strong confirmation of the evidence of early writers. Thus the main pieces of evidence are independent and consistent. When combined they form a solid body of proof which is practically irresistible.

But if St. Peter was martyred at Rome (apart from the indications of date in 1 P, on which see following art.), there is no reason to question the belief that he suffered during the Neronian persecution. This is distinctly asserted by Tertullian; it is presupposed in all forms of the Petrine Acts; it is implied in Caius' notice of the tomb on the Vatican; it is the almost necessary inference from Clement's words.

Again, what was the length of his sojourn at Rome? The tradition of a 25 years' episcopate is unhistorical. But that legend crystallized, while it exaggerated, the widespread belief that the apostle spent time enough at Rome to leave his mark upon the Church there. Such a tradition finds early expression in the language of Irenæus, of Dionysius of Corinth, probably also in the words of Ignatius. It is implied in the early accounts of the composition of St. Mark's Gospel.

To what reconstruction of the history does the evidence point? It seems impossible to suppose that St. Peter had already worked in Rome when St. Paul wrote the Ep. to the Romans (1<sup>11ff.</sup> 15<sup>22ff.</sup>), or when at a later time he expressed his desire 'to see Rome' (Ac 19<sup>21</sup>). Moreover, the account of St. Paul's arrival in Rome (Ac 28<sup>14ff.</sup>) seems to exclude the possibility of St. Peter's having been in the city at that time. Thus it seems certain St. Peter had not visited Rome when St. Paul's captivity there began. The evidence of the Epistles of both the Pauline captivities is also negative. If St. Peter had been in the city when St. Paul wrote to the Philippians, and again to the Colossians and Philemon, his description in the one case of the fortunes of the gospel at Rome, and in the other of his own environment, could hardly have been uninfluenced by the fact. We turn to the one Epistle of the second captivity. If we accept the constant tradition of the Church that St. Paul suffered in the Neronian persecution (i.e. shortly after July 64), 2 Ti can hardly be placed in the year 64; for the apostle seems to look forward to a winter not far distant (ταχέως, πρὸ χειμῶνος, 4<sup>21</sup>). It appears, therefore, that 2 Ti was written some two or three months before the winter of 63 closed the seas. The language of this Epistle (4<sup>10ff.</sup>) shows that St. Peter was not in Rome when it was written. The supposition that he arrived in Rome for the first time after 2 Ti was written hardly allows the time which the early patristic notices of his work there (see above) postulate. We are led, therefore, to the conclusion that St. Peter's arrival at Rome must in all probability be placed after the last of the Epistles of St. Paul's first captivity, and long enough before 2 Ti to allow St. Peter to have left the city when that Epistle was written, after having worked there some considerable time. Early tradition, however, gives us one further clue to the time. The two apostles worked together. Now it is almost impossible to suppose that, after St. Paul had once taken the apostolic oversight of the Church's work in Rome, St. Peter could, apart from St. Paul, have planned a visit there. But did the suggestion that he should come to Rome reach St. Peter from St. Paul himself? It is abundantly clear (1) that St. Paul's mind was set on averting any rupture between Jewish and Gentile Christians, and on welding them together in the one Church (Hort, Ecclesia p. 281 ff.); (2) that in his view Rome was the key to the evangelization of the empire; (3) that he was keenly alive in his own case to the importance of one who was the unique representative of one side of the Church's work visiting now the Mother Church at Jerusalem, now the Church in the capital of the empire; (4) that the problem of reconciling the two great elements in the Church presented itself in a concrete form in Rome (Ph 1<sup>5ff.</sup>), and that in Rome he grasped, as even he had never done before, the greatness of the issues involved (Eph

2<sup>11-14</sup>). His evangelistic policy could find no truer or more practical expression than a request to St. Peter to visit Rome while he himself was still there. Such an invitation would be a fitting corollary of the Ep. to the Ephesians. If the Churches saw the Apostle of the Gentiles and the leader of the Apostles of the Circumcision taking counsel together and working together at Rome, they would learn the lesson of the unity of the Church as they could learn it in no other way. Moreover, St. Paul looked forward to his captivity soon ending. Even if he were set at liberty, he was pledged to undertake distant journeys. Whatever, therefore, the issue might be, the Church in Rome would be deprived, of his immediate guidance; and as the far-reaching needs and opportunities of that Church pressed on him, he might well realize how manifold would be the gain resulting from the presence there of St. Peter. It is therefore a conjecture, but a conjecture supported by no inconsiderable amount of indirect evidence, that St. Paul summoned St. Peter to Rome. It is possible that St. Mark, whom we know to have been the companion of St. Peter, was with St. Paul when he wrote to the Colossians as the messenger and the forerunner of St. Peter. If this account of St. Peter's visit to Rome is correct, it will follow that he arrived there towards the end of St. Paul's first captivity, perhaps in the spring of 61. His absence from Rome when St. Paul wrote 2 Ti we may perhaps explain on the supposition that he had been summoned to Jerusalem in connexion with the death of St. James and the appointment of his successor.* He must have returned to Rome before July 64.

2. The Simonian legend.—The most probable account of its genesis is that it grew out of a mistaken identity (Salmon, art. 'Simon Magus,' in Dict. Chr. Biog. iv. p. 682 ff.). With the Simon of Ac 8 another Simon of Samaria was confused. This latter Simon was a Gnostic teacher, who probably lived at the end of the 1st cent. The confusion meets us as early as Justin Martyr, who, expressing probably a general opinion, gave the latter Simon a kind of primacy among heretics. He either himself visited Rome or gained a reputation there through his followers. The strange blunder about the statue can hardly have been a private aberration of Justin's, since it is found in the Gnostic Acts of Peter†—a document which seems to be quite independent of Justin's influence. But when once Simon Magus had been promoted to the first place among heretics, it was natural that the conflict between him and the chief of the apostles, related in the Acts, should be prolonged into a drama of controversy, the earlier scenes of which were laid in the towns of Syria, while the final denouement was reserved for Rome, which both combatants were believed to have visited. In the development of the story considerations of time were boldly disregarded. On the one hand, the last scenes of the drama had to be enacted in the reign of Nero in order to connect them with the fact that St. Peter suffered under that emperor. On the other hand, it was natural to bring Simon to Rome not so very long after the events recorded in the Acts—in the reign of Claudius (Justin, Apol. i. 26); and it seemed fitting that St. Peter * Eus. HE III. xi. : μετὰ τὴν Ἰακώβου μαρτυρίαν καὶ τὴν αὐτίκα γενομένην ἄλωσιν τῆς Ἱερουσαλὴμ λόγος κατέχει τῶν ἀποστόλων κ. τῶν τοῦ κυρίου μαθητῶν τοὺς εἰσὶν τῷ βίῳ λειτουργοῦντες ἐπὶ ταυτῷ πανταρχὸν συνέλθῃν κ.τ.λ. Eusebius places the death of St. James immediately before the siege of Jerusalem, according to the statement of Hegesippus (ap. HE II. xxiii. 18). Josephus (Ant. xx. ix. 1), however, puts it between the death of Festus and the arrival of Albinus. It seems that the latest date which can be assigned to Albinus' entrance on his office is the summer of 62 (Schürer, HJP I. ii. p. 188 n.).

† Actus Petri x. : [Simon] me tantum suasit ut statuum illi ponerem, suscriptioni tali : 'Simoni iuveni deo.'

should go to Rome when the expiration of the twelve appointed years set him free to leave Jerusalem (Actus Petri v. ed. Lipsius p. 49). Somewhat thus does it seem probable that the legend grew, and, as was natural, assumed somewhat different forms—e.g. Simon in the Clementines is rather the heretic, in the Petrine Acts the magician. The final stage in the evolution of the story was reached when Simon was utilized by the Ebionites for a covert attack on St. Paul.

3. The period which succeeded the Council at Jerusalem.—Setting aside, then, the Simonian legend as historically worthless, we are brought to the question—What is the probable account of St. Peter's life after the events at Antioch related by St. Paul in Gal 2 (i.e. probably A.D. 50) and St. Peter's arrival in Rome (i.e. probably A.D. 61). The absence of any trace of personal knowledge of the Churches in Asia Minor in the letter which the apostle addressed to them is a strong argument that he had not visited those districts. Though the tradition which connects St. Peter with the Syrian Antioch, and makes him the organizer of the Church there, does not (apart from the Clementine literature) meet us before the time of Origen, yet in itself it is probable. St. Paul's narrative in Gal 2 is too incidental and too little to St. Peter's credit to have originated a legend. On the other hand, it is natural to suppose that the Clementine literature, especially if its birthplace was Syria, located the apostle's conflict with Simon in towns in which a still living tradition preserved the memory of St. Peter's activity. We are most faithful to the suggestions of the somewhat scanty evidence if we suppose that, after he ceased to make Jerusalem his home, St. Peter laboured in the towns of Syria, and not improbably made the Syrian Antioch the centre of his work.

It may be useful to state probable results in a tabular form—

- A.D.
- 29–35 Ministry at Jerusalem: towards the close of the period a visit to Samaria (Ac 8<sup>14ff.</sup>).
- 35–44 Close of the ministry at Jerusalem: a missionary journey in which periods of somewhat protracted residence at Lydda, Joppa, Cæsarea, and probably other Syrian towns, had a place: somewhat frequent visits to Jerusalem (Ac 11<sup>2</sup>, Gal 1<sup>8</sup>, Ac 12<sup>17</sup>).
- 44–61 Work in Syrian towns with Antioch as its centre: at least one visit to Jerusalem in 49 (Ac 15<sup>7</sup>), but such visits few.
- 61–64 Work at Rome, interrupted probably by a visit to Jerusalem (Eus. HE III. xi.): martyrdom shortly after the fire at Rome in July 64.

- II. Reception in the Church.
- III. Use of the LXX, vocabulary, literary style.
- IV. The readers to whom the Epistle was primarily addressed, and their circumstances.
- V. Authorship and date.

- VIII. Doctrine of the Epistle.

I. TRANSMISSION OF THE TEXT.—Little need be said on this subject. For the authorities—MSS and Versions—see art. JUDE (EPISTLE OF) in vol. ii. p. 799. Two statements, however, with special reference to 1 P must be added. (1) The Epistle is contained in the Syriac Vulgate (Peshitta); but there does not seem to be evidence as to any Old Syriac text. (2) Fragments of the Epistle are contained in the following Old Latin MSS—the Fleury palimpsest=h (1 P 4<sup>17</sup>–5<sup>14</sup>); the Munich fragments edited by Ziegler=q (1<sup>8-19</sup> 2<sup>20-37</sup> 4<sup>10-514</sup>); Cod. Bobiensis=s (1<sup>1-12</sup> 2<sup>3-10</sup>); see Old Latin Biblical Texts, No. iv. pp. xx f., 46 ff.). As to Patristic evidence, citations from the Epistle are abundant, in Greek writers from the time of Polycarp onwards; in Latin writers from that of Tertullian. No serious critical problems are presented by the text.

II. RECEPTION IN THE CHURCH.—It will be convenient to trace the stream of evidence backwards. In all those catalogues of Canonical Books which belong to the 4th cent. and onwards, whether put forth by conciliar authority or found in the works of individual theologians, 1 P has a place. The only writer as to the favourableness of whose verdict there is any doubt is Theodore of Mopsuestia. In reference to him, Leontius of Byzantium (Migne, Pat. Gr. lxxxvi. 1365) states—αὐτὴν τε τοῦ μεγάλου Ἰακώβου τὴν ἐπιστολὴν καὶ τὰς ἐξῆς τῶν ἄλλων ἀποκρήρττει καθολικὰς. It seems probable (see Kihn, Theodor von Mopsuestia pp. 65 ff., 374 f.) that the language of Leontius is loose, and that nothing more is meant than that Theodore rejected James as well as the four Catholic Epistles—2 P, Jude, 1 and 2 Jn—which were not accepted by the Antiochene and the Syrian Churches. Of the grounds for this conclusion two may be mentioned. If Theodore had really rejected 1 P and 1 Jn, the general Council of Constantinople (553) would not have failed to reckon this among the reasons for their condemnation of him. On the other hand, Junilius (Instit. regularia i. 6, 7), whose statements as to the Canon reflect the views of Theodore (Kihn, p. 358 ff.), reckons beati Petri ad gentes prima among the books perfectæ auctoritatis. In the earlier half of the 4th cent. Eusebius includes this Epistle among the books 'generally received' (ἐν ὁμολογουμένοις, HE III. xxv. 2). In the earlier passage of the History (III. iii. 1) which deals with the Canon he makes the important statement—'this epistle the Fathers also of former days (οἱ παλαιοὶ προεβύτεροι) have quoted in their writings as indisputably authentic.' The evidence of Eusebius as to the general acceptance of the Epistle is carried back something like a century in a passage from Origen's Commentary on St. John, quoted by Eusebius (HE VI. xxv. 8)—Πέτρος . . . μίαν ἐπιστολὴν ὁμολογουμένην καταλέλοιπεν. So far there has been no sign of divergence.

We are now brought to the writers who represent the great Churches of Christendom at the beginning of the 3rd and at the close of the 2nd cent. (1) Alexandria. Clement again and again quotes words from the Epistle as those of St. Peter. Thus Strom. iii. p. 562 ed. Potter, καὶ ὁ Πέτρος ἐν τῇ ἐπιστολῇ τὰ ὁμοία λέγει "ὡστε τὴν πίστιν ὑμῶν καὶ ἐλπίδα εἶναι εἰς θεόν"; ib. iv. p. 622, ὁ Π. ἐν τῇ ἐπιστολῇ φησὶν "Ὀλίγον ἄρα, εἰ δέον, λυπηθέντες; so with other formulæ of citation, Pæd. i. p. 124, iii. pp. 296, 303; Strom. iii. p. 544, iv. p. 584 f. Moreover, Clement's Hypotyposeis contained 'short expositions' of this as well as of the other Catholic Epistles and of the Epistle of Barnabas and the Apocalypse of Peter (Eus. HE VI. xiv. 1; Photius, Biblioth. 109); and some at any rate of his comments on 1 P remain translated and possibly edited by Cassiodorus (cf. Zahn, Forschungen iii. 133 ff.). (2) Carthage. Tertullian quotes and refers to the Epistle as the work of St. Peter. Thus de Orat. xx., 'De modestia quidem cultus et ornatus aperta præscriptio est etiam Petri, cohibentis eodem ore, quia eodem spiritu, quo Paulus' (1 P 3<sup>3</sup>, 1 Ti 2<sup>9</sup>); Scorpiace, xii., 'Petrus quidem ad Ponticos, Quanta enim, inquit, gloria,' etc. For other quotations and references see Rönisch, Das NT Tertullian's pp. 556–563. (3) South Gaul. Irenæus, a witness to the traditions of Asia Minor, Rome, and South

Gaul, quotes the Epistle by name, iv. 9. 2 (ed. Massuet), 'Et Petrus ait in epistola sua Quem non uidentēs' . . . ; iv. 16. 4 f., 'Propter hoc ait Dominus (Mt 12<sup>26</sup> 5<sup>23</sup>. 22) . . . Et propter hoc Petrus ait Non uelamentum' . . . ; v. 7. 2 [after 1 Co 13<sup>12</sup> has been quoted, Iren. continues], 'Hoc est quod et a Petro dictum est Quem cum non uideritis diligitis.' For anonymous references see Zahn, Gesch. des NT Kanons i. 1, p. 303 f. (4) Rome. When we turn to the Church of Rome we find the evidence very slight. Hippolytus on Dan. iv. 59 (p. 336 ed. Bonwetsch) uses language derived from 1 Co 2<sup>9</sup> and 1 P 1<sup>12</sup> (eis ἃ καὶ ἐπιθυμοῦσιν τότε ἀγγελοὶ παρακύψαι). The reference is clear, and the juxtaposition with Pauline words shows that the phrase is regarded as scriptural. But it is not a case of definite quotation. In the Muratorian Canon there is no mention of 1 P. It seems, however, inconceivable that a document in which, e.g., the Epistle of Jude and a (supposed) letter of St. Paul to the Laodiceans find a place, should know nothing of an Epistle so widely accepted as 1 P, especially if Zahn's view is correct that the African Church received its NT from Rome (Ges. Kan. i. 1, p. 25 f.). The character of the fragment makes it quite possible that the apparent omission is due to the carelessness of a translator or of a scribe. But two other suggestions deserve consideration. (a) There is no formal mention of 1 Jn; but the opening words of the Epistle are cited in the passage of the fragment which deals with St. John's Gospel. It is probable, therefore, that the author of the Canon considered it unnecessary separately to mention an Epistle to which he had already incidentally referred. It is likely enough that 1 P 5<sup>13</sup> was quoted in connexion with St. Mark's Gospel and its relation to St. Peter's preaching, with which the first sentence of the extant fragment appears to deal (see art. MARK). (b) Zahn (Ges. Kan. ii. 1, p. 110 n.) conjectures that a word and a line have fallen out in a later passage of the fragment, which he would restore thus: 'Apocalypsi (n) etiam Johannis et Petri [unam] tantum recipimus [epistulam; fertur etiam altera,] quam quidam ex nostris legi in ecclesia nolunt.' In any case, the Muratorian fragment being what it is, it is unreasonable to deduce rejection or ignorance of 1 P from its apparent silence.

The remains of the literature of the 2nd cent. supply abundant evidence of the influence of the language of the Epistle on persons widely separated from each other. (i.) Martyrdoms. In the Acts of the Scillitan Martyrs (Robinson, The Passion of St. Perpetua p. 106 ff.) who suffered at Carthage in A.D. 180, we find the words, 'Donata dixit: Honorem Cæsari quasi Cæsari; timorem autem Deo,'—words which are closer to 1 P 2<sup>17</sup> than to Ro 13<sup>7</sup>. Again, in the Letter of the Churches of Lyons and Vienne (A.D. 177), preserved in Eus. HE v. i. f., there is an echo of 1 P 5<sup>6</sup> in the words ἐταπεινούν ἐαυτοὺς ὑπὸ τὴν κραταιῶν χεῖρα, ὡς ἡς ἱκανῶς νῦν εἶναι ὑψόμενοι (ii. 5); of 1 P 5<sup>8</sup> in ἡδὴ δοκῶν ὁ διάβολος καταπεπωκέναι (i. 25), and in οὐς πρότερον φετο [ὁ θῆρ] καταπεπωκέναι (ii. 6). (ii.) Apologists. The language of Theophilus, ad Autolyicum ii. 34, τὸν δὲ ποιητὴν . . . τῶν ὄλων . . . ἀθεοῦσαν, πειθόμενοι δόγμασιν ματαίοις διὰ πλάνης πατροπαράδοτου . . . οἱ [οἱ προφήται] καὶ ἐδίδαξαν ἀπέχεσθαι ἀπὸ τῆς ἀθεμῆτος εἰδωλολατρίας, recalls 1 P 2<sup>11</sup> 1<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>2</sup>. When Justin Martyr, Dial. 103, dealing with Ps 22<sup>3</sup>, suggests the alternative interpretation—ἢ λέοντα τὸν ὠρῶμενον ἐπ' αὐτὸν ἔλεγε τὸν διάβολον—he probably has in mind 1 P 5<sup>8</sup>. (iii.) Heretics. There is some evidence that the Gnostic sects, who early broke away from the Catholic Church, were familiar with the Epistle—(a) the Marcosians (representatives of the Western school of the Valentinians), whose actual words Irenæus (i. 18. 3) seems to be reproducing, τὴν τῆς κιβωτοῦ δὲ οἰκονομίαν . . . ἐν ἣ ὅκτω ἄνθρωποι διεσώθησαν, φανερώτατά φασὶ τὴν σωτήριον ὁδοῦ ἀπαγγέλλειν (1 P 3<sup>20</sup>); (β) the Eastern Valentinians, according to Clem. Alex., Excerpta ex Scriptis Theodoti lxxxvi., οὐ συνεισηθῆλον εἰς τὰ ἡτοιμασμένα ἀγαθὰ, εἰς ἃ ἐπιθυμοῦσιν ἀγγελοὶ παρακύψαι (1 P 1<sup>12</sup>); (γ) Basilides, according to Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. p. 600, μηδὲ λοιδορούμενοι ὡς ὁ μοιχὸς ἢ ὁ φονεὺς, ἀλλὰ ὅτι χριστιανοὶ πεφυκότες (1 P 4<sup>14</sup>). (iv.) Ep. to Diognetus ix., αὐτὸς τὰς ἡμετέρας ἀμαρτίας ἀνεδέξατο, αὐτὸς τὸν ἴδιον υἱὸν ἀπέδοτο λύτρον ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν . . . τὸν δίκαιον ὑπὲρ τῶν ἀδίκων; cf. 1 P 2<sup>24</sup> 3<sup>18</sup>. (v.) Hermas, Vis. iv. iii. 4, ὡς περ γὰρ τὸ χριστὸν δοκιμάζεται διὰ τοῦ πυρὸς κ. εὐχρηστον γίνεται, οὕτως καὶ ἡμεῖς κ.τ.λ.; cf. 1 P 1<sup>7</sup>, but see also Pr 17<sup>3</sup>, Sir 2<sup>5</sup>. Again, Vis. iii. xi. 3, iv. ii. 4, 5 (ἐπιρίψατε τὰς μερμύρας ὑμῶν ἐπὶ τὸν κύριον); cf. 1 P 5<sup>7</sup>, but more probably Ps 54 (55)<sup>22</sup> is the source. Thus the references to 1 P in Hermas are very doubtful. (vi.) Barnabas, xvi. 10, τοῦτο ἐστὶν πνευματικὸς ναὸς οἰκοδομούμενος τῷ κυρίῳ; cf. 1 P 2<sup>5</sup>. (vii.) Didaché i. 4, ἀπέχου τῶν σαρκικῶν καὶ σωματικῶν ἐπιθυμιῶν; cf. 1 P 2<sup>11</sup>. (viii.) Papias. Eusebius, HE iii. xxxix. 16, tells us of Papias—κέχηρηται δ' αὐτὸς μαρτυρία ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰωάννου προτέρας ἐπιστολῆς καὶ ἀπὸ τῆς Πέτρου ὁμοίως. Since Eusebius (HE iv. xiv. 9) uses similar language as to Polycarp (see below), we cannot infer from this notice that Papias did more than silently adopt Petrine expressions. It must, however, be remembered that the character of Papias' Expositions differed widely from that of Polycarp's Epistle. The latter is hortatory. The former dealt largely with matters of history and tradition. Thus Papias' use of 1 P is likely to have been of such a kind as to necessitate an explicit reference to the Epistle. These a priori considerations are confirmed by an examination of Eusebius' words elsewhere. In HE ii. xv. 2, Eusebius, giving an account of the composition of St. Mark's Gospel, mentions a story (φασὶ) that St. Peter approved of the evangelist's action, and gave his authority to the Gospel. He then parenthetically gives his authorities—Clement in the sixth book of the Hypotyposes has recorded the story; and, further, the bishop of Hierapolis, by name Papias, confirms his testimony'—and at once proceeds (in the oratio obliqua): τοῦ δὲ Μάρκου μνημονεύει τὸν Πέτρον ἐν τῇ προτέρᾳ ἐπιστολῇ, ἣν καὶ συντάξαι φασὶν ἐπ' αὐτῆς Ῥώμης, σημαίνειν τε τοῦτ' αὐτὸν τὴν πᾶσαν τροπικώτερον Βαβυλῶνα προσειπόντα διὰ τούτων Ἀσπάζεται κ.τ.λ. (1 P 5<sup>13</sup>). From this somewhat confused passage we learn that Eusebius found three points noted in the writings either of Clement or of Papias or of both—(1) the reference to Mark in 1 P; (2) the composition of 1 P at Rome; (3) the allegorical use of the name Babylon in 1 P. Now, when we turn to the extant fragments of Clement's Hypotyposes (ed. Potter p. 1007), we find that of these three points Clement mentions the former two and is silent as to the last. It appears, therefore, to be a just inference that in regard to this last Papias was Eusebius' authority. Moreover, that Papias' Expositions did contain a passage in which 1 P 5<sup>13</sup> would naturally be appealed to, is certain from the words of Papias himself (ap. Eus. HE iii. xxxix. 15)—ὅστε γὰρ ἤκουσε τοῦ κυρίου [Μάρκος] ὅστε παρηκολούθησεν αὐτῷ, ὑστερον δὲ, ὡς ἔφην, Πέτρον—a passage which makes it clear that in the now lost portion of his work Papias gave a detailed account of Mark's connexion with St. Peter. If, then, 1 P 5<sup>13</sup> was referred to in that earlier section of the Expositions in regard to Mark's presence with St. Peter at Rome, it follows that Papias must have appealed to the Epistle, and therefore have recognized it, as the work of St. Peter. (ix.) Polycarp (c. A.D. 115). There is a long series of coincidences between Polycarp's Epistle and 1 P—Ep. Polyc. i. εἰς ὃν οὐκ ἰδόντες πιστεύετε χαρὰ ἀνεκκλητήν καὶ δεδοξασμένην εἰς

ἦν πολλοὶ ἐπιθυμοῦσιν εἰσελθεῖν || 1 P 1<sup>6, 12</sup>; ii. διὸ ἀναξωσαμένοι τὰς ὀσφύας || 1<sup>12</sup>; ii. πιστεύσαντες εἰς τὸν ἐγγεγραπτα τὸν κύριον ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν ἐκ νεκρῶν καὶ δόντα αὐτῷ δόξαν || 1<sup>21</sup>; ii. μὴ ἀποδιδόντες κακὸν ἀντὶ κακοῦ ἢ λοιδόριαν ἀντὶ λοιδόριας || 3<sup>9</sup>; v. πᾶσα ἐπιθυμία κατὰ τοῦ πνεύματος στρατεύεται || 2<sup>11</sup> (cf. Gal 5<sup>17</sup>); vii. νήφοντες πρὸς τὰς εὐχὰς || 4<sup>7</sup>; viii. ὃς ἀνήμεγκεν ἡμῶν τὰς ἁμαρτίας τῷ ἰδίῳ σώματι ἐπὶ τὸ ξύλον, ὃς ἁμαρτιαν οὐκ ἐποίησεν, οὐδὲ εὐρέθη ὁδὸς ἐν τῷ στόματι αὐτοῦ . . . τοῦτον γὰρ ἡμῖν τὸν ὑπογραμμὸν [sc. τῆς ὑπομονῆς] ἔθηκε δι' ἑαυτοῦ || 2<sup>24, 22, 21</sup>; x. fraternitatis amatores diligentes inuicem . . . omnes uobis inimicem subiecti estote, conuersationem uestram irreprensibilem habentes in gentibus, ut ex bonis operibus uestris, etc. || 2<sup>17</sup> 1<sup>22</sup> 5<sup>5</sup> 2<sup>12</sup>. That Polycarp was thoroughly familiar with 1 P cannot be doubted. He does not, however, preface any of its words and phrases which he weaves into his letter with any formula of citation, nor does he ever mention St. Peter's name. Harnack (Die Chronologie, p. 463) therefore concludes that Polycarp did not regard the Epistle as the work of St. Peter, alleging that this Father deals differently with St. Paul, to whom he several times refers by name, and more than one of whose sayings he introduces with an εἰδότες ὅτι, clearly marking it thereby as a quotation. But, on the other hand, it may be urged—(1) that Polycarp uses, without any note of quotation, phrases derived from Clement's Epistle and from the Epistles of his master St. John (ch. vii., cf. 1 Jn 4<sup>22</sup>, 2 Jn 7), as Harnack admits, and we must add phrases from the OT, the Acts, and from the Gospels; (2) that the phrase εἰδότες ὅτι in each case (chs. i. iv. v.; cf. ch. vi. εἰδότες ὅτι πάντες ὀφείλεται ἐσμεν ἁμαρτίας) introduces an epigrammatic, axiomatic statement (cf. Ro 5<sup>6</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>58</sup>, 2 Co 17 4<sup>14</sup> 5<sup>6</sup>, Gal 2<sup>16</sup>, Eph 6<sup>8</sup>, Ph 1<sup>6</sup>, Col 3<sup>24</sup> 4<sup>1</sup>), while the phrases quoted from 1 P are rather of a hortatory type; (3) that Polycarp is writing to a Church which St. Paul founded and to which he addressed an Epistle, and that it is in reference to these facts that he mentions St. Paul's name (chs. iii. ix. xi.); that on the one occasion when he appeals directly to the authority of St. Paul's writings (ch. xi., 'sicut Paulus docet'), it is for a statement which is of the nature of a revelation—Sancti mundum iudicabunt (1 Co 6<sup>2</sup>). Further, Polycarp's love for and familiarity with 1 P are a proof that he regarded the Epistle as a document of supreme interest and authority—a document which he had by heart; they must be interpreted in the light of the fact that Irenæus, his spiritual son, habitually refers to it as the letter of St. Peter. (x.) Clement of Rome, vii. ἀπεισώμεν εἰς τὸ αἷμα τοῦ Χριστοῦ καὶ γνῶμεν ὡς ἔστιν τιμιον τῷ πατρὶ αὐτοῦ || 1 P 1<sup>19</sup>; xxxvi. ἀναβάλλει εἰς τὸ θαυμαστὸν αὐτοῦ φῶς [so Codd. A C (om. αὐτοῦ), τὸ φῶς Syr., Clem. Alex.]; lix. δι' ὃ ἐκάλεσεν ἡμᾶς ἀπὸ σκότους εἰς φῶς, ἀπὸ ἀγνωστίας εἰς ἐπίγνωσιν κ.τ.λ. || 1 P 2<sup>9, 15</sup>. Again, Clement uses the Petrine word ὑπογραμμός in reference to ὑπομονή (v.) and, after quoting Is 53, Ps 22, to Christ's humility (xvi.), cf. 1 P 2<sup>21</sup>. Further, in 1 P 4<sup>8</sup> we have Pr 10<sup>12</sup> quoted in the form ἀγάπη καλύπτει πλῆθος ἁμαρτιῶν, a form approximating to the Hebrew but widely different from the LXX. The Petrine rendering is found in Clem. xlix. and in 'the Ancient Homily' (2 Clem.) xvi. Again, Pr 3<sup>24</sup> (κύριος ὑπερηφάνους ἀντιτάσσει LXX, Heb. 'He') is quoted in Ja 4<sup>6</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>5</sup>, in the form ὁ θεὸς ὑπερηφάνους κ.τ.λ. In this latter form the words are cited in Clem. xxx. (θεός), Ign. Eph. v. (ὑπερηφ. ὁ θεός ἀντιτάσσει).

To sum up: 1 P is, with the single exception of 1 Jn, the only one among the Catholic Epistles 'of whose authority was never any doubt in the Church.' No sooner did a theological literature (properly so called) spring up in the Church than this Epistle is quoted by name as the work of St. Peter. In the earliest Christian literature outside the NT (i.e. A.D. 90–190) it is second only to the Gospels and the Pauline Epistles in the extent of the influence which it exercised on the language and thoughts of writers widely separated from each other in place and in circumstances. The testimony which these writers bear to the Epistle is indirect, with one probable exception. There is good reason for thinking that Papias referred to it explicitly as the Epistle of St. Peter. The only natural interpretation of the facts—the early and wide influence of the Epistle on the one hand, on the other the consistent and unwavering attribution of it to St. Peter on the part of all writers from Irenæus' time onward—is that from the first it was regarded as the work of that apostle.

III. USE OF THE LXX, VOCABULARY, LITERARY STYLE.—(i.) The thought and language of 1 P are deeply influenced by the OT, and the writer uses the OT in the LXX version. It is not possible to draw an absolute line between direct quotations and instances of mere appropriation of LXX language. In the former category the following passages may be conveniently classed—1<sup>16</sup> (Lv 11<sup>44</sup> 19<sup>2</sup> 20<sup>7</sup>), 1<sup>24</sup> (Is 40<sup>6ff.</sup>), 2<sup>6-8</sup> (Is 23<sup>16</sup>, Ps 117 [118]<sup>22</sup>, Is 8<sup>14</sup>), 2<sup>9f.</sup> (Is 43<sup>20f.</sup>, Ex 19<sup>5f.</sup> || 2<sup>32</sup> [cf. Mal 3<sup>17</sup>], Hos 1<sup>6</sup> 8<sup>f.</sup> 21<sup>3</sup>, 22<sup>(20)</sup>), 2<sup>22, 24f.</sup> (Is 53<sup>9, 12, 8</sup>), 3<sup>10ff.</sup> (Ps 33 [34]<sup>12ff.</sup>), 4<sup>8</sup> (Pr 10<sup>12</sup>), 4<sup>18</sup> (Pr 11<sup>31</sup>), 5<sup>5</sup> (Pr 3<sup>24</sup>). When these quotations are examined textually, it appears that (1) the writer quotes from memory, this conclusion being suggested by the number of small variations and adaptations (see especially 3<sup>10ff.</sup>); (2) in one passage (2<sup>9</sup>) his reminiscence of the LXX is influenced by his remembrance of Ro 9<sup>33</sup>; (3) there is some slight evidence for the conclusion that the LXX text familiar to him resembled that found in NAQ rather than that given by B (cf. von Soden, Hand-Comm. p. 113); see 2<sup>8</sup> (+ ἐπ' αὐτῷ; but the addition may be due to Ro 9<sup>33</sup>), 2<sup>22</sup> (εὐρέθη ὁδός); but note, on the other hand, 3<sup>12</sup> (+ ὅτι); (4) that in one passage (4<sup>8</sup>) he either himself formulates, or (in view of Ja 5<sup>20</sup>) more probably adopts, a revised translation of the Hebrew.

Apart from quotations, however, the writer continually weaves into his own language words and phrases which are (possibly unconscious) reminiscences of the LXX.

Most phrases of this kind are indicated by the use of uncial type in WH. To these may be added—1<sup>2</sup> εἰρήνη πληθυνθήη (Dn 3<sup>98</sup>), 1<sup>18</sup> ἀναξωσαμένοι . . . τὰς ὀσφύας (Pr 29<sup>35</sup>), 1<sup>19</sup> ἄμενος ἁμαρτίας (e.g. Ex 29<sup>38</sup>), 2<sup>4</sup> προσηχόμενοι (Ps 33 [34]<sup>6</sup>, see Hort's note), 2<sup>24</sup> τῷ σώματι αὐτοῦ ἐπὶ τὸ ξύλον (Dt 21<sup>23</sup>), 3<sup>13</sup> τίς ὁ κακίστος (Is 50<sup>9</sup>), 5<sup>6</sup> ταπεινώθη . . . ὑπὸ τὴν κραταιὴν χεῖρα (Gn 16<sup>9</sup> and e.g. Job 30<sup>21</sup>), λίαν ἀφύμενος (e.g. Ezk 22<sup>28</sup>). Moreover, the following words are probably derived from the LXX—ἀντίδικος, γυναικίος, ἐπίλοιπος, ἰερῆτιμα, κατακυριεύειν, καταπίνειν, κλήροι, παροικία, πάτος, πύραυς, βαντισμός, βύπος, συντρέχειν (Ps 49 [50]<sup>18</sup>). Again, not a few expressions suggest that the writer of the Epistle was acquainted with some books of the Apocrypha—ἀδείφους (1 Mac twice, 4 Mac four times, in abstract sense), ἀλιμτος (2 Mac thrice, 3 Mac once), ἐπίσκαπος ψυχῶν (cf. Wis 1<sup>6</sup> 3<sup>18</sup>), κτισσῆς (Jth once, Sir once, 2 Mac thrice, 4 Mac twice), πρόγνωσις (Jth twice), ὑπογραμμός (2 Mac once). The three epithets ἀφθαρτος, ἀμίαντος, ἀμέραντος (1<sup>4</sup>) occur in Wisdom; the combination ἐξῆραντι κ. ἱερανοῦν (110) in 1 Mac 9<sup>26</sup>.

(ii.) A rough analysis of the vocabulary of the Epistle seems to reveal four main elements—(a) With one of these, that derived from the LXX, we have already dealt. (b) There is the obvious Christian element, examples of which are φιλαδέλφια (φιλάδελφος), χάρισμα. It is important to remember that, though St. Paul's Epistles are the earliest evidence for the use of such words as these in a specifically Christian sense, it does not follow that their currency was due to him, or that a writer who so uses them is proved thereby to be a literary debtor to him. (c) There is a considerable number of words and expressions in the Epistle which do not occur elsewhere in the NT, and which may be briefly described as classical.*

* For instances of verbal affinity with Philo see Salmon, Introduction 6 p. 505 f.

They are—ἀναγκαστός (Plato), ἀνάγκη (Philo, Plut., Strabo), ἀντιλοιδόριον (Lucian., Plut.), ἀπείχεται ἐπιθυμιῶν (Plato), ἀπογενέσθαι (Herod.), ἀπόθεσις (Plato, Arist. = 'laying up'), βίον (Hom.), ἐμπλοκή (Strabo), ἐπιπέλασμα (Menand.), εὐνοφλυνία (Xen., Arist.; verb LXX twice), ὁμόφρων (Hom., Hes., Pind.), ἐπλήξιν (Herod., Thuc.), ὁ παραληλυθὸς χρόνος, παροστράδατος (Dion H., Diod., Inscriptions; cf. Deissmann, Neue Bibelstudien p. 94), προθύμιος (Herod., Aesch.); cf. also ἴναια (Plato, Arist., Polyb.) also in LXX, He 412, ἰστιάξιν (Xen., Dem., Arist.) found also in Lk 628.

(d) We notice in this Epistle a remarkable series of words for which there seems to be no earlier or contemporary authority—ἀλλοτριοπίσκοπος, ἀμαράντωνος, ἀναγεννᾶν, ἀνεκδόλητος, ἀπροσωπολήμπτως, ἀριγέννητος (found, however, in Lucian), ἀρχιποίμην (found, however, in 4 K 3<sup>d</sup> (Symm.) Test. xii. Patri. Jud. 8), ἐγκομβούσθαι, περιέχει ἐν γραφῇ, περιθέσις, προμαρτύρεσθαι, σθενοῦν, συνπρεσβύτερος, ὕπομψάνειν (but in Dion. H. = 'to fail').

The vocabulary, then, of the writer is a full one, including as it does words representing the several strata of the language. The proportion of classical words is large; so, too, is the list of words of which there is little or no independent attestation. None, however, of those which come under the last head strikes the reader as affected or odd. Each is correctly formed. The meaning of all but a very few words (e.g. ἐπερώτημα, ἀλλοτριοπίσκοπος) is at once clear.

(iii.) The general style, like the vocabulary, shows that the writer within certain limits had a very considerable appreciation of, and power over, the characteristic usages of Greek.

The sentences are naturally linked to each other, and are impeded, as a rule, by no special difficulties of construction. They rise at times into a simple grandeur (e.g. 13-9. 17-21 22<sup>1-25</sup> 56<sup>10</sup>). Passing to matters of detail, we note a keen sense of the significance of order, rhythm, and balance in the arrangement of words—e.g. 17-21 22<sup>1</sup> (ὅτι ὑμῶν, ὑμῶν) 42. 12 55. Again, the letter is marked by a fullness and deliberateness of expression shown in (1) the writer's love of putting a fact or a duty first negatively and then positively, see 14. 18. 23 216 33. 9. 21 42 52x; (2) the skillful use of epithets and adverbial expressions, e.g. 13. 18. 22 22; (3) the expansion of a single idea by means of synonyms—14. 10r. 19 28. 11. 25 34. 8. 15. 22 418 58. 10. Passages where the use of allied but contrasted words adds force or delicacy to the language are 15 (τετηρημένην . . . φρουρούμενους), 21 37 (συνακούτες . . . συνακληρουμένους), 45-10 (ἑαυτοῦ . . . ἀλλήλους . . . ἑαυτοῖς), 57 (τὴν μέριμναν ὑμῶν . . . αὐτῶν μέλει). The tenses are used with marked exactness, and their force is often brought out by contrast, 15 (τετηρημένην, φρουρούμενους), 18 (ἰδόντες, ὄραντες), 111f. (ἰδῆλου, ἀπεκαλύφθη), 113 (ἀναξωσάμενοι, νήφοντες), 210 (ἠλητημένοι, ἐληθίτες), 217 (τιμῆσάτε (the abstract rule), ἀγαπάτε, φοβείσθε, τιμᾶτε (the detailed fulfilment)), so also 213 (ὑποτάγητε), 218 31 (ὑποτασσόμενοι), 410 (ἐλαβον, διακονοῦντες), 413 (χαίριστε, χαρήτε). Again, the use of contrasted prepositions is often full of meaning, 12 (κατὰ, ἐν, εἰς), 13 (κατὰ, εἰς, διὰ), 15 (ἐν, εἰς; ἐν, διὰ), 121 (διὰ, εἰς), 24 (ὑπὸ, παρὰ), 318 (πρὸς, ὑπὲρ). The meaning of the opening paragraph—the fulfilment of the Divine purpose in relation to Messiah and the Gentiles—largely depends on the pregnant use of the preposition εἰς ('reserved for,' 'destined for') in 15. 10. 11. Again, it will be felt how much is involved in the double contrast between the plural and the singular in 42 ἀνθρώπων ἐπιθυμίας, θελήματι θεοῦ (cf. Heracleon ap. Origen in Joan. tom. xx. 24, τὸν διάβολον μὴ ἔχην θέλημα ἀλλ' ἐπιθυμίας; cf. also 53 τῶν κλήρων . . . τοῦ πικρινοῦ).

It is interesting to contrast this Epistle with the Pauline Epistles in regard to the imagery used. The figures are drawn from the associations of birth, childhood, and family life (1<sup>3</sup>. 14. 17. 22<sup>1</sup>. 22<sup>2</sup>), nomadic life (1<sup>1</sup>. 17 21<sup>1</sup>), temple and worship (2<sup>5</sup> 3<sup>15</sup>), building (2<sup>4</sup>), the fields and pastoral life (1<sup>4</sup> (2<sup>4</sup>) 52. 6), military life (1<sup>5</sup> 2<sup>11</sup> 4<sup>1</sup>), painting (2<sup>21</sup>), working of metals (1<sup>7</sup> 4<sup>12</sup>). The writer differs from St. Paul in the lack of originality which his imagery shows—it is almost entirely derived from the OT: in the narrowness of its range: in its simplicity and brevity; no metaphor is expanded or permitted to lead on to side issues.

To sum up: the writer of the Epistle must have been a diligent student of the LXX, and was saturated with its language. In particular, it may be noted that his mind is constantly recurring to the Bk. of Proverbs. There is also reason for thinking that he was acquainted with some books of the Apocrypha. The nature and range of his vocabulary shows that he had considerable knowledge of, and power over, the resources of the Greek language; and this conclusion is confirmed when we note the delicacy and accuracy of his perception in regard to the rhythmical arrangement of words, the use of synonyms, and the management of tenses, prepositions, etc. At the same time, there is no sign of any conscious effort after effect. We do not find here the trained rhetoric of the writer to the Hebrews, the impetuous, unstudied, eloquence of St. Paul, or the epigrammatic conciseness of St. James. Viewing the Epistle from a purely literary standpoint, we find its merit in the exact correspondence between its spirit and its form. The simple impressive language is the spontaneous expression of the writer's tender persuasiveness and calm logic.

IV. THE READERS TO WHOM THE EPISTLE WAS PRIMARILY ADDRESSED, AND THEIR CIRCUMSTANCES.—The Epistle is addressed to the Christians in the four Roman provinces which together coincided with the region which bears the modern name of Asia Minor. It has, indeed, been lately urged (Deissmann, Bibelstudien p. 244) that no letter, properly so called, could be addressed to communities scattered over so vast a district; the circulation of such an Epistle, it is said, would have taken up many years of the life of the messenger. Such a position, however, leaves out of sight the wonderful facilities for travel which Rome had created throughout the empire, as well as the fact that in St. Paul we have an instance of a Christian missionary who did plan and execute rapid tours of visitation over large districts (cf. e.g. Ac 15<sup>41-16</sup> 18<sup>22f</sup>. (cf. 19<sup>1</sup>) 19<sup>21</sup>). Moreover, since the letter does not deal, as many of St. Paul's Epistles do, with controversy or business, or with matters of pressing local or personal importance, there would be no need for the messenger to deliver it immediately to all those to whom it was addressed. It would be sufficient if he communicated it to the several Churches in the provinces, as in the course of time he reached them. See also below, § 6.

From the question of their home we turn to the problem of their past. Is the letter addressed to those who had been converted to Christ from Judaism or from heathenism? The opinion that its readers were Jews by birth was held (as we infer from his language about St. Peter's travels) by Origen (quoted by Eus. HE III. i.), by Didymus of Alexandria, by Eusebius (HE III. iv. 2), and by the Greek Fathers generally. This consensus of ancient opinion was followed by many scholars between the Revival of Learning and the present century—Erasmus, Calvin, Grotius, and Bengel. Among critics of the last half century it has won the constant and earnest support of B. Weiss (e.g. Der petrinische Lehrbegriff, 1855, p. 99 ff.; Introd. to NT, 1888, vol. ii. p. 137 ff., Eng. tr.), and recently of Kühl in his commentary in the Weiss-Meyer series. The two last mentioned scholars, it should be added, maintain their view as to the readers of the Epistle in close connexion with their conclusion as to the early date of the Epistle (see below). On the other hand, in ancient times Augustine (c. Faust. xxii. 89; Enarr. in Ps. 146 (147) 9) and Jerome (adv. Jovinian. 1<sup>39</sup>) held that the Epistle was addressed to Gentile Christians, though in de Virr. Illust. 1 the latter follows Origen in speaking of the apostle's 'praedicationem dispersionis eorum qui de circumcisione crediderant in Ponto'; and for this view recent critics of all schools have given a practically unanimous vote.

A brief examination of Kühl's arguments will serve to bring into prominence some important points. (1) The word διασποράς in the salutation, it is said, is decisive; it must point to 'Jewish settlements' (cf. Ja 1<sup>1</sup>)—an argument which convinced ancient opinion. As against this interpretation no stress can be laid on the absence of the article before διασποράς; for in such a formula as a salutation prefixed to a letter the article is frequently omitted. The following considerations, however, seem to have decisive force on the other side. (a) In the clause itself the words παρεπίδημοι and διασπορά are kindred to each other, both dealing primarily with the manner of man's life on earth. Since the former is here used in a metaphorical sense (cf. 1<sup>17</sup> 2<sup>11</sup>), it would be harsh to take the latter literally. (b) The opening and the close of the Epistle cannot be interpreted independently of each other. There is an intentional correspondence between them. The phrase ἑκλεκτοῖς παρεπίδημοις διασπορᾶς in 1 answers to ἡ ἐν Βαβυλῶνι συνικλιετή in 5<sup>13</sup>. The word διασπορά and the name Βαβυλῶν (= Rome, see art. BABYLON IN NT and, both published since that art. was written, Hort, 1 Peter pp. 6, 167 ff., and Zahn, Eint. ii. p. 19 ff.) are both expressions taken from the vocabulary created by Jewish history and afterwards transferred to the Christian Church. (c) Elsewhere in the Epistle language primarily applied to Israel is used of the Christian Church, see especially 2<sup>9</sup>. (d) The Epistle itself supplies a comment on διασπορά used metaphorically in 5<sup>9</sup> τῇ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ ὑμῶν ἀδελφότητι; compare Jn 11<sup>52</sup>, Didaché x. 5. These considerations further exclude Salmon's suggestion (Introd. p. 442), that 'the Epistle was written to members of the Roman Church whom Nero's persecution had dispersed to seek safety in the provinces'—a suggestion which is also open to the objection that, while it is natural and intelligible to use a recognized term in a metaphorical sense, it cannot be said to be either natural or intelligible to give it a special application unless that application is explained or in some way indicated by the context. (2) The use of the OT without note of quotation in cases where the force of the words as proof depends on their recognition as derived from the OT, presupposes a familiarity with the OT which converts from heathenism would not possess. To this it may be replied—(a) that the Epistle contains no argumentative passage, and that a writer might well enforce an exhortation by an appeal to OT language which his readers would not fully appreciate; moreover, it is not denied that in the Churches of Asia Minor there was an element of Jewish converts; (b) that the force of Kühn's argument depends almost entirely on his further supposition that the Epistle is addressed to recent converts (see below). (3) Kühn adduces certain passages as proving the Jewish descent of those addressed. The words of Hosea quoted in 2<sup>10</sup> were originally spoken to Jews; it is natural, therefore, it is said, that St. Peter should re-apply them to the Jews. In 2<sup>25</sup> Kühn pleads that the correlative terms ἦτε πλανήταμοι and ἑπιστρέφετε imply that those addressed had lapsed—an assertion not true of Gentiles. But Kühn's interpretation of both these passages assumes a general apostasy on the part of the Jews of the Dispersion, for which, in fact, we have not the slightest evidence. In regard to 2<sup>25</sup>, even if the idea of a return is pressed (but see Ac 14<sup>15</sup> 15<sup>3</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>9</sup>), the original relation of man to God may well have been in the apostle's mind here as in 4<sup>19</sup> (πιστῶ κρίσιν; cf. e.g. Ac 17<sup>28</sup>, Col 1<sup>20</sup> ἀπεκαταλλάξαι). Again, in reference to 3<sup>9</sup>, Kühn argues that Gentile women would become Sarah's children by conversion to Christ, and that therefore of none but Jewish women could it be said that they became so 'by well-doing.' But, even if the common punctuation of the passage is adopted, the words may very well mean, 'whose children you (Gentile) women proved yourselves by well-doing' (see Hort on 1<sup>5</sup>, p. 71). There is, however, much to be said for making the clause ὡς Σάρρα . . . τέκνα a parenthesis, and taking ἀγαποῦσθαι κ.τ.λ. as co-ordinate with ὑποτασσόμενοι.

On the other hand, there are passages of two kinds which only by repeated acts of exegetical violence can be construed as applicable to Jews. (1) Passages scattered throughout the Epistle dealing with the past moral condition of those addressed, 1<sup>14</sup> (cf. Ac 17<sup>30</sup>, Gal 4<sup>8</sup>, Eph 4<sup>18</sup>), 1<sup>18</sup> (cf. Ro 1<sup>21</sup>, Eph 4<sup>17</sup>; on παιστρομαρτύτου see Hort's note), 4<sup>24</sup> (for τὰ ἴθνη in an ethical sense see 1 Th 4<sup>5</sup>, Eph 2<sup>11</sup> 4<sup>17</sup>; note also ἔσθονται—heathen neighbours would not wonder if Jews did not join in their idolatrous immoralities). (2) The opening paragraph (13-12), where the contrast between 'us' (writer and readers alike, 1<sup>5</sup>) and 'you' (cf. Eph 1<sup>26</sup>), and still more the emphatic and remarkable language used about 'you' as persons for whom the blessings of the gospel were destined in God's purpose, and whom they had at length reached (1<sup>5</sup>. 10. 12, cf. 1<sup>25</sup>), seem to imply the fundamental conception of the admission into the family of God of the long-excluded Gentiles (see Hort's notes on 1<sup>3-12</sup>).

Further, the negative argument in this case is of considerable weight. The writer is silent on many topics on which almost inevitably he would have dwelt had he been speaking as a Jew to Jews. Then he does not, like St. James, draw out the moral teaching of the Law; nor, like the writer to the Hebrews, does he concern himself with the spiritual interpretation of the ancient histories, and of the ritual of the old covenant. He never takes occasion by a reference to 'the Fathers' to allude to the glories of Israelitish ancestry and its manifold significance for a Christian Jew (see Ac 3<sup>13</sup>. 25 5<sup>30</sup> 7<sup>2</sup>. 38 13<sup>17</sup>. 32 22<sup>14</sup>, He 1<sup>1</sup>, cf. Ro 9<sup>5</sup>). In short, the contrast between our Epistle (both in matter and manner) and those apostolic speeches and Epistles which are addressed to Jews, and, we may add, those parts of St. Paul's Epistles in which he turns to the Jewish element in the Churches to which he writes, is by itself a cogent reason for rejecting the theory that the Epistle was primarily addressed to Jewish Christians.

To sum up: the Acts supplies evidence that in many churches within the provinces enumerated in 1 P 1<sup>3</sup> there was a considerable Jewish element, and there is no reason for supposing that the other churches comprehended in the salutation differed from these in character. Such converts from Judaism would be especially alive to the meaning of the allusions to OT language so frequent in the Epistle. All considerations, however, point decisively to the conclusion that St. Peter had in his mind predominantly, though probably not exclusively, Gentile readers.

We pass to the evidence supplied by the Epistle as to the more recent history and the present condition of its readers. They owed their conversion to more than one evangelist (1<sup>12</sup>). That they were newly-made converts is certainly not implied by the injunction ὡς ἀρτιγέννητα βρέφη τὸ λογικὸν ἄδολον γάλα ἐπιποθήσατε (2<sup>2</sup>; cf. 1 Co 14<sup>20</sup>; Hermas, Sim. ix. 29); the habit of responding to their true spiritual instincts was a lifelong duty. And, on the contrary, there are indications that they had been Christians for some considerable time. St. Peter assumes that there were Christian presbyters in the communities addressed, and, moreover, that these elders were exposed to temptations arising from official routine, and from motives of sordid greed and of ambition—temptations which would hardly assail men watching over the first stages of the growth of infant churches. Further, the apostle implies that sufficient time has elapsed since his readers became Christians for them to have become a marked body among their heathen neighbours, and to have had experience of the difficulties and dangers inseparable from such a position.

What was the nature of these perils? On our answer to this question depends our view as to the date of the Epistle, and consequently, to a large extent, as to its general character and meaning. Does the letter presuppose that its readers were the victims of a persecution organized or authorized by the State? And, if so, is there evidence that this persecution was of a kind unknown in the year A.D. 64?

It will be convenient to consider the second of these two questions first. The passage on which the answer depends is 4<sup>15</sup>, and three points in regard to it claim attention. (a) In view of the evidence now available, it seems unreasonable to question St. Luke's statement that 'the disciples were first called Christians at Antioch' shortly before the year A.D. 44, still more unreasonable to doubt its currency at Rome at least some little time before the Neronian persecution* (see Lightfoot, Ignatius i. p. 400 ff.; Zahn, Eint. ii. p. 40 ff.; also art. CHRISTIAN in vol. i. p. 384 ff.). The name Christian, then, does not in itself suggest a date later than 64. (b) But 'the Epistle seems to refer directly to the edict of Trajan, which has a place in Pliny's correspondence, if the difficult word ἄλλοτριοεπίσκοπος points to the delator' (Jülicher, Eint. p. 135; cf. Holtzmann, Eint. p. 494). But, even if the essential idea of delator were not absent from the word ἄλλοτριοεπίσκοπος, the passage itself refutes this view. For, since the first three offences are mentioned in the inverse order of their heinousness—murder, theft, ill-doing (on the last see Hort, p. 135 f.)—the fourth place in the series could not be assigned to so vile an offence as that of the delator. Moreover, the ἦ ὡς before ἄλλοτριοεπίσκοπος, contrasted with the previous ἦ . . . ἦ, marks the transition to a different kind of offence. All the requirements of the passage are satisfied if we suppose that three legal offences are spoken of, then a social fault. The word itself, when examined, confirms this view. It is best illustrated by Epictetus, Encheir. iii. 22 (quoted by Zahn, Einkl. ii. p. 39), ὁ γὰρ τὰ ἀλλότρια πολυπραγμονεῖ [i.e. the Cynic] ὅταν τὰ ἀνθρώπινα ἐπισκοπῆ, ἀλλὰ τὰ ἴδια, and Hor. Sat. ii. 3. 19, 'aliena negotia curo Excussus propriis'—the former passage being a protest against, the latter a playful pleading guilty to, the charge often brought against the philosophers of busying themselves with their neighbours' concerns. The Christians, in their first zeal for the Divine law of purity and love, would be apt to be betrayed into an exasperating officiousness, into making a vain attempt to set the world around them to rights. Such a social indiscretion would not bring them within the law, but it would most surely involve them in much suffering—hence such apostolic precepts as Col 4<sup>2</sup>, Eph 5<sup>15</sup> (cf. 1 Th 4<sup>11</sup>, 2 Th 3<sup>11</sup>). The word ἀλλοτρι-επίσκοπος, then, appears to show that the word πασχέρω has a wider reference than to punishments inflicted by a magistrate (cf. 2<sup>19c</sup>). (c) A distinction is drawn between the proceedings against Christians under Nero in A.D. 64 and those which took place at a later time. In the earlier period, it is said, Christians suffered not as Christians but as those who were proved guilty of crime. In the later period the name Christian itself ensured condemnation. No evidence, it is allowed, is extant as to the time when the earlier procedure gave place to the later. The transition had taken place before the correspondence of Trajan and Pliny; it possibly took place as early as Vespasian's reign. The language of 1 P 4<sup>16c</sup>, it is urged, presupposes the circumstances of the later period, when a Christian suffered as a Christian. But surely this conclusion is due to a confusion of thought. It is obviously true that such language could be used by a Christian teacher after, but it by no means follows that it could not be used before, the alleged change in the attitude of the State towards the Church. For even if it be granted that in the eyes of the law each Christian who suffered in Nero's gardens suffered as a convicted incendiary, yet in the eyes of his fellow-believers he suffered for Christ; and when once the nickname Christian had become a current term, the phrase 'to suffer as a Christian' would become a natural synonym of the older phrases 'to suffer for Christ' or 'for the name of Christ' (Mt 24<sup>9</sup>, Lk 21<sup>12</sup>, Ac 5<sup>41</sup> 9<sup>16</sup> 15<sup>26</sup> 21<sup>13</sup>, Ph 1<sup>29</sup>).

* Two possibilities must be borne in mind. (a) Luke does not say that the name Christian was first invented at this time, but that it was now first used of 'the disciples.' It may have been applied to the Jews at Antioch earlier, and thus it may be a part of the inheritance which passed to Christianity from Judaism. (b) It may have been used of 'the disciples' independently at different places, especially if it was already applied to Jews. There is, however, nothing strange in a speedy importation of the nickname from the Syrian Antioch to Rome (cf. Juv. iii. 62).

It is, moreover, open to serious question whether the evidence implies any essential difference between the proceedings under Nero and those under, e.g., Trajan. All that we know of the Neronian persecution is derived from the somewhat rhetorical account in Tacitus (Ann. xv. 44), one brief sentence of Suetonius (Nero 16), and the allusion in Clement's Epistle. To the present writer, the evidence seems to point clearly to the conclusion that in A.D. 64 at Rome the Christians suffered legally for their religion. The reasons for this view are briefly these: (1) It would have ill-suited Nero's position to throw the blame of the great fire on persons who would have to be proved guilty of incendiarism before they were punished. We must surely conclude that he adopted the simple and sensible plan of slaking the public thirst for vengeance by the dramatic punishment of an unpopular class of people on whom he could shift the odium of being the authors of the fire, but who could be legally condemned without more ado as the votaries of a religio illicita. 'The legal grounds for interference were in existence from the first, and no special edict was needful' (Harnack, Die Chronol. p. 454 n.; cf. Lightfoot, Ignatius i. p. 11; Westcott's Essay on 'The Church and the World' (in Epistles of St. John)). (2) The language of Tacitus is quite consistent with, even if it does not require, this interpretation of the situation. Thus, in regard to the clause 'Primum correpti qui fatebantur,' the whole context refutes the idea that the confession was of incendiarism. The meaning can only be 'fatebantur se esse Christianos.' The admission of Christianity was the turning-point of their case. Again, in the following clause ('Multitudo ingens haud perinde in crimine incendii quam odio humani generis conuicti sunt') the word conuicti, which appears to imply judicial investigation of detailed criminal charges, is a conjecture for the MS reading coniuncti—a word which may justly be thought to be more in Tacitus' manner than the prosaic conuicti. Nor can the phrase 'odium humani generis' be taken as naturally pointing to illegal actions or conduct. It has a close parallel in the phrase which Tacitus uses in his description of the Jews (Hist. v. 5), aduersus omnes alios hostile odium. Jews and Christians would alike hold aloof from the social life of pagans; they would alike rebuke by their conduct, if not by their words, the idolatries and the profligacies of their neighbours. If the Roman Christians used such words as we find in St. Paul's Roman Epistle (e.g. Ro 1<sup>18</sup> 2<sup>9c</sup>), they might easily be represented as 'haters of the human race.' (3) The words of Suetonius ('afflicti suppliciois Christiani, genus hominum superstitionis nouæ ac maleficæ') are most naturally interpreted as asserting that Christians suffered as Christians. Moreover, if Nero was the first to act on the essential illegality of their position, and so stamped Christianity as illegal, the historian had a good reason for placing his notice of the fact among various police regulations. If, on the other hand, they were condemned not for their Christianity but for their criminal actions (real or supposed), there would be nothing new about the procedure—nothing to differentiate their case from that of criminals generally. (4) It is difficult to suppose that the ingens multitudo (cf. πολὸν πλῆθος, Clem.), including, according to Clement, matrons and girls and slaves, were one and all convicted of criminal actions. Their condemnation as votaries of an illegal religion, especially in a time of excitement and panic, would be an easy and expeditious matter (cf. Tac. Ann. ii. 85; Suet. Claud. 25).

So far, then, it appears (a) that the somewhat scanty evidence as to the Neronian persecution does not support the theory, that it differed essentially from later persecutions in regard to the method of procedure against the Christians; (b) that, if such a difference were proved to exist, the language of 1 P would be as natural from the pen of a Christian teacher in the earlier as in the later period.

We are thus brought to the question—What was the nature of the sufferings to which those to whom the Epistle was addressed, like their fellow-Christians throughout the world (5<sup>9</sup>), were exposed? Were they the victims of a persecution directed by the State? 'The clearest point,' writes Dr. Hort (p. 1), 'is that [the Epistle] was written during a time of rising persecution to men suffering under it'; and he suggests that this was either 'the persecution begun by Nero, or a secondary persecution arising from that,' or a persecution peculiar to Asia Minor, 'independent of any known persecution bearing an emperor's name, and perhaps even a little earlier than Nero's persecution' (p. 3 f.), adding that the language about the emperor and his officers (2<sup>13c</sup>) is in favour of the second of these two alternatives. 'The Christian congregations,' says Jülicher (Einkl. p. 135; cf. Harnack, Die Chronol. p. 453), 'and that throughout the whole world, have now to endure bitter suffering, to bear the fiery proving of their faith (4<sup>12</sup>)—a trial so bitter that now the end of all things cannot be far off (4<sup>17</sup>) . . . The period of systematic persecutions has begun.' On the other hand, Zahn (Einkl. ii. p. 34) finds it hard to comprehend how a 'persecution of the Christian confession, regulated by the imperial power or by the magistracy, can be discovered in the Epistle.' A decision between views so diametrically opposed can be arrived at only by an examination of the Epistle itself. The passages bearing on the question may be conveniently considered under the following heads:—

(1) 4<sup>7</sup> ('the end of all things is at hand'). This phrase is a commonplace with those (e.g. Jülicher, Harnack) who insist that the Christians of Asia Minor were enduring the extreme bitterness of persecution. The context, however, gives no countenance at all to the supposition that the expectation of the end was connected in the writer's mind with the cruelty of the Church's sufferings. He draws from the expectation the lesson, not of patience but of devout sobriety—a duty dealt with also in the preceding context.

(4) 2<sup>12</sup>. 3<sup>0</sup>. 13 44 14. From these passages it appears that slanders and insults had a prominent place among these 'sufferings.'

(5) 3<sup>13r</sup>. 17. The form of these hypothetical sentences (τίς ἂν παύσων . . . ; ἀλλ' εἰ καὶ πάσχοντες [not εἰ πάσχετε], and εἰ θέλοι [not θέλει]; cf. εἰ δέον 16) makes it clear that the writer regards suffering for Christ as no more than a possibility for at least some of those whom he is addressing. Such language is inconsistent with the hypothesis that a general persecution, organized by the government, was raging fiercely.

(6) 3<sup>15</sup>. 41<sup>5r</sup>. Both these passages are very frequently supposed to deal with the relation of Christians and Roman magistrates. But in neither case can this reference be sustained. On 41<sup>5r</sup> see above. In 3<sup>15</sup> (ἵνα τοῖμοι αἰεὶ πρὸς ἀπολογίαν παντὶ τῷ αἰτούντι κ.τ.λ.) the word παντὶ as well as the expression μετὰ πρῶτοντος καὶ ὄψου show that the injunction deals with the general intercourse of the Christians with their pagan neighbours (cf. Col 4<sup>6</sup> πᾶς δὲ ὑμῶς ἐνὶ ἑκάστῳ ἀποκριθεῖσθε).

(7) 2<sup>13r</sup>. The passage is an echo of St. Paul's words in Ro 13<sup>1r</sup>. But in place of the general language of Ro (ἰουραία ὑπερίουρασι . . . αἰ οὐσαι ἰουραία . . . οἱ ἄρχοντες) we have in 1 P a clear and detailed reference to the imperial government—'the emperor (βασιλεὺς)', 'provincial governors sent by him (ἡγεμόνες δι' αὐτοῦ πηραμένοι)'. Moreover, St. Peter's description of the purpose of the existing central government as being (on one side) the 'commendation' of 'well-doers' goes considerably beyond the earlier dictum of St. Paul (τὸ ἀγαθὸν ποιεῖν, καὶ ἕως ἴστανον ἐξ αὐτῆς); and this description he still further emphasizes by the explanation—'thus (i.e. in accordance with His will) is the Divine institution of civil government) it is the will of God, that by well-doing men silence the ignorance of those who are senseless.' To this passage must be added the other passages in the Epistle where the writer speaks in a tone of unwavering hopefulness as to the effect of ἀγαθοποιία on the heathen world (2<sup>12</sup> 31. 16). St. Paul wrote Ro 13 when he still regarded the Roman State as 'the restraining power,' and still looked to the Empire as the protector of the Church. That a Christian teacher, writing from Rome after Nero's attack on the Church to fellow-Christians in the provinces, should adopt St. Paul's language, only making it more explicit and emphasizing its hopefulness, seems inconceivable. How impossible such a position at that time would have been, is clear when with the paragraph in 1 P we compare the symbolism of the Apocalypse—the beast and the harlot seated on the seven hills, 'drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus' (Rev 17<sup>6</sup>. 9).

To sum up: the passage last considered affords strong reason for thinking that the storm of the

* Cf. Didaché xvi. 5, τίς ἔξω ἢ κρίσις πάντων ἀθρόων ἐν τῇ πύρωσιν τῆς δοκιμασίας, καὶ σκανδαλισθήσονται πολλοὶ κ.τ.λ. The previous context speaks of the advent of the 'world-deceiver.'

Neronian persecution had not as yet swept over the Church at Rome, and that no persecuting policy against the Church had been adopted by the Roman magistrates in Asia Minor. Not a word is found in the Epistle about men shedding their blood or laying down their lives for the gospel. None of the passages in any of the above groups, as we have seen, contains any reference to, or hint of, an organized persecution. But it needs only a little reflexion in the light of actual history to convince us how much of the keenest suffering the confession of Christ must have cost these Asiatic Christians, though the State had not as yet become their enemy. They were called upon to face violence, slander, the severance of social and family ties, worldly ruin. In the earliest days of their missionary activity St. Paul and Barnabas frankly told their converts—διὰ πολλῶν θλίψεων δεῖ ὑμᾶς εἰσελθεῖν εἰς τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ θεοῦ (Ac 14<sup>22</sup>). Such tribulations were not confined to the Churches of Asia Minor. It was well that St. Peter, out of his wider experience at Rome* and elsewhere, should remind them that these sufferings were the lot of the Christian brotherhood everywhere (5<sup>9</sup>).

V. AUTHORSHIP AND DATE.—It will be convenient to preface the discussion of these questions with a tabular statement (founded on that given by Holtzmann, Einkl. p. 318 ff.) of the different views held by representative critics.

I. On the Assumption of the Authenticity of the Epistle: (1) c. 54 A.D. (before St. Paul's sojourn at Ephesus)—B. Weiss, Kühl. (2) During the later period of St. Paul's activity before his imprisonment—B. Brückner. (3) 59 or 60—Glogau. (4) c. 62 (during St. Paul's imprisonment at Rome)—Steiger, Guericke, Bleek, Wieseler. (5) Shortly before the Neronian persecution—Hotmann, Renan, F. C. Cook, Zahn. (6) c. 65 (or a little later)—e.g. Eichhorn, de Wette, Neander, Grimm, Huther, Sieffert, Ewald, Wiesinger, Usteri; probably the majority of English scholars, e.g. Plumptre, Salmon, Farrar, Sanday (apparently); Expositor, June 1893, p. 411, Hort (not earlier than 62, probably after Neronian persecution), Lightfoot ('probably written not earlier than the summer of 64, Clement ii. p. 499). (7) 70–80, Ramsay (who would assign 80 as the probable date, The Ch. and the Empire p. 279 ff.), Swete (preferring apparently the first half of the decade, St. Mark p. xviii.).

II. On the Assumption of the Spuriousness of the Epistle: (1) Under Domitian (81–96)—Scholten, von Soden (92–96), Harnack (83–93, but possibly one or even two decades earlier than 83, Die Chronol. p. 454), McGiffert (about 90). (2) Under Trajan (98–117)—Schwegler, Baur, Keim, Lipsius, Pfeleiderer, Hausrath, W. Brückner, Hilgenfeld, S. Davidson, Jülicher (about 100). (3) Under Hadrian (117–138)—Zeller. (4) 140–147—Volkmar.

The difficulties involved in the theory that the Epistle is spurious may be conveniently considered first. They are many, and of various kinds. A close study of the document itself reveals no motive, theological, controversial, or historical, which explains it as a forgery (cf. Harnack, Die Chronol. p. 456 f.). It denounces no heresy. It supports no special system of doctrine. It contains no rules as to Church life or organization. Its references to the words and the life of Christ are unobtrusive. It presents no picture of any scene in St. Peter's earlier life, and does not connect itself with any of the stories current in the early Church about his later years. Why, moreover, should a forger, with all the world to choose from, select so strangely wide a district, four provinces, as the supposed destination of the letter, and why should he mention them in an order (on this supposition) so chaotic and so inexplicable? Why should he represent Silvanus as the amanuensis or the bearer of St. Peter's letter, though in the Acts he nowhere appears as in any way connected with that apostle, but both in the Acts and in three Epistles

* When St. Paul first arrived at Rome, the Jews at Rome tell him that they know that 'everywhere this sect is spoken against' (Ac 28<sup>22</sup>). The language of Tacitus (Ann. xv. 44) clearly implies that before the Neronian persecution Christians were regarded at Rome with feelings of hatred and horror—'quos per flagitia inuisos uolgens Christianos appellabat . . . aduersus fontes et nouissima exempla meritos.'

(1 and 2 Th, 2 Co) as the companion of St. Paul? Why, above all, should a forger give to Pauline thoughts and to Pauline language a prominent place in an Epistle bearing the name of St. Peter? These difficulties do not appear less formidable when we review the theories of those critics who have attempted to meet them. The Tübingen school, indeed, had a clear and concise answer to the question why a Pauline element is found in a Petrine Epistle. The letter, in their view, is a Unionsschrift (see Holtzmann, Einl. p. 316), celebrating the agreement of the two parties in the Church which bore the names of the two great apostles. 'But that theory,' to quote Harnack's verdict (Die Chronol. p. 456, cf. p. vii ff.), 'is admittedly profoundly shaken in general, and in particular it is refuted in its application to 1 Peter.' We turn at once to three recent theories.

(a) Von Soden (Hand-Commentar zum NT iii. 2, p. 117), putting the letter in the last four years of Domitian's reign, suggests that Silvanus was the author of the Epistle (5<sup>12</sup>): that, however, instead of speaking in his own name, he makes St. Peter, the glorious martyr (5<sup>1</sup>), utter words of encouragement to Churches among which the apostle had himself once worked; that, conscious what judgment the apostle had formed of him, he ventures to add the testimony to himself πιστοῦ ἀδελφοῦ ὡς λογιζομαι; that he perhaps derived his right to speak in the apostle's name from his own position as an ἀπόστολος (1 Th 2<sup>9</sup>) and a prophet (Ac 15<sup>32</sup>). A theory burdened with such complicated improbabilities hardly merits serious discussion.

(b) Jülicher (Einl. p. 134 ff.) holds that the letter was written about the year 100. In view of 5<sup>13</sup> and of the author's familiarity with St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, he conjectures that he was a Roman Christian. In spite of its obvious 'catholic' character, the letter is addressed to the five provinces of Asia Minor; and Jülicher finds an explanation of this fact in the supposition that the writer was a native of Asia Minor, and thus had a natural interest in the brethren of that region. He had, it is clear, an intimate knowledge of St. Paul's writings; but, when he wanted to give an apostolic authority to his own words, he refrained from using the name of that apostle, partly from motives of reverence and partly that he might not tear open again wounds which were now half healed. It is clear that this special view of the composition of the Epistle is open to all, or to nearly all, the objections mentioned above as generally valid against the supposition of its spuriousness.

(c) Harnack (Chronol. p. 457 ff.) draws a distinction between the opening and closing sentences (1<sup>14</sup>, 5<sup>12ff.</sup>) and, on the other hand, the main body of the Epistle (1<sup>3</sup>-5<sup>11</sup>). The latter—whether originally a letter or not, there is no evidence to determine—is the work of 'some prominent teacher and confessor, who, possibly writing from Rome, and, it may be, a prisoner there, was certainly so familiar with Pauline Christianity that he could move about within its area with perfect freedom.*' The date of this document, which to us is a fragment, lies between 83-93, but may conceivably be some 20 years earlier. The opening and closing sentences, on the other hand, Harnack, modifying a suggestion first put forward by him in his edition of the Didaché (p. 106 n.), considers to have been added between A.D. 150 and 175. He further discovers resemblances in style between these sentences and 2 Peter, the earliest document in which our Epistle is quoted as the work of St. Peter, and indulges the suspicion that the clauses which now begin and end 1 Peter are the work of the same author as 2 Peter.

Harnack (p. 458 ff.) urges that his view as to 1<sup>14</sup> 5<sup>12ff.</sup> is confirmed by four arguments. (1) These sentences can without loss be removed from the document. But, on this principle, all Epistles might profitably be curtailed at both ends. (2) These sentences are poor in style, and present various difficulties. But it is only natural that the beginning and the close of a letter should be simple and plain in style, and Harnack's objection to the phrase ὡς ὁμοίων καὶ ὀνειδιζόμενον ἀίματος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ (1<sup>2</sup>) is due to a want of appreciation of the words (see below, p. 794). Further, the existence of ambiguities in those parts of a letter which deal with personal matters is often a strong proof of its authenticity. The writer of a letter assumes on the part of his correspondents a knowledge of personal facts, obvious enough at the time, but soon forgotten. Moreover, any gaps in such knowledge the bearer of a letter would be trusted to fill up. (3) The motive of such additions lay in a sense of the instructiveness of the document, and the feeling that words so full of edification must be apostolic. Phenomena not wholly dissimilar are found in connexion with other documents—'Ephesians,' Ep. Barnabas, the so-called Second Ep. of Clement. But the first assertion suggests no answer to the question why the fragment should be assigned to St. Peter and not rather to St. Paul, with whose writings it has obvious points of contact. In regard to the second assertion, the reply is obvious. The documents adduced fail as parallels, both in other respects and especially just in the crucial point, viz. the addition to a document of sentences containing details geographical and personal, which are, as they stand, obscure, and are altogether lacking in picturesque precision. (4) Tradition favours the hypothesis. No writer before Irenæus quotes the letter as that of St. Peter. On the reception of the Epistle in the Church see above.

Harnack's hypothesis is open to serious objections, based on the internal evidence of the document itself and on external evidence. In the first place, what was the character of the document (i.e. 1<sup>3</sup>-5<sup>19</sup>)? It was not a treatise, for it is hortatory throughout. Was it, then, like the so-called Second Epistle of Clement, a homily? This is in the highest degree improbable, partly because of its close resemblances to St. Paul's Epistles, especially of the opening paragraph—ἠγαπητοὶ ἰθὺς καὶ πατρὸς κ.τ.λ. (1<sup>3</sup>)—to the opening paragraph of 2 Co and 'Ephesians'; partly because of the great variety of topics dealt with—a procedure natural in a letter, but ill-suited to a sermon; partly because the language is general, and there is an absolute lack of any such reference to the immediate surroundings or the special circumstances of his hearers as we should expect in the words of a preacher; partly because the whole tone of the document produces the impression that the teacher is not face to face with those whom he is addressing—note especially the phrase πρὸς τὸν ἄνθρωπον ὃν ἐν ἑστέιν παρακαλῶ (5<sup>1</sup>). If, then, the document was neither a treatise nor a homily, it must have been a letter; and, if a letter, it must originally have included, if not some personal message, at least some form of salutation. We must therefore suppose either that the interpolator deliberately excised the original beginning or ending or both, or that the document came into his hands in a mutilated form. This last hypothesis, so far as the initial salutation is concerned, is highly improbable; for the first leaf of the MS must have contained much more of the letter than the customary brief words of salutation, and the paragraph which must have immediately followed the salutation (1<sup>3ff.</sup>) is extant. In the second place, the difficulties arising from the consideration of internal evidence are increased when external evidence is taken into account. The main body of the Epistle, as Harnack admits (p. 461 f.), was known to Clement (probably), Polycarp, and Papias. The Epistle therefore must have been widely circulated before the time of the supposed interpolator. How are we to account, then, for these widely-circulated (uninterpolated) copies having disappeared, leaving no posterity; while all known MSS and versions, all MSS used by Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, Irenæus, and all other early writers who quote the Epistle as the work of St. Peter, must have descended from a single ancestor—the copy, that is, in which the additions at the beginning and the end were made about the middle of the 2nd cent.?' The improbabilities involved in Harnack's hypothesis are many and great. It is important, because it essentially belongs to a period of transition. It is the product, on the one hand, of the lingering influence of an older criticism, too thoroughly bent upon negative results to retain much delicacy of perception; and, on the other hand, of a keen literary and spiritual sense of the significance of a writer's matter and manner. His own words (p. 464 f.) are remarkable, and appropriately conclude this section: 'If the hypothesis here brought forward should prove erroneous, I should more readily prevail upon myself to regard the improbable as possible and to claim the Epistle for Peter himself, than to suppose that a Pseudo-Petrus wrote our fragment as it now stands, from the first verse to the last, soon after A.D. 90, or even from ten to thirty years earlier. Such an * McGiffert (History of Christianity in the Apost. Age p. 599) conjectures that the writer of the Epistle was Barnabas. He accepts Harnack's theory of interpolation.

* Harnack supposes interpolations not only in 1 P, but also in Jude, the Pastoral Epistles, Mt, Jn (Die Chronologie pp. 468, 485, 700, 679). The improbability of such a hypothesis in the case of a single document, as pointed out above, is very great. The improbability of the same improbable series of events having taken place in the case of six separate documents is infinite. The argument is well put by Dom Butler in the Dublin Review for Jan. 1890, p. 13 ff.

assumption is, in my opinion, weighed down by insuperable difficulties.'

We proceed, then, to examine the objections urged against the view that the salutation is original and veracious, and that the Epistle was written by St. Peter. The chief of these are five in number—

(1) The references to persecution are of such a kind as to imply a date which lies outside the probable, if not the possible, limits of St. Peter's life. This objection has been (p. 783 ff.) considered.

(2) St. Peter was a Jew of lowly origin, and Papias speaks of Mark as his ἑρμηνευτής. The Epistle, on the other hand, is written in good Greek, and the writer was thoroughly familiar with the LXX (so, e.g., Jülicher, Eintl. p. 132 f.). The facts alleged as to the Epistle are undisputed (see above, p. 781 f.). Are they incompatible with St. Peter's authorship? In Galilee, with its Greek towns such as Gadara (Jos. Ant. xvii. xi. 4, BJ II. vi. 3), there was so considerable an element of Greek life that, even when St. Peter became a follower of Christ, it is unlikely (to say the least) that he was wholly ignorant of colloquial Greek (Mayor, St. James pp. xli, coix; Abbott, Essays on the Original Texts of the Old and New Testaments p. 162 ff.; Zahn, Eintl. i. p. 28 f.). We may reverently suppose that our Lord, when He chose the apostle as 'the rock on which He would build His Church,' discerned in him intellectual as well as spiritual gifts which fitted him for his destined work. In Jerusalem, after the Ascension, St. Peter had much intercourse with Hellenistic Jews. His departure from Palestine can have been no sudden step; and it would be strange if he did not prepare himself for the work which lay before him by using opportunities, which certainly were within his reach, of increasing whatever knowledge he already had of the lingua franca of the Roman world. Mark was known in the early Church as 'the interpreter of Peter,' probably because he assisted the apostle in his first attempts to address Greek-speaking people. Greek must have been the vehicle of communication with Cornelius, and not improbably with the Jews of the Dispersion on the Day of Pentecost. We may conjecture that Mark was one of 'the brethren' who accompanied St. Peter from Joppa (Ac 10<sup>23</sup>), and that he helped him in speaking to the Roman centurion and his household. It may well be that Mark 'the interpreter' read with the apostle some Greek literature, and especially the LXX, of which it is not impossible that he had gained some knowledge in his home at Bethsaida. At any rate the years which St. Peter spent in missionary work outside the borders of the Holy Land, specially, we may add with great probability, in the Syrian Antioch and its neighbourhood (see above), cannot but have given him a familiarity with Greek sufficient to enable him to write a letter in Greek, even if he still had to trust Mark 'the interpreter' to prune away in it any solecism of which he might still be guilty. The Epistle of St. Peter, it must be remembered, is no isolated phenomenon in the apostolic age. One who accepts the Epistles of St. James and St. Jude as genuine is entitled to point to them as a proof that even Jews who, so far as it appears, did not extend their labours beyond Jerusalem, could acquire a good Greek style.

(3) If the Epistle was written from Rome, its silence about the death of St. Paul, if his martyrdom was recent, or, if St. Paul was then at Rome, the absence of any message from him or news about him, is said to be inexplicable (cf. von Soden p. 115). The subject will come before us again. For the present, it is sufficient to say that the bearer of the letter—such as Silvanus appears to have been—might well be entrusted with personal news (Hort p. 6).

(4) It is alleged that we do not find in the Epistle much which we should expect to find in a letter of St. Peter, the chief of the Lord's personal followers; that it shows no sign of a vivid remembrance either of Christ's life or of His teaching (von Soden p. 115; Jülicher p. 134; Harnack p. 451). We cannot, then, place the Epistle after St. Paul's Epistles and suppose it to be the work of St. Peter, unless we admit, according to Jülicher's view, that 'Paul had exercised on Peter a greater influence than Jesus.' The discussion of this objection falls under two heads. (a) The Lord's life. Silence as to the facts of the Lord's life and ministry, strange to us in the case of one who remembered details the knowledge of which would have been of priceless value to later generations, is not a phenomenon peculiar to 1 Peter. From the Books of the NT other than the Gospels hardly a hint as to the events of our Lord's earthly life can be gathered. In the speeches recorded in the Acts, if we may assume that they represent with substantial accuracy the apostle's earlier teaching, St. Peter refers once to the Lord's baptism (10<sup>38</sup>, cf. 1<sup>22</sup> 4<sup>27</sup>) and twice to His miracles (2<sup>22</sup> 10<sup>38</sup>), but to nothing else before the Passion. The facts of the NT then point to the conclusion that in their public teaching, whether oral or written, the apostles concentrated attention on the great momenta of the Lord's 'manifestation'—His sufferings and death, His resurrection and exaltation. While, however, there is in the Epistle nothing biographical or autobiographical, there are unobtrusive indications that its author was an eye-witness of the Lord's life. In 1<sup>8</sup> (ὅν οὐκ ἴδόντες ἀγαπήτε) a return to the first person plural (v.<sup>3</sup>) would have been quite natural had the writer been one who had not seen the Lord. The words gain greatly in force and tenderness if they are the words of a disciple who loved One whom he had seen (Jn 21<sup>15</sup>), and who welcomes to a fellowship in his love for Christ those who had not seen. Again, when in 5<sup>1</sup> the writer speaks of himself as ὁ συνπρεσβύτερος κ. μάρτυς τῶν τοῦ Χριστοῦ παθημάτων, the description is almost pointless unless it implies that he bears witness to what he himself had seen (contrast 4<sup>13</sup>). The whole clause is clearly intended to justify the authority with which the writer addresses 'the elders.' He shared their position as elders, and therefore knows their difficulties. He is a witness to the very events which form their Gospel, and therefore has a unique claim to be heard. The full significance of the clause is seen only when it is compared with (i.) the commands addressed to the eleven, Jn 15<sup>23</sup>, Lk 24<sup>47</sup>, Ac 1<sup>8</sup>; (ii.) St. John's words in Jn 19<sup>35</sup> (cf. 21<sup>24</sup>), 1 Jn 1<sup>14</sup>, 4<sup>14</sup>; (iii.) St. Peter's words as recorded in Ac 1<sup>21</sup>, 2<sup>22</sup> 3<sup>15</sup> 4<sup>20</sup> 5<sup>32</sup> 10<sup>39</sup>; and when, on the other hand, we mark the entire absence in St. Paul's Epistles of any similar expression, and that in passages where he is insisting on his apostolic authority (e.g. 2 Co 10<sup>1</sup>–12<sup>13</sup>, Gal 1). The nearest parallels in St. Paul—1 Co 9<sup>1</sup> 15<sup>8, 15</sup>, cf. Ac 22<sup>15</sup> 26<sup>16</sup>—serve to bring out into sharper relief the distinctiveness of the Petrine phrase (cf. Ac 13<sup>31</sup>). An instance of this μαρτυρία is found in 2<sup>22</sup>—a reminiscence of the arrest, and of what St. Peter saw as he lingered in the high priest's vestibule. In this connexion the force of the imperfects is not to be overlooked. They give not the summary statement of the historian, but the vivid remembrance of the eye-witness. Again, in the phrase ἀλλήλοις τὴν ταπεινοφροσύνην ἐγκομβώσασθε (5<sup>3</sup>), the picturesque word ἐγκομβώσασθε gathers up the details of the scene related in Jn 13<sup>40</sup> and its lessons. (b) The Lord's teaching. The following are the chief coincidences between 1 P and sayings of our Lord: (a) recorded in the Synoptic Gospels—1 P 1<sup>4</sup> || Mt 5<sup>9</sup> 25<sup>34</sup> 6<sup>30</sup>; 1<sup>6, 8</sup> 4<sup>13</sup> || Mt 5<sup>12</sup>; 1<sup>10</sup> || Lk 10<sup>24</sup>; 1<sup>11</sup> || Lk 24<sup>26, 44</sup>; 1<sup>13</sup> || Lk 12<sup>35</sup> 21<sup>34</sup>; 1<sup>17</sup> || Mt 6<sup>9</sup> Lk 11<sup>2</sup>;

2<sup>d</sup> || Mt 18<sup>2f</sup>, 19<sup>14</sup> Lk 18<sup>17</sup>; 2<sup>d</sup> (προσερχ.) || Mt 11<sup>23</sup> (cf. Jn 6<sup>37</sup> 7<sup>37</sup>); 2<sup>5</sup> || Mt 16<sup>18</sup>; 2<sup>7</sup> (Ps 118<sup>22</sup>) || Mt 21<sup>42</sup>; 2<sup>12</sup> (cf. 3<sup>16</sup>) || Mt 5<sup>16</sup>; 2<sup>18</sup>, 17 || Mt 22<sup>21</sup>; 2<sup>21</sup> (ἐπακολ.) || e.g. Mt 10<sup>38</sup> *; 2<sup>25</sup> (cf. 4<sup>19</sup>) || Lk 23<sup>46</sup>; 2<sup>25</sup> || e.g. Mt 9<sup>36</sup> Lk 15<sup>4</sup>; 3<sup>9</sup> || Lk 6<sup>28</sup>; 3<sup>18</sup> || Lk 10<sup>19</sup> 21<sup>18</sup>; 3<sup>14</sup> || Mt 5<sup>10</sup>; 3<sup>14</sup> || Mt 10<sup>26a</sup>; 3<sup>16</sup> || Lk 6<sup>28</sup>; 4<sup>7</sup> (cf. 5<sup>8</sup>) || Mt 24<sup>42</sup> 25<sup>13</sup> 26<sup>41</sup> Lk 12<sup>27</sup> 21<sup>34</sup>; 4<sup>14</sup> || Mt 5<sup>11</sup>; 4<sup>19</sup> (π. κρίστη) || Mt 6<sup>28a</sup>; 5<sup>1</sup> || Lk 24<sup>47</sup> (Ac 1<sup>8</sup>) Mt 19<sup>28</sup> Lk 22<sup>28a</sup>; 5<sup>2</sup> || Mt 20<sup>25a</sup>; 5<sup>6</sup> || Mt 23<sup>12</sup>; (β) recorded in St. John—1 P 1<sup>3</sup>, 2<sup>3</sup> || Jn 3<sup>3</sup>; 1<sup>8</sup> || 20<sup>23</sup>; 1<sup>19</sup> 2<sup>24</sup> || 1<sup>29</sup>, 3<sup>6</sup>; 1<sup>22</sup> || 13<sup>24f</sup>, 15<sup>13</sup>; 2<sup>9</sup> || 8<sup>12</sup> 12<sup>46</sup>; 2<sup>26</sup> (Gentiles) || 10<sup>11</sup>, 14, 16; 5<sup>2</sup>, 4 || 21<sup>16</sup>, 17 (note τὰ ἀρτία μου). It has been already noticed that St. Peter's imagery differs from that of St. Paul (see above, p. 782). It may further be remarked that all his metaphors (except those of painting and working in metals) find parallels in the Lord's sayings. In estimating the force of the list of parallels given above, two points must be borne in mind: (1) We are not here dealing with a question of literary indebtedness. For us the sayings of Christ are preserved in the literature of the Greek Gospels. One who heard them uttered in the original Aramaic would reproduce them, when writing in Greek, in a form peculiar to himself. Hence verbal similarity to the Gospels is not a measure of real coincidence. (2) The Gospels do not give us an exhaustive collection of our Lord's sayings. Hence, in the case of a document which claims to be the work of an apostle, the Gospels are an imperfect criterion of indebtedness to the Lord's teaching. Yet, judging the influence of our Lord's sayings on the writer of 1 P by the admittedly imperfect standard of the written Gospels, it is not too much to say that his mind is saturated with the words of Christ, and that, in dealing with questions and circumstances very different from those which called forth the Lord's teaching, he instinctively turns to the substance and to the words of that teaching as bearing upon the actual needs of the present. St. Paul was certainly acquainted with the Lord's teaching (see, e.g., 1 Co 7<sup>10</sup>), whether in an oral or in some written form; but the whole literature of his Epistles supplies a list of coincidences with the Gospels fewer in number and far less close than this one Epistle. Apart from the Johannine Epistles, the only parallel in this respect to 1 P is the Epistle of James.

(5) The objection against the Petrine authorship of our Epistle on which recent critics have laid most stress is its affinity in doctrine, thought, and language with the Pauline Epistles. Jülicher (p. 133) brings out three points as to the relation of 1 P to the Pauline literature. (i.) There is nothing un-Pauline in it. (ii.) In regard to his conception of Christ, of the saving efficacy of His death, of faith and regeneration, the writer of 1 P breathes the Pauline spirit even as he uses the Pauline formulas (e.g. ἐν Χριστῷ 3<sup>16</sup> 5<sup>10</sup>, 14, ζωοποιεῖν 3<sup>18</sup>, ἀποκάλυψις and ἀποκαλύπτεσθαι six times, his favourite word ἀναστροφῆς). (iii.) There are many similarities between 1 P and the Pauline Epistles, especially Ro and Eph, which cannot be accidental; the ascription of Eph and 1 P to the same author is a proposition which has been seriously maintained.† This whole position has the approval of Harnack (Die Chronol. p. 451 ff.). But the words of the latter in maintaining it give expression to significant admissions. 'The author,' he writes (p. 452), 'is completely determined by the spirit of Pauline Christianity. But this determination is united with such independence and freedom in regard to religious thought and teaching within the limits of this Paulinism, that the assumption is an obvious one that Paul himself is the author of the document.' And again (p. 364 n.), 'Were it not for the dependence [of 1 P] on the Pauline Epistles, I might perhaps allow myself to maintain its genuineness: that dependence, however, is not accidental, but is of the essence of the Epistle.'

It will be best to clear the ground by indicating the affinities between 1 P and the Epistles of the NT.—(i.) Romans, (ii.) Ephesians, (iii.) other Pauline Epistles, (iv.) James. (i.) Romans, 1 P 1<sup>14</sup> || 12<sup>2</sup>; 1<sup>17</sup> || 2<sup>6</sup>, 11; 1<sup>20f</sup> || 16<sup>25f</sup>; 1<sup>21</sup> || 4<sup>24</sup>; 1<sup>22</sup> || 12<sup>9f</sup>; 2<sup>5</sup> || 12<sup>1</sup>; 2<sup>8</sup> || 9<sup>32f</sup>; 2<sup>13ff</sup> || 13<sup>1-7</sup>; 2<sup>24</sup> || 6<sup>2-11</sup>; 3<sup>5f</sup> || 12<sup>9-18</sup> (cf. 1 Th 5<sup>15</sup>); 3<sup>18</sup> || 6<sup>10</sup>; 3<sup>21</sup> || 6<sup>4</sup> (cf. Col 2<sup>12</sup>); 3<sup>22</sup> || 8<sup>34</sup>; 4<sup>1f</sup> || 6<sup>2-11</sup>; 4<sup>3</sup> || 12<sup>1f</sup>, 13<sup>12f</sup>; 4<sup>10f</sup> || 12<sup>3-8</sup>; 4<sup>13</sup> (cf. 5<sup>1</sup>) || 8<sup>17</sup>; 4<sup>17</sup> || 10<sup>16</sup>, 21 (Is 65<sup>2</sup>); 5<sup>1</sup> || 8<sup>18</sup>. (ii.) Ephesians, 1 P 1<sup>3</sup> || 1<sup>3</sup>; 1<sup>14</sup> || 2<sup>2f</sup>, 4<sup>22</sup>, 18; 2<sup>5</sup> || 2<sup>20f</sup>; 3<sup>8</sup> || 4<sup>32</sup>; 3<sup>9</sup> (εὐλογία) || 1<sup>8</sup>; 3<sup>15</sup> || 3<sup>17</sup>; 3<sup>18</sup> || 2<sup>18</sup> 3<sup>12</sup>; 3<sup>22</sup> || 1<sup>20f</sup> (cf. Ro 8<sup>24</sup>). (iii.) Other Pauline Epistles, 1 P 1<sup>2</sup> || 2 Th 2<sup>13</sup> (cf. 1 Th 4<sup>7</sup>); 1<sup>3</sup> 3<sup>21</sup> || Tit 3<sup>3</sup>; 1<sup>13</sup> || 2 Ti 4<sup>5</sup>; 1<sup>21f</sup> || the Pauline trilogy, e.g. 1 Co 13<sup>13</sup>; 2<sup>18</sup> || Gal 5<sup>13</sup> (different sense); 4<sup>5</sup> || 2 Ti 4<sup>1</sup> (but cf. Ac 10<sup>42</sup>); 4<sup>9</sup> || Ph 2<sup>14</sup>; 4<sup>13</sup> || 2 Co 1<sup>5</sup>, 7, Ph 3<sup>10</sup>; 5<sup>8</sup> || 1 Th 5<sup>6</sup>. Note also 2<sup>25</sup> 5<sup>2</sup> || Ac 20<sup>28</sup> (Pauline speech). (iv.) James, 1 P 1<sup>1</sup> || 1<sup>1</sup> (διασπορά); 1<sup>6f</sup> || 1<sup>2f</sup>, 12 (but see Mt 5<sup>11f</sup>); 1<sup>23</sup> || 1<sup>18</sup>; 2<sup>1</sup> || 1<sup>21</sup>; 2<sup>11</sup> || 4<sup>1</sup>; 5<sup>8</sup> || 4<sup>7</sup>, 10; 5<sup>9</sup> || 4<sup>7</sup>. It should further be noted that (a) a phrase from Pr 10<sup>12</sup> is introduced in 1 P 4<sup>8</sup> and apparently alluded to in Ja 5<sup>3</sup>, both Epistles using a rendering other than that of LXX; (b) Is 40<sup>8</sup> is alluded to in Ja 1<sup>10f</sup> and quoted in 1 P 1<sup>24</sup>; (c) Pr 3<sup>34</sup> is quoted in Ja 4<sup>6</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>5</sup>—both having ὁ θεός, LXX Κύριος.*

To take first the case of James, the coincidences in this Ep. with 1 Peter can hardly be accounted for on the ground of personal intercourse between the two writers. They seem to imply literary indebtedness. The relative dates of the two documents (apart from other considerations) supply a decisive argument that the borrowing is on the side of 1 P (see, e.g., Zahn, Einkl. i. p. 95). Mayor (p. exxiv) gives 40 as the earliest, 50 as the latest, year in which James can have been written. Zahn (Einkl. i. p. 92) gives 50 as its approximate date. The Epistle would therefore be well known among the Jewish Christians in the Syrian towns, and certainly among those in the Syrian Antioch, in the sixth decade A.D. (see above, note on p. 765). There are reasons for thinking that in this decade St. Peter was working in this district, and that he made Antioch his headquarters (p. 779). It is, then, a natural conclusion that St. Peter studied the Epistle of James soon after it was written, and that some 12 years later many of its graphic phrases were fresh in his memory. In any case, the fact that 1 P is influenced in thought and language by James is an important indication that the mind of the writer was one which received and retained such impressions.

The coincidences between 1 P and the Pauline Epp. other than Romans and Ephesians are not very close, and are to be accounted for as the outcome of a common evolution of Christian phrases and conceptions rather than as instances of direct borrowing. The most striking of them, ἐν ἀγαπῶν πνεύματος (2 Th 2<sup>13</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>2</sup>), would, in fact, naturally suggest itself when the practical meaning of the term πνεῦμα ἅγιον became realized in the Church.

The case of Romans is widely different. There is no doubt that the author of 1 P was acquainted with this Epistle. Nor is this surprising, if the writer is St. Peter. For as St. Paul was familiar with James, so Romans could hardly escape the notice of the Apostles of the Circumcision. Though addressed to a particular Church, it dealt with fundamental questions respecting both Judaistic Christianity and the relation of 'all Israel' to the gospel. It is not therefore an extravagant supposition that, giving as it did the apostle's mature views on matters about which he must on more than one occasion have conferred with them (cf. Gal 2<sup>2</sup>), he himself communicated it to the leaders of the Jewish Churches. At any rate it could hardly fail to become known, soon after it was written, at the Syrian Antioch, the great meeting-point of Jewish and Gentile Christianity in the East as Rome was in the West, and so to be brought under St. Peter's notice.

* The supposed coincidences between 1 P and (a) Hebrews (see, e.g., von Soden, Hand-Commentar iii. 2, p. 2), (b) Apocalypse (see Spitta, Apokal. p. 511 ff.) will be found in either case to be such as would naturally appear in independent Christian writers of the same period who were well acquainted with the LXX.

* Outside the Gospels, Rev 14<sup>4</sup> is the only passage in NT, except 1 P 2<sup>21</sup>, where 'to follow' is used in this connexion.

† This is the conclusion of Sieffert (Zeitschrift f. wissenschaftl. Theol. 1881, pp. 178 ff., 332 ff.).

In regard to the relation of Ephesians to 1 P the case is less simple. Critics of different schools agree in holding that 1 P is profoundly influenced by Ephesians. The nature of some of the coincidences noted above seems to put it beyond doubt that the writer of 1 P was familiar with the language of Ephesians. A list of coincidences, however, inadequately represents the indebtedness of 1 P to that Epistle. 'The connexion, though very close, does not lie on the surface. It is shown more by identities of thought and similarity in the structure of the two Epistles as wholes than by identities of phrase' (Hort p. 5). Salmon (Introd. pp. 443, 445), noting independently the same facts, suggests two interpretations of them. (a) 'We might conjecturally explain this difference by supposing the Epistle to the Romans to have been so long known to St. Peter that he had had time to become familiar with its language, while his acquaintance with the Ephesian Epistle was more recent.' (b) 'Peter may have arrived at Rome before Paul quitted it, in which case there would be a good deal of viva voce intercourse between the apostles, as there had been in former times. The doctrines taught by Paul in his Epistle to the Ephesians would also naturally be the subject of his discourses to the Christians at Rome; and these discourses may have been heard by Peter.' Looking only, however, at the broad facts of the case, we may say that, if Ephesians was written by St. Paul during his first captivity, and if St. Peter visited Rome not long afterwards, the acquaintance of the writer of 1 P with Ephesians need cause no difficulty on the supposition that that writer was St. Peter.

From the question of literary we pass to that of doctrinal indebtedness. The writer of 1 P, it is urged (see above), in his theology takes St. Paul as his master. There is nothing, it is added, un-Pauline in the Epistle. The inference drawn is that St. Peter cannot be the author of the Epistle. Two observations cover a large part of the ground occupied by such criticisms. (1) Behind the argument there lies the tacit assumption that the two apostles stood in regard to each other in a position analogous to that taken by the leaders of two factions—a progressive and a reactionary party—leaders who alike by essential differences of principle and by the necessities of party-strife are prevented from learning from each other. Such a view of the mutual relation of the apostles is, it is believed, wholly unsupported by the evidence of the NT and of early Christian literature. (2) The Epistles of St. Paul form for us so large a part of the apostolic literature of the first age, i.e. the period prior to the destruction of Jerusalem, that insensibly we assume that ideas and doctrines emphasized in these Epistles must be of Pauline origin. That St. Paul had a predominant share in the moulding of Christian theology, there can be no doubt. But a body of Christian doctrine was growing up apart from the immediate sphere of his influence. St. Paul must have been a recipient as well as a source of spiritual intuitions.

Estimating early writings by our imperfect criteria, we are probably in danger of exaggerating the Pauline element. Thus, to take as an example the crucial phrase ἐν Χριστῷ, which Jülicher regards as borrowed by St. Peter (3<sup>16</sup> 5<sup>10</sup>. 14) from the Pauline Epistles, there is no question that St. Paul dwelt upon the phrase and placed it in many different lights. But did he create it? The evidence points to a negative answer. For (a) the phrase is in fact the echo of OT phrases—'in God,' e.g., Ps 56<sup>4</sup> 60<sup>12</sup> 62<sup>7</sup>, 'in Jehovah,' e.g., Is 45<sup>17</sup>. 25, the Christian adaptation of these OT expressions being natural as the bearing of the Incarnation upon the doctrine of God was fully realized; (b) the idea is implied in Mt 18<sup>20</sup>, and less distinctly in such references to 'the name' of Christ as Mk 9<sup>37a</sup>; (c) the conception finds repeated and emphatic expression in St. John's record of our Lord's sayings (e.g. 6<sup>56</sup> 15<sup>46b</sup>); and if we accept these reports, which are clearly independent of Pauline influence, as in any degree historical, we can hardly doubt that the use of the phrase ἐν Χριστῷ must be traced back to Christ's own teaching. At any rate, an argument can hardly be founded on the assumption that the phrase was originated by St. Paul. On the other hand, the ideas expressed in 1 P 2<sup>24</sup> 4<sup>14</sup> may reasonably be considered to bear the stamp of an individual mind, and to have been learned from St. Paul's writings or from his spoken words. Further, when the doctrine of the Epistle comes to be examined, it will appear that it differs both negatively and positively from that of St. Paul's Epistles (cf. Hort p. 4).

To sum up: all that we learn of St. Peter from the NT gives us the picture of a man prompt and enthusiastic in action rather than fertile in ideas. His borrowing from St. James' Epistle shows that his mind was receptive and retentive of the thoughts of others. The Epistle undoubtedly owes much to St. Paul. But it is only when the Pauline element is isolated and exaggerated that it becomes a serious argument against the Petrine authorship of the Epistle.

Jülicher (p. 132) implies that, had not the name Peter been prefixed to the Epistle, no one would have supposed that St. Peter was the author. This position is so far true that, had the Epistle been anonymous, to assign the Epistle to St. Peter would have been an unverifiable hypothesis. We do not possess any document sufficiently authenticated as the work of St. Peter to be a standard by which the Petrine claims of such an Epistle could have been judged. The evidence of the speeches in the Acts, though worth consideration as confirmatory, is too indirect, and their date (assuming that they are substantially historical) too far removed from any date which can with any probability be given to the Epistle, for a reliable criterion to be supplied by them. But these considerations have a double application. If, on the one hand, they forbid the rash assertion that an anonymous document is Petrine, so, on the other hand, they are a warning against the hasty rejection of a document which bears St. Peter's name on the ground of its alleged un-Petrine character. The arguments urged to prove that 1 P is un-Petrine have been examined, and they have been shown to be unsubstantial, resting largely on unsupported presumptions. On the other hand, the serious difficulties involved in the hypothesis that the name Peter is a later addition have been pointed out, and it has been shown that the acceptance by the Church of the Epistle as the work of St. Peter was early in date, wide in extent, and unvarying.

But is the Petrine authorship to be accepted indeed, but accepted with certain qualifications? Zahn, following out the suggestions of earlier writers (Ewald, Grimm, Spitta), maintains (Einkl.

ii. pp. 10, 16) that, while the Epistle originally bore the name of Peter, the apostle entrusted the actual composition of it to Silvanus, as one peculiarly fitted, certainly more fitted than himself, to put his thoughts into such a form as would appeal to the Gentile Christians of Asia Minor, —one, moreover, who was known to many of the readers of the letter, and whom they would therefore credit with accurately reproducing for them St. Peter's ideas. The question turns on the interpretation of 5<sup>12</sup> διὰ Σιλβανου υμιν του πιστου αδελφου, ως λογιζομαι, δι' ολιγων εγραφα. The words του πιστου αδ., Zahn argues, imply that the part taken by Silvanus was a responsible one, and therefore cannot have been that of a mere amanuensis. He must therefore have been either a messenger who conveyed the letter, or a friend who put St. Peter's thoughts into the form of a letter. The former alternative, it is argued, is excluded, because in that case the commendation would have been meaningless—painfully useless, if Silvanus proved untrue and the Epistle never came into the hands of its intended recipients; superfluous, if he delivered the letter to them. Against this theory the following considerations together seem decisive:— (1) If Silvanus were the real writer of the Epistle, especially if he is to be identified (see below) with the Silas of the Acts and the Silvanus of St. Paul's Epistles to the Thessalonians and Corinthians (2 Co), we should expect some salutation from him to his readers. In Ro 16<sup>22</sup> Tertius, who was simply the scribe, sends a greeting in the first person (ασπαζομαι υμας εγω Τερτιος ο γραψας την επιστολην εν κυριω). (2) Such a divided authorship—the main ideas being supplied by one man, their manipulation and expression being the work of another—could not result in a letter so natural and so easy in its passage from thought to thought, the transition to a fresh and important idea (e.g. 1<sup>10</sup>) being sometimes due to an incidental phrase. (3) The tone of authority in 5<sup>1</sup>, where the address is strictly personal, is explicable only on a theory either of deliberate personation or of real apostolic authorship. (4) The language of 5<sup>12</sup> is absolutely natural if Silvanus was, what his position in the early Church (see below) fitted him to be, an apostolic delegate, who could, out of his own knowledge, speak of all personal matters and of the progress of the Church in Rome, and whose experience and special gifts (Ac 15<sup>22</sup>) qualified him to give direction and instruction in questions of faith and of conduct. Compare especially Ac 15<sup>27</sup>, Col 4<sup>7a</sup>, Eph 6<sup>21c</sup>. The language in the context confirms this view: (a) the order of the words διὰ Σ. υμιν του π. αδ. is remarkable, and seems designed to picture St. Peter's messenger and his friends face to face; (b) δι' ολιγων εγραφα implies that the apostle's written words were few, because he knew that they would be enforced and supplemented by the living voice of Silvanus.

For διὰ of the bearer of a letter compare διὰ βιβλαφορον, Est 3<sup>13</sup> 8<sup>10</sup>; the subscriptions added in many MSS to the Pauline Epistles, e.g. Romans—εγραψη απο Κορινθου δια Φοιβης, curs<sup>pl</sup>; επιμειθη δι δια Φοιβης, 133; the 'verso' of a letter in the Berlin Papyr. 385—αποδος Σακρατη Σιωα απο Σερνιλλα θυγατρὸς δια Σαρακαμεινος αδελφου αυτης. Further, γραφειν (γραψαι) δια τινος is used in reference to the bearer. In Ac 15<sup>22</sup> the determination of the Church at Jerusalem to send delegates to Antioch is mentioned, in v. 23 the additional fact that the delegates conveyed a letter. To the phrase in v. 23 (γραφαντες δια χειρος αυτων) there corresponds the phrase in v. 30 επιδικαν την επιστολην. So Polyc. ad Phil. xiv. 'Hæc vobis scriptis per Crescentem, quem in præsentî commendaui vobis et nunc commendo.' Three passages in the Ignatian Epistles are, at first sight, ambiguous, and may refer either to the scribes or to the bearers of the letters. (a) From Smyrna Ignatius wrote to three Churches near at hand (Ephesus, Magnesia, Tralles) and to the distant Church of Rome. In ch. 10 of the Epistle to the last named Church he says, γραφω δι υμιν ταυτα απο Σιμωνος δι' Επιστων των εβοιμακιστων. Several reasons make it probable that the Ephesians were the bearers and not the amanuenses of the letter—(1) The plural: it would be natural to dictate a short letter to one person; (2) the context: after a parenthetical sentence Ign. continues: περι των προελθοντων με απο Συρίας εις Ρωμην, the probability being that the mention of those who had gone before him from Syria to Rome is suggested by the mention of those who are even now going before him from Smyrna to Rome; (3) the sequel: at the next stage of the journey (Troas) only one of the Ephesians was still with Ignatius, viz. Burrhus. (b) From Troas Ignatius writes to the Philadelphians, the Smyrnæans, and to Polycarp. In the closing salutations of the two former Epistles the words occur—εν Τρωαδι: υθεν και γραφω υμιν δια Βουρρου. Here the context gives no help towards the interpretation of δια. But other considerations seem decisive. If δια points to the scribe, then there seems to be no reason why the amanuensis should be mentioned in three letters (Rom., Philad., Smyr.), but passed over in silence in the remaining four letters. If, however, in each case δια designates the bearer, then the facts admit of an easy explanation. There would be no need to mention the messenger in the case of the letter to Polycarp; for the same person would be in charge of it who was entrusted with the letter to the Smyrnæans. Again, the distance from Smyrna to Ephesus, Magnesia, and Tralles was small, and there must have been constant means of communication, of which Ignatius would naturally avail himself. In the case of all the letters which had to travel far, the name of the bearer (or bearers) is consistently given. Further, the elaborate care bestowed by Ignatius (Smyr. xi., Polyc. vii. f.) and by Polycarp (ad Phil. xiii.) on the appointment of delegates to the Church of Syria, and the conveyance of letters by their means, is important as confirming the interpretation of the Ignatian phrase γραφειν δια τινος given above, and also as illustrating the employment in apostolic and sub-apostolic times of men of recognized position in communications between Churches.

VI. THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF COMPOSITION.—The restoration of a history must be conjectural. The test of probability in such a case is the extent to which the scheme as a whole offers a natural explanation of the details which have a claim to be taken into account. In the preceding art. it was pointed out that a good deal of indirect evidence points to the supposition that St. Paul during his imprisonment himself summoned St. Peter to Rome, chiefly in order that the sight of the two apostles—the one commonly regarded as the Apostle of the Gentiles, the other as the Apostle of the Circumcision—planning and working together might bring home to the Roman Christians the great lesson of unity. St. Peter, we may suppose, arrived in Rome shortly before St. Paul's release. St. Paul had not very long before written the Epistle to the Ephesians, setting forth in it his mature views on fundamental questions, many of which could not but engage St. Peter's attention in Rome. It would therefore be almost inevitable that St. Peter should study, or, if he had read it before, should study afresh, that Epistle. Moreover—what is of more importance—he would be brought into close and unrestrained intercourse with the mind of the writer. Such intercourse might well recall to his memory the thoughts and words of the Epistle to the Romans, and perhaps suggest its re-perusal. It makes no great demand on the imagination to see how an Epistle written by St. Peter under such circumstances would be full of Pauline thought and Pauline language, and, in particular, would be likely not seldom to echo the words of the Epistles to the Romans and to the Ephesians.

Is it possible to arrive at any probable conclusion as to the point of time when the Epistle was written? (1.) The language of that important section of the Epistle which deals with obedience to the civil power (2<sup>13-17</sup>), gains greatly in point and reality if it was used in view of St. Paul's appeal to the emperor having recently issued in his acquittal. It would be natural for one writing at such a time to recall what St. Paul had himself said on this subject (Ro 13<sup>1a</sup>), and, while using his expressions, to sharpen them and give them greater definiteness. Then it might well seem that 'the praise of them that do well' was an end of the magistrate's functions. If the decision of the Imperial Court had lately frustrated the endeavour of the Jews to secure the condemnation of the apostle of the true Messiah, the event would appear as a revelation of 'the will of God' in respect to His use of the power of the civil magistrate—ἀγαθοποιούστας φημὸν τὴν τῶν ἀφρόνων ἀνθρώπων ἀγνώσιαν. (ii.) Critics from many points of view have laid stress on the absence in the Epistle of any reference to St. Paul. It is one of the problems of the Epistle. But does not the difficulty vanish at once if we suppose that St. Peter wrote while St. Paul was still in Rome, and that Silvanus was undertaking as St. Paul's messenger a journey to the Churches of Asia Minor? In that case it would have been unnatural for the Epistle to convey a message from St. Paul; while news about St. Paul would be needless, since Silvanus would himself explain the position of affairs at Rome.

It is commonly taken for granted that the Silvanus of 1 P is the same person as the Silas of Acts and the Silvanus of St. Paul's Epistles. This is an assumption, though a highly probable one. Four persons bearing the name in the shortened form (Silas) meet us in the pages of Josephus. The name Silvanus is found in the form Σιλβανός in CIG 1816, 7256, in the form Σιλουανός in CIG 4039, 4071. The name, then, is not so common as to make it very likely that more than one Silvanus was closely connected with the apostles. And, further, what we know of the Silvanus of the earlier apostolic history corresponds so strikingly with the facts and probabilities involved in the mention of Silvanus in 1 P, that the identification is advanced many stages of probability. The points important for our present purpose are as follows. Silvanus appears suddenly at the time of the 'Council' at Jerusalem as an ἀνὴρ ἠρώμενος ἐν τοῖς ἀδελφοῖς (Ac 15:22). He is chosen by the Church at Jerusalem to undertake a mission of extreme delicacy as delegate to the Church of Antioch. There his prophetic gifts made a deep impression. After a time he returned to Jerusalem. That he had left Antioch before the painful controversy alluded to in Gal 2, and that he was not therefore one of οἱ λαοὶ Ἰουδαῖοι who proved faithless to St. Paul's teaching, seems clear from the fact that St. Paul deliberately selected him as his companion after the rupture with Barnabas and Mark (see art. MARK). As St. Paul's companion, he visited Derbe, Lystra, and Iconium. With him he traversed τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν γῆρας, and, having shared his journey along the borders of Mysia, with him entered Europe. When St. Paul was constrained by 'the brethren' to hasten from Berea, he left behind him Silas and Timothy—Silas, doubtless, as his representative, and Timothy as Silas' companion and assistant—to carry out the important work of building up the recently planted Church. When the apostle arrived at Athens, he seems to have felt keenly the need of the support of Silas' and Timothy's presence (Ac 17:15). It seems probable that Timothy joined St. Paul at Athens, and was sent back by him thence to Thessalonica (1 Th 3), and that Silas remained in Macedonia and continued the work in other cities besides Berea, till he at length, with Timothy, left Macedonia, and met St. Paul at Corinth (Ac 18:5). It is important to notice that, whatever the exact details of the history may have been, Silas was entrusted by St. Paul with the task of developing his own initial work in the Churches of Macedonia, to which the apostle himself, as time went on, became bound with unusually strong and tender ties of affection. After his arrival at Corinth, Silvanus disappears from the narrative of the Acts (cf. 2 Co 11:9). Some ten years elapse, and we find a Silvanus at Rome, probably, as we have seen, while St. Paul was still in the city. (a) It would have been very natural for St. Paul's old companion to join him at Rome, where others among the apostle's former fellow-workers had gathered round him (Col 4:7-14, Philem 23f.). St. Paul clearly had special need of the sympathy and faithful co-operation of 'those who were of the circumcision' (Col 4:11). (b) On the other hand, the fact that Silvanus is not mentioned in any of the Epistles of the Captivity, and that he appears in the city, apparently not long after the last of these was written, in connexion with St. Peter, suggests the probability that he came to Rome with St. Peter. Silvanus was in early days closely connected with the Churches of Jerusalem and Antioch (Ac 15:22, 32, 33), and it may well be that after he ceased to travel with St. Paul he resumed work in Syria. St. Peter, as we saw, probably came to Rome from Syria, possibly from Antioch. The two men may thus have been much thrown together in later as in earlier years. If St. Peter was summoned to Rome by St. Paul himself with the express purpose of deepening the unity of the Church, he would naturally choose as the companion of his journey to the capital one of St. Paul's old associates. For such a mission Silvanus was peculiarly fitted. He was a Jewish Christian who had long possessed the confidence of the leaders of the Church at Jerusalem (Ac 15:22f.). He had been closely associated with St. Paul. He was a Roman citizen (Ac 16:37). St. Paul was in the habit of sending his most trusted friends as his delegates to distant places to consolidate or to extend his work. It would be very natural that he should send Silvanus on such a mission to districts in some of which were Churches in planting which they had worked together, while in others were Christian communities which must have been to some extent the indirect outcome of their common work. On the assumption, then, that we have to deal with only one Silvanus in the apostolic history, we are able to weave the probabilities into a natural and consistent narrative; and, so far as is possible in such cases, the assumption is justified.

But why does St. Peter seize the opportunity of Silvanus' journey to write an Epistle to the Churches of Asia Minor? There is no indication that he had any personal knowledge of his readers in any of the districts to which he writes. It does not appear that he wished to bring before them and the Church generally any characteristic convictions of his as to the interpretation of the Christian faith, as St. Paul desired to do in the Epistles to the Romans and to the 'Ephesians.' No controversy is touched upon by him. The Epistle bears no trace of having been called forth by the difficulties or needs of any particular Church. Is not the motive which led St. Peter to write a letter to the Christians scattered over the vast districts of Asia Minor the same which we saw reason for thinking brought him to Rome? It is plain that if Silvanus, who long before had been known to some of these Churches as a companion of St. Paul, and who now was travelling as St. Paul's delegate, brought with him a letter from St. Peter, the effect on the minds of the Asiatic Christians would be only less powerful than that produced on the Roman Christians by the sight of the two apostles working and planning together in the Capital. The fact that the letter was written and received under such circumstances, would be the strongest enforcement of the lesson of the Church's unity. The Epistle may even have been written at St. Paul's request. But however that may be, the motive suggested seems adequate and simple. It harmonizes with the phenomena of the Epistle, and indeed throws fresh light on some of them. Thus it is no longer surprising that there is no great thought or purpose, doctrinal or personal, which dominates the whole Epistle. Its scope is truly summed up in the very general words — ἐγγραφα παρακαλῶν καὶ ἐπιμαρτυρῶν ταύτην εἶναι ἀληθῆ χάριν τοῦ θεοῦ (5<sup>12</sup>). Again, the Pauline tone of the Epistle is seen to correspond with all the circumstances of its composition. If these were what we have found reason to think them to have been, the letter could not but be Pauline. Once more, have we not here a final explanation of the fact that, though the mind of St. Peter constantly recurs to the words of Christ, he makes only indirect allusions to the privilege which he once had of watching the life of the Incarnate Lord? To have dwelt on this would have been to appear to disparage the apostolate of St. Paul.

To sum up: all the conditions of the problem seem to be satisfied if we assign the Epistle to a time shortly after St. Paul's trial had ended in his acquittal. The power of the Roman State seemed to be on the side of the Church. But the hatred of the Jews was an enemy 'scotched, not killed,' nay, perhaps it was intensified because deprived of its expected prey. Nor would the social trials of the Christians among their heathen neighbours be lessened by the Imperial decision. The daily experience of a Christian at Rome might well suggest serious warnings as to the proving of faith through suffering. The situation was as follows. St. Paul had himself summoned St. Peter to Rome, with the supreme object of showing to the Christians at Rome and to 'the brotherhood in the world' the unity of the Body and of the Spirit. St. Peter had arrived in Rome, and with him St. Paul's old companion Silvanus. After St. Paul's release Silvanus consents to become his delegate, as he had been years before, and on his behalf to undertake a long journey in Asia Minor. Silvanus would explain to these Churches the situation at Rome. He would enforce the spiritual and doctrinal lessons which were uppermost in St. Paul's mind. But the work of consolidating the Churches, and in them the Church, would be greatly advanced if Silvanus, the messenger of St. Paul, brought with him a letter from St. Peter. The letter itself might deal with general topics, as indeed was inevitable when it was addressed to readers spread over so vast an area. But the fact that it was written by St. Peter, now a fellow-worker with St. Paul at Rome, and transmitted by the common friend of both apostles, now executing St. Paul's commission, was itself the revelation of the mind of the apostles, and a call to deepen the common life of 'the brotherhood,' the significance of which cannot be exaggerated.

It is right to notice two other recent reconstructions of the apostolic history in connexion with the composition of 1 P. The points in which they are open to criticism have been sufficiently indicated in the preceding sections and in art. PETER. (1) Zahn's theory (Evl. ii. p. 13 f.) is as follows:—It is almost impossible to explain the silence of the Epistle as to St. Paul if St. Peter wrote either at a time when the two apostles were together in Rome or after St. Paul's death. It is probable that Mark went from Rome to Asia Minor (Col 410) in the autumn of 62, or early in 63, and afterwards visited Jerusalem. From him St. Peter learned the difficulties which the Jewish Christian teachers had created for St. Paul, and also the intention of the latter after his expected release to undertake a journey to the far West. St. Peter felt these tidings to be a call to himself to visit Rome. Such a visit was no violation of the compact recorded in Gal 29, since the Roman Church had not been founded by St. Paul, and was composed of Jewish Christians, many of whom were Palestinian Jews. St. Peter arrived in Rome in the autumn of 63 or early in 64. St. Paul had already left the city. Since the duration of St. Paul's missionary journey to Spain could not be foreseen, it was natural that St. Peter should tread in St. Paul's footsteps in other ways, and in particular in caring for the Churches of Asia. The fact that Silvanus assisted him in writing the Epistle, enabled him to strike a note in the letter which would find an echo in the hearts of men who directly or indirectly owed their Christianity to St. Paul. As nothing in the Epistle implies that he had recently arrived in Rome, and as his correspondents appear to be already aware of the fact that he was in the city, St. Peter probably wrote the Epistle in the course of the year 64, a few months before his martyrdom. (2) Swete (St. Mark p. xvii f.) follows Lightfoot in dissociating the martyrdom of St. Peter from that of St. Paul, but argues that 'it is open to consideration whether St. Paul's was not the earlier.' He thinks that 'an examination of 1 Peter supplies more than one reason for believing the Epistle to have been written subsequently to St. Paul's death.' Over and above the references to persecution which, he thinks, point to 70-75 as the limit of date, he notices that the letter is addressed to Christian communities some of which were Pauline Churches; that its bearer is 'a well-known colleague of St. Paul'; that it contains reminiscences of two of St. Paul's writings (Eph. Ro). 'The conclusion can scarcely be avoided that at the time when it was written St. Paul had finished his course. The care of the Churches had devolved on St. Peter; the two oldest associates of St. Paul had transferred their services to the surviving Apostle; both had originally been members of the Church at Jerusalem, and, when the attraction of the stronger personality had been withdrawn, both had returned to their earlier leader. St. Peter on his part is careful to show by the character of his letter and by his selection of colleagues that he has no other end than to take up and carry on the work of St. Paul.'

It remains to notice the evidence supplied by the Epistle as to the intended journey of Silvanus. On the questions suggested by 1 P 1<sup>1</sup> see especially Hort's dissertation, 'The Provinces of Asia Minor included in St. Peter's address' (1 Peter pp. 157-184; cf. p. 17). Hort shows that (1) the position of Asia neither first nor last in the list, (2) the fact 'that Pontus and Bithynia stand at opposite ends of the list, though they together formed but a single province, the title of which combined both names,' indicate that in that list we have presented the projected course of the journey. Silvanus 'was to enter Asia Minor by a seaport of Pontus, and thence to make a circuit till [he] reached the neighbourhood of the Euxine once more.' Why he purposed to land in Pontus it is vain to conjecture. The condition of the Christian communities, or some special call to evangelistic work in that district or in the districts to which he would thus best gain access, may have been the determining motive. It is probable that Silvanus was to land at Sinope, the most important of the towns on the seaboard of Pontus. Thence he would visit the northern portion of the vast province of Galatia, probably making its capital Ancyra his headquarters. At Ancyra he would find more than one road by which he could reach Caesarea, the one town of considerable importance in Cappadocia. Taking at this point the great road running westward to Ephesus, he would be able to visit the Churches in South Galatia, and so to enter the province of Asia. Northwards there lay Christian communities through which he would pass on his way to Bithynia, where it seems to have been the intention that he should again take ship. 'In thus following by natural and simple routes the order of provinces which stands in the first sentence of the Epistle, Silvanus would be brought into contact with every considerable district north of the Taurus in which there is reason to suppose that Christian communities would be found' (Hort p. 184).

I. 1<sup>1</sup>-2<sup>10</sup>. The privileges belonging to the redeemed family of God.—(1) 1<sup>1</sup>f. Salutation. (2) 1<sup>3</sup>-12. The joy of salvation. (a) Vv. 3-5. Benediction of the Father for the new birth and the heavenly inheritance. (b) Vv. 6-9. This joy in Christ is maintained by you in the midst of present sorrows, the issue of which will be seen at 'the revelation of Jesus Christ.' Faith in an unseen Lord is the spring whence comes this joy of σωτηρία. (c) Vv. 10-12. This σωτηρία was the subject of the prophets' search, as they foretold the facts which evangelists proclaimed to you, and which angels desire to discern. (3) 12-20. The fruits of this σωτηρία in life. (a) Vv. 13-21. Seriousness. Such being your position, do you, with minds alert and passions in control, set your hope on the Divine grace ever supplied to you, as Jesus Christ is gradually revealed to you. Not your sinful past, but the holiness of God must be the standard of your life. You must be solemnized by (α) the remembrance that your 'Father in heaven' is a strict Judge; (β) the thought of the greatness of the price paid for your redemption from an inheritance of vanity. (b) Vv. 22-25. Love towards the members of the spiritual family. The self-purification involved in redemption leads on to the cultivation of love towards the members of the spiritual family—genuine, deep, active. This is a duty which flows from the fact of ἀνασινωσις. (c) 21<sup>f</sup>. Growth. If (on the negative side) you have stripped off from yourselves malice and such unchildlike vices, you must (on the positive side) surrender yourselves to your true spiritual instincts and live by the spiritual milk, the spiritual sustenance which is the direct gift of God. So you will grow up unto σωτηρία. (d) 24-10. Privilege. Christ is the living stone, rejected by the act of men but in God's sight ἱερός. He is the foundation on which you are being built up as a spiritual house for spiritual acts of worship. This view of Christ (i.e. as the foundation stone) finds expression in the very letter of Scripture (Is 28<sup>16</sup>). It has a double aspect. On the one hand, it is for you who believe that He is ἱερός. On the other hand, for those who disbelieve, the Psalmist's words about the stone of stumbling are true, their very stumbling being within the limits of the Divine purpose. But you are the true Israel, with all the privileges of the λαός θεός.

II. 2<sup>11</sup>-4<sup>11</sup>. The brotherhood which is in the world, and its duties.—(1) 2<sup>11</sup>f. General introductory counsels. Be like mere sojourners in the world. Let the moral beauty of your conduct make your very detractors watch you, so that in the day of decision they may glorify God. (2) 2<sup>13</sup>-3<sup>12</sup>. Duty of submission to every Divine institution among men. (a) 2<sup>14</sup>-17. Subjects and civil magistrates. For Christian freedom must not be a cloak for (social or political) disaffection. 'Honour the king' is one practical application of the universal rule 'Honour all men.' (b) 2<sup>18</sup>-25. Slaves and masters. Obey even unreasonable masters. He who does right and patiently suffers wrong, pleases God. To nothing less than this were you called. For Christ suffered for us; and in all His sufferings left us the pattern-sketch of a life of sinless endurance and constant trust. (c) 3<sup>1</sup>-6. Wives and husbands. To watch the wife's serious and pure life may win the husband who has been deaf to the spoken message. Her adornment must be within—a spirit placid in itself, gentle towards others. Such is the example of the wives of ancient story. (d) 3<sup>7</sup>. Husbands. Husbands have a corresponding duty—to pay their wives the reverence due to their weakness. Those who share an earthly home (συνακοιῦντες) must behave to each other as those who share (συνκληρονόμοι) the heavenly inheritance. (2) 38-42. A summary of mutual duties (cf. 55). In a word, let kindness rule. Do not return evil for evil, but bless your revilers; for the inheritance of blessing is the end of the Christian calling (Ps 34:12-16). (f) 318-22. Suffering and its reward. I spoke of evil. Who shall do you evil, if you be champions of good? But even should you suffer for righteousness' sake, you are happy. Do not fear, but make your hearts a sanctuary for the Christ. Towards others, be always ready to explain and defend your faith to any questioner. In yourselves, maintain a good conscience, that your conduct may shame your detractors. For, should this be God's will, it is better that you, like Christ, should suffer for well-doing than for evil-doing. For Christ once for all, i.e. dealing decisively with sins, died, the just on behalf of the unjust, that He might bring you (then afar off) to God. But these sufferings had (as yours will have) their issue in blessing. (i) On the one hand, His being put to death in regard to His flesh was His quickening in regard to His (human) spirit. Clothed in that human spirit He extended (εξεί) His sphere of ministry. He journeyed and made proclamation to the spirits in prison, spirits who slighted God's long-suffering in the days when the ark was being built. In the ark only eight souls were saved, the water (which to others was the instrument of judgment) bearing up the ark and so becoming an instrument of σωτηρίας. The reality, of which the water of the Flood was a type, even baptism, saves (σώζει) you; not the external cleansing of the flesh, but the inquiry of a good conscience after God,* the final source of its efficacy being the resurrection of Jesus Christ. (ii) The patient suffering of Christ had a second issue—His triumph. He journeyed (as before into Hades 319, so now) into heaven and is at God's right hand, the victorious sovereign over all spiritual powers. (g) 41-8. The ideal of Christian life. Christ then suffered in relation to the flesh. Hence the true conception of life. Let it be your armour. To have suffered in regard to the flesh means to have ceased to exist in regard to sins. Realize your spiritual position by living no longer by the rule of the manifold lusts of men, but by the one will of God. It is enough to have given the past to the heathen vices of debauchery, drunkenness, idolatry. The heathen wonder that you hold aloof from their vile riot, and traduce your motives. But the injustice is not for ever. They will have to give an account to Him with whom the judgment of living and dead is 'as a very little thing' (τριβύλιον). Such judgment of the dead is just. For the proclamation of the gospel to the dead had this for its object, that, while the dead must be judged after the pattern of men in reference to the flesh (the earthly life), they may nevertheless be enabled to live after the pattern of God (cf. 115) in reference to the spirit. (h) 47-11. Christian life in view of the approaching end. The end of all things is near. Therefore be serious and devout. Most of all, cultivate mutual love. Let each man use his peculiar endowment for the good of the whole body—his gift of utterance, relying on Divine inspiration; his gift of ministry, resting on Divine strength. So God will be glorified.

III. 412-514. The trials of the brethren.—(1) 412-19. Trust in the midst of suffering. Let not God's process of testing and refining you seem to you strange, as if some strange chance were befalling you. Rather rejoice at your participation in the sufferings of the Christ, that when His glory is revealed your joy may be intensified. To bear Christ's reproach is an outward sign of a spiritual grace resting on you. I say Christ's reproach, for I would not have any of you suffer for any criminal act or for any social indiscretion. But to suffer as a Christian is a reason not for shame but for thanksgiving. You must expect suffering. For the set time has come for the judgment to begin with God's household. What, then, shall be the end of those who wilfully reject the gospel? Hence let those who have even to suffer in fulfilment of the Divine purpose do right and commend themselves to a Creator who will not 'forsake the work of his own hands.' (2) 51-5. Pastors and people. I who share their office (and so can sympathize with them), and am a witness to the sufferings of the Christ (and so speak with authority), charge your elders to shepherd God's flock, not in the spirit of slaves or hirelings or tyrants. Then when the Chief Shepherd is manifested they will have their reward. You younger men have a corresponding duty, to be subject to elders. All of you—your duty is humility and mutual service. (3) 56-11. Final counsels. Humble yourselves under God's dealings that He may exalt you. Cast your anxiety on Him, knowing His providential care for you. Watch; for the devil ravins for you as a prey. Firm through your faith resist him, conscious that for your brethren throughout the world the same sufferings are being fulfilled. God who called you, He, after your brief space of suffering, will strengthen you. (4) 512-14. Commendation of the bearer of the letter. Salutations.

VIII. DOCTRINE OF THE EPISTLE.—In this section an attempt will be made to indicate in outline the doctrinal teaching contained in the Epistle. The letter is a λόγος παρακλήσεως, and contains no systematic exposition of any part of the Christian faith. But in the mind of the writer there is a consistent and comprehensive theology which finds incidental and instinctive expression.

The Petrine speeches in the Acts were called forth by special circumstances, and (except the speeches recorded in Ac 10:30-43 15:7-11) were all addressed to non-Christian Jews at Jerusalem. We have no right, therefore, to look to them for the full cycle of Christian doctrine which even 'in the beginning of the Gospel' St. Peter had apprehended. The following coincidences, however, between 1 P and the Petrine speeches recorded in the Acts are noteworthy:—1 P 110 (προφήται) || Ac 3:18. 21. 24 10:43, cf. 21:6ff. 25:ff. 32:2. 26. || 111. 21 || 224. 32f. 318ff. 410 530f. 1040; 121 || 316; 27 || 411 (Ps); 224 (ἐλπίς) || 530 1039; 45 || 1042 (see also 2 Ti 41); 51 || 122 232 315 1039. 41. Of these coincidences, the parallel between 1 P 121 (τοῖς δι' αὐτοῦ πιστοῖς) and Ac 3:16 (ἡ πίστις ἣ δι' αὐτοῦ) is very remarkable. It is the kind of coincidence which suggests direct connexion of some kind. Mere literary dependence on the one side or the other is not supported by coincidences between 1 P and portions of the Acts other than the Petrine speeches. The suggestion made on other grounds (see above, p. 782 n.), that St. Peter and St. Luke may well have met in Rome, should in this connexion be kept in mind.

(1) The doctrine of God.—(a) The Holy Trinity.—As elsewhere in the NT (2 Th 2:13, 1 Co 12:4ff., 2 Co 13:14, Eph 3:14ff. 4:3ff., Jude 20f., cf. Rev 1:4), the Three Persons are revealed in their several relations to the complete redemption of man (12). The fact that the Three Names are not given in the order of historical manifestation is an indication that the Persons are regarded as 'coequal' (cf. 2 Co 13:14). The mystery of the essential relation of the Three Persons is not otherwise touched upon. In regard to their relation κατ' οἰκονομίαν, the Father is spoken of as 'the God and Father' of the incarnate Lord ('Jesus Christ,' 13), and as the object of His un-failing trust in the extremity of humiliation (223), while the temporal mission of the Spirit is referred to (112). (b) The Father. The unique phrase πιστὸς κριότης (419) implies that the relation of God to man as Creator is the final basis of trust (cf. Mt 6:25ff., He 12:9). The spiritual Fatherhood of God, i.e. the regeneration of men through the revelation in Christ and the Divine act of the resurrection, is a root-thought in the Epistle (13. 23), and from it springs the social teaching as to φιλαδελφία. (c) The Son. Is the pre-existence of Christ asserted or postulated in the Epistle? In the phrase τὸ ἐν αὐτοῖς [sc. τοῖς προφήταις] πνεῦμα Χριστοῦ (114), the reference in Χριστοῦ is not primarily personal; the word rather alludes to the conception of the Messiah progressively revealed and apprehended (see Hort's note). Again, in 120 φανερωθέντος is placed in antithesis to προεγνωσμένου, and therefore does not necessarily imply personal pre-existence. The words, however, in 318ff. appear to be decisive. The personality of Him whose actions are described resided neither in the σάρξ (cf. 41) nor in the πνεῦμα. Clothed in that human spirit (ἐν ᾧ), when the flesh had been laid aside in death, He carried out His ministry among the dead. Thus the passage distinctly implies that He who worked on earth and in Hades was a superhuman Person, assuming all the elements of human nature, and therefore existing before the beginning of the human life. (d) The Spirit. The Spirit is mentioned in 12. 11f. 414. In 414 the words, an echo of Is 12, are a Christian adaptation of the thought and language of the OT. The Spirit of God which rested on Messiah is the portion of those also who suffer for Messiah's sake. The earlier passage (11) is, as was seen above, closely connected with the ancient Messianic hope. 'The Spirit of Messiah' was 'in the Prophets.' But the mention of the Spirit in v. 11 cannot be disconnected from the mention of the Spirit in v. 12. The Spirit was the power through which the witness of the ancient prophets and the witness of Christian evangelists were rendered. Thus the two verses together emphasize the continuity of revelation (cf. the 'Constantinopolitan' Creed). For in v. 12 (διὰ τῶν εὐαγγ. ὑμᾶς πνεύματι ἀγίῳ ἀποσταλέντι ἀπ' οὐρανοῦ) the reference is definite, not to a but to the Holy Spirit. The absence of the article simply brings out the character of the power—'through no less a power than the Holy Spirit'; compare, e.g., Ro 8<sup>14-16</sup> and the anarthrous but definite use of θεός, Χριστός, κύριος, υἱός (He 1<sup>2</sup>). The addition of ἀποστ. ἀπ' οὐρανοῦ can hardly be taken otherwise than as an allusion to the historical gift of the Spirit at Pentecost.

(2) Redemption.—Everything in regard both to the Redeemer (1<sup>20</sup>, cf. Ac 2<sup>23</sup>) and the redeemed (1<sup>14</sup>) is conditioned by the πρόγνωσις of the Father. Even disobedience to the gospel does not lie outside the sphere of His purpose (2<sup>8</sup>). The preparation is dwelt on in 1<sup>10-12</sup>. The prophetic witness was twofold—(a) to the sufferings destined for Messiah (εἰς Χρ.) and the different elements in His subsequent glory; (b) to the Divine grace destined for the Gentiles (εἰς ὑμᾶς, cf. Ac 10<sup>43</sup>). It should be noted that in this Epistle there is no allusion to the Law either in its ceremonial or in its moral aspect, nor again (except the passing reference to the 'holy women,' 3<sup>24</sup>) to the ancient story of Israel; contrast St. Paul's Epistles. The Divine Person took human nature in its completeness—σὰρξ and πνεῦμα (3<sup>18</sup>); in 2<sup>24</sup> the Lord's σῶμα is spoken of, but St. Peter has no occasion to refer to the Lord's ψυχή, in St. Paul's psychology the σῶμα and the ψυχή together making up the σὰρξ. Christ was sinless (2<sup>22</sup>), the language being derived from Is 53<sup>9</sup>; cf. 1<sup>19</sup>). He endured the last issue of the life of sinful man in the separation of 'flesh' and 'spirit,' and 'in His spirit' passed into the unseen world of waiting human spirits (3<sup>19</sup>, cf. Ac 2<sup>27-31</sup>). His death is presented in a twofold aspect. On the one hand, it consummated the example of the typical human life (2<sup>21</sup>). On the other hand, in His death He met the needs of sinful men. He 'died' to help them—δικαίως ὑπὲρ ἀδίκων (3<sup>18</sup>). And His help to them consisted in this, that He finally and effectually dealt with sins (ἅπασι περὶ ἁμαρτιῶν, 3<sup>19</sup>). The mode in which He dealt with sins is developed in 2<sup>24</sup>. Adopting the language of Is 53<sup>12</sup>, the apostle says that the Sinless One 'took our sins' (not sin as a principle, but the concrete sins of men) to Himself, i.e. by virtue of His representative humanity. His human 'body' was, as it were, the vessel in which the sins of men were gathered (ἐν τῷ σώματι αὐτοῦ) and borne to the last extreme of humiliation—the ξύλον involving to the mind of Jews the Divine curse (Dt 21<sup>22</sup>). By His death (so the context implies) His relation to the flesh and to sins finally ended (2<sup>24</sup> 4<sup>1</sup>, cf. Ro 6<sup>10</sup>), so that the true life of humanity is henceforth ideally set free from the dominion of sin. This freedom the redeemed have to work out in their several lives. In 1<sup>18</sup> a different line of thought is followed. Gentiles (for it is to Gentile Christians that the Epistle is addressed, see above) were ransomed (ἐλυτρώθητε—the word is taken from Is 52<sup>9</sup>; cf. especially Mt 20<sup>28</sup>, 1 Ti 2<sup>6</sup>) from bondage to an inheritance of vanity, and the ransom was no less a price than the 'precious blood' (cf. Ps 72<sup>14</sup> Heb., 115 (116) <sup>6</sup> (15) LXX) of Christ. Christ Himself is likened to a lamb free from intrinsic blemish and from accidental stain (ἄμωμον καὶ ἄσπιλον). The whole cycle of ideas is probably derived from the history of the first Passover and of Israel's redemption from Egypt. The reserve of the passage is remarkable. Nothing is said in regard to the question to whom the λύτρον was paid. The sacrificial language is metaphorical (ὡς ἄμμου); it is simple and is not developed. The aim of the Lord's sufferings is twofold. On the one hand, ἀπέθανεν . . . ἵνα ὑμᾶς προσαγάγη τῷ θεῷ (3<sup>18</sup>). There is a slight emphasis on ὑμᾶς—'you Gentiles who were afar off' (Eph 2<sup>13</sup>). Christ dealt with the sins of men, and remained Himself δικαίος. His work and His abiding character fitted Him to bring those whom He had freed from sin into the presence of God. The ideas of mediatorship and reconciliation lie in the background. On the other hand, Christ bore our sins ἵνα ταῖς ἁμαρτίας ἀπογενόμενοι τῇ δικαιοσύνῃ ζήσωμεν (2<sup>24</sup>). Here and in 4<sup>14</sup> Christ's death is described as involving the Christian's death to sin (cf. St. Paul, e.g., Ro 6<sup>22</sup>). The correlative idea of 'the life to righteousness' leads naturally to the teaching of the Epistle in regard to the resurrection. The resurrection in regard to Christ Himself is described as the reversal (1<sup>11</sup> 3<sup>22</sup>; cf. 4<sup>13</sup> 5<sup>1</sup>) through the act of the Father (1<sup>21</sup>) of the humiliation involved in suffering and death—a conception which is prominent in the Petrine speeches in the Acts (see above, p. 766), but which in the Epistle falls into the background. In regard to men, it is δι' ἀναστάσεως Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ (a) that the Father 'begat anew' (ἀναγεννήσας) all Christian men (ἡμᾶς, 1<sup>3</sup>, cf. 1<sup>23</sup>); (b) that Baptism becomes in the gospel dispensation (ῥύνη) the crisis of salvation to each (ὑμᾶς . . . σώξει, 3<sup>21</sup>; cf. Tit 3<sup>5</sup> ἔσωσεν). Further, the effect of redemption is not limited to the initiation of the Christian life. If 'sanctification by the Spirit' is represented (1<sup>2</sup>) as the influence which surrounds (ἐν) the working out of the Divine purpose in the case of the ἐκλεκτοί, that ἐκλογή has for its immediate end (εἰς) the twofold issue ὑπακοή καὶ ἄντιστασις αἵματος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ—a life lived in accordance with the Divine will and pattern (1<sup>14</sup> 2<sup>2</sup>, cf. e.g. 1<sup>16</sup> 2<sup>15</sup>), and continually cleansed from the defilement of sin by the application of the quickening blood of Christ. The thought and the language are derived from the OT. The phrase ἄντιστασις αἵματος recalls at once the ὑδωρ ἄντιστασις of Nu 19<sup>9, 13, 20</sup> (cf. He 12<sup>24</sup>, Barn. v. 1 ἐν τῷ αἵματι τοῦ ἄντιστασιματος αὐτοῦ). In ancient Israel provision was made whereby the faithful Israelite, defiled by contact with the dead, should be sprinkled with 'the water of separation.' In the true Israel not water poured on the ashes of the victim, but the blood of Jesus Christ (cf. He 9<sup>13</sup>), is ever ready for the cleansing of those who are obedient, but who from time to time are defiled through contact with evil. Thus the sequence of thought is precisely that in 1 Jn 1<sup>7</sup> (ἐὰν ἐν τῷ φωτὶ περιπατῶμεν . . . τὸ αἷμα Ἰησοῦ κ.τ.λ.)*. The end of the divinely sustained growth (2<sup>2</sup>) and of the discipline of the Christian man (1<sup>2</sup>) is 'salvation' (εἰς σωτηρίαν)—that 'perfect soundness' which answers to God's purpose in creation.

(3) The Church.—The two aspects in which the Christian Church is prominently presented in this Epistle are closely related to OT language and Jewish thought. (a) The Church is regarded 'as first and foremost the true Israel of God, the one legitimate heir of the promises made to Israel' (Hort p. 7). Hence in 2<sup>9</sup> the remarkable transference to Christians in their corporate aspect of the prerogatives which belonged to Israel. The Christian Society is represented as a priestly body (2<sup>9</sup>) chosen to do priestly service (2<sup>5</sup>), but the spiritual character of this worship (as opposed to the material and merely ceremonial worship of ancient Israel) is insisted on (πνευματικὰς θυσίας, 2<sup>5</sup>; cf. Ro 12<sup>1</sup>, Jn 4<sup>23</sup>). The idea of the new Israel is not foreign to St. Paul (e.g. Gal 6<sup>16</sup>) or other writers of the NT, but nowhere is it insisted on with such emphasis as here. (b) The Church is a universal brotherhood (2<sup>17</sup> 5<sup>9</sup>). In the OT Israelites are constantly described as 'brethren' (e.g. Ex 4<sup>18</sup>, Dt 18<sup>15</sup>, Neh 5<sup>8</sup>); for the usage of later times comp. e.g. 2 Mac 1<sup>1</sup>, Ac 22<sup>5</sup> 28<sup>21</sup>. In the true Israel the tie is not natural, but spiritual. It grows out of the fundamental fact of the Divine ἀναγέννησις (1<sup>2</sup>). The duties involved in this brotherhood are distinctly described as flowing from the spiritual relation of Christians to God as their Father—ἀλλήλους ἀγαπήσατε . . . ἀναγεγεννημένοι (1<sup>23</sup>). Hence the repeated insistence on ἀγάπη and φιλαδελφία (1<sup>22</sup> 2<sup>17</sup> 4<sup>8</sup>). If the very term ἀδελφότης (2<sup>17</sup> 5<sup>9</sup>) emphasizes the notion of unity, the qualifying words ἡ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ (5<sup>9</sup>; cf. διασποράς, 1<sup>1</sup>) suggest the idea of universality: the 'brotherhood' is catholic. Little is said of the organization of the Church. The spirit in which elders are to work is enforced in 5<sup>12</sup>. In 4<sup>10</sup> there is an allusion to the due exercise of χαρίσματα in the Christian Society, and particular reference is made to those who teach and those who minister. The term ἐκκλησία, however, does not occur in the Epistle. The allusions to the Church suggest that, while the writer had a deep realization of the broad facts, he had not been led specially to ponder on their inner significance and promise, as the 'Ephesians' shows that St. Paul had done.

* Hort, basing the interpretation of the phrase on Ex 24<sup>8-9</sup>, concludes that the reference is to an initial pledge of obedience and an initial 'sprinkling with blood'—the admission to the Christian covenant. The preposition εἰς (emphasized by juxtaposition with ἵνα), pointing to a goal, and the position of the clause seem to the present writer strong arguments against this interpretation.

(4) Eschatology.—The Epistle holds an important position in the NT in respect to eschatological teaching. St. Peter (4<sup>7</sup>) regards the 'end of all things,' i.e. the great consummation, when the present order will pass away, as near at hand. In this point there is an important contrast between the teaching of this Epistle and that of the later Epistles of St. Paul (Hort, Romans and Ephesians p. 141 f.). The time of the end is regarded under two chief aspects. (1) It will be a time of ἀποκάλυψις. Then the progressive 'revelation of Jesus Christ' (1<sup>13</sup>) will culminate in a final 'revelation of Jesus Christ' (1<sup>7</sup> 5<sup>4</sup>; cf. Lk 17<sup>30</sup>), a 'revelation of his glory' (4<sup>13</sup>; cf. 1<sup>11</sup> 2<sup>1</sup>). Then will be the καιρὸς ἔσχατος when the 'inheritance' of Christians will be 'revealed,'* their participation in the glory 'which shall be revealed' (5<sup>1</sup>), God's αἰώνιος δόξα which was the goal of their 'calling' (5<sup>10</sup>). (2) It will be a time of judgment. God, indeed, is essentially ὁ κρίνων—ἀπροσωπολήπτως (negatively, without partiality; 1<sup>17</sup>), δικαίως (positively, with absolute justice; 2<sup>23</sup>), ἐπίμωτος (with the unerring precision of perfect knowledge; 4<sup>5</sup>). His judgment is individual, and is determined by each man's action (1<sup>17</sup>). It will then comprehend 'quick and dead' (4<sup>5</sup>; cf. Ac 10<sup>42</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>1</sup>). It will be observed that, throughout, the judgment is ascribed to the final authority of the Father (cf. e.g. Ro 14<sup>10</sup>), and that nothing is said in the Epistle of the mediatorship of the Son in the judgment (Ro 2<sup>16</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>10</sup>; cf. Jn 5<sup>22</sup>, 27).

But the question inevitably arises, How will perfect justice in judging the dead deal with those who died before the proclamation of the gospel? To this question St. Peter gives an answer in 4<sup>6</sup>, in close connexion with which we must take 3<sup>19</sup>. The difficulty of the two passages lies not so much in any obscurity of language as in the mysterious nature both of the subject with which they deal and of the problems which they suggest. The earlier of the two passages (3<sup>19</sup>) is limited in scope, dealing only with the case of those who, being disobedient, perished in the great typical judgment of the ancient world. The interpretations which explain the words as referring either (1) to an antediluvian mission of Christ, or (2) to an evangelization of the angels who fell (Jude<sup>6</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>4</sup>), appear (in view of the context, the grammatical construction, and the parallel in 4<sup>6</sup>) to be quite untenable. What appears to be the simple and natural view of the passages is given in the paraphrase above. It may further be observed (a) that the apostle necessarily uses the language of human experience (πορευθεὶς; cf. v. 22), though narrating events transcending human experience; (b) that the phrase τοῖς ἐν φυλακῇ πνεύμασιν in reference to Hades is quite natural language for a Jew; comp. Apoc. Bar xxiii. 4 'a place was prepared where the living might dwell and the dead might be guarded,' 2 Es 7<sup>25</sup>, 33; (c) that it is not impossible that the apostle's language (ἐκήρυξε . . . φυλακῇ) was suggested by Is 61<sup>1</sup>, 42<sup>7</sup> 49<sup>9</sup>. The emphasis of the passage rests on the Person of the κήρυξ. The later passage (4<sup>6</sup>) differs from the earlier in three important respects: (a) the reference is not limited to the dead belonging to one generation. The anarthrous καὶ νεκροῖς is not in itself necessarily universal in scope, but here it must be interpreted in the light of the preceding words (τῷ . . . κρίνοντι ζῶντας καὶ νεκροῖς); (β) the main point here (according to the requirements of the context) is the simple fact that the gospel was preached to the dead, not (as in 3<sup>19</sup>) the agent in its proclamation; hence the difference of wording (ἐκήρυξεν, εὐηγγελίσθη) is no argument that the two passages have not a common reference to a single occasion; (γ) while in 3<sup>19</sup> nothing is said as to the aim or effect of the proclamation, here its object is distinctly stated. It is important to notice that this sentence, in which the purpose is described, is one in which μέν and δέ oppose two clauses, whereof one is really subordinate to the other' (Liddell and Scott sub voce μέν ii. 5). The purpose of the preaching was not that the dead should be judged, but that though judged . . . they yet might live. . . . The aorist (κρίθῶσι) points to the one season of the judgment; the contrasted present (ζῶσι), to the continuous life κατὰ θεόν (cf. 1<sup>15</sup>). The two passages taken together appear unquestionably to assert that at the supreme crisis of redemption the Redeemer Himself proclaimed the gospel to the dead, those who perished in the Flood being particularly specified, and that therefore such blessings of the gospel as are not confined to this earthly order were offered to them.

Apart from possible allusions to the subject in three passages of St. Paul (Ro 10<sup>7</sup> 14<sup>9</sup>, Eph 4<sup>9</sup>), no writer in the NT refers to the descensus ad inferos, with the significant exception of St. Peter (cf. Ac 2<sup>27</sup>, 31), who may well have learned the mysterious facts of which he speaks from the lips of the Risen Lord Himself. The simplicity and reticence of St. Peter's disclosure are remarkable. On references to the descensus in early Christian literature see Lightfoot on Ign. Magn. ix. (add to the passages collected Gospel of Peter ix.). It appears certain that these early references are not based upon the passages in 1 P. 'No direct appeal is made to St. Peter in any of the numerous references to the Descent; the earliest quotation of 1 P 4<sup>6</sup> we have been able to find is in Cyprian's Testimonia' (Swete, Apostles' Creed p. 58). Hence in these passages we have expansions of a primitive Christian tradition, independent of St. Peter's written words.

Additional note on the name 'Peter.'—Dr. Schechter, in the Jewish Quarterly Review for April 1900, p. 428 f., writes thus: 'Besides the epithets "the God-fearing" Abraham or Abraham "the friend of God," Abraham also bears in Rabbinic literature the title of "the Rock." . . . The Rabbinic passage forms an illustration of Nu 23<sup>9</sup> "For from the top of the rocks I see him," and runs * Hort takes the words ἰστοῖμιν ἀποκαλυφθῆναι (15) to refer to the immediately preceding εἰς σωτηρίαν, and interprets in καιρῷ ἰσχυρῶν as meaning 'in a season of extremity.' But (1) it is difficult to disconnect ἰσχυρῶν here from ἰσχυρῶν τῶν χρόνων in 1<sup>20</sup>; and καιρὸς is common in eschatological phrases in Daniel and NT, e.g. 4<sup>17</sup>, Rev 13<sup>3</sup>; (2) the 'inheritance' is the main subject of the passage, and for εἰς σωτηρίαν (standing alone) comp. the same phrase in 2<sup>2</sup>; (3) ἰστοῖμιν ἀποκαλυφθῆναι (cf. E) is correlative to τετηρημένοι ἐν οὐρανοῖς.

thus: There was a king who desired to build, and to lay foundations; he dug constantly deeper, but found only a swamp. At last he dug and found a petra (this is the very word the Rabbi uses). He said, "On this spot I shall build and lay the foundations." So the Holy One, blessed be he, desired to create the world, but meditating upon the generations of Enoch and the Deluge, he said, "How shall I create the world whilst those wicked men will only provoke me?" But as soon as God perceived that there would rise an Abraham, he said, "Behold I have found the petra upon which to build and to lay foundations." Therefore he called Abraham Rock [רֶכֶס], as it is said, "Look unto the rock whence ye are hewn. Look unto Abraham your father" (Is 51<sup>1,2</sup>). Yalkut i. 766.   7. Conclusion.

I. THE EPISTLE CONSIDERED APART FROM THE QUESTION OF ITS GENUINENESS.—1. TRANSMISSION OF TEXT. For the authorities—MSS and Versions—see art. JUDE (EPISTLE OF) in vol. ii, p. 799. Some further points must be noted. (1) 2 P is not contained in the Peshitta. The text given in the printed editions of that version is, it appears, part of the Philoxenian version of the NT made in the early years of the 6th cent. (see below, p. 805). (2) Portions of pre-Hieronimic texts are found in the Fleury palimpsest=h (edited by Berger, 1889), in the Munich fragments edited by Ziegler=q (only 1<sup>1-4</sup>), and in the Speculum commonly known by the symbol m (ed. Wehrich). The text represented in h q, according to Berger, is one based on a late 'Italian' text, kindred to that revised by Jerome, transplanted to Africa and there greatly altered—'an African text of a late period.' Some remarkable fragments of an old Latin text are contained in Priscillian (ed. Schepss)—1<sup>20</sup> (omnis profetia uel scriptura interpretationem indiget, p. 87), 2<sup>8,10</sup> (p. 29), 2<sup>5</sup> (p. 46). Ambrose (de Fide iii. 12) quotes 1<sup>10</sup>. (3) Patristic evidence for the text is found chiefly in (a) Greek writers—Didymus, Ephraem (not Syriac works), Cyril Alex., John of Damascus, the commentators Œcumenius and Theophylact, the fragments in Cramer's Catena (some being ascribed to Athanasius, Eusebius of Emesa, and Chrysostom; on the last see below, p. 805 n.); (b) Latin writers—Ambrose, Priscillian, Jerome, Augustine, Fulgentius, Vigilius, Bede. Difficulties of interpretation give a sense of insecurity in regard to the text (e.g. 2<sup>11,14</sup>). Hort supposes that there are primitive errors in 3<sup>10,12</sup>. On 3<sup>2</sup>, see below p. 811; and on 3<sup>10</sup> see Vansittart in the Journal of Philology iii, p. 357 ff., where he suggests that the 'existence' of this Epistle, as of that to the Hebrews, 'depended for many years on a single copy.'

2. SUMMARY OF THE EPISTLE.—The Epistle (after the salutation) seems to fall into three sections—(1) 1<sup>3-11</sup>; (2) 1<sup>12-22</sup>; (3) 3<sup>1-18</sup>. Each of the two latter sections begins with a reference to the writer's personal relation to those whom he addresses, and in both cases he goes on to speak of the dangers which will soon overtake them from false teachers.

(1) (i.) 1<sup>1f</sup>. Salutation; (ii.) 1<sup>3f</sup>. Divine gifts.—The Divine power has given us all needful endowments, endowments through which He has given us* His promises, that through these promises you, having escaped from the world's corruption, may become sharers in the Divine nature. (iii.) 1<sup>5-7</sup> The duty of diligence. Such gifts imply duties. Use diligence on your part that one excellence in you may grow out of another. (iv.) 1<sup>8-11</sup> The hope of diligence. Such excellences, where they exist, cause fruitfulness. For he who has them not is blind, and forgets that he was cleansed from the sins of his old life. Therefore with the greater diligence see that you make God's calling and choice of you an abiding blessing. For so acting, you will not stumble; and the gift of entrance into the eternal kingdom will without stint be yours.

(2) (i.) 1<sup>12-15</sup> The writer's care for his friends.—Hence, though ye know these truths, I will ever keep them fresh in your memory, so long as I am in this tabernacle, for I know from the Lord's disclosure of the future to me that my putting it off will come suddenly. Further, I will take diligent care that, as during my life so also after my departure, you shall be reminded of these truths. (ii.) 1<sup>16-21</sup> The teachers' warrant. For we did not follow fables skillfully elaborated when we told you of the power of the Lord and His coming (i.e. in the flesh). Our warrant was that we had been initiated into the mystery of His majesty. We beheld the glory which He received from the Father, when the voice of God addressed Him as My Son, when we were His companions in the Holy Mount. And what is more abiding than a fleeting voice we possess in the prophetic word. Give heed to it as a lamp shining in a foul place till the perfect dawn comes. But remember that the interpretation of a prophecy in Scripture does not lie within a man's unaided power †; for prophecy came not by the will of man, but men spake from God as they were controlled by the Spirit. (iii.) 2<sup>1-11</sup> False teachers; their sure punishment. As there were false prophets in Israel, so there will be false teachers among you, denying even the Master who purchased them. Many will follow them, their life and their teaching being marked by lasciviousness, greed, insincerity. But their judgment has long been actively working. For God ever punishes the evil. He punished angels when they sinned, committing them to dens of darkness to be kept for judgment; the ancient world, while He delivered Noah; the Cities of the Plain, their overthrow being an example of what shall happen to ungodly men, while He delivered Lot, ever warned out by the lascivious life of the lawless. Yes, the Lord can deliver the godly from temptation, and keep the unrighteous in punishment for the day of judgment. And this is chiefly so with those whose sins are uncleanness, proud insubordination, and slandering; whereas angels, greater in power than they, bring no slanderous accusation against them (i.e. these sinners) before the Lord. (iv.) 2<sup>12-22</sup> Marks of such false teachers. Such men may be easily discerned. In their sins, and therefore in their punishment, they are like irrational animals. They blazon their profligacy in broad daylight. They are spots and flaws in your company. Their glances are ceaselessly unchaste. They entice restless souls. They sin from motives of covetousness like Balaam, who was miraculously rebuked for his madness. They are as purposeless as waterless springs or tempest-driven mists: their end will be thick darkness. With empty vauntings they entice into lusts those who are just escaping from evil companionship. Themselves the slaves of corruption, they promise a spurious liberty. They are indeed slaves. For if they were rescued from the defilements of the world and are now again ensnared therein, their last state has become worse than their first. For ignorance of righteousness is better than deliberate rebellion against the holy commandment. Their degradation is set forth in common proverbs.

(3) (i.) 3<sup>1f</sup>. The writer's Epistles.—In this, as in my former letter, I remind you of the words spoken long ago by the prophets, and of the Lord's commandment brought to you by those of the apostles who were your teachers. (ii.) 3<sup>3-7</sup> Mockers at the promise of the Return. Remember before all else that in the last days mockers will come, men of lustful life, scornfully asking what has become of the promise of His return. For the Fathers passed away, and the world's course is unchanged. Such mockers are self-condemned. For they wilfully forget that by the word of God the heavens were made, and the earth compacted of water and by means of water, waters which became the instrument of judgment. And by the same word the heavens and the earth are being kept for the fire of the final judgment. (iii.) 3<sup>8-13</sup> The Lord's delay and His coming. Forget not that God reckons not time as men reckon. His seeming slowness in fulfilling His promise is in truth His long-suffering towards you, that all may come to repentance. Howbeit the day of the Lord will come suddenly, the day when the vault of heaven shall pass away, and the stars shall melt with heat, and the earth and men's works therein shall be discovered. The certainty of this dissolution of material things is a call to holiness of life and to an earnest expectation of His coming. Then—because the day of God has come—the whole fabric of the universe shall be burned up. But we expect, according to His promise, new heavens and a new earth—the home of righteousness. (iv.) 314-18 The steadfastness of believers in the strength of this hope. Wherefore having these hopes, be diligent that you may be found of the Lord at His coming blameless. And regard the Lord's long-suffering as salvation, as Paul said to you, and as he says in all his letters, dealing in them with these matters—letters in which are many difficult sayings which those who lack learning and stability twist and wrench, as they do all the other Scriptures. But do you be on your guard against the evil influence of the lawless, and grow in grace and knowledge.

* Spitta (Der zweite Brief des Petrus p. 41 f.) would read παρ in v. 4 with A 36, 38 syr-bod syr-hl-mg, and would take the παρ of v. 3 and the δὲ of v. 4 to refer to the apostles.

† Spitta (p. 115) takes the words to mean, 'Keine Prophezeiung der Schrift ist der Art dass sie vernichtet werden könnte.'

3. DOCTRINE OF THE EPISTLE.—(1) The doctrine of God. (a) The Father. The term πατήρ is used only in relation to the Incarnate Son (1<sup>17</sup>). God by His word (command) was the Creator and is the Sustainer of the universe (3<sup>5,7</sup>). He is above the limitations of time (3<sup>8</sup>). He inflicts punishment on angels and men (2<sup>1a</sup>), and thus the ἡμέρα κρίσεως (3<sup>7</sup>) is described as ἡ τοῦ θεοῦ ἡμέρα (3<sup>12</sup>). But He is long-suffering, and delays judgment (3<sup>9</sup>, cf. 3<sup>15</sup>). He gave His witness to the Incarnate Son (1<sup>17</sup>). Men can know God (1<sup>2</sup>) and can partake of the Divine nature (1<sup>4</sup>). The phrase θεία φύσις (1<sup>4</sup>) refers rather to what God essentially is; the phrase ἡ μεγαλοπρεπὴς δόξα (1<sup>17</sup>) to God as revealing Himself by outward signs. (b) The Son. Nothing is said of the pre-existence of the Lord. The term θεός is, however, applied to Him in 1<sup>1</sup> τοῦ θεοῦ ἡμῶν κ. σωτήρος Ἰησοῦ Χρ.; contrast the order in 1<sup>2</sup> τοῦ θεοῦ κ. Ἰησοῦ τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν, and compare 1<sup>11</sup> 3<sup>18</sup> τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν κ. σωτήρος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ. Compare the phrase ἡ θεία δύναμις αὐτοῦ (1<sup>3</sup>), and note how He is closely joined with the Father as the object of man's knowledge (1<sup>2</sup>). In 1<sup>16</sup> it seems the preferable, if not the necessary, interpretation to take παρουσία of the First rather than of the Second Coming, for (a) the context speaks of history and not prophecy; (β) the word itself, though as a fact elsewhere in the NT and in this Epistle (3<sup>4,12</sup>) it is used of the Second Coming, naturally bears this meaning* (cf. ἔλευσις, Ac 7<sup>52</sup>). If this interpretation of 1<sup>16</sup> be the true one, then the message of the Incarnation is described as dealing with τὴν τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ δύναμιν καὶ παρουσίαν—the Lord's essential power and His coming to the world. His μεγαλειότης was revealed on the Mount of Transfiguration. He purchased men (i.e. by His blood, cf. Rev 5<sup>9</sup>), and so became their absolute Master (δεσπότης, 2<sup>1</sup>; cf. δοῦλος . . . Ἰ. Χρ., 1<sup>4</sup>). The term σωτήρ, as applied to Him, is characteristic of this Epistle (1<sup>1,11</sup> 2<sup>20</sup> 3<sup>2,18</sup>). His kingdom is described in the words of Daniel (3<sup>10</sup> [4<sup>2</sup>] 7<sup>27</sup>, cf. 1 Mac 2<sup>27</sup>) as an αἰώνιος βασιλεία (cf. Lk 1<sup>33</sup>, Rev 11<sup>15</sup>). He will fulfil His promise to return (3<sup>4</sup>). (c) The Holy Spirit. The only mention of the Holy Spirit is in reference to His controlling inspiration of the ancient prophets (1<sup>21</sup>).

(2) Redemption.—In regard to our Lord, it was wrought out by Him in His act whereby He purchased men (2<sup>1</sup>); in regard to Christians, it is brought into contact with each one in the καθαρισμός which parts the new from the old life (1<sup>9</sup>). The Divine 'calling' and 'choice' of men are regarded as closely related (τὴν κλήσιν κ. ἐκλογὴν, 1<sup>10</sup>; note the vinculum of the common article). Human effort is needed to give them an abiding validity (βεβαίαν). In 1<sup>9</sup> (τοῦ καλέσαντος ἡμᾶς) it is uncertain (α) whether the ἡμᾶς refers to Christians generally or to the apostles in particular; (β) whether the ὁ καλέσας refers to the Father or to Christ. Much stress is laid on conduct and on the cultivation of Christian virtues (1<sup>5a</sup>). Knowledge (ἐπιγνώσις, 1<sup>2,3,8</sup> 2<sup>20</sup>; γνώσις, 1<sup>5</sup> 3<sup>18</sup>) has a pre-eminent position assigned to it. The object of knowledge is the Father (1<sup>2,3,9</sup>) and Christ (1<sup>8</sup> 2<sup>20</sup> 3<sup>18</sup>); in 1<sup>5</sup> γνώσις appears without further definition. The knowledge of God and of Christ is the means whereby men escape the evil of the world (2<sup>20</sup>) and receive grace and peace (1<sup>2</sup>) and spiritual endowments (1<sup>3</sup>). The cultivation of Christian excellences leads to fruitfulness in regard to this knowledge (1<sup>8</sup>), which is not a final but a progressive knowledge (3<sup>18</sup>). Since it is closely allied to χάρις (3<sup>18</sup>), it is clearly a spiritual and not an intellectual attainment. On the other hand, the γνώσις of 1<sup>5</sup> (without a definition of its object) is apparently 'knowledge' generally; it is described as the link between ἀρετή and ἐγκράτεια. The end of the Divine promises is that men should become θελας κοινωνοὶ φύσεως (1<sup>4</sup>). The goal of Christian diligence is the entrance into the Lord's 'eternal kingdom' (1<sup>11</sup>).

(3) Creation.—The cause of creation was 'the word (command) of God' (3<sup>5</sup>). But at least in regard to the earth further (physical) details are given—γῆ ἐξ ὕδατος καὶ δι' ὕδατος συνεστώσα. Probably the interpretation given by Cœcumenius (quoted by Field, Notes on Translation of the NT p. 242) is the true one—ἡ γῆ ἐξ ὕδατος μὲν, ὡς ἐξ ὕδατος αἰτίου· δι' ὕδατος δέ, ὡς διὰ τελικοῦ (sic lege pro διατελικού)· ὕδωρ γὰρ τὸ συνέχον τὴν γῆν, ὅλον κόλλα τις ὑπάρχον αὐτῆς. In v.<sup>10</sup> the universe is described as consisting of 'the heavens' (the vault of heaven), the stars (στοιχεῖα), the earth.

(4) Angelology.—It is clearly laid down that there once was 'a fall' of certain angels (ἀγγέλων ἀμαρτησάντων, 2<sup>4</sup>), and that their sin was followed by Divine vengeance. God committed them to 'pits of darkness,' there to be kept for (final) judgment. In a later passage of the Epistle (2<sup>11</sup>) there is an obscure reference to the ministry of angels. The false teachers (it is there said) δόξασαν οὐ τρέμουσιν, βλασφημοῦντες, ὅπου ἀγγελοὶ ἰσχυροὶ κ. δυνάμει μείζονες ὄντες οὐ φέρουσιν κατ' αὐτῶν παρὰ Κυρίου βλάσφημον κρίσιν. It must remain doubtful if κατ' αὐτῶν refers to the false teachers or (as the parallel in Jude<sup>81</sup> suggests) to the δόξαι just mentioned. In either case, angels appear to be represented as bringing before the Lord tidings as to the conduct of created beings, whether angels or men.

(5) Eschatology.—Fallen angels and unrighteous men alike undergo temporary punishment until the time of their final doom (2<sup>4,9</sup>). The day, when 'the promise of his coming' is fulfilled, variously described as ἡμέρα κρίσεως (2<sup>9</sup> 3<sup>7</sup>), ἡμέρα κυρίου (3<sup>10</sup>), ἡ τοῦ θεοῦ ἡμέρα (3<sup>12</sup>), has three aspects—(α) In regard to the sinful: To the ungodly it will be a ἡμέρα . . . ἀπωλείας (3<sup>7</sup>, cf. 2<sup>1</sup> 3<sup>16</sup>); and of this 'destruction' the overthrow of the Cities of the Plain is the type (2<sup>6</sup>). The disclosure as to the angels who sinned does not go beyond the simple idea of κρίσις (2<sup>4</sup>); (β) In regard to the universe: 'Dissolution' (τοῦτων . . . πάντων λυομένων, 3<sup>11</sup>) is the destiny of all parts of the material universe. The means of this dissolution will be fire (πυρὶ τηρούμενοι 3<sup>7</sup>, καυσούμενα 3<sup>10</sup>, πυρούμενοι, καυσούμενα 3<sup>12</sup>). (γ) In regard to the righteous: The dissolution of 'the heavens and earth that now are' will usher in the fulfilment of the Divine promise of 'new heavens and a new earth.' The spiritual character of the new universe is insisted on—ἐν οἷς δικαιοσύνη κατοικεῖ (3<sup>13</sup>). In an earlier passage of the Epistle (1<sup>9</sup>), where the meaning and the construction are doubtful, it seems to be implied that that day will be the dawn of such full daylight 'in the hearts' of the faithful that the 'lamp' of prophecy will be no more needed.

4. THE WRITER OF THE EPISTLE, ITS READERS, THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF ITS COMPOSITION, AS REPRESENTED IN THE EPISTLE ITSELF.—(1) The Writer. The writer speaks as 'Simon (Symeon) Peter, bond-servant and apostle of Jesus Christ.'

* Compare, e.g., Ign. Philad. 9, τὴν παρουσίαν τοῦ σωτήρος . . . τοῦ πάθος αὐτοῦ, τὴν ἀνάστασιν; Apol. Aristidis, 15; Justin, Apol. i. 52; see Lightfoot on Ign. l.c.

He refers to two, possibly to three, occasions in his discipleship—(a) his presence on the Mount of Transfiguration (1<sup>10ff.</sup>); (b) the Lord's revelation to him in regard to his death (1<sup>14</sup>); (c) the Lord's call of himself and of other disciples (1<sup>3</sup>). The last reference is doubtful (see above, p. 809). The Epistle does not assert that he had visited those to whom he writes; though it is not unnatural to suppose that this is implied in 1<sup>12ff.</sup> 3<sup>2</sup>. But he had written to them one earlier letter (3<sup>1</sup>), the object of which had been, what the object of the present letter was, viz. to kindle their minds to remember the teachings of the ancient prophets and of the apostles who had instructed them. He calls St. Paul 'our beloved brother,' and he was acquainted with several of his Epistles, and especially with one which that apostle had written to those whom he is now addressing. He himself now writes under a sense that his death is imminent (1<sup>14</sup>); and he promises that, so long as he lives, he will still remind them of his teaching, and that he will make provision that after his decease they should always be able to call it to mind. Nothing in the letter, it should be added, reveals the place where he writes, his companions, or his plans. (2) The recipients of the letter. Unless we assume that the former Epistle referred to in 3<sup>1</sup> is 1 P, nothing is said in the Epistle to show where its intended recipients dwelt. The two phrases, τοῖς ἰσθμῶν ἡμῶν λαχοῦσιν πίστιν (1<sup>1</sup>, cf. Jude 3), and ἀποφυγόντες τῆς ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ ἐν ἐπιθυμίᾳ φθορᾶς (1<sup>4</sup>), make it probable that they were Gentile rather than Jewish converts. But the language is too general to warrant a certain inference. Some at least of the apostles had been among their teachers (3<sup>2</sup>), and it appears from 1<sup>12</sup> that they were not recent converts. From their past we turn to their future. The Epistle warns them of the advent among them of certain false teachers. It is an assumption—though it is a probable assumption—that the three passages of the Epistle which speak of false teachers—2<sup>1-22</sup>, 3<sup>2-7</sup>, 3<sup>10</sup>—refer to the same persons. Taking this identification for granted, we note the following points in the description of these enemies of the truth: (1) Their life and teaching are such that in effect they deny the rule of Christ and His law (2<sup>1</sup>); (2) they are themselves immoral, and by life and teaching they infect others (2<sup>2-10</sup>, 12<sup>ff.</sup>, 18<sup>f.</sup>); (3) they are insubordinate to authority (2<sup>10</sup>); (4) they are influenced as teachers by greed of gain (2<sup>3</sup>, 12, 14); (5) as teachers they are plausible and crafty (2<sup>3</sup>, 14, 19); (6) their teaching is empty rhetoric (2<sup>18</sup>); (7) they ridicule the idea of Christ's return (3<sup>3ff.</sup>); (8) they support their false teaching by an unscrupulous appeal to Scripture (3<sup>16</sup>). Such are the notes of the false teaching which will arise ἐπ' ἐσχάτων τῶν ἡμερῶν (3<sup>3</sup>).

To this statement of the details as to the writer and recipients of the Epistle, which seem to be implied in the document itself, it will be well to append the views as to the occasion of the Epistle and the circumstances of its composition, which have been put forward of late years by two critics who have defended its authenticity.

(i.) The chief points which Spitta emphasizes in his elaborate work, Der zweite Brief des Petrus und der Brief des Judas, 1885, are as follows:—St. Peter wrote the Epistle late in his life to Jewish Christians, to whom both he (3<sup>1</sup>) and St. Paul (3<sup>16</sup>) had addressed letters which have not been preserved. He promises to make provision that after his death his friends shall be reminded of his teaching. The Epistle of Jude was accordingly written at a later time for the express purpose of carrying out St. Peter's intention; and in that Epistle there are several direct references (vv. 4, 5, 12) to 2 P, while in Jn 17 f. we find words from 2 P 3<sup>2</sup> quoted as apos-tolitic words. The destination of the Epistle explains its subsequent history. The 'paulinische Einseitigkeit' of our NT Canon is one of many proofs that the early Church was not wont to welcome documents which had Jewish associations.

(ii.) Zahn, Einleitung ii. 42-110, 1899, takes the same general line as Spitta, but is somewhat more precise and circumstantial in his reconstruction of the history. St. Peter addressed the Epistle to Churches, mainly Jewish, in Palestine and in the adjacent districts, but not N. or N.W. of the Syrian Antioch. The apostle had long before taken a leading part in their evangelization, and had subsequently written to them a letter now lost. St. Paul also, not improbably during his imprisonment at Cæsarea, had sent them a letter; but this letter, like the letter of St. Peter just mentioned, has not been preserved. One of the chief reasons why St. Peter wrote them this second letter was to warn them against false teachers, whose evil influence he had himself seen at work in Gentile Churches. He feared lest the plague should spread to Jewish converts. The apostle then, over and above the exhortations and warnings of the Epistle itself, promises that he will, as long as he lives, remind them of the truths on which he insists, and further, that he will write for them an instruction in doctrine (Lehrschrift), that after his death they may have these things ever brought to mind. The time of the Epistle must be placed late in St. Peter's life; for (a) he writes as one now growing old; (β) many letters of St. Paul are in existence; (γ) there is a feeling of disappointment abroad that the promise of the Return is unfulfilled; (δ) the first generation of Christians is now dying off. As to the place where the Epistle was written, it contains no indication that St. Peter had as yet been in Rome. On the other hand, it is natural to suppose that, when he wrote to them, he was not living in the immediate neighbourhood of his correspondents. Thus it is an obvious conjecture (a) that the place where the Epistle was written was Antioch; (b) that the time of its composition was shortly before St. Peter left the East for Rome, where he probably arrived in the autumn of 63; i.e. the date falls within the years 60-63. About a dozen years later (circ. 75) St. Jude wrote to the same Churches, and (vv. 4, 17) formally quoted 2 P as an apostolic document. As to the later history of 2 P, it is important to emphasize the fact that 1 P and 2 P were written to wholly different groups of Churches. It is quite natural, therefore, that their fate should be different. For a long time Gentile Christians would trouble themselves but little as to an Epistle addressed to Jewish Christians. Hence the comparative obscurity into which 2 P fell.

There is little room for difference of opinion as to the date of 2 P among critics who maintain the genuineness of the Epistle, and hold the almost universal opinion that it was written as a sequel to 1 P, the latter Epistle being placed near the end of St. Peter's life. The case, however, is somewhat altered for any who follow B. Weiss and Kühl (see above, p. 782 f.) in their view that 1 P was written about the year 54. Yet these critics do not diverge from the conclusion as to the date of 2 P mentioned just above. On the one hand, Kühl urges that the silence of the Epistle as to the destruction of Jerusalem is a proof that it was written before the year 70. On the other, the fact that St. Peter holds himself henceforth alone responsible for the instruction of those to whom he writes, though he is aware that St. Paul had written to them, points to a time after the death of the latter apostle. The most probable date, therefore, is (according to Kühl) about the middle of the 6th decade.

II. THE QUESTION OF THE GENUINENESS OF THE EPISTLE.—1. INTEGRITY OF THE EPISTLE. Before discussing the problem of the genuineness of the Epistle we must clear out of the way the question of its integrity. Are we bound to consider the Epistle as a whole? May not some of the difficulties in regard to its genuineness arise from the fact that the Epistle as it stands has been interpolated? In this matter Kühl has inherited the suspicions of two earlier critics—Bertholdt and Lange. It will be sufficient to examine the case as stated by Kühl. He supposes (1) that the whole of ch. 2 is an interpolation; (2) that in 3rd words have been inserted to facilitate the dovetailing of the interpolated passage into the original letter. In this original document, according to Kühl's theory, the passage about prophecy was succeeded immediately by an exhortation—ὑμεῖς δέ, ἀγαπητοί, μνήσθητε τῶν προειρημένων ρημάτων ὑπὸ τῶν ἀγίων προφητῶν, τοῦτο πρῶτον γινώσκοντες κ.τ.λ. He is thus enabled to maintain that the Epistle in its original form is older, in its present interpolated form more recent, than Jude. It should be added that the reference in 3rd to an earlier Epistle, addressed by the same writer to the same readers, likewise disappears. Suspicions as to the integrity of a document, when they are interested, are themselves suspicious. In this case they claim no external support. And the internal evidence of the Epistle is against them. The transition from 1st to 2nd is natural. The thought of ancient prophecy leads to a reference to its parody in the false prophets of old days. If the writer goes on to draw a parallel between the dangers of the past and the dangers which he foresees in the future, the sequence of his thought is quite simple. Again, there cannot be said to be any difference in style between ch. 2 and the rest of the Epistle. Again, if affinities with Jude are most conspicuous in ch. 2, they are not confined to that chapter, and, when examined, they appear to be borrowings from Jude as clearly in ch. 1 as in ch. 2 (see art. on JUDE, § 4). Lastly, it will be shown later that the coincidences between 2 P and the Apocalypse of Peter are found both in ch. 1 and in ch. 2 of 2 P. Their diffusion cannot but be a weighty argument for the integrity of the Epistle. The suspicions, then, of Kühl and his predecessors in this view must be dismissed as arbitrary and unsupported by external or internal evidence.

2. RECEPTION IN THE CHURCH.—The investigation falls under three heads—(1) the alleged use of the language and characteristic thoughts of 2 P in documents (other than Books of NT) belonging to 1st and 2nd centuries; (2) such alleged use of, and references to, 2 P in documents belonging to the period between the beginning of the 3rd century and the time of Eusebius; (3) the evidence of Eusebius and of other writers of the 4th and 5th centuries; the reception of 2 P in the Canon of the Eastern (Greek) and Western Churches, and its rejection in the Syrian Church.

(1) Some of the alleged coincidences will be examined in detail. The rest are dealt with in the general remarks at the end of this section.

(a) Clement of Rome.—(i.) 'We have Noah and Lot adduced in vii. 5 and xi. 1 similarly to what is done in 2 Peter ii. 5-9' (Warfield in the January number of the Southern Presbyterian Review, 1882, p. 53). But in Clement the examples of Noah and Lot do not stand side by side as in 2 P, but are widely separated in a whole series of OT worthies. (ii.) Clem. vii. ταῦτα, ἀγαπητοί, οὐ μόνον ὑμᾶς νοθεύοντες ἐπιστέλλομεν, ἀλλὰ κ. εἰαυτοὺς ὑπομνήσκοντες || 2 P 1st 3rd. Beyond the fact that the common Greek word meaning 'remind' occurs in both passages in reference to a letter, there is no resemblance in phraseology or idea. (iii.) Clem. vii. Νῶε ἐκήρυξεν μετάνοιαν || 2 P 2nd. Lightfoot, however, shows that Clement probably derived this conception of Noah from the Sibylline Oracles. (iv.) Clem. ix. τοὺς τελείως λειτουργήσαντας τῇ μεγαλοπρεπεῖ δόξῃ αὐτοῦ || 2 P 1st 17. It must, however, be observed that in the LXX the noun (μεγαλοπρέπεια) is (especially in the Psalms) a very favourite word, and that the adjective occurs in reference to God, e.g. 2 Mac 8th 15 (τὸ μ. θνομα). The special phrase in question is an echo of the language of the Psalms—20 (21)st δόξαν κ. μεγαλοπρέπειαν, 144 (145)th τὴν μεγαλοπρέπειαν τῆς δόξης τῆς ἀγιοσύνης σου . . . τὴν δόξαν τῆς μεγαλοπρεπειᾶς τῆς βασιλείας σου. In Clement the adj. is common, being used in reference to the Divine will, gifts, worship, strength, name (ix. xix. xlv. lxi. lxiv.). The impression that in Clement the phrase in question and similar expressions have a liturgical origin (i.e. that they are derived from [Greek] synagogue prayers) is confirmed by a reference to the Greek Liturgies, e.g. Liturgy of St. Chrysostom, ἅγιος εἰ καὶ πανάγιος, καὶ μεγαλοπρεπὴς ἡ δόξα σου (Swainson p. 129), Liturgy of St. James (Swainson p. 268). (v.) Clem. xxiii. A passage is quoted as Scripture containing the words, 'These things we did hear in the days of our fathers also; and behold we have grown old, and none of these things hath befallen us.' The thought is not dissimilar to 2 P 3rd, but there is no coincidence of expression. Clement probably took the quotation (cf. '2 Clem.' xi.) 'from some spurious prophetic book'; see Lightfoot, in loc. (vi.) Clem. xxxv. ἀκολουθήσωμεν τῇ ὁδῷ τῆς ἀληθείας || 2 P 2nd. But it must be remembered that the use of ἡ ὁδός (e.g. τῆς ζωῆς, διδασχῆς, see Harnack on Did. 1) and the use of ἡ ἀλήθεια (e.g. ὁ κανὼν τῆς ἀληθείας) are very common; the combination of the two words therefore is in no way remarkable. (vii.) Clem. xxxiv. εἰς τὸ μετόχους ἡμᾶς γενέσθαι τῶν μεγάλων κ. ἐνδόξων ἐπαγγελιῶν αὐτοῦ || 2 P 1st 4. But it must be noticed that the phrase has a parallel in an earlier chapter (xix.), μεγάλων καὶ ἐνδόξων μετεπιληφότες πράξεων. Compare also xxvi. τὸ μεγαλεῖον τῆς ἐπαγγελίας αὐτοῦ.

(b) The Ancient Homily ('2 Clement') xvi. ἔρχεται ἡδὴ ἡ ἡμέρα τῆς κρίσεως ὡς κλίβανος καὶ βροντῆς καὶ τακῆσονταί τινες [λέγε αἱ δυνάμεις] τῶν οὐρανῶν, καὶ πᾶσα ἡ γῆ ὡς μόλιβος ἐπὶ πυρὶ τρεχόμενος, καὶ τότε φανήσεται τὰ κρύφια καὶ φανερὰ ἔργα τῶν ἀνθρώπων || 2 P 3rd 10, 12. The language of the earlier part of the extract is largely derived from Mal 4, Is 34th. The idea of the conflagration of the world at the judgment was somewhat widely current in the 2nd cent. In the last clause there is in language, idea, and context a certain coincidence with 2 P 3rd (γῆ καὶ τὰ ἐν αὐτῇ ἔργα εὐρεθήσεται), where, however, the reading (see above, p. 796) is very doubtful. The notion, however, of a disclosure of secret things is inseparable from the notion of the judgment; and the language and thought of the Homily are in reality nearer to Ro 2nd 1 Co 3rd 4th than to 2 P 3rd. Spitta, Der Zweite Brief p. 534 n., notices some other coincidences, of which the most striking are Hom. v. (ἡ δὲ ἐπαγγελία τοῦ Χριστοῦ μεγάλη καὶ θαυμαστή ἐστίν) || 2 P 1st 4; Hom. ix. (ἐξ εὐλακρυνούσ καρδίας) || 2 P 3rd (but cf. Is 38th, He 10th 22*); Hom. xiv. (ἐπ' ἐσχάτων τῶν ἡμερῶν) || 2 P 3rd (a phrase unique in NT but not uncommon in LXX).

(c) Didaché.—The passage 3, 6-8, writes Spitta (p. 534 n.), 'shows a very remarkable kinship with Jude and 2 Peter. We notice the rare expression γόγγυσος (cf. Jude 16), and especially the twice repeated βλασφημία, ἀθάδης and τρέμων, and we compare 2 P 2nd.' In Did., however, the τρέμων is part of a phrase which clearly comes from Is 66th. For ἀθάδης cf. Pr 21st, Tit 1st. When the whole chapter of the Didaché is read, the idea that we have here a literary link with 2 P vanishes.

(d) Ignatius.—Spitta points out coincidences between Ignatius and 2 P—Eph xi. 1, xii. 2 || 2 P 3<sup>15</sup>; xiv. 1 || 2 P 1<sup>15</sup>; Trall. xiii. 3 (ἐν ᾧ εὐρεθελήμεν ἄνωμοι) || 2 P 3<sup>4</sup>. The last is the only one in the series which deserves consideration, and about it Spitta himself allows that the phrase of Ign. may very well be 'stereotyp gewordene Wunschformel.'

(e) Barnabas xv. συνετέλεσεν ἐν ἑξ ἡμέραις. τοῦτο λέγει ὅτι ἐν ἑξακισχίλοις ἔτεσιν συντελέσει Κύριος τὰ σύνπαντα. ἡ γὰρ ἡμέρα παρ' αὐτῷ [σημαίνει] χίλια ἔτη. αὐτὸς δέ μοι μαρτυρεῖ λέγων. Ἴδὸν ἡμέρα Κυρίου ἔσται ὡς χίλια ἔτη || 2 P 3<sup>8</sup>. In connexion with this passage of Barnabas it will be convenient to bring together and to discuss the whole group of passages which are alleged to be reminiscences of 2 P 3<sup>8</sup>.

(i.) Justin, Dial. 81, τὸ οὖν εἰρημένον ἐν τοῖς λόγοις τοῦτοις, εἴηεν· κατὰ γὰρ τὰς ἡμέρας τοῦ ξύλου αἱ ἡμέραι τοῦ λαοῦ μου ἔσονται, τὰ ἔργα τῶν πόνων αὐτῶν παλαιώσουσι. (Is 65<sup>22</sup>) νεοθήκαμεν ὅτι χίλια ἔτη ἐν μυστηρίῳ μηνύει. ὡς γὰρ τῷ Ἀδὰμ εἶρητο, ὅτι ἡ δ' ἂν ἡμέρα φάγη ἀπὸ τοῦ ξύλου, ἐν ἐκείνῃ ἀποθανεῖται, ἐγνωμεν αὐτὸν μὴ ἀναπληρώσαντα χίλια ἔτη. συνήκαμεν καὶ τὸ εἰρημένον ὅτι ἡμέρα Κυρίου ὡς χίλια ἔτη εἰς τοῦτο συνάγειν. There then follows a reference to Rev 20<sup>10</sup>.

(ii.) Iren. v. 23. 2 (Iren. has given one interpretation of Gn 2<sup>17</sup> and then proceeds), 'Quidam autem rursus in millesimum annum reuocant mortem Adæ: quoniam enim dies Domini sicut mille anni, non superposuit autem mille annos sed intra eos mortuus est.'

(iii.) In v. 28. 3 Irenæus is discussing Gn 2<sup>14</sup>.—'a narrative of the past and a prophecy of the future'—ἡ γὰρ ἡμέρα Κυρίου ὡς χίλια ἔτη· ἐν ἑξ ὄν ἡμέραις συντελέσεται τὰ γεγονότα.

(iv.) In Hipp. in Dan. 23. 24 the words—ἡμέρα δὲ (γὰρ) Κυρίου (ὡς) χίλια ἔτη—are adduced in reference to creation.*

There is no doubt that the final source of the saying is Ps 90 (90)<sup>4</sup>. But the question remains whether the writers just cited take the phrase directly from 2 P or whether they borrow it from some source independent of 2 P, to which indeed 2 P may well itself be a debtor for it. Three points must be noticed. (1) In all the writers cited above (except 2 P) the form of the phrase consistently is ἡμέρα Κυρίου. (2) In all of them the saying is used in regard to the mystical interpretation of a passage in Gn 2—in Barn., Iren. (v. 28. 3), Hipp. in reference to Gn 2<sup>14</sup>; in Justin, Iren. (v. 23. 2) in reference to Gn 2<sup>17</sup>. Thus the context in all these passages is very similar and quite alien from the context in 2 P. (3) That speculations similar to the idea expressed in this saying were current in Rabbinical literature is clear from Schöttgen and Wetstein on 2 P 3<sup>8</sup>, and from Schöttgen, Horæ Heb. ii. p. 497. And this evidence as to Jewish thought on the matter is carried back into the 1st cent. A.D. (Schürer, HJP II. iii. p. 138 f.) by a passage in the Book of Jubilees (sometimes called the 'Little Genesis'), referred to by Hilgenfeld on Barn. xv., which (see Jahrb. f. bibl. Wiss. ii. p. 241) runs as follows: 'And [Adam] lived 70 years less than 1000 years; for a thousand years are as one day according to the heavenly testimony. Therefore it is written concerning the tree of knowledge, "On the day when ye eat thereof, ye shall die." Wherefore he fulfilled not the years of that day, but died therein.' The subject, it will be observed, is the same as that in relation to which Justin and Iren. (v. 23. 2) adduce the saying. The evidence, then, seems clearly to point to the conclusion that the source of the interpretation of a thousand years as 'a day of the Lord' was Jewish, probably a Haggada concerned with Gn 2. The saying became something of a commonplace in the Christian literature of the 2nd cent., and was used by the Fathers, cited above, in a sense more cognate to its Jewish origin than that in which it is found in 2 Peter.

* Compare Hippolytus, 'Heads against Caius,' in Hermathena vii. p. 403 f. (cf. pp. 406, 418), 'The number of the years is not the number of days, but it represents the space of one day . . . according to the saying, One day in the world of the righteous is as a thousand years.'

(f) The Testaments of the XII. Patriarchs.—The parallels in this book 'render it probable,' says Warfield p. 52, 'that the author had and used 2 Peter.' 'They are such,' he continues, 'as the very rare phrase μασμοῖς [Oxford MS—μάσμασι] τῆς γῆς in Benj. 8, cf. 2 P 2<sup>20</sup>—a phrase found in 2 Peter only in the NT, and in the Test. XII. Patt. only in its age; the rare phrase τοῦ πλάττειν λόγους in Reuben 3, which seems to have been suggested by 2 P 2<sup>8</sup>; the use of τηρεῖν in Reuben 5, just as it is used in 2 P 2<sup>9</sup>.' As to the first of these alleged coincidences it must be noticed (1) that the word μασμοῖς is found in Wis 14<sup>26</sup>, 1 Mac 4<sup>42</sup>, and occurs elsewhere in the Testaments, viz. in Levi 17; (2) that it has been already used in the immediately preceding context (οὐ γὰρ ἔχει μ. ἐν καρδίᾳ); (3) that the special phrase (τῆς γῆς) is suggested by the metaphor of the sentence (ὡς περ γὰρ ὁ ἥλιος οὐ μαινεταὶ προσέχων ἐπὶ κόπρον . . . οὕτω καὶ ὁ καθαρὸς νοῦς ἐν τοῖς μασμοῖς τῆς γῆς συνεχόμενος κ.τ.λ.). The phrase πλάττειν λόγους is used in Demosthenes and other classical writers. In regard to the last of the three coincidences it must be sufficient to refer to Jude<sup>6</sup>, Book of the Secrets of Enoch 7<sup>1</sup> 18<sup>4</sup>; similar phrases are common in the Enochian literature (see art. on JUDE, vol. ii. p. 801).

(g) The Shepherd of Hermas.—Zahn (der Hirt des Hermas p. 431) and Warfield (p. 51) have collected a number of passages in the Shepherd which they suppose to contain reminiscences of 2 P. It must be sufficient to examine three of the passages on which special stress is laid. (i.) Vis. i. 3. 4, τῷ ἰσχυρῷ ῥήματι πῆξας τὸν οὐρανὸν καὶ θεμελιώσας τὴν γῆν ἐπὶ ὑδάτων || 2 P 3<sup>8</sup>. In reality, however, the passage is an echo of passages in the OT, Ps 23 (24)<sup>2</sup> 103 (104)<sup>51</sup>, 135 (136)<sup>6</sup> (N<sup>o.</sup> a AT), Is 40<sup>22</sup>, and has no points of contact with the language of 2 P. (ii.) Sim. viii. 11, ὁ Κύριος ἐπεμψέ μοι σπλαγχνισθεῖς πᾶσι δοῦναι τὴν μετάνοιαν καί περ τινῶν μὴ ὄντων ἀξίων διὰ τὰ ἔργα αὐτῶν· ἀλλὰ μακρόθυμος ὁ Κύριος θέλει κ.τ.λ. || 2 P 3<sup>9</sup>. Zahn urges that of the many passages in Hermas which deal with repentance, this alone connects it with the Divine μακρόθυμία and emphasizes the universality of the gift. But it must be observed (α) that the πᾶσι is taken up from the immediately preceding context, ὑπάγε καὶ πᾶσι λέγε ἵνα μετανοήσωσι; (β) that the passage has quite as much affinity with Ac 17<sup>30</sup>, Ro 2<sup>4</sup> as with 2 P 3<sup>9</sup>. (iii.) Sim. vi. 4. 4, τῆς τρυφῆς καὶ ἀπάτης ὁ χρόνος ὥρα ἐστὶ μία . . . ἐὰν ὄν μίαν ἡμέραν τρυφήσῃ τις καὶ ἀπατηθῇ κ.τ.λ. || 2 P 2<sup>12</sup>. But it will be noticed (α) that the μίαν ἡμέραν of Hermas points to the riot as shortlived, the ἐν ἡμέρᾳ of 2 P points to it as shameless—'in broad daylight'; (β) that both τρυφή and ἀπάτη are favourite words with Hermas. As to the former, the desire ποικίλων τρυφῶν is a sign of the presence of 'the angel of evil' in a man (Mand. vi. 2. 5). Again, ἀπάτη in Mand. viii. 5 has a place among the 'evil works' from which 'the bondservant of God must abstain.' Having been thus spoken of separately, they are joined together in a long description of 'the man who thinks that he has the spirit' (Mand. xi. 12), and they reappear separately and side by side throughout the Sixth Parable. Their occurrence, therefore, in Hermas appears to be quite independent of 2 P. Other coincidences are Vis. iii. 7. 1 || 2 P 2<sup>15</sup>; Vis. iv. 3. 4 || 2 P 2<sup>20</sup>; Sim. v. 6. 8, 7. 1, viii. 11. 1, ix. 13. 9 || 2 P 2<sup>20</sup> (but the use of ἐπίδουσι in regard to the parables is quite obvious); Sim. vi. 2. 2 || 2 P 2<sup>12</sup>

(but καταφθορά is common in the LXX); Sim. vi. 2. 6 || 2 P 2<sup>20</sup> (but in Hermas εμπλέξει is the natural word to use of sheep entangled in thorns, etc.); Sim. ix. 17. 5, 18. 1 || 2 P 2<sup>21</sup> (but cf. Gal 4st). When, then, the passages in Hermas are examined, the conclusion is that they are interesting as illustrations of the passages in 2 P, but give no probability to a theory of literary dependence.

(h) Justin, Dial. 82, 'For with us even until now are there prophetic gifts, whereby you also yourselves [i.e. you Jews] should know that the things which of old belonged to your nation have now been transferred to us. But as there were withal false prophets in the time of the holy prophets who arose among you, so also in the present day are there many false teachers (ψευδοδιδάσκαλοι) also, of whom our Lord forewarned us to beware.' 'But where,' Warfield asks (p. 51 f.), 'can this forewarning be found? Does it exist anywhere but in 2 P 2<sup>1</sup> (cf. 1<sup>21</sup>). . . . It is exceedingly difficult to see how there can be any reasonable doubt but that these passages are drawn from 2 Peter. And if so, it is noticeable that Justin refers to 2 Peter with respect, as Scripture, as, practically, the words of our Lord—in a word, as an authoritative book giving the Lord's teaching.' To Warfield's question as to the source of this warning Justin himself supplies a decisive answer. After a few words on our Lord's foreknowledge, Justin continues, 'For He said that we should be murdered and hated for His name's sake, and that many false prophets and false Christs should come (παρεύσονται) in His name and lead many astray; and this is the case.' The reference, therefore, plainly is to Mt 24<sup>6, 9, 11, 24</sup>. There are apparently only two reasons which can be pleaded as grounds for hesitation. (1) The word ψευδοδιδάσκαλος does not occur in the report of our Lord's words in Mt, or indeed anywhere in the NT except in 2 P. But in Christian circles, where the words ψευδάδελφος, ψευδαπόστολος, ψευδολόγος, ψευδομαρτυς, ψευδοπροφήτης, ψευδόχριστος were all current (all occurring in NT), and where a διδάσκαλος was closely allied to a προφήτης, the word ψευδοδιδάσκαλος was sure to arise, and its occurrence in two writers cannot be taken to imply literary obligation. In Ep. Polyc. 7 we find τὰς ψευδοδιδασκαλίας, and in Didaché 13<sup>1, 2</sup> διδάσκαλος ἀληθινός appears as well as προφήτης ἀληθινός—a phrase which implies ψευδοδιδάσκαλος. (2) A parallel is drawn in Justin, as in 2 P, between the false teachers in the Christian Church and the false prophets in Israel. But it will be observed (a) that the comparison is very natural in a discussion of the presence of prophetic gifts in the Church; (β) that Justin does not speak of it as part of the warning for which he quotes the Lord's authority. There is a similarity between the passage in 2 P and that in Justin, but it justifies no other conclusion in the case of Justin than that which we reached in the case of Hermas.

(i) Melito.—A passage is quoted from a fragment of Melito's Apology, which has been preserved in a Syriac translation (Cureton, Spicilegium Syriacum, p. 50 f.), of which the principal clauses are as follows: 'There was once a flood and wind, and the chosen men were destroyed by a mighty north wind . . . but, again, at another time there was a flood of waters, and all men and living creatures were destroyed by the multitude of waters, and the just were preserved in an ark of wood, by the ordinance of God. So also it will be at the last time; there shall be a flood of fire, and the earth shall be burnt up together with its mountains, and men shall be burnt up together with the idols which they have made . . . and the sea, together with its isles, shall be burnt; and the just shall be delivered from the fury, like their fellows in the ark from the waters of the Deluge.' It should be noticed that earlier in the fragment

(p. 50) there had been an allusion to the judgment of fire: 'Fear Him who shaketh the earth . . . and removeth the mountains from their place; Him who can make Himself like fire, and burn up everything.' Further, it will be observed (a) that Melito refers not only to the Flood and the great judgment by fire, but also to the destruction of the Tower of Babel; and (β) that the destruction of the Tower has a place in the Sibylline Oracles iii. 97 ff., while in the immediately preceding context (iii. 82 ff.) there is a prophecy of the destruction of the world by fire. In line 109 there is an incidental allusion to the Flood, a subject which is treated at length in bk. i., the early date, however, of this book not being so fully established as that of bk. iii. (Schürer, HJP ii. iii. p. 287). There are no links of phraseology or of characteristic ideas which connect Melito with 2 P. The verdict, therefore, of Westcott (Canon p. 223 n.) seems to be the only reasonable one: 'It is impossible therefore to affirm that the reference in Melito is to 2 Peter, and not rather to the Sibyllines or to the widespread tradition on which they rested.'

(k) Theophilus of Antioch.—Two passages have been pointed out in Theophilus ad Autolychum, which, it is urged, have all the appearance of being reminiscences of 2 P. (i.) ii. 9, οἱ δὲ τοῦ θεοῦ ἄνθρωποι, πνευματοφόροι * πνεύματος ἁγίου καὶ προφήται γενόμενοι κ.τ.λ. Compare 2 P 1<sup>21</sup> ὑπὸ πνεύματος ἁγίου φερόμενοι ἐλάλησαν ἀπὸ θεοῦ ἄνθρωποι (οἱ ἅγιοι θεοῦ ἄνθρωποι, NA, etc.). But it must be noticed that the key-word of the passage (πνευματοφόρος) is derived from the LXX of Hos 9<sup>1</sup> (ὁ προφήτης . . . ὁ πνευματοφόρος), Zeph 3<sup>4</sup>; that Theophilus uses the word in the sense of 'an inspired speaker' in ii. 22 (αἱ ἅγιοι γραφαὶ καὶ πάντες οἱ πνευματοφόροι), iii. 12 (διὰ τὸ τοὺς πάντας πνευματοφόρους ἐν πνεύματι θεοῦ λελαληκέναι); that language similar to that under discussion is habitual in Theophilus; see ii. 33, 35, iii. 17, cf. Justin, Apol. i. 33; and, lastly, that the phrase 'man of God' is very common in the OT (occurring some 50 times) in reference to a prophet. Thus a reference to other passages in Theophilus shows that here he is using LXX language in reference to the Prophets. (ii.) ii. 13. In his treatment of the Divine command, 'Let there be light,' Theophilus observes, ἡ διάταξις οὖν τοῦ θεοῦ, τοῦτ' ἐστὶν ὁ λόγος αὐτοῦ, φαίνων ὡς περ λύχνος ἐν οἰκίῳ συνεχομένῳ, ἐφώτισεν τὴν ὑπ' οὐρανόν. The metaphor is thought to be derived from 2 P 1<sup>19</sup>. But the word οἰκίωμα is suggested by the previous context—ἄνθρωπος γὰρ κάτω ὡν ἀρχεται ἐκ τῆς γῆς οἰκοδομῆν—the human building is contrasted with the Divine. The metaphor of the λύχνος is obviously suggested by the subject under discussion—the light kindled by man is contrasted with the light kindled by God. If it is thought necessary to find a 'source' for a metaphor so obvious in the context, 2 Es 12<sup>12</sup> ('Tu enim nobis superasti ex omnibus prophetis, sicut lucerna in loco obscuro') is as near to Theoph. as is 2 P.

(l) Irenæus.—We have already dealt with two passages in this writer (p. 800). In two other passages he has been supposed to be relying on 2 P. (i.) iii. 1. 1, μετὰ δὲ τὴν τούτων [sc. Petri et Pauli] ἐξόδον || 2 P 1<sup>12</sup>. But that ἐξόδος (exitus) was not an uncommon word in this sense in early Christian literature has been pointed out on p. 770. (ii.) 'We come in the fourth book' (xxxvi. 4), Warfield writes (p. 49), 'to another passage in which [Irenæus] adduces Noah, then Sodom and Gomorrah, and Lot, to show that God will punish the wicked and save the holy. Our minds go immediately to 2 Peter ii. 4-7, whence the framing of this passage seems to have been derived.' Here, too, it is important to look at the previous context. The object of the chapter is to show that Christ came from the Father, who had sent the prophets in earlier days. Irenæus proves, therefore, from Christ's sayings the unity of God's character in the old and in the new dispensation. In the course of the argument he quotes Lk 21<sup>34</sup>. 12<sup>35</sup>. 17<sup>26-31</sup> (Noah, Lot, Sodom), Mt 24<sup>42</sup>. He then draws the inference, 'Unum et eundem annuntians Dominum, qui in temporibus Noe propter inobedientiam hominum superduxit diluuium, et in temporibus Lot propter multitudinem peccatorum Sodomitaram pluit ignem a caelo; et in nouissimo . . . superducet diem iudicii.' There then follows the passage to which Warfield refers, the 'framing' and the ideas of which are clearly drawn from the passage just quoted from the Gospels.

* The word is printed here as it appears in Otto's ed. of Theophilus and in the Cambridge LXX. But it is possible that it should be accented as a passive, πνευματοφόρος. See Lightfoot's note on Ignatius Eph. i.

(m) There are one or two passages from heretical documents belonging (in their original form) probably to the 2nd cent. which must be examined. The first of these is a phrase of Ptolemæus, a follower of Valentinus, still living when Irenæus wrote. Zahn (Gesch. Kan. i. p. 759) compares a phrase of this writer's, preserved by Epiphanius (Hær. xxxiii. 6)—παρούσης δὲ τῆς ἀληθείας, with 2 P 1<sup>12</sup>. But the context in Ptolemæus (i.) shows that the word ἀλήθεια is used in different senses in the two passages, and (ii.) itself naturally accounts for the use of the phrase. It runs thus: αὐτὰρ εἰκόνας . . . καλῶς ἐγένοντο μέχρι μὴ παρῆν ἀλήθεια. παρούσης δὲ τῆς ἀληθείας τὰ τῆς ἀληθείας δεῖ ποιεῖν.

(n) The Clementine Literature.—(i.) Recog. v. 12, 'Unusquisque illius fit seruus cui se ipse subjecerit' || 2 P 2<sup>19</sup>. Salmon (Introd. p. 488) compares Origen, In Exod. Hom. 12, 'Unusquisque a quo unicitur huic et seruus addicitur.' Both passages occur in a translation by Rufinus, and may therefore be interpolations. Salmon, however, points out that 'the difference of the Latin makes it likely that in both cases Rufinus is translating, not interpolating.' But it is equally possible that Rufinus, translating two different books at two different times, interpolated different free renderings of 2 P 2<sup>19</sup>. The question whether Rufinus did interpolate when he was translating will come before us again in connexion with Origen. (ii.) Hom. xvi. 20. Salmon (p. 488 n.) calls attention to the words ἀλλὰ τὸναντίον μακροθυμεί, εἰς μετάνοιαν καλεῖ. In these words, 'taken in connexion with the whole context, there is very probably a use of 2 Pet. iii. 9.' In the context Peter speaks of the blasphemies of Simon Magus and of 'the boundless long-suffering of God.' The earth had not opened; fire had not come down from heaven; rain was not poured out; beasts were not sent forth from the thicket to avenge this spiritual adultery. 'But, on the contrary, He is long-suffering; He calls to repentance.' It is difficult to see what there is in the context which specially recalls 2 P, while the particular phrase is nearer to Ro 2<sup>4</sup> (τῆς μακροθυμίας καταφρονεῖς . . . τὸ χρηστὸν τοῦ θεοῦ εἰς μετάνοιαν σε ἀγει) than to 2 P 3<sup>9</sup>, though, in fact, it is too natural and obvious to require any literary source.

(o) Actus Petri cum Simone xx. (ed. Lipsius p. 67) 'Unusquisque enim nostrum sicut capiebat uidere, prout poterat uidebat. Nunc quod uobis lectum est iam uobis exponam. Dominus noster uolens me maiestatem suam uidere in monte sancto, uidens autem luminis splendorem eius cum filiis Zebedei, cæcidi tamquam mortuus et oculos meos concludi et uocem eius audiui talem qualem referre non possum, qui me putauī exorbatum ab splendore eius . . . et exurgens iterum talem eum uidi qualem capere potui.' A phrase in the next chapter (ed. Lipsius pp. 68, 32) must be compared,

'tale lumen . . . quod enarrare nemo hominum possit.' The Gnostic Acts of Peter, of which this document forms part, belong in all probability to the 2nd cent. (see above, p. 774). The only authority, however, for this particular document is a 7th cent. MS, presenting a Latin version of the original Greek. Can we be certain, then, that the whole passage quoted above is not interpolated by some editor or translator? It was shown above (p. 774) that the Gnostic Acts of Peter probably formed part of the series of Leucian Acts, to which the Acts of John also belong. Now in the Acts of John (James, Apocr. Anecdota ii. p. 7) there is a long account of the Transfiguration, and this account contains a phrase (as James, p. xxvi, notes) of the same type as phrases which occur several times in the Petrine Acts at this point—φῶς τοιοῦτον ὅποιον οὐκ ἔστιν δυνατὸν ἀνθρώπῳ χρωμένον (lege χρωμένῳ) λόγῳ φθαρτῷ ἐκφέρειν ὅτιν ἦν. It seems to be a legitimate inference that there is every probability that the Leucian Acts of Peter, like the Leucian Acts of John, contained (i.e. in their original form) a reference to the Transfiguration, and that the Latin version reproduces characteristic phrases of the original. Now there are three coincidences with 2 P in the Latin passage of the Petrine Acts quoted above—(i.) 'maiestatem suam uidere'; (ii.) 'in monte sancto'; (iii.) 'uocem eius talem.' Of these the last has strong claims to be considered a phrase of the original Leucian Acts; it seems at first sight a complete parallel to the φωνῆς τοιαύτης of 2 P 1<sup>17</sup>; but in 2 P the 'voice' is the Father's 'voice,' in the Acts it is the utterance of the Son; and again, in 2 P the τοιαύτη introduces the actual words, while in the Acts the 'talem' is followed by a 'qualem.' Thus the parallel, when examined, is less striking than on the surface it appears. Of (i.) (ii.) it can only be said, that if we could be certain that these phrases represented corresponding expressions in the original Leucian Acts, the conclusion would be irresistible that there is some direct connexion between the Petrine Acts and 2 P. But we have no right to assume that these phrases are not due to an editor or translator, and consequently it would be lost labour to speculate on the kind of connexion between the two documents which, if original, they would imply. Clearly this is an important point in relation to the problem of 2 P on which fresh light would be very welcome.

We have now reviewed the passages in the sub-Apostolic writings and in the Christian literature of the 2nd century, which, it is alleged, contain reminiscences of 2 P. If we put aside the passage from the Clementine Recognitions and that from the Acts of Peter as open to the suspicion of not accurately representing the original texts, there does not remain, it is believed, a single passage in which the coincidence with 2 P can with anything approaching confidence be said to imply literary obligation to that Epistle. The resemblances in thought or phrase are such as are constantly found in quite independent specimens of literature, when they belong to the same general period and deal with the same general subject.

(2) It will be convenient to range the authorities which claim discussion in the next period under the several Churches.

(i.) Alexandria.—(a) Clement. Did Clement in the Hypotyposesis comment on 2 P? The statement of Eusebius, HE vi. xiv. 1, runs thus: 'In the Hypotyposesis, to speak briefly, he has composed concise expositions of all Canonical (ἐκδοθέντων) Scripture, not omitting even the disputed (Epistles), I mean that of Jude and the remaining Catholic Epistles, as well as (τῆ) Barnabas and the so-called Apocalypse of Peter.' This evidence is confirmed by that of Photius (Biblioth.

109), who speaks of the Hypotyposesis as 'giving interpretations of Genesis, Exodus, the Psalms, the Epistles of St. Paul, the Catholic Epistles, and Ecclesiasticus (τοῦ ἐκκλησιαστικοῦ).' The last phrase is probably a scribe's blunder for τῶν ἐκκλησιαστικῶν; compare Rufinus, in Symb. Apost. 38, 'alii libri sunt, qui non canonici sed ecclesiastici a maioribus appellati sunt.' If this be so, Photius has in mind the non-Canonical books mentioned by Eusebius. On the other side must be set two pieces of evidence. (a) Cassiodorus (de Instit. Div.) in a passage of the Preface asserts that 'it is said (ferunt) that Clement expounded the Divine Scriptures of the Old and of the New Testament from the beginning to the end.' But in a later passage (c. 8) of the same book he limits the scope of Clement's work, 'In epistolis autem canonicis Clemens Alexandrinus . . . id est in epistola S. Petri prima, S. Joannis prima et secunda, et Jacobi, quaedam Attico sermone declaravit.' (β) Cassiodorus goes on to speak of a translation which he had made of Clement's expositions, but in which he omitted doctrinal statements which offended him. It is probable, on the whole, that the Latin version of Clement's expositions which we now possess is that of Cassiodorus. This Latin version includes expositions of 1 P, Jude, 1 Jn, 2 Jn. It will be seen that this series of Epistles corresponds with the list given by Cassiodorus, if in the latter we suppose that James was substituted by a mistake for Jude. We have, then, two conflicting views—one (based on the evidence of Eus., Photius, and the Preface of Cassiodorus) to the effect that Clement commented on all the Catholic Epistles; the other (supported by Cassiodorus' statement in the body of his work, and by the extant Latin version of Clement's commentaries) to the effect that Clement commented on four of the Catholic Epistles, 2 P not having a place among those four. The reconciliation of these two contradictory conclusions, so far as 2 P at least is concerned, may be found in the supposition that Clement did comment on 2 P, but that in his work it had a place by the side, not of 1 P but of the Apocalypse of Peter,* which Clement quotes as the work of Peter and as Scripture (Eclogæ ex Scriptt. Proph. xli. xlviii. xlix.). In that case Cassiodorus might well exclude Clement's comments on 2 P from his avowedly eclectic version; or they may have had no place in his copy of Clement. It is an important fact that no passage can be adduced from Clement's works in which 2 P is referred to, still less any in which it is quoted by name. Thus the evidence, which cannot be considered as altogether free from doubt, points to the conclusion that Clement regarded 2 P as a book hovering, like the Apocalypse of Peter, on the borders of the number of the books definitely recognized as Apostolic, but that he did not place it on a level with 1 P. (b) Origen. The first absolutely incontrovertible reference in Christian literature to 2 P is found in the words of Origen reported by Eus. HE VI. xxv. 8, Πέτρος δὲ . . . μίαν ἐπιστολὴν ὁμολογουμένην καταλέλοιπεν, ἔστω δὲ καὶ δευτέρα* ἀμφιβάλλεται γάρ. No other passage is quoted from any of Origen's works now extant in the original Greek in which he quotes from, or alludes to, 2 P. There are, however, several passages in Rufinus' translation of certain works of Origen, not extant in Greek, where 2 P is used. They are as follows. In Ep. ad Rom. iv. 9 (ed. Lomm. vi. p. 302), 'ad participationem capiendam divinæ nature, sicut Petrus Apostolus edocuit' (2 P 14); ib. viii. 6 (vii. p. 234), 'Petrus in epistola sua dicit Gratia vobis et pax multiplicetur in recognitione Dei; et iterum alibi Ut boni dispensatores multiplicis gratiæ Dei' (2 P 12, 1 P 4<sup>10</sup>); in Exod. xii. 4 (ix. p. 149), 'Scio enim scriptum esse, quia unusquisque a quo vincitur huic et seruis addicitur' (2 P 2<sup>10</sup>); in Levit. iv. 4 (ix. p. 221), 'Et iterum Petrus dicit Consortes, inquit, facti estis divinæ naturæ' (2 P 14); in Num. xiii. 8 (x. p. 157), 'Et ut ait quodam in loco Scriptura Mutum animal humana voce respondens arguit prophetæ dementiam' (2 P 2<sup>16</sup>); in Lib. Jesu Naue vii. 1 (xi. p. 63), 'Petrus etiam duabus epistolarum suarum personat tubis.' Compare the allusions in the two following passages—in Num. xviii. 4 (x. p. 228), 'Consuetudinem propheticam . . . de qua dicitur Omnis propheta non potest propria absolute constare' (2 P 1<sup>20</sup>); in Ezech. v. 3 (xiv. p. 74), 'Multo nobis utilius fuerat diuino non credidisse sermone, quam post credulitatem adhuc rursus ad peccata conuerti, quæ ante commisimus' (2 P 2<sup>21</sup>). The question remains—Are these references to, and quotations from, 2 P part of the original text of Origen, or insertions by Rufinus? (1) It is a fact worth noticing, that while it would have been consonant with Eusebius' plan (HE III. iii. τινες τῶν κατὰ χρόνους ἐκκλησιαστικῶν συγγραφέων ὁποῖαι κέχρηται τῶν ἀντιλεγόμενων) to record the use which Origen made of the Epistle, had he found in the Greek text of Origen the passages given above from the Latin translation, he does not notice their existence. (2) It would not have been against the probabilities of the case if no reference to 2 P had occurred in the extant Greek works of Origen, and yet a single allusion or so had been made to that Epistle in a work which chanced to survive only in a Latin translation. But it is certainly strange that not one reference is to be found in the works of Origen extant in Greek, but that half a dozen present themselves in those works of Origen which exist only in Rufinus' Latin. The idea of θεοποίησις, for example, is a characteristic thought with Origen (as indeed it is with Clement). We are surprised that twice in the works which are preserved to us in Rufinus' translation Origen illustrates the idea from 2 P, while in his other works he never does so. Thus the number of references to 2 P in Rufinus' translation creates a suspicion as to their genuineness. (3) Each of these references to, or quotations from, 2 P can, it is believed, be cut out without injury to the context.* But whatever be the truth as to the references to 2 P found in those works of Origen which have reached us only through the medium of Rufinus' translation, the deliberate statement of Origen as to 2 P remains. The phrase ἀμφιβάλλεται γάρ clearly conveys, not an opinion of Origen's, but information as to the division of opinion in his time; it may further be thought to suggest that 2 P had already secured a position, which was assailed. The words of the previous clause—ἔστω δὲ καὶ δευτέρα—leave us in little doubt that Origen's judgment was unfavourable to the Epistle.

(ii.) Egypt.—The two great Egyptian versions, the Sahidic and the Bohairic, contain all the seven Catholic Epistles. The date of these versions, however, has not been put beyond doubt. Lightfoot placed 'the completion or codification of the Memphitic [i.e. Bohairic] version' at the middle of the 3rd cent. (Scrivener, Plain Introduction 2 p. 343). Headlam, in his completion of Lightfoot's article

* In one passage referred to above—'Petrus in epistola sua dicit Gratia vobis et pax multiplicetur in recognitione Dei; et iterum alibi Ut boni dispensatores multiplicis gratiæ Dei' (Lomm. vii. p. 234)—there seems to be some positive evidence for the theory of interpolation. It would be most unnatural for Origen to refer to 2 P with the words in epistola sua; to quote the salutation of 2 P, which only differs from that of 1 P by an immaterial addition (in recognitione Dei); and then to add a quotation from 1 P, introducing it with the phrase et iterum alibi.

* Zahn (Forsch. iii. p. 154) suggests that in view of its prophetic contents Clement connected 2 P with the Petrine Apocalypse.

(in the fourth edition of Scrivener, ii. p. 104f.), holds that 'it has been sufficiently proved that translations into Coptic existed in the 3rd cent., very probably in the 2nd.' F. Robinson (art. on EGYPTIAN VERSIONS in vol. i. p. 670ff.) urges that such conclusions are in danger of outrunning the evidence, and that 'historical evidence, on the whole, points to the 3rd cent. as the period when the first Coptic translation was made.' The investigation desiderated by Westcott (Canon p. 370), i.e. 'how far an older work underlies the printed text, and whether that can be attributed to one author,' has not yet been accomplished. We must therefore acquiesce in his verdict as to the Bohairic version, a verdict which is even more applicable to the Sahidic—'till this has been determined, no stress can be laid upon the evidence which the version affords for the disputed Cath. Epp.'

(iii.) Carthage.—There is no evidence that Tertullian or Cyprian was acquainted with 2 P.

(iv.) Asia Minor.—(a) In a letter to Cyprian (Cyprian, Ep. lxxv. 6), Firmilian, bp. of Caesarea in Cappadocia, writes: 'Stephanus . . . adhuc etiam infamans Petrum et Paulum beatos apostolos . . . qui in epistolis suis haereticos execrati sunt et ut eos euitemus monuerunt.' The reference, it would seem, must be to 2 P, since 1 P contains no indictment of heretics. (b) Methodius, bp. of Olympus and afterwards of Patara, who appears to have suffered in the Diocletian persecution. Zahn (Gesch. Kan. I. i. p. 313) points out some passages in the treatise de Resurrectione, in which he thinks that this writer alludes to 2 P 3<sup>10-13</sup>. They are as follows:—ἐκπυρωθήσεται μὲν γὰρ πρὸς κάθαρσιν καὶ ἀνακαινισμόν καταβασιῶ πάντων κατακλυζόμενος ὁ κόσμος πυρὶ, οὐ μὴν εἰς ἀπόλειαν ἐλεύσεται παντελῆ καὶ φθόραν . . . διδ' ἀνάγκη δὴ καὶ τὴν γῆν αἰθρῆ καὶ τὸν οὐρανὸν μετὰ τὴν ἐκφλόγωσιν ἔσεσθαι πάντων καὶ τὸν βρασμὸν (ed. Jahn p. 78); and again, ἵνα γινώσκωμεν εὐθιγότερον ὅτι πάντων πυρὶ καταβασιῶ κατομβρομένων τὰ ἐν ἀγγελίᾳ σώματα καὶ δικαιοσύνη διαπρέψαντα καθ' ἀπερ ψυχρῶ ὕδατι τῷ πυρὶ, οὐδὲν ἀλγυνόμενα πρὸς αὐτοῦ, ἐπιβήσονται (p. 94). But the words of Methodius do not contain any phrases borrowed from 2 P, and may well be speculations on the ἐκπύρωσις independent of that Epistle. There is, however, a fragment from the same treatise (Pitra, Anal. Sacra iii. p. 611) which explicitly quotes 2 P 3<sup>8</sup>—χίλια δὲ ἔτη τῆς βασιλείας ὠνόμασεν τὸν ἀπέραντον αἰῶνα διὰ τῆς χιλιάδος ἡμερῶν γέγραφε γὰρ ὁ ἀπόστολος Πέτρος ὅτι μία ἡμέρα παρὰ Κυρίου ὡς χίλια ἔτη καὶ χίλια ἔτη ὡς ἡμέρα μία. In this connexion the evidence of the Dialogue which passes under the name of Adamantius should be noticed. In this work, which was probably written in the later years of Constantine, large use is made of the works of Methodius (Hort in Dict. Christ. Biog. i. p. 39f.), and 2 P is quoted in it. In one passage (§ 2, p. 58 ed. Wetstein) the orthodox interlocutor helps his Marcionite opponent out of a difficulty as to St. Paul's authority by adducing Ac 9<sup>15</sup>, and 2 P 3<sup>15</sup> (πῆ δὲ ὑπὸ Πέτρον τοῦ ἀποστόλου γεγραμμένον). In another passage (§ 1, p. 41), it should be added, words (ἕκαστος ᾧ ἤττηται τούτῳ καὶ δεδολωται) very near to those of 2 P 2<sup>19</sup> are appealed to as 'the common proverb' (ὁ ἐξῶθεν λόγος).

(v.) Rome.—(a) Murat. Canon. 2 P is not mentioned in the text of the fragment as it stands. Zahn (Gesch. Kan. II. i. p. 110 n.), however, conjectures that in one passage some words have slipped out, and he would restore it thus: 'Apocalypsin etiam Johannis et Petri [unam] tantum recipimus [epistolam]; fertur etiam altera, quam quidam ex nostris legi in ecclesia nolunt.' For the language cf. Eus. HE III. iii. 4. The suggestion appears a probable one, but without further evidence it must remain a conjecture. (b) Hippolytus. The following passages claim attention:

—Refut. Hær. ix. 7, ὁ πρὸς μὲν ὧραν αἰδούμενοι καὶ ὑπὸ τῆς ἀληθείας συναγόμενοι ἁπολόγου μετ' οὐ πολλὸν δὲ ἐπὶ τὸν αὐτὸν βόρβορον ἀνεκκλιόντο (2 P 2<sup>22</sup>); in Dan. iii. 22, ᾧ γὰρ ἂν τις ὑποταγῆ τούτῳ καὶ δεδολωται (2 P 2<sup>19</sup>); ib. iv. 10, εἰ γὰρ καὶ νῦν βραδύνει πρὸ καιροῦ, μὴ θέλω τὴν κρίσιν τῷ κόσμῳ ἐπιενεγκεῖν (2 P 3<sup>8</sup> 2<sup>9</sup>); ib. iv. 16, μήποτε . . . ἀπονυστάξαντες οἱ ἄνθρωποι ἐκπέσωσιν τῆς ἐπουρανίου ζωῆς; ib. iv. 60, ἵνα μὴ . . . ἀπονυστάξαντες ἐκπέσωμεν τῆς αἰδίου ζωῆς (2 P 3<sup>17</sup>). These coincidences are not such as to produce conviction.* The first two, which are not the least striking of the series, are of the nature of proverbs, and it is rash to infer literary indebtedness from the common use of such expressions. The use of ἐκπεσεῖν in the last two passages is not in itself specially remarkable (cf. e.g. Gal 5<sup>4</sup>, Epist. ap. Eus. HE VII. xxx. 13; Can. Petri Alex. 8, 10, 11 (Routh, Rel. Sacr. iv. p. 31 ff.)). Taken together, however, these passages in Hippolytus give the impression that he was acquainted with 2 P.

(vi.) The division of sections in Codex B.—In this MS there are two divisions of sections, one older than the other. This double division is carried on through the Catholic Epistles with the exception of one Epistle. In 2 P (standing between 1 P and 1 Jn) the older divisions are wanting (Gregory, Proleg. i. pp. 156, 359). The conclusion is inevitable that the ancestor of Codex B, to which these divisions were first attached, did not contain 2 P.

(vii.) Old Latin Texts.—That there are pre-Hieronymian Latin translations of 2 P (see above, p. 796) is clear. But the fragments which remain indicate that these translations belonged to the later 'Italian' type of text; nor is there any evidence that others of earlier date ever existed. This view, in regard to the absence of 2 P from older Latin translations of the Catholic Epistles, is confirmed by the fact to which Westcott (Canon p. 263ff.) calls attention, 'It appears that the Latin text of the Epistle [in the Vulgate] not only exhibits constant and remarkable differences from the text of other parts of the Vulgate, but also differs from the first Epistle in the rendering of words common to both; . . . it further appears that it differs not less clearly from the Epistle of St. Jude (which was received in the African Church) in those parts which are almost identical in the Greek.' 'The supposition,' he adds, 'that it was admitted into the Canon at the same time with them becomes at once unnatural.'

To sum up the evidence of the 3rd cent.: 2 P was probably commented on by Clement, but regarded as the companion, not of 1 P but of the Apocalypse of Peter; it is not, however, quoted in his extant works. Origen certainly knew of the Epistle as accepted by some, but rejected by others; it is probable that he himself did not use it. It was received into the Canon by the Egyptian Churches, but the time of its reception we do not know. It was accepted in Asia Minor by Firmilian and Methodius, the latter of whom regards the Apocalypse of Peter as 'inspired' (Conviv. Virg. ii. 6). It is probable, but not certain, that it was known at Rome in the time of Hippolytus. Neither Tertullian nor Cyprian refers to it, and it does not appear to have been included among the Catholic Epistles in any but the late pre-Hieronymian Latin texts. There is no Western attestation of the Epistle during this period.

(3) We now pass to the 4th cent., when the place which, as will appear, 2 P had already secured among the Apostolic books became assured everywhere except in the Syrian Church. (a) Eusebius. It appears from HE II. xxiii. 25 (τῆς λεγομένης Ἰούδα, μαῖς καὶ αὐτῆς ὁσῆς τῶν ἐπτὰ λεγομένων καθολικῶν) that the phrase 'Catholic Epistles' (cf. vi. xiv. 1) was already a recognized term, and that they were already commonly regarded as seven in number. We turn to the two great passages in which Eus. deals with the books of the NT. In HE III. iii., after mentioning 1 P as 'certainly genuine,' he continues, τὴν δὲ φερομένην δευτέραν οὐκ ἐνδιάθῃσκον μὲν εἶναι παρειλήφαμεν· ὁμῶς δὲ πολλοῖς χρῆσιμος φανεῖσα, μετὰ τῶν ἄλλων ἐσπουδάσθη γραφῶν. He then refers to the Acts of Peter, the Gospel, the Preaching, and the Apocalypse, and, after stating the plan and purpose of his references to the books of the NT, he gives his own judgment in regard to 2 P—τὰ μὲν ὀνομαζόμενα Πέτρου, ὧν μόνην μίαν γνησίαν ἔργων ἐπιστολὴν καὶ παρὰ τοῖς πάλαι πρεσβυτέροις ὠμολογημένην, τοσαῦτα. In the later passage (III. xxv.) Eus. divides the books into two main classes—the accepted books (ὀμολογούμενα) and the disputed books (ἀντιλεγόμενα). The latter class is again subdivided. There are within it (α) 'disputed books which are yet recognized by most (γνώριμα τοῖς πολλοῖς),' and (β) 'disputed books which are spurious (ψόθα).' To the latter subdivision belongs (among other books) the Apocalypse of Peter; to the former, 'the so-called Epistle of James, that of Jude, the Second Epistle of Peter, and the so-named Second and Third of John.' From these passages of Eus. we learn some important points about 2 P. (i.) The Catholic Epistles were, at the time Eus. wrote, regarded (at least in some quarters) as seven in number;* (ii.) the judgment of the past, as Eus. had received it, was against 2 P—οὐκ ἐνδιάθῃσκον μὲν εἶναι παρειλήφαμεν. (iii.) The reason why 2 P had been 'studied (ἐσπουδάσθη) in company with the other Scriptures' was, according to Eus., that it was regarded very commonly as answering the purposes of practical edification (πολλοῖς χρῆσιμος φανεῖσα). (iv.) Eus. did not himself receive 2 P as γνησία ἐπιστολή. When he speaks of 1 P, which he accepted without a doubt, as παρὰ τοῖς πάλαι πρεσβυτέροις ὠμολογημένην (cf. § 1), he clearly implies that 2 P was deficient in such recognition. The opinion of Eus. is significant. His knowledge of early Christian literature was wide. He was acquainted with many works which are lost to us. When, then, the modern critic fails to discover in early writings any certain trace of 2 P, his experience is only a repetition of that of Eusebius. And further, the evidence of Eus. indicates that the recovery of such lost books as those of Papias and Hegesippus, which were known to him, would in all probability supply us with no fresh evidence as to 2 P.

We turn now to the great Churches of the East, and to the great writers whose influence dominated Western Christendom in the 4th century and onwards.

(i.) The Churches of Syria.—(a) The Syriac-speaking Churches. The Syriac Vulgate (Peshitta) contained only three of the Catholic Epistles, viz. James, 1 P, 1 Jn. There do not appear to be any quotations from or references to 2 P in Aphraat or in the Syriac works of Ephraem.† At a much later time (i.e. the 13th cent.) Ebed Jesu, a Nestorian bishop of Nisibis, writes, 'Tres autem

* The fact that seven Catholic Epistles appear for the first time, so far as the present writer knows, in Eusebius of Cæsarea, confirms the suggestion of Sanday (Studia Bibl. et Eccles. iii. pp. 253, 259), that 'it is possible that the collection of seven Epistles may have originated [at Jerusalem]; or if brought in the first instance from Egypt, it would seem to have been at Jerusalem that it first became established.'

† F. H. Woods in Studia Biblica et Ecclesiastica iii. p. 138. In v. 342 B. Eph. has the words 'the day of the Lord is a thief.' The phrase has been thought to be derived from 2 P 310, for, when it is compared with the Pesh. of 1 Th 5, it will be noticed that (1) 'in the night' is omitted, (2) 'the Lord' takes the place of 'our Lord.' But such slight differences and coincidences are hardly worth consideration in the case of a common proverbial expression.

Epistolæ quæ inscribuntur Apostolis in omni codice et lingua, Jacobo scilicet et Petro et Joanni; et Catholicæ nuncupantur' (Assemani, Bibl. Or. iii. Pars i. p. 9 f.). On the other hand, the discoveries and investigations of Dr. Gwynn of Dublin (Royal Irish Acad. Transactions, xxvii. p. 269 ff., xxx. p. 347 ff.) show that the Harklensian version of 2 P, Jude, and 2, 3 Jn is a revision of the text of these Epistles published by Pococke in 1630, which is given in the printed editions of the Peshitta; and further, that the Pococke text of these Epistles was a part of the Philoxenian version made by Polycarp for Xenaias or Philoxenus, the Monophysite bishop of Mabug about the year A.D. 500. It appears, therefore, that 2 P was rejected by the early Syrian Church, but that early in the 6th cent. it was accepted at least in the Monophysite branch of that Church. (β) The Greek School of Antioch. Among the innumerable quotations from and allusions to Scripture found in the writings of Chrysostom,* Theodore, and Theodoret, there does not appear to be one reference to 2 P. In the Synopsis commonly ascribed to Chrysostom (Migne, Pat. Gr. lvi. 314 ff.) the phrase used—τῶν καθολικῶν ἐπιστολῶν τρεῖς—implies not only the acceptance of three Epistles, but the rejection of others. The views of Theodore are preserved (see arts. on JUDE and 1 PETER) in Junilius' treatise, Instituta Regularia. Of the Catholic Epistles only 1 P and 1 Jn are accepted. 'Adiungunt quam plurimi quinque alias, quæ apostolorum canonicæ nuncupantur.' These five Epistles, among which is 2 P, are described as being mediæ auctoritatis (Kihn, Theodore p. 478 ff.). Thus 2 P had no place in the Syriac NT. The great Antiochene school of exegetes joined their Syriac-speaking neighbours in its rejection. Moreover, since Chrysostom's expositions at any rate were addressed to popular audiences, the rejection of the Epistle by the great teachers in question must have reflected the usage of the Antiochene Church generally in the matter. (ii.) Asia Minor. 2 P has a place in the list of Gregory Nazianzen; yet neither he nor Gregory of Nyssa nor Basil appears to quote or to refer to the Epistle (Westcott, Canon p. 446). An expression of doubt is found in the list of Amphilocheus, bishop of Iconium (c. 380 A.D.)—καθολικῶν ἐπιστολῶν | τινὲς μὲν ἐπτὰ φασιν, οἱ δὲ τρεῖς μόναι | χρῆται δέχσασθαι. (iii.) Jerusalem. Cyril includes 2 P in his list of books, as does his contemporary and fellow-countryman Epiphanius (cf. Zahn, Gesch. Kan. II. i. p. 226 n.). (iv.) Alexandria. The list of NT books given by Athanasius in one of his Festal Epistles includes 2 P. Towards the end of the century, however, the doubt as to 2 P finds expression in the commentary on the Epistle by Didymus. His words, as they are preserved in the Latin translation, are as follows: 'Non est igitur ignorandum presentem epistolam esse falsatam, quæ licet publicetur non tamen in canone est' (Migne, Pat. Gr. xxxix. 1774). The Latin phrase printed above in italics probably represents the Greek words ὡς νοθεύεται αὐτὴ ἢ ἐπιστολή. If this be so, the passage conveys not the writer's own view, but a report of the opinion of others. Zahn (Gesch. Kan. I. i. p. 312) urges that Didymus is here recording a judgment which is a relic of the 2nd or 3rd cent., though expressed in the language of later times. The similarity of the terms used to those employed by Eusebius in reference to James (Eus. II. xxiii. 25) suggests rather that Didymus here preserves an opinion more or less contemporary with himself,—the view probably of scholars who conceded a public use of the book—'it seemed useful to many' (Eus. HE iii. iii. 1),—but protested against its being placed on the same level as books whose authenticity was not questioned. (v.) Constantinople. The Church in New Rome was in many respects the daughter of the Church at Antioch. But she did not inherit any doubts as to the full Canon of the NT. Constantinople was the centre and the type of Imperial influence on matters ecclesiastical and religious. The preparation, which Constantine entrusted to Eusebius, of 'fifty copies of the Divine Scriptures' for use in the new capital, had important results. It was natural that these copies should contain all the books of the NT which had gained general recognition. A quasi-official standard was thus set up; and the distinction between 'acknowledged' and 'disputed' books soon became little more than a matter of antiquarian interest (Westcott, Canon p. 427).

We turn to the West. There appears to be no ante-Nicene evidence for 2 P in the West. It is quoted in the last quarter of the 4th century by Ambrose of Milan (de Fide iii. 12, 'Petrus sanctus adseruit dicens Quapropter satagite,' etc. (1<sup>9</sup>)), and by Priscillian in Spain (see above, p. 796). It has a place in the list of Philastrius of Brescia (c. 385), and later in that of Rufinus (c. 410). On the other hand, in the Canon Rommensianus, which appears to be an African list of the middle of the 4th cent., it is inserted, but inserted with a protest—

epistolae Iohannis III ūf CCCCL una sola
epistolae Petri II ūer CCC
una sola.

The author of the list, transcribing an older catalogue, added an expression of his own doubt.* The decisive influences, however, in Western Christendom were those of Jerome and Augustine. The latter, though not insensible to the effect on the authority of a book caused by its rejection in some quarters (de Doctr. Chr. ii. 12, 13), yet in practice appealed without distinction to all the books of our NT. Jerome was acquainted with the widespread doubts as to the genuineness of 2 P. In the section in the de Virr. Illustr. which deals with St. Peter, he says, 'Scripsit duas epistolas quæ catholicæ nominantur; quarum secunda a plerisque eius esse negatur propter stili cum priore dissonantiam.' The kind of objection which they are alleged to have urged limits the reference of a plerisque: Jerome has in mind the doubts of the learned. This dissonantia he thus accounts for (Quest. ad Hedib., Migne, Patr. Lat. xxii. 1002), 'Duæ epistolæ quæ feruntur Petri stilo inter se et caractere discrepant structuraque uerborum. Ex quo intelligimus pro necessitate rerum diuersis eum usum interpretibus.' These doubts, however, Jerome himself puts on one side, and in his letter to Paulinus (Migne, Patr. Lat. xxii. 548) he speaks of the books which make up our NT without any sign of differentiating between them—'Paulus Apostolus ad septem ecclesias scribit . . . Iacobus Petrus Joannes Judas Apostoli septem epistolas ediderunt.' This view, which doubtless represents that of the Church of Rome, found expression in the Canon of the Vulgate. The recognition in this version of the Seven Catholic Epistles practically closed the question in the West. Thus during the course of the 4th cent. the Epistle was finally received into the NT of Greek-speaking and Latin-speaking Christendom, though the Syriac-speaking Churches still refused to it entrance into their Canon.

To sum up: The evidence as to the reception of 2 P in the Church has now been given and sifted.

* Harnack (Theol. Litzg. 1886, col. 173) suggests that in the repeated una sola there is in one case a reference to James, in the other a reference to Jude. The word sola, however, would remain unexplained (see Zahn, Gesch. Kan. ii. i. p. 155 n.; Sanday in Studia Bibl. et Eccles. iii. p. 243 ff.).

It becomes necessary to interpret it as a whole. We do not find any certain trace of 2 P in the extant literature of the 2nd cent. Coincidences, which have been adduced to prove literary indebtedness, turn out on examination to be nothing more than illustrations, literary or doctrinal. Further, the words of Eusebius, as was pointed out above, seem to exclude the possibility that books now lost contained clear references to 2 P. Spitta and Zahn (see above, p. 798) agree in finding an explanation of the obscurity in which the Epistle remained in the supposition that it was addressed by St. Peter to Jewish Christians, and that Gentile Christians would not be likely to take much interest in a document written for Jewish fellow-believers. The theory is open to criticism in several directions. (i.) It cannot be said that there is anything in the Epistle itself which suggests that it was addressed by a Jew to Jews. The negative argument urged against the supposition that 1 P was sent to Jewish Churches is valid here; see above, p. 783. (ii.) But let it be granted that internal evidence favours the supposition that it was addressed to Jewish converts. Would such a destination be likely to be a bar to its recognition in other Churches? The Epistle of St. James and that to the Hebrews were both addressed to Jewish communities; and though they were by no means universally accepted in ancient times, yet their history stands in marked contrast to that of 2 P. (iii.) The argument for the authenticity of 2 P, as urged by these critics, depends largely on the witness of the Ep. of St. Jude, which in their view was sent to the same Church or Churches as 2 P. Why, then, was the brief Epistle of one who was not an apostle circulated widely, while a longer Epistle of the chief of the Lord's personal followers was permitted to remain in absolute obscurity?

The want of allusions to the Ep. and of reminiscences of its language is more significant when two further considerations are taken into account. In the first place, the style of the Epistle is so remarkable that its phrases, if known, could hardly fail to be remembered, and, if regarded as apostolic, to be appealed to; and it must be added that, if appealed to, they could not but be reproduced in a form which would make recognition easy and obvious. In the second place, the Epistle would have been a controversial armoury for the assailants of the Gnostics. Had it been known and looked on as authoritative, it could not but have been used, as 1 John and 2 John are used by Irenæus (i. 16. 3, iii. 16. 5, 8). The first piece of certain evidence is the passage from Origen quoted by Eusebius, though it hardly admits of doubt that the Epistle was known to Clement of Alexandria. It is certain that during the 3rd cent. the Epistle gained acceptance in certain Churches, though the evidence is too scanty and (e.g. as to the date of the Egyptian and of the Old Latin texts) too uncertain for us to define with any exactness what those Churches were. It is clear also that by the time of Eusebius the recognition of Seven Catholic Epistles had (at least in Churches which he knew best) become usual. On the other hand, the evidence of Origen, Eusebius, Didymus, and Jerome shows that those teachers whose knowledge of Christian literature prior to their own days was widest, were conscious of the doubt which attached to 2 P.

How, then, was 2 P received into the Canon? The history is very obscure, but the evidence suggests that there were three stages. (a) The information which we possess as to the Hypotyposes of Clement leads us to think (see above, p. 803) that at Alexandria, at the beginning of the 3rd cent., 2 P was regarded as the companion of the Apocalypse of Peter rather than of 1 P. This is to some extent confirmed by the position of Methodius, who used 2 P (see above, p. 804), but who also counted the Apocalypse of Peter among 'divinely inspired writings' (Conviv. Virg. ii. 6; Migne, Pat. Gr. xviii. 57). (b) If this be so, yet before the time of Eusebius the two documents had parted company. Eusebius, who did not himself accept 2 P, gives us his view of the way in which before his time 2 P had secured a place among the Catholic Epistles—πολλοῖς χρήσιμος φανεῖσα μετὰ τῶν ἄλλων ἐσπουδάσθη γραφῶν. When once it was 'studied with the other Scriptures,' it could not fail to attach itself to 1 P, for it proclaimed itself as a 'second Epistle' of that apostle (3<sup>a</sup>). This juxtaposition would necessarily confirm the respect already paid to it, and would, for most readers, decide at once its apostolic authorship. Further, we may conjecture that, when other Epistles besides the three—1 P, 1 Jn, Ja—were reckoned as Catholic Epistles, there would be a natural tendency to make that group seven in number. So the collection would seem to have a sacred completeness, and also to be brought into relation with the Pauline collection. For St. Paul wrote to Seven Churches (Canon Murat.; Jerome, ad Paul. Ep. liii. 8, Migne, Pat. Lat. xxii. 548), and his Epistles were regarded as fourteen in number. Again, the Apocalypse was addressed to Seven Churches. (c) We have already seen how, notwithstanding the doubts of the learned, the fuller Canon of the Catholic Epistles gained final recognition in the Greek Churches of the East and in the Western Churches. Reviewing the whole history, we remark that the case of 2 P is unlike that of Jude. We find no trace of the Epistle in the period when the tradition of apostolic days was still living. This lack of early evidence, even when taken in conjunction with the paucity of 3rd cent. evidence, the doubts expressed by, e.g., Origen and Eusebius, and the absence of the Epistle from the NT of the Syriac-speaking Church, does not prove its spuriousness. But the absolute insufficiency of external evidence creates a presumption against its genuineness, and throws the whole burden of proof on the internal evidence of the Epistle itself.

3. VOCABULARY AND STYLE.—(a) Vocabulary. A full examination of the remarkable vocabulary of 2 P is beyond the limits of this article. The following are the main points:—

(i.) The influence of the LXX.—The Epistle contains no formal quotation from the OT. WH use uncial type only in five places—22 (Is 628) 222 (Pr 2611) 38 (Ps 90 (39) 4) 312 (Is 344) 313 (Is 6517 6622). But in none of these passages is the resemblance of language so close as to make the reference to the LXX certain. In 22 (δὲ αὐτῶν . . . βασιλευσθησάντων) the writer perhaps does not adopt a type of phrase common in early Christian literature; see Lightfoot on Clement, 1. The only word common to 222 and Pr 2611 is κῶνος, and we may have a current proverb based on the words of Proverbs. Much the same may be said of 38 (see above, p. 800). In 312<sup>a</sup> the writer is perhaps adopting the phraseology of Christian apocalyptic writings based on Is (cf. Rev 21<sup>a</sup>, Apoc. Petr. apud Macarius Magn. iv. 7; see Lightfoot on '2 Clem.' xvi.). Other LXX phrases are εἰρήνη πληθυνθείη 12 (Dn 398, but see 1 P 12, Jude 2), ἡ αἰώνιος βασιλεία 111 (Dn 3100), κατακλυσιὸν ἐπάγειν 25 (Gn 617), ἐπ' ἐσχάτων τῶν ἡμερῶν 39 (e.g. Jos 2427). For ἐν τῷ αἰῶνι ὄρει (118) compare Ps 26, Is 119 2713 6818, Ezk 2314 (where, however, 'my', 'thy', or the like, is always added). The phrase ἡμέραν ἐξ ἡμέρας 29 (LXX 2) is also classical (Eur. Rhesus 445). Words used in this Epistle which are characteristic of the LXX are ἐλεγχίς (Job 2), ἐντροπῶν (LXX 5), καθαρισμός (common in LXX), κατακλύζειν (LXX 6, Wis 2), καταποντίζειν (2 Mac 1, 3 Mac 2), καταστροφή (Gn 1920), μεγαλιότης (LXX 4), μεγαλοπρεπής (Dt 1, 2 Mac 2, 3 Mac 1; see above, p. 799), μάστιγος (common in LXX), υπατάζειν (LXX 11), σκήνωμα (common in LXX), ὑποζυγίον (common in LXX = 'ass'). Some of these words, however, such as καθαρισμός, μάστιγος, were at an early period adopted into the vocabulary of the Church, and so, without any borrowing from the LXX, would naturally be used by a Christian writer. That the author of 2 P derived some of his words and phrases from the LXX is clear. But it is no less clear that he was not steeped in its language. It was not a book which he was wont 'nocturna uersare manu, uersare diurna.'

(ii.) Classical words.—A large element in the vocabulary consists of what may be roughly described as classical words. Care, however, must be taken not to set up a delusive standard. In his articles on 2 P in Expos. (Ser. ii. vol. iii.) E. A. Abbott writes thus (p. 206): 'In order to appreciate the resemblance between this Indian-English [i.e. a passage quoted from the Madras Mail] and the style of the Second Epistle, we must bear in mind that some of the words employed by the author of the latter are very rare in Greek literature; and others, though good classical Greek in themselves, are rare or non-existent in the New Testament.' A modern scholar, with his apparatus of NT lexicons and concordances, is apt unconsciously to isolate the vocabulary of the NT writers or of a certain section of them, and, forgetting that the limits of this vocabulary are accidental, to make it something of an absolute rule by which to judge a document whose authenticity is doubtful. With this caution the following list of words is given which do not occur in the NT except in 2 P*—ἄθεσμος (3 Mac 2, Diod., Philo, Joseph., Plut.), ἀκατάπαντος (v.l. in 214; Polyb., Diod., Joseph., Plut.), ἄλωσις (LXX 1; Pind., Herod., Æsch.), ἀμαρβής (Symm. (Ps); Herod. and onwards), ἀμώμιτος (Hom., inscr., adv. Herod.; v.l. in Ph 215), ἀποσείγειν (common Herod. and onwards; Sir 1), ἀργίην (Soph., Eur., and onwards; LXX 6), ἀστήριτος (Anthol., Longin.), ἀνχημρός (Eur., Plato, etc.; Apoc. Petri), βλέμμα (Æsch. and onwards; on meaning see below), βέρβρος (LXX 1; Æsch. and onwards; comp. in βορβόρα κλιεσθαι Epict. Diss. 4. 11. 29), βραδυνός (Hom. and onwards), διανυάζειν (Polyb., Plut., Aq. (Job)), δυσνόητος (Lucian, Diog. Laert.), ἐγκατοικίην (Herod., Eur., Polyb.), ἐκίσσος (Herod. and onwards common), ἐκπαλαί (Philo, Joseph., Plut., Arrian), ἐξακολουθεῖν (LXX 6; Polyb., Joseph., Plut., Dion. Hal., Epict.), ἰταγγέλιμα (Dem., Isocr., Aristot.), ἰπλοῦσις (Aq. (Gn), Sym. (Hos); Hermas, Iren., Clem., Sext. Emp., Heliod.; verb Mk), ἰσότης (Æsch., Dem. 'spectator'; Plut., Inscr. in reference to mysteries), ἰσότης (Philo, Joseph., Plut., Lucian, Æl.), λίθην λαβῆν (Jos. Ant. ii. ix. 1), μίσσημα (LXX 8; Tragg. and onwards common), μωπρός (Wis 1, 1 Mac 1; Aq. (Dt), Symm. (K), Plut., Test. xii. Patr., Hermas), δύλιος (Aq. (Is); Anthol.), ἰμύχλη (LXX 10; Hom. (Il.), Æsch., Ar. Xen., Aristot.), παραινόμεν (LXX 9; Thuc., Plato, Polyb., Dion. Hal.), παρισάγειν (Isocr., Polyb., Plut., Diod.), παρισάφειν (Dem. 'to bring in a law'), πλαστός (Herod., Eur., Xen., Lucian), σπρηγμός (Aristot., Diod., Plut.), στραβόειν (LXX 1, 3 Mac 1, 4 Mac 4; Herod. and onwards common in literal sense), ταχνός (LXX 6; Theocr., Callim., Aratus), τεφρόν (Theophr., Lycophro, Philo, Dion. Cass., Antonin., Anthol.), ταίσις (LXX 3; Hom. and onwards common), τελμητός (Thuc., Philo, Joseph., Plut., Lucian) 3; (LXX 7; Hom. and onwards common), φωσφόρος (Tim. Lect., Philo).

(iii.) Very rare or unique words.—They are ἀκατάπαντος (v.l. in 214; on the possible origin and meaning of the word see Hort's Introduction [Notes p. 170]), ἰμωπρωμένη (KL and other authorities omit in ισπ. in 38), ἰξέρημα, κλιερός (so BC* curs 4; κλιερωμα KAKLP, etc.), παραρρόνια, ροῖζῶδον, ταρταροῦν. Of these, two (ἰξέρημα and κλιερός) occur in the two proverbs cited in 22, and we cannot be sure therefore that they are due to the writer himself. In the case of three of the words the matter is one of form. The word ἰμωπρωμένη does not seem to occur elsewhere; but ἰμωπρωμένος, which does not occur in profane writers, is found in LXX 6, in Theodot. 1, in an anonymous Greek version 2, and in He 1138. Again, there does not seem to be anything to choose in point of rarity between κλιερός and κλιερωμα. For both, a reference is given in the lexicons to a work on farriery (Hippiatrica) of late date. The former is found in Theod. (Pr 215), the latter in Symm. (Ezk 1013). The former expresses the act of rolling, the kindred Aristotelian word κλίσις being inadmissible since it has a technical athletic sense; the latter properly the thing rolled, and so perhaps the place of rolling—the word κλιεστρα, which is used in Xen. Eq. 5. 3, is apparently a technical term in the training of horses. Again, if παραρρόνισιν is found in Plato and Hippocrates, the παραρρόνια of 2 P shares the opprobrium of being a ἀπαξ λεγόμενον with παραρρόνισις, which is used by the LXX in Zec 124. Again, for ροῖζῶδον (as for ροῖζῶδες) Nicander, a poet who wrote about 150 B.C., is quoted, the verb (ροῖζειν) and the noun (ροῖζος) both being recognized Greek words. Again, the verb ἰξέρην is used of vomiting (metaphorically) in classical Greek (Aristoph.) and in Aquila (Lv 1828), and 'vomit' is a natural meaning of ἰξέρημα. Lastly, though ταρταροῦν is found apparently only in 2 P and in a scholium on Homer, the compound καταταρταροῦν is used by Apollodorus and Sextus Empiricus. The words which have been examined are, it cannot be denied, strange and unusual terms; but something can be said in defence of each of them. The papyri which have been discovered of late years have brought home to us our ignorance of colloquial Greek, and suggest caution in prematurely condemning a word found only in a particular writer as the barbarism of an individual.

(iv.) Solecisms.—There are certain expressions in the Epistle which, so far as our knowledge of the language goes, appear to be contrary to usage. They are as follows:—

(a) Βλέμμα (Βλέμματι καὶ ἀκοῇ, 28). Field (Notes on Trans. of NT p. 241) writes thus: 'In seeing and hearing. This seems to be the only admissible interpretation, though quite at variance with the use of βλέμμα in good writers. . . St. Peter should have written either ὄρασι καὶ ἀκοῇ or βλέπον καὶ ἀκούον.'

(b) καυσόσθαι (210. 12). It is pointed out that Dioscorides (c. 100 A.D.) and Galen (c. 160 A.D.), both medical writers, use the word in the sense of 'to suffer from καῖνος, i.e. a remittent fever. The word does not appear to occur elsewhere. On the other hand, it must be noticed that Athenæus (see Sophocles, Lexicon) uses the cognate noun καῖνος of 'burnt soil,' and that Hesychius assigns to it the meaning of 'a volcanic country.'

* In this list the LXX includes the Apocrypha. Words are not included which are given under the next (iii.) section.

(c) μειλίχων (112; so NABCP curs<sup>4</sup> Egyptt (boh sah), ohe amilašaw KL, etc., Syr-hk). Field (ib. p. 240) writes thus: 'RV renders [μειλίχων] "I shall be ready," and Alford "I will be sure"; but no example of any such use of μειλίχων is forthcoming. . . . I think it not improbable that St. Peter wrote διὰ μείλησιν, "I will take care," a rare but not unexampled construction for διὰ μέλησιν μαι.'

(d) μητὴν ποιήσαντες (115). The phrase is used from Herodotus onwards with the sense 'to make mention of.' In the passage quoted from Thucydides ii. 54 (πρὸς ἃ ἔπασχον τὴν μητὴν ἱστούμενοι), the expression signifies 'they shaped their recollections' (cf. i. 140, πρὸς τὰς συμφοράς καὶ τὰς γνάμους τρεπομένους). In Arist. Rhet. iii. 12. 4, μητὴν ποιήσαντες means 'he has made him famous' (see Cope's note). But no instance of the phrase in the sense of 'to remember' is forthcoming.

(e) μωπάζειν (τυφλὸς ἴστω μωπάζων, 19). The passage quoted for the verb from Arist. Probl. 31. 16. 25 (μωπάζειν λέγονται οἱ ἐκ γίνεσθαι τὰ μὲν ἔργα βλέποντες, τὰ δὲ εἰς ἀποστάσεως οὐχ ὀράντες) is not found in Bekker's text. The adjective μωπῶν, however, occurs several times in the passage, as in Rhet. iii. 11. 12, in the technical sense 'shortsighted,' nor is it found with any other meaning. There seems to be no justification at all from usage for the opinion of those who, like Spitta (p. 73 ff.), take μωπάζων in 2 P to imply 'willful blindness,' and so explain its position after τυφλὸς ἴστω; nor is such a meaning natural. There can be little doubt that the writer of 2 P is here guilty of a rhetorical bathos.

(f) παρισπέρειν (σπουδὴν πᾶσαν παρισπέρειν, 15). Wetstein quotes Jos. and Diod. for the phrase σπουδὴν πᾶσαν ἐπιφέρειν. It must, however, be confessed that the RV 'adding on your part' is rather a benevolent paraphrase than a translation (παρ-ισπέρειν and similar words having the idea of transmission), and that it is difficult to assign any meaning which can be justified by usage to the double compound. In 2<sup>1</sup> the similarly formed verb παρισπέρειν is correctly and pertinently used (cf. Gal 2<sup>4</sup>, Jude 4).

(g) σειρός (σειροὺς ζώον, 24; so NABO Aug. al, σειραῖς KL, etc., boh Syr-hk). Field (ib. p. 241) writes thus: 'σειρός, σιρός, or σιρρός, "a pit," or "excavation," properly for the storage of grain, as Demosth. p. 100, 23. . . . Philo. de Tel. Constr. p. 86. . . . And J. Pollux joins κατάγειοι οἰκίσαι, καὶ σειροὶ, καὶ φρίατα, καὶ λάκαα. Alford wrongly translates "dens," and says: "The word is used for a wolf's den by Longus i. 11"; but he can never have read the passage, in which the method of trapping a she-wolf is thus described: συλλέθοντες οὐ οὐ κομῶνται νύκτωρ, σειροὺς ὀρύσσουσι τὸ εἶδος ὀργυίας. . . . Here too, then, it seems probable that the author of 2 P has in the midst of a somewhat magnificent phrase interpolated a word with which a technical sense was commonly, if not exclusively, associated.*

(v.) We pass on to note a remarkable characteristic of the vocabulary of 2 P, viz. its iteration. There are some words which must be repeated, whenever it is necessary to express distinctly and briefly the idea which they connote (e.g. πίστις); and to this class some of the words in the following list may justly be thought to belong. But it is obvious that in the majority of cases there is no such justification. And it is best to give the list in full that this peculiarity of the Epistle may be clearly seen. It will be remarked (1) that some of the words and phrases repeated are in themselves unusual; (2) that they sometimes occur more than once within a very short space.

Words (or kindred words) and phrases repeated are—ἀθεῖστος 27 219; ἀποφύγειν 14 218 20; ἀτάκται 21 bis. 3 37. 16; ἀσπίλοι 27, ἀσπίλοι 29 18; βίβλαι 110 10; δεδωρημένος 13, δεδώρηται 14; δέλεος 21 14 18; ἐκπαῖ 23 35; ἐκακολοῦν 116 22 15; ἐπαγγελία 34 9, ἐπαγγέλλομαι 219, ἐπαγγέλλω 14 31<sup>9</sup>; ἐπαγαγὼν 21 5; ἐπιχρηρῶν 15 11; ἐπίσταμαι 13 6 7 31; ἐπίσταμαι 28, ἀσπίλῃ 25 37; ζῆφος 24 17; καταβαῖ 219<sup>1</sup>; ἰδίω 13 20 216 22 33 16 17; καυνοῦμαι 310 12; καυθάνω 35 8; λέσθαι 310 11 12; μισθὸς ἀδικίας 218 15; μισοῦμαι 220, μισοῦμαι 210; παροῦσι 119, παροῦσιν 119; βιβλαῖαν. . . ποιήσασθαι παρὰ τὸν πῶνόντες 110; προσοχῶν 312 13 14; σπουδάζειν 110 15 31<sup>4</sup>, σπουδῆ 15; σπυρμιόκο 317, ἐσπυρμιόκο 112, ἀσπυρμιόκο 214 310; πυρμιόκο 114 21; τηρῶν (for future judgment) 24 9 17 37; τοῦτο πρῶτον γινώσκοντες 120 35; ὑπομιμνήσκω 112, διενγίρω ἐν ὑπομνήσει 113 31; ὡς ἐἴσατο 246; φωνὴ ἰνερθίστα 117 18, ἠνίχθη προσηγία 121, φθέρων 212, φθέρῃ 14 212 (bis); φθιγγεῖσθαι 216 18.

(vi.) There are some interesting pairs of synonyms found in the Epistle. (a) ἀγάπη, φιλανθρωπία (17), the thought apparently being that 'love of the brethren' must lead on to 'love' in the widest sense (contrast 1 P 1 22. 48; see Westcott on 1 John 2 10). (b) ἀσπίλοι καὶ ἀμώμητοι (314), cf. σπίλοι καὶ μώμοι (213). In 1 P 1 19 we have ἀμώμοι καὶ ἀσπίλοι. The word μώμος (=blame, disgrace, in classical Greek) is common in the LXX as representing in sound and approximately in sense the Hebr. מום ('blemish,' in the case of sacrificial victims); hence also frequently in the LXX the word ἀμώμος (of a victim 'without blemish'). Thus the two words ἀμώμος and ἀσπίλοι can with propriety stand side by side. The writer of 2 P, however, connects together ἀσπίλοι and ἀμώμητοι (cf. v. l. in Ph 2 15), apparently transferring to the latter word the special sense which had become attached to ἀμώμος, though it should be noticed that μωμῶσθαι is once used in the LXX (Dt 32 5) in translating מום. (c) κλήσιν καὶ ἐκλογὴν (110), see Lightfoot on Col 3 12. (d) λόγος, φωνή (118c). There is 'a recognized distinction between λόγος and φωνή, as denoting respectively "an intelligible utterance" and an "irrational cry"' (Lightfoot on Ignatius, Rom. 2); cf. Jn 1 14 23. Here the distinction between the two words lies in the transitoriness of the φωνή (cf. Lk 9 8) and the permanence of 'the prophetic λόγος.' But it is remarkable that the term of inferior dignity is here used of the direct utterance of God Himself. (e) τυφλὸς ἴστω μωπάζων (see above).

The vocabulary, then, of the Epistle is a singular one. The writer affects unusual, striking, poetical words. He is apt to amplify or decorate a current phrase in a way which makes its appropriateness at least questionable (e.g. σπουδὴν πᾶσαν παρισπέρειν, ἀσπίλοι καὶ ἀμώμητοι). Briefly, his vocabulary is to a remarkable degree an ambitious one. On the other hand, the extraordinary list of repetitions stamps it as poor and inadequate. The reader is constantly tempted to think that the author intentionally dwells upon a sonorous word, which pleases his fancy, unconscious that the unnecessary recurrence of a word spoils the literary effect. Further, the writer can hardly be defended against the charge of using words and phrases incorrectly. There is little doubt that this indictment has been exaggerated, and that our ignorance of colloquial Greek is apt to betray us into condemning words which with fuller knowledge we should accept without question. But, as a matter of fact, we do not find that good Greek writers hit upon expressions which seem to us uncouth in themselves, and which lack authority, with anything like the same frequency as the writer of 2 Peter.

(b) From the Vocabulary we turn to more general characteristics of Style. The writer, fond as he is of unusual words, has but a poor supply of connecting particles (e.g. μέν . . . δέ is not found in the Epistle). Thus it is remarkable how sentence after sentence is linked to the preceding words by means of γάρ—1<sup>8-11</sup> (4 times), 2<sup>18-21</sup> (4 times); and how relatives (sometimes involving an awkward ambiguity) are employed for the same purpose—1<sup>4</sup> 2<sup>2</sup> 3<sup>1</sup> 5. 12. Closely connected with this poverty of connecting particles is the fact that we have in the Epistle involved and cumbrous sentences, e.g. 13<sup>1</sup>. (where, if the reading διὰ δόξης be adopted, διὰ is used four times), 2<sup>12-16</sup>. The following points claim notice under this general heading—In 24<sup>1</sup> we have the phrase οὐκ ἐφέριστο ἀλλά twice used, and the repetition is made the more unpleasing by the fact that the first ἀλλά introduces a contrast differing in kind from that introduced by the second (ἀλλά . . . παρέδωκεν, ἀλλά . . . ἐφύλαξεν). In 21<sup>8</sup> there is an awkward involution of one participial clause in another (τοῦς . . . ἀποφεύγοντας τοῦς ἐν πλάνῃ ἀναστρεφομένους), while in v. 20 ἀποφυγόντες is used of a set of persons other than those referred to in the τοῦς ἀποφεύγοντας of v. 18. Again, the piled-up genitives of 3<sup>2</sup> are very cumbrous, and not free from ambiguity (but on the possibility of a 'primitive' error see below, p. 811). Again, the double ἀπό and the οὐτως of 3<sup>4</sup> (ἀφ' ἧς οἱ πατέρες ἐκοιμήθησαν, πάντα οὕτως διαμένει ἀπ' ἀρχῆς κτίσεως) confuse the meaning. Again, while in Jude 10 the φυσικῶς (ὅσα δὲ φυσικῶς ὡς τὰ ἄλογα ζῶα ἐπίστανται) is natural and forcible, the corresponding phrase in 2 P 2 12 (ὡς ἄλογα ζῶα γεγεννημένα φυσικὰ εἰς ἄλωσιν) wants both simplicity and clearness. In the sentences which follow, the artificial elaboration of the writer's style is very conspicuous,—v. 12 γεγεννημένα . . . εἰς φθορὰν . . . ἐν τῇ φθορᾷ αὐτῶν καὶ φθαρῆσονται, ἀδικούμενοι μισθὸν ἀδικίας,—while in the next verse we have the strained and eccentric phrase ὀφθαλμοὺς ἔχοντες μεστοὺς μοιχαλίδος. There are, indeed, passages in the Epistle in which an earnestness of exhortation or of hope moulds the language, and in which we recognize a certain grandeur and power of diction, e.g. 1<sup>10</sup>, 19-21 3 11-13, 17<sup>1</sup>. But this is not the impression which we gain from the Epistle as a whole. The student probably has to confess that not seldom in reading the Epistle he has paused in perplexity over some startling or strange phrase. The experience which he has gained from time spent on the writings of St. Paul or St. John encourages him to hope that if he patiently ponders on the words they will at length reveal their meaning; that the reason why an unusual expression was chosen will in time become plain to him. But his hope is disappointed. The sense of the artificiality of the expression does not wear off, and, as he dwells on it, he cannot honestly say that its significance grows upon him. This Epistle is the one book of the NT which, it may be thought, gains by translation. The reader of the dignified and sober English of the AV, in which the ambiguities and eccentricities of the original are to a great extent obliterated, has probably a far higher idea of the literary style of the Epistle than the student of the Greek.

* It seems, however, not improbable that we have here a 'primitive' error. The writer of 2 P almost certainly had in mind Jude 6 (δαιμόνιοι αἰδίοις ὑπὸ ζῶον τετήρηκεν). If he wished instead of the common word δαιμόνιοι to substitute the much rarer word σειραῖς,—which, however, means 'cords or ropes' rather than 'heavy chains,'—it would be very likely that, with the sound of the twice-repeated -αις (δαιμόνιοι αἰδίοις) in his mind, he would write σειροὺς for σειραῖς.

The question has still to be faced how far the style and diction of 2 P assist us in arriving at a verdict as to its genuineness. We have no right to assume that an Epistle of St. Peter would be written in good Greek, or even that it would be free from offences against literary propriety and good taste. But style is an index of character. The Epistle does produce the impression of being a somewhat artificial piece of rhetoric. It shows throughout signs of self-conscious effort. The author appears to be ambitious of writing in a style which is beyond his literary power. We may hesitate to affirm that the literary style of the Epistle in itself absolutely disproves the Petrine authorship. But it must be allowed that it is hard to reconcile the literary character of the Epistle with the supposition that St. Peter wrote it.

4. INTERNAL EVIDENCE.—(a) References to the Gospel history. (i.) Spitta (p. 37 ff.) and Zahn (p. 60 ff.) take the words τοῦ καλέσαντος ἡμᾶς (1<sup>3</sup>) to refer to the Lord's call of the apostles (cf. ἡμῖν 1<sup>1</sup>). This interpretation of the passage would be less improbable if the reading ὑμῖν in place of ἡμῖν (1<sup>4</sup>) had satisfactory critical support. The natural, if not necessary, view of the whole context is to take the whole series ἡμῶν (1<sup>2</sup>), ἡμῖν, ἡμᾶς (1<sup>3</sup>), ἡμῖν (1<sup>4</sup>) as referring to the writer and the readers alike, joined together in their common faith. In that case 1<sup>3</sup> speaks of the fact that those addressed had been 'called,' while 1<sup>10</sup> takes up the thought and emphasizes the duty involved in that 'call.' There is therefore in all probability no reference to the Gospel history in 1<sup>3</sup>.

(ii.) In 1<sup>16ff.</sup> there is the reference to the Transfiguration. Spitta (pp. 101 ff. 493 ff.) and Zahn (p. 58) urge that this reference is independent of the accounts of that event in the Synoptic Gospels. Thus the former lays stress on the fact that in 2 P it is said that the Lord 'received honour and glory' from the Father. This points, he thinks, to what the parallel in the history of Moses (Ex 34<sup>29ff.</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>7ff.</sup>) would lead us to expect, viz. that the glory of Jesus was the reflexion of the glory of God—a communication of glory which preceded the attestation of the heavenly voice. This account of the glorification of Jesus on the Mountain is different from, and (as being more natural) earlier in date than, that given by the Synoptists. But, on the other hand, it must be noted (α) that the phrase is λαβῶν τιμὴν καὶ δόξαν (not λαβῶν . . . δόξαν), and that τιμὴ points rather to an attesting voice than to a reflected glory; (β) the obvious and almost necessary interpretation of the two participles λαβῶν . . . ἐνεχθείσης is that the latter defines and explains the former—'He received honour and glory when there came to Him,' etc. Omission of details of the history (e.g.

the presence of Moses and Elias) in an allusion contained in a letter cannot reasonably be taken to show that the writer is giving an account independent of, or more primitive than, that of the Synoptists. To pass to another point, the form of the words spoken by the heavenly voice in 2 P is nearer to that in Mt than to that in either of the two other Synoptists. The words as read in Cod. B (followed by WH)—ὁ υἱὸς μου ὁ ἀγαπητὸς μου οὕτως ἐστίν, εἰς ὃν εὐδόκησα—differ from those in Mt in (α) order; (β) insertion of the second μου (cf. Mt 12<sup>18</sup> (Is 42<sup>1</sup>)); (γ) substitution of εἰς ὃν (a construction not found elsewhere in LXX and NT *) for ἐν ᾧ; (δ) omission of ἀκούετε αὐτοῦ. The bulk of authorities (SACKL, etc.), however, give the words in a form which differs from that of Mt in two points only, (γ) (δ). Again, it is often suggested that the words τοῦ σκηνώματός μου (v. 14) and τὴν ἐμὴν ἐξοδὸν (v. 15), occurring in the immediately preceding context, contain references to the history of the Transfiguration (Mt 17<sup>4</sup> || Lk 9<sup>31</sup>). If this is so, then, since the term ἐξοδος is used by Luke, not in words which he reports, but in his own brief summary of the conversation between the Lord and Moses and Elias, it follows that the writer of 2 P was acquainted with Lk. The word ἐξοδος, however, is not uncommon in such a connexion (see p. 770).

(iv.) In 1<sup>14</sup> (ταχινή ἐστίν ἡ ἀπόθεις . . . καθὼς καὶ ὁ κύριος ἡμῶν Ἰ. Χ. ἐδήλωσέν μοι) we have a reference to a disclosure made to St. Peter by our Lord as to his death. Spitta (pp. 88 ff., 491 f.) lays it down peremptorily that 'there is absolutely no connexion between 2 P 1 and Jn 21'; that the allusion is to some other prophecy of Jesus not recorded in the Gospels, but on which the Quo Vadis story is based. It is true that the words used in 2 P do not necessarily imply that the writer is indebted to the Gospel of St. John: they are quite compatible with the supposition that St. Peter is (independently of any written document) recalling and reproducing in his own words the substance of the Lord's revelation to him. But it is unreasonable to postulate an occasion other than that recorded in Jn 21, when the Lord revealed something of the circumstances of the apostle's death. The Lord's prophecy as given in Jn 21<sup>18</sup> contains all that is required in 2 P. If the word ταχινή be taken to mean 'coming soon' (as Spitta interprets it), then the reference is rather to the δταν γηράσῃς; if it is understood to mean 'sudden,' then the allusion is to the violence plainly foreshadowed in the Lord's words.

The alleged references to the Gospel history contained in the Epistle have now been examined. The first of them has been put aside. The remaining three, when taken together, will probably produce on many minds the impression that the writer of 2 P was acquainted with Mt and Jn and (if the allusion which some have found in ἐξοδος be pressed) with Lk also. But such an impression, however strong it may be, does not amount to a well-founded conviction. The verdict on the non-genuineness of the Epistle, as far as this piece of evidence goes, is a non liquet.

The case, however, is different when we turn to another aspect of the reference to the Transfiguration and to the Lord's prophecy as to St. Peter's death. Do these allusions reveal a too keen anxiety on the writer's part to identify himself with St. Peter? Have we here some one personating the apostle, and therefore, in order to support his assumed character, unduly emphasizing two scenes in the Lord's life, each of which was closely connected with St. Peter?

The answer to the question, when so put, is, it is believed, that in themselves these allusions do not supply any valid argument against the genuineness of the Epistle. It cannot be considered strange or unnatural that the writer, if he were indeed the great apostle, should recall either of these incidents.

But there is a characteristic of the Epistle on the negative side which must be taken into account. (a) We should have expected that a personal follower of the Lord, who had heard our Lord's discourses, would instinctively reproduce much of his Master's teaching. It is true that, as was pointed out above (p. 788), our knowledge of our Lord's sayings is imperfect. The Gospels do not record all our Lord's words. But they certainly preserve a wide representative cycle of His teaching. And we should expect a letter of St. Peter to contain some reminiscences of Christ's words, which, with the Gospels in our hands, we could identify as such. 2 P does not fulfil that expectation. There is but one of the sayings of the Lord recorded in the Gospels alluded to in 2 P (2<sup>20</sup> || Mt 12<sup>45</sup>, Lk 11<sup>26</sup>). (β) Again, the Epistle does not refer to the great momenta of the Lord's life on earth—the Passion, the Resurrection, and the Exaltation. Here then we have, as it appears to the present writer, two weighty arguments against the genuineness of the Epistle—a negative argument and a positive argument. On the one hand, the Epistle does not contain what we should have confidently expected an Epistle of St. Peter to contain—allusions to the Lord's sayings and allusions to the great events of the Lord's life. The force of this argument is greatly increased when with 2 P we compare 1 P. On the other hand, the fact that the only allusions to incidents in the Lord's life found in the Epistle are such as would support the character of one writing as St. Peter, does become, in view of the silence of the Epistle as to the Passion, the Resurrection, the Ascension, and of the absence from it of allusions to the Lord's teaching as recorded in the Gospels, a serious ground for questioning the Petrine authorship of the Epistle.

(b) Absence of personal messages and greetings.—No companion of the apostle is mentioned. The apostle himself sends no personal message or greeting. On the former of these two points no stress can be laid. The latter has some weight as against the theory of Spitta and Zahn, that the Epistle was addressed by St. Peter to a Palestinian Church (or Palestinian Churches) with which the apostle had had personal dealings; it has none as against the common view that St. Peter sends a second letter to Churches throughout the provinces of Asia Minor, which he had never visited. Apart from these two special points there is, it must be allowed, a certain indefiniteness in the Epistle as to the circumstances and surroundings of those to whom the letter was sent, and more especially of the writer. Nothing is said, for example, of the place whence the letter was written. But it would be easy to draw on the imagination for reasons which might naturally and fully explain the reticence of the letter on personal matters. The result therefore is a purely negative one. The genuineness of the Epistle does not receive the support which it would have gained, had it contained personal messages and personal news which harmonized with known facts. On the other hand, no substantial argument adverse to its genuineness can fairly be deduced from their absence.

(c) Anachronisms.—(i.) 3<sup>15</sup>. Does the passage imply that in the writer's time a collection of St. Paul's Epistles existed, and that they were regarded as Scripture? The first point to be considered is the meaning of the phrase τὰς λοιπὰς γραφάς. Spitta (p. 294) holds that 'only writings of St. Paul's associates can be intended, addressed to the Gentile Christians who belonged to the sphere of his apostolic work.' According to this view, it would appear that the term αἱ γραφαί is used not in the sense of 'Scriptures,' but with a general non-technical meaning. Zahn (Einl. pp. 98 f., 108) follows the same general line of interpretation, but enters more into detail. In his opinion, the reference is to 'writings of a religious character—writings which could claim respect in Christian circles either because of the persons who composed them, or because the Christian congregations made use of them in public worship.' 'We do not know,' he adds, 'how much Christian literature already existed in the years 60–64.*' He urges that, as the allusion to these writings is altogether incidental, and as no distinguishing epithet, e.g. 'holy,' 'prophetic,' is added, the special sense of αἱ γραφαί, as applied to a collection of the Holy Scriptures, is here excluded. He further points out that, as the technical sense of the term ספרים did not prevent the Jews from using the word ספר of any book whatever, so the narrower use of αἱ γραφαί and τὰ γράμματα did not as a matter of fact debar Greek-speaking Christians from employing the words γραφῆ, γραφά, and γράμματα in a wide and general sense; if no instance of this sense of γραφῆ is found in the NT, that is a mere matter of chance. To substantiate his position as regards γραφῆ he refers to 2 Ch 2<sup>11</sup> (εἶπεν Χειράμ . . . ἐν γραφῇ), Neh 7<sup>64</sup> (ἐξήγησαν γραφὴν αὐτῶν τῆς συνοδίας), Dn 5<sup>5</sup> (τὴν γρ. ἐκέλευν, i.e. the writing on the wall), 1 Mac 14<sup>27</sup>, 48 (the writing on tables of brass), Iren. iii. 6. 4, xvii. 4, v. Procl. (in each case hæc scriptura of Irenæus' own work), Clem. Strom. vi. 3 (p. 755, ed. Potter; προΐουσης τῆς γραφῆς, i.e. the treatise itself), Eus. HE II. xi. 1 (τὴν περὶ τούτου . . . τοῦ Ἰωσήπου γραφῆν). Similar uses of the word might be quoted from classical Greek (where it commonly has a formal sense ['document'], often a legal sense ['indictment']), e.g. Thuc. i. 129, τσαυτὰ μὲν ἡ γραφὴ ἐδήλου, Ξέρξης δὲ ἤσθη τε τῇ ἐπιστολῇ κ.τ.λ. In all these passages, it will be noticed, it is clear, either from the phrase itself or from the context, what the γραφῆ in question is. They present no parallel to the absolute use of the word in the plural. The phrase αἱ γραφαί used absolutely points to a definite and recognized collection of 'writings,' i.e. the Scriptures. If any further assurance of this is needed, it is given (a) by the context—the word σπερβλοῦσαν shows that the writings were authoritative, and that their support had at all costs to be secured, and (β) by the added word λοιπὰς—τὰς λοιπὰς γραφάς; compare Sir. Procl. ὁ νόμος καὶ αἱ προφητεῖαι καὶ τὰ λοιπὰ τῶν βιβλίων; Iren. ii. 28. 7, 'Dominus manifeste dixit et reliquæ demonstrant Scripturæ.' From the καὶ and the τὰς λοιπὰς—ὡς καὶ τὰς λοιπὰς γραφάς—we are obliged to infer that the Epistles of St. Paul are regarded as Scripture. Again, the fact that St. Paul's Epistles are regarded as Scripture, together with the phrase ἐν πάσαις ἐπιστολαῖς, leads to the further conclusion that the writer of 2 P possessed not merely isolated letters of St. Paul, but a collection of his Epistles, to which, as authoritative documents of the faith, appeal was made.† It is impossible to suppose that a collection of St. Paul's Epistles had been made and that they were treated as Scripture during the lifetime of St. Peter.

† Compare the Acts of the Scillitan Martyrs, Libri et epistulæ Pauli iuri iusti (Robinson, The Passion of S. Perpetua p. 114, in 'Texts and Studies' I. ii.).

(ii.) 3<sup>2</sup> μνησθῆναι τῶν προειρημένων ῥημάτων ὑπὸ τῶν ἁγίων προφητῶν καὶ τῆς τῶν ἀποστόλων ὑμῶν ἐντολῆς τοῦ κυρίου καὶ σωτῆρος. It is possible that there is a primitive error in the text, and that διὰ should be inserted after τῆς—the commandment of the Lord and Saviour given through your apostles* (cf. the title of the Didache—διδάχῃ Κυρίου διὰ τῶν δώδεκα ἀποστόλων τοῖς ἔθνεσιν, and also 2<sup>21</sup> τῆς παραδότησης αὐτοῖς ἁγίας ἐντολῆς). But this suggestion does not affect the matter with which we are at present concerned. It is true that the phrase 'your apostles' admits of the explanation that the writer is referring to those apostles who had taught the readers of the Epistle, and that, so interpreted, the phrase cannot be said to be an impossible one in a letter written by St. Peter. But, on the supposition that St. Peter is writing to Christians whom he had himself taught, it must be admitted that it is strange that he should use an expression so cold and so general. Two other considerations must be taken into account. In the first place, it seems certain (see art. JUDE, EPISTLE OF, vol. ii. p. 802 f.) that the whole phrase is an expansion of the corresponding words in Jude<sup>17</sup>, where there is a simple and natural reference to the oral teaching of the apostles (ἐλεγον). Secondly, the addition of a reference to the prophets changes the kind of remembrance. The idea of keeping in mind the teaching of Scripture is introduced. Now in the 2nd cent. it was customary to speak of Scripture either under the two divisions—the Prophets and the Apostles—(e.g. Murat. Canon, 'neque inter prophetas completum numero neque inter apostolos'), or under the three divisions—the Prophets, the Lord (the Gospel), and the Apostles—(e.g. Iren. i. 8. 1, ἦν [ὑπόθεσιν] οὕτε προφήται ἐκήρυξαν οὕτε ὁ Κύριος ἐδίδαξεν οὕτε ἀπόστολοι παρέδωκαν); see Lightfoot on Ign. Philad. v. The impression produced by 2 P 3<sup>2</sup> is that we have here a post-apostolic writer elaborating the simple phrase of Jude<sup>17</sup> and instinctively reproducing phraseology current in his own days, while the ὑμῶν is introduced as being in character with the style of a letter. This impression is strengthened when the passage under discussion is taken in connexion with 3<sup>15</sup> (see just above).

(iii.) Closely connected with the points just dealt with is the problem suggested by the controversial element in the Epistle.

It has often been noticed that the writer speaks of the rise of certain false teachers as future (2<sup>14</sup>, 3<sup>2</sup>), and then, using the present tense (2<sup>11</sup>, 12, 17, 20 3<sup>2</sup>, cf. 3<sup>16</sup>), describes them as already active. It might be argued that he projects himself into the future, and then, from the point of view of a spectator, regards future events as actually happening. But it must be remarked that (1) this change from the future to the present takes place twice (2<sup>10</sup>, 3<sup>2</sup>); (2) in ch. 2 perfects are used (γέγονεν 2<sup>20</sup>, συμβέβηκεν 2<sup>22</sup>). The most natural interpretation of these phenomena is that the writer first speaks in his assumed character of a prophet, and that then, forgetting that assumed character, he depicts the false teaching actually rife around him.

Does the language used betray any sign of being aimed against the Gnostics? It is clear that those against whom the writer warns his readers not only practised, but taught, immorality. Their error was not only a matter of life (as appears to be the case with the libertines of St. Jude's Epistle), but also of doctrine. They are ψευδοδιδασκαλοι (2<sup>1</sup>). In this connexion the language of 1<sup>4</sup> is remarkable—ἐπιχορηγήσατε . . . ἐν τῇ ἀρετῇ τῆν γνῶσιν, ἐν δὲ τῇ γνῶσει τὴν ἐγκράτειαν. Here γνῶσις is used absolutely, and it is linked with ἀρετῇ and ἐγκράτεια. It would seem as if the writer emphasizes the bearing of a true γνῶσις on conduct because he has in mind those whom a false γνῶσις betrayed into ἀκρασία. It will be remembered that the name 'Gnostic' was, as far as our knowledge goes, first claimed by sects whose teaching justified profligacy of life (Iren. i. 25. 6; Hippolytus, Hæc. v. 6). Again, it may be thought that the words ἐλευθερίαν αὐτοῖς ἐπαγγελλόμενοι αὐτοὶ δούλοι ὑπάρχοντες τῆς φθορᾶς (2<sup>19</sup>) exactly express the theory of certain Gnostic teachers as to the 'spiritual' man's independence of matter, and the practical results of that doctrine (cf. e.g. Iren. i. 25. 4). Again, the writer of 2 P charges the false teachers with perverting Scripture (3<sup>16</sup>). It is clear that, when St. Paul wrote the Epistle to the Romans, there were those who depraved the doctrine of grace (Ro 6<sup>1-15</sup>; cf. Jude<sup>4</sup>). But there is no trace in apostolic times of false teachers supporting their views by a reckless or dishonest interpretation of the Old Testament, which alone could then be known under the name of Scripture. Nor, indeed, is it easy to see how the controversies of that age could give occasion to a forced exegesis of the OT; the arguments which the Judaistic opponents of St. Paul may well have drawn from the OT would be of a different kind. But such violent wresting of Scripture (i.e. the OT and the NT) as is described by the word στρεβλοῦσιν was the characteristic method by which the Gnostics of the 2nd century endeavoured to support their doctrines. Irenæus charges them with such a dishonest procedure again and again (i. Præf.; 3. 6, παρατρέποντες τὰς ἐρμηνείας καὶ βραδουρογούντες τὰς ἐξηγήσεις; 8. 1; 9. 1, καταχρησάμενοι τοῖς ὀνόμασιν εἰς τὴν ἰδίαν ὑπόθεσιν μετήνεγκαν). This indictment, then, of the false teachers does not appear to harmonize with what we know, or with what we can with reasonable probability conjecture, of the apostolic age. It does fit in with the characteristics of a later time.

(iv.) 3<sup>3</sup> ἐλεύσονται . . . ἐμπαίικται . . . λέγοντες Ποῦ ἐστὶν ἡ ἐπαγγελία τῆς παρουσίας αὐτοῦ; ἀφ' ἧς γὰρ οἱ πατέρες ἐκοιμήθησαν, πάντα οὕτως διαμένει ἀπ' ἀρχῆς κτίσεως. It is sometimes urged that the question of the scoffers points to a time later than the days of the apostles; and even more stress is laid on the reply—not an assurance of the nearness of the advent, but an explanation of delay (v. 8 μία ἡμέρα παρὰ Κυρίου κ.τ.λ.). It is, however, difficult to feel the force of these arguments considered in themselves. The fact that 'the immediate imminence of the coming of the Lord . . . faded out of view' in St. Paul's mind, as the Epistle to the Ephesians seems to indicate, 'when year after year passed away, and still there was no sign of the Lord's coming' (Hort, Rom. and Eph. p. 141 f.), is a sufficient proof that towards the end of St. Peter's life men would not be unlikely to ask the question put into the mockers' mouths, nor a Christian teacher unlikely to give some such answer as we find in 2 P 3<sup>3</sup>. The passage will come before us again when we come to compare 2 P with 1 P. But the phrase ἀφ' ἧς οἱ πατέρες ἐκοιμήθησαν gives rise to much more serious misgivings. Who are 'the fathers'? They are, says Spitta (p. 234 ff.), the actual fathers of those who are introduced as speaking.* This interpretation is open to several grave objections. (a) Since to St. Peter the phrase οἱ πατέρες would have a quasi-technical sense (cf. e.g. Jn 6<sup>53</sup>, Ac 7<sup>19</sup>, Ro 9<sup>5</sup>, He 1<sup>1</sup>), the meaning suggested would require the addition of ἡμῶν.* (β) The words 'since our fathers died,' put into the mouth of a number of persons, fix no definite limit of time. (γ) The context seems to imply that 'the fathers' had embraced the Christian hope, and so early in the history of the Church as St. Peter's lifetime it would be quite unnatural to introduce a group of persons speaking of their fathers as Christians (see Zahn, Einkl. ii. p. 72). Zahn (ib. pp. 67, 73) urges that the term οἱ πατέρες could be used of the first generation of Christians — the ἀρχαῖοι μαθηταί (Ac 21<sup>16</sup>) — before it had died off to the last man, and that, in fact, a whole generation separated the years 60-63, in which he places the Epistle, from the day when the promise to return was given. But, on the other hand, it must be remembered that the use of the term οἱ πατέρες in itself implies a considerable lapse of time. The founders of a movement are not called 'the fathers' till a later age looks back upon their work. Further, the clause as a whole implies a distant retrospect; the words ἀφ' ἧς . . . ἐκοιμήθησαν πάντα οὕτως διαμένει could not have been used unless a considerable interval had elapsed since the passing away of 'the fathers.' The words might conceivably be justified on the hypothesis that St. Peter is here foretelling the future, and that he dramatically puts into the mouth of the mockers, who should 'come in the last days,' words appropriate only from their supposed point of view. But such an interpretation is too artificial. And it must be confessed that here again we seem to be carried far beyond the limits of the apostolic age.

* Spitta gets over the difficulty that ἀφ' ἧς implies a considerable interval by supposing that the relative ἧς refers back to τῆς παρουσίας αὐτοῦ. He takes ἀπὸ in a pregnant sense with ἐκοιμήθησαν—'Die Väter sind entschlafen von der Parusie weg, ihr Tod hat sie der Parusie entzogen.' For this use of ἀπὸ he compares Ro 9<sup>5</sup>, Col 2<sup>20</sup>, 2 Co 11<sup>3</sup>. It is strange that he does not see that the γὰρ (ἀφ' ἧς γὰρ) makes such an interpretation absolutely impossible.

(d) Doctrine.—The doctrine of the Epistle is chiefly remarkable, so far at least as our present purpose is concerned, on the negative side. We should not, indeed, have expected St. Peter to dwell with such detail (3<sup>100r</sup>) on the physical accompaniments of 'the day of the Lord,' and on its relation to the several parts of the material universe, as contrasted with its human and spiritual issues. We might feel it strange that what we should elsewhere describe as physical speculations on the process of creation, should find a place in a letter written by St. Peter (3<sup>5</sup>). But these are matters of taste and feeling, or at least of opinion; and on such considerations no decisive judgment can be based. But it is otherwise with the silence of the Epistle as to doctrines of primary importance. St. Peter was an eye-witness of the human life of the Incarnate Word, of His sufferings, of the manifestations of the Risen Lord, and of His Ascension. He heard Christ's words about the Paraclete, and partook of the outpouring of the Spirit at Pentecost. But the Epistle says nothing of the example of Christ, or of His sufferings and death, or, except the allusion in 2<sup>1</sup> (τὸν ἀγοράσαντα αὐτοὺς δεσπότην), of Redemption. It is silent as to the Resurrection and the Ascension. It makes no reference to the Holy Spirit except as the source of inspiration to the ancient prophets (1<sup>21</sup>). It does not allude to prayer. We have no right, it may be urged most truly, to expect an apostolic Epistle to treat of every Christian doctrine, even the most vital. But is it conceivable that St. Peter, with his history and his experience, would pass over all these matters, essential to the Christian faith, as though they were not? The silence as to the Resurrection is the crucial point. The apostles were essentially witnesses to the Resurrection. The Resurrection was the final proof of the Divine mission of the Lord, the foundation of the Christian faith. As such it holds a unique place in the writings of the apostles, and in their teaching as reported in the Acts. But in this Epistle, when the writer (1<sup>16</sup>) has occasion to appeal to the guarantee of the truth of his teaching as to 'the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ,' the Resurrection is ignored, and the apostolic witness to Christ is made to rest on the Transfiguration. The Transfiguration was doubtless an event of deep meaning; but its meaning was relative to the time when it took place, and to the circumstances of those who were present on the mountain. Its glory was in the days of the Lord's humiliation a transitory anticipation of the Resurrection. It belongs to an order of events different from that to which the Resurrection belongs. It would be difficult to exaggerate the significance of the fact that in the Epistle generally, and especially at this particular point in it, the Resurrection is unnoticed. A subordinate but not unimportant matter is the language used by the writer of 2 P in this reference to the Transfiguration—ἐπόπται γενηθέντες τῆς ἐκείνου μεγαλειότητος (1<sup>16</sup>). The word ἐπόπτης is borrowed from the Greek mysteries, where it denoted one who was admitted to the third and highest stage. For the word itself cf. Plut. Alcib. 22, τοὺς ἄλλοις ἑταίρους μύστας προσαγορεύοντα καὶ ἐπόπτας; CIG 71b, 2158 (in both of which places it is closely associated with μύστης); Clement of Alexandria is fond of using words of this group in reference to the spiritual vision of God (e.g. Pæd. i. 6 (p. 113), 7 (p. 129); Strom. i. 28 (p. 424), ii. 2 (p. 431)). The metaphor is not one which we should have expected St. Peter to use. It is artificial, and savours of a later time when the Church borrowed such terms, often probably through the medium of the Gnostics, from the language of the Greek mysteries.*

5. RELATION TO 1 PETER.—Under this head little more has to be done than to bring together results which have been already reached as to the two Epistles separately.

(a) Vocabulary and literary style.—As to the former point, Warfield (p. 67) writes thus: 'These resemblances are seen not only in peculiar phrases, such as the form of salutation, "Grace and peace be multiplied," found in these two Epistles and nowhere else, but also in the recurrence in both of rare combinations, such as ἀμῶνον καὶ ἀσπίλου, 1 P 1<sup>19</sup> repeated 2 P 2<sup>13</sup> and 3<sup>14</sup> and nowhere else, and also the common possession of a very peculiar vocabulary such as is represented by the occurrence in both of ἐποπτεύσαντες (1 P 2<sup>12</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>16</sup>), ἰσότημος (1 P 17<sup>19</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>4</sup>), reinforced by the like community in such as φιλadelphία (1 P 1<sup>22</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>7</sup>); χορηγεῖν (1 P 4<sup>11</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>5-11</sup>); ἀπόθεσις (1 P 3<sup>21</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>14</sup>); ἀρετή (1 P 2<sup>9</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>3</sup>); ἀναστροφή (1 P 1<sup>15</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>7</sup>); ἀλήθεια in a peculiar sense (1 P 1<sup>22</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>22</sup>); κομίζεσθαι (1 P 1<sup>9</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>13</sup>), etc., all of which are rare words in the New Testament.' It seemed best to quote this passage at length. A glance reveals how this list needs careful sifting. Thus Warfield's mode of statement is confusing; the word ἰσότημος, for example, does not occur in 1 P, but πολότημος (1<sup>7</sup>) and τίμιος (1<sup>19</sup>). Again, the plural αἱ ἀρεταὶ in 1 P 2<sup>9</sup> (a reminiscence of Is 43<sup>21</sup>) is clearly far from being a parallel to the singular ἀρετή, 2 P 1<sup>3</sup>, though in both passages the reference is to God. But in fact verbal coincidences, however abundant, between 2 P on the one hand and on the other 1 P and the Petrine speeches in the Acts (Speaker's Com. iv. p. 226), would be of but little weight in support of the genuineness of 2 P; for if that Epistle is not genuine, but was written in the 2nd cent., it is clear that both 1 P and the Acts must have been accessible to its author, and that therefore he may have derived words or phrases from them. The real question is whether a comparison of the two Epistles reveals that kind of similarity which suggests that they are the product of the same mind. It must be said briefly that the two documents are in complete contrast in reference to literary style. This contrast is obvious whether we regard smaller points of expression (e.g. the connexion of sentences and clauses) or the broader literary characteristics of the two Epistles. The style of 1 P is simple and natural, without a trace of self-conscious effort. The style of 2 P is rhetorical and laboured, marked by a love for striking and startling expressions.

* Cursives 4, Ægyptt (boh sah), Syr-hkl add ἡμῶν. But, in the case of an addition of this nature, the evidence of versions is of little value.

* The habit of using language derived from the mysteries, in reference to communications supposed to be made by our Lord to His disciples, runs riot in the Gnostic Pistis Sophia.

(b) Use of the OT.—The writer of 1 P formally quotes the OT; he deliberately adopts its language (e.g. 2<sup>pt</sup>. 22); he instinctively, and apparently unconsciously, falls into its phraseology. The writer of 2 P, on the other hand, as we have seen, never formally quotes the OT, and uses but few distinctively OT expressions. This is precisely the reverse of what we should have expected to be the case if the theory of Spitta and Zahn were true, namely, that St. Peter wrote the First Epistle to the Gentile, the Second Epistle to Jewish Christians.

(c) Reminiscences of the Lord's teaching.—The writer of 1 P constantly shows that he has the Lord's sayings in his mind. It is doubtful if the writer of 2 P refers to more than two of them.

(d) Use of St. Paul's Epistles.—The writer of 1 P is deeply influenced, both in thought and in language, by two of St. Paul's Epistles (Ro, Eph). The writer of 2 P, while he mentions St. Paul's Epistles generally, owes no debt, literary or doctrinal, to them. This argument, however, cannot be said to carry so much weight as it appears to do at first sight. For we saw cause to believe that there were special reasons why the words and thoughts of these two Epistles of St. Paul should be in St. Peter's mind when he wrote the First Epistle.

(e) Doctrine.—It has often been remarked that while in 1 P 'the end' is regarded as near (4<sup>7</sup>), the writer of 2 P seems to contemplate delay as part of the Divine counsel. It might be a not unfair reply that in the one case the writer sets forth his own personal hope, in the other case he has to meet the jibes of enemies of the truth, and to account for the unquestionable fact of delay which gave point to their mocking question. But, indeed, the difference between the two Epistles in regard to doctrine is deeper and more far-reaching than a contrast of view as to the hope of the Lord's speedy return. Any one who has endeavoured to draw out the doctrinal teaching of the two Epistles must feel that they are widely separated from each other. There is a richness of devout thought, a vital apprehension of the great facts and truths which are characteristic of Christianity, in 1 P, for which we search in vain in 2 P. The thought of Christ's sufferings, considered as the supreme example and as redeeming acts dealing with all the needs of men, the thought of Christ raised and exalted by the Father, the thought of the present personal relation of Christians to Christ's work and to Christ Himself, dominate the one Epistle; they are, as we have seen (see above, p. 812), passed over in the other.

Such are the differences between the two Epistles. It remains to examine certain considerations which have been suggested with a view to explain or to mitigate the difficulty.

(1) Difference of date.—If St. Peter wrote the two Epistles, they could not be widely separated in point of time. The examination of all the evidence points to the year 61 as the probable date of 1 P (see above, p. 791 f.). 2 P, if the work of St. Peter, could not be placed more than a year or two later, or, if we accept the view of Spitta and Zahn that the former Epistle alluded to in 2 P 3<sup>1</sup> is not

1 P, a year or two earlier. Even if we put aside ancient evidence, and, accepting the theory which finds in 1 P indications of a later date (see above, p. 783 f.), suppose that St. Peter's life was prolonged beyond the year 70, the interval between the two documents cannot have been much more than ten years. It may well be doubted whether ten years at the end of a long life can reasonably be supposed to have so completely changed a man's literary style and the tone and range of his thoughts.

(2) Difference of subject.—The object of 1 P, it is urged, was to comfort and encourage the suffering; that of 2 P to warn against a shameful perversion of the truth. It must, however, be remembered that ch. 1 of 2 P is not denunciatory. Such a difference of subject might well account for a difference of tone, and a difference in the relative position and emphasis given to Christian doctrines. It would modify; it would hardly revolutionize.

(3) Difference of circumstances.—The strongest presentation of the case in this respect is probably the theory of Zahn (Eiml. ii. p. 96). 'So long,' he says, 'as men started with the assumption that 1 P is a document actually composed by the apostle ('ein eigenhändiges Schreiben des Apostels'), and that 2 P purports to be intended for a circle of readers similar to that addressed in 1 P, then the great diversity of the two Epistles in thought and language could not but be strong evidence against the genuineness of 2 P. But this evidence is destroyed, since both the above-mentioned assumptions have been shown to be erroneous. It is obviously intelligible that Peter, in a letter addressed to the Gentile Churches of Asia Minor, which Silvanus wrote by his commission and in his name, should speak in a way different from that in which he speaks in a letter of his own composition ('in einem eigenhändigen Brief') addressed to Churches of Jewish Christians, who owed their Christianity to him and his associates.'

In this position three points must be noticed. (a) It is remarkable that both Spitta (p. 530 ff.)* and Zahn, in defending the Petrine authorship of 2 P, are obliged to give up the real Petrine authorship of 1 P. It has, however, been shown in the article on 1 PETER (p. 789 f.) that (a) the language about Silvanus in 1 P 5<sup>12</sup>, though it does not exclude, yet certainly does not support, the hypothesis that the composition of the letter was left to him; (β) the phenomena of the Epistle itself are decisive against this theory. (b) It has been pointed out (see above, pp. 798, 806) that 2 P contains no indication of being addressed to Jewish Christians, and that the internal evidence, both negative and positive, points decisively in the opposite direction. (c) But if these two points are conceded, it is clear that everything depends on the sense given to 'speaking in a different way'—'anders redet.' The supposed variation of circumstances would account for a difference, perhaps a great difference, between the two letters. But, on the one hand, it must be observed that the characteristic of tender and sympathetic affection is conspicuous in the letter which was addressed to those with whom St. Peter had had no personal dealings, while it is absent from the letter which (in Spitta's and Zahn's view) was sent to persons who owed their Christianity to the apostle—a reversal of what would have been naturally anticipated. And, on the other, the differences between the two Epistles in literary style and tone and teaching are, as it appears to the present writer, so numerous and so fundamental that no difference of amanuenses or 'interpreters' can account for them unless we are prepared to admit that, in the case of either one or both of these letters, the substance and the language alike were left absolutely in the hands of the apostle's companion.

6. LITERARY AFFINITIES.—(a) The Epistle of Jude. That there is a close literary connexion between Jude and 2 P is certain. Which of the two writers is the borrower? It must be here sufficient to refer to the article on the EPISTLE OF JUDE (vol. ii. p. 802 f.), where the question is discussed. Further study confirms the present writer in the conclusion there reached, that the 'various lines of argument converge, and, as far as demonstration is possible in literary questions, demonstrate the priority of Jude.'† What is the bearing of this result on the question of the genuineness of 2 P? It is obvious that the fact that 2 P borrows from Jude is no more prejudicial to the genuineness of the former than the fact that 1 P borrows from Ro and Eph tells against the authenticity of 1 P. The difficulties in regard to date, if we prolong the apostle's life beyond 64, are not insuperable. The result is therefore a negative one. 2 P is deprived of a witness on whose evidence recent defenders of the apostolic authorship of 2 P (Spitta and Zahn) have greatly relied.

(b) Josephus.—In an article in the Expositor (2nd series, vol. iii. p. 49 ff.) E. A. Abbott maintained that there is a remarkable series of coincidences in language between 2 P and the Antiquities of Josephus (Præf. 3, 4; IV. viii. 2 [the last words of Moses]). 'Taken as a whole,' Abbott concludes (p. 62), 'the evidence in favour of the theory that the author of the Second Epistle imitated Josephus can hardly fail to appear striking, if not convincing.' The theory was examined by Salmon in his Introduction, p. 638 ff. (ed. 1; the discussion is curtailed in later editions). He points out (1) that 'the alleged coincidences relate entirely to words, and not at all to thoughts'; (2) that 'they do not occur in passages of [what he himself would call] "brief compass";' (3) that 'they are not in the same sequence and connexion'; (4) that 'the words common are not "unusual or startling," or such as can fairly be called hapax legomena.' It will probably be now generally admitted that the theory broached by Abbott has broken down on examination. There is a curious series of coincidences between the Preface of St. Luke's Gospel and Josephus Contra Apionem i. 10. The same account is probably to be given of the resemblances between Josephus and Lk and of those between Josephus and 2 P. They are most likely due to the diffusion of 'common-places' of rhetorical study, set prefatory phrases, and the like.

(c) The Apocalypse of Peter.—When the fragment of this Apocalypse was published, it was at once noticed (e.g. by James, A Lecture on the Apocalypse of Peter p. 52) that between it and 2 P there is a remarkable series of coincidences. The following table includes one or two coincidences between 2 P and fragments of the Apocalypse

* An inscription from Stratonicea in Caria, given by Deissmann (Bibelstudien i. p. 277 f.), contains the phrases, τῆς τῶν Ῥωμαίων αἰωνίου ἀρχῆς, πᾶσαν σπουδὴν ἰσχυροῦμαι ἐς τὴν πρὸς [αὐτοῖς ἐπίβ]ῃαν, τῆς βίαις δυνάμεως ἀρετᾶς; cf. 2 P 11<sup>15</sup> 13. But these coincidences do not, as Deissmann thinks, indicate any connexion between the inscription and the Epistle.

† 'The Assumption of Moses' was used by Jude (see art. EPISTLE OF JUDE, vol. ii. p. 802). But the question arises whether 2 P does not show an acquaintance with the Assumption independent of the knowledge of it which he might have gained from the passage of Jude. The apparent resemblance alluded to is between 2 P 21<sup>3</sup> ὁδὸν ἠκούμενοι τὴν ἐν ἡμέρᾳ πρῶτῃ, and the Assumption vii. 4, 'omni hora diei amantes conuiuia denotatores gulae.' But the resemblance is seen to be a merely superficial one, when the force of omni hora is noticed. The Assumption rebukes gluttons who would feast at any hour of the day; the Epistle, shameless profligates who riot in broad daylight.

James (p. 53 ff.) draws attention to several documents which appear to borrow from the Apocalypse of Peter. It is worth while to note coincidences between 2 P and some of these documents.

(a) 'The First Book of Clement, which is called the Testament of our Lord Jesus Christ: the words which He spake to His holy apostles after He had risen from the dead.' The book seems to have been originally written in Greek. Lagarde (Reliquiae Juris Ecclesiastici Antiquissimi Graece p. 80 ff.) has retranslated the extant Syriac version into Greek. James (p. 54) holds that at least the first fourteen sections of this document 'give us a very fair idea of the lost first part of the Apocalypse of Peter.'

The same answer is given to similar petitions made by the Moon and Stars and by the Sea. Compare a similar passage in another document, which seems to be connected with the Apocalypse of Paul, The Testament of Abraham x. (ed. James p. 87 f.).

To what conclusion does a study of the coincidences between 2 P and the Apocalypse of Peter lead us? There are five possible views which may be taken. (1) The coincidences may be boldly put aside as mere chance resemblances without significance. This view hardly needs discussion. It can scarcely be held by a serious critic, who considers the coincidences as a series, and appreciates the nature of the most striking of them. Few will hesitate as to the correctness of Salmon's view, that 'the agreements of our fragment [i.e. the Apocalypse of Peter] with the second Epistle of Peter . . . are more than accidental' (Appendix to Introduction p. 591). So Sanday (Inspiration p. 347), 'The resemblances are so marked as I think to prove that the two writings are nearly connected.' (2) Did the writer of the Apocalypse borrow from 2 P? This view seems to be impossible in view of (a) the naturalness of the words and phrases as they stand in their several contexts in the Apocalypse; (β) the fact that some of them are repeated in the Apoc. (sometimes with the form varied), and are found also in kindred documents; (γ) the fact that we find in the Apocalypse none of the strange and remarkable phrases of 2 P which would fix themselves in the mind of a reader who remembered enough constantly to borrow. (3) Did the writer of 2 P borrow from the Apocalypse? This view appears to be a quite possible one. (4) Are the two documents the work of one writer? This is the view to which Sanday (Inspiration p. 347) seems to incline. 'It is no doubt possible,' he writes, 'that the writer of the Apocalypse may have imitated the Epistle, or that both may have been affected by some common influence. If there had been on the whole better reason than not for believing the Epistle to be the genuine work of St. Peter, it would be natural to fall back upon some such assumption. But, as the balance of argument is really the other way, the question is forced upon us whether it is not on the whole more probable that the two writings are both by the same hand. This is at least the simplest of the different hypotheses which are open to us.' The present writer ventures to think that this explanation is excluded by a consideration of the literary style of the two documents. The Apocalypse is simple and natural in style. There is nothing remarkable in its vocabulary. It is, in a word, wholly free from the literary peculiarities which are so strongly marked in 2 P. (5) Are the two documents the work of two writers who belonged to the same school, whose thoughts moved in the same directions, and to whom the same expressions and words had grown familiar? Among these five possible explanations the choice seems to lie between (3) and (5). The fact that there is a similarity between the two writings, not only in words or in definitely marked ideas, but also in general conceptions—e.g. in both there is the picture drawn of Christ on a mountain with His apostles, the latter being admitted to a secret revelation which they should afterwards use for the confirmation of their disciples—seems to be an argument of some strength in favour of the view that the two documents are the product of the same school.

7. CONCLUSION.—The task remains of interpreting, as a whole, the evidence bearing on the question of the genuineness of 2 Peter. The external evidence is, as was pointed out, wholly insufficient. No evidence exists at all till the time of Clement of Alexandria, or (if we would speak with absolute certainty) till the time of Origen. Thus the burden of proof is thrown on the Epistle itself. It is conceivable that, through some accident or series of accidents, a genuine Epistle of St. Peter might lie hid till the end of the 2nd or the beginning of the 3rd cent. and then suddenly come to light. But an Epistle claiming to be such must bear unmistakable testimony to its own genuineness. The internal evidence of 2 P has been examined. The literary style of the Epistle is artificial; it shows little command over or appreciation of the language, and yet it is extraordinarily ambitious. It is not easy to think that St. Peter can have cultivated such a style, and the Epistle itself gives no support whatever to the idea that an amanuensis was employed in its composition. Again, the only events in the gospel history to which allusion is made are incidents which had a conspicuous place in St. Peter's life. About all other events in the Lord's life, even the most momentous, the Epistle is absolutely silent. It hardly alludes to any of the Lord's sayings which are recorded in the Gospels. The suspicion, therefore, cannot fail to arise, that the references which are made to the gospel history are selected as being in harmony with the supposed authorship. From history we turn to doctrine. Nothing is said in the Epistle of the Passion or the Resurrection or the exaltation of Christ, or of the Holy Spirit in the Christian Church, or of Prayer. Not only is the Resurrection passed over, but the Transfiguration takes its place as the guarantee of the truth of the gospel. The difficulties, therefore, in the way of holding that the Epistle is the work of a personal disciple of Christ, called to be a witness of the Resurrection, which a study of the Epistle itself reveals, are very serious. They become much more serious when it is compared with what we have every reason to believe to be the genuine words of St. Peter. The First Epistle is wholly different from the Second in literary style, in its use of OT language, in its allusions to the Lord's life and teaching. It dwells with reiterated emphasis on those primary Christian facts and doctrines which have no place in the Second Epistle. The internal evidence, then, reviewed so far, is adverse to the Petrine authorship. But there is another element in the internal evidence, of which, at this point, account must be taken. There are in the Epistle what appear to be clear signs of a date much later than the apostolic age. It is only by unnatural interpretations that 3<sup>d</sup> and 3rd can be made to harmonize with a time within the possible limits of St. Peter's life. The anachronisms of the Epistle seem clearly to point to the 2nd cent. as the time of its composition. This conclusion, based on internal evidence, is confirmed when external evidence is taken into account. On the one hand, it is in accordance with the absence of any trace of the Epistle till the beginning of the 3rd cent. On the other hand, it is at one with what is the natural, if not necessary, inference from the resemblances between the Epistle and the Apocalypse of Peter, viz. that these two documents are the work of the same school and belong (approximately) to the same date.

The evidence is obviously cumulative. Different minds will vary in the interpretation of this or that piece of evidence, and in the weight which they allow to evidence the interpretation of which is unquestioned. To the present writer it appears that too many independent lines of evidence converge towards one result to allow of hesitation. The only conclusion, it is believed, which is in accordance with the evidence, external and internal, is that 2 P is not the work of the apostle, but is a document which must be assigned to the 2nd century.

Two subjects remain for consideration—

(1) Is it possible to ascertain with any degree of probability the place where, and the time when, the Epistle was written? It has been shown to be probable on literary grounds that the Apocalypse of Peter and the Second Epistle of Peter belong to the same school. This conclusion is confirmed by what seems to be the natural interpretation of the evidence as to Clement of Alexandria. It appears likely that he, in his Hypotyposeis, placed the two documents side by side, and commented on them as closely related writings. It seems probable that the birthplace of the Apocalypse was Egypt (see above, p. 777), and we therefore infer that it is also probable that 2 P was written in Egypt (cf. Jülicher, Eintl. p. 151; Harnack, Die Chronologie p. 469). This conclusion is further supported by the fact that the Epistle has points of contact in language and thought with two great writers of Alexandria—Philo and Clement.

(1) Philo. Salmon (Introduction p. 502 ff.) notes that 'there is a whole host of 2 Peter's rare words in Philo.' Thus, to take a single example, the word ισότης (2 P 1) occurs in Philo, Leg. Alleg. ii. 6 (ed. Mangey i. 70, ισότης αὐτὸ ἠρησόμενος ἄνθρωπος); de Sacr. Abelis et Caini 3 (i. 165, τὸν σοφὸν ἰσότημον κόσμον *); and ισοτιμία is found in de Cherub. 34 (i. 180), Vita Mosis 7 (ii. 86). But more important than resemblance in mere vocabulary is kinship in modes of thought. Thus, if 2 P speaks of God's ἀρετή, in Philo we have the phrases τὴν ἀρετὴν καὶ σοφίαν τοῦ θεοῦ (Leg. Alleg. ii. 14, i. 75), τὰ περὶ θεοῦ καὶ τῶν ἀρετῶν αὐτοῦ (Quis Reverenti Div. Her. 22, i. 488), τὴς θείας ἀρετῆς (ib. 23, i. 489), τῆς ἀρετῆς τοῦ πάντα μεγάλου θεοῦ (de Somniis i. 16, i. 635). Again, Philo supplies parallels to the phrase θείας κοινωνοὶ φύσεως, 2 P 1<sup>4</sup>—e.g. Vita Mosis ii. 11 (ii. 143), ἦξει γὰρ τὴν φύσιν τοῦ θεοῦ ἴσως; de Spec. Leg. iv. 8 (ii. 343), τῆς μακαρίας καὶ ἰθαίμενος θεοῦ φύσεως; de Abram. 28 (ii. 22), οἱ μεμυμένοι τὴν θεϊαν φύσιν; de Somniis i. 23 (i. 647), σοὶ λογικῆς κοινωνοὶ καὶ φύσεως. Again, with the phrase τὸν προφητικὸν λόγον in 2 P 1<sup>9</sup> and with the words of the Epistle as to prophecy, 1<sup>20</sup> (πάντα προφητικῶς γραφῆς ἰδίας ἐπιλήσεως οὐ γίνεται, οὐ γὰρ θελήματι ἀνθρώπου κ.τ.λ.), we compare the use of the same phrase ὁ προφητικὸς λόγος in, e.g., Leg. Alleg. iii. 14 (i. 95), de Plant. Noe 28 (i. 347); and similar expressions, such as ὁ προφητικὸς λόγος (de Congr. Erud. Grat. 30, i. 543), στόματι προφητικῶ (de Mut. Nom. 24, i. 599), ἐν προφητικαῖς ῥήσεσιν (ib. 31, i. 604), ὁ ἱερὸς λόγος (Leg. Alleg. iii. 4, i. 89; ib. 56, i. 119); and Philo's language about prophecy in, e.g., Quis Rev. Div. Heres 52 (i. 510), προφῆτης γὰρ ἰδίου μὲν οὐδὲν ἀποφθίγγεται, ἀλλότρια δὲ πάντα ὑπακούοντες ἱτέρου; Vita Mosis i. 51 f. (ii. 125 f.), λέγα γὰρ οὐδὲν ἰδίον ἀλλ' ἅτ' ἂν ὑπαχῆσθαι τὸ θεῖον . . . ἰθαίμενος θεοφορεῖται; de Monarch. i. 9 (ii. 222), προφῆτης θεοφόρητος θεσπιῖ καὶ προφητῆσιν, λόγον μὲν οἰκίαν οὐδὲν . . . ἐρημνίης γὰρ εἶναι οἱ προφῆται θεοῦ καταχραζόμενοι τοῖς ἰκίνοις ὀργάνοις πρὸς ὄψλιν ἂν ἂν ἰθελῆσθαι; de Spec. Leg. iv. 8 (ii. 343), προφῆτης τε μὲν γὰρ οὐδὲν ἰδίον ἀποφθίγγεται τὸ παράπαν ἀλλ' ἔστιν ἐρημνίης ὑποβάλλοντος ἱτέρου πάντῳ ἕσα προφῆρι . . . ἐπιτηροῦντότεο δὲ καὶ ἰθαίμενος τοῦ θεοῦ πνεύματος κ.τ.λ.).

(2) Clement. 2 P 2<sup>22</sup> (ὅς λουσαμένη εἰς κυλισμὸν βορβόρου) has a close parallel in the proverb quoted by Clement, ὅς ἦδονται βορβόρου μάλλον ἢ καθαρῶ ὕδατι (Cohort. 10, p. 75, ed. Potter; Strom. i. 1, p. 317), in the earlier passage a saying of Democritus being added, εἰς φαρτῶ μαργαίνουσι. With the phrase τοῦ καθαρισμοῦ τῶν πάλαι αὐτοῦ ἁμαρτιῶν (2 P 19) compare Quis Dives salv. 40 (p. 957), τὴν μὲν ὁδὸν προγεγενημένον θεὸς δίδωμι ἀρετῆν, τῶν δὲ ἐστίντων αὐτοῖς ἱκαστοῖς ἰαντῶ; Strom. iv. 24 (p. 633), ἀφίενται γοῦν πρὸς τοῦ Κυρίου αἰ πρὸ τῆς πύλης. Again, with 2 P 21<sup>19</sup> (ἐλευθέρια αὐτοῖς ἐπαγγελόμενοι, αὐτοὶ δούλοι ὑπάρχοντες τῆς φθορᾶς) compare Strom. iv. 5 (p. 530), ὅτι ἐστὶ ἀδιαφόρος βιωτικὴν οὐδὲ ἀναίδην δουλευτικὴν τοῖς ἀτιμωτάτοις μέρεσιν ἡμῶν, γαστρὶ καὶ αἰδαίοις, δι' ἐπιθυμίαν κολλυκεύονταν τὸν ἡμίτερον νεκρὸν.—The similarity of two other passages in 2 Peter to characteristic passages in Clement is much more important. (i.) In Clement's system faith is the foundation; on this is built a superstructure of good living; 'knowledge,' with the higher virtues which spring from it (ἀπάθεια taking a prominent place among them), is a later stage of growth. See, e.g., the passage at the beginning of Strom. vi. where he refers to the purpose of his Paedagogus—ἡ παιδαγωγός... τὴν ἐκ παιδῶν ἀγαγὼν τε καὶ προφῆν ἀπειθεῖν, ταπεινῶν, ἐκ κατηχητικῶς συναΐθουσαν τῇ πίστει πλιετικὴν καὶ προσημαστικῶσαν τοῖς εἰς ἄνδρας ἔγγροστομένους ἐν αἰμασὶ τῆς ψυχῆς, εἰς ἐπιτήρησιν γνωστικῆς παραδόχου. He bitterly complains of those who divorce faith from conduct, e.g. Strom. i. 9 (p. 341), μόνον καὶ ψιλὴν τὴν πίστιν ἀκαταύτουσιν. The ascending series of virtues in 2 P 15f (πίστις, ἀρετή, γνώσις, ἐγκράτεια, ὑπομονή, εὐσέβεια, φιλαδέλφεια, ἀγάπη) is seen at once to have points of contact with that type of Alexandrian thought which finds expression in Clement's writings. With the words of 2 P compare especially Clement, Strom. ii. 8 (p. 445), ἡ πρώτη πρὸς σωτηρίαν εὐδοκία ἡ πίστις ἡμῶν ἀναφανίσταται, μὲν ἢν φοβὸς τε καὶ ἐπιπίς καὶ μετάνοια, οὐκ τε ἐγκράτεια καὶ ὑπομονὴ προσημαστικαί, ἀρῶσιν ἡμᾶς εἰς τὴν ἀγάπην εἰς τὴν γνώσιν; Strom. vii. 10 (p. 865), τῶ ἔχοντι προσεβήθησαν τῇ μὲν πίστι ἢ γνώσει τῇ τε γνώσει ἢ ἀγάπῃ τῇ ἀγάπῃ δι' ἡ κληρονομία. (ii.) It would be easy to adduce a very large number of passages from Clement illustrating the essential idea of the phrase θεῖος κοινωνὸς φύσις (2 P 14). In the first place, he constantly dwells on man's relation to God by creation (e.g. Cohort. 10, p. 78); man cannot be ἀμαρὸς θεῖος ἰσότητι (Strom. v. 13, p. 698). In the second place, he raises to the highest place of Christian hope the Platonic idea that 'the end of happiness is ὁμοίωσις θεῷ κατὰ τὸ δυνατὸν' (Strom. ii. 19, p. 482; cf. e.g. Strom. vii. 3, p. 835). Lastly, he finds the consummation of man's being in θεοποίησις (e.g. Cohort. 11, p. 89; Strom. vi. 14, p. 797, δύναμιον λαβούσα κυριακὴν ἢ ψυχῇ μιλιτᾶ εἶναι θεῷ; ib. 15, p. 803). Clement was a debtor to those who had gone before for much of his characteristic teaching. It is a reasonable conclusion from the parallels with Philo and Clement that the writer of 2 P was influenced in some of his conceptions and in his phraseology by the Christian school of Alexandria as it existed before Clement's time.

In regard to date, the superior limit is approximately fixed by the fact that the Epistle was known to Origen, probably to Clement, and that it was already accepted by some in the time of the latter as the work of St. Peter. It can hardly, therefore, have been composed quite recently in Clement's, certainly not quite recently in Origen's, time. The latest possible date, therefore, would be about the year A.D. 175. As to the inferior limit, the following considerations are pertinent. (1) A literature is growing up, connecting itself with the name of St. Peter. (2) The immoral Gnostic sects are active. (3) St. Paul's Epistles have been collected: they are regarded as Scripture, and, with other Scriptures, they are violently misinterpreted by the heretics. These indications point to a date later than the first quarter of the 2nd cent. We may conclude provisionally that the Epistle was written a few years before, or a few years after, the middle of the 2nd cent., in Egypt, perhaps in Alexandria.

It must be added that a first rate commentary on 2 P is a great want of English theological literature. Such a commentary would have for its primary object the examination in detail of the relation of the language and ideas of 2 P to early Christian literature, and especially to pseudographic and apocryphal documents. Till this work has been accomplished, conclusions as to the place of writing and as to the exact date within the 2nd cent. to which 2 P is to be assigned, must be regarded as tentative.

(2) In what sense is 2 P to be viewed as a forgery? When we regard the Epistle from the point of view of those who possess in the NT a fixed and definite collection of apostolic writings, our natural impulse, when we find ourselves unable to maintain its genuineness, is to condemn it as a shameless forgery, composed with the express purpose of gaining, by means of false statements, a place by the side of the genuine Epistle of St. Peter. But it may well be doubted if this verdict is not wholly vitiated by our ignorance of the circumstances of its composition, and by our natural transference of the ideas of a later time to an earlier and different age. The Epistle is closely related to the Apocalypse of Peter. It seems itself to refer (115) to some other related document or documents. If, then, it was part of a literature which connected itself with the name of St. Peter, the Epistle with similar writings may well have been put forward without any sinister motive. The very number of such documents may well have been at the time a sufficient bar to misconception. Their real character may have been perfectly well known to the readers for whom they were primarily intended. In other words, the personation of the apostle, which appears so wicked when 2 P is viewed as an isolated document, may well have been an obvious literary device rather than a religious or controversial fraud.

The religious and theological aspect of the conclusion that the genuineness of the Epistle cannot be maintained, lies outside the scope of this article. The present writer, however, may be allowed to say, that in his opinion the adoption of such a critical verdict can cause perplexity only when the Lord's promise of guidance to His Church is regarded as a charter of infallibility.

F. H. CHASE.

PETHAHIAH (Πηθαΐα).—1. The head of the nineteenth (LXX eighteenth) priestly course, 1 Ch 24<sup>16</sup> (B Πηθαΐά, A Αφεισή). 2. A Levite who had married a foreign wife, Ezr 10<sup>23</sup> (B Φαθαΐά, A Φεθειά); introduced by a later hand in Neh 9<sup>8</sup> (LXX om.). 3. A Judahite officer, who 'was at the king's hand in all matters concerning the people,' Neh 11<sup>24</sup> (B Παθαΐά, A Φαθαΐά).

PETHOR (Πηθ; B Φαθουρα, A Βαθουρα).—The home of Balaam (Nu 22<sup>5</sup>, Dt 23<sup>4</sup>), said (Nu) to be 'on the River' (i.e. the Euphrates), and (Dt) to belong to Aram-naharaim (cf. Nu 23<sup>7</sup>), i.e. the region between the Euphrates in its upper course (by and below Carchemish) and the Khabour, some 400 miles N.N.E. of Palestine. It is no doubt the Pitru, mentioned by Shalmaneser II. (b.c. 860-825): 'I crossed the Euphrates, and took the city Ana-Asur-utir-asbat on the other side of the Euphrates, on the Sagur, which the Hittites call Pitru' (KTB i. 133, l. 37-40; cf. 163, l. 36; 173, l. 85-6); and the Pedru, named long before among his conquests by Thothmes III. (W. M. Müller, As. u. Eur. 291; RP<sup>2</sup>, v. 38, No. 280). The Sagur is the modern Sajur, which flows into the Euphrates from the N.W. at a point about 60 miles N.E. of Aleppo: Pitru or Pethor, if 'on' both the Euphrates (Nu 22<sup>5</sup>) and the Sajur, must thus have been on the W. bank of the former river at its junction with the Sajur, and therefore, speaking strictly, just beyond the W. border of Aram-naharaim (Dt 23<sup>4</sup>).* It was, of course, much more nearly N. of Moab than 'east' (Nu 23<sup>7</sup>); but it must be remembered that the term 'east' is used broadly (see Gn 29<sup>1</sup>, of Haran, in the same neighbourhood). For 'mountains' (ib.) between the Sajur and the Euphrates, Dillm. refers pertinently to Sachau, Reise in Syr. u. Mesop. 1883, pp. 159 ff., 165 ff. (cf. also the map). PETHUEL (Πηθουή; perhaps, by a copyist's slip, for Πηθουή Bethuel, so LXX [Βαθουήλ] and other VSS, but Vulg. Phatuel).—The father of the prophet Joel, Jl 1<sup>1</sup>.

PETITION.—1. Πηθῆ from Πηθ to ask, is tr. 'petition' in 1 S 17<sup>27</sup>, 1 K 21<sup>6, 20</sup>, Est 5<sup>6, 7, 8, 9, 12</sup>. In Jg 8<sup>24</sup> we find the subst. and vb. together, literally 'ask an asking,' EV 'desire a request.' So 1 K 21<sup>6</sup> (EV 'ask a petition'), 2<sup>20</sup> (EV 'desire a petition'). In Est 5<sup>7</sup> 'petition' and 'request' appear as synonyms (Heb. Πηθῆ and Πηθῆ). 2. Πηθῆ from the same vb., Ps 20<sup>5</sup>. 3. The Aram. ܡܬܢܢ, from ܡܬܢ 'to inquire into,' Dn 6<sup>7, 13</sup>; in v. 12 the subst. is not expressed in Heb. 4. δέησις, 1 Mac 7<sup>37</sup> 'a house of prayer and petition' (οἶκος προσευχῆς καὶ δεήσεως; RV 'prayer and supplication'). 5. αἴτημα, 1 Jn 5<sup>15</sup> 'We have the petitions which we desired' (τὰ αἰτήματα ἃ ἠτήκαμεν, RV 'which we have asked'). 6. Oratio, 2 Es 8<sup>24</sup>.

PETRA.—See SELA.

PEULLETHAI (Πουλήθαι, B Ἰαφθοσλαθλ, A Φουλαθι).—The eighth son of Obad-edom, 1 Ch 26<sup>7</sup>.

PHAATH MOAB (Φαθ Μωάβ), 1 Es 5<sup>11</sup> (B Φθαλειμωάβ), 8<sup>31</sup> (B Μααθμ., AV Pahath M.) = Pahath-Moab.

PHACARETH (Φακαρέθ), 1 Es 5<sup>34</sup> = Pochereth-hazzebaim, Ezr 2<sup>37</sup>.—The succeeding word belongs to this name as in Cod. B Φ. Σαβεΐθ, and is not a separate name as it is taken by Cod. A and RV 'the sons of Sabie.'

PHAISUR (B Φαισοῦρ, A Φαισοῦ), 1 Es 9<sup>22</sup> = Pashhur, the head of a priestly house, elsewhere called Phassurus, 1 Es 5<sup>26</sup>.

PHALDEUS (B Φαλαδαῖος, A Φαλδαῖος, AV Phaldaius, 1 Es 9<sup>44</sup> = Pedaiah, Neh 8<sup>4</sup>).

PHALTIEL (Phalthiel, i.e. פֶּלְתִּיֶל, cf. 2 S 3<sup>15</sup>; D Salatiel, Syr. Psaltiel). — The 'captain of the people,' who had an interview with Esdras at the close of his first vision, 2 Es 5<sup>16</sup>.

PHANUEL (Φανουήλ, i.e. פְּנֹֻּל Penuel). — The mother of Anna, Lk 2<sup>36</sup>.

PHARAKIM (Β Φαρακέμ, Α -κείμ, AV Pharacim), 1 Es 5<sup>31</sup>. — His sons were among the temple servants who returned with Zerubbabel. The name is omitted in the parallel lists of Ezr and Neh.

PHARAOH (פָּרֹאֵה, Φαραώ). — The term does not occur in the Tel el-Amarna letters, nor perhaps anywhere else in cuneiform literature. In fact, so far as we know, in ancient times it was the Hebrews alone who adopted the term; from Hebrew it passed into Greek, and from Greek into Arabic. In face of these facts it is almost superfluous to mention that Renouf has noted that פָּרֹאֵה can, if necessary, be connected with an Arabic and even with a Hebrew root (PSBA xv. 421). The word existed in full use in Egyptian, with a purely Egyptian etymology, and there is no need to seek it further. The earliest instance of the title in Hebrew is probably in Ex 15<sup>4</sup>, generally assigned by critics to about B.C. 950.

In inscriptions of the Old Kingdom an expression Pr'o, 'great house,' is found, and signifies the royal house or estate, especially in titles such as 'superintendent of the gardens of Pr'o'; but there is nothing to show that it was then applied to the person of Pharaoh. In the Middle Kingdom, from dynasty 12-16 it still designated strictly the palace and royal establishment rather than the king, yet it is already often followed in writing by the Vivat! 'Life, Prosperity, Health.' In the New Kingdom it became at once personal, and was soon a common term for the king; e.g. a letter is addressed to Amenhotep IV. (18th dynasty) as 'Pharaoh the Lord.' In the 19th dynasty it is the usual expression for the king in unarchaistic narrative and in the stories, and is followed by the royal personal determinative. Certain hieratic documents show that in the 22nd dynasty it preceded the personal name of the king in dates, thus: 'the Stn (king) Pr'o (Pharaoh), Shashaqa.' In formal inscriptions the older royal titles persisted to the end, but in demotic the new style alone was used (at least from the 25th dynasty, the period of the Assyrian invasion), and documents exist naming the Pr'o Nk'w, the exact equivalent of 'Pharaoh-Necho.' At the same time the king is always referred to in narrative as Pr'o. Probably not much later than this the Ayin was lost. In Old Coptic (of the 2nd cent. A.D.) the descendant of Pr'o is simply πρεο, 'the king,' and the π being misinterpreted as the def. article, left only ερο as the word for king in Coptic. Φεράων, given as the name of an Egyptian king in Hdt. II. cxi., is evidently only the royal title Pr'o.

The phrase 'Pharaoh king of Egypt,' so common in the OT, is not taken from the Egyptian. In Assyrian, 'Pir'u king of Musri,' named in an inscription of Sargon, seems at first the precise equivalent to it, but Winckler (Mitth. d. Vorderas. Ges. 1898, i. 3) distinguishes Musri, a north-Arabian land, from Misri, Egypt; so this equation is at least very doubtful.

Shishak is the first king of Egypt whom the Bible definitely names; and it is a guarantee of comparatively early date and a non-Egyptian source for the record in 1 K 14<sup>25a</sup>, that his name is not there preceded by the title 'Pharaoh.' The Saite kings Pharaoh-Necho and Pharaoh-Hophra are accurately entitled as in contemporary Egyptian. The Ethiopian conqueror Tirhakah is regularly called 'Pharaoh Tirhakah' in Egyptian documents, but in the Hebrew (2 K 19<sup>9</sup>) his true position is more accurately defined as 'king of Cush.'

1. The first appearance of the title according to the canonical scheme of the biblical books is in Gn 12<sup>10-20</sup>. As Abram is to be placed long before the 18th dynasty, the title here seems an anachronism such as is met with in the late Egyptian stories. Another difficulty in the narrative is the mention of Abram's having camels in Egypt. Herodotus refers to camels on the borders of Egypt in the time of Cambyses, which at least testifies to their presence in the writer's own day (5th cent. B.C.), and this, except for the passage in Genesis, is the earliest mention of the animal in connexion with Egypt; it would, however, be easy to believe that camels were known throughout the Persian period and as far back at least as the Assyrian invasions in the 7th cent. (25th dynasty). As the narrative presents no clear feature—famines being frequent—by which Abram's Pharaoh may be distinguished from others, and since Egyptian, as well as Hebrew, chronology is at present exceedingly obscure for the earlier periods, it is obviously useless to attempt his identification.

2. The Pharaoh of Joseph. The long and elaborate story of Joseph presents some very interesting data for consideration, but they are not favourable to the view that it is historically true. Its use of the title 'Pharaoh,' and of Yē'ōr, the late Egyptian name of the Nile, which is derived from the old form Ytr, alike preclude an early date for its redaction. Far weightier is the evidence of the names Potiphera (P-ti-p-R', 'the gift of the Sun'), Asenath ([N]es-Neith, 'belonging to Neith'), Zaphenath-pa'aneah (Zt-p-ntr-c-f-nkh, 'Saith the god, "he liveth" !'), which are of forms common after the 21st dynasty, and not occurring at all before it. The name Asenath strongly suggests the times of the Saite dynasties, when the worship of Neith was prominent and all these types of names were in full currency. A genuine Egyptian name of the type of Zaphenath-pa'aneah would have included the name of a specific deity, but at any rate the Hebrew author was so familiar with the formation of Egyptian names that he could introduce appropriately into the formula a new element p-ntr, 'the god,' instead of a god's name, without committing a solecism. The relations of Egypt with Palestine from the 10th cent. B.C. onward, and especially in and after the period of the Assyrian invasions, may explain this.

In a priestly inscription of the latest period, at the Cataracts, there is a record, that can scarcely be historical, of a 7 years' famine under one of the earliest kings, perhaps B.C. 3000, but we have no other record of any famine of like duration until Arab times. Our knowledge of Egypt is still very limited. Of the tenure of land in Egypt we know little; of the buying up of the people and their land, and the ultimate arrangement for paying 1/4th of the produce as a tax to Pharaoh, nothing is known. To seek the prototype of the Pharaoh of Joseph seems a rather thankless task. The chariot may or may not be an anachronism; its employment probably began under the Hyksos. It is usually conjectured that the Pharaoh who raised Joseph to the highest place in the realm and treated his shepherd brethren so well was a Hyksos, 'Shepherd,' king of the 15th or 16th dynasty. But of the Hyksos kings we know practically nothing except that some of them ruled the whole of Egypt, that they worshipped particularly or exclusively the god Set, and that their principal residences were On (Heliopolis) and Avaris (most likely Zaru) in the N.E. of Lower Egypt. Probably other events than those recounted in Genesis brought about the disappearance of the feudal system of the Middle Empire before the New Kingdom. See, further, article JOSEPH.

3. 4. The Pharaohs of the Oppression and the Exodus. On the supposition that these events took place in the 18th or 19th dynasty, 'Pharaoh' is a term which might well be employed by a contemporary historian of them. But Yēōr for the Nile seems to lower the date, and, had the great occurrences been still fresh in the remembrance of the emigrants or of their immediate descendants at the time of writing down the story, the distinctive names of the Egyptian kings concerned, and other definite information, would hardly have been omitted from the narrative. If the account is literally true, or almost so, it presents us with a considerable historical sequence to fit into the Egyptian history of the New Kingdom, a period for which our information is much fuller than usual. Ramses II. of the 19th dynasty is generally (see Driver's discussion in Hogarth's Authority and Archaeology, 52 ff.) accounted the Pharaoh of the Oppression, and his son and successor, Merenptah, is considered to be the Pharaoh of the Exodus, which some, however (e.g. Lieblein, PSBA, 1899, 66), would place in the reign of Amenhotep III. or IV. of the 18th dynasty, supporting their argument by the movements of the 'Habiri' (Hebrews?) in Palestine as disclosed by the Tel el-Amarna letters. The name of Raamses given (Ex 1<sup>11</sup>) to a store city built by the Hebrews clearly refers to some city built for one of the kings named Ramses. Of these Ramses II. was the greatest; he was also pre-eminent as a builder. Several cities were called after his name, and one in the Eastern Delta, in the region of Goshen, retained it till a late date. He was also active at Pithom, as is shown by M. Naville's excavation there; but it is by no means clear that he was the founder of it: probably the site was already ancient in his day. The Oppression evidently lasted many years. Ramses II. reigned 67 years, and thus the Exodus may have taken place in the short reign of Merenptah, the son and successor of that aged king. The remarkable fact that the Israelites are named on a monument of Merenptah (see Petrie, Six Temples, pls. xiii., xiv.) as destroyed or harried by him, apparently in Palestine, does not disprove this theory, as detachments from the main body might have left Egypt from time to time, and settled and multiplied at Hebron, round the tombs of the patriarchs. Nor is it disproved by the recent discovery of the mummy of Merenptah in the tomb of Amenhotep II., for the biblical narrative does not distinctly state that Pharaoh himself was drowned in the Red Sea. The Israelites are said to have passed through the desert of Sinai, and wandered 40 years in its neighbourhood; and it happens that there are no records extant of Egyptian expeditions to the quarries of Sinai during the reigns of Merenptah and his successor. On the other hand, there is no trace in the Hebrew records of any Egyptian invasion of Palestine before Shishak of the 22nd dynasty; unless indeed, as some think, 'the hornet' of Jos 24<sup>12</sup>, Ex 23<sup>27, 28</sup>, Dt 7<sup>20</sup> refers to the inroad of Ramses III. This king of the 20th dynasty certainly harried the country, and, had the Israelites previously entered it in force, it is hardly probable that his invasion would not be mentioned in the Book of Judges. But it is possible to reconcile the chronology of Judges with a theory that would make the entry of the Israelites into Palestine subsequent to the last campaign of Ramses III. (Petrie, PSBA, 1896, p. 243). Also, even on the usual theory, the passage of the Egyptian armies along the coast roads into Syria would leave untouched the highlands of Palestine and the Valley of the Jordan, from which the spread of the Hebrews must, as a matter of fact, have been only gradual. To sum up, the monuments of Egypt give us no record either of the Oppression or of the Exodus. As the story stands, there are passages in it which are difficult to credit, but some modifications would enable us to place it in the time of Ramses II. and Merenptah. See, further, art. MOSES.

5. In 1 Ch 4<sup>18</sup> there is mention of a 'daughter of Pharaoh' in a genealogy; but not only is her chronological position doubtful, it is even uncertain whether a royal title or a personal name is intended by the expression.

6. In David's lifetime Hadad the Edomite fled to Egypt and was well received by Pharaoh, who gave him the sister of his queen Tahpenes to wife (1 K 11<sup>14ff.</sup>). Here the queen's name offers a clue, but at present no such name has been recognized from Egypt. At the end of the 11th cent. B.C. Egypt was ruled by two contemporaneous dynasties, one ruling at Thebes and the other at Tanis (Zoan) in the Eastern Delta, the latter, however, having the suzerainty over the whole country. The power of Egypt must have been small, and no large monuments were raised in that period.

7. Solomon's Egyptian father-in-law (1 K 2<sup>46</sup> 3<sup>1</sup>) should likewise be a Tanite king (21st dynasty); according to 1 K 9<sup>16</sup> he took Gezer and gave it to Solomon.

It is noticeable that Shishak king of Egypt (the founder of the 22nd dynasty) is never called Pharaoh. This is the first occasion in the Bible on which a distinctive name is given to an Egyptian king. It seems as if the vague traditions in the earlier stories were now succeeded by more positive knowledge as to later events. As noted above, Shishak was called by the Egyptians 'Pharaoh Shishak' (Rec. de Trav. xxi. 13, l. 1), but the fashion was a new one, and would be little known to foreigners.

8. 'Pharaoh king of Egypt' of the time of Sennacherib and Hezekiah. In both versions (2 K 18<sup>21</sup> and Is 36<sup>6</sup>) the Rabshakeh addresses Hezekiah with the words, 'Behold thou trustest on the staff of this bruised reed, even upon Egypt; whereon if a man lean, it will go into his hand, and pierce it: so is Pharaoh king of Egypt to all that trust on him.' Here 'Pharaoh king of Egypt' is a vague way of designating the king, who appears at that time to have been Tirhakah, in 2 K 19<sup>9</sup> rightly called 'king of Ethiopia.' In Egyptian documents this conqueror of Egypt is regularly designated 'Pharaoh Tahraqa.' It may be questioned whether there is not in the biblical account a confusion between two distinct campaigns of Sennacherib, and whether 'Pharaoh king of Egypt' does not refer to another king reigning in B.C. 701; cf. art. HEZEKIAH in vol. ii. p. 378<sup>b</sup>. Tirhakah probably did not begin to reign before B.C. 685. F. LL. GRIFFITH.

PHARATHON (Φαραθών).—A place in Judaea, fortified by Bacchides against Jonathan, 1 Mac 9<sup>50</sup>. The EV separate Pharathon from the preceding name, reading 'Timnath, Pharathon,' whereas LXX seems to combine the two—τῆν Θαμνάδα Φαραθών. G. A. Smith agrees with the latter, holding that 'evidently one place' is referred to (but see Buhl, GAP 206 f.). Pharathon is probably the village Feron in the low hills west of Shechem, guarding the approach to the main route on the Plain of Sharon, and Timnath may be Timnath-heres. See SWP vol. ii. sheet xi. Cf. also art. PIRATHON.

i. ORIGIN AND HISTORY OF THE PHARISEES AND THE SADDUCEES.—Though the Pharisees and the Sadducees make their first appearance as distinct parties during the latter half of the 2nd cent. B.C., they represent tendencies which can be traced much further back in Jewish history. When Ezra returned from Babylon (B.C. 458), he found the Jews living in and around Jerusalem divided into two parties on the question of intercourse with foreigners. Those who returned first from exile (B.C. 537) had been more scrupulous in this matter. They seem to have held aloof at first not only from the heathen inhabitants of the land, but also from the descendants of those Jews that had been left in Palestine by Nebuchadnezzar, and to have admitted into the new community only those whose ancestors had been in exile, or who were otherwise able to prove that they were of pure stock (Ezr 2, Neh 7<sup>6-73</sup>). Gradually, however, they fell away from this strictness; they received into their fellowship their Palestinian brethren and such of the heathen as acknowledged J<sup>h</sup> and His commandments; and many of them even entered into alliances of various kinds with those of their heathen neighbours who remained heathen.

That such was the case we learn especially from the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah. Immediately upon his arrival in Jerusalem, Ezra was informed that many of the people had intermarried with the people of the land, the chiefs of the people being most guilty (9<sup>11</sup>).* A commission appointed to inquire into the matter took three months to perform its task (10<sup>16f.</sup>). The number of those who had contracted such marriages was very great; the list that was drawn up (10<sup>18-44</sup>) contains the names of four members of the high priest's family (v. 18). Ezra perceived that a grave crisis had arisen in the history of the Jewish community in Palestine; the holy seed was being profaned (9<sup>2</sup>); the heathen element might soon become dominant; the danger could be averted only by the adoption of measures that would secure that only such could belong to the community as were of pure Jewish blood. He accordingly demanded that they put away their foreign wives and children, without giving them the opportunity of becoming Jews (10<sup>1-5, 11</sup>). Though they pledged themselves to do so (10<sup>5, 19</sup>), this measure was not, at least permanently, carried out.† For when Nehemiah first visited Jerusalem (B.C. 444) he found matters exactly as Ezra had found them. The 'nobles of Judah' were in close alliance with the foreign element (Neh 6<sup>17-19</sup> 3<sup>5</sup>); the Sabbath was not strictly kept (10<sup>31</sup>, cf. 13<sup>15a.</sup>); and mixed marriages were exceedingly common. After taking the precautionary measure of building the wall of Jerusalem, he held an assembly of the people, at which they resolved to separate themselves entirely from all foreigners, and to observe all the LORD's commandments (9<sup>2</sup> 10<sup>38f.</sup>). He did not, however, compel them to put away their foreign wives and children, but only to pledge themselves to abstain from all mixed marriages in future (10<sup>30</sup>). But he had not yet gained a complete victory. When he revisited Jerusalem in 432, he found that the high priest Eliashib had renewed his close fellowship with Tobiah (13<sup>4f.</sup>), that the Sabbath was still desecrated (v. 15<sup>f.</sup>), that many of the people were still marrying foreign wives (v. 28<sup>f.</sup>), and that a grandson of the high priest was son-in-law to Sanballat (v. 28). Against these abuses he took active measures. He cast out all Tobiah's household stuff, and had the chambers of the temple purified (v. 8<sup>f.</sup>); he renewed his injunctions against Sabbath desecration and the contracting of fresh mixed marriages, and expelled the high priest's grandson from the Jewish community (v. 28).* 'Thus,' he adds, 'cleansed I them from all strangers' (v. 30). Complete separation from all foreign elements became henceforth the principle of Judaism.

In connexion with these proceedings it is important to notice that the natural leaders of the people, including the members of the high priest's family, who had become a sort of temple nobility, were among the chief offenders, and that it was from them that Nehemiah experienced the greatest active opposition. Backed up by the authority of the Persian king, he was able to crush their opposition, and to establish in Judæa the strict separation which from the first had ruled among the pious exiles in Babylonia. 'The aftertime shows plainly that he accomplished the work of his life. He impressed the stamp of his spirit upon Judaism for all time, and forced it to follow the course he had marked out' (Cornill, History of the People of Israel, p. 168; see also Wellhausen, Isr. und Jüd. Geschichte, p. 173). We must not, however, make Nehemiah a Pharisee and Eliashib a Sadducee. In them and their respective adherents we have only, at the most, a preparation for the parties that formed much later. The victory of Nehemiah was the victory of Judaism generally, not of Judaism in its specific Pharisaic form.

Regarding the latter half of the Persian period we have hardly any authentic information. The high priest was probably, under the Persian governor of Syria, the civil as well as religious head of the Jewish community; he and his priestly brethren of higher office along with their families would doubtless form a kind of aristocracy, even as compared with the rest of the priests. Judging from the conduct of some of their successors towards the close of the Greek period, it is very unlikely that their influence was always of an ideal character (cf. the story of Johanan and Bagoes, Ant. XI. vii. 1). In spite of the triumph of the exclusive party under Ezra and Nehemiah, there still remained an Israel after the flesh, and a deep gulf between it and the Israel after the spirit.†

† For detailed proof drawn from the Psalms see Bertholet, Die Stellung der Israeliten und der Juden zu den Fremden, p. 184ff. We need not suppose that only wicked people were opposed to the rigorism of Ezra. Cheyne (Jewish Religious Life after the Exile, p. 220) makes the Book of Ruth 'an idyllic story to justify admitting into the community any foreign women who heartily adopted the nationality and religion of their Jewish husbands. . . . It shows that Ezra did not gain an at all complete victory over the friends of mixed marriages.'

* We learn from Mal 2<sup>14f.</sup> that some of the Jews had put away their Jewish wives in order to marry foreign women.

† According to the LXX of 10<sup>44</sup> they put away their foreign wives along with their children.

The conquest of Persia by Alexander the Great and the setting up of the Greek kingdoms of Egypt and Syria under his successors brought the Jews into close contact with a new and highly developed civilization. During the first half of the Greek period Judæa belonged to Egypt, and the Palestinian Jews, with whom we are mainly concerned, though surrounded by Greek cities, with which they had constant intercourse, do not seem to have been much harmed by such intercourse. It was otherwise when Syria (B.C. 198) became the paramount power. Antiochus III., it is true, favoured the Jews in many ways, and allowed them the enjoyment of unconditional religious freedom (Ant. XII. iii. 3. 4). A crisis came, however, when Antiochus Epiphanes ascended the throne (B.C. 175). He resolved to suppress the Jewish religion, and he found a party among the Jews themselves ready to play into his hands. This party contained leading members of the priesthood, several of whom had adopted Greek names, and who, in order to further their own ambitious designs, were prepared to go almost any length in Hellenizing the people. During the reign of Seleucus IV., one Simon, who was 'guardian' of the temple, and who was evidently one of the chiefs of this Hellenizing party, had caused serious trouble to the high priest Onias III. (2 Mac 3-4<sup>9</sup>). On the accession of Antiochus Epiphanes to the throne, Jason, whose name was originally Jesus (Ant. XII. v. 1), supplanted his brother Onias in the high priesthood (B.C. 175) by promising the king a large sum of money; in return for another large sum he also received permission to erect a gymnasium in Jerusalem and to register its inhabitants as citizens of Antioch (2 Mac 4<sup>7-9</sup>). And now the work of Hellenization began. Jason 'forthwith brought over them of his own race to the Greek fashion. . . . Seeking to overthrow the lawful modes of life, he brought in new customs forbidden by the law; he established a Greek place of exercise under the citadel itself, and caused the noblest of the young men to wear the Greek cap. And thus there was an extreme of Greek fashions, and an advance of an alien religion. . . ; the priests had no more any zeal for the services of the altar; but despising the sanctuary, and neglecting the sacrifices, they hastened to enjoy that which was unlawfully provided in the palestra, after the summons of the discus; making of no account the honours of their fathers, and thinking the glories of the Greeks best of all' (2 Mac 4<sup>10-22</sup>; cf. 1 Mac 1<sup>14</sup>). He even sent money to Tyre to provide a sacrifice for Hercules. After three years Jason was supplanted in the high priesthood by Menelaus, brother of the above-mentioned Simon,* who is described in 2 Mac 4<sup>25</sup> as 'bringing nothing worthy the high priesthood, but having the passion of a cruel tyrant and the rage of a savage beast.' In order to secure his position with the king by means of bribery, Menelaus spoiled the temple of its vessels of gold (4<sup>32</sup>); the aged high priest Onias, who protested against this sacrilege, was treacherously murdered (4<sup>33</sup>), and a deputation from Jerusalem, which appeared before Antiochus to accuse Menelaus of these and other outrages, was put to death (4<sup>39-50</sup>). On a false rumour of the death of Antiochus, Jason endeavoured to recover the high priesthood. Thinking that Judæa was in revolt, Antiochus returned from Egypt (B.C. 170), took Jerusalem by storm and gave it up to pillage for three days. He also entered 'the most holy temple of all the earth,' having Menelaus for his guide; he took the holy vessels with his 'polluted hands' and spoiled the temple treasury (5<sup>11-21</sup>; cf.

1 Mac 1<sup>20</sup>). Two years afterwards an even worse fate befell Jerusalem. Returning from a campaign in Egypt, Antiochus sent an officer with a large army to Jerusalem, with orders to slay all that were of full age, and to sell the women and the younger men. These orders were executed most relentlessly. The city was plundered and set on fire; its walls were torn down; such of its inhabitants as had not been put to the sword or made captive fled; only apostates and heathen strangers remained; and the city of David was rebuilt into a strong citadel, the Akra, which was held by a Syrian garrison till B.C. 142 (2 Mac 5<sup>22</sup>; cf. 1 Mac 1<sup>20</sup>). Soon thereafter a decree was issued by Antiochus suppressing the Jewish religion. The sacrifices in the sanctuary at Jerusalem were forbidden; the Sabbaths and feasts were to be profaned and the sanctuary polluted; their sons were no longer to be circumcised; the sacred books had to be delivered up; altars and temples and shrines for idols were to be built in the cities of Judah, and swine's flesh and unclean beasts were to be offered in sacrifice. These injunctions were rigidly carried out by overseers appointed for the purpose. On the 15th of Chislev (i.e. December) B.C. 168 an altar was erected to Zeus Olympius on the altar of J', and on the 25th a sacrifice was offered on it to the heathen deity. Whether Menelaus officiated as high priest, we cannot tell. Such of the Jews as remained loyal to the law were barbarously put to death, no respect being paid to age or sex (1 Mac 1<sup>41</sup>).

Hellenism had evidently made considerable progress not only among the priestly aristocracy and the inferior priests (2 Mac 4<sup>14</sup>), but also among the people generally (1 Mac 1<sup>11</sup>), more especially in Jerusalem and among the young men (cf. Ant. XII. v. 1 with 1 Mac 1<sup>15</sup>). At first there was probably no intention, even on the part of the leading Hellenizers, to apostatize from the national religion; what they desired was to remove from Judaism its narrowness and exclusiveness, to give up the intolerable and, as it seemed to them, barbarous customs of the fathers, so that they might freely participate in the advantages of Greek culture and in the joys of Greek life. But even after Antiochus had taken his extreme measures, many of the Hellenizing party still adhered to him.* 'Many of Israel consented to his worship, and sacrificed to the idols, and profaned the Sabbath' (1 Mac 1<sup>43</sup>; cf. what is said of the 'lawless' and 'ungodly' 3<sup>5, 8</sup> 6<sup>21</sup> 9<sup>23</sup> 10<sup>14</sup>; also Dn 8<sup>23</sup> 11<sup>30, 32</sup>). After the outbreak of the Maccabæan rising we find them among the 'Macedonian' garrison of the citadel (Ant. XII. v. 4, ix. 3) and in the armies of Seron, Ptolemæus, Nicanor, and Gorgias (XII. vii. 1. 3). But, as the Maccabæan rising proves, these measures of Antiochus had shown the mass of the people to what Hellenism was tending and had awakened a powerful reaction.

Apart, however, from this national reaction, the radical Hellenism of the priestly aristocracy had called forth another extreme party, the Hasidæans (see art. HASIDÆANS). This party is, in principle, as ancient as Judaism, but it was opposition to extreme Hellenization that brought them close together into a separate company (συναγωγή, 1 Mac 2<sup>42</sup>), shortly before the Maccabæan rising, and made them all the more resolved to stand by the threatened law. They were the party of those who had laid most to heart the teaching of the scribes (cf. 1 Mac 7<sup>12, 13</sup>); they were so devoted to the law (2<sup>42</sup>) as not even to defend themselves when attacked by the Syrians on the Sabbath (v. 32<sup>2</sup>); they observed strictly the laws as to purification (1 Mac 1<sup>62</sup>, * According to Josephus (Ant. XII. v. 1), Menelaus, whose name was originally Onias, was the brother of Jason. According to Wellhausen his Hebrew name was Menahem or Manasseh.

* According to Josephus (Ant. XII. ix. 7) it was Menelaus that persuaded him to compel the Jews to renounce their religion; cf. 2 Mac 5<sup>15</sup>.

2 Mac 6<sup>18ff.</sup>), and insisted upon complete separation from the Gentiles (2 Mac 14<sup>38</sup>). Though they were not the first to raise the standard of revolt against the Syrians, they soon associated themselves with Mattathias and his friends in the common cause (1 Mac 2<sup>42</sup>); but they withdrew from the struggle, when religious freedom was granted and Alcimus, a descendant of Aaron, was made high priest instead of Menelaus (7<sup>12ff.</sup>), and do not seem, at least as a party, to have taken any further share in the war, in spite of the perfidy of Alcimus in putting many of them to death. They were an exclusively religious party, supremely interested, not in the political independence of the nation, but in the strict observance in every respect of the laws and customs handed down from the fathers.

We have dwelt at considerable length on the Hellenizers and the Hasideans, because these were the progenitors respectively of the Sadducean and Pharisaic parties.

It is during the reign of John Hyrcanus (B.C. 135-105) that we first hear of these as two opposed parties.* According to Josephus (Ant. XIII. x. 5, 6), Hyrcanus on one occasion invited the Pharisees to a feast, and having entertained them well and put them in good humour, reminded them that they knew he was desirous to be a righteous man and to do all things whereby he might please God, after their manner. If they observed him erring in any way, he requested them to correct him. They all expressed entire satisfaction with him, except one, Eleazar by name, who informed him that, if he would be really righteous, he must lay down the high priesthood and be content with the civil government of the people, and stated, as the reason for making this demand, that they had heard from old men that his mother had been a captive in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes. Not only Hyrcanus, but also all the rest of the Pharisees were indignant at Eleazar for repeating this story, which of course insinuated a suspicion as to the purity of Hyrcanus' descent. But one, Jonathan, a Sadducee, and a great friend of Hyrcanus, assured the latter that Eleazar had simply expressed the sentiments common to all the Pharisees, and advised him to test them by putting to them the question, what punishment Eleazar deserved. On their answering that he deserved stripes and bonds, Hyrcanus was very angry, and concluded that Eleazar had reproached him with their approbation. He accordingly left the party of the Pharisees, abolished the decrees they had imposed upon the people, and punished those that observed them with death.

Though the form of the story as told by Josephus is certainly unhistorical,† there is every reason to believe that in the time of Hyrcanus the Pharisees had become a well-defined party and broke decisively with the Hasmonæan princes. The Maccabæan rising, which was originally in defence of religion (1 Mac 2<sup>27-50</sup>), had developed in a way that was little to the mind of 'the pious,' who, as we have seen, had withdrawn from the contest, when religious freedom was granted in the year 163. It gradually became a war, not for the law, but against the ancient aristocracy for the ethnarchy under the Syrians, and ended in the founding of a worldly dynasty. In the course of their struggles, Judas and his brothers were compelled by the necessity of their position to make use of 'profane' means; they entered into alliances with Gentile nations (1 Mac 8<sup>17</sup> 12<sup>1ff.</sup> 14<sup>24</sup>), and took the side, now of one, now of another pretender to the Syrian throne; they accepted from the kings of Syria military titles and commands and even the office of high priest (10<sup>26ff.</sup> 65 11<sup>27f.</sup> 57<sup>ff.</sup> 14<sup>38</sup>), and acted generally in accordance with the dictates of worldly prudence. The result was the establishment under Simon of a thoroughly secular State, the civil ruler being at the same time high priest (14<sup>41-47</sup>). Hyrcanus, whom Josephus calls a disciple of the Pharisees, walked in the footsteps of his predecessors. He renewed the alliance with Rome (Ant. XIII. ix. 2, XIV. x. 22) and kept a standing army of foreign troops, with which he accompanied Antiochus Sidetes against the Parthians (XIII. viii. 4). It is true, he destroyed the Samaritan sanctuary upon Mt. Gerizim, and forcibly converted the Idumæans and razed Samaria to the ground; but these were purely political measures, undertaken for the purpose of extending his dominion beyond the narrow limits of Judæa. His high priesthood was a secondary matter. 'For Hyrcanus the tiara had fallen to the rank of a mere decoration; he was a secular prince like the neighbouring heathen kings; his State was a purely secular realm, which was no longer able to pursue spiritual aims, no longer had spiritual concerns' (Cornill, p. 212).

The majority of the people were meanwhile satisfied with this turn of affairs. They were proud not only to enjoy religious freedom, but also to be once more an independent nation, and honoured the valiant princes who had led them to victory (1 Mac 13<sup>26</sup> 14<sup>4-11</sup> 40<sup>ff.</sup>). The ancient aristocracy also, the extreme Hellenizers of the time of Epiphanes, who at first had held out against Judas and his brothers, had either been swept away or had recognized the futility of carrying on the struggle, and along with their adherents came over to the new rulers, to whom they were able, from their birth and attainments, to render considerable service. Taught by experience, they had given up all thought of overthrowing the national religion, and accommodated themselves to the new order of things, which imposed upon them no harsh restrictions, and allowed them the full enjoyment of the good things of this life (cf. 1 Mac 15<sup>32</sup>). Along with the leading men of the new regime,* they became the chief supporters of the Maccabæan princes, with whose political aims they were in full sympathy. It is this party, consisting of members of the ancient and the new aristocracy and their adherents, that went by the name of Sadducees. They were primarily a purely political party. They were supremely interested in the maintenance and prosperity of the State as a secular State; religion was with them an altogether secondary concern; and they held very lax views on the subject of exclusiveness.

To 'the pious,' on the other hand, the Hasmonæan rule must have become ever more and more obnoxious. Since the outbreak of the Maccabæan rising they had doubtless grown both in numbers and exclusiveness, and were now known by the name, Pharisees. These were essentially a purely religious party, although we shall find them occasionally using political means for the attainment of their religious ends. Their fundamental principle was complete separation from everything non-Jewish. In order to secure this separation the law must be scrupulously kept; there must be no adoption of foreign ideas or ways of living; there must be no alliances with other nations; Israel, as the chosen people of J', must live an altogether separated life. The whole tendency of the new dynasty was against this exclusiveness. Hence the opposition to it of the Pharisees. Josephus may be right in making the ostensible ground of their quarrel with Hyrcanus the possession by him of the high priesthood. But the real ground of their opposition to him was much deeper. The Hasmonæans were orthodox worshippers of J', and even compelled neighbouring peoples to become Jews. But the dynasty they had founded was a worldly dynasty; and the Pharisees felt instinctively that in a national State with national politics their ideal was less likely to be realized than even under the rule of the Gentiles. The success of the Maccabæan rising had thus led to the formation of the two parties which played so important a part in the after history of the Jews.*

* The frequent occurrence of foreign names at this time among the Jews shows the progress that Hellenism had made among them. The Hasmonæan princes themselves bore foreign, in addition to their Hebrew names: Hyrcanus, Antigonus, Aristobulus, Alexander, Alexandra. For other Greek names at this time see 1 Mac 14<sup>22-24</sup> 15<sup>15</sup> 16<sup>1ff.</sup>; Ant. XIII. ix. 2. † That which was surprising in the case of the first Hellenizing high priests, had, it would seem, become the fashion in the national party, at least among those of higher rank. They had learned to do what the foreigners did, and did not scruple to bear foreign names' (Bertholet, op. cit. 230 f.).

* According to Ant. XIII. v. 9, they existed as parties as early as the time of Jonathan.

† Montet, Essai sur les origines des partis saduécien et pharisien, 205 ff.; Wellhausen, op. cit. 290.

Under Alexander Jannæus (B.C. 104-78) the opposition between the Hasmonæans and the Pharisees broke out into open conflict. Jannæus was a man of such an utterly worthless character that he very soon alienated the people from him and made them sympathize with the Pharisees. On one occasion, when, at a Feast of Tabernacles, he was officiating as high priest, the people pelted him with the lemons they were carrying for the celebration, and reviled him as the son of a captive and as being therefore unworthy of his priestly office. At his command his troops cut down 6000 of the people (Ant. XIII. xiii. 5). When he returned to Jerusalem from his war with Obâdas, defeated and without an army, there broke out an open rebellion, which lasted for six years, during which 50,000 Jews perished. When, wearied of the contest, he asked the conditions of peace, they demanded his death and called in the aid of the Syrian king, Demetrius III. (Eucairus). Jannæus was totally defeated and fled to the mountains. Moved by sympathy with him in his sore need, and perhaps dreading lest their country should once more become subject to Syria, many of the Jews deserted to him; Demetrius was compelled to retire, and Jannæus took fearful revenge upon his adversaries:—upon his return in triumph to Jerusalem he caused 800 of their chiefs to be crucified (Ant. XIII. xiii. 5, xiv. 1. 2). That the leaders in this rebellion were Pharisees, is evident from the fact that they afterwards avenged the execution of the 800 (Ant. XIII. xvi. 2), and that Jannæus, when dying, counselled his wife Alexandra Salome to make peace with them and be guided by them (XIII. xv. 5).

Alexandra Salome (B.C. 78-69), during whose reign Hyrcanus II., her eldest son, was high priest, followed entirely her dying husband's advice. She recalled the exiled Pharisees, admitted them to a large share in the government, and reintroduced the Pharisaic practices which John Hyrcanus is said to have abolished (Ant. XIII. xvi. 1 ff.; BJ I. v. 1 ff.). She also gave to the heads of the scribes a seat in the Sanhedrin along with the priestly aristocracy and the elders. According to later tradition, this was the golden age of Judaism.† But the Pharisees, who, according to Josephus, governed the queen, made a bad use of their authority. They took such fearful vengeance upon the Sadducees that a deputation of the latter, led by Aristobulus, Salome's younger son, presented themselves before her, protesting against the cruel treatment to which they were subjected. They reminded her of the assistance they had rendered her husband, hinted at the readiness with which neighbouring monarchs would receive them into their service, and insisted upon being at least placed in her fortresses. They not only succeeded in having an end put to the reign of terror, but also obtained command of all the fortresses, except three, where, along with Aristobulus, who soon joined them, they awaited the death of the queen to snatch the power out of the hands of the Pharisees (Ant. XIII. xvi. 2. 3. 5; BJ I. v. 3. 4).

* See Bousset, Jesu Predigt in ihrem Gegensatz zum Judentum, p. 29 ff. The Psalms of Solomon complain bitterly of the Hasmonæans having assumed the office of high priest and the title of king; see Ryle and James, Ps. of Sol. on 81<sup>d</sup> 17th. Hyrcanus, however, did not call himself king, but 'high priest and head of the commonwealth of the Judeans.'

† Montet, op. cit. 277 ff. 'Under Simon ben Shatach [a leading Pharisee and brother of the queen] and queen Salome, rain fell on the eve of the Sabbath, so that the corns of wheat were large as kidneys, the barley corns as large as olives, and the lentils like golden denarii; the scribes gathered such corns and preserved specimens of them in order to show future generations what sin entails' (Talm. Bab. Ta'anith 23a, in Streane, The Age of the Maccabees, p. 72).

On the death of Alexandra, Aristobulus (B.C. 69-63) soon dispossessed Hyrcanus II. of both the kingship and the high priesthood (Ant. XIV. i. 2, xv. vi. 4, xx. x.). He befriended the Sadducees, who were his chief supporters. In the course of the struggle that ensued, both the brothers appealed to the Romans, and presented themselves before Pompey in Damascus, in order to plead their cause. A third party (whom most take to have been Pharisees) also appeared before him, desiring the abolition of the sovereignty altogether, and the restoration of the old sacerdotal constitution (Ant. XIV. iii. 2). When at last he was compelled to take the temple-mount by storm (B.C. 63), Pompey entered the Holy of Holies, but left the treasures of the temple untouched. Many of the leaders of the Sadducees were executed; Aristobulus and his children were taken to Rome; and Hyrcanus was restored to his much-curtailed inheritance, not as king, but as high priest and ethnarch, with the nominal control of the civil administration of the country. How the Pharisees regarded this terrible catastrophe we learn from the Psalms of Solomon.* They looked upon it as a Divine punishment of the Sadducean aristocracy and priests, who had called the Romans into the land (81<sup>d</sup>-19), but were at the same time bitterly enraged against the heathen, who had so impiously defiled the temple and the holy city (Ps-Sol 1, 2, 8, and 17, which seem to refer to Pompey's capture of Jerusalem; cf. Ryle and James, op. cit. xlili).

After the loss of national independence, the opposition between the Pharisees and the Sadducees naturally soon lost its political character, and became more and more distinctly religious. The Sadducees, who still formed the majority of the Sanhedrin, attempted, during the ethnarchy of Hyrcanus, to call Herod to account for his lawless proceedings in Galilee, but this attempt only proved their powerlessness (Ant. XIV. ix. 1 ff.). When Herod captured Jerusalem (B.C. 37), he put to death 45 of these Sadducean Sanhedrists (Ant. xv. i. 2 calls them leaders of the party of Antigonus, cf. BJ I. xviii. 4; Ant. XIV. ix. 4 says 'all the members of the Sanhedrin' except Sameas); and he still further diminished their power by deposing and appointing high priests according to his own pleasure, and by introducing among the high priestly families his own relations and creatures. When he purged the Sanhedrin in the manner just described, he spared the leaders of the Pharisees, who had advised the citizens to throw open the gates of the city to him (Ant. XIV. ix. 4, xv. i. 1); and although they refused to take the oath of allegiance, he merely punished them with a fine (XV. x. 4; XVII. ii. 4). Recognizing their influence with the people, he at first would fain have gained them over to his side, and therefore took pains in several ways to respect their religious feelings (cf. xv. xi. 5. 6); but they simply acquiesced in his rule, as being a Divine judgment upon the people for their sins. Towards the end of his reign, their attitude towards him became one of hostility. They conspired with members of his household to secure his overthrow (xvii. ii. 4), and (B. C. 4) instigated their pupils to cut down the golden eagle, which he had placed over the chief entrance to the temple as a sign of Roman sovereignty. For this offence he caused a number of them to be burned alive (xvii. vi. 2-4; BJ i. xxxiii. 1-4).

When, after the deposition of Archelaus, Judæa passed under the direct rule of the Romans, the latter left internal matters largely in the hands of the Sanhedrin, under the presidency of the high priest, who belonged to the Sadducean party (Ant. xx. ix. 1; Ac 5<sup>17</sup>). The Sadducean aristocrats, with whom the new families raised by Herod to the high priestly dignity had soon mixed, thus regained a considerable measure of power; but in order to stand well with the people, they were compelled to act in respect of all legal questions in accordance with the principles of the Pharisees (Ant. xviii. i. 4). The latter, many of whom sat in the Sanhedrin (Ac 5<sup>34</sup> 23<sup>5</sup>), were the real leaders of the people. Under Agrippa I. (A. D. 41-44), who, at least within Palestine, lived the life of a pious Jew, observing strictly the ancient laws and offering daily sacrifices, they had matters very much after their own mind. To please them, Agrippa persecuted the Christians, put James, the brother of John, to death, and cast Peter into prison (Ac 12). When Judæa passed again under the direct rule of the Romans, the Sadducees once more became the nominal possessors of authority. But their doom was sealed. With the destruction of Jerusalem, the high priesthood and the Sanhedrin vanished, and the Sadducees, as a party, disappeared from history.

It was otherwise with the Pharisees.* They survived the Temple and the State. They had not, strictly speaking, been a political party within the old commonwealth, and for that very reason, when the latter perished, their influence was not lessened. Their leading Rabbis formed a body, which regarded itself as a continuation of the ancient Sanhedrin. At first it had its seat at Jamnia; it afterwards removed to Galilee, and remained for a long time at Tiberias. The office of president was hereditary in the family of Hillel. The president's authority grew rapidly. He bore the title of the old high priests, Nasi or Ethnarch, and, later, Patriarch; in course of time he was recognized by the imperial government as the head of the Palestinian Jews; from Jews in foreign lands he received gifts of money, which were collected annually by his representatives. These Rabbis separated themselves more and more completely from the Gentiles. The LXX, which had become the Christian's Bible, was supplanted by a more literal translation, that of Aquila. They also became more strict among themselves; the old tendency of the scribes to regulate the whole of life by the law was accentuated. The result was a spiritual slavery such as had never before existed. The communities voluntarily submitted to the new hierarchy; they willed the end, viz. the maintenance of Judaism, and therefore accommodated themselves to the means. As result we have the preservation of Judaism as an international fellowship even after the downfall of the theocracy.

ii. LEADING CHARACTERISTICS OF THE PHARISEES.—(1) Their scrupulous observance of the law. According to Josephus they were noted for their accuracy in interpreting the laws (BJ i. v. 2, ii. viii. 14, Vita 38, Ant. xvii. ii. 4), and for the scrupulousness with which they kept them (Ant. xviii. i. 3). They held as binding not only the written, but the oral law, the 'traditions of the fathers' (xiii. x. 6, xvi. 2). Like their progenitors, the Hasidæans, they were, speaking generally, the party of the scribes, whose precepts they carried into practice, and whose leaders, latterly, proceeded from their ranks (xv. i. 1, x. 4). The account given of them in the NT is substantially the same as that of Josephus. In the Gospels the Pharisees and the scribes are constantly mentioned in the same connexion, and in such a way as to imply that they practically formed the same party, e.g. Mt 5<sup>20</sup> 12<sup>38</sup> 15<sup>1</sup>, Mk 2<sup>16</sup> 7<sup>1-5</sup>, Lk 5<sup>17-21</sup> 30<sup>67</sup> 7<sup>30</sup> 11<sup>53</sup> 14<sup>3</sup> 15<sup>2</sup>, Jn 8<sup>3</sup>.* The great discourse in Mt 23 (cf. Lk 11<sup>37-52</sup>) is directed against both the Pharisees and the scribes. Gamaliel is both a Pharisee and a doctor of the law (Ac 5<sup>34</sup>); the Pharisees form the strictest sect of the Jewish religion (26<sup>5</sup>), and Saul, a Pharisee (Ph 3<sup>6</sup>), had been brought up according to the strict manner of the law of the fathers (Ac 22<sup>3</sup>). Attention is called to their holding the traditions of the elders, especially in regard to the washing of hands and vessels (Mk 7<sup>1-5</sup> = Mt 15<sup>2</sup>, Mt 23<sup>25</sup>, Lk 11<sup>38</sup>), to their tithing (Lk 18<sup>12</sup>, etc.), fasting (Mk 2<sup>18</sup> = Mt 9<sup>14</sup>, etc.), and strict observance of the Sabbath (Mk 2<sup>23</sup> = Mt 12<sup>10</sup>, Lk 13<sup>10</sup> 14<sup>10</sup>, Jn 5<sup>1-16</sup> 9<sup>14</sup>). The traditions of the elders were even more binding than the commandments of the written law (Mk 7<sup>8</sup>). In later Jewish writings we find similar statements. The written law had to be explained in accordance with tradition. 'The sword comes upon the world for suppression of judgment; and for perversion of judgment; and for explaining Torah not according to canon (tradition).† 'Words of Soferim are akin to words of Torah and more beloved than words of Torah, for (Ca 1<sup>2</sup>) Thy Love is better than Wine.' It is added that whereas the Torah contains both light and weighty precepts, the words of the Soferim are all of the latter class (Rabbi Jochanan in Taylor, op. cit. 105). 'It is a greater crime to teach contrary to the precepts of the scribes than contrary to the Torah itself' (Sanhedrin xi. 3 in Schürer, GJV ii. 390 [HJP ii. ii. 12]). No contradiction was allowed to anything that had once been introduced and laid down by the fathers (Ant. xviii. i. 3).

The Pharisees were thus the strictly legal party among the Jews. Their piety was strictly legal; the essence of religion consisted in the accurate knowledge and scrupulous observance of the law and tradition, which were the norm of all life, national, social, and individual. The Sadducees, while they had a tradition of their own, utterly rejected the traditions to which the Pharisees were so much attached.

(2) Immortality of the soul, resurrection of the body, and future retribution. According to Josephus, the Pharisees taught that every soul is incorruptible, but that only those of good men pass over into another body, while those of the wicked are punished with eternal suffering (BJ ii. viii. 14). They held that there is an immortal vigour in souls, and that under the earth there are rewards and punishments for those that have lived virtuously or viciously in this life; that for the latter there has been appointed an everlasting prison, but the former have the power to return to life (Ant. xviii. i. 3 f.). In the above passages Josephus does not represent the Pharisees as believing in the transmigration of souls, but as holding the doctrines, common to Judaism since Dn 12<sup>2</sup>, of a resurrection of the body and of a future retribution. The Psalms of Solomon also speak only of a resurrection of the righteous. The sinner 'falleth; verily grievous is his fall, and he shall not rise again; the destruction of the sinner is for ever. But they that fear the LORD shall rise again unto life eternal, and their life shall be in the light of the LORD, and it shall fail no more' (3<sup>13-16</sup>). 'The life of the righteous is for ever. But sinners shall be taken away unto destruction' (13<sup>24</sup>). 'Therefore is their inheritance hell and darkness and destruction. . . . But the saints of the LORD shall inherit life in gladness' (14<sup>6f</sup>; cf. 15<sup>11-16</sup>). The Sadducees denied the immortality of the soul and the resurrection of the body.

* Such expressions as 'the scribes of the Pharisees' (Mk 2<sup>16</sup>), 'the Pharisees and their scribes' (Lk 5<sup>30</sup>), 'the scribes of the Pharisees' part' (Ac 23<sup>9</sup>), show that there were also non-Pharisaic scribes.

† Pirke Aboth v. 13; see Taylor, Sayings of the Jewish Fathers

(3) Messianic expectations. The doctrine of the resurrection was a cardinal doctrine with the Pharisees, because of its close connexion with their Messianic hopes. They looked for a literal reign of God upon earth, when the power, of which they were meanwhile deprived, would be in their hands; for the Messianic kingdom was to be the kingdom of the saints, and they were the saints. In the Psalms of Solomon we have a good account of these hopes as cherished by them shortly before our Saviour's birth. The Messiah, who is not Divine, is the son of David, and is raised up by God, whose vicegerent he is upon earth. He delivers Israel from the supremacy of the Gentiles (i.e. the Romans), whom he destroys with the word of his mouth, and thrusts out the sinners (i.e. the Sadducees) from the inheritance of God. He reigns over Israel, evidently in Jerusalem, which he purges and makes holy as in the days of old; the Gentiles also become subject to him. Pure from sin himself, there is no iniquity in his day in the people's midst; they are all holy and the sons of their God. Though his kingdom is really an earthly kingdom, nothing is said of material blessings.* But that their hopes were occasionally of a very materialistic nature, is evident from the prospect which, according to Josephus, they held out to Bagoas, the eunuch (Ant. xvii. ii. 4). Naturally the Sadducees were wholly indifferent to such Messianic expectations.

(4) Angels and Spirits. The Sadducees denied that there was either angel or spirit; the Pharisees confessed both (Ac 23<sup>8</sup>).

(5) Divine providence and freedom of man's will. According to Josephus, the Pharisees, while making everything dependent on fate and God, taught that the doing of what is right or wrong is for the most part in man's own power, but that fate also co-operates in every action (BJ ii. viii. 14). They maintained that all things are done by fate, and yet admitted a measure of freedom to man, so that he contributes to the divinely willed result (Ant. xviii. i. 3); or, as it is put in another passage (XIII. v. 9), they taught that some things, but not all, are the work of fate; with regard to some events, it is in man's power whether they happen or not. It is altogether improbable that the Pharisees spoke of 'fate'; but the Psalms of Solomon bear witness to the substantial accuracy of Josephus' statements. 'Verily as for man—his portion is laid in the balance before Thee—he addeth not thereto nor increaseth contrary to Thy judgment, O God' (5<sup>6</sup>). 'O God, our works are in our choice, yea, in the power of our own soul: to do either righteousness or iniquity in the works of our hands. Whoso doeth righteousness layeth up for himself life at the LORD'S hand: and whoso doeth wickedness is guilty of his own soul to destroy it' (9<sup>7-9</sup>).* The Pharisees believed in the omnipotence and providence of God, and therefore held that in human actions, good or bad, a co-operation of God must be assumed. At the same time they insisted upon the freedom of man's power of choice, and upon man's responsibility. The Sadducees denied 'fate' altogether, and made man the absolute master of his own destiny.

(6) Their separation from the mass of the people, their distinctive 'Pharisaism.' On all the above-mentioned points the Pharisees simply held what was common to later orthodox Judaism. But all our sources present them to us as a distinct party within the people, an ecclesiola in ecclesia.† This is implied also in the name that they bore. The name, Φαρισαῖοι, is derived from the Aramaic פְּרִישֵׁי, stat. emphat. פְּרִישָׁא, and denotes 'the separated ones.' Whether this name was given them by their adversaries (Schürer, Montet, Edersheim) or adopted by themselves,‡ it connoted something more specific than the separation from the Gentiles, which, since the time of Ezra and Nehemiah, was characteristic of all who would be genuine Jews. It referred to their separation from the great mass of even their orthodox fellow-countrymen. The latter, however willing, were unable to observe strictly the minute prescriptions of the law as to foods and levitical purity; they were consequently unclean in the eyes of the Pharisees, who, in order to avoid all risk of being defiled, held aloof, as far as possible, from all intercourse with them. 'Parush is one who separates himself from all uncleanness and from unclean food and from the people of the land, who are not scrupulous in the matter of food' (Nathan ben Jehiel). The Pharisees were thus the Separatists or Purists. The name, however, that they gave themselves was hābērīm (חֲבֵרִים 'associates'), a name which also shows that they formed among themselves a close fellowship. A hābēr is one who, whether learned or unlearned, scrupulously observes the law, written and oral, more especially in respect of levitical purity, tithes, and all other religious dues. According to the OT view each Israelite was the hābēr (חֲבֵר) of the other; the Pharisee acknowledged as his hābēr only him who scrupulously observed the law. These scrupulous observers of the law, and these alone, were the hābērīm, the genuine Israelites. The rest of the people were simply the 'am hā-ārez, the people of the land, common persons, the vulgar herd. In the Books of Ezr (9<sup>11</sup>, 10<sup>2-11</sup>) and Neh (10<sup>28-31</sup>) this name was given to the heathen and half-heathen inhabitants of Palestine as distinguished from the Jews; as used by the Pharisees, it designated the mass of the people as distinguished from themselves, the real Israelites, the Israel according to the spirit.§

They were naturally unable to separate themselves entirely from 'the people of the land,' and had therefore to draw up precise rules regulating their intercourse with them. 'The full hābēr * See Sir 11<sup>14</sup>: 'Good things and evil, life and death, poverty and riches are from the Lord' (cf. 35<sup>7-15</sup>); 15<sup>11f</sup>: 'Say not thou, it is through the Lord that I fell . . . it is He that caused me to err . . . (The Lord) left man in the hand of his own counsel. If thou wilt, thou shalt keep the commandments; and to perform faithfulness is of thine own good pleasure. He hath set fire and water before thee; thou shalt stretch forth thy hand unto whichever thou wilt. Before man is life and death; and whichever he liketh, it shall be given him.'

† According to Josephus (Ant. xvii. ii. 4) they numbered above 6000 in the time of Herod.

‡ Wellhausen (op. cit. 259) says it was a title of honour and called attention, not so much to their separation, as to their eminent piety.

§ The above paragraph summarizes Schürer, GJV 3 ii. 396-403, a very full and lucid account of the matter; cf. also Weber, Jüdische Theologie, etc., 42-46; Edersheim, i. 311f. Schürer remarks that the question, 'Who is my neighbour?' (Lk 10<sup>29</sup>), was a very important question to a Jew. The hābēr of a Rabbi was a Rabbi; the hābēr of a priest was a priest; the hābēr of an Israelite was an Israelite.

* See Ryle and James, op. cit. lii. ff.; Hühn, Die messianischen Weissagungen des israelitisch-jüdischen Volkes, 91 ff.

undertook not to sell to an 'am hā'ārez any fluid or dry substance (nutriment or fruit), nor to buy from him any such fluid, nor to entertain him as a guest in his own clothes (on account of their possible impurity)' (Edersheim, i. 312). Hillel 'used to say, No boor is a sinner; nor is the vulgar [an 'am hā'ārez] pious' (Aboth, ii. 6); cf. Jn 7<sup>49</sup>: 'this multitude which knoweth not the law are accursed'; also the fault found with our Saviour on account of His free intercourse with publicans and 'sinners,' Mt 9<sup>10-12</sup>, Mk 2<sup>14-17</sup>, Lk 5<sup>27-32</sup> 7<sup>36-50</sup>.

Notwithstanding the fact that they thus separated themselves from the mass of the people, they were not a religious 'sect' (Ac 15<sup>5</sup> 26<sup>5</sup>) in the strict sense of the term. Neither in worship nor doctrine did they separate themselves from the Jewish community at large. 'Hillel said, Separate not thyself from the congregation' (Aboth, ii. 5). They worshipped in the temple and the synagogue along with their fellow-countrymen, and the views they held as to the law, the resurrection of the body, etc., were by no means peculiar to themselves. They were, indeed, in all respects 'the classical representatives of post-exilic Judaism, (Schürer, GJV<sup>3</sup> ii. 403 [HJP ii. ii. 25]).

While their separation from the 'am hā'ārez shows that the Pharisees were far from being democrats, they were nevertheless, at least ultimately, the popular and most influential party. They had more influence with the multitude than even the king and the high priest (XIII. x. 5, XVII. ii. 4); they had the multitude on their side (XIII. x. 6), so that the Sadducee officials had to act according to their principles (XVIII. i. 4). Even in Roman times, when the high priest was still the head of the Sanhedrin, and the Sadducees had probably the most votes, the Pharisees were the real rulers in respect of legal matters. They had influence especially with women, e.g. Alexandra Salome and the female members of Herod's household (XVII. ii. 4). They were also, according to the Gospels, the real leaders of the opposition to our Lord. Several reasons contributed to their popularity. They had more regard to the public than the Sadducees (BJ ii. viii. 14); they were milder as judges (Ant. XIII. x. 6, xx. ix. 1); they shared, and indeed nourished, the national hatred against the Romans; the doctrines they held and taught, their scrupulous observance of the law, and their outwardly strict and severe manner of life caused them to be revered as pattern Israelites (XVIII. i. 3). That they courted this popularity, we learn, not only from the Gospels, but also from such sayings in the Pirke Aboth as 'Let thy house be opened wide; and let the needy be thy household' (i. 5); 'Receive every man with a pleasant expression of countenance' (i. 16); and Hillel's saying (quoted above), 'Separate not thyself from the congregation' (ii. 5).

(7) The Pharisees and the supremacy of the Gentiles. Though the Pharisees were not a political party, it is unjust to represent them as unpatriotic. Their patriotism, however, was 'religious patriotism' (Cheyne). Their ideal was the kingdom of David. What they desired was not the setting up of a merely independent secular kingdom of Israel, but an Israel reconstituted by means of the law, an Israel over which God reigned in the person of His vicegerent, and from which all 'sinners' were excluded. For the setting up of this Jewish nationality they looked, not to the adoption of political methods, but to a direct interposition of God; the great means whereby they could prepare the way for this Divine interposition was the strict carrying out of the law. So long as this was permitted, they could tolerate even a foreign yoke, as being a Divine punishment for the people's sins; only when this was not permitted, or when their principles were flagrantly outraged, did they resist with force, as in the time of Alexander Jannæus and towards the close of Herod's reign (cf. the Hasidæans in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes). Their use of political means to further their religious ends during the reign of Alexandra Salome shows that they were by no means consistent in the application of their religious principle.

A fairly correct idea of their attitude to the foreign domination may be formed from the Psalms of Solomon. The LORD, who is 'King over the heavens and judgeth kings and rulers' (2<sup>4</sup>. 36), is 'our King' (5<sup>22</sup>), He is 'our King henceforth and even for evermore' (17<sup>1</sup>. 51); He is the King of the expected Messiah (v. 38). Because of the people's sins, He has meanwhile given them up to a foreign yoke. In 17<sup>3</sup>. 6 ('Thou, O LORD, didst choose David to be king over Israel, and didst swear unto him touching his seed for ever, that his kingdom should not fail before Thee. But when we sinned, sinners rose up against us; they fell upon us and thrust us out: even they, to whom Thou madest no promise, took away our place with violence'), the allusion is probably to the usurpation of the high priesthood and kingship by the Hasmonæans; but the psalmist writes in the same strain of the overthrow of Jerusalem by the Romans. God not only did not prevent Pompey from casting down fenced walls with a battering-ram (2<sup>1</sup>), but it was He that brought the Gentiles upon Jerusalem (2<sup>24</sup> 8<sup>6</sup>). God's righteousness was manifest in these judgments (2<sup>16</sup> 8<sup>7</sup>. 31); they were a judging of Israel with chastening (8<sup>32</sup>; 18<sup>4</sup> 'Thy chastening is upon us as upon a firstborn son only-begotten'). Still the psalmist does not conceive this foreign domination as lasting. He looks forward with confidence to a restoration of Israel under the divinely raised up, but human, Messiah (17<sup>35</sup>), who puts no confidence in any carnal weapon (v. 37), suffers no wicked person or stranger to dwell any more among the people (vv. 29, 31), nor any iniquity to be in their midst (vv. 29, 36), and judges the nations and the peoples with the wisdom of his righteousness (v. 31). 'Blessed are they that shall be born in those days' (17<sup>30</sup> 18<sup>7</sup>); but the present generation must wait God's appointed time (7<sup>9</sup>); they must pray for its speedy advent (17<sup>23</sup>-26. 51), and be prepared for it by a Divine cleansing (18<sup>6</sup>: 'The LORD cleanse Israel for the day, when He shall have mercy upon them and shall bless them; even for the day of His appointing, when He shall bring back His anointed').

This was undoubtedly the attitude of the Pharisees generally to the Gentile rule. Such rule was meanwhile to be tolerated, as being a Divine chastisement (the standpoint of Pollio and Sameas, Ant. XIV. ix. 4, XV. i. 1); but it was nevertheless a violation of God's sovereignty over the elect people. God alone was king of Israel; there could be no lawful king of Israel, save God's vicegerent, the 'son of David.' In accordance with this principle they were opposed to the Hasmonæan princes (who were neither descendants of David nor of the legitimate high priestly family) and abhorred the rule of Herod and the Romans. To the former the majority of them refused the oath of allegiance (Ant. xv. x. 4, xvii. ii. 4); and they questioned the lawfulness of paying taxes to the latter (Mt 22<sup>17</sup>, Mk 12<sup>14</sup>, Lk 20<sup>22</sup>). They thus by their teaching and practice fanned the flame of national hostility to the Romans, and were indirectly responsible for the rebellion against Rome. Josephus is anxious to separate the Zealots entirely from the Pharisees (in Ant. XVIII. i. 1. 6 he calls them a fourth philosophic sect), and draws attention to the fact that some leading Pharisees did not approve of their excesses (BJ IV. iii. 9); but he is forced to admit that it was a Pharisee, named Zadok, who along with Judas Galilæus formed that party, and that the notions they held were those of the Pharisees (Ant. XVIII. i. 1. 6, cf. BJ II. viii. 1). The Zealots were the party of political action, and simply carried out the Pharisaic principles to their logical conclusion.

iii. THE PHARISEES AND JESUS. — (1) Their opposition to our Lord. The Pharisees and scribes were the first to assume an attitude of hostility and criticism to Jesus. They maintained this attitude all through His public ministry down to the very close; for although in the last days of His life the Sadducees were most prominent, the Pharisaic scribes also took part in His trial and condemnation. They had many reasons to find fault with Him. He claimed authority to forgive sins (Mt 9<sup>1</sup>, Mk 2<sup>6f.</sup>, Lk 5<sup>21</sup>), and associated freely with publicans and 'sinners' (Mt 9<sup>11</sup>, Mk 2<sup>16</sup>, Lk 5<sup>30</sup> 7<sup>39</sup> 15<sup>1f.</sup> 19<sup>7</sup>); He and His disciples were indifferent to ascetic practices (Mt 9<sup>14</sup>, Mk 2<sup>18</sup>, Lk 5<sup>33</sup>), and to levitical purity (Mt 15<sup>1f.</sup>, Mk 7<sup>18f.</sup>, Lk 11<sup>37f.</sup>), and were not careful to observe the Sabbath in the orthodox fashion (Mt 12<sup>1-8</sup> 9-14, Mk 2<sup>23f.</sup> 3<sup>1f.</sup>, Lk 6<sup>1f.</sup> 6<sup>9</sup> 13<sup>14</sup> 14<sup>1f.</sup>, Jn 5<sup>10f.</sup> 9<sup>13f.</sup>). They accused Him of being in league with Beelzebub (Mt 12<sup>24f.</sup>, Mk 3<sup>22f.</sup>, Lk 11<sup>14f.</sup>, cf. Mt 9<sup>34</sup> 11<sup>19</sup>), demanded a sign from Him (Mt 12<sup>28f.</sup> 16<sup>1</sup>, Mk 8<sup>11</sup>), and attempted to frighten Him from Galilee into Judæa, where He would be more in the power of the Sanhedrin (Lk 13<sup>31</sup>, cf. Plummer, St. Luke, 348). They put testing questions to Him, e.g. as to the way of inheriting eternal life (Lk 10<sup>26f.</sup>), as to the greatest commandment (Mt 22<sup>34f.</sup>, Mk 12<sup>28f.</sup>), and as to the law of divorce (Mt 19<sup>3</sup>, Mk 10<sup>2</sup>). These were leading questions meant to test His orthodoxy, and to discredit Him, if possible, with the people (see Swete, The Gospel according to St. Mark, p. 202 on Mk 10<sup>2</sup>: 'probably their intention was simply to place Him in apparent opposition to Moses, who had permitted divorce'). Their most skilful testing question was that as to the lawfulness of paying tribute to Cæsar (Mt 22<sup>15f.</sup>, Mk 12<sup>13f.</sup>, Lk 20<sup>19f.</sup>): whatever answer He gave, He could hardly avoid offending either the Roman authorities or the people. For their alliance with the Herodians in this matter (Mt 22<sup>16</sup>, Mk 12<sup>13</sup>), cf. Mk 3<sup>6</sup>. From their standpoint their opposition to Him was inevitable. They felt instinctively that the whole spirit of His life was in flat contradiction with their most cherished convictions.

(2) Our Lord's criticism of the Pharisees. Jesus recognized that the opposition between Himself and the Pharisees was essential, and not only defended Himself against their attacks, but also criticised them keenly. He frequently denounced them as hypocrites (e.g. Mt 6<sup>2</sup> 5. 16 15<sup>7</sup> 23<sup>13</sup> 15. 23. 25. 27. 29, Mk 7<sup>6</sup>), whited sepulchres (Mt 23<sup>27</sup>, cf. Lk 11<sup>44</sup>), the offspring of vipers and serpents (Mt 12<sup>34</sup> 23<sup>33</sup>), an evil and adulterous generation (Mt 12<sup>39</sup> 16<sup>4</sup>), and blind guides (Mt 15<sup>14</sup> 23<sup>16</sup> 19. 24. 26); He warned His disciples against their leaven (Mt 16<sup>6</sup> 11<sup>f.</sup>, Mk 8<sup>15</sup>, Lk 12<sup>1</sup>), denied that their righteousness qualified for admission into the kingdom of heaven (Mt 5<sup>20</sup>), and declared that, while the publicans and harlots were entering the kingdom, they were remaining outside (Mt 21<sup>31f.</sup>). He recognized their official character, and the duty of the people towards them as authorized teachers, but He warned against following their example (Mt 23<sup>2f.</sup>). He also charged them with a great many specific vices, most of which were inherent in Pharisaic Judaism.

The fundamental principle of Pharisaic Judaism was complete separation from everything non-Jewish; hence their separation from the mass of their fellow-countrymen; hence also their devotion to the minute study and scrupulous fulfilment of the law. The law was God's great gift to Israel; their possession of the law was the most signal proof that they were God's chosen people; it separated Israel as a 'holy' people from all other peoples. It was also the only, and the absolutely perfect, means of attaining the Messianic salvation both for the individual and the nation. Life had therefore no other aim and meaning than the study and fulfilment of the law. One evil consequence of this 'idolatry of the law' was the externalizing of religion. God was conceived of mainly as Lawgiver and Judge. The religious relation between God and Israel was purely legal; it was founded on a purely legal compact. Religion was not a fellowship with God, but a strictly legal walk before God. Their zeal for the law was consequently a serving of God for the sake of reward; more especially for the supreme reward of sharing in the glory and bliss of the Messianic age. It was possible to satisfy God's demands perfectly in a legal way; and by doing so they hoped to enjoy the commanding God, whom they obeyed, as a gracious God. This doctrine of merit led almost of necessity to a great multiplication of precepts, to a hedging or fencing of the law, so as to make its violation almost impossible. They also sought to acquire merit by doing more than was commanded. Moreover, in their keeping of the law, they considered mainly whether a particular action was commanded or forbidden. Their attitude to their almost deified law was external, formal, mechanical. They laid stress not upon the rightness of an action, or upon the disposition from which it was done, but upon its being commanded and upon its formal correctness. They applied this principle even to such matters as fasting and prayer. They attached excessive importance to the precepts relating to foods and levitical purity, because the strict observance of these precepts kept them from defilement. They made the law 'only a manual of religious etiquette.' Their righteousness was thus mere formalism; their righteous man was one who kept the law, written and oral, in an external, but formally correct manner.

Our Lord's whole teaching regarding God as the Father was a criticism of Pharisaic legalism. God is not primarily Lawgiver and Judge, but the heavenly Father. Religion is fellowship with God. The religious bond uniting God and man is grace on God's part, trust and love and heartfelt obedience on the part of man. In the relation between God and man there is no room for the idea of merit (Lk 17<sup>7-10</sup>). God cares for individual sinners quâ sinners, and throws the kingdom of heaven wide open to all who are willing to enter in. He sends His Son to seek and to save the lost, and rejoices greatly when any lost one comes back. He rewards men, not according to the quantity of work they have done, but in accordance with His own sovereign grace (Mt 20<sup>1-16</sup>). Our Lord explicitly criticises the externalism of the Pharisees. According to Him, the basis of the ethical life is not an external authority, but the personal relation of an individual to God (cf. Mt 5<sup>45</sup> 48 18<sup>32f.</sup>, Lk 7<sup>47</sup>). What He demands is not outward correctness, but inner moral life (Mt 23<sup>25-28</sup>, Lk 11<sup>39-41</sup>), the surrender of the whole personality (Mt 22<sup>37-40</sup>), not the mere performance of a number of externally good deeds. That which 'defiles' a man is the evil condition of his own heart (Mt 15<sup>11f.</sup>, Mk 7<sup>14f.</sup>). No action is of any moral worth, unless it is the expression of the inward disposition (cf. what is said of almsgiving, prayer, and fasting Mt 6<sup>2</sup> 5. 16 9<sup>14f.</sup>). The righteousness of the kingdom of heaven is inward and spiritual; it is the fruit of a renewed heart and of a filial relation to God.

The purely formal ethics of the Pharisees led to a great many other evils. They paid no attention to the ethical content of a law. Ethically indifferent precepts were as important as those bearing on really moral duties, simply because they were contained in the law or tradition. They accordingly busied themselves with minute trifles, to which they even attached greater importance than to the discharge of duties to their fellow-men. They divorced morality and religion (Mt 15<sup>17</sup>, Mk 7<sup>17</sup>, Mt 23<sup>23</sup>, Lk 11<sup>42</sup> 18<sup>12</sup>, cf. Mt 5<sup>23</sup> 9<sup>13</sup> 12<sup>10</sup>; justice and mercy, etc., are opposed by our Lord to a false way of serving God; mercy is better than sacrifice; duty to parents takes precedence of so-called religious duty; to be reconciled to one's brother is more necessary than coming to the altar; the Sabbath is 'sanctified' by doing good; 'the programme of genuine religion': 'genuinely ethical deeds are more important than the observance of ceremonial prescriptions'—Jülicher). Their externalism did not deliver them from the impulses of the natural man, such as covetousness and rapacity (Mt 23<sup>25</sup>, Mk 12<sup>40</sup>, Lk 20<sup>47</sup>, cf. 16<sup>14</sup>) and the desire of receiving honour from men (Mt 23<sup>5</sup>, Mk 12<sup>38</sup>, Lk 11<sup>43</sup> 14<sup>7</sup> 20<sup>46</sup>); while it led inevitably to casuistry (e.g. in respect of the Sabbath; * oaths, Mt 23<sup>16-22</sup>; duty to God outweighing duty to man, Mt 15<sup>3</sup>, Mk 7<sup>9</sup>; inventing statutes virtually cancelling more irksome ones, Mt 23<sup>4</sup>, Lk 11<sup>46</sup>), ostentation and self-righteousness (Mt 6<sup>1-18</sup> 23<sup>5</sup>, Mk 12<sup>40</sup>, Lk 16<sup>15</sup> 18<sup>9</sup> 20<sup>47</sup>), censoriousness (Lk 18<sup>9</sup>), and hypocrisy (Mt 23<sup>25-28</sup>, Mk 12<sup>40</sup>, Lk 11<sup>39</sup> 44 16<sup>15</sup> 20<sup>47</sup>). They paid external homage to the great men of the past, but were altogether void of their spirit (Mt 23<sup>29</sup>, Lk 11<sup>47</sup>). By means of their false interpretations of scripture and their legal conception of religion they shut the kingdom of heaven both against themselves and others (Mt 23<sup>13</sup>, Lk 11<sup>52</sup>); while by means of their fencing of the law, they turned the commandments of God (e.g. as to the Sabbath), which were given to help men to live a true life (Mk 2<sup>27</sup>), into heavy burdens, grievous to be borne (Mt 23<sup>4</sup>, Lk 11<sup>46</sup>). There were doubtless in our Lord's time many good men among the Pharisees, but the tendency of the whole system was to produce hypocrisy (cf. what is said of proselytes Mt 23<sup>10</sup>), or, in the case of earnest and sincere souls, self-torture and a sense of estrangement from God (cf. Mt 11<sup>28</sup>; see Weber, 320 f.).

PHARPAR (פַּרְפָּר, Β' Ἀφαρρά, Ἀ Φαρρά) is named by Naaman, along with the ABANAH (2 K 5<sup>12</sup>), as one of the rivers of Damascus. Much has been written on the subject, but its identity is still in doubt. The Arab Version gives Taurá for Pharpar, * See Schürer, ii. 470 ff., 491 f.; Edersheim, ii. 774 ff.

but the modern Beirut revision simply transliterates Farfara. There is a local belief, for which some antiquity is claimed, that Abanah and Pharpar are represented by Nahr Banids or Abanids, and Nahr Taurá, respectively. In favour of this, Dr. Wm. Wright argues in Nelson's Bible Treasury (p. 250), quoting the late Dr. Meshaka, one of the most learned of modern Damascenes. The old Arab geographers, however, are unaware of the pre-eminent charms of any two rivers of Damascus. Dimashki (c. A.D. 1300) speaks of seven streams into which the waters of el-Barada are divided, and mentions among the others, with no special commendation, Nahr Thawrah and Nahr Balniyas (or Bánās). So also Idrisi (A.D. 1154). But even these names are unknown to Istakhri and Ibn Haukal (A.D. 951-978), who refer to only three canals as branching off from the main stream. It is hard to see why Naaman should have ignored the river itself, flowing towards the city with full refreshing current, to extol two of the canals supplied by its waters.

The identity of Pharpar with el-A'waj is maintained by Thomson (Land and Book, iii. 359, 398, 429). The two main sources of this stream rise on the eastern slopes of Hermon, just under Ḳasr 'Antár; the 'Army to the north, and the Jennány to the south. Below Sa'sa' the latter takes the name Sabirány, which it retains after confluence with the 'Army, as far as el-Kisweh, on the great hajj road. Thence to the lake it is called el-A'waj ('the crooked'). In the season of melting snows the volume of water it carries is very great; but later in the year the stream is much attenuated. Escaping from the valley, el-A'waj waters the south-eastern part of the plain of Damascus, and, splitting up into several streams, falls at last into Bahret el-Hijāneh. In the Wādy Barbar it is natural to detect an echo of the ancient 'Pharpar'; but Thomson errs in making this Wādy tributary to the Sabirány. Such waters as it supplies are carried into the plain north of Jebel el-Aswad, while the Sabirány flows to the south. The proposed identification, therefore, loses what support might be derived from similarity of name. It is, however, adopted by G. A. Smith as probable (HGHL 1 642), and by Baedeker as certain (Pal. 3 268, 312). Dr. Wright quotes Dr. Meshaka to the effect that el-A'waj 'is not a river of Damascus at all. It is distant a ride of 3 hours from the city at the nearest point.' Against this we have the statement of Dimashki (c. 1300), 'another river (of Damascus) is called el-A'waj,' and the distance from Bawwabet Ullah to the nearest point is only 6 miles.

It is futile to seek for the Pharpar in the short stream from Ain Fijeh.

Beside el-Barada, with its copious and never-failing supplies, el-A'waj may seem hardly worthy of mention. But during the greater part of the year it carries down no mean volume of water; and there is no other stream near the city at all deserving the name of river. It should also be remembered that whatever ministered to the fruitfulness and beauty of any part of the famous plain would be an object of grateful pride to the Damascene soldier.

PHASELIS (Φάσηλις)*.—A city on the eastern extremity of the coast of Lycia near the Pamphylian frontier, standing apart, not only geographically, * Φασήλις wrongly in edd. of 1 Mac 15<sup>23</sup>, and in some classical authors; but Φάσηλις is right, and is now printed in Strabo, p. 666, Paus. iii. 3. 8 (where older edd. have oxytone), etc. Φασήλις was the name of a kind of vase or utensil in Alexandria.

but generally even politically, from the rest of the country. Pliny (Nat. Hist. v. 36) and Stephanus Byz. actually assign it to Pamphylia; but this is erroneous. It was said to be a Dorian colony; and it became a city of great importance at a very early time, being one of those which shared in the trade with Egypt under Amasis, B.C. 570-526. It struck a series of coins in the 6th and early 5th cent. with a variety of types, among which the most noteworthy are the prow and the stern of a war galley.

These coins, which were struck on the Persian standard, cease about B.C. 466, when the Athenian confederacy became powerful on these coasts; but Thucydides (ii. 69) mentions that Phaselis was a place of consequence in the Athenian trade with Phœnicia and the Levant coasts generally. Its coinage began again about B.C. 400, and during the 4th and 3rd cents. the same types were characteristic. During that period it was a more or less independent city; but while Lycia was under the power of the Ptolemies, B.C. 276-204, Phaselis was probably under the same influence; and at the end of that time a radiated head, which is conjecturally taken as representing Ptolemy IV., appears on the prow in the reverse type.

When Seleucid power ended in B.C. 190, Phaselis commenced to use the type of Pallas. About B.C. 168 it began to strike coins with the types of the Lycian confederacy (Κοινὸν Λυκίων), founded in that year (see LYCIA); and in the 1st cent. it also struck coins which are of a different style. There can therefore be no doubt that at least in the period later than B.C. 77 (when it was captured by Servilius Isauricus), it ceased to be a member of the Lycian confederacy; and Strabo mentions that it was not a member in his time (B.C. 64-A.D. 19). But Mr. G. F. Hill, in his Catalogue of Coins in the Brit. Museum, Lycia, p. lxxvii, thinks there is no reason to deny its membership during the period before B.C. 77. But the mention of Phaselis among the States to which the Roman consul sent letters in B.C. 139 in favour of the Jews (1 Mac 15<sup>23</sup>), proves that it was at that time a free city, distinct from the Lycian confederacy (which is also mentioned as a recipient of similar letters); and Mr. Hill admits that there is some reason to think that it was not a member of the confederacy about B.C. 100, for it must have been one of the greatest cities of Lycia, yet Artemidorus does not mention it when enumerating the six members of the first class at that period. Now, even its coins with confederacy types do not mention the name ΑΤΚΙΩΝ, as is the case with those of most cities; there are, however, occasional examples of the same omission on the coins of other Lycian cities, even during the early period of the confederacy. But, on the whole, it would appear that Phaselis either never belonged to the confederacy (but merely from alliance and common interest adopted the types), or ceased before 138 to belong to it; and the words of Cicero (Verr. ii. 4. 10, 21) suggest that it had originally been a Lycian city, but that it soon allied itself with the Cilician pirates (which led to its capture by Servilius) and separated from the Lycians.

Phaselis stood on a promontory with a very conspicuous mountain behind it. Livy (xxxvii. 23) describes this in vague and hardly accurate terms. He is evidently alluding to the vast ridge of Taurus, which rises from the coast all along the eastern part of Lycia, and is seen by sailors for a great distance out at sea; but he is hardly correct in saying that Phaselis is the first land descried by sailors on the voyage from Cilicia to Rhodes.

No coins of Phaselis are known with certainty under the Roman empire except in the time of Gordian III. (others are probably forged), which shows that it hardly maintained its ancient importance in the post-Christian period. It was a bishopric in the Byzantine time.

PHASIRON (Α Φασιρών, ♂ Φασειρών, ♀ Φαρισών).—Name of a Nabatean tribe (1 Mac 9<sup>26</sup>). Since most Nabatean names find easy etymologies in Arabic, it ought to be possible to explain this from that language; the roots, however, which this name recalls, seem rarely used for forming proper names, except, indeed, fazara, which gives Fazarah, a well-known tribal name. The form Pashirôn of the Peshitta version makes it no easier. The name may be corrupt. D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

PHASSURUS (Β Φάσσουρος, Α Φάσσουρος, AV Phassaron), 1 Es 5<sup>25</sup> = Pashhur.

PEREZITE occurs in AV and RV of 2 Es 12<sup>21</sup> and in AV of Jth 5<sup>19</sup> for the more usual PERIZZITE, which is the reading of RV in the latter passage.

PHICOL (פִּיכֹל, פִּיכֹל).—The captain of the host of Abimelech, who accompanied his master upon the occasion of the latter's entering into treaty with Abraham, Gn 21<sup>22, 32</sup> (E), or Isaac, 26<sup>26</sup> (J). See ABIMELECH, No. 1.

PHILADELPHIA (Φιλαδέλφεια, WH -ia).—A city in the E. part of Lydia, in the valley of the Cogamis* (an important tributary of the Hermus), on the extreme outermost slopes of Mount Tmolus. It is now a station on the railway, 28½ miles from Sardis, 64 from Magnesia, 105 from Smyrna (by the detour which the railway makes round Mount Sipylus). It is situated only 650 feet above the sea near the upper end of the low coast valley which runs up from the gulf of Smyrna; and around it on all sides, except the road to Sardis, rise the mountains which form the rim of the great central plateau, or extend out from it towards the sea like fingers. Thus the Cogamis valley is a sort of funnel (like the Lycus valley, with its cities, see LAODICEA) in the flank of the lofty main plateau of Asia Minor. A few miles farther up the course of the river was the old city of Kallatebos, mentioned by Herodotus on the march of Xerxes, whose rank and power were probably transferred to Philadelphia, when it was founded. The name Philadelphia shows that it commemorates Attalus II. Philadelphus (so named from his affectionate and loyal conduct to his elder brother and predecessor, Eumenes II.); and it must have been founded between B.C. 189 (when Eumenes came into possession of this country) and Attalus's death in 138.

The importance of the new city lay in its relation to the cities of the upper plateau. The direct waggon and carriage road from the cities of northern Phrygia to the Ægean ran past Philadelphia to Smyrna; and a considerable part of the fertile district called the Katakakaumene, or Burnt Land, also sent its abundant vintages, fine wines, and other produce by Philadelphia to the same port (though the western Katakakaumene would send direct by Sardis to Smyrna). Strabo seems perhaps to describe Philadelphia as part of the Katakakaumene, but this is hardly accurate geographically; and his expression, on p. 579, that it was on the side of that district, must be taken strictly as denoting the outer side. That district was a broken, irregular country forming part of the great plateau, but on a lower level, like a step leading up to it. The Katakakaumene lay north and north-east from Philadelphia. It derived its name from the extraordinarily fresh and impressive traces of volcanic action which appear in it: great streams of lava, and vast heaps of cinders, looking as if they had just cooled yesterday, surround the three 'funnels' (as Strabo calls them, Devitt, or Ink-pots,* as the Turks now call them), which are the craters of volcanoes that were active down to a comparatively recent time. These blackened and bare rocks and cinder heaps encroach in irregular outline on the rich, green, fertile glens and slopes of the luxuriant country, with its ten cities, from which it derived its other name, Decapolis. Strabo (xiii. p. 628) describes Philadelphia as being constantly subject to earthquakes, so that the walls and houses could hardly stand firm; but modern experience tends to show that there is considerable exaggeration in his picture. He also says that few people lived in the city, but that most lived in the open country, and were engaged in cultivating the very fertile land. This account would suggest a somewhat simple and rustic settlement; but that is hardly the impression that one gets from other facts. Philadelphia was evidently a place of importance in the imperial organization of the province of Asia. It took the name Neokaisareia for a time in the 1st cent., being so styled on coins of Tiberius, Caligula, and Claudius, and the name was evidently given to it under Tiberius, who aided it to recover from a great earthquake in A.D. 17. Under Vespasian it was honoured with the title Flavia. In the reign of Caracalla it received the honour of the Neokorate (see PERGAMUM).† Meetings of the Council of the province Asia, with the games called Ková 'Asias, were held in it, at least in later time.

Philadelphia was the seat of one of the seven Churches to which were sent special messages through the mouth of John, in the opening of the Apocalypse. In all probability each of the seven is to be understood as the centre and head of a district; and it would be quite a mistake to understand that there were only these seven Churches in the province. Laodicea is certainly to be taken as representative at least of the whole Lycus valley (where the Churches of Colossæ and Hierapolis had long existed), and probably also of southern Phrygia (see LAODICEA). Similarly Philadelphia stands as representative of a district; and there can be no doubt that its district consisted of the neighbouring regions of the plateau, including parts of eastern Lydia and western Phrygia. None of the valley west of it could be in its district, for the Hermus cities would fall either under Sardis or under Thyatira.

These facts, and its abundant coinage, reveal to us rather a rich and powerful city, connected by trade with a large district towards the east and north, for which it formed a centre, and thus well suited to be one of the central Churches of Christianized Asia. It is said that there has been 'set before it a door opened' (Rev 3<sup>o</sup>), and the 'open door' doubtless refers to its position on the threshold of the eastern country, and to the rapidity with which the new religion was spreading to the plateau through the cities connected with Philadelphia. On this sense of the 'open door' compare 2 Co 2<sup>12</sup>.

But it is hardly possible, in our almost complete ignorance of the inner history and circumstances of Philadelphia, to find an intimate connexion between them and the language of the address to the Church. It may, however, be noticed that in the seven letters to these Churches, it is chiefly the faults which are associated with the local circumstances, and which derive light therefrom. In so far as a Church attained Christian purity, its character rises to a higher plane; in so far as it degenerates from that high level, it becomes affected by its earthly surroundings. Now the two Churches which are addressed in terms of almost unmingled praise are Smyrna and Philadelphia; and in those two addresses we find least reference to local history and situation. Philadelphia had kept the word, and not denied the name of God. It is described in Rev 3<sup>o</sup> as having 'a little power'; and this is considered by some commentators to be explained and illustrated by Strabo's description of the actual city as being small. But the allusion to its 'little power' seems rather to point to the Church being a recent foundation, which had not yet acquired great strength in the city, though there is a brilliant opening before it. As a newly founded and small Church it was more likely to escape notice and persecution; and hence it is to be 'kept from the hour of trial,' 3<sup>o</sup>. It is stated in 3<sup>o</sup> that there was a synagogue in Philadelphia. The Jews of this synagogue had degenerated greatly from the strictness of Hebrew morality and religion, had complied with the pagan customs and ways of living, and had become 'the synagogue of Satan.' Yet this synagogue was to recognize the love that God had bestowed on this Church, and to bow down before it. This apparently implies that the Jews of Philadelphia were in process of rallying to the Christian side. The Church on the whole is rebuked for no faults or weakness; but is exhorted to continue strong and energetic, as it has hitherto been; and to 'hold fast what it has.'* Great rewards are promised to those who are steadfast and win the victory. The name of God, and the name of His city, the new Jerusalem, and the new name of the writer who addresses them, are to be written on all who overcome (on this see PERGAMUM).

Philadelphia was a bishopric under the metropolitan see of Sardis, in the Byzantine period, mentioned in all the lists immediately after Sardis. It grew steadily as the Ægean coast cities tended to dwindle, and the central regions of Asia Minor to grow more important in the Byzantine period. In the last centuries of the empire it rose to a lofty pitch of heroism. It was long the bulwark of the Christians against the encroachments of the Turkish power, whose centre was at Konia or Iconium. Frederick Barbarossa was permitted to enter the city alone by its inhabitants, though they fought for two days against his army, as he was marching across Asia Minor on the fourth crusade in 1190. Andronicus Palæologus (1283-1328) recognized its importance by raising it to the rank of a metropolitan archbishopric, and making it tenth in 'the order of dignity.'† This probably implies that it now became practically the Christian centre of Lydia (in place of Sardis), although the official lists (Notitiæ Episcopatum), with their usual conservatism (see PERGA), continue to mention it, as before, in the list of bishoprics subject to Sardis (sometimes with the added note, 'which was promoted to the rank of a metropolis,' as in Not. xiii.). In 1306 it stood a long siege by the Seljuk Turks; but, after suffering terribly from hunger, it was relieved by Roger de Flor with his Catalan troops. Again in 1324 it suffered a similar siege, and even greater extreme of hunger; but again was relieved by the Byzantine general, Alexius Philanthropenus. As the Turkish power * Wrongly called, by almost all travellers and guide-books, Devlit.

† See Buresch, Aus Lydien, p. 103 ff. Marquardt (Röm. Staatsverw. i. p. 341) is mistaken in saying that it was the seat of a conventus; but it was one of the places in the conventus Sardinus where the court of the conventus might be held by the proconsul.

spread westward, Philadelphia was entirely isolated, but still maintained its proud independence as a free Christian city in a Turkish land, until it was conquered by a combined army of Ottoman Turks and Byzantine imperial troops sent by the submissive emperor, in a year which is given variously between 1379 and 1390.* In 1403 it is said to have been captured by Tamerlane, who built a wall with corpses (the situation of which is still pointed out).

It is remarkable that the city whose noble Christian career is intimated in the message Rev 3<sup>9-14</sup> should have had the most glorious history of all the cities of Asia Minor in the long struggle against the Turks. Perhaps the only city that could vie with it was Smyrna (also highly praised in Rev); but the resistance of Smyrna was due in part to European aid, while Philadelphia maintained itself with native steadfastness and vigour. It is still to a large extent Christian. 'He that overcometh, I will make him a pillar in the sanctuary of my God, and he shall go out thence no more,' Rev 3<sup>12</sup>.

The modern name of Philadelphia is Ala-Sheher, the 'reddish city' (or rather parti-coloured, with a reddish-brown tinge), so called from the colour of the hillside that slopes away backwards and upwards behind the city. It was by a mere error, due to a smattering of Turkish, that older travellers reported its name as Allah-Sheher, the City of God, which has led to a good deal of mistaken moralizing.

PHILEMON (Φιλήμων).—The correspondent to whom St. Paul addressed the charming letter which bears his name (see the following article). The name occurs with considerable frequency in inscriptions, and is found twice in literature in connexion with Phrygia, viz. in the beautiful legend of Philemon and Baucis (Ovid, Metam. viii. 631), and in Aristoph. Aves, 762. St. Paul's correspondent was most probably a native of Colossæ (cf. Philem<sup>1</sup> with Col 4<sup>17</sup>); and in Theodore's time his house was pointed out in that city. Tradition speaks of him as bishop of Colossæ (Apost. Const. vii. 46), and the Menæa of Nov. 22 record his martyrdom there, by stoning, in company with Apphia, Archippus, and Onesimus, in the reign of Nero. In the case of such facts as these, local tradition may generally be regarded as trustworthy, and here it falls in with the documentary evidence, for the idea that Philemon was of Laodicea is a mere guess.

Philemon was a dear and intimate friend of St. Paul (vv. 1, 2<sup>2</sup>), and probably one of his converts (v. 19). Of the circumstances of his conversion to the Christian faith we have no record, but it may well have taken place during St. Paul's stay at Ephesus (Ac 19<sup>26</sup>; but cf. also Ac 16<sup>6</sup>). From the facts that he owned slaves (see ONESIMUS), and that he was noted for his hospitality and charity to his fellow-Christians (vv. 2, 5-7), it is plain that he was a rich man. St. Paul speaks of 'the church in his house' (v. 2), and does not scruple to bid him prepare a lodging for him against the time he should arrive in Colossæ (v. 2<sup>2</sup>). It only remains to be added that Philemon was so earnest in his work for the gospel, that St. Paul can call him a συνεργός (was this at Ephesus?), and that the tone of the apostle's appeal on behalf of Onesimus would lead us to conclude that he was a man of high and generous character, who might be expected to rise superior to the prejudices of heathendom as to the relations between master and slave. APPHIA may have been his wife, and ARCHIPPUS his son.

PHILEMON, EPISTLE TO.—

- i. External tradition.
- ii. Transmission of text.
- iii. Purport and analysis of the Epistle.
- iv. Its internal evidence and genuineness.
- v. Its place in St. Paul's life.
- vi. Its attitude to slavery.

i. The earliest certain quotations from this Epistle are found in Origen (cf. Hom. xix. in Jer. 2, Comm. Series in Matt. §§ 66, 72), who expressly ascribes it to St. Paul. That Marcion accepted it is explained by Tertullian (adv. Marc. v. 21) as due to its extreme brevity. The Muratorian Canon names among the Pauline Epp. 'ad filemonem unam.' Eusebius counts it among the ὁμολογούμενα (HE iii. 25). It must have been included, if we are to judge from the extant documentary evidence, in the earliest collection of Pauline letters. The play upon words (εὐχρηστος . . . ἀχρηστος) of v. 11 is found again in Theophilus (ad Autol. i. 1), and Ignatius (Eph. ii., Magn. ii.) uses ὀναιμην as it is used in Philem 20; but these last coincidences do not necessarily betray literary connexion, though they suggest it.

ii. The text of the Epistle is attested by the uncials  $\aleph$  A C D L P  $\zeta$  (this last unpublished) and F G (these omit v. 21-end); and by the Egyptian, Syriac, and Latin VSS (of the OL we have d e f g m). Of the cursives it is sufficient to mention 17, 47, 67<sup>2</sup>, 137 as specially valuable.

iii. This Epistle differs from all the other Pauline Epp. which have reached us, in that it is a strictly private letter written to an individual friend. It is possible, though not certain, that the words ἐγὼ Παῦλος ἔγραψα τῇ ἐμῇ χειρὶ (v. 19) apply to the whole letter, which would thus have been an autograph, and not written by an amanuensis, as was St. Paul's usual habit. The Pastoral Epp., although addressed to individuals, are semi-official in character, and deal with the affairs of the whole Christian society; the nearest parallel in the NT to Philemon is 3 Jn, addressed to 'Gaius the beloved.' This characteristic of Philemon provoked prejudice against it in early times, and Jerome, Chrysostom, and Theodore of Mopsuestia found it necessary to defend the Epistle against the charge of secular triviality, unworthy of St. Paul, and unbefitting, as was argued, a work to be included in the sacred Canon of the NT. But modern critics from Luther to Renan have shown a keener insight, and have found in the contents of the Epistle matter for admiration rather than for depreciation.

The body of the letter is an appeal made by St. Paul to PHILEMON, a citizen of Colossæ, on behalf of ONESIMUS, a runaway slave who had come under the apostle's influence and had embraced the Christian faith. Onesimus seems (v. 18) to have been a thief, and would in the ordinary course of things have been subjected to very severe punishment had he come again into the power of his former master Philemon. The apostle, with rare tact and delicacy, which only bring his strong sense of justice into fuller relief, asks pardon for the offender, not only as a personal favour to himself (vv. 9, 11, 14), but on the ground of the brotherhood in Christ of master and slave (v. 16). He does not ask directly that Onesimus shall be freed, although he indirectly suggests it (v. 21); 'the word emancipation seems to be trembling on his lips' (Lightfoot).

An analysis of the letter may be drawn up as follows:—Salutation (vv. 1-3); thanksgiving for Philemon's love and faith (vv. 4-7); request that he will receive Onesimus, the bearer of the letter, with kindness (vv. 8-17); adding the assurance that, so doing, he will gratify the writer, who hopes soon to visit Colossæ (vv. 18-22); salutations and final benediction (vv. 23-25).

The whole Epistle has frequently been compared to a beautiful letter written by the younger Pliny on a similar occasion (Plin. Ep. ix. 21), of which a translation is given by Lightfoot (Col. and Philem. p. 316).

iv. Considerable as is the external testimony (see i.) to the Pauline authorship of this Ep., the strongest argument for its genuineness is based on its internal evidence of truth, its witness to itself. 'Peu de pages,' says Renan, 'ont un accent de sincérité aussi prononcé. Paul seul a pu écrire ce petit chef d'œuvre.' The vocabulary of the Ep. has indeed been challenged in refutation of this general impression which it leaves upon the mind, and has been described, e.g. by Baur, as un-Pauline. As a matter of fact, the only words which do not occur again in St. Paul are ἀναπέμπευ, ἀποστίνειν, ἀχρηστός, ἐπιτάσσειν, ξενία, ὀνειράσθαι, and προσοφελειν; and of these all but the last occur elsewhere in the NT or in the LXX.* No serious argument can be based on such a meagre list; and, on the other hand, many phrases in the letter are unmistakably Pauline. Not to lay overmuch stress on the form of salutation (v. 3), and farewell (v. 26), and the opening thanksgiving (vv. 4<sup>a</sup>), which are in St. Paul's undoubted style, for these might be imitated by a falsarius, the diction all through is that with which we are familiar in the Pauline Epistles. We have the metaphor ὃν ἐγέννησα ἐν τοῖς δεσμοῖς which recalls 1 Co 4<sup>15</sup>; we have words like ἐπίγνωσις, παθήσια, παράκλησις; we have τάχα which only occurs again Ro 5<sup>7</sup>; and we have quite a number of coincidences with Eph, Col, Ph; e.g. cf. δέσμιος Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ (vv. 1 and 9) with Eph 3<sup>1</sup>, συνεργός and συστρατιώτης (vv. 1, 2) with Ph 2<sup>25</sup>, ἀνήκον (v. 8) with Eph 5<sup>4</sup> Col 3<sup>18</sup>, συναϊχμάλωτος (v. 23) with Col 4<sup>10</sup>, and ἀδελφός ἀγαπητός (v. 16) with Eph 6<sup>21</sup> Col 4<sup>7</sup>. On the whole, not only does the artless style of the letter powerfully support its claim to be genuine, but the phraseology is strikingly like that of the other Pauline Epp., and especially Eph, Col, Ph, the Epp. of the first Roman captivity.

v. An obvious link connecting the letter with Colossians is supplied by the proper names which occur in both Epistles. Both purport to come from 'Paul and Timothy'; while writing both Paul is in captivity; in both Archippus is greeted (v. 1, Col 4<sup>17</sup>); Aristarchus, Mark, Epaphras, Luke, Demas join in the salutations with which the letters conclude; Onesimus a 'beloved brother' is to be the bearer of both letters, accompanied as it would seem by Tychicus (v. 16, Col 4<sup>7</sup>). With this agrees the fact that no greeting to Philemon is found in Colossians, because to him a separate letter had been addressed. And as Ephesians and Colossians were intrusted to the same messenger, viz. Tychicus (Eph 6<sup>21</sup>, Col 4<sup>7</sup>), we are led to the conclusion that the three Epistles, Eph, Col, Philem, were written at the same time and under the same circumstances. (See EPHESIANS, EPISTLE TO).

A determination of the place of writing will help us to determine the time. As St. Paul was in captivity, the letter must have been written either from Cæsarea (Ac 24-26) or from Rome (Ac 28<sup>30</sup>). Tradition is all in favour of Rome, and the a priori arguments which have been alleged on the side of Cæsarea are untrustworthy.

Thus (a) it has been urged that Cæsarea being nearer to Colossæ than Rome, it would be more natural that Onesimus should fly there. But, on the contrary, a fugitive could more easily hide himself in the great metropolis. (b) If Eph, Col, Philem were carried by the same messenger from Rome, he would arrive first at Ephesus, and yet in Eph we find no commendation of Onesimus. This is explicable only, it has been supposed, on the hypothesis that Onesimus was no longer with Tychicus, having arrived at his destination (Colossæ) before the messengers reached Ephesus. But this would involve an approach from Cæsarea rather than Rome. It is a sufficient answer to this that arguments a silentio are very untrustworthy, and that no reason has been assigned why a slave like Onesimus should be singled out for mention in a letter to a Church where he was not known. (c) Philem<sup>22</sup> suggests that St. Paul intended to go direct to Colossæ, while Ph 2<sup>24</sup> speaks of his intention of going to Macedonia. This would suggest a starting-point south of Colossæ, so that that place might be visited en route to Macedonia.

But we do not know how far the apostle's plans were modified in the interval between the composition of Philemon and Philippians, nor is there any reason why he should not have proceeded from Rome to Colossæ via Philippi.

The positive arguments, independent of tradition, in favour of Rome are slight. E.g. from Eph 6<sup>19</sup> it appears that St. Paul had a certain amount of freedom while in captivity, which is hardly consistent with what we know of his imprisonment at Cæsarea and of the dangers to which he was there exposed (Ac 23<sup>21</sup>; but cf. 24<sup>23</sup>). But leaving that aside, there is at least nothing to forbid us to acquiesce in the traditional belief that it was in Rome that the apostle wrote the three letters Eph, Col, Philem, as it is evidently the place from which he wrote the kindred Epistle to the Philippians (Ph 1<sup>13</sup> 4<sup>22</sup>; cf. PHILIPPIANS, EPISTLE TO).

The question as to the priority of Philippians to the group Eph, Col, Philem, is difficult, and there is not a great deal of evidence available. Lightfoot, Sanday (see Smith's DB<sup>2</sup> i. 627), and Hort (Rom. and Eph. p. 102) support the view that Philippians was written earlier than Eph, Col, Philem; but the opposite opinion, that it is the latest of the Epp. of the first Roman captivity, has also many defenders, e.g. Zahn (Einleit. i. 386, 392), Gwynn (Speaker's Comm.), and Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 358), and on the whole it seems to the present writer the more probable.

The reasons for this opinion are the following: (α) It seems from a comparison of Eph with Ph that the conditions of the apostle's imprisonment are represented as more rigorous in the latter Ep. than in the former, which contemplates a state of things like that portrayed in Ac 28<sup>30-31</sup>. On the other hand, when Ph was written, he has been put on his trial, and forced to make his ἀπολογία (cf. Ph 1<sup>18f</sup>, 21<sup>7</sup>, 23). (β) Again, a comparison of Philem<sup>22</sup> (ἀλλ' ἴσα γὰρ εἶμι διὰ τὸν προσευχῶν ὑμῶν χαρισθῆσθαι ὑμῖν) with Ph 2<sup>24</sup> (ἀπείθεαι ἐν κυρίῳ οὗ καὶ καὶ ταχίως ἰλευσάμεθα) taken in connexion with the joyful tone of Ph, despite the trials which the writer has endured, points to the fact that he was much more confident of his release when Ph was written than at the period of writing Philem, and this would naturally arise from the fact that his trial, which had not come on before the group of letters Eph, Col, Philem was despatched, was in progress and was already so far advanced that he could predict the issue with some confidence. (γ) Too much has been made of the fact that Luke and Aristarchus who join in the salutation to the Colossians and to Philemon are not named in Ph, for they are not named in Eph either. Yet still it falls in with the hypothesis that they had departed before Ph was written; and indeed Ph 2<sup>20</sup> ('I have no man likeminded [sc. with Timothy] who will care truly for your state') seems to make it certain that when Ph was despatched the companions who are named in Col, Eph, Philem had departed from the side of the apostle. The only positive argument of any weight which has been urged on the other side is that the similarities between Ro and Ph are much closer than between Ro and Eph, Col, Philemon. Lightfoot, in particular, urges that Philippians resembles the earlier rather than the later group of Pauline letters, and that therefore it must be placed before Eph, Col, Philemon. Such an argument has little force, for on any hypothesis the interval which separates Eph, Col, Philem from Ph is too brief to account for any marked change in style, supposing such to exist. And, on the other side, the undoubted parallels between Ph and the Pastoral Epp. may be brought forward (cf. e.g. 1<sup>23</sup> and 2<sup>17</sup> with 2 Ti 4<sup>6</sup>, 4<sup>8</sup> with 1 Ti 3<sup>8</sup>, 1<sup>21</sup> with Tit 1<sup>11</sup>, 1<sup>12</sup>, 2<sup>25</sup> with 1 Ti 4<sup>15</sup>).

We thus are inclined to place Philemon before Philippians, and therefore it will fall not quite as late in St. Paul's first captivity as that Epistle. The determination of the year of writing will depend on the system of Pauline chronology which is adopted (see CHRONOLOGY, vol. i. p. 420). It is perhaps most probable that it was written in the year A.D. 61.

vi. The conditions of social life which form the background of the Ep. are deeply interesting to the student of history, and the letter derives a peculiar importance from the light which it throws on the attitude of the early preachers of the gospel to the institution of slavery. It is not condemned, nor (as has been said already, § iii.) does St. Paul even advocate directly the emancipation of Onesimus. Christianity did not attempt all at once to abolish an institution which was so deep rooted in Roman social life, however inconsistent it was with the religion of the Incarnation. Indeed the revelation of the brotherhood of men in Christ made it especially necessary to emphasize (as the apostles did) the fact that social differences were not thereby obliterated. Even if (which is doubtful) St. Paul was so much in advance of his age as to have grasped the idea that no man has a right to own another, to have proclaimed the iniquity of slavery to a world which was not prepared for it would have exposed society to the frightful dangers of a bellum servile, on the one hand, and would, on the other, have done more to arouse the hostility of the Roman imperial authorities than any other proclamation could have effected. Christians had to show at the very outset that Christianity was not inconsistent with good citizenship, and that the reforms which it hoped to promote in social life would not be imposed violently from without, but that they would be the outcome of the development of the national conscience, in which the seed of the gospel was to grow and fructify, secretly but surely, as the leaven spreads in the meal. And the event has justified the policy. Slowly and steadily, as Christianity spread, did the condition of the slave improve in imperial Rome; until at last the time came when it was possible for the Church, with a fuller recognition of the implications of the creed, and without danger to her own corporate life, to preach emancipation. And the letter to Philemon is the first indication in Christian literature that the problem of the relation of master to slave must be seriously affected by the new conception of the brotherhood of man, which Christ's apostles had set themselves to proclaim.

LITERATURE.—Lightfoot on Colossians and Philemon is the best; von Soden (Hand-Commentar) and Vincent (Internat. Crit. Comm.) are also valuable; and Abp. Alexander's comm. in the Speaker's Comm. is picturesque and full of matter.

PHILETUS (Φιλέτος) is mentioned along with Hymenæus in 2 Ti 2<sup>17</sup> as sharing in the same heresy regarding the resurrection. The nature of that heresy has been already explained in the article on Hymenæus (which see), and it is sufficient to state here that it consisted in doing away with anything in the nature of a bodily resurrection, and resolving all Scripture references to such a state into figure or metaphor. For full particulars regarding the men and their heresy, reference may be made to J. G. Walch, Miscell. Sacra, p. 81 ff.; and to F. R. Walch, Hist. der Ketzereien, i. 125 ff. See also Ellicott on The Pastoral Epp. in loc., and Burton, Bampton Lect., Note 59, p. 428.

The names of Philetus and Hymenæus occur separately among those of Cæsar's household whose relics have been found in the Columbaria at Rome.

PHILIP (Φίλιππος).—1. King of Macedonia, B.C. 359–336, and father of Alexander the Great (1 Mac 1<sup>6</sup>). 2. A Phrygian, who was left by Antiochus Epiphanes as governor of Jerusalem, after he had plundered the temple in B.C. 170 (2 Mac 5<sup>22</sup>). Philip is described as being 'in character more barbarous than him that set him there,' and he showed his cruelty by burning certain fugitive Jews, who had taken refuge in caves, and scrupled to defend themselves on the Sabbath (ib. 6<sup>11</sup>). He was the first to take measures against Judas Maccabæus (ib. 8<sup>8</sup>), and is often identified with—3. A 'friend' and foster-brother (σύντροφος) of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Mac 8<sup>24</sup>). This view is supported by Zöckler, but the grounds of the identification are somewhat precarious (cf. Rawlinson in Speaker's Comm.). Epiphanes on his deathbed gave his ring to Philip, and appointed him chancellor and guardian of his son, Antiochus v. (1 Mac 6<sup>14</sup>). Lysias, however, gained possession of the young king, and seized the supreme power. Philip, returning with the army from Persia, occupied Antioch, whereupon Lysias, who with Antiochus Eupator was prosecuting the war in Palestine, hastily made terms with Judas Maccabæus and returned to Syria (ib. 6<sup>55-63</sup>). Lysias took Antioch, and according to Josephus (Ant. XII. ix. 7) put Philip to death. The statement that, on the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, Philip took refuge in Egypt with Ptolemy Philometor (2 Mac 9<sup>25</sup>), cannot be reconciled with our other authorities; and 2 Mac alludes elsewhere (13<sup>23</sup>) to Philip's attempt to establish his authority as regent. 4. Philip v., king of Macedonia, B.C. 220–179. His overthrow in battle is mentioned as one of the great achievements of the Romans (1 Mac 8<sup>5</sup>). An able and energetic monarch, he extended his power in Greece and Epirus, and in B.C. 215 made an alliance with Hannibal. The war with Rome, however, was not carried on with much energy, and after some years a hollow peace was made. In the year 200 the Romans again declared war, but gained little advantage till the supreme command was entrusted to T. Quinctius Flaminius, by whom Philip was completely defeated at Cynoscephalæ in Thessaly (B.C. 197), and forced to accept humiliating terms. During the remaining years of his life he attempted to recover something of his former power, but his cruel and suspicious conduct alienated his subjects, while he was continually troubled by disputes between his two sons. He was at last induced to put his younger son Demetrius to death, and dying shortly afterwards was succeeded by Perseus (which see).

PHILIP (Φίλιππος, Philippus).—1. THE APOSTLE. One of the Twelve, belonging to Bethsaida of Galilee (Jn 12<sup>21</sup>), the fourth of those who attached themselves to Christ as followers, and the first whom our Lord directly called (1<sup>43</sup>). He had probably been, like his fellow-townsmen Andrew and Peter, a disciple of John the Baptist; for his call took place near 'Bethany beyond Jordan, where John was baptizing,' on the day after Christ's interview with Simon Peter, when Jesus purposed (ἐθέλωσεν) to leave the district for Galilee (12<sup>28, 43</sup>).

Himself 'masterfast,' Philip, either at Bethany or on his arrival, along with Jesus, at Cana, communicates his discovery of the Messiah foretold in the OT to his friend Nathanael, describing Jesus (in accordance with his defective information at the time) as the son of Joseph (1<sup>45</sup>). Unable to meet directly Nathanael's objection to an alleged Messiah sprung from Nazareth (see NATHANAEL), Philip wisely falls back on experimental evidence, invites Nathanael to 'come and see,' and is the means of his friend's coming, not only into the Master's presence, but under His saving power (1<sup>46</sup>). When the Twelve are chosen, Philip becomes one of the second quartette, at whose head, in each list, his name stands (Mt 10<sup>3</sup>, Mk 3<sup>18</sup>, Lk 6<sup>14</sup>). He appears thrice otherwise in the Gospel history; and all the references to him (except the bare statement that he was one of the Twelve) are made by his fellow-townsmen John, who, writing probably after all his fellow-apostles were dead, appears anxious, in the case of Philip and Andrew, to rescue from oblivion or obscurity, through a few significant reminiscences, some characteristics of those two friends of his youth.

Philip's prompt reply to our Lord's inquiry in Jn 6<sup>5f</sup> suggests that he had anticipated his Master's compassionate desire to feed the multitude in the wilderness, and had reckoned up (privately, but not unobserved by Jesus) the minimum sum required for the purpose,* without any thought, seemingly, of miraculous intervention. Philip's Greek name, given to him, perhaps, in honour of Philip the tetrarch (Lk 3<sup>1</sup>), led probably to the 'Greeks who came up to worship at the feast' selecting him as a medium of introduction to Christ; but it was an appropriate coincidence that those who wished to 'see Jesus' should have applied to one who had said to Nathanael, 'Come and see.' Philip's application to Andrew (who also bore a Greek name, and, like Philip, had brought another into Christ's presence), to take part, as principal (Jn 12<sup>22</sup> RV), in the desired introduction, arose probably not from any doubt as to our Lord's willingness (Jn 10<sup>19</sup>), but from modesty and a sense of the importance of the occasion. The request of Philip, on the occasion of Christ's address on the night before the Passion (14<sup>8</sup>), for some such revelation, presumably, of God the Father as Moses had enjoyed (Ex 33<sup>18ff.</sup>), indicates the union of earnest religious aspiration with somewhat dull spiritual apprehension. He was seeking after the shadow of a theophany, when the substance of the incarnation was already given to him; just as he had formerly concerned himself about the need of 200 pence, when the riches of Christ's miraculous power were available. Philip's motto appears to have been 'Seeing is Believing,' both in the signification of undue dependence upon testimony addressed to the senses, and in the worthier meaning of an appreciation of the value of experimental evidence. The main lesson to be learned from the incidents of Philip's history as related in the Gospel is this, that while a sincere believer needs to be thoroughly 'proved' (Jn 6<sup>6</sup>) and instructed before he is fit to 'go forth' as a leader and pastor of the Church; on the other hand, if the portion of truth already apprehended be faithfully held, he may, amid defective knowledge (Jn 1<sup>45</sup> 'son of Joseph') and imperfect spiritual insight, possess the genuinely missionary spirit, be instrumental in leading others to Christ, and advance the kingdom of heaven.†

Philip's life and work after the Ascension are obscured by the widely prevalent confusion in early times between this apostle and the evangelist Philip, who was one of the 'Seven.'‡ The confusion arose, doubtless, from the wider use, after Pentecost, of the word 'apostle,' as including others besides the Twelve (see APOSTLE). It seems best to accept as reliable the earliest distinct testimony regarding Philip's later career furnished by Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus in the latter part of the 2nd cent., who was likely to have been well-informed. Polycrates (quoted by Eusebius, iii. 31) states that Philip, 'one of the Twelve,' lived as * A denarius or 'penny' (about 9½d.) purchased 12 wheat or 36 barley 'loaves' (Mishna, Peah, viii. 7 and Rev 6<sup>9</sup>)—round cakes an inch thick and a span in diameter. 200 'pence' would thus procure a scant meal (Jer 37<sup>2</sup>, Lk 11<sup>9</sup>) for 5000 men and 2200 women and children.

† Clement of Alex. (Strom. iii. 4) records a tradition that Philip was the disciple referred to in Mt 8<sup>21</sup> as asking Christ for permission 'first to go and bury my father.' If so, the incident belongs to Philip's call, not to discipleship, but to apostleship, when permanent departure from home was involved.

‡ Thus Tertullian (de Bapt. 18) speaks of the Apostle Philip being 'snatched away from the eunuch'; the Philip of Ac 6 is referred to in the Apost. Const. vi. 7 as συναποστόλος; and in Calendars of the Coptic and Armenian Churches there is a commemoration of Philip as 'Deacon and Apostle' (Assem. Bibl. Or. iii. 645; cf. Wright, Apoc. Acts of Ap. ii. p. 69 ff., where the history is given of Philip, 'Apostle and Evangelist'). Even Eusebius shares in the confusion (HE iii. 31).

one of the 'great lights of Asia,' and is 'buried at Hierapolis along with his two aged virgin daughters'; and he adds that another daughter, who 'lived in (fellowship with) the Holy Spirit,' was buried at Ephesus.* The statement of Polycrates is supported by the apocryphal Journeyings of Philip the Apostle (3rd cent.), which represent Hierapolis as the chief scene of his labours, and associate him significantly with Bartholomew (who is described, however, as one of the Seventy); by Theodoret, the historian, who records in his Commentary on Ps 116 [Eng. 117] that 'the apostle Philip controverted the error of the Phrygians' (to whose country Hierapolis belonged); by pseudo-Dorotheus, who states in his Synopsis that Philip of Bethsaida preached in Phrygia, and is buried with his daughters in Hierapolis; and by pseudo-Epiphanius, who makes a similar declaration (Lipsius, Apokr. Apost. i. pp. 211-213, iii. 25, 26).† In substantial harmony, so far, with Polycrates is his contemporary Clement of Alexandria, who states (Strom. iii. 6) that the 'apostles Peter and Philip begat children,' and that the latter apostle 'gave his daughters in marriage' (which would account for the burial of one daughter in Ephesus and not in Hierapolis). The fact of Philip the Evangelist having had four virgin daughters who prophesied, does not invalidate the early testimony to Philip the Apostle having also had notable daughters, although it may have led to confusion on the part of later or less well-informed writers; and the apostle's settlement and labours in Asia Minor harmonize with the introduction of his name on three occasions into the Gospel written at Ephesus by St. John.‡

Regarding Philip's labours prior to his settlement in Hierapolis, the traditions are divergent. The Journeyings represent him as travelling through Lydia and Asia; in the apocryphal Acts of Philip, Upper Hellas, particularly Athens (where he is said to have abode for two years, and to have founded a Church, appointing presbyters and deacons), and afterwards Parthia, are the scenes of his ministry; while later Latin documents attribute to him the evangelization of the Gauls (Galatians?) and Scythians (Lipsius, iii. 26, 50, E. 19; Fabricius, Cod. Apoc. ii. 736). Similarly conflicting are the traditions regarding the manner of Philip's death. A natural decease appears to be indicated by Clement of Alex. (Strom. iv. 9), pseudo-Dorotheus, pseudo-Epiphanius, and the Latin Passio Philippii (according to the last-mentioned, at the age of * Eus. (HE iii. 30) refers to a still earlier testimony in the same direction by Papias, bishop of Hierapolis (first half of 2nd cent.), to the effect that the daughters of Philip the apostle had told him (Papias) about a man raised from the dead in their father's time. As Eus., however, does not quote the exact words of Papias, and as the historian himself confused the two Philips, this reference must be regarded as uncertain.

† In a recently discovered ancient Christian inscription at Hierapolis reference is made to a Church τῶν ἑνδύων ἀποστόλου καὶ διακόνου Φιλίππου (Ramsay, Cities and Bishops of Phrygia, p. 552). Although Philip the Evangelist is sometimes called ἀποστόλος in the wide sense (see above), so formal an ascription of apostleship is not likely to have been made except to one of the Twelve.

‡ The earliest and strongest testimony in favour of the Philip who settled in Hierapolis being the evangelist, is the statement in Eusebius (HE iii. 31), that in a dialogue held at Rome early in the 3rd cent. between Caius and Proclus a Montanist, the latter is represented as referring to 'four prophetesses, daughters of Philip, whose tomb, as well as that of their father, was at Hierapolis.' It is, of course, not absolutely impossible that both Philips were buried with their respective daughters in the same city; but, assuming the improbability of such a coincidence, it is a tenable supposition that either Eus. (through his own ideas being confused) misunderstood, so far, Proclus, or that Proclus himself, knowing about 'daughters of Philip' buried at Hierapolis, assumed mistakenly that these belonged to Philip the Evangelist. The tradition, moreover, which identifies the Philip of Hierapolis with the evangelist is neutralized by the counter-tradition, according to which the latter became bishop of Tralles (see next article).

87). Other ancient authorities ascribe martyrdom to the apostle. Pseudo-Hippol., the Journeyings, and the Ethiopian Acts represent him as crucified head downwards (according to the first document, under Domitian; according to the second, in the reign of Trajan); while several Latin martyrologies and an ancient Irish Passio relate that he was first stoned, then crucified (Lipsius, iii. 25, 26, 48, 50, E. 73; Atkinson, Passions and Homilies from Leabhar Breac, pp. 112, 358).

2. PHILIP THE EVANGELIST.—One of the Seven chosen by the primitive Church at Jerusalem, and ordained by the apostles (Ac 6) to take charge of the daily ministration of charity to the Christian widows and other poor (see DEACON). If not a Hellenist Jew, he was a Hebrew with conspicuously liberal sympathies. After the outbreak of persecution, inaugurated with the martyrdom of his colleague Stephen, Philip, hindered in the fulfilment of one office, straightway entered on the work of another. He was one of those who departed from Jerusalem for missionary ministry (8<sup>a, b</sup>). As Stephen was the forerunner of Paul in unfolding the relation of Christianity to Judaism and in repudiating the Jewish claim to a monopoly of Divine favour, so Philip was the precursor of the Apostle of the Gentiles in missionary zeal, and particularly in opening the door of the Church's fellowship to non-Jewish believers. (1) He selected as his first missionary field the (chief) city of Samaria (Ac 8<sup>b</sup> RV), i.e. either Sebaste (Samaria) or Neapolis (Sychem). The Samaritans, notwithstanding their partial Hebrew descent and partial acceptance of Judaism (including circumcision), were rigidly excluded from the Jewish Church, and were denied even the privilege, accorded to heathens, of becoming proselytes. To this people Philip, mindful doubtless of our Lord's own Samaritan ministry (Jn 4), proclaimed the Gospel and administered baptism. The inhabitants of the city had long been under the influence of SIMON MAGUS (which see), whom his sorceries had induced them to regard as 'the Power of God which is called Great' (Ac 8<sup>10</sup>). Philip's preaching, supported by miracles of healing and of dispossession, was successful in transferring Samaritan allegiance from Simon to Christ. The population as a whole were baptized; and Simon himself (although with divided heart, as the issue proved) believed and received baptism. Philip's success in Samaria led to the despatch thither of Peter and John, who completed the work which the evangelist had begun. The first stage was thus reached in the development of the Christian Brotherhood out of a Jewish sect into the Catholic Church. (2) A further service in the same direction was rendered by Philip through his baptism of the Ethiopian eunuch, whom he met, by Divine suggestion and providential arrangement, on the road between Jerusalem and Gaza (Ac 8<sup>26ff.</sup>). * This eunuch, who held the high office of treasurer to CANDACE (which see), queen of the Ethiopians, had apparently become, in his native land, a 'proselyte of the gate' † to Judaism, and was

* According to Jerome (Epist. 103) and a Roman martyrology (quoted by Lipsius, iii. 3), the baptism took place at Bethsoron, near Hebron.

† The word εὐνοῦχος is sometimes applied to a high court-official, without implying castration (Gn 39<sup>1</sup> LXX); but this treasurer, owing to his employment in a confidential capacity under a queen, would most probably be a eunuch literally (see ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH). Such a condition would prevent him from becoming a 'proselyte of righteousness,' but was not incompatible with his admission to worship in the temple as a 'proselyte of the gate' (Is 56<sup>4, 5</sup>). The supposition that he was a Jew, born in Ethiopia, is hardly consistent with the natural interpretation of the passage. The one argument in its favour, returning home, after worship in the temple, on the occasion, presumably, of one of the great annual festivals. Philip's conduct in relation to the eunuch notably exemplifies trustful obedience to Divine leadings (Ac 8<sup>27</sup>), alertness in availing himself of missionary opportunity (8<sup>30</sup>), and broad-minded disregard of national and religious prejudice (8<sup>38</sup>). The Ethiopian, as a descendant of Ham, belonged to a despised race (Nu 12<sup>1</sup>, Am 9<sup>7</sup>), and, if literally a eunuch, was inadmissible into the full membership of the Jewish Church (Dt 23<sup>4</sup>). Philip by the reception of this man into the Christian Church, virtually declared that disabilities of race and outward condition have no place there, but that all who believe in Christ are eligible for membership and baptism.* It was probably Philip's signal service to the cause of Church extension on these two occasions which led, at least in part, to the designation of him as the evangelist (Ac 21<sup>8</sup>).

After the baptism of the Ethiopian, Philip evangelized the country between Azotus (Ashdod) and Cæsarea, which, according to tradition, was his birthplace (see documents quoted by Lipsius, Apokr. Apost. iii. 2, 40), and where eventually he took up his abode (Ac 21<sup>8</sup>). There, along with four virgin daughters who were prophetesses, † he was found residing, more than 20 years later, by St. Paul and his friends, who remained for some days as guests in his house, on their way to Jerusalem. During the apostle's protracted imprisonment at Cæsarea we may assume there would be much intercourse (Ac 24<sup>23</sup>) between Philip and one with whose missionary zeal and broad ecclesiastical views the evangelist would be in full sympathy. Among those who were in Cæsarea along with St. Paul (at least during part of the time) was St. Luke (Ac 27<sup>2</sup>); and the details of Philip's early evangelistic ministry, recorded in Ac, were doubtless, at this time, communicated to Luke by Philip himself. The historical credibility, therefore, of the narrative in Ac 8 can be questioned only by those who dogmatically reject all records of what is supernatural (Ac 8<sup>7, 26, 39</sup>). ‡

In 65 A.D. the revolt which developed into the great Jewish war broke out at Cæsarea; and Philip, like other Jewish Christians, would probably leave Palestine before the fatal issue. We are prepared, accordingly, for traditions which indicate his ultimate settlement elsewhere. These traditions are divergent. (1) The earlier connects the evangelist and his daughters with Hierapolis (see note † on p. 835<sup>b</sup>), but is rendered doubtful by the manifest confusion which existed as to the two Philips. It appears to the present writer much less worthy of acceptance than (2) the tradition which represents Philip, with his daughters, as settling at Tralles § in Asia Minor, as performing viz. that no such objection seems to have been raised to Philip's procedure as was made in the case of Peter and Cornelius (Stokes, Acts of the Apostles, i. p. 412), is met by the fact that the baptism of Cornelius and his household was notorious, having been, in a manner, publicly administered (Ac 10<sup>24, 33</sup>); whereas the Ethiopian was baptized without witnesses, and the circumstances would probably, at the time, become known only to a limited and sympathetic circle.

* According to an old Ethiopic tradition, the eunuch is represented as having evangelized the subjects of Candace or Hendake (Ludolf, Hist. Ethiop. iii. 1, 2; Niceph. Callist. Hist. Eccl. ii. 6).

† Jerome (Epist. 108) states that the chambers of the four daughters were still shown at Cæsarea in his day. An ancient Greek menologium (quoted by Lipsius, iii. 3) records their names as Hermione, Charitine, Irais, and Eutychiene. Hermione is stated by the same authority to have practised medicine, and to have been thrown, without injury, into a caldron of boiling water in the reign of Hadrian.

‡ It is open for us, however, although not necessary, to regard the interventions referred to in 8<sup>28, 39</sup> as made through natural means; in the former case through a dream, in the latter through a divinely produced impulse of Philip's own mind (Stokes and Holtzmann, in locis).

§ This city is usually understood to be the more celebrated Tralles in Caria; but, if we suppose it to be the other Tralles there many miracles, and as becoming ἐπίσκοπος or ἐπίτροπος of the Church which he was mainly instrumental in building up in that city (pseudo-Dorothei. Synopsis; Martyr. Basilii; Joseph. Hymnographus; and other authorities quoted in Acta Sanctorum, xxi. p. 608 ff., and by Lips. iii. 2, 3). In favour of the latter tradition is the fact of its being associated, not like the former, with both Philips, but with the evangelist alone. According to most forms of the tradition, he died a natural death at Tralles; but one authority (a Greek menologium, quoted by Lips. l.c.) represents him as suffering martyrdom there.

PHILIP (HEROD).—See HEROD in vol. ii. pp. 358<sup>b</sup> and 359<sup>a</sup>.

PHILIPPI (Φιλιπποι).—Philippi, in Turkish Felidjik or Little Philippi, to distinguish it from Philippopolis in Bulgaria, was founded (or rather re-founded, for an earlier town had existed on the site) by Philip of Macedon in the middle of the 4th cent. and called after his name. It was situated in eastern Macedonia—so near Thrace that it is sometimes spoken of as Thracian—on a steep hill rising at the edge of a great plain which stretches far inland to the north and north-west. In the opposite direction stood its port of Neapolis (the modern Kavala), 8 or 9 miles distant, at the nearest point of the coast: the road connecting the two, part of the great Egnatian road which ran across from the Ægean to the Adriatic, passed through a depression in a line of hills which stretch east and south-east of Philippi and cut it off from the sea. An immense marsh lay directly south of the town, fed by the springs which gave it its older name of Crenides. At the present time two streams pass one on each side of Philippi, but at some short distance from it,—the larger rising on the east and flowing to the south of the town,—and fall into this lake or marsh, which in turn is itself a source, though not the main one, of the river Dramenica, a tributary of the Strymon. If ancient authorities, however, are to be trusted, this river, known as Angitas or Gangites or Gangas, derived its name from the Philippi branch. Where the country is so marshy, the configuration of the streams may have altered since St. Paul's day.

Philippi, with the rest of the dominions of Perseus, king of Macedonia, fell under Roman domination by the victory of the consul Æmilius Paullus in 168 B.C., whose reorganization of the conquered territory, while it preserved municipal freedom and self-government and diminished taxes, aimed at destroying the political unity of Macedonia by a division into four regions; a division so strictly carried out that an inhabitant of one region could neither intermarry with nor hold property in another. Of these regions the first, which had Amphipolis for its capital, included the whole district east of the Strymon, and therewith Philippi. It is, however, doubtful to what extent this system of tetrarchies survived the formal establishment of Macedonia as a province (A.D. 146).

The event which differentiated the fate of Philippi from that of Macedonia at large was of much later date. In the autumn of B.C. 42 the party which had brought about Caesar's death in the hope of restoring the republic was finally extinguished in the defeat of Brutus and Cassius by in Lydia, which was also the seat of a bishopric (Hierocles, Notitia Episc. p. 168), and was distant from Hierapolis only fifteen miles, the proximity of the two cities would account the more easily for Philip the Evangelist, as well as Philip the Apostle, being associated with Hierapolis.

Antony and Octavian (afterwards Augustus) outside the walls of Philippi. The colony of Philippi, *Colonia Augusta Julia [Victrix]* Philippensium*, was founded, as the name Julia implies, in honour of the victory of the cause of Julius Cæsar (cf. Strabo, vii. fr. 41, κατοικία μικρά, ἠδὲ ἦθη δὲ μετὰ τὴν περὶ Βρούτων καὶ Κάσσιον ἡτταν): and the first citizens, if we may judge from the phrase cohors præf. Phil. upon the coins, were soldiers of the bodyguard of Antony and Octavian. A second foundation by Augustus after the battle of Actium eleven years later, when many of the dispossessed partisans of Antony in Italy were transplanted to Dyrrhachium and Philippi (Dio, li. 4, §6), is commemorated by the other title Augusta. The territory of the colony included Neapolis.

Each Roman colony was a fresh representation of the Roman people in miniature. The magistrates, elected by the citizens, or rather by the senate of the colony, fulfilled on a small scale the functions of their prototypes in Rome, and like them were attended by lictors bearing fascēs or bundles of rods: their authority, within their district and over its inhabitants, excluded even that of the governor of the province. And Philippi, besides the normal privileges of all colonies, possessed as well the ius Italicum, or exemption for its territory from the rent ordinarily reserved for the Roman state over conquered countries.

About a hundred Latin inscriptions survive from Philippi: the most interesting, CIL III. i. 633, records the names of a collegium or burial guild recruited from the lower classes (including out of a total of 69, 4 slaves of the colonia and 3 of private persons), and entitled cultores or sodales Silvani. The guild had its sacerdos, its junior [sacerdos], and its aedilis, and had erected a temple (the gifts for which are recorded) to its tutelary deity.

Christianity first made its way to Philippi, as far as we know, in the person of St. Paul. Somewhere about A.D. 50, perhaps most probably in the spring of that year (see CHRONOLOGY OF NEW TESTAMENT, vol. i. p. 422), the apostle in the course of his second missionary journey crossed for the first time from Asia, and having set foot on European ground at the seaport of Neapolis, pushed on without delay to the mother city of Philippi, where sufficient stay was made to preach and found a Church. His companions were, from Antioch Silas (Ac 15<sup>40</sup>), from Lystra Timothy (16<sup>1</sup>), from Troas Luke (16<sup>10</sup>), where the first person plural commences in the narrative).

St. Luke describes Philippi as πρώτη τῆς μερίδος Μακεδονίας πάλαι κολωνία, a phrase which, as it stands, must mean either 'the first city in rank,' or 'the first city they came to,' in (that) district of Macedonia. The objections to either interpretation are serious. (1) Philippi was not the first city in rank, for Thessalonica was the capital of Macedonia as a whole, while in S.E. Macedonia, Amphipolis, distant only 30 miles from Philippi, was not only the capital of the region in the original Roman tetrarchy (see above), but was still in St. Luke's day much more than its equal in importance: Amphipolis had a separate issue of coins for the reign of each of the emperors from Augustus to Nero, while for the same period Philippi was apparently content with two, one under Augustus and one under Claudius. (2) Nor is the translation 'first city to come to' any more satisfactory. As a matter of fact the apostle first set foot in Neapolis; and in so far as Neapolis was Thracian (so Bp. Lightfoot, Philippians 4, p. 50, n. 1), Philippi must have been the same, since Neapolis was in the territory of Philippi (CIL III. i. p. 120). And if the geography of this interpretation is doubtful, its grammar is impossible: πρώτη is never used in this sense without qualifying words (Field, Notes on the Translation of the New Test. ad loc., quoting πρώτη μετὰ τὴν Γαλατίαν, πρώτη . . . πρὸς μακεδονίαν, πρώτη . . . ἵσταν ἐπ' Ἀχαΐας). Moreover, in either translation the τῆς before μερίδος is intolerably awkward, and so the older scribes felt: B drops the article, and the Bezan reviser (D) substitutes for πρώτη τῆς μερίδος the single word μερίδος.

* Ramsay, Journal of Theological Studies, Oct. 1899, p. 116, follows Head, Historia Numorum, p. 192, in adding Victrix: but Mommsen, CIL III. i. 600, denies the title; and it does not seem to be sufficiently proved from the coins.

Hort (New Testament in Greek, Appendix, ad loc.) attempted to escape these difficulties by reading Πιρίδος for μαρίδος, 'a chief city of Pierian Macedonia.' But if we are to emend, it is better to read πρώτης for πρώτη της, 'a city of the first region of Macedonia and a colony.' This simple emendation—it may have arisen either by the accidental reduplication of the letters π, or from a misunderstanding of the correction if by mistake πρώτη was written originally, and -της written over it to correct it—occurred first to Joannes Clericus (according to Blass, Philology of the Gospels, p. 68, but we have not been able to verify the statement) and to the unnamed friend of an English divine, James Peirce (see Peirce's Paraphrase and Notes on the Epistle of St. Paul to the Philippians, ed. 1, A.D. 1725, ed. 2, A.D. 1733, p. 3, and L. M. Artemonius, Initium Evangelii S. Johannis, A.D. 1726, pt. 1, p. 211); and in our own day has occurred independently to Field, op. cit. p. 124, Blass, loc. cit. and Acta Apostolorum, ad loc., and to the present writer. The only possible objections appear to be (i.) that μαρίδος does not mean a district or region (Hort, loc. cit.); and (ii.) that though Philippi had belonged to the 'first region,' the whole division into tetrarchies had fallen out of memory long before. But as to (i.) μαρίδος is in fact found as a term for subdivisions of the Egyptian 'nomes' (Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 168, note); as to (ii.) there is nothing in our present knowledge to justify so sweeping an assertion (Ramsay, ib.).

St. Paul was always accustomed to commence his mission within the sphere of the religious organization of Judaism. But Philippi—unlike the Cypriot towns, Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, Thessalonica, Beroëa, Athens, Corinth, Ephesus (Ac 13<sup>5</sup>. 14 14<sup>1</sup> 17<sup>1</sup>. 10. 17 18<sup>4</sup> 19<sup>8</sup>)—possessed apparently no synagogue, so small was the number and importance of the Jews there, and on the Sabbath St. Paul found the few Jewish worshippers at prayers beyond the gates of the city by the riverside. If we ask ourselves why under such circumstances St. Paul stopped at Philippi, the most probable answer is that what attracted him was exactly the feature which accounted for the paucity of Jews, namely, that it was not an ordinary Greek town but a Roman colony: Rome and things Roman were uppermost in the mind of St. Paul.

The reading of the Textus Receptus is ὅ ἐνομιζέτο προσυχὴ εἶναι, 'where there was accustomed to be prayer'; and Blass's conjecture, ad loc., ἐνομιζέτο ἐν προσυχῇ εἶναι, gives a similar sense. The Western authorities, however (ἵδου προσυχὴ εἶναι, D; oratio esse uidebatur, latt.), as well as Westcott and Hort (ἐνομιζέτο ἐν προσυχῇ εἶναι, but no single uncial gives exactly this reading), say nothing about the habitual character of the worship there; and it would be possible, if St. Paul's visit could coincide with one of the great Jewish fasts (those of the 4th, 5th, 7th, and 10th months, Zec 8<sup>19</sup>), to suppose that the riverside worship was due only to the solemnities of the day. Compare Tertullian, de ieiunio 16, 'Iudaicum certe ieiunium ubique celebratur, cuius omnis tempus per omne lictus quocumque in aperto aliquando iam precem ad caelum mittunt'; by which we ought perhaps to interpret the more general words of the Decree of the Heliocarnassians (Josephus, Antiquities, xiv. x. 23), τὰ σάββατα ἄρην καὶ τὰ ἱερά συντελεῖν . . . καὶ τὰς προσυχὰς ποιῆσαι πρὸς τῆ θαλάσσης κατὰ τὸ πάριον ἕδος. Where no seashore was available, any open place, quocumque in aperto, appears to have answered the purpose. It will be noted that both authorities specially mention 'prayer' or 'prayers' as the distinguishing mark of this open-air service, just as St. Luke does for Philippi.* On the whole it is more probable that we are to understand that the open space by the river was the normal scene of what Jewish worship there was at Philippi.

That St. Paul 'sat' and so spoke 'to the women who had gathered' there, appears to imply both a contrast to the more formal procedure of a synagogue (St. Paul stands to preach at Pisidian Antioch, Ac 13<sup>16</sup>, yet see Lk 4<sup>20</sup>. 21), and also the non-existence of many worshippers beyond the (Gentile) women who here as elsewhere, especially in Macedonia (Ac 13<sup>50</sup> 17<sup>4</sup>. 12), were attracted to Judaism. From this class, at any rate, was drawn the first convert, Lydia the purple seller of Thyatira, who was followed by the whole familia of which she was the mistress; her house became the home of the apostle and the centre of the Philippian Church (see LYDIA, and cf. Ramsay, St. Paul the Roman Traveller, p. 214).

Among the women influenced by St. Paul, either as an attendant at the preaching by the riverside, or simply from the general spread of interest in the strangers and in the novel faith they were propagating in Philippi, was a slave girl, who performed in a small way the functions of an oracle, and gave answers like one under inspiration to whatever questions might be asked of her, her owners, of course, reaping the benefit of the fees paid for the privilege of inquiry.

* There appears to be little or no evidence for any technical use of προσυχὴ in the sense of an informal 'place of prayer' as opposed to 'synagogue.' See art. SYNAGOGUE.

As the pagan prophetess (like the prophetesses of the Montanists) was conceived of as the passive instrument of the spirit which inspired her, she would speak with its voice, not with her own, and so might be called (as Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 215) ventriloqua or εγγαστριμβος (thus the Witch of Endor in the Fathers is called both πύθιασσα and εγγαστριμβος). For several points in the story, compare the description of a false prophet in the Shepherd of Hermas, Mand. xi. § 12, μισθὸς λαμβάνει τῆς προφητείας αὐτοῦ, ἴαν δὲ μὴ λάβῃ οὐ προφητεῖαι: § 2, ὡς ἐπὶ μάντιν ἔρχονται καὶ ἰερωντῶσιν αὐτὸν τί ἄρα ἔσται αὐτοῖς: § 6, ἄλας οὐ λαλεῖ ἴαν μὴ ἰερωντῆθῃ: § 13, κατὰ γωνίαν αὐτοῖς προφητεῖαι.

Daily as St. Paul passed to 'the (place of) prayer,' the girl, perhaps from some fixed station at a street corner, annoyed him by following and crying out that he and his companions were, like herself, 'slaves of (the) God,' divinely inspired to preach to the Philippians a 'way of salvation,'—a form of recommendation not at all after the mind of St. Paul,—till at last one day he turned and made use of those powers of exorcism which the early Christians never for a moment doubted that they could wield, 'in the name of Jesus Christ,' over the spirits that 'possessed' such pagan devotees. The girl, whose belief in him was no doubt very real, lost from that day forward her supposed gift; and her owners (the injury to their gains making them keenly susceptible to the injury to their religion) seized Paul and his chief companion, Silas, dragged them to the forum,—the great open space in a Roman city on to which the law-courts would look,—and brought them before the magistrates on the double charge of violating public order (ἐκταράσσουσι τὴν πόλιν) and of preaching rites which for Romans at least, whatever might be the case with others, it would be illegal to accept or carry out (καταγγέλλουσιν ἔθνη ἃ οὐκ ἔξιστιν ἡμῖν παραδέχεσθαι οὐδὲ ποιεῖν Ῥωμαῖοι οἶσιν).

The magistrates are called ἄρχοντες in Ac 16<sup>19</sup>, στρατηγῶν in 16<sup>20</sup>. 22. 23. 36. 38; and Prof. Ramsay (St. Paul, p. 217, Journal of Theological Studies, Oct. 1899, p. 115) sees in St. Luke's employment of the two terms in 16<sup>19</sup>. 20 a proof that the book never received its finishing touches. ἄρχοντες was the normal Greek word for a supreme board of magistrates. στρατηγῶν was, in later times at least, used interchangeably with ἄρχων; but it was also the technical rendering of the Latin praetor (so ἀντιστρατηγός = propraetor); and in some colonies the highest grade of magistrates were actually called after the Roman model praetores, so that it has been questioned whether this may not have been the case at Philippi. But it would seem that this usage was confined to the period B.C. and to the oldest group of Roman colonies outside Italy, those in Gallia Narbonensis. It must be taken, then, as fairly certain that the official title of the superior magistrates was not praetor but as in other colonies duumvir. [The inscription CIL iii. Suppl. No. 7389, which speaks of one who was Quaestor in Bithynia-Pontus, Cerial Ædile, Prætor-designate, Decurion or Senator, at Philippi and in Thrace, refers to the Roman Prætorship. Duumvir, Duoviri, can be represented literally in Greek by δυωνδικαίς, δύο ἄνδρες; but it is beyond question that a writer like St. Luke would avoid, if possible, such awkward literalism. He could only fall back on the rough equivalent στρατηγῶν; and his use of this Greek phrase in no way proves either that the magistrates at Philippi were praetores, or even that they were called so by courtesy.

The trial was never carried to an end (ἀκατακρίτους, Ac 16<sup>37</sup>); popular feeling had been roused, and the magistrates, in the exercise of their general power to detain and punish suspicious characters (Mommsen, Römisches Strafrecht, 1899, p. 309, n. 1), summarily ordered their hectors to scourge the prisoners. A Roman citizen was by law exempt from a form of punishment which was looked upon as degrading (ὑβρισθέντες ἐν Φιλίπποις, 1 Th 2<sup>2</sup>); and since on one other occasion at least St. Paul claimed his rights (Ac 22<sup>25</sup>), it is possible that at Philippi too he made a protest which passed unheard or unheeded; but as he suffered scourging altogether not less than three times (τρὶς ἐραβδίσθη, 2 Co 11<sup>25</sup>), it is also possible that for the moment he was silent of set purpose about his citizenship. [If it could be supposed, in face of 16<sup>37, 38</sup>, that Silas was not a citizen, the motive of his silence would be obvious]. The prisoners were then remanded with special instructions as to their safe custody; and the gaoler, no doubt rightly interpreting this as a warning against too lenient a treatment, threw them into the inner prison and made their feet fast in the stocks.

The ισωτέρα φυλακή was surrounded entirely by the outer prison, and appears to have had no light and no air except through the door: for illustrations of the inner prison and stocks, cf. (1) Epistle of the Churches of Lyons and Vienne (A.D. 177; Eusebius, HE v. 1), τὰς κατὰ τὴν εἰρητὴν ἐν τῷ σκοτεινῷ καὶ τῷ χαλεπώτατῳ χωρίῳ συγγελλίσαι καὶ τὰς ἐν τῷ ἔילῳ διατάσεις τῶν ποδῶν ἐπὶ πικρῶν διατινυμένων τρήσμα; (2) Acts of Perpetua (A.D. 202) § 3, post paucos dies recipimur in carcerem et expaui quia nunquam experta eram tales tenebras, id. paucis horis emissi in meliorem locum carceris; § 8, die quo in neruo mansimus; (3) Acts of Pionius (A.D. 250) § 11, ὡς διαμφορικῶς . . . ἔβαλον αὐτοὺς ἐς τὰ ἰσώτερα, but afterwards they were allowed out εἰς τὸ ἱερῶν; (4) Eus. HE vi. 39, cf. Origen (c. A.D. 250), τὰς τε ὑπὸ σιδῆρά κλοιῶ καὶ μυλοῖς εἰρητῆς τιμωρίας καὶ ὡς . . . τοὺς ποδῶν ἐπὶ τρήσμα τῶν χαλεπῶν ἔϊλον παρατεταῖς διατρήματα καταπλάσιμος κ.τ.λ.; (5) Cyprian, Ep. xxxvii. 3, squalorem carceris ac receptaculi poenalis horrorem; xxxix. 2, per decem nouem dies custodia carceris saeptus in neruo ac ferro fuit. Cf. Mommsen, Römisches Strafrecht, p. 302.

At midnight Paul and Silas were singing at their prayers (προσευχόμενοι ἕμνον: Jewish liturgy is too obscure a subject for us to say whether it formally included prayers for midnight, but Ps 119<sup>62, 164</sup> should not be overlooked; in any case, the 'hymns' may probably have been from the Psalter), when an earthquake shook the prison so violently that the bars of all the doors and the fetters of the prisoners gave way. The gaoler, supposing naturally that his prisoners had taken the opportunity to escape, and knowing that he would be held responsible for them, would have committed suicide if St. Paul had not been able to reassure him, and so turn him from his purpose. From that moment, if not before, it is clear that he attributed the convulsion of nature to the prayers and powers of his two prisoners; and he at once professed himself their convert. From the inner prison he removed them to his own house,—a violation of the spirit rather than of the letter of the magistrates' injunctions,—ministered to their temporal wants, and received from them spiritual instruction and baptism. As in Lydia's case, the whole household came over to Christianity with its head.

As soon as day broke, the duoviri, doubtless thinking to avoid all further complications by seeing that the objects of the riot left Philippi before the excitement should burst out afresh, sent their lictors to the prison with an order terminating all further proceedings, which, as Roman prisons were used only as places of detention before or during trial, was equivalent to a direct order of release. St. Paul refused to leave in this undignified fashion; he advertised the fact that he and Silas were citizens; and he demanded a personal acknowledgment of their error by the magistrates. This was willingly accorded as the price of the departure of the unwelcome strangers, whose citizenship not only rendered illegal the previous proceedings, but would complicate any future proceedings that the owners or the populace might choose to press against them. St. Paul, though he would not forego a formal farewell to his hostess and his converts, did not further contest the demand that he should leave Philippi, where, indeed, his presence might for the moment hinder rather than further the work of the gospel. But the foundations of a flourishing Church had been laid; and Luke, the writer of the Acts, was (to judge from the dropping of the first person plural between 16<sup>17</sup> and 20<sup>5</sup>) left in charge of it.

Five years later (perhaps in A.D. 55) St Paul, on his way to Corinth in the course of the third missionary journey, passed again through Macedonia and exhorted at length the Christians of 'those parts' (παρακαλέσας αὐτοὺς λόγῳ πολλῷ, Ac 20<sup>2</sup>). We may be certain that a visit to Philippi was included, for the time occupied in travelling from Ephesus to Corinth was apparently as much as six months (cf. 1 Co 16<sup>8</sup> with Ac 20<sup>2, 5</sup>). On his return from Corinth in the early spring he paid another and unintended visit (Ac 20<sup>3</sup>), the last of which we have a definite record; and though it delayed the journey to Jerusalem, which he was so anxious to accomplish by Pentecost (Ac 20<sup>16</sup>), he spent with the Philippian Church the last pascha which he was to enjoy in freedom for many years, while his (mostly Gentile?) companions went on and awaited him at Troas. At Philippi the 'we-passages' commence again (20<sup>5</sup>): St. Luke appears to have joined St. Paul again at this point, and probably stayed by him during the rest of the period of the Act.

The bonds of peculiar affection which united St. Paul to his Philippian converts are impressed on every line of the letter (see PHILIPPIANS, EPISTLE TO THE) which he wrote to them from Rome, probably at the beginning of his first captivity there (c. A.D. 59-60).

That St. Paul again visited Philippi during the eastern travels implied in the Pastoral Epistles, is not recorded, but may almost be assumed. The apostle journeyed to Macedonia from Ephesus (1 Ti 1<sup>3</sup>), and the journey would naturally be made viâ Troas and Philippi. And if the recorded visit to Troas (2 Ti 4<sup>13</sup>) belongs, as is probable, to a different and later occasion, the indications of the Pastoral Epistles suggest two visits to Philippi rather than one.

At the beginning of the 2nd cent. the Church of Philippi emerges once more for a moment into the light of history, when it received a visit from one apostolic father and a letter from another. Some time in the reign of Trajan (i.e. before A.D. 117), Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, was condemned to death as a Christian, and sent in charge of a guard of soldiers to be thrown to the beasts at Rome. His route, as we know from his Epistles, lay through Philadelphia, Smyrna, and Troas. Thence, like St. Paul, he must have crossed to Neapolis and so reached Philippi (his guards were probably making for one of the Adriatic ports by way of the Egnatian road), since the Church of Philippi 'welcomed' and 'escorted' him, and on his departure wrote two letters, one to the Church at Antioch consoling them for the loss of their bishop, and one to Polycarp of Smyrna asking for copies of as many as possible of the letters which Ignatius had written in Asia Minor.* St. Polycarp's answer is his Epistle to the Philippians, the sole source of our knowledge of this episode of Philippian history. We learn from it, further, that scandal had been caused at Philippi by the conduct of the presbyter Valens (the name is singularly frequent in Philippian inscriptions), and his wife, who had apparently, like Ananias and Sapphira, combined to carry out some dishonest financial transaction. Avarice would seem specially reprehensible to a Church which had distinguished itself for liberality as the Philippian Church had done in St. Paul's day (Ph 4<sup>10-18</sup>; and of Macedonia generally, 2 Co 11<sup>8, 9, 31-5</sup>).

Of the subsequent history of the Philippian Church nothing seems to be known till we meet the names of a few of its bishops among the subscriptions to 4th and 5th cent. councils: 'Porphyrius a Macedonia de Philippis' at Sardica in A.D. 344 (the Church of Philippi was therefore Athanasian, not Arian); 'Flaviano Philippensium qui Rufi loqure reuerendissimi Thessalonicensium episcopi locum gerebat' (he signed next after the bishops of Alexandria, Jerusalem, and Ephesus) at the œcumenical Council of Ephesus in A.D. 431; 'Sozon Philippi' at the Latrocinium of Ephesus in A.D. 449, and the same bishop, 'Sozon Philippensis,' at the Council of Chalcedon, which undid the work of the Latrocinium, in A.D. 451.

* It is not impossible that this request of the Philippians was the origin of the collection of a corpus of the Ignatian letters, and therewith of their preservation for later ages.

i. THE CHURCH OF PHILIPPI.—On the town see preceding article. The Church of Philippi was founded by St. Paul during his Second Missionary Journey, about the year A.D. 52 [Turner, 50]; it was the first Church which he founded on the soil of Europe (Ac 16<sup>12ff.</sup>). On his arrival in the city, according to his custom, he sought out the Jews, who do not appear to have been numerous, for they had no synagogue within the city, only a 'place of prayer' (προσευχή) outside the gates, on the banks of the river Gangites. Paul, accompanied by Silas and Timothy, and possibly by Luke (the use of 'we' in Ac 16<sup>13</sup>, and the graphic character of the whole narrative, betray the hand of an eye-witness), repaired to this place on the Sabbath day and spoke to some women whom they found there. A certain God-fearing proselyte named Lydia [or this may be simply an ethnic name='the Lydian'; see above, p. 177<sup>b</sup>], from the city of Thyatira, received the word, and was baptized with her household. Paul and his companions remained for some time in Philippi, continuing to frequent the Jewish place of prayer; there does not appear to have taken place any breach between him and the Jews on this occasion. The incident of the maid with the 'spirit of divination,' and the subsequent arrest of Paul and Silas, led to their abrupt departure, but not until the nucleus of a Christian Church had been formed. The author of the Book of Acts says (16<sup>40</sup>) that before leaving Philippi, Paul and Silas entered the house of Lydia and comforted 'the brethren.'

Two features in the narrative deserve special notice, for they were not without influence on the subsequent history of the Philippian Church. The first is that the Jews were few in number; the second, that the earliest converts were women. To the first we may ascribe the failure of the Judaizers to gain a footing within this Church; and perhaps the second explains the specially kindly interest taken by the Philippian Church in the personal comfort of the apostle. It may also account for the circumstance that the disputes in the Philippian Church were about personal rather than doctrinal questions. It has been said that the narratives in Ac 16<sup>13</sup> 17<sup>4</sup> 12 indicate—there is some corroborative evidence in the inscriptions—that in Macedonia women held a higher position than elsewhere. Female influence certainly continued strong in the Church of Philippi, for Paul regarded a personal quarrel between two of his female converts as a serious danger to the Church (Ph 4<sup>2</sup> 3).

The Church founded by Paul and his companions continued to prosper. It suffered persecution (2 Co 8<sup>2</sup>), but remained conspicuously faithful to the gospel of Paul and to Paul himself. If we are to understand 'bishops,' 'deacons' (Ph 1<sup>1</sup>) as names of ecclesiastical officers, it appears to have made more rapid progress in organization than other Churches (see on this point below, iv. n. 2). The Churches of Macedonia, and we may be sure Philippi was not an exception, manifested their attachment to Paul by the alacrity with which they collected money for the poor saints of Jerusalem, although they were themselves in deep poverty (2 Co 8<sup>3</sup>). The Philippians also sent repeated personal gifts to Paul when he was in Thessalonica and in Corinth (2 Co 8<sup>9</sup>, Ph 4<sup>15</sup> 16); and, lastly, when he was in Rome their care for him again revived, and they sent a gift through Epaphroditus, who was instructed to remain in Rome and minister to the apostle (Ph 4<sup>18</sup>).

It is probable that the friendship between Paul and the Philippians was cemented by more frequent intercourse than we know of. Polycarp (Philip. iii. 2) speaks of the 'letters' written by Paul to the Philippians; and, although this may be a mere inaccuracy on the part of Polycarp, or even if the plur. ἐπιστολαί may be used to denote a single letter (see Lightfoot, ad loc.), it is most improbable that Paul made no written acknowledgment of the repeated gifts. As Philippi lay on the Via Egnatia, he must have frequently received tidings of its Church from friends and messengers (Ac 19<sup>22</sup>). In the year 57 [Turner, 55] Philippi had two visits from the apostle in person; and it was in Macedonia, and almost certainly in Philippi, that he spent the anxious days of waiting for Titus (2 Co 2<sup>12</sup> 7<sup>5</sup> 6). There also he wrote, in all probability, the Second Epistle to the Corinthians (2 Co 2<sup>13</sup> 7<sup>8</sup> 8<sup>1</sup> 9<sup>2</sup> 4). If that was the case, Paul passed one of the most critical seasons in his life, when his entire life-work seemed in danger, among the Philippians; and at such seasons friendships are deepened. A second visit was paid to Philippi when Paul kept the Paschal feast with his converts before leaving for Jerusalem; and the language in Acts suggests that it was with difficulty that he tore himself away from them (Ac 20<sup>5</sup> 6).

In his Epistle, Paul expresses a hope that he would again visit the Philippians after his release from his Roman captivity (Ph 2<sup>24</sup>). Whether this hope was fulfilled we cannot say. If he was released,—as seems more probable,—and the Pastoral Epistles are to be accepted as a genuine record of his subsequent labours, he certainly paid one visit to Philippi after his release (1 Ti 1<sup>3</sup>), and probably more than one.

ii. THE TIME, PLACE, AND CIRCUMSTANCES OF WRITING.—When St. Paul wrote the Epistle to the Philippians, he was a prisoner (Ph 1<sup>7</sup> 13. 14. 17), and the place of his captivity was almost certainly Rome. He sends greetings from those of Cæsar's household (4<sup>22</sup>). A large and active Christian Church is in his neighbourhood, of whose doings he is fully cognizant (1<sup>14-17</sup>). A number of friends, old and new, are beside him, and appear to have free access to him (4<sup>21</sup> 22); he sends letters and messengers to distant Churches, and messengers come from other lands to visit him (4<sup>18</sup>). All this is in harmony with his Roman life as described in Acts (28<sup>30</sup>): it is improbable that he enjoyed the same liberty in Cæsarea, where, moreover, as far as we know, there was no Christian Church. One expression only in the Epistle suggests Cæsarea. In 1<sup>13</sup> the apostle writes that his bonds had become manifest in Christ ἐν ἔλφ τῷ πραιτωρίῳ. When in Cæsarea, Paul was confined in the prætorium of Herod (Ac 23<sup>35</sup>). Usage forbids us to understand prætorium as the imperial palace on the Palatine; nor does it seem to have been used (as is held by Ellicott, Meyer, etc.) as a name for the barracks of the imperial guard (see Lightfoot, Philip. p. 99). It is a designation, however, frequently given by Latin writers (e.g. Tac. Hist. ii. 11) and by Josephus (Ant. XIX. iii. 1) to the prætorian or imperial guard; and in this sense most modern commentators understand it here. Mommsen (Berlin. Akad. Sitzungsberichte, 1895, p. 495 ff.), who is followed by Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 357), maintains that it is here a name for the supreme imperial court, before which Paul appeared. This explanation relieves Paul's words of that note of exaggeration which they contain according to the former interpretation; for it is not possible that the knowledge of Paul as a bondsman of Christ should have pervaded the ranks of the immense imperial guard. See, further, art. PRÆTORIUM.

If Paul wrote the Epistle in Rome, it was written between 62 and 64 [Turner, 59 and 61]; or if Harnack's chronology be adopted, between 57 and 59. The probability is that it is the last of the Epistles of the captivity, and that it belongs to its closing period. (Bleek, Lightfoot, Sanday, Hort, et al. would place it first among the Epistles of the captivity; the view advocated in this art. is that of Zahn, Gwynn, Ramsay, et al.) A good deal had happened in Rome since Paul's arrival. If we accept Mommsen's view (see above), he had already appeared before his judges; and he was looking forward to a speedy settlement of his case (2<sup>24</sup>). The assumption of Zahn (Eint. in d. NT), that when the apostle wrote, the period of libera custodia had ended, and that he was in strict durance, rests upon a slender foundation, and is hardly consistent with the free intercourse with his friends implied in 2<sup>19</sup>.

St. Paul's Roman life, as mirrored in the Epistle to the Philippians, presents that blending of joy and sorrow, of unexpected triumphs and baffled hopes so familiar to the reader of the Book of Acts and of the Pauline Epistles. For years he had longed to see Rome that he might preach the gospel in that great gathering-place of the nations, and communicate some spiritual gift to the Church of the metropolis of the world. He entered Rome, however, in a guise that seemed to mock all his hopes of fruitful apostolic labour; but he was able to assure the Philippians that the frustration was only in appearance; for his bonds in Christ had become manifest in a manner which had spread to wide circles the knowledge of Christ (1<sup>13</sup>); and his presence as a captive for Christ's sake had quickened evangelistic zeal within the Roman Church (1<sup>14</sup>). But an element of personal bitterness mingled with his joy at the success of the preaching of the gospel. Some of the preachers whom his inspiring presence had sent forth to preach were animated by feelings of animosity towards himself, and preached Christ 'of faction,' hoping, as the apostle expresses it, to add affliction to his bonds (1<sup>17</sup>). This can hardly mean that they hoped to increase the rigour of his captivity, for if they had irritated the authorities by their preaching, they would themselves have been the first sufferers; they rather wished to make him feel more acutely the limitations of his captive condition as compared with the unfettered freedom enjoyed by his rivals. It is the opinion of some critics (e.g. E. Haupt) that the cause of the hostility of those preachers was simply jealousy of the masterful alien who had become the leader of the Christian community in Rome. Had they been Judaizers, it is urged, Paul could not have rejoiced in their preaching, after his emphatic condemnation of different gospels in the Ep. to the Galatians (1<sup>6</sup> 5<sup>2</sup>). It is true that there do not seem to have been in Rome, when Paul wrote to the Romans, Judaizers of the extreme Galatian type. The Roman Church appears to have contained a majority of Gentile Christians, but there must have been in it a considerable minority of Jewish Christians, some of whom were anxious to preserve certain Jewish rites and customs. These may have taken alarm at the immense accession to the strength of the other party by the arrival in their midst of the great representative of anti-legal Christianity. It seems therefore not improbable, and it is certainly more charitable to assume it, that those who preached Christ 'of faction' were under the influence of a more respectable motive than personal jealousy of the apostle. St. Paul might rejoice in their preaching, because through it men heard of Christ who would otherwise not have heard the gospel at all. It was otherwise when, as in the case of the Galatian Judaizers, an attempt was made to substitute a gospel trammelled by legal conditions for the free gospel of the grace of God, which the Galatians had already received.

During his Roman captivity St. Paul was solaced by the society of a number of friends. Timothy, Luke, Epaphroditus, Aristarchus, Epaphras, Tychicus, John Mark, Demas, Jesus Justus, and Onesimus [see separate articles on these names] were all more or less frequent visitors in the hired house (μισθωμα, Ac 28<sup>30</sup>) in Rome, and not improbably often lodged under its roof. To a man like Paul, who possessed a genius for friendship, the presence of his friends must have been a source of unfailing joy and comfort; and he owed to their ministrations not only the personal comfort which he enjoyed, but his opportunities of missionary effort in Rome and elsewhere; for he frequently sent them out on apostolic missions. But one expression in the Ep. to the Philippians shows that the element of disappointment was not altogether absent even when he was in the society of his chosen friends, and that they did not always come up to the apostle's high standard of self-forgetfulness in the service of Christ. He writes (2<sup>19</sup>, 20), 'I hope in the Lord Jesus to send Timothy shortly. For I have no man likeminded who will care genuinely for your state. For they all seek their own, not the things of Jesus Christ.' It has been said that if these words are to be taken seriously, they show that Paul, like Luther in his old age, fell into a mood of morose complaining, which made him unjust towards his fellow-workers. But we need not apply them to all the friends of whom mention has been made above, only to those, and perhaps few, who happened to be present with him at the time he was writing; some of these appear to have pleaded private business, and to have excited Paul's easily roused indignation by their apparent indifference to a mission which was dear to his heart. "All," writes Jülicher (Eint. in d. NT), 'is without doubt hyperbolic. Paul was a man; and he had a right to give expression in his letters to his passing moods.'

It is generally supposed that Epaphroditus was the bearer of the letter to Philippi, and that he was also the amanuensis. Lightfoot's judgment is that 'on the whole it seems most probable' that 4<sup>3</sup> is an appeal to Epaphroditus, who was by Paul's side and writing down his words, to use his best endeavour to heal the grievous quarrel between Euodia and Syntyche. Others consider this unnatural, and prefer to take Συνύργος as a proper name, and to explain γνήσιος as 'truly called.' The return of Epaphroditus and the fitness of sending thanks for the gifts received, through the person who had brought them, was probably the immediate occasion of the Epistle.

iii. THE CONTENTS OF THE EPISTLE. — The Epistle begins in St. Paul's usual manner, with this exception, that the bishops and deacons are singled out for special greeting (1<sup>1-2</sup>). The apostle goes on to say that the remembrance of the Philippians always awakens in his heart thankfulness to God, and that his prayers for them are accompanied with joy, because of their fellowship in the furtherance of the gospel from the day they first heard it (vv. 3-8). A prayer follows, that their love may abound more and more, and that it may be accompanied with knowledge and discernment so that they shall be able to prove things that differ, and be found free of offence unto the day of Christ (vv. 9-11).

The apostle then turns to his own affairs, which are likewise those of the gospel. His captivity, instead of proving a calamity to the cause of Christ, as might have been feared, had contributed to the spread of the glad tidings, his bonds having become manifest in Christ throughout the whole pratorium and to the rest. His captivity had likewise emboldened many brethren to speak the word of God without fear; and although some of the preachers had been animated by unworthy feelings towards himself, he was able to rejoice that they had proclaimed Christ. For himself, he cherished the confident expectation and hope that Christ would be magnified in him, whether by his life or by his death. Death was to him a more attractive prospect than life, for after death he should be with Christ; but his life was more needful for the Philippians and his other converts, and he felt confident that he would be spared for their sakes. Only one thing could damp the joyful confidence of the apostle, evil tidings of his converts, and he therefore exhorts them to live in a manner worthy of the gospel, and not to be intimidated by adversaries (vv. 12-30).

An appeal to the Philippians follows, to fulfil the apostle's joy by living lives of brotherly love. They are warned to shun the spirit of faction and vainglory, and to cultivate lowliness of mind. In their Lord Christ, who exchanged the form of God for the form of a servant (Bruce, Hummil. of Christ, p. 28; see Gifford, Incarnation, p. 22 ff., and below, iv. n. 2), they had before them an example of lowliness of mind, and in His subsequent exaltation, a proof of God's approval of the lowly mind (2<sup>1-11</sup>).

The apostle then repeats certain warnings already given against disputings and murmurings, and entreats the Philippians to live as children of God. His absence ought to act as an additional incentive to more strenuous efforts on their part to work out their own salvation with fear and trembling (vv. 12-18).

The apostle intimates his intention to send Timothy to visit Philippi, that he may comfort them, and bring tidings of them to himself. Timothy is one who will truly care for their welfare; and such men were at the time rare among the apostle's companions, for they all seek their own, not the things of Jesus Christ. The apostle explains that he has sent back Epaphroditus whom the Philippians had sent to minister to him, because Epaphroditus, after a dangerous illness, had been seized with a longing for his home. He had, however, done noble service to the apostle, and deserved the best reception from his fellow-Christians in Philippi on his home-coming. The passage ends with the words, 'Finally, my brethren, rejoice in the Lord' (2<sup>12-31a</sup>).

The last words of the former paragraph seemed to indicate that the apostle was about to close his letter. But a new paragraph begins with 3<sup>1b</sup>, in which he goes on to state that he does not hesitate to repeat warnings formerly given, as he knows that they are a means of safety for his converts. An impassioned invective follows against the 'dogs' of the concision who were always barking at him. Their worship, which they were so eager to introduce among all Christians, was a worship in the flesh, and not by the Spirit of God. Paul had himself possessed, in all their fulness, the fleshly privileges of which the Judaizers boasted, and had renounced them that he might gain Christ in their stead, and experience the power of His resurrection, and that fellowship in Christ's sufferings through which lies the path to a joyful resurrection. The apostle adds that he is aware that his own apprehension of the blessings of the Christian calling is as yet incomplete, but he describes himself as one who is forgetting the things that are behind, and stretching forward to the things which are before. A warning reference follows to some who are spoken of as the enemies of the cross of Christ, not apparently because of their opposition to the gospel, but because of their worldly and licentious lives. These men mind earthly things; but the citizenship of the Christian is in heaven. The passage concludes with a general exhortation to Christian steadfastness (3<sup>1b-4</sup>). An entreaty follows to two women, Euodia and Syntyche, who had been formerly fellow-labourers with Paul, to be of one mind in the Lord; and an unnamed true yoke-fellow (or perhaps [see above] a friend named Synzygus) is exhorted to labour to bring about the desired reconciliation. All are exhorted to rejoice in the Lord, and to show by their gentle and forbearing behaviour towards all men that they believed their Lord to be at hand. Their needs should be laid before the Lord in prayer, and the peace of God—a better defence than all the devices of men—would stand sentinel over their hearts and thoughts. After another 'finally,' a passage follows which seems to breathe the spirit of the philosophic moralist rather than of the Christian apostle. Let them open their minds and hearts to the contemplation of all true and beautiful thoughts, of all fair deeds wherever they are to be seen (4<sup>2-9</sup>).

St. Paul then gives thanks for the gift the Philippians had sent through Epaphroditus, which he valued because of the spirit of which it was the manifestation, rather than for itself, for he was not in need. The Epistle closes with salutations and the Pauline benediction (vv. 10-end).

iv. THE CHARACTERISTICS OF THE EPISTLE. — In the Ep. to the Philippians and in the Second Ep. to the Corinthians, St. Paul's personal character is more clearly revealed than in any of his other writings. But the two Epistles disclose different sides of his character. In 2 Co he is writing to adversaries and to lukewarm or suspicious friends, and we mark how acutely he felt personal slights and unworthy accusations. He pleads his own merits and services in a manner which shows that self-esteem was by no means dead within him, and he verges on what appears to the modern reader boastfulness. In writing to the Philippians, he is addressing some of the most trusted friends he had in the world. This trust in his readers gives a pleasing sense of repose to the Epistle. It accounts for the epistolary undress of the language, for the want of plan, for the repetitions, and for the obvious reluctance to leave off. There were some things amiss even in Philippi, and Paul had to administer certain reproofs, but he is less fearful than on other occasions, having a full conviction that God would perfect His good work among them, and reveal His will to them in those matters which were as yet obscure to them. Chapter 3 forms an exception to the general restfulness of tone observable in the Epistle (see Note 3 below). Critics, however, have discovered that there existed a soreness in the mind of the Philippians about Paul's reception of their pecuniary gifts. Zahn (Eim. in d. NT) maintains that they had written a remonstrance to him complaining that he had not suitably acknowledged it. Another critic (Holsten) finds in St. Paul's words 4<sup>10-19</sup> 'thankless thanks.' A third (E. Haupt), however, regards his acknowledgment as a veritable masterpiece of delicate and considerate courtesy. The practice of lauding the courtesy of the apostle has been somewhat overdone. St. Paul could be very courteous, but his courtesy was always kept in strict subordination to his duties as a counsellor and as a reprover. To say not only that he did not desire, but that he did not require the gift, was not precisely the courtesy of the courtier; and was likely enough to bring a shade of disappointment to the countenances of the poor people who had sent it. But the apostle evidently recognized that they were in some danger of exaggerating the value of the money gift. He said, therefore, with all plainness of speech, that to him its value consisted solely in the evidence it gave of their personal affection, and of their willingness to make sacrifices for the cause of God.

NOTE 1.—Ph 1<sup>1</sup> σὺν ἐπισκόποις καὶ διακόνοις. This is the first (unless we take into account the words attributed to Paul in Ac 20<sup>28</sup>) mention in the NT of bishops. Its presence in a letter purporting to be written by St. Paul has excited suspicion of the genuineness of the letter, as the episcopal office (at least in its monarchical form) is generally admitted to have originated at a later period. It is very doubtful, however, if St. Paul here refers to the holders of a definite ecclesiastical office. When writing to the Thessalonians, he spoke of their leaders as οἱ προϊστάμενοι (1 Th 5<sup>12</sup>). In the Ep. to the Ephesians those exercising episcopal functions are named ποιμένες καὶ διδάσκαλοι (Eph 4<sup>11</sup>). In the Ep. to the Hebrews they are termed ἡγούμενοι (He 13<sup>17</sup>). The apostle here names those 'bishops' who were elsewhere called by other names, but who exercised the same functions. Whether this was the first occasion on which the word was uttered in the Christian Church, we cannot say; probably it had been already given by Paul or by others to Philippian Church rulers; but it was a name, once given, that was likely soon to supersede all others on the principle of the survival of the fittest. It was well known and understood by Greeks; and not less so by the Jews, for it is common in the Septuagint; and it expresses by a single word at once the dignity and the duties of the rulers of the Church.

E. Haupt suggests that the bishops and deacons are here selected for special greeting because they had taken a leading part in arranging for and collecting the gifts sent by Epaphroditus. With regard to the two classes of persons named, Haupt writes: 'It is possible that there is no reference here to the offices.' In 1 Th 5<sup>12</sup> the same persons are certainly designated by the expressions οἱ κοινῶντες and οἱ προϊστάμενοι; and it is at least probable that the same is the case with regard to the ποιμένες and διδάσκαλοι of Eph 4<sup>11</sup>. Clement (1 Ep. xlii. 5) ascribes presidency to ἐπισκοπῆς and διακονῆς alike. It is, therefore, possible that here ἐπισκοπῆς and διακονῆς are to be understood as applying to the same persons; and that here as in the other Pauline Epistles, there was as yet no fixed terminology for the office of president' (Die Gefangenschaftsbriefe, p. 3). See, further, on the subject of this note, Hort, Ecclesia, 11 f.

NOTE 2.—Ph 2<sup>5-11</sup>. This passage has been pressed into the service of speculative theology, and many attempts have been made to extract from it an apostolic doctrine of the relations of the Divine and human natures of our Lord. It is very doubtful, however, if the apostle had any intention of formulating, or even of hinting at the meaning which his words are supposed to bear. In v. 4 he had uttered a warning against factiousness and vain glory, and a counsel follows to cultivate lowliness of mind. Of this voluntary choice of lowliness, Christ was their great example, for He had exchanged His heavenly glory for the life of humanity,—for a life which ended in a death of shame.

According to some commentators the words ὅς ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ ὑπάρχων οὐχ ἄρταρμὸν ἠγήσατο τὸ εἶναι ἴσα θεῷ refer to the lowliness of spirit exhibited by the Son during His pre-existent life. Although in the form of God, He did not ambitiously snatch at equality with the Father. If this be the meaning, it is a thought strangely foreign to the ordinary thought of St. Paul to hint even at a possible rivalry between the Father and the Son. Nor do the words force us to adopt this interpretation. The word μορφῆ as distinguished from σχήμα denotes that which is essential to the subject, that which properly belongs to its nature; and the words τὸ εἶναι ἴσα θεῷ need not express a different, but the same idea. Christ being in the form of God, therefore possessed equality with God. The only word which creates difficulty is ἄρταρμὸς, which, according to its termination, signifies 'a snatching,' not 'the thing snatched.' But substantives in -μὸς are frequently used to describe the concrete thing (e.g. πικραρμὸς, πονηρμὸς, δυσρμὸς). 'Ἀρταρμὸς' occurs only once in classical writers in a passage in Plutarch (Mor. p. 12 A). So we cannot say with certainty whether or not it was ever employed in the passive sense. It was certainly so used by the Greek Fathers, who were writing in their native tongue. In a number of passages the Fathers employ the expression ἄρταρμὸν τὴν ποιότητα as synonymous with the more ordinary expression ἄρταρμὸν τὴν οὐσίαν. If we may so translate ἄρταρμὸς here, the meaning is that Christ did not regard the equality with God which He possessed, as a prize to be eagerly grasped and retained, but of His own will surrendered it for the condition of lowliness. The verb κωλύω (Ro 4<sup>14</sup>, 1 Co 11<sup>7</sup> 21<sup>6</sup>) refers to this surrender by Christ of His heavenly glory and dignity, and the manner of surrender is explained in the expression that follows—μορφῆν δούλου λαβών. To answer the questions of speculative theology as to the exact relation which continued to exist between the 'two natures' of Christ, was entirely foreign to the purpose of St. Paul's exhortation. 'It contains,' writes Zahn (Eim. in d. NT), 'hardly more dogmatical teaching than the sentence in 2 Co 8<sup>9</sup>.'

NOTE 3.—Ph 3<sup>1b-20</sup>. This passage does not harmonize either in substance or in tone, with the rest of the Epistle. It almost looks as if it had been torn out of its connexion in the Ep. to the Galatians, or in the 2nd Ep. to the Corinthians. It has certainly more kinship with those Epistles than with the Epistle in which it stands. It consists of a passionate invective against the Judaizers, reminding us of Galatians, followed by a vindication of St. Paul's own position as the possessor of all the privileges of which the Judaizers were fond of boasting.

It is extremely difficult to discover a fitting connexion between it and the preceding paragraph, which concludes with the words, 'Finally, my brethren, rejoice in the Lord.' Some commentators (e.g. Bengel, B. Weiss, Klöpfer) have seen a link of connexion in the circumstance that Christian joy was obscured by the practice of Judaic rites which diverted the gaze from Christ: 'Gaudium spirituale optinam affert certitudinem contra errores, Judaicos præsertim' (Bengel). But a connexion so delicately hinted, when the Judaizers were in question, is unlike St. Paul. Lightfoot gives up the attempt to establish an inner connexion of the passage with what goes before. He conjectures that the apostle was interrupted when writing the letter. In the interval something occurred in Rome which reminded him of the restless propagandism of the Judaizing missionaries. 'What if they should interfere at Philippi as they were doing at Rome, and tamper with the faith and loyalty of his converts? With this thought weighing upon his spirit he resumes his letter.' But a device of this character rather suggests the interpreter in despair. We prefer the explanation of E. Haupt, who remarks that the fragmentary character of Paul's closing exhortations makes it unnecessary to look for a connexion with the foregoing passage, if a possible danger to the Philippians from the Judaizers was present to his mind. That he is speaking of the Judaizers sufficiently explains the sudden change of tone to severity and solemn warning; for the mention of those plotters against the peace of his Churches always excited the indignation of the apostle. It also accounts for the introduction of the vindication of his own ancestral privileges as a Hebrew of the Hebrews, and as one who had always been found blameless as touching the righteousness which is of the law; for the apostle was aware that it was the invariable practice of the Judaizers to indulge in detraction of himself, whom they regarded as the chief obstacle to their designs upon the freedom of the Church.

V. THE GENUINENESS AND INTEGRITY OF THE EPISTLE.—The genuineness of Philippians was denied by Baur and his scholars Schwegler, Volkmar, etc., and by Hitzig. The mention of bishops and deacons in the greeting betrayed, they maintained, a later date than the lifetime of St. Paul. They found in it, moreover, evident traces of the Gnosticism of the 2nd century. Its teaching regarding the Kenosis of Christ (2<sup>6</sup>) was a reflexion of the Valentinian myth of the fall of Sophia from the Pleroma to the Kenoma. In 2<sup>8</sup> they found the Gnostic Docetic teaching about the body of Christ; and in 2<sup>10</sup> Marcion's doctrine of a Descensus ad Inferos. In Clement, who is mentioned in 4<sup>3</sup>, they perceived a reference to the Clementine Romances. The design of the Epistle, according to Baur, was to repel Ebionite assaults, and to promote unity between the two sections of the Church. The views of Baur with regard to this Epistle possess at present only a historical interest. The Epistle to the Philippians is accepted, if not by all, at least by a great majority of NT critics. Many who reject Ephesians and are doubtful of Colossians (e.g. Jülicher, Hilgenfeld, Pfeiderer, Lipsius), accept Philippians as the genuine work of the apostle. Holsten in his latest work (Paulinische Theologie, 1898), although he continued to place it among the Epistles wrongly ascribed to Paul, admitted that its teaching is wholly Pauline. A theory was broached recently by Voelter (ThT, 1892) that the Epistle is in part the work of Paul, in part by another hand. The genuine parts are, according to Voelter, 1<sup>1-7</sup>. 12-14. 18-26 217-29 410-21. 23. The remaining parts are not genuine. Spitta (Zur Geschichte u. Lit. d. Urchristenthums, 1893) also denies the integrity of the Epistle. C. Clemen (Die Einheit d. paulin. Briefe, 1894), while rejecting the theory of Voelter and defending the genuineness of the whole of the Epistle, maintains that it consists of two letters of the apostle, written at different times, and made into one by an editor. 2<sup>19-24</sup> 3<sup>2-4</sup> 4<sup>8</sup>.<sup>9</sup> he holds to belong to the second letter. The expression of Polycarp, that Paul wrote 'letters' to the Philippians, is relied upon as giving a certain traditional authority to this theory. Did the portions which are considered as belonging to different letters follow one another consecutively, the theory might deserve some consideration; for two letters by the same author might easily have got fastened together, and would in time have been regarded as one letter. But it is hard to see what motives could have induced an editor to transform two connected letters into a document of artificial piecework. Chapter 3 alone gives some colour to the idea that foreign matter may have found its way into the Epistle, but is not sufficient to lead us to accept Clemen's theory.

PHILISTIA.—See next article, and PALESTINE.

PHILISTINES (פְּלִשְׁתִּים, in Am 9<sup>7</sup> and 1 Ch 14<sup>10</sup> [Kethibh] פְּלִשְׁתִּים; LXX Φυλιστιναι in the Hexateuch, and ἀλλόφυλοι elsewhere; in Josephus and other Greek writers Φυλιστινῶν or Παλαιστίνων).— 'Philistines' is the gentile plural of פְּלִשְׁתִּי, in AV 'Palestina,' 'Palestine,' 'the Philistines,' but in RV always 'Philistia'; in Assy. 'Palastu,' 'Pilstu'; in Gr. Παλαιστίνη, but in LXX always transmuted into the word for 'Philistines' (Ex 15<sup>14</sup>, Is 14<sup>29</sup>, 31, Ps 60<sup>8</sup> 83<sup>7</sup> 87<sup>4</sup> 108<sup>9</sup>, Jl 3<sup>4</sup>). The Hebrew name as well as the Greek has been explained, though with very doubtful warrant, as by derivation denoting 'immigrants.'

1. The Name.—It is probably Semitic. It has a peculiar grammatical use. The Hebrew has two usual ways of designating a people as such. One way is by the use of the primitive noun without modification, just as proper names of persons are used. For example, 'Asshur,' 'Assyrian,' 'the Assyrian,' 'the Assyrians' are in Hebrew all alike Asshur, this noun denoting either the founder, the country, the nation, or the people, and in each meaning used in the masculine singular, and without the article. But no such use is ever made of any primitive from which Pēlištīm might be derived. The other way is by the use of the gentile adjective in the masculine singular, with the article. We have, for example, 'the Moabite,' 'the Jebusite,' 'the Ekronite,' 'the Gittite,' in the singular, alike for an individual and for the people as a whole, though the English versions pluralize words of this class when they denote peoples. In contrast with this, the word Pēlištī is used in the singular only of individuals, the instances being Goliath (1 S 17<sup>8</sup>, 10 and often) and the Philistine of 2 S 21<sup>17</sup>, and is always plural when it denotes the Philistine people. Further, it is regularly used without the article, though there are some exceptions, e.g. Jos 13<sup>2</sup>, 1 S 4<sup>7</sup> 7<sup>13</sup> 13<sup>20</sup> 17<sup>51</sup>, 2 S 5<sup>19</sup> 21<sup>12</sup> (Keth.), 1 Ch 11<sup>13</sup>, 2 Ch 21<sup>16</sup>. These facts differentiate this name, in a very marked way, from most other biblical names of peoples.

This differentiation becomes the more marked when we note that it serves to affiliate the Philistine name in certain directions, as well as to sever it in other directions. Perhaps the name Caphthōrīm and the six other unusual names mentioned with Pēlištīm in Gn 10<sup>13</sup>, 14 follow completely the same usage, though the number of instances is too small to be decisive. The word Rēphāīm, when used as a gentile name, follows the same usage; and the other proper names of the giant peoples follow it in that they are used in the plural (see GIANT, etc.). The name פְּרִזִּי, denoting the Egyptian people, is plural except in Ezr 9<sup>1</sup>. The words פְּתִי, 'Ethiopian,' לְיִבִּי, 'Lybian,' חֲכָדָאִי, 'Chaldaean,' denoting peoples, are always plural, and are regularly definite without the article. All this is certainly significant of facts in Philistine history. Whether the facts thus signified are recoverable is another question.

2. Characteristics of the Philistines in the times when they are best known.—The usage attending the name is not more remarkable than are many of the facts concerning the Philistines themselves, as they appear in the OT.

Their territory extended 'from the Shihor* which is before Egypt, even unto the border of Ekron northward' (Jos 13<sup>3</sup> 5). Its eastern limit was at Beth-shemesh (1 S 6<sup>10</sup>). It included possibly 2000 square miles of land, much of it remarkably fertile. Within this territory there were, according to the biblical writers, in the times when the Philistines were prominent, four kinds of inhabitants. First, there were the Philistines proper. Second, there were remnants of the Anakim and the Avvim in Gaza, Gath, Ashdod, etc. (Jos 11<sup>22</sup> 13<sup>3</sup>, Dt 2<sup>23</sup>). These were politically Philistine, as the Anakim at Hebron were politically Amorite. Third, the accounts of the conquest under Joshua and of the subsequent events seem to imply that there were Canaanites living among the Philistines, some of whom were conquered and superseded by Israel (see 3 below). Fourth, some of the southern Geshurites (Jos 13<sup>3</sup>, 1 S 27<sup>8</sup>), and perhaps other like tribes, lived within the Philistine territory, near the Egyptian border. It is noteworthy that the Philistines seem to have confined themselves to their own narrow region, even when for decade after decade they held dominion over the wider territories of Israel. It is recorded as an exceptional fact that, after the overthrow of Saul at Gilboa, some of them became resident among the Israelites in the regions beyond Jezreel and Jordan (1 S 31<sup>7</sup>, 1 Ch 10<sup>7</sup>).

The Philistines were proficient in agriculture * That is, either an arm of the Nile (Dillm.) or the Wady el-Arish, 'river (לְיַם) of Egypt.'

Politically, they had five principal centres, the cities of Ashdod, Gaza, Ashkelon, Gath, and Ekron (wh. see, severally, and see also 1 S 6<sup>17</sup>, Jos 13<sup>3</sup>, Zeph 2<sup>4-7</sup> etc.). It has been inferred that Ashdod possessed a right of hegemony over the others; but the order of mention differs in different places; and, judging by the history, the claim of Gath to the hegemony is much stronger than that of Ashdod. Besides the five, the Philistines had many other cities, the following (which see) being familiar examples: Gerar, Gezer, Timnah, Ziklag, Gob, Gibbethon, Jabneh (2 Ch 26<sup>6</sup>); and many of them dwelt in unwallied towns (1 S 6<sup>18</sup>, Dt 2<sup>23</sup>); but the five principal centres representatively included them all (1 S 6<sup>13</sup>).

Their political organization was unique. The people of each centre are currently spoken of in the ordinary way in which other nationalities are mentioned, as 'the Ashdodite,' 'the Ashkelonite,' etc. But the centres themselves and their political heads are alike designated by the altogether peculiar word שָׂרָנִים, šērānīm, tr. 'lords' in AV and RV (Jos 13<sup>3</sup>, Jg 16<sup>5</sup> etc.). This word is used only in the plural. It is doubtless the native term, and has no near cognates in the Hebrew, save that a word of the same spelling is used (1 K 7<sup>30</sup>) of some accessory to the wheels of the laver-bases of Solomon's temple. Here the RV, following Vulg. and many lexicons, tr. by 'axles,' though the word is different from the one rendered 'axle-trees' in the same context. Half a dozen opposing derivations have been conjectured for šērānīm, none of them more plausible than the natural suggestion that these five cities and their chiefs were regarded as the centres or representatives of national power; or that šeren is the Greek ῥαββως.

The šērānīm, 'lords,' are distinguished from the sārīm, שָׂרִים, 'captains' (1 S 13<sup>30</sup> 29<sup>2-2</sup>, where AV and RV misleadingly translate 'princes' instead of 'captains'). The former are the depositaries of national authority, and the latter the men in actual military command. In particular cases, both offices may or may not have been combined in one person. The LXX prevailingly tr. šeren by σατραπῆς or σατραπία, 'satrap' or 'satrapy,' and sar by στρατηγός, 'captain,' but sometimes interchange the two, and sometimes tr. šērānīm by ἀρχοντες, 'rulers.'

The functions of the šērānīm were both civil and military. We have no account of any one šeren acting by himself, but only of acts in which the whole body of šērānīm participated. The accounts speak sometimes of the 'armies' and sometimes of the 'army' of the Philistines (1 S 23<sup>3</sup> 28<sup>1</sup> 29). Apparently each of the five centres had its independent force, but all were combined, in time of war, under one command. In David's time Gath was especially prominent, and perhaps held the hegemony (1 Ch 20<sup>8</sup>, RV of 2 S 8<sup>1</sup>; cf. 1 Ch 18<sup>1</sup>). King Achish of Gath may have been the Philistine commander-in-chief, though the narrative does not explicitly say so (1 S 29).

We have no information as to whether the office of šeren was hereditary or elective or perpetuated in some other way, nor as to the relation between this office and that of king. None of the Philistine kings who are mentioned reigned over all Philistia (Gn 20<sup>2</sup> 26<sup>1-8</sup>, Jer 25<sup>20</sup>, Zec 9<sup>5</sup>); they were all local. We are not told whether the šērānīm existed from the earliest times, or whether they continued to exist after the conquest by David. But in the one instance we have of a Philistine king in relations with the šērānīm, the instance of Achish (1 S 28. 29), the king is compelled to submit to the šērānīm. Achish may himself have been šeren of Gath, as well as king of Gath.

The religion of the Philistines was in some respects unique (see DAGON and BAAL-ZEBUB). They were a very religious people. Their priests and diviners (1 S 6<sup>2</sup>) had great influence. Their cloud-observing (?) soothsayers (Is 2<sup>9</sup>) were famous. Their being an uncircumcised people is much emphasized in the biblical records (Jg 14<sup>2</sup> 15<sup>18</sup>, 1 S 14<sup>6</sup> 17<sup>26, 32</sup> 31<sup>4</sup>, 2 S 1<sup>20</sup>, Jer 9<sup>25, 26</sup>).

They were distinguished especially for military prowess. Pretty full details of their system might be gathered from various parts of the Bible, including mention of their archers, their equipment for heavy armed infantry, their organization into hundreds and thousands, etc. (1 S 31<sup>3</sup>, 1 Ch 10<sup>8</sup>, 1 S 29<sup>2</sup>). The accounts make the impression that they usually fought as infantry, though chariots and cavalry are mentioned (1 S 13<sup>3</sup>, 2 S 1<sup>6</sup>, and perhaps Jg 13<sup>9</sup>). We have descriptions of their savage treatment of the bodies of their fallen enemies (1 S 31, 1 Ch 10), and of the honours with which their women welcomed their warriors returning from victory. But more significant than all matters of detail is the fact that this little nation, with its few hundred square miles of territory, was able again and again to conquer Israel, and to hold Israel in subjection for generations.

In their military operations they seem to have pursued a very definite policy. In the earlier stages of any movement of conquest they practised effective and systematic pillage, as, for instance, in the case of Kellah (1 S 23<sup>1</sup>), or earlier, after their first great defeat of Saul (1 S 13<sup>17, 18</sup>). The indications are, however, that the Israelites increased in population and wealth during the long periods of Philistine oppression, provided they were submissive. From this we may infer that it was the policy of the conquerors, whenever resistance ceased, to abstain from pillage, doubtless exacting tribute instead, and finding it for their own interest to have the tributary people as prosperous as possible.

To secure submission, the Philistines practised the disarmament of the subjected people. We have an instance in the time of Saul (1 S 13<sup>19-23</sup>), and what seems to be an allusion to an earlier instance of the time of Shamgar (Jg 3<sup>31</sup> 5<sup>8</sup>). According to the LXX in the first of these passages, the Philistines used this as a method of exacting tribute, suppressing the working of metals in Israel, and then compelling the Israelites to pay an exorbitant price for their tools.

It was the Philistine policy to prevent the existence of a united Israel. As long as David is king of Judah, and has a rival king farther north, they seem to be content. When Israel is divided, the Philistine supremacy is not imperilled. But when it is proposed that David reign over all the twelve tribes, the Philistine armies march at once (2 S 5<sup>17</sup>). A similar situation had arisen previously, when Samuel became judge (1 S 7<sup>7</sup>).

Presumably, the Philistines did not achieve all their successes single-handed. It is a familiar fact that in cases of Egyptian invasion, in earlier times, or, later, of Assyrian invasion, it was the custom of the multitudinous little peoples between the Euphrates and the Mediterranean to band together against the common foe. Judging by the numbers of the Israelites, as mentioned in the Hexateuch, the invasion under Joshua was sufficiently formidable to call for similar confederations of the threatened peoples. As a matter of fact, the Bible represents the resistance made to Joshua and, later, to David as being of this character. We shall presently find evidence that in some of the wars of subjugation the Philistine success was due in part to the ability to array many allies against Israel.

3. The History of the Philistines.—Beyond dispute, they were immigrants into Palestine. The passages presently to be cited affirm this explicitly. It has been thought to be implied in the etymology of the Hebrew name Pelishtim as well as of the Greek Ἀλλόφυλοι. So far, the problem is easy. But the questions whence they migrated, and when and how the migrating stock was modified in its new seats, are questions not so readily answered.

The Philistine language was probably Semitic, although the data whence this conclusion is drawn are restricted. So were certain important elements in their religion and their civilization. This proves either that the Philistines were originally Semitic, or that they changed their language, and to some extent their institutions, under the influence of the Semitic region to which they came.

We are told that they came from Caphtor, as Israel from Egypt, or Aram from Kir (Am 9<sup>7</sup>, Dt 2<sup>20</sup>); that they were Caphtorim (Dt 2<sup>23</sup>). They are called 'the remnant of the coast of Caphtor' (Jer 47<sup>4-5</sup>). The Caphtorim are said to be one of the seven nationalities begotten by Mizraim (Egypt), and the Philistines are said to have 'come out' from the locality where one or more of the other six were (Gn 10<sup>13, 14</sup>). The text has the adverb of place 'from where,' not the pronoun 'from whom,' and the two expressions are not in Hebrew convertible. It is not said that the Philistines are descendants of the Casluhim and the others, and there is no need to transpose the clauses or otherwise change the text (but see Dillm. ad loc.). The net result from this part of the testimony is that the nucleus of the Philistine people consisted of Caphtorim, who migrated, within known historic times, from regions inhabited by Caphtorim and kindred peoples.

But where was Caphtor? The LXX uniformly either transliterate the name or make it Cappadocia. Some have identified Caphtor with Cyprus. This finds some support in the fact that the Egyptian monuments associate the Philistines with the Zakkal, a people from Cyprus, and portray the two as scarcely distinguishable. Ebers, Halévy, and others have strongly held that Caphtor was a region in or near the Egyptian Delta. There is a strong recent trend toward the opinion that Caphtor was Crete. See CAPHTOR, CARITES, CHERETHITES AND PELETHITES, CRETE.

The argument for identifying Caphtor with Crete connects itself closely with the phenomena presented by another biblical name. In two relatively late places (Zeph 2<sup>6</sup>, Ezk 25<sup>15, 16</sup>) the Philistines are identified, wholly or in part, with the Chêrêthim, whom the LXX, in these places, make to be the Cretans. In both passages the word Chêrêthim is used in a punning way, effecting a play on words. The name does not occur elsewhere in the plural, but, in the singular, 'the Cherethite' is once mentioned (1 S 30<sup>14</sup>) as living in or near the Philistine country, and six or seven times in connexion with 'the Pelethite,' as forming a part of king David's military force (1 Ch 18<sup>17</sup>, 2 S 8<sup>18</sup> 15<sup>18</sup> 20<sup>7</sup> and Kerê of 2<sup>23</sup>, 1 K 13<sup>38, 44</sup>). On the basis of these facts it is affirmed that Cherethite is another and earlier name for the Philistines, that they were Cretans, that Pelethite is merely a variant form of Philistine, and that David's successes were largely due to his having Philistine troops. These conclusions are plausible, though they lack something of being sufficiently proved.

The evidence, however, amounts to a strong probability in favour of the more general fact that the Philistines were originally Aryan pirates, whether from Crete or Cyprus or elsewhere, who forced a settlement for themselves among the Semites and Rephaim of the Mediterranean lowland, and adopted the language, and in part the religion and civilization, of the Semites whom they conquered. Of this we shall find many confirmations as we proceed to consider the evidence as to the date when the migration took place.

Ramses III. of Egypt, contemporary, in part, with Joshua, says that in his eighth year he repulsed an invasion made by six or seven hostile nations. Most or all of these nations have Greek names. They are kin to other Greek peoples, settled on the African coast west of the Delta, who made trouble for Ramses in his fifth and his eleventh years, and who had previously made trouble for his predecessors. The invaders who came in his eighth year came by land and by sea. Those who came by land plundered the Syrian regions, 'beginning with the people of Kheta, of Kadi (Galilee), and Carchemish, Aradus, and Alus,' established a rendezvous 'in the land of the Amorites,' and were defeated by Ramses on the frontier between Egypt and the land of Zahi, that is, the region that we know as the land of the Philistines (Insc. in the Ramesseum at Luxor, as cited by Brugsch, Egypt under the Pharaohs, p. 329). Those who came by sea entered the mouths of the Nile, and were there defeated, large numbers of them being captured.

Of these six or seven peoples, two are many times mentioned together, to the extent of being somewhat distinguished from the others. In the sculptures they closely resemble one another. They are, of course, Greek in features and equipment. These two are the Zakkal and the Pulusata, Pulsata, Pulista, Purusata, Purosatha, as the name is variously transliterated. Scholars seem to agree that the Zakkal came from Cyprus. The Pulusata have been identified with the Pelasgi, with the Prosoditæ of Cyprus, and with the Philistines. Some of those who believe that they were the Philistines hold that they came at this time from Crete or Cyprus, and were settled by Ramses, after their defeat, in the cities of Zahi. But it is more in accord with the whole of the evidence to hold that the Pulsata and the Zakkal had then been on this coast for some generations, keeping in communication with their kindred in the various Greek regions, and now making themselves leaders in the movement of the hordes that sought the spoils of Egypt. If the Pulsata of Ramses had then just come from Crete, he would surely have designated them by their Greek name, and not by a Semitic descriptive word. If they had just come from Crete, it is difficult to account for the resemblance which the Egyptians found between them and the Cypriote Zakkal, while this is easily accounted for if the two had long been dwelling among Semitic neighbours on the coast. Other Greek invaders Ramses describes as 'kings,' or as 'peoples of the sea,' but he speaks of the 'leaders of the hostile bands' of the Pulsata and the Zakkal, just as he does in the case of the Edomites ('Effigies at Medinet-abu,' as cited in Brugsch, Egypt under the Pharaohs, p. 332). Sayce (EHH p. 291) cites Hommel as having found a mention of the Zakkal on the coast near Dor, in a Babylonian document (WAI iv. 34, No. 2, lines 2, 6) of the 15th cent. B.C. The writers of the history in the OT certainly thought of the Philistines as well established in their country before the Exodus (Ex 13<sup>17</sup> 15<sup>14</sup> 23<sup>31</sup>, Jos 13<sup>2-3</sup> etc.). Whether they believed that the Philistines were in the land in the time of Abraham and Isaac is not so certain. They designate as Philistine both the land and the people of that date (Gn 21<sup>32-24</sup> 26<sup>1-8, 14, 15, 18</sup>), but it is easy to understand this as a mere geographical use of the term, or as proleptical. On the other hand, however, these Philistines are described as a military people (Gn 21<sup>22, 22</sup> 26<sup>26</sup>), and as having other resemblances to the Philistines of later times; and the proofs that the Philistine migration had not begun as early as the time of Abraham are not so decisive as many imagine.

Whenever the Philistine settlements began, they probably began on a relatively small scale. The immigrants came in successive expeditions, and not all at once. In certain matters they accepted the conditions of life which they found on the soil. They became owners of cattle if the people whom they conquered were owners of cattle, and raisers of crops if the conquered were agricultural people. If they conquered Egyptian tributaries, they accepted the suzerainty without which Egypt would have forthwith expelled them. They seem to have accepted the Semitic names of the cities they conquered. At all events, Gaza, Gath, Ashkelon, and several other cities of the region were known by the names still familiar to us, as early as the time of Amenhotep III. of Egypt (Tel el-Amarna letters). There were of them more men than women, and the marrying of native wives began at once. Their peculiar political organization, that of the šērānim, presumably grew up upon the soil. From the time of Ramses III. they were probably driven from the sea, isolated from their Greek kindred, and compelled to become a non-maritime people. Through these various changes of blood, institutions, government, and external relations, they became at length differentiated as a people by themselves.

The accounts of the conquest by Joshua make the impression that the Philistines were then in their five central cities, but that there were also in the region several independent petty Canaanitish kingdoms; that Israel at that time conquered most of the Canaanite kingdoms, although it failed to permanently hold some of them (Jos 16<sup>33, 41</sup> 11<sup>2, 3, 16</sup> 12<sup>12</sup> 15<sup>33-47</sup> 16<sup>3, 10</sup> etc.); but did not conquer the Philistine cities (Jos 13<sup>2-3</sup>), though Ekron, Ashdod, and Gaza are by the tenure of promise included in the inheritance of Judah (Jos 15<sup>45-47</sup> 13<sup>3</sup>). It is said that Judah, after Joshua's death, conquered Gaza, Ashkelon, and Ekron (Jg 1<sup>8</sup>), but that the Philistine cities were independent when the struggle of the conquest came to an end (Jg 3<sup>8</sup>).

The biblical records signalize four periods of oppression of Israel by the Philistines. The first is that in which Shamgar was the deliverer (Jg 3<sup>31</sup> 10<sup>11</sup>). This was in the time of the twenty years' oppression by Jabin and Sisera (Jg 4<sup>2-4</sup> 5<sup>6, 7</sup>). Presumably, a generation or two of prosperity had raised Israel to a position where he was formidable to his neighbours, and so a coalition was formed against him by the Philistines and the many peoples of the north. The Philistine pressure was mainly felt by Judah and Simeon, and it may account for the absence of these two from Deborah's roll-call of the tribes that marched against Jabin. We have no details of the Philistine operations, but there is a suggestion of a disarmament of their enemies, like that which was practised afterwards in the time of Saul (Jg 3<sup>31</sup> 5<sup>8</sup>).

The second Philistine oppression of Israel is that mentioned in Jg 10<sup>6, 7</sup> as occurring before the eighteen years of oppression by the Ammonites. Contrary to common opinion, the writer of this article holds that this was the oppression in which Samson distinguished himself (Jg 13<sup>2-16</sup>). It began, apparently, before Samson's birth (Jg 13<sup>5</sup>), while Tola was judge. In the time of Samson's wild youth it was so thoroughly a recognized fact (14<sup>4</sup> 15<sup>11</sup>) that it did not prevent relations between Israelite and Philistine families. It ceased when Samson was made judge, after the battle of Lehi (15<sup>14-20</sup>). During the twenty years of his public life, the Philistines kept on their own side of the border (16), even when plotting against him.

The third Philistine oppression was the one that lasted through the forty years that Eli was judge (1 S 4<sup>18</sup>, here regarded as corresponding to Jg 13<sup>4</sup>) and the twenty years that followed (1 S 7<sup>2</sup>). After the first horrors of conquest were over, the Israelites seem to have prospered under the yoke, if we may judge of the population by the size of the armies (1 S 4<sup>2, 10</sup> 11<sup>9</sup> 15<sup>4</sup>). This oppression ceased after Samuel became judge (1 S 7<sup>7-14</sup>). He defeated the Philistines in a decisive battle. He compelled them to surrender the cities in their country that belonged to Israel, that is, apparently, those that had formerly been Canaanite, and had been conquered by Israel. 'And the Philistines were subdued, and they came no more into the coasts of Israel; and the hand of the Lord was against the Philistines' as long as Samuel remained chief magistrate of Israel, a statement not inconsistent with 10<sup>5</sup> 13<sup>3, 19, 27</sup>.

The fourth oppression was that of the time of Saul. It began when Saul had been long enough on the throne for his son Jonathan to have grown to military age (1 S 13<sup>3</sup>). The account says that they invaded Israel with an army extraordinarily large (1 S 13<sup>5</sup>). Deal as we may with the numbers given, it appears that they had at that time great respect for the strength of Israel, and had gathered an immense body of allies to assist them. It turned out that their precaution was needless. Saul quarrelled with Samuel. His army melted away from him. With no resistance worthy of the name, the Philistines became masters, and plundered and disarmed Israel at will. Later, however, Israel rallied. During the remainder of his reign Saul waged a series of fierce battles with the oppressors. He perished in the battle of Gilboa, and the Philistine power over Israel became supreme (1 S 31).

Presumably both David and his northern competitor paid tribute to Philistia during the seven and a half years that he reigned over Judah (2 S 5<sup>5</sup>). Naturally, they interfered to prevent his becoming king over a united Israel. He defeated them in two desperate defensive campaigns (2 S 5<sup>17-25</sup>), and then, in four or more aggressive expeditions (2 S 8<sup>1</sup> 21<sup>15-22</sup>), reduced them to subjection.

In consequence of the disruption of the kingdom after the death of Solomon, the Philistines became independent, but they never re-established their earlier glory. We hear no more of their šērānim. Later, in the Assyrian times, they have a king for each of their cities (Zec 9<sup>5</sup>, Jer 25<sup>20</sup>, and many passages in the records of Sargon and his successors). In the same later times they seem to be engaged in commerce, dealing especially in Israelitish spoils and slaves (Am 1<sup>6-8</sup>, Jl 3<sup>4-8</sup>, cf. Ob 13, 14, 19, depending, however, on the date one assigns to Joel and Obadiah). Perhaps there are signs of a Greek revival among them (Jl 3<sup>8</sup>, and the Yavan of Sargon).

However their institutions changed, we have frequent mention of the Philistines themselves. Among the cities fortified by Rehoboam were Gath and Mareshah, etc. (2 Ch 11<sup>8</sup>). The Philistines warred with Israel for Gibbethon (1 K 15<sup>27</sup> 16<sup>15</sup>). They were celebrated for their oracles (2 K 1<sup>2</sup>) and their soothsayers (Is 2<sup>o</sup>). Some of them paid tribute to Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 17<sup>11</sup>), after whose death they raided Judah (21<sup>16, 17</sup>). Philistia was a refuge for fugitives when the invasions of Shalmaneser II., warring with Benhadad and his allies, caused famine in northern Israel (2 K 8<sup>2, 3</sup>). Hazael of Damascus captured Gath (2 K 12<sup>17</sup>). Ramman-nirāri III. of Assyria conquered Damascus and took tribute from the Philistines. At this point there is a wide gap in the Assyrian records. When they again become available, the Philistines, with a multitude of other nations between the Euphrates and the Mediterranean, have become independent of the Assyrian, and are again being reduced to subjection. Uzziah of Judah is especially prominent among the rebel kings. Later, by intrigue and by arms, Tiglath-pileser, to whom Ahaz of Judah was tributary, reduced Gaza and Ashkelon to tribute (B.C. 734). Under Sargon and Sennacherib there were two parties in the Philistine cities, the one favouring Assyria and the other favouring Hezekiah of Judah, and the latter was crushed. From Sargon to Assurbanipal the Assyrians have much to say concerning their Philistine conquests and subjects. The Philistine military operations of Uzziah and Hezekiah were doubtless connected with Assyrian politics (2 Ch 26<sup>6, 7</sup>, 2 K 18<sup>7, 8</sup>). Their mutual relations to the Assyrians account for the fact that the Israelite historians and prophets, from Amos to Ezekiel, speak of the Philistines sometimes with denunciation, as enemies, but also often as having a common interest (2 Ch 28<sup>18</sup>, Is 9<sup>12</sup> 11<sup>14</sup>, Am 1<sup>6-8</sup>, Mic 1<sup>10-13</sup>, Zeph 2<sup>4-7</sup>, Jer 47<sup>4-7</sup>, Ezk 16<sup>27, 27</sup> 25<sup>15, 16</sup>, Am 3<sup>9</sup> 6<sup>2</sup> 9<sup>7</sup>, Zec 9<sup>5-8</sup>, Jer 25<sup>18-20</sup>). Gath vanishes from the biblical records (except Mic 1<sup>10</sup>) from the time of its capture by Uzziah (2 Ch 26<sup>6</sup>), and is similarly absent from the Assyrian monuments.

The Philistines suffered greatly in the struggle between Egypt and Assyria, in the decades when the Assyrian power went down. Herodotus says that Psammitichus I. of Egypt, the contemporary of Manasseh and Josiah of Judah, took Ashdod after a siege of 29 years (ii. 157); that in the later part of his reign Scythian hordes plundered the temple of Venus at Ashkelon (i. 105); that his successor Necho, returning from the battle of Megiddo (when Josiah was slain, B.C. 608), captured Gaza (ii. 159); that when Cambyses invaded Egypt, about B.C. 525, Gaza and the whole coast belonged to the king of the Arabians (iii. 5).

This is practically the close of Philistine history, though the cities and some of the institutions long survived, and the region has been the scene of many interesting events. The Ashdodites came into collision with Nehemiah (Neh 4<sup>7</sup> 13<sup>23</sup>). Alexander the Great took Gaza from the Persians. Ptolemy Lagi did notable fighting there. In the Greek accounts of the Maccabean times the Allophaloi and the land of the Allophaloi figure prominently, and the land thus described is the Philistine country; but the persons called Allophaloi are any heathen in arms against Israel (e.g. 1 Mac 3-4). Sketches of the later history are given under the names of the respective cities.

PHILOLOGUS (Φιλολόγος).—The name of a Christian greeted by St. Paul in Ro 16<sup>15</sup> along with Julia, Nereus, Olympas, and others. The name is common among slaves and freedmen, and in inscriptions of the Imperial household (CIL vi. 4116). Philologus was commemorated with Patrobas (which see) on Nov. 4. Later legends about him will be found in Acta Sanctorum, Nov., ii. 1, p. 222.

PHILOSOPHY.—

Introduction: the place and function of philosophy; the relations between religion and philosophy; the periods of contact between them.

I. The Problem of Greek Philosophy.—1. First Stage: early Greek thinkers. 2. Second stage: the Sophists; Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle. 3. Third Stage: Stoics and Epicureans; Scepticism; Neoplatonism.

II. The Contact of Christianity with Greek Philosophy.—1. The Christian Unity: Christianity and Neoplatonism contrasted. 2. Christianity and the Greek dualism: (i.) the speculative problem; (ii.) the ethical problem. 3. The relation of Christian experience to Greek forms of thought. Reference to the conclusions of the 'historical' school.

The Place and Function of Philosophy.—Man lives, and man thinks about the life he lives. This is the essence of his constitution as man. He is under the constraint of his nature to re-think the life he lives. This is his distinction from the lower animals, who live, but do not think of their life. Admit that man is an animal, and has been produced by evolution. Admit even that there are traces of several mental faculties in the lower animals. Yet the fact remains that for man alone does life present itself as an object of reflexion. For man alone is experience a problem. Philosophy, speaking broadly, is the activity of thought brought to bear on experience as a whole. It is, in Schwegler's phrase, 'the thinking consideration of things.' It is implied in the very fact of experience being a problem that, throughout its manifold and diverse elements, there is a unity of thought, reason, or spirit. If it were not so, experience would not be a problem, for it would never have arisen as a whole out of the succession of separate sensations. It is the task of Philosophy to make explicit this unity which is implicit in human experience. We can see, therefore, in broad outline, the course which the history of Philosophy must take. It is a progress towards unity, towards a synthesis of elements, towards a view of human experience, with its varied contents, from one central standpoint.

The stages of this progress will be marked by the unifying principles which they severally employ. Such a principle, let us suppose, is reached. It serves to explain a number of the particular elements of experience, and to bring them into a harmony which shall be for the time satisfactory to thought and stimulating to action. Soon, however, it is found that this synthetic principle is not adequate to the complexity of life. Elements of experience come into view which refuse to be explained by the alleged universal principle. The harmony which was temporarily reached is broken. Tragic discord appears. The quest for unity has to be resumed with a deeper, sadder, insight, and a larger, more patient wisdom. As we review the history of Philosophy, accordingly, we see that no speculative system is final. Each system, in turn, has failed. We see, moreover, that Philosophy, if we choose to speak paradoxically, must always end in failure. It is the last result of thought to raise questions which thought alone cannot answer, to penetrate to discords which the energy of thought alone cannot reconcile. This very failure of Philosophy, however, is, in the highest sense, its success. Want of finality in Philosophy, inability to comprehend the variety of experience in one formula, is not a mark of weakness, but of strength. It means that thought is not content with abstractions, but is resolute to face the facts of life in their fulness and their mystery. It is essentially the quest for a synthesis of life. The success of the quest consists in so deepening the problem that it is seen that no merely intellectual synthesis is possible. The problem of Philosophy merges into the problem of Religion; and Philosophy points beyond itself.

Religion and Philosophy thus present many features of resemblance and contrast, and have close and intricate mutual relations. Religion provides the solution which Philosophy seeks. That which is the quest of Philosophy is the realized experience of Religion, a unity in which the profoundest differences in life are actually reconciled, which leaves nothing beyond itself to confound the human spirit, but brings all elements of experience into a perfect spiritual harmony.

Towards religious experience, Philosophy renders a service which is at once apologetic and critical, and is in both aspects helpful and indeed indispensable. Philosophy vindicates the validity and reasonableness of religion. In the words of the Master of Balliol, it provides 'a vindication of the religious consciousness—the consciousness of the infinite—as presupposed in that very consciousness of the finite which at present often claims to exclude it altogether, or to reduce it to an empty apotheosis of the unknown and unknowable' (E. Caird, Essays on Literature and Philosophy, vol. i. p. 224). Philosophy at the same time has to consider the form in which this religious experience at any particular epoch clothes itself. And if it shall appear that the form contradicts the universality and comprehensiveness of the experience of which it is the expression, and is, therefore, falsifying and imperiling that experience, Philosophy must ruthlessly assail that form, and break it up, in name of that principle of reconciliation which is the inspiration and the goal both of thought and action. Religion holds an analogous position toward Philosophy, and has a work to do in its behalf, both constructive and critical. Religion discovers the principle for which Philosophy has been seeking, and exhibits it, not as a theory, but as a power, in the freshness and originality of actual life, transforming character and inspiring service. Philosophy, sinking into exhaustion through the inadequacy of the synthesis which it has reached, is rejuvenated at the fountain of religious experience, and is enabled to meet the deepening complexity of its problem with a more comprehensive and more detailed explanation. Religion at the same time has to consider the intellectual synthesis to which its own inspiration has given birth. And if it shall appear that this synthesis has omitted some element in the problem, and has obtained an appearance of harmony by neglecting some source of discord, and is thus stopping the progress of thought short of its goal, Religion must resist the claim of this Philosophy to be absolute, must emphasize the neglected elements of the problem, and must proclaim again the harmony which triumphs over the discords of life,—a harmony found not in intellectual formulae, but in the verifiable realities of spiritual experience. It follows that Philosophy and Religion can never in their inner meaning be opposed to one another. They are both necessities of the human spirit. Both alike presuppose the spiritual unity which pervades experience, and makes possible both thought and life. Each has its special function in apprehending and realizing this unity; and in their respective functions each is essential to the other. Those periods in which they come into close and conspicuous contact are peculiarly interesting in the history of each. The most important of these occurred in the beginning of the Christian era. In that period, Greek philosophy reached the goal of its long development. In this article we desire to show what that goal was, and how, in reaching it, Greek philosophy asked a question to which Christianity brought the only adequate answer.

I. THE PROBLEM OF GREEK PHILOSOPHY.—The movement of Greek thought falls into three well-marked stages. In the first of these, the principle of explanation is sought beyond consciousness. In the second, a spiritual principle has been won, and is used for the comprehension of all existence, and the erection of a system of encyclopædic knowledge. In the third, thought retreats to the standpoint of the individual; the problem of knowledge is raised in its acutest form; the exhaustion of Philosophy overtakes it, and an intense demand is made for a religious solution.

1. First Stage.—The early Greek thinker looks out upon nature with joyous curiosity, and asks, 'What is the principle which underlies these multitudinous phenomena?' The earliest philosophies contain brief dogmatic answers to this question. They are not valuable in themselves; but they are interesting as stating the problem of Philosophy, and indicating the goal of thought. They are divided into four schools. The Ionic School identified the explanation of all things with one element in nature, saying with Thales (B.C. 640–550), 'all is water'; or with Anaximander (B.C. 611–547), 'all is matter,' τὸ ἀπειρον; or with Anaximenes (B.C. 588–524), 'all is air.' The Pythagorean School passed from substance to the proportion which all things bear to one another, and taught that 'all is number.' The Eleatic School passed still further on the path of abstraction, from 'substance' and 'number' to 'being,' saying with Xenophanes (B.C. 576–480), 'all is one.' The Physicists, in reaction from this abstractness, sought to analyze existence into its material elements. This period closes with Anaxagoras (B.C. 500–428). His great distinction as a thinker is that he relies on the principle of reason, νοῦς, as the principle of explanation. Νοῦς is a world-forming intelligence, acting on the primitive constituents of matter. Thus the first stage in the great movement of Greek philosophy has brought us to a spiritual principle. This is its great achievement, the splendid heritage it hands on to succeeding generations of thinkers. But along with this it also hands on another and less satisfactory heritage, viz. dualism, the opposition of the spiritual and the material, Thought and Extension.

2. Second Stage.—At the period of Greek history at which we have now arrived, about the middle of the 5th cent. B.C., we notice that the interest of thought is turning from the outer world of nature to the inner world of the human spirit. Thought, accordingly, becomes anthropological, and seeks the ultimate principles of truth, not beyond, but within man's consciousness of himself.

(a) The Sophists.—By these men this new departure in the development of Philosophy is inaugurated. One of the most famous of them is Protagoras of Abdera (c. 440 B.C.), a pure subjectivist, who taught that there is no absolute standard either of truth or right. Nothing is good or bad by nature (φύσει), but merely by statute (νόμῳ). Another is Gorgias (c. 427 B.C.), who taught a rigorous individualism, summed up in a series of paradoxes. Nothing exists; or, if something exists, it cannot be known; or, if it can be known, it cannot be communicated. The work of the Sophists was destructive, and often ethically mischievous, but it was necessary, as a preparation for the great forward movement which Greek philosophy was now to take. Their merit is that they have claimed on behalf of man that the principle which is to explain experience must be in harmony with his self-consciousness. Their defect is that they have construed man too poorly, and have regarded self-consciousness as little more than individual opinion or feeling.

(b) Socrates (B.C. 469-399).—In one sense Socrates is a Sophist. He occupies the position of subjectivity, and is a keen critic of conventional customs, institutions, and dogmas. His aim, however, is always positive. He desires to break through mere opinion in order that he may reach universal principles of thought and action. His method accordingly has a double aspect. It is destructive, an 'irony' by which he destroys the conceit of knowledge and convinces of ignorance, which is the 'original' sin of the Socratic theology; but it is also constructive, an obstetric process, whereby universal truth is brought to the birth, and instinct is raised to the rank of clear self-consciousness. In a word, his method is induction, the process whereby is discerned in a mass of particulars what is universal, and therefore fundamental and true. The last result of this method is condensed into the famous Socratic phrase, 'Virtue is knowledge,' knowledge of universal principles of thought and action. In Socrates the problem of Greek philosophy has deepened so as to include the element of man's conscious life. It has become a moral, even a religious problem, how to live life whole, and reach a complete synthesis of experience. Socrates finds the answer in Thought or the Universal. His gospel is 'Salvation by Wisdom.' Defective as it was, the teaching of Socrates declared the supreme worth of man as a spiritual being. It gave direction to the whole subsequent course of Greek thought, till at length the problem became too complex for the Socratic solution.

(c) Plato (B.C. 427-347) and Aristotle (B.C. 385-322).—Socrates attempted no systematization of thought. He was content with enunciating and illustrating a principle. It was the work of Plato and Aristotle to take the Socratic primacy of thought, and from this standpoint to frame systems of knowledge. Their systems have been called 'splendid digressions.' This would be incorrect if it meant that they were not in the main current of Greek thought. It is true, however, that one element prominent in Socrates is lost in them, to reappear with yet stronger emphasis in the post-Aristotelian thinkers, viz. subjectivity. They treat thought as a universal organ. Man as an individual falls into the background. Their problem is that of all Philosophy, to find a unity that shall reconcile all differences; but among these the self-assertion of the individual and the claim of the particular have not found their place.

The Socratic universal principles are in Plato 'ideas,' which are reached by 'reminiscence,' and form the archetypes of all things. Supreme among the ideas is the Good, the ultimate reality, the common ground of all thought and being. The Good is God; but for Plato the question of the personality of God has not arisen. He is moving in the pure ether of speculation, high above the strife and tragedy which make men so eagerly demand or so passionately deny a personal God. Aristotle occupies the same ground as Plato in holding that the universal is the real. But he has a deeper interest than Plato in the phenomenal and the particular. His aim is to bring the universal and particular together, and to exhibit them in their true relations. The formula he uses is that of Form and Matter, εἶδος and ὑλη. Form acts as a plastic artist, taking up the rude amorphous matter, and transforming or rather forming it into actuality. Not only so, but this relation has stages: that which is Form to what is beneath it, being Matter to what is above it. Thus there is a chain of being with mere Matter at one end and pure Form at the other. Pure Form originates the whole movement of existence, but is itself unmoved. It is Thought, in its pure activity, having no object but itself, Very Thought of Very Thought, νόησις νοήσεως. Thus the high level of Greek speculation is theism, not that of the Hebrews with its ethical content, but a theism of thought, in which God abides by Himself in the bliss of perfect knowledge.

Both in Plato and in Aristotle the Unity is magnificent, but it is incomplete. The dualism of Anaxagoras is not yet exorcised. The phenomenal and the individual still fall apart from this sublime transcendental Thought. They must receive their proper place before a true unity can be reached, and when it is, it will not be merely intellectual.

3. Third Stage.—In this, the closing period of Greek philosophy, a great change has come over the ancient world. It is the age of world-wide empire, crushing out the earlier civic life. It is therefore also the age of individualism.

In Plato and Aristotle we are aware of an aloofness from the problems that most interest us; but in the post-Aristotelian philosophies we find an affinity with our modes of thought and our general attitude toward life which make them interesting and valuable, though speculatively they are beneath the level of the great encyclopædic systems which immediately preceded them. The Philosophy of this period is intensely and increasingly occupied with the needs of man. To begin with, it is essentially Ethic, and this Ethic is meant to suffice man for religion. As it advances, it becomes more and more religious, till in the end, in Neoplatonism it is avowedly Religion. The systems of this period all logically connect themselves with elements to be found in Aristotle. In Aristotle we have still the Greek dualism unreconciled. Form and Matter, Reason and Sense, are still in opposition. Accordingly we find: (a) one system which makes Reason its ruling principle; (b) another which chooses Sense for its keynote; (c) a third which chooses either element to contradict and destroy the other; (d) finally, a system which strives to rise above the antagonism of elements, and makes a leap for unity.

(a) The first is Stoicism, which regards the soul of the universe as rational, and gives to it the significant title of the Logos. Of this rational whole of things, man is part. He finds salvation, accordingly, in living according to nature, taking his place at the standpoint of all governing Reason. Thus all things work together for his good. Stoicism, to its eternal honour, lays hold of human personality, and attributes to it absolute independence and infinite worth. In this aspect it approximates to Christianity, and formed a mental and moral discipline which prepared the Roman world for the preaching of the gospel. At the same time, Stoicism failed as a redemptive power in the fast-growing corruption of the Roman world. It is 'Salvation by Wisdom,' limited, therefore, to the few, and precarious even in them. Reason fails as a reconciling, unifying principle. See STOICS.

(b) The second is Epicureanism, which frankly makes matter the ground of all things, sense the ultimate principle of knowledge and action. The Epicurean, like the Stoic, said, 'Live according to nature'; but nature, as he conceived it, was material only, and the end of a life within its limits is no more than pleasure. Such a principle does not necessarily lead to vice; but it may lead to this as well as to virtue; and in any case it fails to organize life into a whole, or quicken it with sustained energy. Epicureanism is the intellectual expression of the decay of moral life in the Roman world. See EPICUREANS.

(c) The third is Scepticism, which, by keeping rigidly to the individualism which was common alike to Stoicism and Epicureanism, showed that no absolute truth of knowledge, no authoritative rule of action, is possible. Thought and life are reduced to the mere play of opinion and impulse. The only possible attitude toward reality is mere suspense of judgment. Such a position is paralysis both mental and spiritual. Scepticism makes articulate the despair which was brooding over the hearts of men. It is the last utterance of Philosophy, and it is the demand for Religion.

(d) The fourth is Neoplatonism. The life of man had become hopeless. The demand of the age, therefore, is not now Wisdom for the conduct of life, but Salvation, σωτηρία, escape from the dissatisfaction of this life, emergence into a higher sphere. To this demand Neoplatonism makes response. It is at once the climax and the destruction of Greek philosophy. In it Thought, the mighty force which had led the human spirit in its quest for unity, breaks down, and gives up the reins of government. After Neoplatonism barbarism followed, and would have followed more disastrously than it did, had not Christianity succeeded to the place vacated by Greek philosophy. The real advance of Neoplatonism on all preceding systems consists in its conception of the speculative and practical problem. The old Greek dualism of Form and Matter is deepened, and is transformed into that of God and the World, the Infinite and the Finite, Good and Evil. It is thus specifically a religious problem; and Neoplatonism is avowedly a religious solution, a Philosophy which takes up all religions into itself, and claims to be the Absolute Religion. The great precursor of Neoplatonism is Philo Judæus. Its chief exponent is Plotinus (A. D. 204-270).

It is impossible here to give any adequate account of the systems of these men, or of the many systems elaborated through the opening centuries of the Christian era. They all occupy the same standpoint, and exhibit many resemblances in their treatment of the problem which they all alike are designed to solve.

It is important, however, to note the three great doctrines into which all Neoplatonic systems may be condensed.

(i.) The Doctrine of God.—God is transcendent, the Absolute, the Original (τὸ πρῶτον), the Unlimited (ἄπειρον). To Him no finite predicates are applicable. He is beyond all determination by human thought. If we attribute to Him power or goodness, it must be remembered that these designations cannot express His real nature.

(ii.) The Doctrine of the World.—Between God and the World, the Infinite and the Finite, there is a great gulf, which Neoplatonism proceeds to fill up with variously conceived schemes of emanation. From the Infinite height there is a descent through less and less perfect beings, till at length crass matter is reached. Only by some such machinery would Neoplatonism allow that God could possibly be the source of material existence.

(iii.) The Doctrine of Man.—Man has in him a spark of the divine. He lies, however, immersed in the sensuous sphere. Salvation for him, therefore, consists in escaping from this sphere and rising into that supersensuous sphere to which he truly belongs. This escape is accomplished in a process of purification (κάθαρσις) by means of ascetic discipline.

To such a system had the long evolution of Greek thought arrived, when Christianity went forth on its mission. With this system Christianity was confronted as its chief antagonist.

II. THE CONTACT OF CHRISTIANITY WITH GREEK PHILOSOPHY.—1. THE CHRISTIAN UNITY. Into the Hellenic world, torn as it was with divisions, hysterically eager for intellectual and moral satisfaction, Christianity entered with the claim to be the unity which men of Hellenic culture, and human hearts everywhere, required and sought for. It differed profoundly, however, from Neoplatonism or any such system, both in the interpretation which it put on the problem and in the nature of the solution it proposed.

(a) The Christian interpretation of the intellectual problem and of the moral need of men. Beneath the opposition of elements, Form and Matter, Infinite and Finite, which was the deepest conception Greek thought had formed of the problem of life, Christianity pierces to antagonism of wills, the personal will of man in revolt from, and out of harmony with, the personal will of God. This is the hurt of the human soul; this is the secret also of the world's pain and unrest. Greek thought never did justice to personality. Pantheism drew the Hellenic mind like a magnet. Its goal was ever absorption of personal life in the wide sea of impersonal being. The hindrance to such a consummation always lay outside the constitution of man, in the material environment of his soul. Christianity boldly grasped the fact of personality; had for its goal the fullness of personal life in communion with a personal God; and saw the hindrance to this consummation within the personal life itself. Evil, the barrier to unity of God and man, is not outside of man, in the material framework in which he finds himself, but within man, in the determination of his will against the divine will.

(b) The nature of the Christian solution. In one word, it was Christ. Christianity, whose keynote, like that of Neoplatonism, is unity, whose phraseology often resembles that of Neoplatonism, differs from it by the whole diameter of mental culture and spiritual experience. It approaches the human spirit, not with a theory, scheme, or process, but with a gospel, a declaration whose sum and substance is Christ Jesus, incarnate, crucified, risen. Holding steadfastly before the eyes of men, as the ultimate problem of life, the reconciliation of wills, human and divine, it proclaims the problem solved, the reconciliation achieved through Christ. Christ is God Incarnate, not a man who has reached the highest point in a process of κάθαρσις, but God, who, in order to effect the reconciliation of man, has entered into humanity, and taken it into union with Himself. The long quest of man for God had ended on the verge of an impassable gulf, across which he vainly sought to cast a rainbow bridge of fair images. In the Incarnation, God of His own proper motion crosses the gulf, and by His own act annihilates the distance. Christ has died for men. That which holds God and man apart is not the frailty of man, as though that could be any real hindrance to spiritual and personal fellowship, or as though the removal of it could secure that fellowship. On this rock Neoplatonism wrecked itself as a redemptive power. The root and secret of man's inability to reach God is sin. He does not need to make himself divine in order to hold communion with God. He does need to be delivered from the burden of guilt. This deliverance has come through the sacrificial death of Christ. Guilt is not a feeling of uneasiness at the division man finds in his own nature. It is the consciousness of alienation from God. Sin is not an element in man's subjectivity, a moment in the process whereby he rises out of individualism. It is an objective reality of the spiritual world, which must be taken out of the way before the human spirit can be at one with God. Christ has done this in the deed of sin-bearing. Christ is risen. His life, while lifted above time and space, is continued in organic union with those who occupy time and space. He raises them through personal union with Himself into union with God. He in them is the source of a life whose spirit is sonship, whose privilege is communion, whose goal is likeness. The occasional ecstasy, which was the highest privilege possible under Neoplatonism, is replaced by a daily fellowship, without ecstasy but with true and abiding intimacy, open not to a few accomplished spirits, but to all who come to God through Christ.

With this the Christian solution is complete. The problem, constituted by antagonism of the human will to the divine, is solved at length.

2. CHRISTIANITY AND THE GREEK DUALISM.—Greek Philosophy, as we have seen in the foregoing sketch, was haunted by a dualism which it sought in vain to overcome. The secret of the failure lay in not conceiving the dualism profoundly enough. Christianity penetrates beneath the dualism of elements to antagonism of wills. The Greek problem lies within the Christian problem. The Christian solution is at the same time also the solution of the Greek problem. This does not mean that Christianity is a philosophy, or has its truth bound up with any special metaphysical system. It is a Religion. But it is a religion which provides the unity sought for by Philosophy.* It contains, therefore, implicitly the answer to the question raised by Philosophy.

(i.) The speculative problem. The Greek mind presupposed the irreconcilability of form and matter. The utmost effort in the direction of reconciliation was that made by Neoplatonism, the filling up of the gulf by a series of emanations. The Christian teachers, surveying the long toil of the Greeks after wisdom, said in effect, 'The ultimate dualism is not that of form and matter; it is that of the divine and human wills. What hinders man from reaching God is not his material environment, but his sin. Christ has taken away the sin of man. The Incarnate Christ may be reached by any human soul, immediately, at a step, a touch, a look. And when Christ is reached, God is reached.' They found, however, that the Greek mind was hag-ridden by phrases and formulæ, Pleroma, Logos, and what not, all implying the impossibility of getting to God except by a clumsy machinery of emanations. They therefore boldly adopted this nomenclature and baptized it into Christ.

What was supposed to be done by emanations, etc., and never really was done, has been done by Christ. He that hath seen Him hath seen the Father. Do they speak of the Pleroma? He is the Pleroma (so in Colossians). Do they speak of the Logos? He is the Logos (so in the Fourth Gospel). These Greek philosophic terms do not indicate that the Christian leaders who use them are sitting at the feet of Greek metaphysicians. The NT conveys a thought which had another origin than the speculations of a Philo; but, entering the Greek world at the time it did, it uses the terms which expressed the endeavour of the Greek mind,

* The reference in Col 2<sup>8</sup> is not to be regarded as a condemnation by the apostle of Philosophy in itself. It has in view a definite form of teaching, easily recognizable by the first readers of the Epistle, though affording matter of inquiry and discussion in later times. This teaching was probably of a theosophic Jewish Christian character, not without relation, as Lightfoot and others have shown, to the Gnostic Judaism of the Essenes (see art. COLOSSIANS). Bengel's remark is apposite, 'Philosophia in se est medium quiddam: sed tamen facilius abusus ad fraudem, in ea præsertim philosophia Judaica, quam tum jactabant et puritati fidei attemperare conabantur' (Gnomon N.T. in loc.) to carry the truth which the Greek mind despaired of reaching. In other words, Christianity, not by emanations or by hypostatized abstractions, but by the living Christ, lifts men to a central standpoint, and enables them to look out on experience as a unity, and to see even in its most material elements no remote antithesis to God, but the manifestation of His mind, the instrument of His purpose. God is self-revealing Spirit. The universe is spiritual to its core. Christ has abolished dualism. Christianity, it cannot be too much insisted on, is not a philosophy; but it is the inspiration and the goal of all philosophy.

(ii.) The practical problem. The Greek dualism haunts Greek ethic, and sets Reason and Sense in eternal opposition. The senses, seated in man's material frame, form the great hindrance to virtue. Greek ethic, accordingly, resolves itself very much into various plans for the disposal of the sensual element in man's nature. Neoplatonism preaches the elimination of sense by an ascetic discipline, which shall gradually set the spiritual nature of man free from all perturbation by the senses. Stoicism proclaims the dominion of reason over the passions. Man is to be a despot in the domain of his nature, crushing every uprising of sense with the proud might of reason. Aristotelianism, breathing the classic spirit of Hellenism, teaches that reason is to use sense as an artist uses the material with which he works, and by means of which he elaborates an artistic product.

Tracing evil to the senses as a given element in man's constitution, Greek ethic never deepens toward conviction of sin, has no need or room for redemption, and remains always proud and self-sufficient. Christianity by a deeper analysis traces evil, not to sense as an element in man's constitution, but to will, i.e. to the man himself in revolt from God. It therefore accumulates upon man responsibility for moral evil, and deeply humbles him before God. Christian morality, accordingly, has the note of humility and contrition which is absent from Greek ethic. It also exalts man, and holds out to him hope of an attainment far higher than was possible under Greek ethic. Let his will be yielded to God and made one with the divine will. He is then at once placed in a position which is central and supreme. His whole nature, including his material frame, is now a domain wherein the will of God is being progressively realized. The painful and precarious treatment of sense as an alien element is replaced by a process by which every element in man's complex nature is brought into harmony. This process has its human side, requiring strength of will and strenuousness of purpose. It is conducted, however, in the might of a divine energy, and its product, the Christian character, is not a manufactured article in which man may pride himself, but a creation, the work of the Divine Spirit operating immediately upon the surrendered spirit of man.

3. THE RELATION OF CHRISTIAN EXPERIENCE TO GREEK FORMS OF THOUGHT.—The after-relations of Christian faith to Greek forms of thought have been made a subject of close and prolonged investigation by the modern school of historical criticism of which Harnack is the great representative, and of which Hatch and McGiffert are leading English examples. The work of this school is of priceless value in respect of its pure historical research. But in so far as it is dominated by certain presuppositions, and is determined by a certain preconceived idea, it seems to the present writer to be mistaken in its results. That dogma is 'in its conception and development a product of the Greek spirit on the soil of the gospel' (Harnack) may in a sense be admitted. At the same time, care must be taken in the application of such a principle to do justice to the original content of the gospel with which later reflections had to deal. In the hands of certain members of the school it may be doubted whether this is secured. In the Hibbert Lecture of the late Dr. Hatch, the problem, as conceived by these writers, is expressed with a clearness which leaves nothing to be desired, viz. 'Why an ethical sermon stood in the forefront of the teaching of Jesus, and a metaphysical creed in the forefront of the Christianity of the 4th cent.?' The conclusion to which the brilliant ability and ripe scholarship of the author are devoted is, that this change, being 'coincident with the transference of Christianity from a Semitic to a Greek soil,' is 'the result of Greek influence.' In plain words, primitive Christianity was simple ethical teaching regarding God and duty, undisturbed by intellectual problems, and absolutely free from speculative elements. Theology, as embodied in the great creeds, is a superstructure of mischievous metaphysics reared by the fruitless subtlety of the Greek intellect, which must be swept away before genuine Christianity can be revealed in pristine beauty and power.

Obviously, then, the question is as to the nature of primitive Christianity. Is it true that it was ethical merely? Is it true that its essence is summed up in the Sermon on the Mount? Is it permissible to lay aside every element in the NT that is not rigidly and exclusively 'ethical'? Is it fair to state the problem as being the transition from the Sermon on the Mount to the Nicene Creed? If the problem be misleading, the conclusions cannot fail to be erroneous. In order to reduce the problem to the simplicity and narrowness of the above statement, the following positions must be maintained. (1) Jesus Christ cannot have been more than a unique religious personality, with deep and true moral instincts, and a high degree of spiritual-mindedness. He cannot have made Himself the centre of His message. His declarations regarding His second coming must have been an afterthought, due to the discovery on His part that His mission was to end in His being rejected and put to death. Here we have to ask: (a) Is this a fair account of the Jesus of the Gospels? Can the personality of Christ as presented in those narratives be reduced to the outlines of such a sketch? Take the picture of Jesus drawn by the historical school and place it beside that given in the Gospels, and say if they are duplicates. If that of the historical school be correct, then that of the Gospels is not merely incorrect in certain features, but is a sheer monstrosity, which invalidates the whole Gospel narrative, and makes it valueless for purposes of sober history. (b) Is it fair to ignore the self-consciousness of Jesus as gathered into His most pregnant sayings? On what principles of historic research is it permissible to discount the self-assertion of Jesus? Has the Self of Jesus not such a place even in that very Sermon on the Mount as to give an entirely different view of the sermon itself, and an entirely different reading of the problem 'from the Sermon on the Mount to the Nicene Creed'? (2) The religion of the primitive disciples must have been simply Jewish Unitarianism and Jewish Legalism, modified in some of their elements by the teaching of Jesus regarding God and duty. Here again the question is as to matter of fact. Is this the whole truth regarding the first generation of Christians? Is this account a fair interpretation of the narrative in the Acts? Can the life and work of the early Church, its worship, its preaching, its missionary impulse, its labours and martyrdoms, be made intelligible on such a supposition? In particular, is it fair to discount the place which the Risen Christ had in the faith of the early Church? Why was He worshipped, prayed to, trusted, served, and that long before Hellenic influence had touched the Church's creed? Give due weight to the self-consciousness of Jesus, estimate aright the place of the Risen Christ in the life of the early Christians; and the positions of Hatch and McGiffert must be profoundly modified. (3) The conceptions of Christ to be found in the NT writings must be due to peculiarities in the intellectual history of their authors, and cannot express anything in the general belief of Christians. On the face of it, such a proposition is utterly improbable. The NT writings are chiefly letters between correspondents. Whatever may have been the intellectual idiosyncrasies of the writers, it is inconceivable that they do not express a consciousness common to writers and recipients. Indeed, this is expressly claimed by the writers, and Paul insists that his teaching is simply the faith of Christian people as such. The existence of a Pauline or Johannine Christianity which was not that of the Church at large, and, in particular, was not the Christianity of Christ, is an unproved hypothesis, not warranted by the known facts of the NT period, and not required for their interpretation.

If, then, the NT as a whole is substantially correct, both in its narratives of events and in its interpretation of them, the problem for the historian is not 'from the Sermon on the Mount to the Nicene Creed,' but 'from the NT as a whole to the Nicene Creed.' The question at issue is, 'Is there anything in the Nicene Creed which, in respect of the truth sought to be expressed, is not already in the New Testament?'

Go back now to the moral and intellectual situation of the age in which Christianity appeared. Greek philosophy has led men to a fundamental dualism, and has uttered the demand of the human spirit for union with God. Neoplatonism, the last despairing effort of Greek thought, fails to meet the demand. Christianity enters the Hellenic world with the proclamation of that for which Hellenic thought had sought in vain, union with God. This, accomplished in Christ, is its message to the Hellenic world, and to the heart of man as such. A mere amended Judaism would have had no point of contact with the Greek mind, or with the spirit of man anywhere. The personal Christ, Son of God and Son of Man, is the centre of the primitive gospel.

Conceive now Christianity entering the Hellenic world; it will bear a twofold relation to Hellenic culture and to Greek forms of thought. (a) It will be influenced by them. It is implicitly the solution of the problem of Greek philosophy. It will thus naturally use the terminology of Greek philosophy, and fill the formulæ of unsuccessful thought with the meanings of a divine revelation. (b) It will stiffly refuse to be coerced by them. The Christian idea of union with God, viz. reconciliation through a Person, utterly transcended Greek thought. Again and again, in the centuries preceding Nicea, the attempt was made to reduce Christianity to a phase of Greek Philosophy. Sabellianism on the one hand, Arianism on the other, were more logically consistent as speculative systems than the fulness of the gospel. Yet Christianity declined to surrender its independence. In the end the Christian experience was gathered into the Nicene Creed, which, in effect, is this: Christianity, stating, in terms borrowed from Greek Philosophy, that which is too great for any system of philosophy, a truth distinctive, unique, a revelation, not a discovery.

PHINEHAS (פִּינְחָס, LXX Φινεές).—1. Son of Eleazar, and his successor in the high priesthood, Ex 6<sup>25</sup>, 1 Ch 6<sup>4</sup>.<sup>60</sup>, Ezr 7<sup>5</sup>, 1 Es 8<sup>2</sup>, 2 Es 1<sup>2</sup>. The circumstance by which Phinehas is chiefly remembered (Nu 25) bears a striking analogy to the most decisive crisis in the life of St. Peter. The great confession at Caesarea-Philippi was scarcely more significant and epoch-making in the growth of Christian discipleship than was that act of fiery zeal at Shittim in the history of the Old Covenant, when for the first time the Mosaic religion came into collision with Baal worship, its future rival. In both cases we have, 'in the fulness of the time,' a great moral decision to be made of world importance, 'Jehovah or Baal,' 'but whom say ye that I am?' Alike at Shittim and at Caesarea, amidst a general hesitancy and failure to grasp the situation, there is a prompt response on the part of one alone, followed by the pronouncement on that one of a signal blessing of far-reaching import. When 'Israel joined himself unto Baal-peor' it was no ordinary revolt or murmuring. Something more was needed 'to make atonement' than the official execution by man of 'all the chiefs of the people,' or even than the visitation of a plague by God. The Divine want was satisfied by the personal devotion of the young priest who, while others wept helplessly, identified himself with 'the Lord whose name is Jealous' ('He was jealous with my jealousy among them'), and determined for ever the rightful attitude of a whole-hearted servant of J<sup>h</sup> towards any encroachments of the abominable idolatries of the heathen. Accordingly we find that the slaying of Zimri and Cozbi was ever after one of the proud and stimulating memories of Israel's past history. In the psalmist's retrospect (Ps 106<sup>30</sup>.<sup>31</sup>) Phinehas, it is implied, was a second Abraham. His deed of faith 'was counted unto him for righteousness, unto all generations for evermore.' The son of Sirach in his 'praise of famous men' stamps Phinehas as 'the third in glory' after Moses and Aaron, 'in that he was zealous in the fear of the Lord, and stood fast in the good forwardness of his soul when the people turned away, and he made reconciliation for Israel' (Sir 45<sup>23</sup>-<sup>25</sup>). The slaughter of the apostate Jew and of the king's commissioner at the hands of Mattathias, which initiated the Maccabæan revolt, recalls to the historian the example of Phinehas, and, in his dying exhortation to his sons, Mattathias reminds them how 'Phinehas our father, for that he was zealous exceedingly, obtained the covenant of an everlasting priesthood' (1 Mac 2<sup>26</sup>.<sup>54</sup>). With respect to this covenant, reasons have been given under the article ABIATHAR for believing that the promise to Phinehas of an everlasting priesthood was conditional, as are all the promises of God, and that, in fact, Abiathar was his last direct representative. The other notices of Phinehas in the Bible history are of lesser importance. Nu 31<sup>6</sup> (P) states that he accompanied the punitive expedition against Midian, not as commander (Jos. Ant. iv. vii. 1), but in his priestly capacity, 'with the vessels of the sanctuary and the trumpets for the alarm in his hand,' in accordance with the law (Nu 10<sup>8</sup>.<sup>9</sup>; cf. 2 Ch 13<sup>12</sup>). He was leader and spokesman of the deputation from the western tribes to the eastern concerning the erection of the altar Ed (Jos 22<sup>13</sup>.<sup>30</sup>-<sup>32</sup>); and in Jg 20<sup>28</sup> the civil war between Benjamin and the other tribes is incidentally stated to have occurred during his high priesthood, and that the ark was then at Bethel (so also Jos. Ant. v. ii. 10), not at Shiloh as previously and subsequently (Jos 18<sup>1</sup>, 1 S 4<sup>3</sup>). Ewald (III ii. 313) notes that the estate given to Eleazar (Jos 24<sup>33</sup>), being called Gibeath-phinehas, is 'a proof that in popular estimation he ranked even higher than his father.' For this place see art. GIBEAH, 3. According to 1 Ch 9<sup>20</sup> Phinehas at one time had been superintendent of the Korahite gate-keepers. 'The sons of Phinehas' (Ezr 8<sup>2</sup>, 1 Es 8<sup>2</sup>, 1 Es 5<sup>b</sup>) seems to mean the clan of priests who elsewhere are called sons of Eleazar.

It remains that a brief mention should be made of the legends that gather round Phinehas in Rabbinical literature. His grandfather Putiel (Ex 6<sup>25</sup>) was identified with Jethro by an absurd etymology, and Phinehas, before his great exploit, had been constantly reproached with his Midianite origin (Sota, Gemara, viii. 6, ed. Wagenseil and Targ. of Jonathan). In the Targ. of Jonathan on Nu 25, twelve signs testify to a Divine interposition in the death of Zimri and Cozbi, and the promise of God receives this remarkable addition: 'I will make him the angel of the covenant, that he may live for ever to proclaim redemption at the end of the days.' A combination of this legend with Mal 4<sup>5</sup> is the probable origin of the widespread belief in the identity of Phinehas with Elijah (Fabricius, Cod. pseudepig. Vet. Test. ch. 170; Seder Olam, ed. Meyer, pp. 261, 845). He was also identified with the anonymous prophet of Jg 6<sup>8</sup> (Seder Olam, ch. xx.) and with the prophet who denounced Eli (Jerome, Qu. Heb. on 1 S 2<sup>27</sup>). Eusebius (Chron. An. 860) blunderingly identifies Phinehas with Eli. Phinehas was also said to have been the author of the last verse of the Book of Joshua, and of an explanation of sacred names (Fabricius, l.c.).

2. Younger son of Eli, 1 S 1<sup>8</sup>. Jos. (Ant. v. xi. 2) says that his father had resigned the office of high priesthood to him on account of his old age. It is true that the biblical narrative implies throughout that Hophni and Phinehas performed the active functions of the priesthood, but there seems no other ground for this supposed abdication in favour of the younger son than the fact that the succeeding high priests were descended from him. Hophni was probably childless. Two sons of Phinehas are mentioned, Ahitub (1 S 14<sup>3</sup>) and Ichabod (1 S 4<sup>21</sup>). On the other hand, it is almost certain that in 2 Es 1<sup>2</sup> this Phinehas is reckoned among the high priests. That list alone inserts Heli, Phinees, and Achias (i.e. Ahijah) between Amariah and Ahitub. This is evidently an attempt to make a complete list by adding Eli and his successors, who are ignored in Ch, Ezr, and 1 Es. This is not the place to moralize on the excesses of Phinehas and his brother, or on their indulgent father's dignified but feeble remonstrances, or on their miserable death. Their ritual irregularity, however, demands an explanation. They committed two distinct breaches of the law. (a) It seems clear that 'the memorial,' which in animal peace-offerings was the inner fat (Lv 3), was always burnt on the altar first; that is, the Lord received His portion before either priest or offerer took theirs. (b) The portion of the animal due to the priest was strictly defined, although neither the law of Lv 7<sup>34</sup> ('the wave breast and the heave thigh have I taken . . . and given unto Aaron the priest and unto his sons as a due for ever from the children of Israel') nor that of Dt 18<sup>8</sup> ('they shall give unto the priest the shoulder and the two cheeks and the maw') may have been then in force. The worshippers, however, seem to have resented the impiety more than the greed of the priests. The sin of the young men is graphically summed up in the statement that 'they contemned (ἕσσω) the offering of the Lord' (1 S 2<sup>17</sup>, on which see Driver or H. P. Smith).

3. Ezr 8<sup>33</sup>, 1 Es 8<sup>63</sup>. Father of Eleazar, one of the two priests who received at Jerusalem the offerings brought by Ezra from Babylon.

PHLEGON (Φλέγων).—The name of a Christian greeted with others by St. Paul in Ro 16<sup>14</sup>. He is commemorated with Herodion and Asyncritus (which see) on April 8 (Acta Sanctorum, April, i. p. 741). The name was borne by a Greek writer of the 2nd cent. who is stated by Origen to have given some information concerning Christ.

PHŒBE (Φοίβη).—In Ro 16<sup>1</sup> St. Paul commends Phœbe to the Roman Christians. He describes her as (1) 'our sister,' (2) 'a servant (διάκονος) of the Church that is at Cenchræ'—the port of Corinth. (3) He asks that they 'receive her in the Lord, worthily of the saints, and assist her in whatsoever matter she may have need of them.' (4) He says that she has been 'a succourer (προσάρτις) of many,' and of himself in particular. It is generally assumed that Phœbe was the bearer of the Epistle, and the words by which she is introduced (συνιστήμι ὑμῖν) imply a formal introduction to the Roman community.

Two points demand a short discussion: (1) How far is διάκονος technical? This is the only place where the office is referred to by name in the NT (for 1 Ti 3<sup>11</sup> 5<sup>35</sup> cannot be quoted), but the younger Pliny (Ep. x. xcvi. 8) speaks of ministrae in the Christian Church, and there are constant references to them under the names of διάκονος (ii. 26) and διακόνισσα (viii. 19, 20, 18) in the Apostolic Constitutions. Moreover, the circumstances of Oriental life must have made it necessary that there should be female attendants to perform for women what the deacons did for men, in baptism, in visiting the women's part of the house, and in introducing women to the bishop or deacons (Apost. Const. iii. 15, etc.). There is no occasion, therefore, for thinking that the word has not, at any rate to a certain extent, a technical meaning, but we have not sufficient grounds for assuming an order of deaconesses in the later sense. The translation 'servant,' however, is inadequate.

(2) The description of her as προσάρτις suggests that she was a person of some wealth and position. This word again is probably technical. It implies the legal representative or wealthy 'patroness.' Her residence at Cenchræ—the port towards Ephesus—would enable her to exercise the duties of hospitality, and to give other forms of assistance to Christians on their first landing in the country, and to help what must have been a small and struggling Church. She is commemorated on Sept. 3. See Acta Sanctorum, Sept., vol. i. p. 602.

i. SOURCES.—The sources of our knowledge of Phœnician history and civilization are contained in—(a) Inscriptions in the Phœnician language. These are very numerous, amounting to some thousands. They have been found in Phœnicia itself and in Cyprus, Egypt, Greece, the islands of Melita, Gaulos, Sicily, Cossura, Sardinia, and Corsica, as well as in Africa, Italy, France, and Spain. Whilst these are invaluable for the restoration of the language (especially such as have Greek transliterations and translations appended), unfortunately very few are of historical interest, few are of any length, few have been found in Phœnicia itself, and, with one exception, none are earlier than the Persian period. The oldest known is CIS No. 5. This is on the fragments of a bowl discovered in Cyprus ('in insula Cypro, casu [ut putamus] reperta') but belonging to a temple of Ba'al not far from Sidon, and on paleographical grounds is assigned to the 9th cent. B.C. It mentions a 'Hiram, king of the Sidonians,' but it remains uncertain to which of the kings of this name it refers. The remaining inscriptions consist mostly of dedications and memorials on tombs, with two or three pertaining to sacrifices. Their chief value lies in the names of kings they contain, and in the proper names containing names of gods.*

(b) The Egyptian hieroglyphic and Babylonian-Assyrian cuneiform inscriptions contain many references to the land of Phœnicia, and give some idea of its relation to foreign powers from the 16th cent. B.C. to the Persian period. The Tel el-Amarna tablets give a glimpse into contemporary history which is valuable and probably characteristic. Much, however, remains to be done in the classification and identification of the geographical names in the cuneiform inscriptions. For the Egyptian much has been done by W. Max Müller.†

(c) References to the Phœnicians, and especially to Tyre and Sidon with their dependencies, in the Old Testament.—These occur in writings extending over a period of about four centuries (9th to 5th cent. B.C.). They consist partly of short notes ethnographical (more properly geographical) as in Gn 10; archaeological or geographical, as in Dt 3<sup>2</sup>, Jos 13<sup>4</sup>; historical, as in 1 K 5 and 16; or relating to religion, as in 1 K 11<sup>5</sup>. In addition to these the longer passages in the books of Isaiah (ch. 23), Jeremiah (chs. 25, 27, 47), and Ezekiel (chs. 26–32) give a striking picture of the commerce and civilization of the chief Phœnician

* The Phœnician inscriptions are collected in the Corpus Inscriptionum Semiticarum, pt. i. vols. i. and ii., Paris, 1881–99. Further details as to some of them, and two or three new and recently discovered inscriptions, will be found in the Oriental Journals of Germany, Vienna, Paris; in the Revue d'Assyriologie, vol. v. No. 1, and other journals.

† The references to Phœnicia in the Egyptian inscriptions will be best found in Flinders Petrie's History of Egypt, Brugsch's Egypt under the Pharaohs, and W. Max Müller's Asien und Europa. The Tel el-Amarna tablets are edited by Winckler, The Tell el-Amarna Letters. A very useful compendium with much valuable comment is contained in Flinders Petrie's Syria and Egypt from the Tell el-Amarna Letters, London, 1898. The best collection of Babylonian and Assyrian inscriptions is in Schrader's Keilinschriftliche Bibliothek, vols. i–iv.

cities at the time when these prophecies were written.*

(d) Greek writings.—For fragments of two of the most important writings on Phœnician history we are indebted to Josephus, Eusebius, and others whose writings we have, who may have taken them from the encyclopædic writer Alexander Polyhistor. Menandros of Ephesus, who seems to have flourished about the 2nd cent. B.C., wrote a history or chronicle of some at least of the Phœnician cities. The first fragment (in Josephus, c. Ap. i. 18 and in part also in Ant. VIII. v. 3) contains Tyrian annals, with a list of kings from the early part of the 10th cent. B.C. to the founding of Carthage at the close of the 9th century. A second fragment (Ant. IX. xiv. 2) tells of a siege of Tyre under Shalmaneser, and a third (c. Ap. i. 21), usually ascribed to Menandros, though he is not explicitly mentioned as the author, gives further chronology and list of kings from a siege of Tyre under Nebuchadnezzar to the accession of Cyrus to the throne of Persia. Three other smaller pieces are of minor importance.

Dios, an otherwise unknown writer, is quoted in Jos. c. Ap. i. 17 as having written an accurate history of Phœnicia. The extract given tells of Hiram the contemporary of Solomon. Two or three other authors are mentioned in Greek literature as writers on Phœnician history, but their works have perished.—Quite different in character from the works mentioned seems to have been the Phœnician history of Philo Byblios, a writer of the end of the 1st cent. A.D. His work professed to be a translation of the writing of a Phœnician named Sanchuniathon who lived in the period before the Trojan war. The portions of his work preserved for us by Eusebius show him to have been a euhemerist, who in his description of the gods and his cosmogony has used Phœnician material, but has so adapted it to suit his own views that his work can be used only after most searching criticism.—Besides the above works, there are references in Greek writings too numerous to be mentioned here. The Iliad mentions 'Sidon,' 'Sidonians,' and 'Phœnicians,' and the Odyssey the same, with the addition of 'Phœnicia.' Herodotus tells of Phœnician legends and commerce, and many writers after him have incidental notices of this land and people.—Of Roman writers, one deserves mention. In the prologue to the 18th book of Justin's epitome of the history of Pompeius Trogus (about the beginning of the Christian era) occur the words, 'Inde (continentur) origines Phœnicum et Sidonis et Velie Carthaginisque res gestæ in excessu dictæ.' The only section that remains is in Justin, xviii. 3 ff., and was probably taken from a work of Timagenes (1st cent. B.C.).†

'Sidon,' 'Sidonians,' 'Tyre,' 'Arvad,' 'Gabal,'* and consult the table in Gn 10; see also CANAAN in vol. i. p. 347. Tyre and Sidon are mentioned in the NT by the Synoptists, Mt 11:21, 22 15:21, Mk 9:33 7:24, 31, Lk 4:26 6:17 10:13-14, and in Ac 13:29 21:3, 7 27:3. In Mk 7:26 the adjective Συροφονικισσα occurs.

† The fragments of Menandros are collected in Müller's Fragmenta Historicorum Græcorum, vol. iv. p. 445 ff., but to Müller's list must be added the paragraph contained in Jos. Ant. ix. xiv. 2, and it should be noticed that a part of the first piece is repeated in Ant. viii. v. 3. It will be observed that Josephus says that Menandros wrote of the 'kings of the Greeks and the Barbarians.' The fragment of Dios is contained in the same volume (Prag. Hist. Gr. iv. 398), where the author is identified with Allios Dios; but this is very doubtful. The remains of Philo Byblios are collected, ib. iii. 560 ff. The value of his work has been much discussed by scholars. A good essay on the subject is that of W. Baudissin in his Studien zur semitischen Religionsgeschichte, vol. i. pp. 1-46. His conclusion is that Philo has taken his material from various sources—some Semitic—and given to it the name of a man of antiquity. Sanchuniathon is a genuine Phœnician name. In any case the work as a whole represents Phœnician religion in its decline, not in its origin.

nicia is still almost entirely unexplored, though a beginning has now been made at Sidon. Scattered about, however, on the surface of the ancient Phœnician land are remains of walls, fortifications, temples, and tombs, which help to tell the story of bygone days. Of the colonies, Cyprus and Carthage have yielded a large number of articles (vases, statuettes, etc. etc.), which throw light on the arts and daily life of the people. Coins also, and seals, though not in large numbers, are now to be found in museums (see below under 'Civilization and Commerce').

ii. THE COUNTRY.—(a) Extent and natural features. Although the Phœnicians inhabited cities as far north as Myriandos (in the Gulf of Alexandretta) and as far south as Jaffa (see below) in the Persian period, the earlier Phœnician territory may be said roughly to have been bounded on the north by the river Orontes or Mt. Casius, and on the south by Mt. Carmel. On the east the limits are entirely unknown, but the Bargylos and Lebanon ranges seem to form natural boundaries on that side. Colonists from Sidon, however, appear to have pushed their way as far inland as the neighbourhood of the sources of the Jordan (Jg 18). The land thus consisted of two distinct regions: (1) The hill-country, i.e. the slopes of Bargylos (Nusaireyah) and Lebanon. Both these ranges extend from N. to S.: the former from Antioch to the river Eleutheros, the latter from this point to the mountains of N. Galilee and Hermon. They are of limestone, with many other formations, and in some parts reach a height of over 10,000 ft. The scenery is magnificent, especially in the great gorges where the rivers pass down into the plains. The vegetation is luxuriant for a long distance up the slopes, and the many flourishing villages on the side of the Lebanon facing the sea to-day, tell us of one part of Phœnician life which has vanished almost entirely from its history. The chief rivers are the Eleutheros, which separates Bargylos from Lebanon; the Adonis, famous in history; and the Lycos, at the mouth of which still remain the well-known Egyptian and Assyrian inscriptions. But besides these there are many small streams which pour down from every mountain slope, full in the rainy season, empty in the dry, and for this very reason affecting both commercial and military movements. (2) The plains are best known as containing nearly all the cities that have left their mark in Phœnician history. The extreme north is a mere strip of land between the mountains and the sea, and the first great plain is that extending for about 60 miles south from Gabala, with a width varying from 2 to 10 miles, and containing the cities of Arvad and Simyra. The next piece of open country is that from the Lycos river to a few miles below Beyrût, then follow the plains of Sidon, about 10 miles long and 2 broad, Tyre about 20 miles long and from 1 mile to 5 miles broad, and Acre about 8 miles long and 6 broad. These plains as well as the hilly slopes were famous for their cultivation, and there are traces to-day, in the remains that are found, of the industries that were carried on in them. But they owe their fame mostly to the fact that they are the highways along which the trade of the East came to the West. The inscriptions at the mouth of the Lycos, the annals of Egypt and Assyria, and the descriptions of the OT prophets, all bear witness to the constant traffic and frequent invasions that were made possible by this low-lying coast-land of Phœnicia.*

* A description of the old Phœnician territory at the present time may be read in Renan, Mission de Phénicie; Walpole, The Ansaryri; Réclus, l'Asie Antérieure; and Baedeker's Palestine and Syria.

(b) History of the country.—The earliest historical mention of the Phœnician land is in the older Egyptian inscriptions, where it appears under the name of Dahe (or Zahi).\* Between B.C. 1587 and 1562 Aahmes reached it in his northern conquests. He also mentions a people called the Fenkhu as workers in his quarries. Thothmes I. (1541–16) overran the whole length of Syria as far as the Euphrates. Thothmes III. (1503–1449) in his 23rd year records a victory over the Fenkhu and other Syrians; in his 29th year another campaign to Retennu, Tunep, Arvad, and Zahi, with much Phœnician spoil; in his 30th year a campaign to Kedesh, Simyra, and Arvad; and in his 34th year a campaign which brought tribute from Zahi, Retennu, and Asi (Cyprus). In the reign of Amenophis III. (1414–1379) Egyptian power seems to have been at its highest, and Phœnicia, with the rest of Syria, was entirely subject to it. The next reign, that of Amenophis IV. (or Akhenaten, 1379–66), is one of decay. The discovery of the Tel el-Amarna tablets has given us a rather fuller insight into the relation of Phœnicia to Egypt than we have had hitherto, for some of the letters contained in these tablets are from or to Egyptian governors and others in Phœnician cities. Thus we have mention of Abimilki of Tyre, Amunira of Beyrût, Khaib, commissioner of Simyra, Ribaddi of Gubla, Shutatna of Akko, Zimrida of Zidon, etc. Nearly all the letters tell the same story of attacks from without and rebellion within, and prove that whether Phœnicia now made a stand for independence or became a prey to other rising empires, it was at this time passing from Egyptian dominion. The Egyptians still made raids into Phœnician territory or marched through it (cf. the inscription of Ramses II. at the mouth of the river Lycos) to attack other enemies, and Phœnicians probably still paid tribute from time to time to Egypt. We have no details of the history of the land at this time. We know, however, that it never formed one united kingdom. Its history is the history of its cities. Of these, Arvad seems to have enjoyed a pre-eminence in the earliest times, and more certainly Sidon a little later. The whole people was sometimes known to foreigners as the Sidonians. The era of Tyre began about B.C. 1197 (according to Jos. Ant. VIII. iii. 1); but Arvad and Sidon were still independent cities in the 9th cent.: in the 8th Tyre seems to bear rule over Sidon, Akko, and other cities. Later, Diodorus Siculus (xvi. 41) mentions a united council of men of Arvad, Tyre, and Sidon at Tripolis (native name unknown). This development of the government with the root  $\text{𐤃}$ ; 'to be beautiful,'  $\text{𐤏𐤍}$  'to act well'; cf.  $\text{𐤏𐤍}$  'to shine' (Asten und Europa, p. 176). This name begins to go into the background in the 12th cent., and is almost forgotten in the Ptolemaic period. Kaft or Keft (in the inscription of Thothmes III. etc.) is frequently taken to indicate the Phœnician coast (cf. Sayce in article CANAAN), but Müller (p. 337 ff.) argues strongly for its representing Cilicia. Canaan is a geographical term denoting the low land, and seems to have been used by the Phœnicians themselves at one time to denote their land (see CANAAN). The name  $\text{Φοινίκη}$  given by the Greeks (it occurs in Odys. iv. 83) has given rise to much discussion. It seems to have been used (like  $\text{Ἑλλάς}$ ) for the land where Phœnicians dwelt, whether at home or abroad; thus Euripides (Tro. 221) uses it for Carthage. The older derivations of the name  $\text{Φοινίκη}$  (Phœnicians) from  $\text{φοῖνιξ}$ , the bird ('phœnix'), or a 'palm,' are fanciful and secondary. Some derive the word from  $\text{φαιός}$ , 'brownish-red,' as denoting the colour of the skin (Pietschmann, Gesch. d. Phönizier, p. 13), a root which reappears in the Latin Pœnus ('Punic' of Carthaginians). Some (cf. CANAAN and Ed. Meyer, Gesch. d. Alterthums, §§ 180, 190, etc.) refer both these names back to the word 'Fenkhu,' which appears in the inscription of Thothmes III. at Karnak. To this Müller objects (p. 208 ff.), that this word was originally only an Egyptian term used in a general sense for the northern barbarians. Finally, Ed. Glaser (Punt und die süd-arabischen Reiche, 1899) has revived the view that the name is connected with the 'Punt' (or Poven-at=Poen-at) of the Egyptian inscriptions, a part of South Arabia and East Africa.

of cities was not without foreign intervention. The Egyptians had scarcely ceased troubling them when they were brought face to face with danger from a new quarter. It is possible that as early as 1140 Nebuchadnezzar I. of Babylonia invaded their country (cf. Winckler, Geschichte Babyloniens und Assyriens, p. 95 and note 18). Tiglath-pileser I. (c. 1100) also seems to have reached the Mediterranean coast near Arvad. In the 9th cent. Assurnazirpal raided the country, as did his successor, Shalmaneser II., who received tribute from Tyre and Sidon and Byblos (Geba), as well as from Jehu king of Israel; and Mattanbaal king of Arvad fought with Ahab at the battle of Karkar (854). In the 8th cent. the cuneiform inscriptions record tribute received by Tiglath-pileser III. from Arvad, Tyre, and Geba; and Menander tells of a siege of Tyre by Shalmaneser IV. which lasted for five years. In the following century Sargon, Sennacherib, and Esarhaddon all sent their armies to Phœnicia, and the last named even to Idalion in Cyprus; and in the 6th cent. the new Babylonian empire continued the work of Assyria in the famous siege of Tyre by Nebuchadnezzar. With the rise of the Persian empire came a change which greatly benefited the Phœnicians. Cyrus seems to have left them alone, and about this time they again supplied the Jews with materials for building their temple (Ezr. 3<sup>7</sup>). Cambyses enrolled them in a satrapy with Cyprus, Syria, and Palestine, and thus received from them their share of tribute; but was friendly to them, and depended on them entirely for his navy (cf. Herod. iii. 19); nor did he attempt force against them even when they refused to give him ships wherewith to attack Carthage. The Phœnician fleet continued to do good service for the Persians, especially against the Greeks, until 351, when Sidon, under Tabnit, revolted; but Ochus soon brought Phœnicia back to obedience, and its cities continued to flourish under their native kings until after the battle of Issus they fell into the hands of Alexander the Great, Tyre only after suffering a long siege and a cruel punishment. After Alexander's death, Phœnicia fell with Syria to Laomedon, then in 320 to Ptolemy Lagi, and in 314 to Antigonus. In 287 it again passed to the Ptolemies, who held it until 198, when it became part of the Seleucid empire. During all this period Greek manners and customs and language were largely introduced into the country. Finally, after it had shared with Syria in the many vicissitudes of the Seleucid power, in 65 Rome took possession, and Phœnicia was included in the province of Syria under a proconsul or pro-prætor, though Tyre, Sidon, and Tripolis remained free cities with their own elected magistrates and council (cf. Ac 12<sup>20</sup>). In Mk 7<sup>24-30</sup> a woman of this country is called a Syro-phœnician; in Mt 15<sup>21-28</sup> the older name 'Canaanitish' is used. For this section, see, further, the Literature cited in the notes to 'Sources,' above.

(c) Greater Phœnicia.—A sketch of the history of Phœnicia would be incomplete without a notice of the many ports, especially in the Mediterranean, where its people settled, and from which came many of those articles of commerce which made them renowned. Some of these settlements can be traced back to the 15th cent. B.C. There may have been some before that time; but records fail us. In some of these places the Phœnicians seem to have had real colonies, in others merely 'factories,' where their traders received the wares of the neighbouring country to export them to their own land. Cyprus was very early settled by them, and although the Greeks afterwards took much of the island, the towns of Kition and Idalion flourished up to Roman times (see CYPRUS). The islands of the Ægean Sea (including Crete, Rhodos, Kythera, and many others) were occupied by them—as many scholars hold—even in pre-Homeric times (cf. Bérard, 'Les Phéniciens et les poèmes Homériques,' in Revue de l'histoire des Religions, xxxix. 173-228 and 419-460). The advance of the Greeks, and consequent expulsion of the Phœnicians from these islands, seems to have led to an increased interest in the settlements in the West Mediterranean, some of which, at least, had been founded long before. Sicily, Sardinia, Corsica, Malta, Gaulos, Tarshish, and Gades in Spain, various places in N. Africa, including the famous Carthage, were settled by them, and were in constant communication with the home country. Many of these settlements have been assigned by history and tradition to certain Phœnician cities, e.g. Útica and Carthage to Tyre, and Carthage itself seems to have established new trading ports on the opposite coast of the Mediterranean. (For settlements outside the Mediterranean, see paragraph in small type below).

iii. THE PEOPLE.—The origin of the Phœnician people is wrapped in mystery. According to their own traditions of the 5th cent. B.C., they dwelt formerly by the Erythrean Sea (Herod. vii. 89; cf. i. 1), i.e. the Indian Ocean, including the Persian Gulf. This tradition is repeated by other classical authors—Strabo, Justin, Pliny, et al. Justin enlarges the story by a statement that an earthquake was the cause of their movement, and that they dwelt then near the 'Assyrian lake' (xviii. iii. 2); and Strabo (who in i. ii. 35 regards the story of the migration as untrustworthy) says (in xvi. iii. 4) that in the Persian Gulf are two islands—Turos and Arados—whose temples resemble those of the Phœnicians, and that the inhabitants of these islands say that the Phœnician islands are named after them, and their towns are settlements from themselves. Sayce (note to Herod. i. 1) suggests that the similarity of names gave rise to the whole legend, and points out that the names are really different, as according to Ptolemy and Pliny the real name of the island in the Persian Gulf was Tylos, while the Phœnician city Tyre was  $\tau\upsilon\varsigma$ , and the Phœnician Arados was properly Arvad. Failing historical evidence, we are led to such testimony as we can get from language, anthropology, and religion. This is avowedly incomplete at the present time; but the material available shows the Phœnicians of the Syrian coast to have been a Semitic people, who took part in the great migration to the West which at different times sent also the Aramaeans to Syria and the Hebrews and their kin to Palestine.

It has long been known that the activity of the Phœnicians was not confined to the islands and coasts of the Mediterranean, and it has been suspected that the Phœnicians of the Syrian coast were perhaps only one branch of a race which had settlements in other parts of the Semitic world. A work entitled, Punt und die süd-arabischen Reiche, by Eduard Glaser, the famous traveller in South Arabia, appeared in the end of 1899, in which evidence has been gathered from the records of Egypt and the South Arabian inscriptions to show that these conjectures are supported by history. According to Glaser, the land of Punt, so often mentioned in Egyptian inscriptions, was a large part of the coasts of East Africa and South Arabia. Thence the Egyptians obtained incense, gold, etc. From this land were established several colonies, including Mashonaland and Socotra. But the remains in the former place are evidently Phœnician, various signs indicate the identity of the races inhabiting the land of Punt, and the name itself is identical with 'Phœnician.' Thus we must in future speak of two branches of the Phœnician people, a Northern on the coasts of Syria, and a Southern (of the same race, language, and origin as the Northern) which left the Erythrean Gulf at a very early period, and ceased from that time to influence the other members of the race. The confirmation or otherwise of this theory must depend on the further evidence of the Babylonian and S. Arabian inscriptions.

iv. ALPHABET AND LANGUAGE.—(a) The Phœnician alphabet is purely consonantal, and consists of 22 characters, written from right to left. Tradition says that this was the first alphabet invented—

'Phœnices primi, famæ si creditur, ausi
Mansuram rudibus vocem signare figuris.'—(Lucan).

It is, however, generally recognized that the invention consists in the taking over of signs used originally by other peoples to denote syllables, and the adaptation of these to denote simple sounds, together with the simplification of what were originally pictorial or hieroglyphic characters. Together with this we must recognize that some letters were not taken over directly, but were formed by slight modifications of those thus received (thus the sign for the rough aspirate h is formed from that of the simple h by the addition of a stroke to the left). Various opinions are held as to the original source. Until lately the favourite view has been that the Phœnicians borrowed their characters from the Egyptian. This was also held in ancient times, and is mentioned in Tacitus—'Primi per figuras animalium Ægyptii sensus mentis effingebant . . . et literarum semet inventores perhibent; inde Phœnicias, quia mari præpollebant, intulisse Græciæ gloriarum adeptos, tamquam reppererint quæ acceperant' (Ann. xi. 14). Supporters of this opinion are divided as to whether the Phœnician characters were derived directly from the hieroglyphs or from the hieratic writing. Much has been written of late to show that the Babylonian-Assyrian cuneiform is the real source of the Phœnician alphabet. This opinion was also held in early times. Pliny says, 'Litteras semper arbitror Assyriis fuisse, sed alii apud Ægyptios a Mercurio, ut Gellius, alii apud Syros repertas volunt' (Nat. Hist. vii. § 37). The widespread use of the cuneiform characters about the time to which is assigned the invention of the Phœnician alphabet, is used to support this hypothesis. A third view held by some corresponds in some degree with the last mentioned by Pliny, and derives the Phœnician characters from the Cypriote, which are connected with the so-called Hittite characters. This opinion is altogether too undeveloped at present to be judged properly. Nor is it easy to decide as to the Egyptian and Assyrian theories. The selection of the characters to which the Phœnician are referred seems arbitrary, and a succession of intermediate forms is wanting. Either view seems to be historically possible, neither proved. The Phœnician alphabet, like most others, seems to have only incompletely represented the sounds of the language. Two words beginning in Phœnician with the same letter are represented in Greek by different letters,  $\tau\upsilon\varsigma$ =Tyros,  $\tau\alpha\varsigma$ =Σιδών. These characters are identical with those found on the Siloam inscription in Judæa and the Moabite Stone, and on early Jewish coins, and may thus be called Canaanitish (in the large sense) as well as Phœnician. The early Greek alphabet was also derived from the Phœnician (cf. Herod. v. 58), though soon altered in many ways to suit the needs of the Greek language.

(b) The language of Phœnicia is pure Semitic, and belongs to the same branch of that family as the Hebrew, the Moabitish, and the Semitic glosses in the Tel el-Amarna letters, forming with these (and probably other dialects of which we have no remains) the so-called Canaanitish group. The materials for an exact comparison with Hebrew are wanting. The inscriptions (with the single exception of CIS i. 5, see above under 'Sources') are later than the 6th cent., and mostly of the 4th and later, when the language had probably suffered a certain amount of decay. The Punic passages in Plautus are of the end of the 3rd cent., and can be used only with care (cf. Nöldeke, Die semitischen Sprachen, p. 25 f.), and the vowel letters in the inscriptions are rare. The consonants are the same as in Hebrew, but many words were probably pronounced with different vowel sounds from those used in the same words in Hebrew. The wau conversive with the imperfect, so familiar in Hebrew, is wanting in the Phœnician, which, on the other hand, seems to have formed a kind of pluperfect with kân (CIS 93). Words, too, that became rare or poetical in Hebrew were in common use in Phœnician. The later language shows the same weakening and confusion of gutturals that marks late Hebrew.

LITERATURE.—On the Phœnician alphabet see de Rougé, Memoires sur l'origine égyptienne de l'alphabet phœnicien, 1874; Deecke, "Ursprung d. altsemitischen Alphabets aus d. neuassyrischen Keilschrift," in ZDMG xxxi. 102ff.; and cf. Zimmern, ib. l. 607 ff.; Isaac Taylor's, The Alphabet?, where the Egyptian origin is accepted; Ball, "Origin of the Phœnician Alphabet," in PSBA, 1893, 392-408; Berger, L'écriture dans l'antiquité. Conder, in The Bible and the East, p. 74 ff., supports the Cypriote origin.

The inscriptions are collected in the French Corpus; the words in them are collected in Bloch's Phœnicisches Glossar (Berlin, 1891); and esp. by Lidzbarski, Handbuch d. nordsemitischen Epigraphik (Weimar, 1898). The words in Plautus are discussed by Gildemeister in Bittschl's edition of Plautus, vol. ii. fasc. 5 (Leipzig, 1884). A fuller discussion of these by Prof. D. S. Margoliouth will appear in a forthcoming number of the Classical Review. The only grammar of Phœnician is Schröder's Phœnizische Grammatik (Halle, 1869). Cf., further, article on LANGUAGE OF OT.

v. CONSTITUTION AND GOVERNMENT.—The Phœnicians never appear in history as one united people under one government. Their political history resolves itself into the history of their chief cities. Naturally a quiet and unwarlike people (Jg 18'), the country folk were probably content with the simpler forms of local or patriarchal government usual among Eastern peoples, depending for help in time of need upon the city that was nearest to them or which they had originally left as settlers. In the cities the government was more conventional. Kings of Sidon, Tyre, Gebal, Kition, and Idalion are mentioned in the OT, in foreign records, and on the Phœnician inscriptions. From Menander's list of the kings of Tyre we can see that the monarchic power remained in the same family, except when revolutions broke the order of succession. As to the constitution of the court circle, we can only gather from our knowledge of Carthage, and of the Semitic states bordering on Phœnicia, that there existed an aristocracy which probably owed its existence in early times to prominent position in the tribes. In some of the cities a body of ten chiefs (Justin, xvii. 6. 1) seems to have been prominent in international business. This seems to have been part of a larger council of a hundred men. Of the organization of the traders, the most important part of the population, we know nothing. A tradition in Justin (xviii. 3) seems to indicate the presence of a large slave population. Among the different cities it was inevitable that one or another should gain some pre-eminence over the others. This is historically proved by the fact that at one time Sidon gave its name to the Phœnician people as a whole, while in OT times Tyre evidently had some kind of supremacy. For the Persian period Diodorus Siculus (xvi. 41) mentions a federal government with headquarters at Tripolis, where Arvad, Sidon, and Tyre held a common council. Even when under the sway of foreign powers, the chief Phœnician cities seem to have always maintained a large amount of self-government in internal affairs; and under the Romans we know that Sidon, Tyre, and Tripolis retained the rank of 'free cities,' with the right to appoint their own councils and magistrates.

vi. CIVILIZATION AND COMMERCE.—The people were originally, in all probability, largely agricultural. The inscription of Thothes III. mentions among the spoil of Phœnicia, 'good bread and various bread, corn in grain, flour . . . and all good fruits of the land.' But though the agricultural class doubtless existed throughout its history, it soon yielded in importance to those of the manufacturers, merchants, and seamen, who received raw material from various parts of the known world, and sent it forth again in new and more useful or more beautiful forms, or contented themselves with simply acting as intermediaries with profit to themselves. Their navigation, originally taken up for business purposes, became later a great source of influence and probably of wealth to them, when they provided a navy for their Persian rulers. Phœnicia was essentially mercantile, and was warlike only when commercial life was threatened. Situated on the only part of the Syrian coast that had any pretence to natural harbours, and hemmed in by lofty mountains on the north and east, its people naturally turned to the sea. And so the sea soon carried their ships; its shells gave them their valuable dyes, and its sand the material for their glass. The meeting of the land trade-routes from Asia and Africa, and of the sea-routes from all parts of the Mediterranean, made alike the history and the civilization of Phœnicia. The land-routes existed for natural reasons; the sea-routes were due to the skill and enterprise of the sailors who pushed their way from island to island, and cape to cape, until they reached the southern capes of Spain, and passed through the Straits of Gibraltar. Yet the people do not seem to have been very original or inventive, and their chief merit seems to have been rather the power of adapting and fitting for commercial purposes the arts they learned from others. They had, too, the advantage of being able to collect in one place the products of many lands, and thus of producing an effect on the imagination of peoples which gave them a glory not all their own. Glass was one of the manufactured articles for which they gained much credit, and tradition came to ascribe its invention to them (Pliny, Nat. Hist. xxxvi. 65); but it had been made 'from time immemorial' in Egypt, and the art of making it was probably taken by the Phœnicians from that country. The dyed wares of Phœnicia were renowned throughout the ancient world, and the abundance of the murex on their coasts (see COLOURS in vol. i. p. 457) gave full opportunity for the production of the most brilliant colours then known; but the art of dyeing probably came from Babylonia. Their weaving and embroidery were alike famous and sought after; but we are still ignorant as to how much progress in these arts was due to native workers. Gold, silver, iron, tin, and lead were imported by them long before the days of Ezekiel, and were wrought into forms of beauty that were known to the Homeric poems (Il. xxiii. 740 ff.; Odyss. iv. 618); but their artistic forms show undoubted marks of large foreign influence. Amber, it is now known, was dug in Phœnicia itself, but was also probably received by the ordinary trade-routes from the Baltic, and objects made of it have been found in the ruins of Mycena.

The artistic side of Phœnician life (with a rather large commercial appearance in it) is well represented in the various objects which have been dug up or discovered in Phœnicia itself, but more extensively in Cyprus and Carthage and a few more of the old Phœnician colonies. The pottery discovered belongs mostly to the Græco-Roman times, and most of its excellences seem to be due to foreign influence. Earlier specimens, supposed to be Phœnician, are both of the painted and incised varieties, but are not at all remarkable. The metal-work is more interesting, and the statuettes of bronze are curious if not particularly beautiful. The bronze bowls of Cyprus and the celebrated cup (discovered at Præneste) of silver, overlaid with gold, with figures in low-relief, alike bear witness to the influence of Egyptian and Assyrian art. The same applies to the seals and cylinders, which do not usually show a very fine finish, and are generally of serpentine, sometimes of glass, etc. The chief feature of this sculpture was the application of colour to give emphasis to certain parts of the figure. Their architecture is only partially known to us from very imperfect remains. A marked feature in their building is the employment of the natural solid rock, as far as possible. This is the case with the old walls of Sidon, much of the funeral architecture, and the famous monolith house of Amrith. There seems to have been no vault in Phœnician architecture, the roof being terraced, as in Syria at the present day. The columns, cornices, and other decorations are almost entirely foreign, largely Egyptian. The tombs were in caves, and sarcophagi were used, and sometimes massive monuments like the so-called 'Hiram's tomb' towered above the burying-place. The architecture of their temples was probably Egyptian. That in all these arts the Phœnicians were reputed to be skilful workmen we know from the OT account of the relations between Solomon and Hiram of Tyre. A namesake of the Phœnician king made for the temple at Jerusalem the two great pillars of bronze, the molten sea, and other objects of beauty and utility (1 K 7 ff.). To reconstruct these from the descriptions given has been a desire of many writers on ancient art, but there is and must be much uncertainty as to the details of the work. See art. PILLAR.

The only metal found in Phœnicia itself was iron, but the abundance of minerals in some of their colonies soon made the Phœnicians expert miners. Cyprus contained large quantities of copper, and the island gave its name to this metal. The Sardinian settlements were apparently due to the search after copper and lead. The mines of Thasos were known to Herodotus (vi. 47), and the Spanish colonies were perfect storehouses of gold, silver, copper, tin, iron, and lead.

The attention given to navigation naturally gave rise to a large industry in the art of shipbuilding, and it is possible to trace on the Assyrian sculptures and Phœnician vases and coins the development from the rude and small boats first used to the large and well-fitted vessels used in later times, and so warmly eulogized by Xenophon in the Economica (§ 8). The art of navigation, too, as distinct from the usual hugging of the shore and sailing in the daytime only, seems to have been developed if not invented by these people, to whom the Polar star was known. 'The ships of the sea, with their mariners,' occupy the first place in Ezekiel's description of the pride of Tyre (ch. 27).

From this description by Ezekiel we can easily understand that the private life of the Phœnician traders was one of great luxury. Many of the articles of commerce, in which they traded, found their way into the homes of the people. Little is known of their private life, but there are indications that behind the outward show of wealth and civilization lay a selfish and even cruel spirit. The traffic in slaves was no unimportant part of their commerce, and for the sake of it they would forget 'the covenant of brethren' (Am 1<sup>9</sup>, 10). Commerce was the life and soul of the people, and the faults as well as the virtues of a purely commercial people marked the Phœnician race (cf. Is 23, etc.).

LITERATURE.—The remains of Phœnician industry and art may best be studied in Renan, Mission de Phœnicie; Perrot et Chipiez, Histoire de l'art dans l'antiquité, tom. iii. 'Phœnicie-Cypré'; L. P. di Cesnola, Cyprus, its Cities, Tombs, and Temples; A. P. di Cesnola, Salamina; Ohnefalsch-Richter, Kypros, die Bibel und Homer; Davis, Carthage and her Remains. For fragments of the Phœnician calendar, cf. Conder in PEFS, 1889, p. 22 f.

vii. RELIGION.—The religion of the Phœnicians was polytheistic, nor so far as we can go back do we find any traces of its ever having been monotheistic. In the Tel el-Amarna tablets the Phœnician names contain the names of several of the gods; in the OT, too, the ba'alim (plur.) are mentioned. The origins of the gods are unknown. The statements of Philo Byblios in this matter are useless, for everything is made to serve his own euhemerism. The view that Ba'al was the name of an originally one and only god—and that the sun-god—has been shown to be more than doubtful (see art. BAAL). Even the later identification by the Greeks of certain Phœnician gods with their own tells us nothing of their origin and previous history. As Ed. Meyer says (Gesch. d. Alt. § 192, note), 'It should never be forgotten that of the Phœnician religion we know very little (recht wenig), of the Phœnician mythology proper, nothing at all.' It is a striking fact that one goddess, 'Tanith,' is mentioned about 2000 times in Carthaginian inscriptions, and we know nothing either as to the meaning of the name or the nature of her being. Without attempting to explain the nature of each individual god, it seems clear, however, that some at least took their origin in the worship of the powers of nature (cf. the 'Ba'al of heavens,' the worship of Eshmun and Adonis, the feasts of the seasons of the year, the veneration of objects of nature, etc. [see below]). In this respect they fall in line with other Semitic peoples. Another determining feature in their worship seems to have been their social organization. The existence of various tribes among the Phœnicians has often been asserted, and is in itself very probable, but there is no evidence for it. On the other hand, the city has played a part, larger than in the history of any country, except perhaps the history of Italy in the Middle Ages. That each city had a god of its own is evident. Sometimes he was simply called the Ba'al of that city (see BAAL), sometimes he had a name of his own (as Melkarth, the Ba'al of Tyre). Beyond the actuating power of these two factors—reverence for the powers of nature, and the bond of city life—it is difficult, if not impossible, to go in the present state of our knowledge of the early gods of Phœnicia. A striking feature in the names of the gods is the presence of so many appellatives in the names of the best-known (thus Ba'al, 'possessor'; Adon, 'lord'; Milk, 'king,' etc.). Another characteristic is the recognition of female as well as male deities. By the side of Ba'al is Ba'alat (as early as the Tel el-Amarna tablets 'Ba'alat ša Gubla'), with Milk is Milkat, with El is Elat (see CIS 243, 244); but it does not follow that because the masculine and feminine forms of the same words are used, that there is necessarily any special relation between the god and goddess represented by them. A closer relation between two gods seems to be indicated by the compounding of two divine names, as in Milk-ashtart, Ba'almeḳart, Zadmēḳarth, Zadtanith, etc.; but whether this has any political or doctrinal significance is uncertain.

In later times Phœnician cities, like other peoples of the ancient world, introduced foreign gods into their temples. Egypt especially furnished its share, and Babylonian deities are not wanting; while in regard to the other nations around them (other Canaanites, Arameans, etc.), it is often difficult to say whether one has borrowed from the others, or all have received them from a common stock. In Greek times the identification of their own gods with Greek deities did much to change the nature and worship of both.

The relation of the individual (we have no evidence of the tribal relation prominent in Arabia, and undoubtedly present among the early Israelites, cf. TRIBE) to the god is expressed by the various words expressing dependence on or relation to, prefixed to names of gods to form names of persons, e.g. עֲבָד 'servant of' (which occurs with the name of nearly every Phœnician god known); אִם 'man of'; בֵּר 'branch, member of' (see Bloch, Phœn. Gloss. p. 19, note); חִי (for אחי) 'brother of'; נִר 'client of'; and once or twice אבִי and אִמִי 'father, or my father is' . . . Women's names are also formed by prefixing the following and similar words to the divine names נַח 'daughter of'; חַת 'sister of'; אִמַת 'handmaid of'; אִרְסַת 'bride of.'

(a) The deities.—Altogether about 50 names of gods are known from the Phœn. inscriptions (see Lidzbarski, 152 ff.). Of many of these we know nothing but the name. Among the most important are the following (in the order of the Phœn. alphabet):—

אֲדֹנִי (Gr. Ἄδωνις, cf. Heb. אָדֹנָי), originally an appellative. A god in Byblos, then in Cyprus, where he was also joined with Eshmun. Origen and Jerome identify him with Tammuz (Ezk 8<sup>14</sup>), who was really a Babylonian god. In some places he is joined with Osiris. For the probable meaning of the Adonis feast, see Baudissin, Studien zur semitischen Religionsgeschichte, ii. 188, note.

אֵל (cf. Heb. אֱלֹהִים) occurs in several proper names, but it is still doubtful whether it stands for a particular god. Philo of Byblos says that he was the chief god of Byblos, but had neither temple nor cultus. The feminine form אֵלָה occurs on two Carthaginian inscriptions as the name of a goddess with priests of her own.

אֲשֶׁמֶן (called by the Greeks Ἀσκληπίος) is not mentioned in the OT, but was worshipped in Sidon, Berytos, Carthage, Cyprus, etc.; and his name occurs frequently in proper names, and compounded with Melkarth (cf. Ed. Meyer in Roscher's Lexikon d. Griechischen u. Römischen Mythologie, i. 1385 f.).

בַּעַל (Gr. Βάαλ, Βήλος, Βήλ, and in proper names Βάλ) was worshipped also by the Israelites, Philistines, and probably by Moabites. He appears in Palmyrene inscriptions as בַּל and בַּלִּי. He was probably also indigenous in Arabia (Nöldeke in ZDMG xl. 174), and is evidently connected with the Babylonian Bel. See BAAL. The feminine form בַּעַלָּה (Gr. Βααλρίς, Βήλρις) occurs in the Tel el-Amarna tablets as Baalat ša Gubla. It is as goddess of the same place that she is mentioned four times in CIS 1. It seems also to be present in the OT place-names בַּעַלְזַר, בַּעַלְזַרָּה, and בַּעַלְזַרָּה.

בַּל appears in Phœnician inscriptions only in proper names, but occurs as a god in Is 65<sup>11</sup>, in the נַחֲלֵי Jos 15<sup>27</sup>, and in Ezr 2<sup>12</sup>, also in Aramaic (ZDMG xlii. 474), in Arabia (Wellhausen, Reste d. Arab. Heidentums<sup>2</sup>, 146), and probably in Palmyrene, but is unknown to the Babylonians. He was a god of Fortune (see art. GAD); but the city-god Τύχη of Greek inscriptions and coins from Syria, with whom he has been generally identified, is regarded by Baudissin (Herzog-Hauck, vi. 334 f.) as referring more probably to Atergatis.

בַּלְתַּי, originally an appellative,—cf. Moloch and Milcom of the Ammonites (see MOLECH),—is mentioned in the Tel el-Amarna tablets in the names Abi-milki, Ili-milki, 'Abd-milki, etc., and in many names in the Phœnician inscriptions. A goddess מִלְכַּה is also found in Carthage, Hadrumet, and Sardinia.

בַּלְתַּיִם (= מִלְכַּיִם 'city-king') is not mentioned in the OT, but was the Ba'al of Tyre, and was identified by the Greeks with Ἡρακλῆς (so in CIS 122, c. 180 B.C.). His temple, according to a tradition in Herodotus (ii. 44), was founded about B.C. 2740. His name is also found in Cyprus, Malta, and Carthage, and in such proper names as Hamilkar, and is preserved in the Greek Μελικέρτης. In compound names of deities he occurs with Eshmun, Zad, and Resheph (see Ed. Meyer in Roscher's Lexikon, ii. 2650 ff.).

בִּנְיָן occurs in the proper names בִּנְיָן, בִּנְיָנִי, and בִּנְיָנִית, which last is also the name Σαρχουιάθων of Philo's fictitious authority.

עֲנַת (in the Greek part of CIS 95 represented by Ἀθηνά) is met with in the OT in the place-names Beth-anath (Jos 15<sup>29</sup>), Beth-anath (Jos 19<sup>28</sup>, Jg 1<sup>33</sup>), and Anathoth (Jer 1, etc.). As a goddess of war she was known and honoured by the Egyptians in the 17th and 18th dynasties, having, according to Meyer (ZDMG xxxi. 718 f.), been taken over from the Hittites. A connexion with the Babylonian Anatu is not proved.

עֲשָׁתֶרֶת (Gr. Ἀστάρτη), identified by the Greeks with Ἀφροδίτη. See ASHTORETH.

עַד seems to be connected with the Heb. צַד 'to hunt, fish,' but occurs only in names of men and of compound deities.

עֲרִישׁ occurs in proper names of Cyprus, and meets us in Egypt as Rashpu, and is ascribed by Meyer, like Anath (see above), to the Hittites. It seems, however, more natural to connect the name with the Hebrew word for 'flame,' and to look upon the deity as a god of storms or lightning. This seems, too, to be confirmed by the combination עֲרִישׁ־עַד in CIS 10 (cf. Driver, Deut. 68, with references).

הַנַּח was the great goddess of Carthage; but though her name occurs some 2000 times in inscriptions, we are ignorant of her nature and origin. Except in two or three inscriptions she is always entitled פַּן בַּעַל 'face of Ba'al.' A compound deity צַוַּתָּה occurs in some inscriptions.

As has been noticed in the case of 'Anat and Resheph, it is possible that some of the gods already mentioned were taken from other peoples. In the later period this borrowing certainly took place, and in the inscriptions we find the Babylonian Nergal, the Egyptian Isis, Osiris, Absit (e.g. Bastu, cf. Bubastis, Ezk 30<sup>17</sup>), Horus, and Ptah. In some cases a Phœnician god was joined with a foreign one, as in Melekosir (so Jeremias), but the first part of the name may be only appellative.

(b) Sacred objects and cultus.—As in other Semitic religions of Western Asia, the most prominent objects of nature had an idea of sanctity attached to them. Whether as themselves containing spirits, who had power over men, or simply as the greatest gifts of the gods, they were regarded with feelings of awe. High places (בָּמֹת) were chosen for their temples and altars as being especially near the deity; and it was on Carmel (which was known to be sacred in the time of Tacitus, cf. Hist. ii. 78) that the priests of Ba'al offered with Elijah (1 K 18). In Greek and Roman writers there are many memories of the earlier sanctity of various Phœnician mountains, from Mt. Casius to Carmel. Waters, too, were regarded with veneration, and some were particularly associated with certain gods, and even named after them (as the Adonis). Springs and rivers, two sources of life in the East, were regarded with peculiar reverence. Trees, too, we find sacred, especially to certain goddesses. The cypress, myrtle, and palm were closely associated with Astarte. This specialization is, however, probably only a development from an earlier form of nature-worship.

The ordinary worship of the Phœnician might be offered in any place in the open air, but was most natural on high places, with trees, and often with a sacred stream. Among these surroundings was built an altar with an ashera beside it, and on it the sacrifice was offered. But there is mention in history of temples (e.g. the temple of Melkarth at Tyre); and one would naturally expect that those who did so much for the temple of Jerusalem should have had great sanctuaries of their own. Yet it is very doubtful whether the temple ever played a very important part in the worship of Phœnicia, or was ever much more than a prominent adornment of a city. Sacrifices were usual, and human life was offered in the fire and human blood on the altars, but apparently only on important occasions. Various animals, both tame and wild, were offered, and products of the field as well as flesh. Sacred prostitution was also a form of offering common to many acts of Phœnician worship. Vows were made in time of difficulty or danger, and votive offerings (statuettes, tablets, etc.) were common. Feasts, too, were often associated with religious rites. Priests and priestesses officiated, and the king himself was sometimes (if not always) a priest.

G. W. THATCHER.

PHOENIX (Φοίνιξ, AV Phenice) was a good harbour on the south coast of Crete. When the corn-ship from Alexandria, bound for either Puteoli or the Portus Augustus beside Ostia at the mouth of the Tiber,* on which St. Paul was sailing from Myra towards Italy, had been detained so long on the voyage that it was considered too late in the season to risk the passage across the open sea from Crete to the southern coast of Italy, it was resolved to winter in Crete. When the resolution was come to, the ship was lying in Fair Havens, near the middle of the south coast. The question then arose, where should the ship lie up? The centurion, who evidently had the supreme authority,† called a council to advise him on this question; and the opinion of both captain and sailing-master was that they should seek an opportunity and make for the harbour of Phœnix. Paul, whose opinion was also asked (as, though a prisoner, he was treated with much consideration, being a Roman whose appeal to the emperor had been allowed by the procurator governing Palestine, and being also an experienced and practised traveller), strongly urged that they should stay where they were. There must have been good reasons on both sides. The experienced sailors had some ground for their opinion: presumably Phœnix was a better and safer harbour, and quite probably also it was recognized as being the proper place to winter in, if one of the many ships engaged in that trade had to spend the stormy season on that part of their long voyage (as must have been often the case). On the other hand, Paul dreaded the voyage to Phœnix, which therefore must have been some distance away. Winds from the north strike with terrific force on the sea a little south from Crete (though the waters immediately on the coast are protected by the lofty mountains). The danger, then, would be greatest in crossing the great opening of the gulf of Messaria, which begins a few miles west of Fair Havens. It is obvious, therefore, that Phœnix is to be looked for somewhere on the other, or western, side of that gulf.

† That this was so, and that the centurion had authority even over the captain, results from the character of the imperial service (the ship belonged, of course, to one of the imperial corn fleets), in which the military service ranked higher than the naval, and yet was not strictly divided from it. But the centurion exercised his authority with the penalty of severe punishment before him, if he mismanaged; and he therefore would necessarily ask advice on the point of where to winter, and in purely nautical matters would leave the captain and the sailing-master free in their own departments. See Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, p. 324 f.

The centurion, as was right and almost obligatory in his situation,* took the advice of the experts; and, when the opportunity of a mild south wind was given, they set sail; but in attempting to run across the gulf of Messaria, they were caught by a tremendous north-easterly gale, which swooped down on them from Mount Ida, and narrowly escaped after a terrible voyage of many days across the open sea.

Phœnix is described by Strabo (p. 475) as being a settlement (κατοικία, denoting a large flourishing village,† originally a settlement of colonists or κάρουκοι) on an isthmus. The passage is very obscure, owing to a lacuna; but apparently what Strabo describes as the isthmus was a narrow part of the island of Crete, between the northern and the southern sea, with a small town, Amphimalla, on the northern coast, and Phœnix on the southern. Apparently he considered Phœnix as a settlement in the territory of Lappa or Lappa, a Cretan city of importance, striking coins (Φοίνικα τὸν Λαμπεῶν). Now the situation of Lappa is practically certain; it was situated in the inner country, where Crete is narrow for a space, before it broadens out again to its western end, at a site called Pólis. On the southern coast of this narrower part of Crete, Phœnix must be sought. Nearly due south from Lappa there is a village, Loutró, with a harbour, described as the safest harbour on the south coast of Crete. Captain Sprat, an experienced surveyor and sailor, was fully convinced, after an exploration of the south coast, that Loutró must be Phœnix, 'because it is the only harbour west of Fair Havens in which a vessel of any size‡ could find any shelter during the winter months.' James Smith, who defends this view by very convincing arguments, quotes several even stronger assertions of the superiority of Loutró to all other harbours on the south coast. There is some evidence that the tradition of the ancient name remains among the Greeks of the place (Smith's Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, ed. 3, p. 250 ff., App. I. and II.; also p. 86 ff.).

Ptolemy (iii. 17. 3) describes both a harbour Phœnikous and a town near the south coast called Phœnix. His frequent vagueness and want of accuracy make him an unreliable authority; but he places the town and harbour evidently in this part of Crete (see further, below).

Phœnice (i.e. Phœnix) is mentioned as a bishopric in the earlier Notitiae, viii. and ix.; § and Hierocles gives it in his list of Cretan cities. All three authorities speak of it as beside a place Aradena (or Ariadne, Not. ix.): the phrase Φοίνιξ ἵτροι Ἀραδένα denotes that two distinct places were united as a single bishopric. Now Aradena still retains its ancient name as Aradhena, a place

* See the preceding note.

† See Buresch, Aus Lydien, p. 2 f.

‡ The ship which is concerned in the question was large, being able to accommodate 268 of a crew and passengers, and a cargo of corn from Alexandria for Rome.

§ In Not. vii., which is the oldest known, there is a lacuna of about 200 names, among which were the Cretan bishoprics.

which is not much more than a mile from Loutró. Again, Stephanus Byz. mentions Aradena (Ἀραδῆν) as a city of Crete which is also called Anopolis; and about two miles north of Loutró there is a village on high ground with ruins which is called still Anapolis. This is probably to be identified with the Phœnix which Ptolemy distinguishes from the harbour, while Aradhena and Loutró together constitute his harbour Phœnikous, and all three were united in a single bishopric.

Again, Hierocles (whose order in enumeration is commonly a very good guide) mentions the island of CAUDA or Cláuda (he uses the form Κλαύδος) next to Phœnix. Now that island is only a few miles due south of Loutró.

Finally, an inscription placed here in the reign of Trajan shows that an imperial ship was spending so long a time at this point of its course between Alexandria and Italy that there was time to erect some considerable work, whose nature is not specified. There can hardly be any doubt that the ship was lying up for the winter, and the imperial freedman who was in authority on the ship employed the crew at some useful work on shore. The sailing-master, gubernator (compare κυβερνήτης, Ac 27<sup>11</sup>), and the ship's sign, paraseumum (compare παράσημον, Ac 28<sup>11</sup>), are both mentioned. See Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck, 261.

Thus we see that Loutró was beside a harbour where at least occasionally the large ships of that Egyptian corn service wintered.

The identification of Loutró as the harbour called Phœnix in Ac 27<sup>12</sup> seems beyond dispute, if these accounts of travellers and explorers rest on a sufficiently minute examination of the coast. But the identification is encumbered by one serious difficulty. The harbour of Phœnix is described in Acts as looking towards the south-west and the north-west, i.e. apparently as opening towards the west, with a mouth just so wide that the entrance extends up towards north-west and down towards south-west. But the harbour of Loutró opens towards the east, looking between north-east and south-east.

In this difficulty there seem to be only three alternatives open. 1. The harbour of Loutró is formed by a very narrow isthmus connecting a broader peninsula with the mainland; and there is a harbour on each side of the isthmus. As the isthmus runs out south from the mainland, one of these harbours looks east, viz. Loutró, while the other looks west. Bishop Wordsworth has suggested that the western harbour may be the ancient Phœnix, and has pointed out that on the Admiralty chart the name Phinika is given to it. Obviously, most of the arguments for identifying Loutró as Phœnix would apply equally well to this western harbour, which is separated from the other only by a narrow isthmus, and is almost equally near Aradhena and Anapolis. The only difficulty lies in the very positive assertions that Loutró is the only well-sheltered harbour; and certainly the chart represents the western harbour as more widely open. Still it is distinctly desirable that the western harbour should be more closely and critically examined. Sprat, indeed, can hardly have failed to do so, and his weighty authority is almost conclusive (though not quite); but the rest of the evidence depends much on the statements of residents in Loutró; and every traveller knows how prone the Greeks are to emphasize too strongly the arguments which support the identification of their own town with an ancient place of fame; their very love and respect for antiquities lead them to exaggerate the claims of their home.

The conclusion must be that Wordsworth's suggestion is not absolutely disproved, though the evidence accessible at present is against it. Among other things one desiderates careful examination as to whether the coast-line has been modified during eighteen centuries, and whether there are any traces of the western harbour having been used in ancient times.

2. James Smith suggests that the words of Ac 27<sup>12</sup> βλέποντα κατὰ Δίβη καὶ κατὰ Χῶρον, do not mean, as is commonly thought, 'looking towards south-west and north-west,' but 'looking in the direction in which the south-west and north-west winds blow' (i.e. towards north-east and south-east). His rendering is distinctly against the analogy of Greek literary expression; but, considering how little is known of Greek technical sailor language, one cannot feel quite certain that the rendering is absolutely impossible.

3. It has been pointed out* that Luke did not actually visit Phœnix (for the ship never went there), but merely speaks on report: his authority was the argument used by the captain and the sailing-master of the vessel in the council which the centurion called. Naturally these arguments were reported to him by Paul; and, even if Luke were wrong, his mistake would prove, not want of observation of a place which he had seen, but misapprehension of the description of a place strange to him, after that description has passed through an intermediate channel. If (as was often the case) the expression of sailors differed from that of literary Greek and of the ordinary landsman, an error might have thus been produced without any one being conscious of it.

The case, therefore, must be pronounced undecided until Sprat's statement (weighty as it is) is confirmed by new and careful examination; but the balance of evidence is strong that Loutró is Phœnix; and in that case the third alternative is perhaps least improbable, though the second is not proved to be impossible.

PHRYGIA.—

- I. Geographical and Historical.
- II. Pauline Geography.
- III. Phrygia in Acts 2<sup>10</sup>.
- IV. Christianity in Phrygia.
- V. The Jews in Phrygia.

Phrygia (Φρυγία) was the name of a very large country in Asia Minor. On the view which will be here set forth, the noun Phrygia never occurs in the Bible, but only the term 'the Phrygian region' (Ac 16<sup>6</sup> 18<sup>23</sup>); † and in 2 Mac 5<sup>22</sup> the ethnic 'Phrygian' is applied to Philip, who was left as governor of Jerusalem by king Antiochus Epiphanes about B.C. 170. In addition to this, a journey right across Phrygia is implied tacitly in Ac 16<sup>7-9</sup>, and another is briefly described in Ac 19<sup>1</sup> (according to the view to be here explained). But in spite of the very small appearance made by the Phrygian name in the Bible, there are such difficult questions connected with the passages where it occurs that a somewhat long discussion is needed. Moreover, Phrygia had unusual importance in early Christian history, and the monuments of Christianity before the time of Constantine that remain in the country are of unique number, interest, and importance. It can * Ramsay, St. Paul the Trav. p. 326.

† Many scholars regard Φρυγίας as a noun, not an adjective, in both these passages; others take it as an adjective in 16<sup>6</sup>, and a noun in 18<sup>23</sup>. These opinions will be very fully treated in the sequel.

be truly said that the first Christian city was a city of Phrygia.

It will be convenient to classify the following remarks under headings.

I. GEOGRAPHICAL AND HISTORICAL.—The vast country of Phrygia presents so great a variety in natural character that it cannot be described except at too great length. The level of the cities varies from the frontier town Karoura in the coast-valley of the Mæander, 500 ft. above sea-level, to the ancient city, among the monuments of the early kings beside the tomb of Midas, about 4000 ft. Great mountains, plains, and lakes are found in it. The two chief cities of Phrygia in the time of Paul were Laodicea and Apamea (Strabo, p. 576).

Phrygia means the land of the Phryges; and there is a general agreement that (as Herodotus, vii. 73, says) the Phryges were a tribe, or union of tribes, from Macedonia or Western Thrace, who crossed the Hellespont into Asia Minor, and gradually spread their conquests first over the Troad, and then farther east and south over the plateau. In the eastern direction they penetrated at their extremest range of power through the Sangarius valley and up to the banks of the Halys. On the south-east they reached ICONIUM, which was the last Phrygian city on that side. On the south they were stopped by the Pisidian mountains, the northern ridges of the Taurus range, into which they seem never to have penetrated. On the west the boundaries vary most; but on all sides they vary to an extraordinary degree. Hence, in trying to define what any ancient author means by the name 'Phrygia,' we must begin by inquiring what period is referred to, and what was the usage of the name in that period.

That the country of the Phrygians at an early period was bounded on the north-west only by the waters of the Ægean and the Hellespont is beyond doubt. They were the masters of the sea, according to Diodorus (vii. 11), for 25 years about B.C. 900. Troy is frequently called Phrygian, and there was a large, vaguely defined region along the Hellespont and the Sea of Marmora, called Hellespontine Phrygia. The country beside Mount Sipyles, north of Smyrna, the realm of Tantalos and Pelops, is often called Phrygia by the poets, who reproduce ancient semi-historical myths; and this shows that considerable part of western Lydia once bore the name of Phrygia.

At an early time the irruption of Thracian tribes, such as Thynoi, Bithynoi, Mysoi, across the Bosphorus drove a wedge through the country of Phrygia, and separated Hellespontine Phrygia from the inner country, which was henceforth termed Great (Μεγάλη, Magna) Phrygia. The Phrygian element and name died out in Lydia also at an early period. The Troad ceased to be called Phrygia; and though the name of Hellespontine Phrygia* lingered on for several centuries, the land lost the Phrygian character,† and after the time of Alexander the Great it seems to have no longer possessed any claim to be called a distinct and separate country. Strabo still uses the name in A.D. 19. The north-eastern regions of Phrygia Magna were transformed into GALATIA during the 3rd cent., first through gradual drifting of the Gauls into that district as the one where there was least resistance to contend with, and finally, about B.C. 232, by general agreement of the surrounding rulers, and especially Attalus I., king of Pergamum, who penned them into this place and acknowledged their right to it, but set limits to their wide-ranging forays. About B.C. 205 a new name, Phrygia Epictetus, i.e. Acquired Phrygia, came into existence. It was applied to a region in the north which seems to have been acquired by Attalus I. from Bithynia. According to Strabo (p. 576) it contained six cities at least, Azanoi, Nakolia, Kotiaion, Midaion, Dorylaion, Kadoi. Another name for a special district was Paroreios Phrygia,* the great valley in the east between Sultan-Dagh and Emir-Dagh (whose ancient names are unknown), with the cities Ipsos or Julia, Philomelion, Thymbrion or Hadrianopolis, Tyriaion, and many small towns and villages.

* Also called Little Phrygia in distinction from Great Phrygia (Strabo, p. 571).

† The Phrygian character was probably bound up with the use of the Phrygian language. Iconium called itself Phrygian, because the language was used there (see Ramsay, Historical Commentary on Galatians, p. 216).

A third district was Pisidic Phrygia, or Phrygia towards Pisidia, or Phrygia the Pisidian.† The city of Antioch towards Pisidia is the only one assigned to this district by Strabo; but Ptolemy, and probably Polybius, extend it more widely to include Apollonia and other cities in the valleys underneath the northern flanks of Taurus. Strabo clearly says that Paroreios and Pisidian Phrygia were only parts of Great Phrygia, whereas he distinguishes Epictetus as a separate and added country.

Under the Romans, the whole country of Cibyra and most of the valley of the Lysis were reckoned to Phrygia, though previously they had been counted either to Pisidia or to Kabalis or to Milyas. It would also appear that the lower part of the Lycus valley was divided at an earlier time between Lydia (viz. Hierapolis and Hydrela) and Caria (viz. Laodicea and Trapezopolis and Attoudda);‡ but in the Roman period all these cities came to be classed to Phrygia. On the other hand, Iconium was then classed to Lycaonia (except in the estimation of its inhabitants, see ICONIUM and LYCAONIA), as were also Laodicea Katakakumene and even perhaps Tyriaion.

In the Roman time Phrygia was divided between two provinces, Asia and Galatia, with thorough Roman indifference to national frontiers in mapping out their province—an indifference which resulted in the final failure of those provincial divisions to attain permanence. These two parts were called Phrygia Asiana and Phrygia Galatica: for the former name, see Galen, π. τροφ. δυν. iv. p. 312 (Kuhn, vi. p. 515); for the latter, see a notice in a Byzantine Menologion (taken from a good and ancient source) quoted in Acta Sanctorum, Sept. 28, p. 563.

That part of Phrygia was included in the province Galatia, though often ignored, is no longer denied by any scholar. A number of inscriptions, enumerating the parts of the province Galatia, mention among them Phrygia; e.g. CIL iii. 6818, mentions the parts as Galatia, Pisidia, Phrygia, Lycaonia, Isauria, Paphlagonia, Pontus Galaticus, Pontus Polemoniacus; compare CIL iii. 6819; Fränkel, Inscr. Pergam. No. 451 (the lists vary at different periods as districts were added to or taken from the province). See also GALATIA, vol. ii. p. 90 f.

Moreover, several cities which Strabo and Ptolemy assign to Phrygia, e.g. Apollonia and Antioch, are shown by their coins and by other means to belong to the province Galatia; and Ptolemy gives the region which he calls Pisidian Phrygia as a part of the province Galatia.

Galatic Phrygia, or the Phrygian region of the province Galatia, was not a very large country. It was a strip of territory extending in considerable length along the front of the Pisidian mountains; and it included the cities of Iconium (in the native usage), Antioch the Colonia, Apollonia, and, as Ptolemy says, several others. Asian Phrygia was immensely larger, including all Paroreios and Epictetus and far the larger part of Great Phrygia. In process of time the Pisidian connexion became stronger, and the name Pisidian Phrygia was gradually disused. Antioch ceased to be considered a city of Phrygia and was called 'of Pisidia.' Some of the epigraphic lists of the regions making up the province Galatia omit Phrygia and mention only Pisidia. At last a distinct Roman province Pisidia was constituted about A. D. 295, with the metropolis Antioch and a secondary metropolis Iconium. But in the time of St. Paul, and long after, the view was dominant among the people that Antioch and Iconium were cities of the Phrygian region.*

* It is often wrongly said that Paroreios denoted the country west and south from Sultan-Dagh, with the city of Pisidian Antioch. That was Pisidic Phrygia (see following note).

A distinction between High Phrygia and Low Phrygia can be traced in the Roman time from Strabo, A. D. 20, onwards. Low Phrygia was a name that included Hierapolis (Philostratus, Imagines, i. 12) and Lake Anava (Strabo, i. p. 49) and the Sangarios (Steph. Byz. s. v.), i. e. it included those districts that were less elevated above sea-level, while High Phrygia (ἡ ἄνω Φρυγία) was the elevated region of central Phrygia lying between the Sangarios on the north-east and the great road passing close to Hierapolis in the Lycus valley and along the edge of Lake Anava. Aristides speaks of a certain city (probably Akmonia, possibly Synnada) as in High Phrygia. The pair of terms rarely occur in literature; but they clearly were in current local use.

We have seen how Phrygia steadily diminished, losing parts on the west, north-west, north-east, south-east, and south. About A. D. 295 or soon afterwards, when the great province Asia was broken up, two new provinces were formed, † Phrygia Prima and Secunda, called also Great and Small, ‡ or Pacatiana and Salutaris: the last pair of names came into use in the latter part of the 4th cent., and soon established themselves in almost universal usage. The name Salutaris is explained by the Byzantine writers as caused by the fact that St. Paul had preached the gospel of salvation there. This is a curious statement: it implies that St. Paul had preached much more in Phrygia Secunda than in Phrygia Prima (which was the western half under the primacy of Laodicea). Now that may be either a belief founded on old authority, or a mere groundless fabrication of the Byzantine time, to explain a curious name. In the former case it would afford valuable evidence bearing on the history of St. Paul, for there was good authority underlying the really old tradition in Asia Minor. In the latter case it would be absolutely valueless. Unfortunately, the latter alternative is pretty certainly true. The name is Latin (Salutaris) transformed into a Greek word; but if it had rested on a genuine popular tradition or belief, it would have been Greek, for Greek was the language of the country, and very few can have known Latin in Phrygia. The name Salutaris has probably nothing to do with St. Paul or with religion.

The name Phrygia henceforth was restricted within the limits of those two provinces. The district of Cibyra, on the south-west, was given over to Caria, Apamea and Metropolis to Pisidia, and (between 386 and 395) Amorion, Orkistos, and other north-eastern cities to Galatia. In the 8th cent. part of Paroreios was transferred to Galatia, and placed under Amorion as metropolis: it is, however, very doubtful whether this transference affected more than the ecclesiastical organization, for the civil division into provinces (though always retained in the ecclesiastical system) disappeared politically in the 8th cent., and was replaced by the military system of Themes. In the later Byzantine authors much confusion and ignorance is shown in regard to the divisions of Phrygia. Constantine Porphyrogenitus, in his treatise de Thematibus, defines the extent of Salutaris in a thoroughly erroneous way. Cinnamus (p. 198) speaks of Laodicea ad Lycum as on the border of Little Phrygia. Ducas gives the name Great Phrygia to part of the region of Hellespontus (from Assos to the Hellespont), calling it also Low Phrygia: he does not speak of Little Phrygia or of High Phrygia, but apparently he must have treated those names as equivalent, and including both Pacatiana and Salutaris (as Cinnamus evidently does), which he sums up as 'all Phrygia' (see pp. 13, 72). Cedrenus (ii. p. 69), and Nicetas Chon. (p. 68) speak of High Phrygia as evidently including both Pacatiana and Salutaris. In those writers the names are prompted rather by inaccurate antiquarian memory than by real survival of the names in popular usage (see Ramsay, Historical Geography of Asia Minor, pp. 150-153).

II. PHRYGIA IN PAULINE GEOGRAPHY.—This long enumeration of vicissitudes and changes shows how slow one must be in making assertions as to the meaning of the name Phrygia in any ancient writer, and how carefully the situation and the context must be studied. Accordingly, when in a writer of the 1st cent. we find the statement that a traveller crossed Phrygia, we must not assume forthwith that a journey across Phrygia Asiana is meant. The term Phrygia is employed freely in inscriptions of that period, found in the country outside of it, in the sense of Phrygia Galatica; and a writer who follows as a rule local expression may have used this term Phrygia in the same way as local inscriptions do. In such a case we must examine the context to see which division of Phrygia is to be understood. Now in Ac 16<sup>8</sup> Paul is stated to have traversed the region of Phrygia.* What part of Phrygia did he traverse? The situation makes this clear. Paul in his journey had reached Lystra. † He now went on through Phrygia. It is beyond doubt that the part of Phrygia through which he must go immediately on leaving Lystra was Galatic Phrygia, which began only a very few miles north of Lystra. Moreover, Paul had started on this journey with the deliberate intention of visiting two cities of Galatic Phrygia, Iconium and Antioch; and as we now see, geography makes it clear that he could not possibly proceed onwards from Lystra without going through Iconium and through part of Galatic Phrygia. ‡

* In Antioch the memory of its Phrygian character remained as late as the 3rd cent. (see evidence in Ramsay, Histor. Comment. on Galatians, §§ 19, 20); but outsiders called it 'of Pisidia' in the 2nd cent. Similarly in Iconium.

† Malalas says that Constantine divided Phrygia into two provinces, implying that in 295 only one province, Phrygia, was constituted. If so, Constantine's action is older than A. D. 325, as is shown in Cities and Bishops of Phrygia, pt. i. p. 81; Malalas, in fact, mentions Constantine's act before the Council of Nicæa (A. D. 325), xiii. p. 323.

‡ Small Phrygia (Μικρά Φρυγία) occurs in a few 4th cent. authorities; the name Great Phrygia in this new sense does not occur (our authorities say 'Phrygia' and 'Small Phrygia'), but seems necessarily to follow from the other term.

* It is immaterial to the geogr. import whether Φρυγίαν in that passage is to be taken as a noun or (what we think right) as an adjective connected with the following χώρας.

† Some say Iconium; but we cannot consider that Ac 16<sup>2</sup> implies that Paul has reached Iconium, for he is still in Lystra in 16<sup>3</sup>. Ac 16<sup>1</sup> and 16<sup>8</sup> give the successive stages of travel. This, too, hardly touches the geogr. import.

‡ This is even clearer on the North-Galatian than on the South-Galatian theory. If Paul were going from Lystra to North Galatia, he must proceed first to Iconium in Galatic Phrygia; and if he were in Iconium, he must go on through part of that country. It may, on that theory, be maintained that Paul went on through Asian Phrygia afterwards; but it must be admitted that he first went through Galatic Phrygia.

Moreover, if a writer of that period desired to be thoroughly clear, he ought to add some expression or epithet to show which part of Phrygia he meant. But this is exactly what Luke does in Ac 16<sup>6</sup>. He adds the adjective 'Galatic' to show that he means 'Galatic Phrygia.' It is unfortunate that both AV and RV confuse the expression, and render the Greek adjective by the noun 'Galatia.' Luke never speaks of 'Galatia'; because, like most Greeks, he disliked calling the province by that name, and preferred the expression 'Galatic province or region' (as used in CIG 3991).

If Luke had used the noun Phrygia in this place, he would have simply appended the adjective and called the country traversed by Paul 'Galatic Phrygia,' the term quoted above. But he desired to be minutely and pragmatically accurate; and (as is sometimes the case in ancient writers*) in his desire to exclude all possibility of mistake he employed a more cumbersome expression, which becomes obscure to us through our ignorance of the nomenclature of that little known region. A custom existed of designating the various districts included in the vast province GALATIA † as χώραι or regions; e.g. the Isaurian region (Strabo, p. 568 f.), the Antiochian region (at this time a kingdom governed by Antiochus, but afterwards incorporated, see Ptolemy, v. 6. 17). Luke follows this custom: he thinks of 'the Phrygian region,' and adds the adjective 'Galatic,' calling it 'the region (which is at once) Phrygian and Galatic,' ‡ i.e. the country which ethnologically and according to native Greek expression is Phrygian, while politically and according to Roman provincial classification it is Galatic (τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν). Lightfoot was the first to see and to state clearly the right and necessary construction of this expression, and subsequent discussion has failed to shake his decisive argument; but, while he correctly translated it, he failed (owing to the obscurity in which central Asia Minor was then enveloped) to see the right geographical application.

The interpretation of Ac 16<sup>6</sup> affects that of 18<sup>23</sup>; and on that account Luke expresses his meaning more briefly in the second passage. In that passage, as Dr. Hort says (Lectures on Colossians and Ephesians, p. 82), 'he followed his old course (i.e. as in ch. 16) through southern Asia Minor, and this time was allowed to follow it right on to Ephesus,' instead of being stopped and turned away north, as in 16<sup>6</sup>. He passed now through 'the region of Galatia and Phrygia,' as it is rendered in RV (τὴν Γαλατικὴν χώραν καὶ Φρυγίαν). These words are applied to a more extended journey than those of 16<sup>6</sup>, for in 18<sup>23</sup> the journey through Derbe and Lystra is included, whereas 16<sup>6</sup> begins from Lystra, and includes only the subsequent journey. The difference of order of the words is important: in 16<sup>6</sup> two epithets are attached to one noun which follows them, whereas in 18<sup>23</sup> an epithet with its noun is connected by καὶ with a following epithet (or noun), § and the second epithet (with the preceding noun repeated in thought) indicates a second region (this order in enumerating a list is common in Greek). || Two interpretations of the words have been suggested—

1. Φρυγίαν is to be interpreted as a noun, and

* An instructive example is mentioned by Mommsen (Res Gestæ D. Aug. p. 38), præcipuam curam ducens sensum animi quam apertissime exprimere nec dubitans gratia aliquid detrudere ut vitaret obscuritatem (Sueton. Aug. 86), ut sit, ipso nimio ambiguitatis vitanda studio incidit in ambiguitatem!

† See above, p. 864, and vol. ii. p. 87.

‡ The idiomatic English is 'the Phrygian or Galatic Region,' see ii. p. 90, and Classical Review, 1898, p. 337.

§ Epithet or noun, according as we take Φρυγίαν as adjective or as noun; see next sentence.

|| Examples are given in vol. ii. p. 90, τῆς Ναβατιτικῆς χώρας καὶ Τρουαίης καὶ Μωαβιτικῆς καὶ Ἀσσυρίωνος, etc.

indicates the country Phrygia, both Asian and Galatic; Luke may be supposed to use Φρυγία χώρα in 16<sup>6</sup> to indicate Phrygia as a region of the Galatic province, and Φρυγία the noun in 18<sup>23</sup> to indicate the country Phrygia as a single conception independent of Roman provincial divisions. Then τὴν Γαλατικὴν χώραν would indicate 'the Galatic region' in the sense of the province like Γαλατικὴ ἐπαρχία in the Iconian inscription of A.D. 54-55, CIG 3991. Luke would, on this theory, say that Paul traversed the Galatic province and Phrygia (the country). There is a certain simplicity in this view which recommends it; yet for many reasons we are obliged to reject it. The following arrangement seems conclusive. St. Paul, as he traversed the region of Galatia and Phrygia in order, established all the disciples: there were disciples in both the region of Galatia and in Phrygia, so that throughout both regions he passed from Church to Church. Now we know positively that he had as yet no Churches in any part of Phrygia except Galatic Phrygia. Moreover, the remarkable reading of the Bezan text Ac 19<sup>1</sup> shows clearly that its originator (whether Luke himself, as Prof. Blass and his supporters hold, or a 2nd cent. reviser, as seems more probable) considered Paul to have arrived at the borders of Asia in 18<sup>23</sup>, and then, after completing his survey of his Churches, to have begun to return to Jerusalem, when the Spirit bade him turn back again into Asia (i.e. the province Asia), the higher parts of which he traversed, and so, finally, came to Ephesus.

We must therefore adopt the following interpretation:—

2. Φρυγίαν is an adjective, being the briefer description of the same region which in 16<sup>6</sup> is called with pragmatical minuteness τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν. Luke would on this theory say, 'Paul traversed the Galatic region and the Phrygian.' Now, in truth, Paul did traverse two regions of the vast Galatian province, one Lycaonia containing the cities Derbe and Lystra, the other Phrygia with the cities Iconium and Antioch.* The one real difficulty is this: could Roman Lycaonia be called simply 'the Galatic region'? The phrase can be explained and defended only on the supposition that the speaker conceives himself standing or travelling in Lycaonia: Lycaonia consisted of two parts, Roman or Galatic and non-Roman or Antiochian (under king Antiochus); Ptolemy tells us that the latter was called Ἀντιοχίανη (χώρα), and the corresponding term for the other part necessarily would be Γαλατικὴ χώρα: the inhabitants of Lycaonia would describe the two divisions of his country by those terms. This explanation may seem rather complicated, but the complexity is due to the real complexity of the divisions at the time. As we see, it is the expression of one who feels himself standing in the country, i.e. it must be regarded as the expression used by St. Paul the actual traveller, and caught from his mouth by the listener Luke.

The system of dividing Phrygia into High and Low is probably referred to in Ac 19<sup>1</sup>, though the name of the country is not actually mentioned. The journey described in 18<sup>23</sup>, as we have just seen, carried St. Paul over ground which he had previously traversed and cities where there were already disciples; but there still remained a long stretch of country between him and his goal in Ephesus, viz. the whole breadth of the large province Asia. The journey is resumed in 19<sup>1</sup>, where St. Paul is said to have traversed the higher parts (τὰ ἀνωτερικὰ μέρη). The term ἄνω is often used in Greek to indicate simply the inner country as distinguished from the coast;* but this distinction seems not in harmony with Luke's narrative: it is of no consequence to him to distinguish coast and interior: moreover, most of the previous part of the journey was over the high ground of the interior. Here we want some expression suitable specially to describe the part of Asia which he traversed. The word ἀνωρεικός is a rare one, and seems chosen in order to suggest a contrast with certain lower parts;† in other words, the meaning is that St. Paul avoided the route through Lower Phrygia, and traversed Higher Phrygia (according to the distinction mentioned above, § I.). This distinction was important: Luke had a definite purpose in defining the part of Phrygia which St. Paul traversed. He makes it clear that the apostle did not follow the longer and easier trade-route by Apamea, Lake Anava, Colossæ, and Laodicea (which led through Lower Phrygia, see above, p. 864), but took the other more direct road (less suitable for wheeled traffic, but better for walking travellers) across High Phrygia, keeping very near a straight line from Metropolis to Ephesus.‡ That was a point of some importance, for Paul mentions that he had never seen the Churches of Colossæ or Laodicea, which therefore must have been founded by some of his coadjutors (perhaps Timothy).

III. PHRYGIA IN ACTS 2<sup>10</sup>.—Phrygia is also mentioned in Ac 2<sup>10</sup> in the list of places whence came the Jews and proselytes who were present in Jerusalem at the Feast of Pentecost shortly after the Crucifixion—'dwellers in Mesopotamia, and in Judæa§ and Cappadocia, in Pontus and Asia, Phrygia and Pamphylia, in Egypt,' etc. This remarkable list is an insoluble puzzle. It is made on no discoverable principle, either as regards the order of enumeration or as regards the districts mentioned and omitted. The only certain fact about it is that it is quite different in style from the original work of the author of Acts, and must have been derived by him from the earlier authority, or authorities, to whom he owed the narrative of the events described in ch. 2. Some districts where Jews were numerous, and which are certain to have had representatives at Jerusalem, such as Cilicia, are omitted. The names, as a rule, are those of countries, not of Roman provinces; yet Asia is mentioned; this name must denote either the Roman province or a much larger region (see LYDIA); in the former case it would include Phrygia Asiana, in the latter case it would include all Phrygia, both Asiana and Galatica, together with Pamphylia.¶

The most probable view is that Asia in this passage means the province (a Roman province being named in this one case, because the name had already established itself in popular Greek nomenclature); and Phrygia is named in addition, partly because it was inhabited by such large numbers of Jews (see below, § V.), partly because Phrygia Galatica, which contained very many

† ἀνωρεικός (except in passages dependent on Ac 19<sup>1</sup>) is used only by medical writers, Hippocrates and Galen (if we may depend on Steph. Thesaurus on this matter). Hobart (Medical Language of St. Luke, p. 148) does not fail to observe the confirmation which this word gives to his views.

‡ The Church in the Roman Empire before 170, second or later editions, p. 94, note.

§ The name Judæa is suspected by Blass, who would substitute on Jerome's authority Syria. It is, of course, not in harmony with the context; but, in a list which is as a whole incomprehensible, it is vain to carp at one incomprehensible detail.

¶ Pontus and Cappadocia may be regarded as the external boundaries of 'Asia,' taking that term in the sense described in a very difficult passage, Pliny (Nat. Hist. v. 28), where it is said that 'Asia,' if its two parts are taken together, extended from the Ægean and Egyptian and Pamphylian Seas to Paphlagonia and Pontus: on the meaning, see Studia Biblica, iv. p. 45.

Jews, was not included in the province Asia. Similarly, the Lugdunensian Christians wrote to τοῖς ἐπ' Ἀσίας καὶ Φρυγίας ἀδελφοῖς, for they desired to include in their address the important Churches of Iconium, Antioch, and probably several in Galatic Phrygia of later foundation (which were not in Asia). On this address, probably, Tertullian models his expression (adv. Prax. 1) 'pacem ecclesiis Asiæ et Phrygiæ inferentem.' There can be no doubt that the Churches of Phrygia Galatica were as important in the 2nd cent. Christianity, as its Jews were in the Jewish world.

IV. CHRISTIANITY IN PHRYGIA.—Christianity was introduced into Phrygia Galatica by Paul and Barnabas on their first missionary journey (Ac 13. 14). Paul revisited, confirmed, and strengthened them (Ac 16<sup>1-6</sup> 18<sup>22</sup>). Considering how much space the author of Acts assigns to the account of the formation of these Churches (along with the two Lycaonian Churches), and considering how often Paul visited and consolidated them, we must see that they were regarded as being highly important in the early Church.

Phrygia Asiana was traversed at least twice by St. Paul. On his second journey, accompanied by Silas and Timothy, he went from Pisidian Antioch northwards through the country to near the Bithynian frontier (probably to about Dorylaion, over against Mysia), and then westwards into Mysia and the Troad.* Paul was on that journey forbidden to preach in [the province] Asia, so that he cannot have founded any Churches in Asian Phrygia (though, perhaps, we need not interpret the prohibition so strictly as to suppose that he was bound to keep silence absolutely about the gospel on the journey to the Troad: probably the command only implied that he was not to make Asia his sphere of work). On the third journey St. Paul traversed Phrygia Asiana from east to west on a line between Antioch and Ephesus (see above). He probably preached on the journey; but there is no sign of any success; and he was evidently eager to go to Ephesus, and make it the centre for the whole province. Thus in all probability the earliest Churches in Phrygia Asiana were those of the Lycus valley, Colossæ, Laodicea, Hierapolis, founded through the work of his assistants and subordinates (probably Timothy in particular), while he was in Ephesus.

According to tradition of somewhat uncertain value, the Lycus valley was afterwards the scene of missionary work by St. John the apostle and by St. Philip (probably the apostle, though several authorities, especially the later, say he was the deacon). Archippus of Colossæ, the 'fellow-soldier' of St. Paul (Philem 2), was said to have been the first bishop of Laodicea (probably a recollection of his 'ministry, διακονία, in the Lord,' Col 4<sup>17</sup>), and to have been martyred at Chonæ (i.e. the later Byzantine representative of Colossæ); and Nymphas or Nympha Laodicensis is coupled as an apostle with Eubulus of Rome in the Greek Menæa, and commemorated on 28th February: cf. Col 4<sup>15</sup>. Heros is said to have been appointed bishop of Hierapolis by St. Philip, Epaphras of Colossæ by St. Paul. These traditions, hardly trustworthy in themselves, are at least evidence that the Lycus valley was the scene of steady and progressive work in the second half of the 1st century. That work was certainly not confined to the valley, but spread up, doubtless, east and north into Phrygia, and perhaps south towards Cibyra, so that LAODICEA must be taken as the centre and representative of a number of young

* The North-Galatian theory would lengthen the westward journey across Phrygia Asiana, and shorten the northward journey by diverting the route from that country into Galatia.

Churches (as well as those in Colossæ and Hierapolis; see above, p. 831*). Papias and Apollinaris, the great bishops of Hierapolis, Sagaris the bishop and martyr of Laodicea, are evidence of the importance of the Lycus valley in Christian history during the 2nd century.

If Laodicea was such a centre of Christian influence, so also we may be sure were Pisidian Antioch and Iconium. A trace of this work may be observed in the tradition that Bartholomew was the apostle of the Lycaones. It has been pointed out* that this must mean, not the people of Lycaonia, whose apostles were Paul and Barnabas, but the tribe of the Lycaones in central Phrygia, west and north-west of Synnada. But far more important and trustworthy evidence is furnished by the Christian inscriptions of Phrygia, which are collected for the central and south-western districts in Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, pt. ii. chs. xii. xvii.† The earliest is the famous epitaph of Avircius Marcellus, presbyter or bishop‡ of the less famous Hieropolis or Hierapolis in the Glaukos valley about A.D. 192. This document mentions St. Paul in such a way as to suggest that he was regarded with special respect in that district, probably owing to its having been first evangelized by his immediate followers and ministers.

The inscriptions fall into three local groups, differing widely in character. One has its chief centre in Eumeneia and Apamea, and probably resulted from the influence of the Lycus valley Churches; one is strong in the extreme south-east of Phrygia (and in the adjoining northern part of Lycaonia), and evidently sprang from the influence of Iconium and Antioch; the third is seen in the north of Phrygia in the valley of the Tembris or Tembrogus, and seems connected with the Christianity of the Troad (2 Co 2<sup>12</sup>),§ spreading up through Mysia and the province Bithynia. All three therefore seem traceable to a Pauline source. The inscriptions of the third group are more akin to the Montanist type, and those of the first to the Orthodox type,|| while those of the second are mostly indifferent, but contain occasional examples like both other classes. The inscriptions of the first two groups throw considerable light on the Christians of the 3rd cent. Already during the 2nd cent., in the Montanist controversy, Phrygia stands out rather as a country where Christians are contending with Christians, than one where missionaries are trying to convert pagans; and the inscriptions of the 3rd cent. set before us Eumeneia as a city which was mainly Christian in the period 250-300, in fact as the first Christian city (one may say with great confidence); and, further, they show probably that the prosperity of Eumeneia died about the beginning of the 4th cent. Now Eusebius and Lactantius mentioned that a city of Phrygia, whose population was wholly Christian, was destroyed by fire in the persecution of Diocletian, A.D. 301-312; and, though there are some slight discrepancies in details between their statements and probably some exaggeration in the sweeping conclusion, yet the general truth cannot reasonably be doubted; and the coincidence with Eumenian history is so striking that the statements may with the highest probability be applied to it. Apamea, its neighbour and fellow in Christian history, also seems to have sunk in importance to an extraordinary degree about the same time. On the very remarkable type of Christianity developed in those cities, see the full discussion in Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, ch. xii.

Christianity did not spread uniformly over Phrygia. The three local groups of inscriptions are separated by a large district, where the new religion seems not to have grown so strong until the time of Constantine.* The Phrygian martyrs who are known by name almost all belong to the period before A.D. 184 (see Neumann's list in der röm. Staat und die allgemeine Kirche, p. 283). When Christianity was so strong, the Roman theoretical principle, that Christians should be treated as outlaws, was difficult to carry out; for a formal accusation by an overt prosecutor was ordinarily required, and it would be difficult to find private persons ready to incur the hatred of a united and energetic body like the Christians. But in Diocletian's persecution the government hunted down the Christians, and employed soldiers and officials for that special purpose; and in such a time the cities where Christians were most numerous would suffer most. Even in Diocletian's time individual Phrygian martyrs were little remembered, but only the general facts that whole communities and one entire city were destroyed.

Considering at how early a date Christianity was diffused over large parts of Phrygia, it may seem strange that the ecclesiastical system was so backward there during the 4th cent., except in Galatic Phrygia, where the list of bishoprics can be traced almost complete during that century.† The reason lies in two noteworthy facts. In the first place, Phrygia was the country where, above all others, heresy was strongest; but the ecclesiastical lists are of the Orthodox Church. Thus, for example, Kotiaion was a great seat of Christianity in the 3rd cent., and so was the country of the Praipenisseis. Yet neither can be traced in the lists earlier than the 5th cent. The reason is, undoubtedly, that the Orthodox Church had little hold there. We know of either bishops or presbyters at Otrous and Hierapolis in the 2nd cent.; but in the ecclesiastical lists those two cities appear only in the 5th cent. In the second place, Phrygia was regarded by the orthodox writers as rude and uneducated,‡ because the organization and equipment of the Orthodox Church were in a backward state there. Christianity was so strong in certain parts of Phrygia that the persecution of Diocletian raged there on a vast scale, and almost annihilated people and civilization and organization.

V. THE JEWS IN PHRYGIA.—The position and history of the Jews in Phrygia is another large subject, which throws much light on the narrative of Acts and on the rapid spread of Christianity in the country. The Jews were much favoured by the Seleucid kings, as trustworthy colonists in the many cities which they founded to maintain their empire in Asia Minor, especially along the routes leading from their capital at Syrian Antioch through Cilicia and Lycaonia into Southern Phrygia§ and Lydia.

* On the evidence, Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, ii. p. 715; also p. 501.

† Galatic Phrygia is part of Pisidia in the lists. Those Pisidian bishoprics which can first be traced in the 5th cent. or later were in the mountainous and backward districts.

§ Perhaps also with Ac 16<sup>8</sup>, according to a tradition that can be traced in the interior of Mysia during the 4th or 5th cent. (see Acta S. Philetaeri, 19th May; and Expositor, Oct. 1888, p. 264). This tradition perhaps led to the Bezan text in Ac 16<sup>7</sup> διὰ τὴν ἑσπέρην; and, if so, the tradition must be as old as the 2nd cent. (implying that the statement that Mysia was 'neglected,' or 'passed by,' was regarded at that early date as incorrect in the quarters where the Bezan text originated).

|| But one case at least of the most marked northern type occurs, Cities and Bishoprics, ii. No. 393.

Seleucus Nikator (B.C. 301-280) granted them the highest class of rights, equal to those of Macedonian and Greek settlers, in all his colonies; and his successors maintained the privileges of the Jews. Various privileges were conceded to their religious scruples: the entire body of regulations guaranteeing their rights and privileges seems to have remained permanently in force in the cities, and is appealed to as 'the law of the Jews' in an inscription of Apamea as late as the 3rd cent. after Christ.* By one single act Antiochus the Great ordered 2000 Jewish families to be brought from Babylonia and settled in the strong places of Lydia and Phrygia about B.C. 200. When such a course of action lasted for fully a century, it is plain what large numbers of Jews must have been settled in Phrygia, Lycaonia, etc.

These considerations explain how Flaccus, the Roman governor of Asia in B.C. 62, could seize 100 pounds weight of gold at Apamea, and 20 at Laodicea, being contributions from the Jews of Phrygia on the point of being sent up to Jerusalem. These large sums, of course, represented the contributions of great districts, and not simply of the two cities. They are calculated by M. Th. Reinach as together equivalent to 100,000 drachmæ, being the contributions of 50,000 people paying two drachmæ annually.†

According to Dr. Neubauer (Géographie du Talmud, p. 315), these Jews had to a considerable extent lost connexion with their country and forgotten their language; the baths and wines of Phrygia had separated the Ten Tribes from their brethren, as the Talmud expresses it; they were readily converted to Christianity; and the Talmud alludes to the numerous converts. These opinions have been strongly confirmed by epigraphic discovery. The Phrygian Jews were strongly affected by their surroundings, and were ready to comply, at least outwardly, with many pagan customs, and especially with the forms of the imperial religion, regarded as the test of loyalty to the Roman empire. They probably were often inclined to magic and forbidden arts (see THYATIRA and Ac 19<sup>13</sup>). Their frequent tendency to amalgamate Jewish and pagan ideas in an eclectic philosophical system is illustrated at Colossæ (see the Epistle). A Jewess married to a Greek and having an uncircumcised son is mentioned at Lystra (Ac 16<sup>2, 3</sup>). At the same time there can be no doubt that the Phrygian Jews as a body preserved much of the old Jewish character, and presented in society a much higher and purer moral tone than the pagans; and it was this character that gave them great influence and attracted numerous proselytes. On the whole their existence was not hostile, but favourable, to Christianity. Luke emphasizes every instance of their opposition, but he shows clearly that there was another side to the question: the Jews of Pisidian Antioch were opposed to Paul's placing the Gentiles on an equality with themselves (Ac 13<sup>45</sup>), but not so much to his doctrines: a great multitude of Jews at Iconium believed. The Jewish and the Christian inscriptions melt into one another in Phrygia, so that it is often difficult to draw a line of distinction. The Phrygian Christians were strongly inclined to Judaism. Every heresy in Phrygia tended to become Judaistic. Novatianism, which seems to have been ments. The Jews of North Galatia were probably all late immigrants from Phrygia, etc.

* Cities and Bishops of Phrygia, pt. ii. No. 399 bis; see also ch. xv. on 'The Jews in Phrygia.'

† Textes Relatifs au Judaïsme, p. 240. He thinks they must represent several years' contribution; but as the two cities stand for all Asian Phrygia and great part of Lydia, it seems not at all impossible that they are the contribution of one year. Adramyttium and Pergamum are the only other two places where Flaccus is said to have seized Jewish money.

quite free from any Judaizing character in the West, became strongly tinged with it in Phrygia. The Phrygians regarded the 14th day of Nisan as the great religious day, and seem to have called the festival Azymia, the Unleavened. There is every appearance that the reconciliation between Christians and Jews, which was one great aim of St. Paul's work, was attained far more thoroughly in Phrygia than elsewhere.

Early Phrygian Judaic Christianity thus presents a very remarkable character, which stands in the closest relation with the Pauline Epistles. Its development was arrested by the terrible persecution of Diocletian, which seems to have raged with special fury in that most thoroughly Christianized of countries. As Eumeneia was the most thoroughly Christian city, so Apamea was the most strongly Jewish; and they (so far as we can judge) were the greatest sufferers (certainly very severe sufferers) under Diocletian.

PHYGELUS (Φύγελλος, WH Φύγελος).—Mentioned in 2 Ti 1<sup>15</sup> along with HERMOGENES (wh. see) as among those in Asia who turned away from St. Paul during his last imprisonment in Rome. The phrase 'all they which are in Asia,' proconsular Asia that is, must be qualified in some way, known doubtless to Timothy, and may perhaps be best taken to mean, 'All whose help I asked' (cf. 2 Ti 4<sup>16</sup>). We cannot tell what Phygelus refused to do, nor can we affirm with certainty that apostasy or declension from the faith is implied. Possibly he was asked to go to Rome to use some influence he had on the apostle's behalf, and refused to admit that St. Paul had any such claims on him. The forcible language used makes it probable, however, that Phygelus was guilty of something worse than merely neglecting to visit the apostle in his imprisonment. W. MUIR.

PHYLACTERIES, FRONTLETS.—Phylactery—so first in the Geneva Bible, 1557, in earlier versions flateris (Wyclif) and phylacteries (Tindale, etc.)—comes to us through the Vulgate from the Greek φυλακτήριον. In the Greek of the 1st cent. A.D. this word signified an amulet or charm, which possessed the property of protecting (φυλάσσειν) * the wearer against evil spirits and similar malign influences. Among favourite charms were slips of parchment, written over with a magical spell and placed in a case which was hung round the neck, hence also called περιπτρον, περιμμη, synonyms of φυλακτήριον.

In His great anti-Pharisaic discourse (Mt 23<sup>16</sup>), our Lord charges the scribes and Pharisees with ostentation in the discharge of their religious and social duties, 'for they make broad their phylacteries (πλατύνουσι γὰρ τὰ φυλακτήρια αὐτῶν), and enlarge the borders of their garments (for which see FRINGES in vol. ii. 68 ff.), and love the chief places at feasts,' etc. (Mt 23<sup>35</sup> RV). Now there has never been any doubt that the author of the first Gospel here uses φυλακτήρια, which is not found elsewhere in the NT, as the equivalent of the contemporary Hebrew word פָּרָשִׁים, téphillén (plur. of פָּרָשָׁה 'a prayer'), the name then, and by the Jews still, given to two small cases of leather, to be described in the sequel, which were worn by the more ardent legalists of the time, one upon the forehead and the other upon the left arm. This practice, very considerably curtailed, however, is still regarded as one of the most sacred of religious duties by orthodox Jews of the present day (cf. opening paragraph of art. FRINGES).

In this article it is proposed to investigate the origin, history, and significance of the phylacteries,

* The perverted derivation still met with in some quarters from φυλάσσειν (τὸν νόμον), as if φυλακτήρια = observatoria, is now entirely abandoned by scholars.

and for this purpose, on the principle of proceeding from the more familiar to the less, we shall examine—

- i. The practice of modern orthodox Judaism ;
- ii. The alleged Scripture warrant for this practice ;
- iii. The date of the introduction of the phylacteries ;
- iv. The manner and extent of the practice in NT times.

i. THE PRACTICE OF MODERN ORTHODOX JUDAISM.—Every male Israelite above the age of thirteen years is required to 'lay (לָבַשׁ), Mishna, Shebu. iii. 8, 11, etc.) the téphillin'—to use the technical expression—at daily morning prayer. To this extent the use of the phylacteries has been curtailed since NT times (see § iv. below). The téphillin or phylacteries are two in number, known since the earliest times as the head-phylactery (פְּתִילֵי הַיָּד) and the hand-phylactery (פְּתִילֵי הָרֶגֶל), and consist of two cubical leather boxes or cases, varying in size from  $\frac{1}{2}$  to  $1\frac{1}{2}$  in. in the side. The material is the prepared skin of a clean animal which has been thoroughly soaked in pure water. A cube-shaped wooden block (בִּצְלֵי [rúros] Mishna, Kel. vi. 7) is employed to give the desired shape and size. To form the head-phylactery, three deep incisions (מַחְצְוֵי) are made in the block, and the moist parchment spread over it and inserted into the incisions. When the material has dried and hardened the block is removed, and a leather case of four compartments, technically 'houses' (בָּיִת), is the result. Before this, however, two shims (שֵׁם) have been impressed on the soft leather, one with the ordinary three prongs on the outer wall of the bayith, which, when the phylactery is complete, will be to the right of the wearer, and another with four prongs on the outer wall to the left. This fourfold case is now fitted with a leather brim, and into each 'house' is inserted a slip of specially prepared parchment (פָּתִיל Shabb. viii. 3), having written on it, in a special caligraphy, one of the Scripture passages to be cited presently, and each bound round with a few white hairs of a calf or cow. A firm base is supplied by a square piece of thick leather, connected by a flap with the brim, and sewed to the latter by means of twelve stitches (representing the twelve tribes) of clean gut. The four passages of Scripture above mentioned are those which the Jews have always regarded as constituting their warrant for the use of the phylacteries (see ii. below), viz. Ex 13<sup>1-10</sup> 13<sup>11-16</sup>, Dt 6<sup>4-9</sup> 11<sup>13-21</sup>. They are inserted in the four compartments in the order represented by the diagram—

The hand-phylactery is shaped on a similar block without incisions, and consists of a single compartment (בֵּית bayith) with plain walls, fitted with brim, base, and flap as before. The same four passages are written in four parallel columns on a single piece of parchment, and inserted in the bayith. Both phylacteries, coloured a deep black, are kept in position by leather straps (מַחְצְוֵי Yad. iii. 3), which are passed through the flaps. Both straps are of considerable length, and blackened on the upper side. The head-phylactery is fitted to the wearer's head by having its strap tied at the back of the head into a knot (קֶשֶׁר), of the shape of a daleth (ד). One end of the other strap, after being passed through the flap of its phylactery, is formed into a noose by means of a knot of the shape of a yod (י). The shin of the head-phylactery together with these knots thus make up the letters of the sacred name Shaddai ('Almighty'), to which a mystical significance is attached.

The phylacteries, as has been said, are now worn daily at morning prayer, except on Sabbaths and festival days, which, being themselves 'signs,' render the phylacteries unnecessary on those days. After assuming the tallith (see FRINGES), the worshipper proceeds 'to lay the téphillin.' The hand-phylactery is laid first. Its position is the inner side of the left arm, which must be bare, just above the elbow, so that, when the arm is bent the phylactery may rest 'upon the heart' (as commanded Dt 11<sup>18</sup>). The long strap, which passes through the noose, is drawn tight, and wound three times round the arm above the elbow, the worshipper pronouncing the following benediction in Hebrew: 'Blessed art Thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast sanctified us by Thy commandments, and hast commanded us to lay the téphillin.' The strap is thereafter wound four times, then three times, round the arm below the elbow, in such a manner as to form a four-pronged and a three-pronged shin respectively. At this point the head-phylactery is placed in position, so that the case lies in the middle of the forehead just touching the hair, the two ends of the strap hanging down over the shoulders in front, the following benediction being meanwhile repeated: 'Blessed art Thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast sanctified us by Thy commandments, and hast given us command concerning the precept of the téphillin.'* To this is added, when the adjustment is completed: 'Blessed be His name, whose glorious kingdom is for ever and ever.' Finally, the remainder of the strap of the hand-phylactery is wound three times round the middle finger, and the following is said: 'And I will betroth thee unto Me for ever; yea, I will betroth thee unto Me in righteousness, and in judgment, and in loving-kindness, and in mercy: I will even betroth thee unto Me in faithfulness; and thou shalt know the Lord' (Hos 2<sup>19</sup>). Prayers over, the phylacteries are taken off in the reverse order, the head-phylactery first, then the hand-phylactery. We cannot here attempt to give even a summary of the exceedingly numerous and minute precepts which have been elaborated and codified by the Jewish authorities regarding the preparation of the materials, the manner of writing, the preservation and inspection, etc., of the téphillin (see authorities named in the bibliography at end of article).

ii. THE ALLEGED SCRIPTURAL AUTHORITY FOR THE PHYLACTERIES.—The command to 'lay the téphillin' is contained, the Jews maintain, in four passages of the Pentateuch, viz.: Ex 13<sup>9, 16</sup>, Dt 6<sup>9</sup> 11<sup>18</sup>. It is of the utmost importance for our investigation to obtain an accurate and unprejudiced exposition of these cardinal passages, which we proceed to examine in their order.

(a) The bulk of Ex 13 is made up of injunctions regarding the perpetual observance of the Feast of Unleavened Cakes or Mazzoth (vv. 3-10), and of the Dedication of the Firstborn (vv. 11-16). The former, we read, 'shall be for a sign (אֵימָה 'óth) unto thee upon thine hand, and for a memorial (זִכְרוֹן zikkarón) between thine eyes, that the law of J<sup>h</sup> may be in thy mouth: for with a strong hand hath the Lord brought thee out of Egypt' (v. 9). Similarly with regard to the dedication of the first-born, 'it shall be for a sign ('ôth, EV 'token') upon thine hand, and for frontlets (nšw tôphôth) between thine eyes,' etc. (v.<sup>16</sup>). Now these two verses are so similar in their phraseology that no sane expositor would hesitate to declare them to be, in the writer's intention, completely identical. The feast of Mazzoth and the dedication of the firstborn shall alike serve as perpetual reminders to the Hebrews of the Egyptian deliverance, and of J's resulting claim upon them.

* On the slight variation in the form of these and similar benedictions see Friedländer, The Jewish Religion, 1891, note, p. 329 f.; to this excellent work the student is referred for an exposition of the 'sign' of téphillin from the orthodox Jewish standpoint. The renderings given above are from Singer's edition of The Authorized Daily Prayer-Book, 1892, p. 16.

(b) In Dt 6<sup>6a</sup> we read: 'And these words, which I command thee this day (the exact reference of 'these words' will be considered presently), shall be in thine heart; and thou shalt teach (šw) * them diligently unto thy children. . . . And thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be for frontlets between thine eyes. And thou shalt write them upon the door-posts of thy house, and upon thy gates.' In the second passage from Dt (11<sup>18-20</sup>) this injunction is repeated with only slight verbal changes (cf. 11<sup>18a</sup> 'ye shall lay these words upon your heart and upon your soul,' with 6<sup>6a</sup>). We have now before us the cardinal passages on which has been based the ancient Jewish custom of the phylacteries. Do they, we must now ask, or do they not command and sanction this custom? The answer is by no means so easy as may at first sight appear, for it is not an affair of exegesis alone, but involves questions of criticism and lexicology.

Thus we note that the language of the passage Ex 13<sup>9-16</sup> presents a strong Deuteronomic colouring, which has prevented our foremost critics† from assigning it exclusively to J, with which source it has also undoubted affinities. Only two alternatives are possible (cf. Wellh. Comp. d. Hexat.<sup>3</sup> 74). Either we have here a section composed in whole or in part by an editor of the Deuteronomic school (so Kautzsch, Cornill, Bacon), or we have one of several examples of the literary activity of the writer (R<sup>JB</sup>) who united J and E into a single work, and who must have belonged to 'the circles whence Deuteronomy issued' (Kuenen, Hexat. § 9 n. 4, § 13 n. 29).‡ In either case the important result follows, that we have to deal not with two enactments, separated by a couple of centuries, the earlier of which may possibly be understood in a figurative and the later in a literal sense, but with enactments of approximately the same age and reflecting the same religious standpoint.

With regard, further, to the Deuteronomic passages (Dt 6<sup>6-9</sup> 11<sup>18-21</sup>), various critical difficulties suggest themselves. Whence this unwonted and almost verbatim repetition in the course of the same address? Must we hold that in some of the early copies of Dt the verses repeated stood in ch. 6, in others with some variations in ch. 11, and that our present text has inserted a harmonized version of them in both places (so Steuernagel in Nowack's Handkommentar, 1898, p. 40)? Or shall we, with the latest commentator (Bertholet in Marti's Kurzer Hand-Commentar, 1899, p. 36), regard 11<sup>18-21</sup> as an insertion which interrupts the connexion between v.<sup>17</sup> and v.<sup>22</sup>? The strong adversative with which v.<sup>22</sup> opens in the original (אך וְ = 'but,' not as EV 'for') certainly follows awkwardly on vv.<sup>18-21</sup>, which so far makes for the latter view. The present writer, however, doubts whether either passage is in its original place. Dt 6<sup>2</sup>, for example, which is parallel to 11<sup>21</sup>, looks as if originally intended to form the continuation of vv.<sup>6-9</sup>; this would give the following correspondences: 6<sup>6</sup>. 8=11<sup>18</sup>, 6<sup>7</sup>=11<sup>19</sup>, 6<sup>9</sup>=11<sup>20</sup>, 6<sup>2</sup>=11<sup>21</sup>. Assuming that both passages are genuine, we should thus have an impressive call to the continued observance of the provisions of the Deuteronomic code placed both at the beginning and the close of the hortatory introduction in chs. 6-11. In any case the characteristic Deuteronomic phrase, 'these words which I command thee this day' (6<sup>6</sup>), must have here, as it has everywhere else in chs. 5-11, a prospective reference to all the provisions of the following code, and not merely to the two preceding verses, as the commentators suppose. The two pairs of passages, then, we have seen, are alike in tone and intention, and that intention is to impress upon those addressed the duty of perpetual observance, in the one case (in Dt) of the whole Torah, in the other (in Ex) of two particular ordinances thereof. The whole and its parts should be continually in their thoughts and on their lips, and should form a never-failing subject for the instruction of their youth.

† Except Dillmann; but see his latest editor's view in Dillmann-Ryssel, Exodus, pp. 111, 141.

When we proceed to a closer examination of the special verses, Ex 13<sup>9-16</sup>, Dt 6<sup>3</sup> 11<sup>18</sup>, it is very evident, if our contention as to their authors' motive is correct, that the language of these verses is figurative throughout, as, indeed, is usually admitted for Exodus, but denied, or at least questioned, for Deuteronomy. But all figures of speech in Hebrew, as in other tongues, are borrowed from the common objects and processes of nature, or from the familiar facts of human life. So it must be in the case before us. Thus, as regards the 'sign' upon the hand, we have only to recall the widespread practice, among all primitive races, of tattooing or branding various parts of the body with the name or symbol of the deity to whom one wishes to dedicate one's self, and whose protection it is desired to secure (see CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH in vol. i. 538<sup>b</sup>). Such, doubtless, is the underlying idea of the mark (nšw) * of Cain, by which he was placed under the special protection of J' (see esp. Stade's brilliant essay, 'Das Kainzeichen,' in ZATW, 1894, p. 250 ff. In this essay Stade has further shown [p. 310 ff.] that וְקָרַן of Ex 13<sup>9</sup> is a synonym of nšw in this sense).† The forehead,—for such is the meaning of 'between the eyes' in all our passages,—even more than the hands and wrists, was specially adapted for the reception of these religious tokens, and is so used by the most widely scattered savage and semi-savage races at the present day. But even in the canonical and extracanonical literature of the Hebrews we find undoubted references to this practice. Thus we have the young man who bore on his forehead some mark or token that he belonged to the prophets of J'' (1 K 20<sup>41</sup>; see Stade, loc. cit. 314 f.; and Kittel, Handkom. in loc.), Ezekiel's cross (קַרְנֵי 9<sup>4-6</sup>) on the foreheads of the faithful (cf. Rev 7<sup>3</sup> 14<sup>1</sup>), the 'token of destruction' (σημείον τῆς ἀπωλείας) on the forehead of the wicked (Ps-Sol 15<sup>10</sup>, cf. v. 8), while 'the mark of the beast on hand or forehead' (Rev 13<sup>16</sup> 14<sup>9</sup> etc.) is familiar to all. These instances more than suffice to give us a glimpse of the circle of ideas which supplied the metaphors of the passages we are considering. The ordinances of the Torah were to serve the same purpose as these σημεία of the ancient cults; they were to be outward and visible tokens of the Hebrews' allegiance to J'' their God, and of J''s special propriety in them.

In three of the cardinal passages, however (Ex 13<sup>16</sup>, Dt 6<sup>3</sup> 11<sup>18</sup>), for the zikkārôn of Ex 13<sup>9</sup> there is substituted a word of uncertain signification, תֹּתָפוֹת, tōtāphōth, EV 'frontlets.'

* These marks were called σημεία by the Greeks (see Stade, ut sup., and Deissmann, Bibelstudien, 266 ff.); cf. LXX Lv 19<sup>27f</sup>. γράμματα σημεῖα.

† Cf. Nu 16<sup>38</sup>. 40 (Heb. 178. 5), where nšw and וְקָרַן are used interchangeably.

The singular of this word appears as תֹּתָפָה in post-biblical Hebrew, and the תֹּתָפָה of the MT should in all probability be so pointed.* In form it resembles תֹּתָפָה for תֹּתָפָה, by reduplication from a root which must be either תָּפַח or תָּפַח (see König, Lehrgeb. II. i. § 60, 6a). The latter form is generally preferred on the strength of the Arab. tāfa, 'to encircle,' but the sense 'fillet, head-band' (so Ges. Theol., Dillm., Driver, etc.) suits neither the descriptive expression 'between thine eyes' nor the circle of ideas from which, we are convinced, the figure in the text is borrowed. The rendering tēphillin of the Targums is merely a reflexion of the interpretation which had long been current among the Jews (see below). The root תָּפַח is therefore to be preferred, but its significance can only be conjectured. Several modern scholars favour a conjecture, first proposed by Knobel, viz. 'to strike,' then 'to make an incision,' so that tōtāphōth would thus also denote στίγματα (Klein, 'Die Totaphoth nach Bibel und Tradition,' in Jahrb. f. protest. Theologie, VII. (1881) p. 673; Siegfried-Stade, Lex. s.v.; Nowack, Heb. Arch. I. 134). This conjecture, it may here be added, has the support of the Peshitta in Dt 6<sup>8</sup> 11<sup>18</sup>, where tōtāphōth is rendered by rāshma, 'a mark,'† which is also used to render Ezekiel's mark and the mark of the beast in Revelation.

In the absence, however, of all trace of the above signification in the extant literature, it is more probable that we have in תָּפַח a root akin to תָּפַח 'to drop,' and actually found in this sense in the Talmudic תָּפַח 'to drip or drop' (used of wine, oil, blood, etc.); cf. the series תָּפַח, תָּפַח, and Arab. hamhama, Ges.-Kautzsch, Heb. Grammar, § 30k.

תָּפַח is thus akin to תָּפַח 'ear-drops' (Jg 8<sup>26</sup>, Is 3<sup>19</sup>), as is further confirmed by the rendering of the Samaritan Targum תָּפַח, which must be the Aram. תָּפַח 'a drop' (of blood, etc.; see Levy, s.v.). It prob. denoted a 'drop,' bead, or jewel worn as an amulet,‡ i.e. as a true συλακτήριον. In the Mishna, Shabb. vi. 1, 5, tōtēpheth clearly signifies a jewel worn by Jewish women, attached to their head-dress.§ The Deuteronomic authors, then, do not shrink from the use of another bold metaphor to express the thought that the commands of J' shall be as constantly present to the thoughts of His people, and as highly prized as the most precious of jewels by their superstitious contemporaries.

The results of our investigations may now be summed up. The passages in Ex and Dt on which the institution of the phylacteries is based cannot be kept apart in such a way that the expressions of Ex are to be taken figuratively but those of Dt literally. The figurative interpretation of both passages, further, is confirmed by such additional considerations as the following: (a) numerous other expressions in the contexts are plainly figures of speech; such are the references to the words of J' being in the mouth (Ex 13<sup>9</sup>, cf. Schoettgen's remarks, Horæ Heb. et Talmud., 194 f.) and in the heart (Dt 6<sup>6</sup>), to the duty of impressing (תָּפַח 'to prick with a sharp instrument') them upon the children (6<sup>7</sup>), and of laying them upon the heart and the soul (11<sup>18</sup>, but see above, § i., for an attempt to do this literally); (b) similar expressions elsewhere have never been taken otherwise than figuratively, e.g. Dt 30<sup>14</sup>, Pr 3<sup>3</sup> ('bind them [kindness and truth] upon thy neck, write them upon the tablet of thine heart'), 1<sup>9</sup> 6<sup>21</sup> 7<sup>3</sup>, Jer 17<sup>1</sup> 31<sup>33</sup> etc.; (c) there is the impossibility of carrying out the injunctions in the literal sense when these refer to the whole Deuteronomic code, as we saw to be the case even in Dt 6<sup>8</sup>,—a consideration, it may be added, which

* It should be noted that the Hebrew text has twice תֹּתָפָה and once תֹּתָפָה, never, as in the Samaritan Pentateuch, with express plural termination.

† Which favours the singular pointing, as suggested above.
‡ It is well known that the practice of wearing jewellery in the ears, nose, etc., had its origin in the desire to guard the orifices of the body against the entrance of evil spirits (cf. W. R. Smith, RS 1 433 f.). As rings could not be inserted in the eyelids as through the ear-lobes and nostrils, the same end was secured by hanging a jewel 'between the eyes.'

iii. THE RISE OF THE LITERAL INTERPRETATION OF EX 13<sup>16</sup> ETC., AND THE DATE OF THE INTRODUCTION OF THE PHYLACTERIES.—We have now to inquire at what period of Jewish history the literal interpretation of the four passages in question took its rise. A strong presumption against a date in the Exile, or even early in the post-exilic period, is furnished by the fact that the phylacteries are unknown to the Samaritan community (see Klein, loc. cit. 686 f.; Hamburger, Realencycl. d. Judenthums, II. 1065). The Aramaic form of the name tēphillin points unmistakably in the same direction. An evident terminus a quo, however, is supplied by the figurative passages from Proverbs just cited. These are admittedly echoes of the Deuteronomic teaching (see Driver, LOT 6 396), and it is incredible that a Jewish writer would have so expressed himself, if the literal interpretation of Dt 6<sup>8</sup> etc. already held the field. Now the passages in question are all contained in the later section of the book (Pr 1-9), which, if the earlier section (10 ff.) date from the late Persian period, can hardly be earlier than B.C. 300.* Even half a century later, c. 250 B.C.,—the provisional date generally accepted for the beginnings of the Alexandrian translation (LXX),—the figurative interpretation was still accepted, at least in Egypt. This we see from the LXX rendering of the crucial תֹּתָפָה (καὶ ἀράψεις αὐτὰ εἰς σημεῖον ἐπὶ τῆς χειρὸς σου, καὶ ἔσται ἀδάλευτον πρὸ ὀφθαλμῶν σου, Dt 6<sup>8</sup>) as something 'immovably fixed' (ἀδάλευτον; † cf. Ac 27<sup>41</sup>, He 12<sup>28</sup>) before one's eyes, the unchanging subject of one's thoughts.

The terminus ad quem is suggested by the famous letter of the pseudo-Aristeas, who represents himself as having been instructed by Eleazar, the then high priest at Jerusalem, in the institutions of Moses. The latter, says Eleazar, in addition to 'the token of remembrance on our garments (see FRINGES) and the texts (τὰ λόγια) on doors and gates, commanded us expressly to bind the sign on the hands also' (καὶ ἐπὶ τῶν χειρῶν τὸ σημεῖον περιήφθαι—Hody, 'Aristeas Historia,' in De Bibliorum Textibus, p. xviii; Kautzsch, Pseud-epigraphen, 'Der Brief d. Aristeas,' v. 1<sup>89</sup>), an unmistakable reference to the hand-phylactery, but to that only.‡ Unfortunately the date of Aristeas is still sub judice. For various reasons we decline to accept the early date, c. 200 B.C., advocated by Schürer (HJP II. iii. 310), and incline to a date early in the 1st cent. B.C. (cf. Wendland in Kautzsch, op. cit.). We thus obtain a period of one hundred and fifty years (B.C. 250-100), to which the introduction of the phylacteries may confidently be ascribed. Now it is more than a coincidence that this is the period which witnessed the growth of that more strict and literal observance of the requirements of the Torah, which is associated with the rise to power and influence of the sect of the HASIDÆANS (wh. see) and of their successors, the Pharisees. The latter, we know, acquired great influence under John Hyrcanus (B.C. 135-105), * Toy in the International Critical Comm. says c. 250 B.C. ('Proverbs,' Introd. xxx); so, too, Wildeboer in Marti's Hand-comm.

† For this term and the variant σάλευτον (of which Philo gives an ingenious explanation, Opp. II. 358), as also for the renderings of the later Greek versions, see Field, Origenis Hexapla, at Ex 13<sup>16</sup> and Dt 6<sup>8</sup>.

‡ Have we here an indication that the head-phylactery was of later introduction than the hand-phylactery? The female diviners of Ezekiel's day were in the habit of binding amulets (תֹּתָפָה, EV 'pillows,' but understood in the former sense by Ephraem Syrus, and the anonymous 'Hebrew' who rendered the word by συλακτήριον, see op. cit. Field's Hexapla, in loc.) on their wrists, a practice which Hitzig regarded as the precursor of the phylacteries (see the comm. on Ezk 13<sup>18a</sup>, and art. ΚΕΡΧΗΡΙΑ). The late W. R. Smith seems to have shared this view (Jour. of Philology, xiii. 286).

imposing upon the people their views regarding sacrifice, prayer, and worship generally (Jos. Ant. XVIII. i. 3), and it may well be that among the observances which the Pharisees then introduced (see ib. XIII. xvi. 2), and which were successively abrogated by Hyrcanus and reintroduced by Alexandra (B.C. 78), the practice of 'laying the tēphillin' had a place. Our conclusion, then, is that the introduction of the phylacteries may with certainty be assigned to the period between B.C. 250 and 100, and conjecturally to the generation embraced by the reigns of Simon the Hasmonean and his son John Hyrcanus, viz. B.C. 140-105.

iv. THE PHYLACTERIES IN THE EARLY CENTURIES A.D.—By the NT writers, as by Josephus (Ant. IV. viii. 3) and by their contemporaries generally, the phylacteries, like the use of the Shēma (שְׁמָע) in the daily prayers (Schürer, HJP II. ii. 77, 84 f.),—for both practices doubtless had their rise in the same period and in the same circles,—were regarded as dating from the days of Moses. The practice was, of course, regarded as having scriptural authority, but even the details of the construction of the phylacteries were ascribed to a special revelation to Moses (technically לְפָתִיחַ לְמִשְׁכַּת מֹשֶׁה, for which see Hamburger, Realencycl. 2nd Suppl. p. 162 ff.). The following details, gleaned from the Mishna,—which may be taken as authoritative for the century ending A.D. 135, although in its present form of somewhat later date,—may be given as illustrating the practice of orthodox Jewish circles in NT times, and as showing, when compared with the details already given in § i., how little change has been introduced since the 1st cent. A.D. In the Mishna, then, we find the same terms applied to the phylacteries as at the present day, tēphillā shel rōsh and *t. shel yād*h (for the latter also, more correctly, יָדָי לְפָתִיחַ 'tēphillā of the arm,'—Mikv. x. 3, 4). The material was the same (Kel. xxiii. 1); the shape square, not round (Megil. iv. 8). The head-phylactery, sometimes spoken of as the phylactery par excellence (Kel. xviii. 8, etc.), was already divided into four compartments (Kel. ib.), but not more (Sanhed. xi. 3), each with its parchment slip (Shabb. viii. 3; cf. Justin Martyr, the first Christian writer outside the NT to refer to the phylacteries by name, Dial. c. Tryphone, 46, ed. Otto<sup>1</sup>, ii. 148, φυλακτήριον ἐν ὑμέσι λεπτοτάτοις γεγραμμένων χαρακτήρων τινῶν) containing in all probability the same passages as in modern times. Thus the third of the passages in question (Dt 6<sup>4-9</sup>) is expressly described as 'the smallest section (קָטָן מִכָּל הַשֵּׁנִי) in the tēphillin, which is, Hear, O Israel' (Sanhed. viii. 3).* The writing had to be in the square Hebrew character (אֲרָמֵי, lit. Assyrian, i.e. Syrian or Aramæan). Women, slaves, and minors (קָטָן) were exempt from the obligation of wearing the phylacteries (Berakoth, iii. 3), also all males in the presence of their dead (ib. iii. 1), and on Sabbaths and festivals, the latter as greater 'signs' rendering superfluous the observance of the lesser sign of the phylacteries. When not in use the phylacteries were kept in a case (קֶבֶד, Shabb. vi. 2). From various indications it may be inferred that they were worn during the whole day, the justification for which was found in a mistaken interpretation of Ex 13<sup>10</sup>. There the Hebrews are enjoined to keep the feast of Unleavened Cakes קִיּוֹם חֲמֵשׁ יָמִים, i.e. not from day to day, every day, but—as the phrase elsewhere signifies and as the context requires—from year to year (so correctly Onkelos; also Aquila ἀπὸ χρόνου εἰς χρόνον). The Jews, however, referring the command to the phylacteries (v.<sup>9</sup>), interpret the words as enjoining their use 'from day to day.' This interpretation is most clearly expressed in the Targum (pseudo-)Jonathan to Ex 13<sup>10</sup>. After the direction that the hand-phylactery shall lie on the upper part of the left arm, and the head-phylactery in the middle of the upper part of the forehead, we read: 'Thou shalt observe this commandment of the phylacteries in the appointed time, on working days but not on Sabbaths and feast days, and in the day time not in the night time' (ap. Walton's Polyglot, vol. iv.). The later limitation of their use to the time of the daily prayers was no doubt due to the same causes as brought about a similar curtailment in the wearing of the zizith (see FRINGES in vol. ii. 69<sup>a</sup>).

It is difficult to say with certainty to what extent this habitual wearing of the phylacteries prevailed among the Jewish people as a whole. That it was the invariable practice of the Pharisees and of the scribes, who belonged almost exclusively to that sect, we may take for granted. On the other hand, the balance of probability is against its adoption by the Sadducees, who may possibly be referred to in the Mishna sentence (Sanhed. xi. 3) as saying, 'there is no such thing as tēphillin (לְפָתִיחַ)'. Certainly the Karaite Jews, who claim to be the religious successors of the Sadducees, maintain the figurative interpretation of the injunctions in Ex and Dt (Hamburger, op. cit. ii. 1204; Klein, loc. cit. 688). The great mass of the people also,—ὁ ὄχλος ὁ μὴ γινώσκων τὸν νόμον (Jn 7<sup>49</sup>),—engrossed in the hard routine of daily toil, paid no heed to this enactment of the scribes (with Jn 7<sup>49</sup> cf. Talm. Bab. Berakoth, 47b: 'Who is an 'am-ha'arez? R. Jehoshua says: Every one who does not lay the tēphillin' (לֹא נִשְׁמַע בְּכַף)'. Hence we may infer that neither our Lord nor His disciples followed, in this respect, the lead of the Pharisees (cf. Jn 7<sup>15</sup>). In His denunciation of the latter (πλατύνουσι γὰρ τὰ φυλακτήρια αὐτῶν, Mt 23<sup>5</sup>) our Lord is generally understood to refer to the ostentatious breadth of the straps (רִיבֵיץ Yad. iii. 3, etc.) by which the phylacteries were firmly secured on head and arm, as is expressly stated by the earliest Syriac translators (see loc. cit. in the codices of Lewis [Sinaiticus] and Cureton: 'for they make broad the straps of their tēphillin (אֲרָמֵי רִיבֵיץ)'. It is probable, however, that this increase in the width of the straps was accompanied by a corresponding increase in the size of the phylacteries proper, and that both are included in the denunciation.

In addition to the Talmud (Mishna and Gemara), we have in the Targums ample evidence of the Jewish belief in the antiquity of the phylacteries, resulting in several cases in amusing anachronisms. Thus Saul's bracelet or armlet (2 S 1<sup>10</sup>) is converted into 'the phylactery * (אֲרָמֵי) which was upon his arm.' The turbans (אֲרָמֵי) of Ezekiel and his fellow-exiles are changed to phylacteries (Targ. Ezk 24<sup>17-23</sup>), while Mordecai is represented as recognizable as a Jew by his phylacteries (Targ. Est 8<sup>15</sup>).

While we believe that the introduction of the phylacteries was not due to a superstitious belief in their magical virtues as 'appurtenances to make prayer more powerful' (so W. R. Smith, Jour. of Phil. xiii. 286, and others), but, as we have shown above, to a mistaken obedience to the letter on the part of over-zealous students of the Torah, it cannot be denied that by the rank and file of the people—from whom, no doubt, the name φυλακτήρια proceeded—and even by some of the more educated, the phylacteries were regarded as possessing magical properties. This appears from the repeated mention, in the Mishna, of the tēphillin alongside of the kēmia (קִמְיָא), which was an amulet also written on parchment by a professional exorcist (see Shabb. vi. 2), and worn on the person, from the rendering of Ca 8<sup>s</sup> in the Targum,* and from various references in the Midrash and Gemara (for which see Klein, 679 f.; Hamburger, art. 'Tephillin').

On the other hand, the Talmud abounds in extravagant eulogy of the religious value of the phylacteries.† In the Middle Ages, from the 8th, and especially from the 10th cent. (Hamburger), they were less esteemed; and, in some parts at least, the practice almost became extinct (see Rodkinsohn, תפלה לישה, Ursprung u. Entwicklung d. Phylacterien-Ritus, 1883 (Hebrew), to be used with caution, cf. REJ vi. 288). The fact that several Jewish scholars of note, beginning with Samuel ben Meir (Rashbam, 1080-c. 1150), in their commentaries maintained the figurative interpretation of the cardinal passages, no doubt contributed to the growing disuse of the phylacteries. A return to the earlier practice, however, was gradually effected, and their use is now universal among the orthodox Jews, both of the Polish and Spanish rites. At the age of thirteen years and a day the Jewish boy attains his religious majority, becomes responsible for his actions, and a 'Bar-Mizvah' (בן מצוה, for the history and significance of which see Löw, Die Lebensalter in d. jüd. Literatur, 210 ff.). Among the duties and privileges of the Bar-Mizvah not the least important is that of 'laying' the tephillin.

LITERATURE.—The commentaries, esp. Dillmann-Ryssel, Exodus, etc.; Dillmann, Driver on Deuteronomy; Kalisch, Exodus (special dissertation, pp. 223-227). The numerous minute Rabbinical prescriptions will be found in the authoritative works of Maimonides (Yad Ha-hazaka Hilkoth Tephillin) and Joseph Caro (Shulhān 'Arukh). Extensive excerpts from Maimonides in Ugolinius, Thes. Antiquitatum Sacrarum, xxi., containing treatise 'de Phylacteriis Hebræorum.' Of the older discussions the most valuable are those by Buxtorf, Synagoga Judaica, pp. 176-185; Spenser, de Legibus Hebræorum, etc., Cambridge, 1727, lib. iv. capp. 1-7 ('de natura et origine Phylacteriorum'); Bodenschatz, Kirchliche Verfassung der heutigen Juden, iv. 14-19 (with illustrations). Lightfoot, Schoettgen, and similar works on Mt 23<sup>s</sup>. M. Margoliouth, The Fundamental Principles of Mod. Judaism, pp. 1-49. Of the articles in Bible Dictionaries perhaps the most important are those by Delitzsch in Riehm's Handwörterbuch, etc. (art. 'Denkzettel'), by Ginsburg in Kitto-Alexander's Biblical Cyclopædia (art. 'Phylactery'), both illustrated, and by Hamburger, Realencyclopædie d. Bibel u. Talmud, vol. ii. (art. 'Tephillin'). The only critical investigation of the subject hitherto has been by Klein, 'Die Totaphoth nach Bibel u. Tradition,' in the Jahrbücher für protest. Theologie, 1881, pp. 666-689 (useful collection of material, but critically and exegetically weak). The varying usage of the Middle Ages is given by Rodkinsohn, תפלה לישה, Ursprung u. Entwicklung des Phylacterien-Ritus bei den Juden (in Hebrew), 1883 [not seen]. A short exposition of modern Jewish teaching in Friedländer, The Jewish Religion, 331-338.

PHYLARCH (τὸν φυλάρχον, 2 Mac 8<sup>22</sup>).—There can be but little doubt that this word is not a proper name (as in AV; cf. RVm), but a military title. In Athens the 'phylarchs' had command of the cavalry; and here either a cavalry officer or a commander of auxiliary forces seems to be intended. Zöckler still supports the proper name.

PHYSICIAN.—See MEDICINE, p. 321.

PI-BESETH (תְּבֵשֶׁת, Βούβαστος).—Ezk 30<sup>17</sup>, a city in Lower Egypt, the hieroglyphic Per-Bastet, 'House of Bastet,' in Copt. Pubasti, Buasti, etc. The city was named Bast; the goddess who dwelt in it was hence called Bastet, 'the Bastite,' and thence again was formed the sacred name of the city, viz. Per-Bastet, lit. 'the house of the Bastite.' The sacred name was that adopted by the Greeks and Romans; the modern name of the site, Tell

* It is maintained by some, however, that the power of protecting from evil spirits here affirmed is confined to the mēzūā. † It is unfair, however, to use for polemical purposes such purely academic statements as Berakoth, 6a, that the Almighty Himself 'lays the tephillin'! (a curious inference from the following passages: Is 62<sup>8</sup>, Dt 33<sup>2</sup>, Ps 29<sup>11</sup>).

Basteh, 'the hill of Basteh,' may be derived from the original form.

Bubastis was probably a wealthy and important city from the earliest times. Its mounds are very extensive, and its temple, recently excavated by Naville for the Egypt. Expl. Fund., contained monuments of every period from the 4th Dynasty down to Roman times. It is now entirely deserted, but lies close to the large town of Zagazig, which owes its importance to the railway. Bubastis was capital of the 18th nome of Lower Egypt, the boundaries of which are very uncertain. In history it does not appear until the time of the 22nd Dynasty, founded by Shishak about B.C. 1000, and known as the Bubastite Dynasty, under which Bubastis was the second city of Egypt, Thebes still remaining the first. When that dynasty expired, and Egypt was divided, Bubastis was still the capital of a royal family, which was afterwards considered to be the legitimate 23rd Dynasty. The city was visited by Herodotus, who greatly admired the situation and beauty of its granite temple, and has recorded the existence of a popular and somewhat licentious annual festival held in honour of the goddess Bastet (Hdt. ii. 59 f.). The goddess was figured with the head of a lioness, or later almost invariably of a cat. She was held to be a mild form of Sekhmet, the goddess of destruction. Cats were sacred to her. Her son was named Maheh, 'fierce-eyed lion'; but Nefer-Atum was commonly worshipped as the third member of the Bubastite triad. Mummied cats, sometimes in bronze cases, were very abundant, the cat cemetery having extended over many acres; but antiquity dealers have now plundered what the damp atmosphere of the Delta had spared.

passages RV has 'figured stones' (cf. Lv 26<sup>1</sup>). These may have been stones erected for worship, or with a hand or other amulet sign marked upon them for the preservation of fields and vineyards from evil influences. For 'pictures of silver' in Pr 25<sup>11</sup> RV gives 'baskets (m. filigree work) of silver.' See Lagarde, Anmerk. z. Gr. Uebersetz. d. Proverb. 80. 2.  $\text{קִיָּצִים}$ . For  $\text{קִיָּצִים}$   $\text{לְכָל$   $\text{לְעַל$  of MT the LXX has  $\text{\epsilon\rho\iota\ \pi\acute{\alpha}\sigma\alpha\nu\ \theta\epsilon\alpha\nu\ \pi\lambda\omicron\lambda\omicron\nu\ \kappa\acute{\alpha}\lambda\lambda\omicron\nu\varsigma}$ , AV 'upon all pleasant pictures,' RV 'upon all pleasant imagery' (m. 'watch-towers'). Siegfried-Stade propose to read  $\text{קִיָּצִים}$  (cf. Jon 1<sup>5</sup>), 'ships,' for  $\text{קִיָּצִים}$ .

Figures were represented either by an image completely separated from its surrounding material, or by a surface in partial relief, or by a line of stain or etching ( $\text{קִיָּצִים}$ ) on the surface.

At the present day, when a pious Syrian Jew wishes to have a picture of the temple and the Mount of Olives in his house, he falls upon the device of having a line engraving made up of Scripture quotations, thus avoiding the formal infringement of the second commandment. See engraving on previous page. G. M. MACKIE.

PIECE.—1. A measure: 1 Es 8<sup>20</sup> 'an hundred pieces of wine' (Gr.  $\text{\mu\epsilon\tau\rho\rho\eta\tau\eta\varsigma}$ , RV 'firkin,' as the same word is translated in Jn 2<sup>6</sup> AV and RV). See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES. 2. An instrument of war; 1 Mac 6<sup>11</sup> 'pieces to cast darts and slings' (Gr.  $\text{\sigma\kappa\omicron\rho\pi\iota\delta\iota\omicron\nu}$ , dim. of  $\text{\sigma\kappa\omicron\rho\pi\iota\omicron\varsigma}$ , a scorpion). In this sense the word is scarcely obsolete. Shaks. I Henry VI. i. iv. 15, has—

'A piece of ordnance 'gainst it I have placed.'

In Selden's day the word was beginning to be replaced by gun. He says (Table Talk, p. 65), 'Sometimes we put a new signification to an old word, as when we call a piece a Gun.'

PIETY.—In Lat. pietas signified dutieous regard (1) to the gods, (2) to one's parents [cf. the familiar 'pius Aeneas' of Vergil, Aen. i. 220, etc.] and inferiors, (3) to one's country; and the Eng. word 'piety' retained all these meanings. We use it now of devotion to God only, although we can prefix an adj. and speak of 'filial piety.' We cannot say with Milton, Samson Agon. 993—

'The public marks of honour and reward
Conferred upon me for the piety
Which to my country I was judged to have shown.'

In AV the only occurrence is 1 Ti 5<sup>4</sup> 'If any widow have children or nephews, let them learn first to show piety at home,' where  $\text{\epsilon\upsilon\delta\omicron\epsilon\beta\epsilon\iota\nu}$  is rendered 'to show piety,' and the tr. is retained in RV. An example of the meaning 'devotion to God' is found in the Preface to AV, 'Piety towards God was the weapon, and the onely weapon that both preserved Constantines person, and avenged him of his enemies.' J. HASTINGS.

PIGEON.—See DOVE.

PI-HAHIROTH ( $\text{\פִּי הַחִירוֹת}$ ).—When the Israelites turned back from ETHAM, 'in the edge of the wilderness,' they encamped 'before ( $\text{\קִדְמָה}$  Ex 14<sup>2</sup>) or beside ( $\text{\בְּצֵד}$  v. 9) Pi-hahiroth, between MIGDOL and the sea, before BAAL-ZEPHON.' The name occurs again in the itinerary of Nu 33<sup>7-8</sup>. In v. 8 RV has 'from before Hahiroth,' instead of 'from before Pi-hahiroth,' following in this the MT  $\text{\קִדְמָה}$ , which, however, may be a copyist's error for  $\text{\קִדְמָה}$  or  $\text{\קִדְמָה}$ . All the passages in which Pi-hahiroth is mentioned belong to P. Unfortunately, the above definition of its position is insufficient to fix its site, for Migdol and Baal-zephon, like most of the places named at the initial stages of the Exodus, are themselves unknown. Even RAAMSES has not been identified, although we know the site of PITHOM. See, further, art. EXODUS in vol. i. p. 803.

The etymology and the meaning of the name Pi-hahiroth are likewise uncertain, although attempts have been made to explain it from the side both of Egyptian and of Hebrew. The LXX, which finds a proper name in Nu 33<sup>7</sup> (B  $\text{\epsilon\rho\iota\ \sigma\tau\omicron\mu\alpha}$  'Epiróth, AF . . . Eiróth)<sup>8</sup> (BA  $\text{\acute{\alpha}\pi\epsilon\nu\alpha\nu\tau\iota\ \text{E}\acute{\iota}\rho\acute{\omega}\theta}$ ), treats  $\text{\פִּי הַחִירוֹת}$  in Ex 14<sup>2-9</sup> as an appellative,  $\text{\acute{\alpha}\pi\epsilon\nu\alpha\nu\tau\iota\ \tau\eta\varsigma\ \epsilon\pi\alpha\iota\delta\epsilon\omega\varsigma}$ . The 'farmstead' of this last rendering reminds Sayce (EHH 181) of the ahū or 'estate' of Pharaoh in the district of Thukut, on which, according to a letter dating from the 8th year of Merenptah, the Edomite herdsmen were allowed to settle. Naville has proposed to make Pi-hahiroth = Pi-Qerhet, 'the house of the goddess Qerhet,' the name of a sanctuary in or near Pithom, but to this there are philological objections. The Pesh., Targ., and Sa'adya take  $\text{\פִּי}$  as the construct of  $\text{\פִּי}$  'mouth,' while  $\text{\חִירוֹת}$ , according to the first, means 'trenches or canals,' according to the other two, 'mountains or rocks.' For modern conjectures see Dillm.-Ryssel on Ex 14<sup>2</sup>, which, along with Sayce (HCM 252 ff.) and Driver (in Hogarth's Authority and Archaeology, 57, 61), may be consulted on the question of the site. J. A. SELBIE.

PILATE.—Pontius Pilatus ( $\text{\Pi\acute{\omicron}\nu\tau\iota\omicron\varsigma\ \text{P}\acute{\iota}\lambda\acute{\alpha}\tau\omicron\varsigma}$ ) was the fifth\* Roman procurator of Judæa. After the deposition (A.D. 6) of Archelaus, his territory, which included Judæa, Samaria, and Idumæa,† was erected into an imperial province in charge of an officer of the equestrian order with the title of procurator. In the Gospels, Pilate is called simply governor ( $\text{\eta\gamma\epsilon\mu\acute{\omega}\nu}$ ); but Josephus specifically calls the ruler procurator ( $\text{\epsilon\pi\iota\tau\rho\phi\omicron\varsigma}$ ; Ant. xx. vi. 2, BJ ii. viii. 1, ix. 2, etc.),‡ as also does Tacitus (Ann. xv. 44). His official residence was in the palace of Herod in Cæsarea (cf. Ac 23<sup>35</sup>); but at the time of the feasts he usually went up to Jerus., probably occupying there also the palace of Herod.§ The military force under him consisted of about three thousand men at Cæsarea, besides small garrisons scattered throughout the country, and a cohort (500 men?) stationed in Jerusalem.|| His judicial authority was supreme, except in the cases of Roman citizens, where appeal lay to the emperor, while his chief duty concerned the financial administration and the collection of taxes for the imperial treasury. The Judean procurators thus exercised much higher authority than officers of the same name in most Roman provinces, where they presided merely over the finances. Similar administrative functions, however, were entrusted to the eparchs of Egypt and the procurators of Noricum, Rætia, and a few other exceptional peoples.¶

But while Judæa was thus directly governed by Rome, a large measure of local self-government was allowed, especially to urban communities. In Jerus. the Sanhedrin was the supreme court of the nation, and as many judicial functions as possible were retained by it. Death sentences, however, required the governor's confirmation, and were executed by him (cf. Jos. Ant. xx. ix. 1, BJ ii. viii. 1). The tolerant Roman rule showed much respect for the customs and prejudices of the Jewish people. It aimed at as large liberty as was consistent with order and tribute. Most of the difficulties in Judæa arose from the religious zeal and intractable disposition of the Jews themselves. On the other hand, their liberties were liable at any moment to be overruled, if necessity seemed to require it; and the procurators were generally men who grievously abused their authority. The nation itself also was divided, and in an almost constant state of tumult. The recollection of these facts is necessary in order to appreciate the position of Pilate when Christ was brought before his bar.

* Some count him the sixth procurator, reckoning as the first Sabinus who took charge during the absence of Archelaus (Jos. Ant. xvii. ix. 3, x. 1); but Sabinus, as procurator in Syria under Varus, merely acted to secure Cæsar's interests after the death of Herod, and while the cause of Archelaus was yet in doubt.

Of Pilate's origin we know nothing,* though it has been inferred, from his nomen Pontius, that he belonged to an ancient Samnite family whose name frequently appears in Roman history.† His cognomen has, however, been derived from pileatus,—one who wore the pileus, the cap of manumitted slaves,—and the inference has been drawn that he was a freedman, or descended from one. But his appointment as procurator makes this improbable, since such officers were uniformly of equestrian rank.‡ Hence others derived Pilatus from pilum, a javelin. His prænomen is unknown, nor does his name appear in history apart from his residence in Judæa. He was preceded in office by Coponius (A.D. 6–9?), Marcus Ambivivus (A.D. 9–12?), Annus Rufus (A.D. 12–15?), and Valerius Gratus (A.D. 15–26), and was appointed (Eus. HE i. 9) in the twelfth year of Tiberius (A.D. 26), and continued in office ten years (Jos. Ant. XVIII. iv. 2).§ The unusual length of time during which he and Gratus held office was, in accordance with the policy of Tiberius, based on the opinion that governors who had already enriched themselves, would be better for the people than new ones whose avarice was yet unsatisfied (Jos. Ant. XVIII. vi. 5). Tacitus (Ann. i. 80, iv. 6) also notices the long governorships under Tiberius. Pilate came therefore to Judæa contemporaneously with the appearance of John the Baptist, and his rule covered the period of Jesus' ministry and of the first establishment of Christianity in Judæa.

Pilate's administration was marked by events which show both the difficulties of his task and the small effort which he made to understand the Jews or accommodate himself to their prejudices. The first disturbance (Jos. Ant. XVIII. iii. 1, BJ II. ix. 2, 3) probably occurred soon after his entrance on office. To satisfy the Jews, the Romans had directed their soldiers not to carry to Jerus. upon their standards the usual image of the emperor; but Pilate sent the army to Jerus. to winter, and directed that the standards, with the images upon them, should be taken by night into the sacred city. This seemed to the Jews a direct violation of their religious laws. Forthwith multitudes hastened to Cæsarea to implore the governor to remove the images. For five days he refused to heed them, and on the sixth he admitted them to his presence, but suddenly ordered his soldiers to surround them, and threatened them with instant death if they persisted in their request. To his astonishment the Jews threw themselves on the ground, and declared that they would rather die than endure the violation of their laws. Pilate, of course, had not intended so great a massacre, and was forced to direct the removal of the images. Another disturbance arose from Pilate's use of the money contributed to the temple treasury, to build aqueducts to Jerusalem. It has been suggested that his real object was to provide water for an army besieging the city (cf. Müller, Pont. Pil. p. 16). At any rate the project aroused violent opposition, and when Pilate came to Jerus. the people clamoured against his design. On this occasion, however, he silenced the tumult by introducing disguised soldiers into the crowd, who, at a signal, drew their clubs and scattered the multitude (Jos. Ant. XVIII. iii. 2). The incident, referred to in Lk 13<sup>1</sup>, of the 'Galilæans whose blood Pilate mingled with their sacrifices,' is not mentioned by other authorities. Doubtless Pilate ordered them to be slain in the outer court of the temple, perhaps on account of some riot, while they were celebrating one of the feasts. This appeared to some an unusual judgment of Providence upon these men; and the incident illustrates the disturbed state of the country, the frequent severity of Pilate's measures, and the odium in which the governor was held. The sedition in which Barabbas took part (Mk 15<sup>7</sup>, Lk 23<sup>19</sup>) is another example of the turbulent state of the community; while still another incident, characteristic of Pilate's rule, is described by Philo (ad Gaium, 38). Philo makes Agrippa relate to Caligula that Pilate once hung gilt shields in the palace of Herod in Jerus., on each of which was inscribed the name of the donor and of him in whose honour the shield was dedicated. But even this aroused the fury of the Jews. Their chief men, including four sons of Herod, besought him to remove the objects of offence; and, when he refused, they wrote to Tiberius, who ordered the procurator to take the shields to Cæsarea. Philo makes Agrippa describe Pilate as 'inflexible, merciless, and obstinate.' He says that the Jews' threat to communicate with Tiberius 'exasperated Pilate in the greatest possible degree, as he feared lest they might go on an embassy to the emperor, and might impeach him with respect to other particulars of his government—his corruptions, his acts of insolence, his rapine, and his habit of insulting people, his cruelty, and his continual murders of people untried and uncondemned, and his never-ending, gratuitous, and most grievous inhumanity.' This is doubtless a one-sided representation. In the Gospels Pilate manifests a strong desire to do justice, and he was not more arbitrary or cruel than many other Roman officials. But he also appears in the Gospels, as in Philo, passionate and fierce, uniting obstinacy with weakness, seeking his ends by unworthy devices, and restrained in his desire to do justice by dread both of his turbulent subjects and of the effect of an appeal from them to the emperor. All accounts agree in testifying to the hearty dislike which existed between him and the Jews.

* The Germanic legends mention several towns as the birth-place of Pilate. One of the most widespread locates his birth in Mayence, as the illegitimate child of a king (variously styled Cyrus, Tyrus, and Atus), who sent him, because of a murder, to Rome, whence, because of another murder, he was sent to Pontus, from which place he derived his name. There he served the emperor by conquering the wild tribes of that region; whereupon Herod made him his co-regent, and was in turn overcome by him. See G. A. Müller, Pont. Pil. p. 48 ff.

‡ The case of Felix, who was a freedman, is remarked upon by Tacitus as if quite unusual.

§ He must have been removed early in A.D. 36, since Vitellius, after sending Pilate to Rome, attended a passover in Jerus. (Jos. Ant. xviii. iv. 3), and shortly after began the expedition against Aretas, king of the Nabatæans, which, however, was prevented (Ant. xviii. vi. 4) by the news of Tiberius' death (early in A.D. 37). Pilate's appointment therefore is to be dated A.D. 26, since Josephus states that he ruled ten years.

Pilate's share in the trial of Jesus is related briefly in Mt and Mk, but somewhat more fully in Lk; while Jn records further details which explain and confirm the Synoptic accounts. The governor evidently had some previous knowledge of Jesus, as his wife also probably had (Mt 27<sup>19</sup>). The Lord's ministry indeed had been mainly in Galilee, so that probably He had only within a short period before his arrest come under Pilate's notice. But it is incredible, in view of the interest lately aroused by Jesus in Judæa, and the necessary watchfulness of the government, that His presence had not been reported to the procurator; and at the trial it is expressly stated that Pilate 'knew that for envy they had delivered him unto him' (Mt 27<sup>18</sup>). But when, early in the morning, the representatives of the Sanhedrin, which had already condemned Jesus to death for blasphemy, brought Him to Pilate for permission to have Him put to death, and refused to enter the governor's residence lest they should be defiled (Jn 18<sup>28</sup>), Pilate went out * to them and demanded what charge they brought against the prisoner. They seem to have expected him to confirm their sentence without inquiry, a fact which illustrates the large authority conceded by the Romans to the native court. But Pilate refused to act without reasons. When they suddenly cried, 'If this man were not an evil-doer, we should not have delivered him up unto thee' (Jn 18<sup>30</sup>), he contemptuously remarked, 'Take him yourselves, and judge him according to your law,' thus forcing them to admit that they could not secure their purpose except through him. His position fully warranted this haughty expression of authority; but he was probably actuated in this instance by the desire to do justice, or at least to prevent the injustice which they intended (Mt 27<sup>18</sup>). The Jews therefore, being forced to present charges, and knowing the uselessness of bringing the charge of blasphemy, made three accusations, viz. perverting the nation, forbidding to give tribute to Caesar, and claiming to be Christ, a king (Lk 23<sup>2</sup>). The latter two, and perhaps the first, were matters with which the civil authority would naturally deal. Pilate therefore asked Jesus, 'Art thou the king of the Jews?' Jesus replied in the affirmative, but to the accusing cries of the Jews He was silent. The governor was impressed by His demeanour, though acknowledging so grave a charge, as that of no ordinary prisoner. So he led Jesus within the palace, and privately examined Him (Jn 18<sup>33-38</sup>). † In this interview the disposition and character of Pilate specially appear. Jesus freely answered his questions, and explained the entirely unworldly nature of His kingdom. He dealt with the Roman throughout as with one not actuated by malice, but placed in circumstances where he could escape guilt only by courageously obeying the truth (cf. also Jn 19<sup>11</sup>). For this, however, Pilate was not prepared. His ejaculation, 'What is truth?' (Jn 18<sup>38</sup>) was the utterance of a worldly mind, entirely sceptical of the worth of real religious and moral principles. But he was convinced that Jesus was politically harmless, and ought not to be sacrificed to Jewish malice and fanaticism. So he resolved to save Him. Yet he was afraid peremptorily to release Him: a fear which is perfectly intelligible in view of the evident determination of the chief priests, the serious charges they had presented, the large tolerance always shown to Jewish prejudices, as well as of the suspicious character of Tiberius and the excellent grounds of complaint which the Jews already had against the governor. Therefore Pilate began the series of feeble devices, which the Synoptists record, to secure the release of Jesus by a popular verdict, or at least to free himself from participation in His death. He first brought Him forth, and declared that he found no fault in Him (Jn 18<sup>38</sup>). But this unexpected announcement evoked from the priests and bystanders the cry, 'He stirreth up the people, teaching throughout all Judæa, and beginning from Galilee even unto this place' (Lk 23<sup>5</sup>). Hearing that Jesus was from Galilee, and impressed by the fury of their desire, Pilate thought to rid himself of the case by transferring it to Herod Antipas, who was then in Jerusalem. He was the more willing to do this because the relations between him and Herod had been strained, and he desired to show his friendliness. But Herod, perhaps out of compliment to Pilate, refused to accept jurisdiction, only indicating by his mockery of Jesus his contempt for the prisoner's claims (Lk 23<sup>7ff.</sup>). Pilate thus found himself compelled to adjudicate. He again declared his conviction of the prisoner's innocence, and appealed to Herod's refusal to pass sentence in confirmation of his own judgment. He proposed therefore to please the Jews by chastising Jesus, but his own conscience by releasing Him (Lk 23<sup>14ff.</sup>). It was a weak compromise, and certain to satisfy no one. Meanwhile the multitude, doubtless increased by new arrivals, some of whom hardly understood the purpose of the assemblage, began to clamour (Mk 15<sup>6</sup>) that Pilate should, according to his custom at the feast, * set free some notable prisoner. Knowing the popularity of Jesus, Pilate hoped through this custom to prevent the purpose of the chief priests, and asked if he should release Jesus. But he was foiled by the priests persuading the people to demand the release of a certain Barabbas, who was probably popular as a leader of sedition against the government (Mt 27<sup>20</sup>). It was apparently at this point that Pilate, having taken his seat on the chair of judgment (see GABBATHA), † received the message from his wife, ‡ which doubtless added a superstitious feeling to the force of his conviction that Jesus ought to be released (Mt 27<sup>19</sup>). But he had already yielded his true ground and could not recover it. When again he asked whom they would choose for release, they unitedly cried 'Barabbas.' When he next inquired what they wanted him to do with Jesus, the cry arose, at the instigation of the priests, 'Crucify him.' Shocked by their fierceness, the governor protested against so extreme a penalty. 'Why? What evil hath he done? I have found no cause of death in him. I will chastise and release him' (Lk 23<sup>22</sup>). But they clamoured for crucifixion. Pilate appears to have been simply overborne by their fierceness and the threatening aspect of affairs. His fault was moral weakness. Yet the peculiar character of his government and the known tolerance of Rome toward Jewish prejudices make it quite intelligible that unwillingness to anger the Sanhedrin should outweigh with such a man the feeble sense of duty. His handwashing (Mt 27<sup>24</sup>, cf. Dt 21<sup>6-8</sup>) though the act was a natural symbol) was but the weak device of a superficial mind, as he sought to

* The origin of this custom is unknown. Schürer (HJP i. ii. 60) states that it 'was grounded on a special authorization of the emperor, for the right of remitting a sentence was not otherwise given to the governors.' He cites Hirschfeld, Sitzungsb. d. Berl. Akad. 1889, p. 439; and Merkel, Abhandl. aus d. Gebiete des. röm. Rechts, I Heft, 1881. Friedlieb (Archäol. 110) thinks it was done at every feast, but St. John (18<sup>39</sup>) limits it to the passover. Some suppose it was a Jewish custom retained by the Romans, and Pilate's language in Jn ('Ye have a custom,' etc.) seems to confirm this view. Others think it was of Roman origin, and connect it with Livy's statement (v. 13) that, at the feast of the gods called Lectisternium, prisoners were freed.

† The βῆμα (Mt 27<sup>19</sup>), which had been put on 'a place called the Pavement, but, in the Hebrew, Gabbatha' (Jn 19<sup>13</sup>). Those who identify Pilate's residence with the fortress Antonia suppose this place to have been the elevated, paved ground between the fortress and the temple (see ΠΡΑΞΟΡΙΟΝ). Those who identify Pilate's residence with Herod's palace suppose the βῆμα to have been placed on a mosaic floor (ἀβόστρωτον, 'spread with stones'), which was called in Aram. Gabbatha (גַּבְּתָא 'elevation') from the elevated position which it, with perhaps the βῆμα upon it, occupied. Cassar (Suet. Jul. 46) is said to have carried a portable pavement on which to place his judgment-seat; and St. John's mention of the pavement with the βῆμα seems to imply that it had some connexion with the delivery of a judicial sentence, and gave formality to Pilate's final decision. See GABBATHA.

‡ Originally magistrates were not allowed to take their wives to the provinces, but the rule had ceased to be observed, as is shown by the failure of an effort to enforce it mentioned by Tacitus (Ann. iii. 33, 34).

* Being only a procurator, Pilate had no quæstor, and therefore conducted the trial himself.

calm his conscience by throwing the guilt of the transaction upon others.

But, though Pilate yielded to their request, and delivered Jesus to his soldiers to be scourged preparatory to crucifixion, St. John's narrative (19<sup>1-16</sup>) shows that the governor's conscience was not yet silenced. Once again he sought to satisfy the Jews by the spectacle of Jesus bleeding and mocked, declaring that even yet he had discovered in the prisoner, though under torture, no cause of death. When they still cried 'Crucify him,' Pilate became sullen and angry. In bitter satire, and as though about to dismiss the whole case, he bade them do the foul deed themselves. Then first they brought forward a religious charge, apparently feeling that now they needed only to work on the governor's sentiments and make him realize how serious the case appeared to them. 'We have a law, and according to our law he ought to die, because he made himself the Son of God.' But the words roused afresh Pilate's superstition. Again, and now with evident anxiety and fear (Jn 19<sup>8</sup>), he privately examined Jesus, this time concerning His origin. The silence of Jesus to these inquiries further wrought on Pilate's mind, and, though he tried to induce Jesus to speak by boasting of his own power, he again made an effort to release Him. But the Jews, now fully realizing that they must conquer the impression which Jesus had made on Pilate by bringing to bear a stronger motive, taunted the governor with infidelity to the emperor in favouring a pretended king; and this appeal to Pilate's political ambitions proved decisive. He resolved to silence his convictions. Resuming his seat on the Bema, he satirically and sullenly presented Jesus to them as their king. Thereupon he had at least the grim satisfaction of hearing his turbulent subjects vigorously forswear their political freedom and profess their allegiance to the emperor (Jn 19<sup>15</sup>). Then he finally delivered Jesus to crucifixion; but it was quite in keeping with Pilate's character and with the violence which he had done to his own convictions, that he obstinately refused to change the title on the cross, its very offensiveness to the Jews being a merit in his eyes (Jn 19<sup>22</sup>).

Thus Pilate appears a typical specimen of a worldly man. The good in him was unsupported by moral principle, and overborne by personal and political considerations. Compelled to take the leading part in a transaction where high moral qualities were supremely demanded, he proved himself to be without them, and made a great crime possible by his feebleness of character. This is quite consistent with his bravado and recklessness on other occasions. Christ's judgment upon Pilate (Jn 19<sup>11</sup>) is also the verdict of history.

Pilate's rule was brought to its close by an ill-judged attempt to suppress a harmless movement in Samaria (Jos. Ant. xviii. iv. 1). A certain impostor summoned the Samaritans to Mount Gerizim by promising to show them the sacred vessels which Moses was alleged to have hidden there. They came armed, and collected in a village called Tirabatha. But Pilate fell upon them, and caused many, both then and subsequently, to be slain. Thereupon the Samaritans appealed for redress to Vitellius, the legate in Syria, pleading that no political sedition had been intended. Vitellius ordered Pilate to repair to Rome to answer the complaints against him; but before the procurator reached the capital, Tiberius had died. Thereafter Pilate disappears from authentic history. Traditions, however, concerning him existed in the Church, and finally took the shape of fantastic legends. Eusebius (HE ii. 7 and Chron.) relates, on the authority of certain unnamed earlier writers, that Pilate fell into such misfortunes under Calig-ula that he committed suicide; and later authorities repeat the statement. The Apocr. literature elaborated the story (see Tischendorf, Evang. Apoc., Ante-Nicene Fathers, vol. viii.). According to one version ('Παράδοσις Παλάτου'), Tiberius summoned Pilate to Rome to answer the charge of crucifying Christ. When, at the examination before the Senate, Tiberius uttered Christ's name, the statues of the gods fell to the ground; whereupon Tiberius ordered war to be made against the Jews, and Pilate to be beheaded. The latter, however, with his wife, died a penitent, and was assured by a voice from heaven of his forgiveness. According to another and probably later account (Mors Pilati), Pilate appeared before Tiberius in the Saviour's tunic, which protected him from the emperor's fury. When he was stripped of it, Tiberius condemned him to death, but Pilate killed himself. His body was cast into the Tiber, but the evil spirits so disturbed the waters that the Romans carried the body to Vienne and sank it in the Rhone.* Thence, for the same reason, it was removed to the territory of Losania (Lausanne), but was finally sunk in a pit surrounded by mountains. Thus the legend connected itself with the mountain opposite Lucerne (supposed to have been named originally Pileatus, because surmounted often by a hat-shaped cloud, but corrupted by connexion with the legend into Pilatus; see Ruskin, Mod. Painters, v. 128; Müller, Pont. Pil. pp. 52, 53) where the body of Pilate is said to lie in a lake on the mountain, and at times emerge and go through the motion of washing the hands. The legend exists in various forms, however (see Müller, ib.), and attached itself to several localities. In one of the later accounts Pilate is said to have been executed by Nero (see Schürer, HJP i. ii. 88 n.). The 'tendency' of the earlier legends was to represent the Roman Government in its treatment of Pilate as vindicating the Christians and Christ; while the disposition to represent Pilate as becoming himself a Christian † explains, perhaps, the belief of the Coptic Church that he died a saint and martyr. ‡

Pilate's wife is said to have been named Claudia Procula or Procla. Christian tradition made her a proselyte to Judaism (Gosp. of Nic. 2). That she became a Christian is also a very old tradition (Orig. Hom. on Mt. 35). In the Gr. Church she became a saint, honoured on Oct. 27th. Some have even identified her with the Claudia of 2 Ti 4<sup>21</sup>. Her dream may be assumed to indicate that she had heard of Jesus and His beneficent life and deeds.

That Pilate made a report to Tiberius concerning Jesus is affirmed by Justin (1 Ap. 35) and Tertullian (Ap. 21), as well as by later writers (e.g. Eus. HE ii. 2), and Apocr. literature. Some report from the governor to the emperor is probable; but it is doubtful if the early Fathers rested their appeal to it on any certain knowledge of its existence, or of its preservation in the archives. Certainly the extant Acta Pilati are spurious. Eusebius relates (HE ix. 5) that in the great persecution under Maximin, Acts of Pilate derogatory to Christ were forged and circulated by the pagans; but none of these have survived.

PILLAR.—1. פִּלָּר, Arab. nusub or nushb, plur. ansáb, from the Semitic root nsb, meaning 'to set upright.' 2. פִּלָּר, from the same root, employed in Gn 19<sup>26</sup> to describe the pillar of salt into which Lot's wife was transformed. 3. פִּלָּר, rendered in Greek by στήλη (also employed by LXX in Gn 19<sup>26</sup>). This Hebrew word occurs in Jer 27<sup>19</sup> in the sense of 'column,' which is probably its only signification, whereas פִּלָּר means any upright stone. More frequently פִּלָּר is rendered by the Greek σῦλος (Ex 13<sup>21</sup>, Jg 20<sup>40</sup>, Job 27<sup>11</sup>), or by the word κίον, Jg 16<sup>25, 26</sup>. 4. פִּלָּר (used in plur.), pillar dedicated to sun-worship. Cf. the Carthaginian תבילת, Baethgen, Beiträge zur sem. Rel. p. 25 ff. (cf. פִּלָּר 'sunglow' = sun in Job 30<sup>28</sup>). On פִּלָּר see Gesen.<sup>28</sup> § 85 n. The plur. occurs in Ezk 6<sup>4, 6</sup>, Is 17<sup>8, 27</sup>, Lv 26<sup>30</sup>, 2 Ch 14<sup>4, 7</sup>. It may have been a later equivalent of פִּלָּר (so Kittel). LXX did not understand the term, variously rendering by ξόλινα χειροποίητα, τεμένη, βδελύγματα, and εἰδωλα.

The term פִּלָּר is nearly always used in association with religious cultus,* and signifies the upright stone which, in the pre-exilic and pre-Deuteronomie worship of Israel, was the never failing accompaniment of the Heb. sanctuary or bāmāh. It consisted of rough unhewn stone, and was the symbol of the Divine presence or numen, which was considered in some sense to reside in or be attached to it (see Jos 24<sup>26, 27</sup>). Upon it the blood of the sacrificed victim or the oil of the vegetable offering was poured or smeared (cf. Gn 28<sup>18</sup>).

There is clear evidence that in the primitive sanctuary of the early Semites the upright stone served as altar and Divine symbol in one; but in the later and more developed form of the cultus, both among Semites and other races, the altar and stone-symbol came to be separated the one from the other. This probably arose from the fact that it was found convenient to have a separate place for the reception and slaughter of the victim, and to this another motive came to be superadded in connexion with the larger and more important sanctuaries, viz. the need of having an erection which should be conspicuous to a large concourse of beholders who witnessed in silence the solemn act of slaughter. The further need to provide for the reception and disposal of the blood gave rise to special arrangements in this particular apparatus of worship. That the distinction between altar and stone-symbol arose very early in the history of primitive Israel is clearly revealed by the facts of language, since it is quite evident that פִּלָּר 'altar' or place of slaughter, belongs to early as well as late Hebrew. These views are established by archaeological evidence. Primitive dolmens have been discovered provided with hollows formed for drink-offerings, and intended to serve as altars. Stones were also used by the ancient Palestinian inhabitants for the worship of ancestral manes as well as to mark the place of burial. See Nowack in Heb. Archäol. i. p. 92, who cites from the researches of Noetting and Schumacher in ZDPV ix. 268, and Zeitsch. für Ethnol. xix. 37 ff.; and Conder, Heth and Moab, pp. 238, 266 ff. The Rev. James Sibree has informed the present writer that many similar stones have been found in Madagascar.

* The exception Is 6<sup>13</sup> is far from certain. The last clause of the verse is omitted in LXX BA* though supplied in Luc. text and by a later hand in A. The preceding relative clause, with its אֲשֶׁר, and the unique use of בְּצֶלֶם, appears to the present writer to have been mutilated at some early date.

Much obscurity hangs over the origin of the unhewn stone representation of deity. It has been generally held that that origin is to be found in the primitive fetish worship of which many illustrations have been collected by Prof. Tylor* and other writers from Africa, India, and ancient Hellas. Theophrastus (4th cent. B.C.) describes the superstitious Greek as passing the anointed stones in the street, taking out his oil-phial and pouring its contents on them, and then, after falling on his knees to worship, going on his way (Char. xvi.). Survivals of stone-worship were to be found even in quite recent times among the remote mountain peasants of Norway (Tylor, ib. p. 167). Accordingly the employment of the stone-symbol among the primitive Semites may be regarded as part of a well-nigh universal tradition of antiquity. In ancient Arabic polytheism we find the stone nushb or the group of ansáb. The blood of the sacrificial victim was smeared upon the stone. The idea involved in this act was evidently, as Robertson Smith suggests, that of bringing 'the offering into direct contact with the deity, and in like manner the practice of stroking the sacred stone (e.g. that of the Kaaba) with the hand is identical * Primitive Culture, vol. ii. p. 161 ff. It is by no means easy to define the meaning of 'fetish.' Usually it is explained as meaning the material thing, as a stone, which is made the object of worship. Others deny this, treating the fetish as a magical 'medium whereby one is placed in closer connexion with the deity, and in which divine powers reside.' See Chantepie de la Saussaye, Lehrbuch der Religionsgesch. 2 i. p. 14. This writer remarks with much truth that it is not any or every object of sense-perception to which the term can be applied, 'but only the individual, one might say, accidental object which attracts the attention of the savage.' There is no essential distinction between the fetish and the idol. The distinction is merely one of external form. The former is a rude natural object accidentally found, the latter is carved or painted by human hands. In both cases the spirit, which is the object of worship and whose help is sought, is supposed to be in some way incorporate in the material. Siebeck, Lehrbuch der Religionsphilosophie, p. 64, contrasts this view with the more advanced conception which regards the idol as the symbol and not the seat of deity. It may here be remarked, in order to prevent misunderstanding, that the expression 'stone-symbol' is not used in this exclusive sense in this article. The stone among the early Semites not only represented but incorporated the numen of the deity. See Robertson Smith, RS 2 p. 204 ff.

with the practice of touching or stroking the garments or beard of a man in acts of supplication before him.'

The stone might represent a male or female deity, but it must not be inferred that the plurality of stones represented always a plurality of deities. Probably it represented as a rule a single object of worship, just as the twelve stones erected by Joshua at Gilgal (Jos 4<sup>20</sup>), and the same number by Moses (on the occasion of the covenant sacrifice at Sinai, Ex 24<sup>4</sup>), for the twelve tribes of Israel, represented the one God, Jehovah. According to Wellhausen (Reste arab. Heid.<sup>2</sup> p. 102) it was customary in oaths to swear 'by the anzāb which stand around such and such a god.' In an interesting passage in which Herodotus describes the mode in which the ancient Arabs ratify a solemn covenant (iii. 8), he speaks of seven stones on which the sacrificial blood was smeared in honour of Dionysus and the heavenly (goddess), probably meaning the sun and moon (so Abicht). In the interesting narrative of Nilus quoted by Robertson Smith (RS<sup>2</sup> p. 338), the camel chosen as a victim is bound upon a rude altar of stones piled together. Probably this may be regarded as the most primitive type of Arabian or Semitic sacrifice.

The sacred stone (or stones) was not conveyed by the nomadic clan from place to place in its wanderings, like an ark or some movable simulacrum, but remained stationary, since the stone may be considered to have focussed the presence and personal power of the deity that owned and occupied the Temenos, Kodesh (or Haram), as the hallowed spot was named by Greek or Semite respectively. Such a spot was frequently one of special fertility accompanied by a sacred spring and tree. Frequently the mazzēbā consisted of a large natural upright rock of irregular shape. The two pillars of Heracles (the Greek equivalent of Baal) consisted probably of enormous cliff-like rocks situated by the Straits of Gibraltar. Numerous examples of such natural blocks of stone in situ are given in RS<sup>2</sup> p. 110 (see especially the footnote). Among these is the notable stone-symbol of the goddess al Lāt (see Kinship and Marriage, p. 292 ff.). Doughty gives a description of his visit to et-Tāif, where he saw this and two other sacred stones (Arabia Deserta, ii. p. 515 ff.). The interesting fact that goddesses were also worshipped under these stone-symbols clearly proves that Movers is wrong in ascribing to them a phallic origin and character.* They can only be explained as one of the many forms of fetishism out of which polytheistic cultus grew.

Any stone of this character would mark a Bēth-el. Hence such stones came to be called by the Greeks βαίτυλοι or βαίτυλια.† In Is 57<sup>6</sup> we have an interesting reference to the wide prevalence of this worship of sacred stones, on which drink-offerings were poured and to which meal-offerings were offered. In the wādis, the winter-torrents made these boulders smooth and round. See Cheyne's note, ad loc., in SBOT.

It was not at every spot that such sacred pillars were erected. There must be a special manifestation of the Divine presence in order to render the worship valid, because the place had thus become invested with special sanctity. Not simply fertile oases with trees and flowing spring coming from the depths of the soil, but also special events, as battles, signal deliverances and visions, were tokens of God's presence. Thus after the battle of Michmash, Saul ordered a great stone to be rolled

(1 S 14<sup>33</sup>) which served as an altar (v.<sup>35</sup>); Bethel, according to JE, became a consecrated spot through the vision of Jacob, who in consequence set up the stone pillar and poured oil upon it (Gn 28<sup>18</sup>).

These passages sufficiently illustrate the primitive character of the pre-exilian Hebrew mazzēbā which formed the indispensable accompaniment of every sanctuary (Hos 3<sup>4</sup>). The early pre-exilian code of legislation preserved in Ex 20<sup>25</sup> sought to keep intact the stone's primitive condition. It was to remain unhewn and no iron instrument was to desecrate it, either because the stone itself was sacrosanct like the sacred enclosure in which it stood, or perhaps, as Nowack suggests (Heb. Archäol. ii. p. 17), because the profaning hand of man drove the numen out of the stone. If we are to believe the statement of the Mishna tract Middoth (iii. 1), the altar of burnt-offering in Herod's temple was formed of unhewn stones. Throughout the earlier portion of OT narrative we constantly meet with allusions to the stone pillars of the local sanctuaries, e.g. Shechem (Jos 24<sup>26</sup>), Ramoth-gilead (Gn 31<sup>45</sup>), Gilgal (Jos 4<sup>5</sup>), Mizpeh (1 S 7<sup>12</sup>), Gibeon (2 S 20<sup>8</sup>), En-rogel (1 K 1<sup>9</sup>). Sometimes the stone gave the name to the spot, as Eben-ezer (1 S 7<sup>12</sup>, cf. 4<sup>1</sup>). Here again, as in the case of 1 S 14<sup>33</sup> (already mentioned), the erection of the stone at a particular spot follows the manifestation of Divine power in His people's signal victory. That the rough stone (mazzēbā), as the symbol of Jehovah, differed in no respect from that which was erected to represent Baal, is quite certain. Baal worship and Jehovah worship at the local bāmōth were inextricably blended in the pre-Deuteronomic period, as the oracles of Hosea clearly testify (Hos 2<sup>18</sup> the genuineness of which Wellhausen and Nowack unnecessarily surrender). The mazzēbōth of Baal were destroyed in Samaria by the reforming zeal of Jehu (2 K 10<sup>26, 27</sup>).

Whether there is any reference to the stone-symbol in the designation of Jehovah by the name 'rock' in many poetical passages in the OT (Ps

18<sup>32</sup>, 1 S 2<sup>2</sup>, Dt 32<sup>44</sup>, Is 30<sup>29</sup>), it is not easy to determine. The name for rock here is  $\text{רָב}$ , which also enters into proper names which have their parallels in Assyrian (Schrader, COT ii. p. 326). The balance of evidence is on the whole against this attractive supposition. In the first place, the occurrence of such names in Hebrew is late (Buchanan Gray observes that they occur only in P and never in JE or Judges\*). In the second place,  $\text{רָב}$  is not the term associated with the sacred symbol by the Hebrews, but  $\text{קָדָשׁ}$ ; but  $\text{קָדָשׁ}$  is never employed in personal proper names. Probably, therefore, we should regard the use of  $\text{רָב}$  in the personal names and in the poetical passages as figurative only, Jehovah being regarded as a safe and strong place of refuge (Ps 27<sup>5</sup> 61<sup>8</sup>), or as affording shadow from oppressive heat, cf. Is 32<sup>2</sup>. See, further, art. ROCK.

In Phœnician cultus we frequently notice the presence of twin pillars. Thus we find twin pillars erected in Solomon's temple† by Hiram the Tyrian artificer (1 K 7<sup>15-21</sup>). Similar twin pillars are exhibited on coins which portray the temple at Paphos, and also they represented the deity Melkarth at Tyre. The latter are specially described by Herodotus (ii. 44), who paid a personal visit of inspection to this famous Tyrian shrine of Hercules (Melkarth). According to Herodotus, this temple was sumptuously wrought and furnished. One of the pillars was of refined gold, and the other of emerald (or more probably, as Abicht suggests, of green glass), the latter emitting a bright light at night-time, perhaps for the mariners at sea. To the same category belong the bronze pillars of the temple of Hercules at Gades (גָּדֵס), another Phœnician settlement, described by Strabo.

Respecting Phœnician stones, sometimes called גָּבִי, see Pietschmann's Gesch. der Phönizier, pp. 204-213. Among the varied forms of these Phœnician stelæ, some of which were worked into a square shape tapering at the top (see illustration below), special mention should be made of the votive stelæ, erected by individuals as the result of a vow to the deity in order to secure some desired object. Many of them have no inscription. Others bear a legend which would nearly always be somewhat of the following character: 'To the Rabbat, the Tanit-P'nê-Ba'al and the Adon, the Baal-Hammon, as N.N. son of N.N. has vowed, since they have heard his voice; may they bless him.' It is possible that this may have been the real character of the memorial stone erected by Absalom (2 S 18<sup>18</sup>, 'Now Absalom in his life time had reared up for himself the mazzēbeth which is in the king's dale; for he said, I have no son to keep my name in remembrance; and he called the mazzēbeth after

See also the figured representations in his Commentary, p. 44, and in his Heb. Archæol. pp. 245, 249 f. his own name, and it is called Absalom's monument (7) unto this day'). It may have been rather a votive stone than merely memorial, erected in anticipation of his attempt to seize the throne. There is no necessity, with Löhr, to suppose that this mazzēbā was originally the mark of an old Canaanite sanctuary, and that its significance as a Divine symbol has been transformed into something else by the writer; see Smend, Alltest. Religionsgesch. 2 p. 132 and footnote.

The erection of the mazzēbā as a stone-symbol was forbidden in the Deuteronomic code (Dt 16<sup>22</sup>, 'Neither shalt thou set thee up a mazzēbā, which the LORD thy God hateth'), which belongs to about the year B.C. 621 in Josiah's reign. Hereafter it became illegitimate. The reference to the pillar to Jehovah at the border of Egypt in Is 19<sup>19</sup>, 'there shall be a mazzēbā at the border [of Egypt] to the LORD,' must be regarded as pre-exilian and pre-Deuteronomic, though it is probable that the chapter in which it occurs has been affected by later influences. OWEN C. WHITEHOUSE.

PILLAR, PLAIN OF THE.—In Jg 9<sup>6</sup> we read that the men of Shechem and all the house of Millo made Abimelech king 'by the plain (AV; RV 'oak,' RVm 'terebinth') of the pillar that was in Shechem' (עֲצָבַת יִשְׁכָּם בְּעֵץ יָבֵשׁ; LXX B πρὸς τῆ βαλάνω τῆ εὔπερῆ τῆς στάσεως τῆς ἐν Σικίμοις [A om. τῆ εὔπερῆ and the second τῆς]; Aq. ἐπὶ πεδίον σηλωμαρος; Vulg. juxta quercum que stabat in Sichem). The correct rendering is undoubtedly 'the terebinth of the pillar' (see OAK No. 3 and PLAIN No. 2), although it is doubtful whether this can be obtained from the MT עֲצָבַת. The latter word is held by some (e.g. Studer) to be a noun synonymous with עֲצָבַת; but even so the absence of the article has to be accounted for. It is possible that, inserting the article, and punctuating differently, we should read תַּבְּרִי (cf. 1 S 13<sup>23</sup> 14<sup>17</sup>, 2 S 23<sup>14</sup>); but, upon the whole, the best course appears to be to emend, with Moore (followed by Budde), to תַּבְּרִיבָּ 'the mazzēbā terebinth.' Abimelech, as Moore appositely points out, was thus acclaimed at the sanctuary of Shechem, as Saul was at that of Gilgal (1 S 11<sup>10</sup>). The name was in all probability purposely obscured by the Massoretic reading and punctuation תַּבְּרִי. The mazzēbā mentioned in Jg 9<sup>6</sup> is perhaps the same as is called in Jos 24<sup>28</sup> 'a great stone' (בְּרִיבָּ).

PILLOW.—1. תַּבְּרִי 1 S 19<sup>13, 16</sup> [only]. Michal, according to AV and RV, put a pillow of goats' hair at the head of the teraphim which she had laid in David's bed. The LXX (ἡπαρ) reads תַּבְּרִי as תַּבְּרִי (constr. of תַּבְּרִי 'liver'); and this is adopted by Jos. (Ant. vi. xi. 4), who describes, somewhat fancifully, how the palpitation of the goat's liver under the bed-clothes conveyed to Saul's messengers the impression that David was gasping for breath. The root תַּבְּרִי, from which תַּבְּרִי is derived, probably means to 'intertwine or net,' so that תַּבְּרִי תַּבְּרִי would signify something woven or netted from goats' hair. Hence one or other of the two renderings proposed in RvM ('quilt or network') should probably be adopted in preference to the text. A number of commentators (e.g. Sebastian Schmidt, Ewald, Keil) think the reference is to a mosquito-net (κωρυμπίον) spread over the face of a person sleeping. But, as Driver points out, in Jth 10<sup>21</sup> 13<sup>9</sup>, where this Greek term is used of the CANOPY (wh. see) of Holofernes' bed, the κωρυμπίον is fixed upon the στυλοῖ or bedposts. In favour of the rendering 'quilt' we have the employment of a cognate Heb. term תַּבְּרִי in 2 K 8<sup>16</sup> for the coverlet which Hazael used to smother Benhadad. But it must be confessed that the description of Michal's action in 1 S 19<sup>13</sup> is not clear enough to determine the sense of תַּבְּרִי. The following term תַּבְּרִי (AV 'for his bolster,' RV 'at the head thereof') does not define the position in which the תַּבְּרִי was placed with reference to the head, whether over, or under, or around it; it simply implies proximity (see, further, Driver, Löhr, and H. P. Smith, ad loc.). 2. It is this word תַּבְּרִי which is rendered by AV 'pillow' in Gn 28<sup>11, 18</sup>, but RV gives more correctly 'under his head' (LXX πρὸς κεφαλῆς αὐτοῦ). The other occurrences of the Heb. expression in the same sense are 1 S 26<sup>7, 11, 16</sup>, in all of which AV has 'at his bolster,' RV 'at his head' (in v.<sup>12</sup> read תַּבְּרִי for תַּבְּרִי; AV 'from Saul's bolster,' RV 'from Saul's head'; LXX ἀπὸ πρὸς κεφαλῆς αὐτοῦ); 1 K 19<sup>6</sup>, where both AV and RV render תַּבְּרִי by 'at his (Elijah's) head' (AVM 'bolster'; LXX πρὸς κεφαλῆς αὐτοῦ). 3. תַּבְּרִי (LXX προσκεφάλαια) Ezk 13<sup>18</sup> (AV, RV 'pillows'). The meaning appears to be 'fillets' or 'bands,' used as amulets or charms, for instance in the process of divination. See art. KERCHIEF, also PHYLACTERIES, p. 872<sup>b</sup>, and cf. the Comm. of Davidson or Bertholet, ad loc. 4. תַּבְּרִי. 'Pillow' is the correct tr. of this word in 1 Es 3<sup>9</sup>, where we are told that the three pages of Darius each wrote his sentence, sealed it up, and put it under the king's pillow. The only other Biblical occurrence of this Gr. term (in addition to the LXX of Ezk 13<sup>18, 20</sup> above) is Mk 4<sup>38</sup>, where we read that Jesus was in the stern asleep 'on a pillow' (so AV, but RV 'on the cushion,' Gr. ἐπὶ τὸ προσκεφάλαιον). The reference appears to be to the cushion used by rowers (Cratin. Hor. 18, Hermipp. Strat. v.); see the Comm. ad loc.

J. A. SELBIE.

PILTAI (פִּלְטַי, B. om., A. Φεληται).—The head of the priestly house of Moadiah in the time of Joiakim, Neh 12<sup>17</sup>. It is possible that we should emend to פִּלְטַי, Palti; cf. Nu 13<sup>9</sup>, 1 S 25<sup>44</sup>, 2 S 23<sup>26</sup>.

PIN.—Jg 4<sup>21, 22</sup> RV for AV 'nail.' The Heb. is תַּי (LXX πίσσαλος). In 5<sup>26</sup>, by an unaccountable inconsistency, RV retains 'nail,' although the Heb. is the same, and relegates 'tent-pin,' to the margin. On the other uses of the word תַּי; see art. PADDLE. The tent-pins, to which the ropes of the tent were fastened (Is 33<sup>20</sup>), were not of metal but of wood, as among the Bedawin at the present day (see Moore, ad loc.). For the question whether the description of Jael's action in 4<sup>21, 22</sup> is not due to a prosaic misunderstanding of 5<sup>26</sup> (Wellh. Comp. p. 222; W. R. Smith, OTJC p. 132; Stade, GV t. i. p. 178 n.), see art. JAEL and SISERA.

PINE TREE.—The תַּי in AV of two Heb. expressions—1. עֲז־שֶׁמֶן ez-shemen (Neh 8<sup>15</sup>), RV 'wild olive.' We incline to the rendering 'fatwood trees' for this expression in this and the other passages in which it occurs. This would include all the resinous trees of Palestine and Syria, especially the pines. See OIL TREE.

2. תִּדְחָר tidhār (Is 41<sup>19</sup> 60<sup>18</sup> RvM 'plane'). There is nothing in the etymology to indicate the tree intended. Dardār in the Arab., which is used for both the elm and the ash, is cited by the Oxf. Heb. Lex.; but this is from a different root, dārdār, not dāhār, and really sheds no light on the question. Theodotion (Q<sup>mg</sup>) transliterated תִּדְחָר by θαδδάρ, while Symmachus rendered it πελάταν, i.e. πελέαν, 'elm.' In the LXX there are five trees named where there are three in MT; possibly two of the names are doublets. The reading of RvM (and Cheyne) 'plane' does not seem to have any foundation. The same is true of Gesenius' rendering 'oak.' This he obtains from the radical signification of dahr (Arab.)='age' or 'duration'; but the Heb. [תִּדְחָר] dāhar, has not, so far as we know, any such meaning. Perhaps the best refuge for our ignorance would be a textual or marginal transliteration tidhār, as suggested in the case of tē'ashshār in the same passage (see BOX TREE), and 'alghummim' (see ALGUM). G. E. POST.

PINNACLE (περύγιον, diminutive of πτερυξ, 'wing'; so lit. 'little wing'; Vulg. pinnaculum and pinna respectively in Mt 4<sup>5</sup> and Lk 4<sup>9</sup>, the only two places where the Gr. word occurs in NT).—That part of the temple enclosure (τὸ ἱερόν, not ὁ ναός) to which the devil took our Lord for the purpose of tempting Him.

περύγιον is used in the LXX to translate the following Heb. words:—1. קַנֵּף kānāph, wing or border, as of a garment, Nu 15<sup>28</sup>, 1 S 15<sup>27</sup> 24<sup>4</sup>. 2. תַּבְּרִי šēnappēr, fin of a fish, Lv 11<sup>9</sup>. Aristotle in περὶ ψυχῆς, i. 5. 14 has the word in this sense. 3. קַנֵּף kāzāh, Ex 28<sup>26</sup> (AV 'border,' RV 'edge' of breastplate).

In NT it stands for some part of the roof of the sanctuary or of the temple proper, perhaps the S.E. corner, from which the widest and most impressive view was obtained. The part meant was well known, as the use of the article τὸ (περύγιον) shows, but the word is used in this connexion only, and we have no means of definitely fixing its connotation. Opinions, which differ widely, may be arranged in two main classes.

(a) Those which make the pinnacle a part of the sanctuary or temple proper (ὁ ναός). Meyer (on Mt 4<sup>9</sup>) argues that the use of τοῦ ἱεροῦ, not τοῦ ναοῦ, shows that the temple proper cannot be meant; but he forgets in this criticism that ἱερόν is a general word which embraces the sanctuary and also the adjoining buildings; it therefore covers ναός, though it includes more. It has this more extensive meaning in Mt 12<sup>9</sup> 24<sup>1</sup>, Mk 13<sup>3</sup>, Lk 21<sup>5</sup> 22<sup>62</sup>, though in some other passages it seems to denote the buildings around, to the exclusion of the temple proper, as in Mt 21<sup>12, 14</sup> 26<sup>55</sup>, Mk 14<sup>49</sup>, Lk 19<sup>47</sup> 21<sup>37</sup> 22<sup>63</sup> 24<sup>53</sup> etc. In Mt 4<sup>5</sup> and Lk 4<sup>9</sup> it may be used in the broad or in the narrow sense—the word itself proves nothing. The sense here must accordingly be ascertained from the context, or the probabilities of the case. Those who seek the pinnacle somewhere in the sanctuary differ as to its exact situation. (1) Luther, Beza, and Grotius place it on the parapet surrounding the roof; such a fence had by law (Dt 22<sup>6</sup>) to be placed on the roof of all buildings, to prevent accident by falling. (2) The ridge or the highest point of the roof, say Fritzsche and Winer. (3) According to Paulus, it is the gable or pediment of the roof, and it gets its name from its shape Λ. (4) Krebs, Keim, and generally the older expositors identify the so-called pinnacle with the roof. (5) Lightfoot (Hor. Heb. on Mt 4<sup>5</sup>) holds that the summit of the ἄλμ ('ulam) or porch, which extended on both sides of the sanctuary on the east, is what we are to understand. This porch was, he says, like a wing of the temple, and the top of it was like its wing.

(b) Others hold that a part of some out-building is what is meant. Here again, as before, there are differences as to the details. (1) Wetstein and Michaelis think that Solomon's porch on the east of the temple (see Jos. Ant. XXI. ix. 7) is what is meant. (2) The Στοὰ βασιλική on the south side of the temple area (see Jos. Ant. xv. xi. 9) is what B. Crusius, Arnoldi, and Meyer take the word to stand for. From this portico, according to the account of Josephus (see above), the view below is a deep and giddy one. This is the opinion to which Lightfoot is most inclined next to his own.

When, however, we remember that the sanctuary was on the highest of a series of terraces, so that its roof would command valleys and mountains around Jerus., and even beyond Jordan, it is much more natural and impressive to make the sanctuary roof the scene of this temptation. Meyer objects that, on account of its being covered with pointed spikes, put there to keep the birds away, Christ could not have been placed there; but the priests are known to have ascended to this roof (Middoth, ch. 4; Tannith, Talm. Bab. fol. 29).

PINON (פִּינֹן).—An Edomite 'duke,' Gn 36<sup>41</sup> (A Φινός, D Φεινών, E Φινών)=1 Ch 1<sup>52</sup> (B Φεινών, A Φινών). It is the same name which appears in Nu 33<sup>42</sup> as Punon (פִּינֹן), one of the stations of the Israelites. See PUNON.

PIPE, in the sense of a tube, occurs in AV and RV of Zec 4<sup>2</sup> (נִסְרֵי) and in AV (RV has 'spouts') of v. 12 (נִסְרֵי) in connexion with the golden candlestick which the prophet saw in a vision, and which had a bowl at the top filled with oil for supplying its seven lamps by means of pipes leading to them. For 'pipe' in the sense of a musical instrument see MUSIC.

PIRAM (פִּירָם 'wild ass'?).—The king of Jarmuth who joined other four kings against Gibeon, but was defeated by Joshua at Beth-horon and afterwards put to death at Makkedah along with his allies (Jos 10<sup>32</sup>). According to Hommel (Anc. Heb. Trad. 223 n.), Pir'am is identical with Pir'u, the name of an Arabian king in the time of Sargon. Sayce (EHH 225 n.) compares the Egyp. Pi-Romi.

PIRATHON, PIRATHONITE (פִּירָתוֹן, ὁ Φαραθωνίτης, Luc. Ἐφραθωνίτης), Jg 12<sup>13, 15</sup>.—Abdon, a minor judge, was a Pirathonite, i.e. a native of Pirathon

'in the land of Ephraim, in the hill-country of the Amalekites,' a district either anciently held by the Amalekites, or seized by them on one of their invasions from the south. Benaiah, one of David's mighty men, belonged to the same town, 2 S 23<sup>30</sup>, 1 Ch 11<sup>31</sup> ὁ Φαραθωνεὶ, 27<sup>14</sup> ὁ ἐκ Φαραθῶν. It is generally identified with Fer'ata, 6 miles S.W. of Samaria (a site also proposed for Ophrah); some prefer Fer'on, due W. of Samaria. Smith suggests that Pirathon was a fortress at the head of the Wady Far'ah, HGHL 355, cf. 350 f.; Moore is inclined to look for it in Benjamin, as Abdon is a Benjamite family in 1 Ch 8<sup>22, 30</sup> 9<sup>36</sup>. Pirathon was one of the places fortified by Bacchides, 1 Mac 9<sup>50</sup> καὶ τὴν Θαμνάδα Φαραθῶν. It appears that καὶ τὴν has fallen out of the text before Φ. here. The other fortresses in this verse are all ἐν τῇ Ἰουδαίᾳ, so that Φ. can hardly be the same as Pirathon above; unless the author made the mistake of introducing a Samaritan town into his list of Judæan forts. See also Jos. Ant. XIII. i. 3.

PISGAH.—This word (which always has the def. art. הַר הַפִּיגָה) is not found by itself, but in the expressions הַר הַפִּיגָה וְהַר הַפִּיגָה. The first of these occurs in four passages, two of which refer to Moses (Dt 3<sup>27</sup> 34<sup>1</sup>). In art. NEBO (MOUNT) it is pointed out that 'the top (head) of Pisgah' and 'Mt. Nebo' are alternative designations (in D and P respectively) of the same spot, and the situation is described. The two other passages are Nu 21<sup>20</sup> 23<sup>14</sup>. In Nu 21<sup>20</sup> a station in the journeyings of the children of Israel is described as 'the top of Pisgah which looketh down upon the desert' (AV 'toward Jeshimon,' cf. RVm); and according to Nu 23<sup>14</sup> Balak brought Balaam, after sacrificing on the high places of Baal, or at Bamoth-baal (22<sup>41</sup>), 'into the field of Zophim, to the top of Pisgah.'

The second expression is found Dt 3<sup>17</sup> 4<sup>9</sup>, Jos 12<sup>3</sup> 13<sup>20</sup>. RV renders 'slopes of Pisgah,' with 'springs' in the margin; AV has 'Ashdath-pisgah,' except in Dt 4<sup>9</sup>, where it has 'the springs of Pisgah.' In Jos 10<sup>40</sup> 12<sup>5</sup> הַר הַפִּיגָה occurs by itself, and is rendered RV 'slopes,' AV 'springs'; and פִּיגָה is the first word of Nu 21<sup>15</sup>—RV 'slope of the valleys,' AV 'stream of the brooks.' From these versions it will be seen that the unusual word from the root פָּגַח has been variously interpreted. In Aramaic פָּגַח means 'to pour' [it is the Targ. rendering of פָּגַח in MT], and hence פִּיגָה and הַר הַפִּיגָה are interpreted as places where water is poured down, i.e. the sloping sides of hills, or as pourings forth, i.e. streams or springs.

The AV, in treating it as a proper name, follows the LXX, which renders uniformly Ἀσηδόθ (Μηρόθ is a variant in B of Jos 12<sup>3</sup> and A of 13<sup>20</sup>). The hesitation of AV is like that of the Vulgate, which renders radices montis Phasga in Dt, and Asedoth in Joshua. The Onomasticon takes it as the name of a city in the tribe of Reuben, and adds 'adpellatur autem addito cognomento Asedoth Fasga, quod in lingua nostra resonat abscisum.' (Cf. Eus. [Lag. 206]: λέγεται δὲ Ἀσηδόθ Φασγῶ ὅ ἐστι λαευντή.) It also asserts (s.v. 'Abarim') that a district was still called Φασγῶ, Fasga (Onom. Lag. ed. pp. 124, 125, 237). No trace of such a district has been found on the eastern side of the Dead Sea, but a very similar name is applied to a promontory on the western shore (Ras Feshkah); and in its neighbourhood is the Neby Musa of Moslem tradition.

The renderings of LXX for Pisgah call for some comment. In the second group (those containing Ἀσθόθ-happisgāh) we find Φασγῶ or Φασχά three times, and τὴν λαευντήν in Dt 4<sup>9</sup>. In the first group (those containing 'top of Pisgah') we find Φασγῶ once (Dt 34<sup>1</sup>), but Nu 21<sup>20</sup> τοῦ λελαευνμένου, and Nu 23<sup>14</sup>, Dt 3<sup>27</sup> (both B) Λελαευνμένου.

The root  $\text{פִּשׁ}$  occurs only once in the Massoretic text of OT (Ps 48<sup>14</sup>) in Targ. Jerus. as a verb 'to divide' (MT  $\text{פָּשַׁח}$  and the Ar. λεγ.  $\text{פָּשַׁח}$  of Gn 15<sup>10</sup>), and  $\text{פִּשְׁתָּה$  denotes 'a portion.' The word  $\text{λαξεῖω}$  (which is used of hewing and dressing stone) is the LXX rendering of the MT  $\text{פִּשַׁח}$  in the command to hew the second tables of stone (Ex 34<sup>1-4</sup>, Dt 10). In the Onomasticon it is regarded as a translation of Pisgah, and the 'abscisum' of Jerome (see the passages given above) seems to indicate a mountain with precipitous sides. Pisgah as seen from the heights of the Moabite plateau would not suggest the idea of a mountain cut off from its fellows, but as seen from the Dead Sea and Jordan Valley its steep sides justify the epithet 'abscisum,' which may be taken as an interpretation of  $\text{λαξεῖω}$  and Pisgah. There is another alternative suggested by the similarity between  $\text{פִּשַׁח}$  and  $\text{פִּשְׁתָּה}$ , viz. that the LXX translation is due to a confusion of consonants. It may further be noted that the different renderings of the LXX are not found in different books, but that in both Numbers and Deut. Pisgah is translated in one place as a proper noun, and in others explained by the Greek verb  $\text{λαξεῖω}$ .

PISHON ( $\text{פִּישׁוֹן}$ , Phison).—See EDEN. In Assyrian pisannu means 'water-channel.'

PISIDIA (Πισιδία) was a country in the southern part of Asia Minor, bounded by Lycia on the west, Phrygia on the north, and Pamphylia on the south, while on the east it passed in a vague, indefinite way into the land of the Isauria or Tracheiote tribes. Its greatest length, east to west, was about 120 miles, and its greatest breadth about 50. On the north and south Pisidia was originally well defined by its relation to the Taurus mountains: in this part Taurus is a broad tract of many lofty ridges intersected by valleys, some of large size along the course of considerable rivers or the margin of lakes, others mere glens among the hills. Where the mountains are merged definitely in the great plateau on the north, or sink to the level coast-land on the south, Pisidia ended. Several of those large valleys bore special names, such as Kabalis, Milyas the land of the Milyes or Milyai, the country of the Etenneis (more strictly Hetenneis, transformed in Greek into two separate names attached to two parts of the country, Etenneis and Katenneis), the country of the Orondeis, the country of the Homonades: sometimes those districts were called by their special names, but often they were summed up as parts of Pisidia.

In the course of Roman history the name Pisidia was changed from a strictly geographical to a political term. Pisidia was merely a part of the great province Galatia in the 1st cent. after Christ. In A.D. 74 the larger half of Pisidia was taken from the province Galatia and attached to the new double province of Lycia-Pamphylia. It was then reckoned part of Pamphylia; and that name now gradually came to be used as including many cities which previously were purely Pisidian; while the name Pisidia was more especially applied to the part of that country which was still in the province Galatia, and Pisidia steadily encroached on PHRYGIA until in practice the whole of Galatic Phrygia was called Pisidia. Antioch and Apollonia, originally cities of Phrygia, then came to be called cities of Pisidia. Still later, probably under Diocletian, the whole of southern Galatia was formed into a province Pisidia, to which were attached western Lycaonia and another slice of Phrygia with the cities of Apamea and Metropolis. Thus we find Iconium called a city of Pisidia in the 4th cent. by Ammianus Marcellinus. About 372 another new province Lycaonia was constituted out of parts of the provinces Isauria, Pisidia, and Galatia (eastern Lycaonia and Isaurapolis from the first, western Lycaonia and parts of eastern Pisidia from the second, Glavama or Egdaumana from the third); and henceforth the name Pisidia was used to denote the diminished province with Antioch as capital.

In the time of St. Paul, Pisidia was still used in its old and strict sense to indicate the whole great group of mountain valleys in the Taurus, which politically formed part of the province Galatia. Paul traversed Pisidia on his way from Perga to Antioch (Ac 13<sup>14</sup>), and again on his return journey from Antioch to Perga (Ac 14<sup>24</sup>). On the former occasion Pisidia is not named, probably for the reason that Paul and Barnabas were going straight to Antioch and did not preach by the way. On the second occasion 'they passed through Pisidia and came to Pamphylia'; the two names are here used as political terms, one being a region of the province Galatia (see vol. ii. pp. 87, 90 f.), the other the small procuratorial province on the coast.

In Ac 13<sup>14</sup> the true text is 'Pisidian Antioch' * (not Antioch of Pisidia), that being a way of distinguishing it from the many other Antiochs, abbreviated from the fuller description 'a Phrygian city towards Pisidia': the region (of the province) of which Antioch was metropolis is mentioned Ac 13<sup>49</sup>: it was (Galatic) PHRYGIA.

If Paul preached in Pisidia, the brevity of the reference rather suggests that the work was unimportant and unsuccessful. He found there no 'door opened unto him' (2 Co 2<sup>12</sup>). A rude, little-educated, rustic population was not favourable to his teaching; and there is no reason to think that Pisidia was early Christianized. The only part where there are any pre-Constantinian Christian inscriptions, is that which lies closest to Apamea; † and the new religion is likely to have spread there from that great seat of early Christianity (see PHRYGIA).

Yet a Pauline tradition seems either to have remained alive from the first or to have grown up later in Pisidia. The modern name of the imposing but wholly desolate and unpopulated ruins of Adada is Kara Bavlo. The word Kara (literally 'black,' metaphorically in common usage 'terrible' or 'strong') is often applied to ancient sites. The name Bavlo is now applied to the modern town 5 or 6 miles south of Kara Bavlo, which has replaced it as the seat of government. Plainly the name was carried with the population from the old site to the new; and the old city was henceforward distinguished as Kara Bavlo. Now it is evident and certain that Bavlo is merely the modern pronunciation of the apostle's name  $\text{Παῦλος}$ ; and clearly this name was the popular local designation of Adada, derived from the patron saint. And it is highly probable that this local identification of Adada with the apostle's name is to be connected with the fact that Adada is the one important city in Pisidia on the direct road from Perga to Antioch; and that the name attests a local legend that St. Paul passed that way and taught in the city. A remarkable and very early ruined church stands near the road leading to the south about a mile or two from the city.

One other trace of Pisidia has been left on the NT. When St. Paul speaks of the 'perils of rivers' and 'perils of robbers' which he had been exposed to, no locality is likely to have been so prominent in his mind as Pisidia. It was still barely conquered when he traversed it. Augustus had found it necessary to plant in it several colonies, Cremna, Comama, Ölbasa, Parlais, to keep down its unruly tribes. Its mountain fastnesses were the natural haunt and refuge of robbers; and the inscriptions bear testimony to this. Some examples are quoted in the Church in the Roman Empire before 170, p. 23 f.; see also Conybeare and Howson's scholarly work on St. Paul (though it indicates a different route across Pisidia).

LITERATURE.—As to Pisidian ethnology and language hardly anything is known; Ramsay, 'Inscriptions en Langue Pisidienne,' in Revue des Universités du Midi, 1895, p. 353, has published the only known monuments of the language; but they contain hardly anything more than proper names, revealing a few grammatical forms. The proper names, Grecized in form, which occur in Greek inscriptions, are of remarkable and peculiar character: many Greek inscriptions of Pisidian cities are given by Sterrett in his Wolfe Expedition and his Epigraphic Journey in Asia Minor; by Lanckoronski, Städte Pamphyliens und Pisidiens (containing also splendid accounts and photographs of sites and monuments).

PISPAH (פִּסְפָּה, Β Φασφαί, Α Φασφά).—An Asherite, 1 Ch 7<sup>38</sup>.

PIT in OT represents twelve Heb., and in NT two Gr. words. 1, 2. From the root פָּאָר, only in Piel, 'make distinct or plain':—(a) פָּאָר (possibly from idea of coming to light or appearing), commonly rendered 'well,' indicating a deep shaft containing water. It corresponds with Arab. bīr. It is once used of the pits whence bitumen was taken, גְּאֵי תַרְשִׁיִּשׁ (Gn 14<sup>10</sup>). The dark, cold depths, from which, if one fell in, escape would be so difficult, doubtless suggested the figures 'pit of destruction' (Ps 55<sup>23</sup>), 'pit' (Ps 69<sup>15</sup>), 'narrow pit' (Pr 23<sup>27</sup>). (b) בֵּיר the usual word for 'cistern,' which should take the place of 'pit' (RVm) in Lv 11<sup>36</sup>, 1 S 13<sup>6</sup>, 2 K 10<sup>14</sup>. When empty, the bōr was frequently used as a place of confinement (Gn 37<sup>22a</sup>, Zec 9<sup>11</sup>). It is rendered 'dungeon' in Gn 40<sup>15a</sup>, Is 24<sup>22</sup> RVm, La 3<sup>53, 55</sup>; so also Jer 38<sup>6</sup> (RVm 'pit'), which may explain the figure in Ps 40<sup>2</sup>. בֵּיר רִבְוֹ (Ex 12<sup>23</sup>, Jer 37<sup>16</sup>) is a prison cell. Thus it comes to be used for the universal prison of the tomb (Pr 1<sup>12</sup>, Ps 28<sup>1</sup> 30<sup>8</sup>, Is 14<sup>15</sup> 38<sup>18</sup>, Ezk 26<sup>20</sup> etc.). The pit in which Benaiah slew the lion (2 S 23<sup>20</sup>, 1 Ch 11<sup>22</sup>) and the pit, prepared against the necessities of a dreaded siege, into which Ishmael cast his slaughtered victims (Jer 41<sup>7-9</sup>), were probably large empty reservoirs. The hole out of which stones have been quarried (Is 51<sup>1</sup>) is often used as a cistern.

3. בָּב (from בָּבַב 'to dig') corresponds with the Arab. jubb, a deep well or cistern or ditch. The word occurs in 2 K 3<sup>16</sup>, where the most likely sense is 'trenches' (RV), and in Jer 14<sup>3</sup>, where 'pits' should surely be 'cisterns' (possibly also in same sense [so Klost.] in Jer 39<sup>10</sup> 52<sup>16</sup> || 2 K 25<sup>12</sup>).

4. גָּבַר (from גָּבַר ? 'to gather together') a cistern, as in Is 30<sup>14</sup> RV; but in Ezk 47<sup>11</sup> probably a marsh or pool.

5. גִּבְעָר (an Aram. loan-word) occurs only in Ec 10<sup>8</sup> 'He that diggeth a pit shall fall into it'; cf. the parallel in Pr 26<sup>27</sup>, where the word used is שָׁחַ; root גִּבְעָר Syr. and Aram. = 'to dig.'

6. פָּחַת (from an unused root פָּחַת 'to excavate'), probably an excavation, or deep cleft with gloomy recesses in which one might hide (2 S 17<sup>9</sup>). It is rendered 'hole' in Jer 48<sup>28</sup>, and doubtless because of its forbidding aspect it is associated with those things which inspire terror (Is 24<sup>17</sup>, Jer 48<sup>48</sup>, La 3<sup>47</sup> RV, etc.). Into some such opening the body of Absalom was thrown (2 S 18<sup>17</sup>).

compass his undoing (Ps 7<sup>15</sup> (ditch) 9<sup>15</sup> 35<sup>7</sup> 94<sup>13</sup>, Pr 26<sup>27</sup>, Ezk 19<sup>4, 8</sup>). It is also used as equivalent to the grave, which is destined to entrap all living (Job 33<sup>18a</sup>, Ps 30<sup>9</sup> 55<sup>25</sup>). 'Pit' (RVm) should take the place of 'corruption' in Job 17<sup>14</sup>, Ps 16<sup>10</sup> 49<sup>9</sup>, and Jon 2<sup>6</sup> (RVm); of 'destruction' Ps 103<sup>4</sup>, and of 'grave' Job 33<sup>22</sup>. In Job 9<sup>31</sup> it seems to indicate a receptacle of filth, while in Is 51<sup>14</sup> it clearly denotes a dungeon. (c) שְׁחָה occurs thrice (Ps 57<sup>6</sup> 119<sup>85</sup>, Jer 18<sup>22</sup>), fig. in each case, of the subtle and malevolent schemes of enemies.

11, 12. From the root נָשָׂה 'to bow down':—(a) נָשָׂה only once, fig. (Pr 28<sup>10</sup>). (b) נָשָׂה (Ps 107<sup>20</sup>, La 4<sup>20</sup>). In the former case, instead of 'destructions,' we may read with Delitzsch (in loc.) 'pits,' referring to the sufferings into which they had sunk. In the latter it again refers to the successful designs of the enemy.

In the NT the terms used are—1. βόθρος (= βόθρος, any hole or hollow in the ground, as, e.g., the trench in which a tree is planted), Mt 12<sup>11</sup>. In Mt 15<sup>14</sup>, Lk 6<sup>39</sup>, AV renders 'ditch'; RV uniformly 'pit.'

2. φρέαρ, an artificial well, cistern, reservoir, or, generally, pit. In Lk 14<sup>5</sup> (RV), where the empty well is doubtless intended, and Jn 4<sup>11, 12</sup> it is rendered 'well.' In Rev 9<sup>16</sup> it is used figuratively of the pit of the abyss. Empty wells are often left uncovered and unguarded near the villages, and especially around deserted sites in Palestine, and form a serious danger to the traveller, particularly in the dark. See, further, the following article. W. EWING.

PIT (metaphorical).—As might be expected, the metaphorical use of this word is most frequent in the poetical and prophetic books of the Bible, and in passages where an elevated style is natural. It stands in the EV (see the preceding article) for a number of Heb. words, and the utter lack of consistency in the translation is well exemplified in Pr 22, in the 14th verse of which 'pit' is the rendering of שְׁחָה, whilst in 23<sup>27</sup> גָּבַר is represented by 'pit,' and שְׁחָה by 'ditch.' The shades of meaning may be classified as follows:—

1. In a solitary instance, Is 51<sup>1</sup>, 'the hole of the pit (בֵּיר)' refers to Sarah, the ancestress of the nation, the quarry from which it was digged.

2. Very frequently the pit is a stratagem or device by which an enemy is injured. Ezk 19<sup>4, 8</sup> justifies the conclusion that the figure was suggested by the pits in which wild animals are captured. The Heb. words used in this sense are—בָּאָר, בֵּיר, שְׁחָה, פָּחַת, שְׁחָה, שְׁחָה, שְׁחָה. See Ps 9<sup>15</sup> 35<sup>7</sup> 119<sup>85</sup>, Pr 22<sup>14</sup> 23<sup>27</sup> 28<sup>10, 17</sup> etc.

3. From this sense the transition is easy to that of the miserable condition or the ruin into which one falls—the roaring pit (בֵּיר שְׁאוֹל) of Ps 40<sup>2</sup>, the watery pits (פְּתִיחוֹת) of Ps 140<sup>10</sup>, the βόθρος of Sir 12<sup>16</sup>, the βόθρος ἄδου of Sir 21<sup>10</sup>.

5. The grave is often entitled 'the pit.' Here, again, a variety of Heb. words are employed—בָּאָר, שְׁחָה, בָּאָר שְׁחָה, בֵּיר, שְׁאוֹל, שְׁחָה, קֵלִי, שְׁחָה. Such passages as Ezk 32<sup>23</sup> call up the picture of a huge columbarium with graves in the sides. But here and elsewhere it is not easy to distinguish between this significance and the one mentioned under No. 6.

6. Hades, the realm of shades, situated beneath the earth, and tenanted by thin, unsubstantial ghosts, bears this name. At Is 14<sup>15</sup> the pit (בֵּיר) is obviously the same as 'hell,' i.e. Hades (שְׁאוֹל).

7. In the Apocalypse the abode of the devil and his angels is conceived of as a vast underground abyss, communicating with the surface of the earth by a great shaft, which is opened or closed from above by God's angels sent forth for the purpose. For this pit, or bottomless pit, φρέαρ, φρέαρ τῆς ἀβύσσου, ἡ ἀβύσσος, see Rev 9<sup>1</sup>. 2. 11 11<sup>7</sup> 17<sup>8</sup> 20<sup>1</sup>. 3, and cf. art. ABYSS. J. TAYLOR.

PITCH (נַחַשׁ, נַחֵשׁ, פִּיטָא) may denote either mineral pitch (bitumen), or the vegetable pitch obtained from resinous trees. Pliny (Nat. Hist. xiv. 25, xvi. 23) reserves the word pix for the latter, while the former is called pissasphaltus. The words rendered 'pitch' in Scripture apparently refer to mineral pitch, an inflammable, viscous substance, composed of a mixture of hydro-carbons, and found now in a more liquid, now in a more solid state (see BITUMEN).

נַחֵשׁ occurs in Gn 6<sup>14</sup> as the name of the substance with which the ark was covered both within and without. The word has a variety of meanings elsewhere in OT, and its usage here is connected with the simple sense of the verb נַחֵשׁ ('to cover'), which appears in the same verse as the cognate of the noun, and is tr<sup>d</sup> 'to pitch.' LXX has ἀσφαλτόσεις τῇ ἀσφάλτῳ, and ἀσφαλτος is elsewhere the rendering of נַחֵשׁ ('bitumen').

נַחֵשׁ in Ex 2<sup>8</sup> is one of the substances with which the ark of bulrushes was daubed, the other being נַחֵשׁ. It might seem from the Hebrew as if two distinct substances were referred to, but LXX combines both in the translation ἀσφαλτοπίσσα. The distinction between נַחֵשׁ and נַחֵשׁ is probably that between the more liquid and the more solid varieties of bitumen.

In Is 34<sup>9</sup> נַחֵשׁ (LXX פִּיטָא) occurs twice in the prediction of the desolation of Edom. 'The streams thereof shall be turned into pitch, . . . and the land thereof shall become burning pitch.' The mention of 'brimstone' in the same verse, and the fact that bitumen occurs along with sulphur near the Dead Sea, suggest that here also bitumen is meant.

In Apoc. πῖσσα occurs thrice. Sir 13<sup>4</sup> refers to the defilement caused by touching pitch. In Three<sup>23</sup> pitch is mentioned among the substances used in kindling Nebuchadrezzar's fiery furnace. Bel<sup>27</sup> describes how Daniel slew the dragon by putting into its mouth lumps of pitch, fat, and hair, that had been boiled together. JAMES PATRICK.

PITCHER (קַדִּימָה, LXX ὄδρα; in La 4<sup>2</sup> קַדִּי, LXX κεράμιον, as in NT).—A vessel for holding water (Gn 24<sup>12a</sup>), carried by girls on their shoulders (v. 15). These vessels were made of earthenware (Jg 7<sup>19</sup>, 20), and sufficiently wide-mouthed to admit a torch (Jg 7<sup>16</sup>, 19, 20). It was in a kad that the widow of Zarephath kept her meal (1 K 17<sup>12</sup>), although the word is translated 'barrel' in AV and RV; and the vessels of water (also called 'barrels') which Elijah caused to be poured over his sacrifice at Carmel were kaddim. In the figurative description of death in Ec 12<sup>6</sup> the pitcher is said to be broken at the fountain. The nēbel of Jeremiah was an earthen vessel in shape resembling a skin bottle, and probably had a narrower neck than the kad. As both vessels were made to be carried, they had usually a pair of handles. The pitcher borne by the man who led the apostles to the place where the Passover was to be prepared was a κεράμιον (Mk 14<sup>13</sup>, Lk 22<sup>10</sup>). The Samaritan woman's waterpot was a hydria of earthenware (Jn 4<sup>28</sup>), smaller than the stone hydria of Cana (Jn 2<sup>6</sup>), which do not seem to have been equally portable. In Is 5<sup>10</sup> κεράμιον of LXX represents Heb. נַבִּי (EV 'bath'); in Jer 35<sup>5</sup> it represents nēbel (RV 'pots,' AV 'bowls').

The Egyptian gad or gai (Copt. κελωλ) was an earthenware vessel resembling the kad, with side handles, and sufficiently wide-mouthed to serve as a receptacle for fruit or other solids (Papyrus Anastas. iv. 14), while commonly used for water or beer, as in the story of Anpu and Bata. Pitchers of this kind have been figured by Bliss (A Mound of Many Cities, pp. 118, 120), and by Petrie in his sketches of Palestinian pottery; see Tell el Hesi, p. 40, pl. vii. figs. 123, 125, ix. fig. 190. See art. POTTERY.

The English word 'pitcher' is derived from the French. The vessel is called pitchier in the Languedoc, and this has its root in the Latin picarium or bicarium, from which we also have got the word 'beaker.' The word does not occur in Middle English to the writer's knowledge, the water vessel being an ewere or ewer; see Boke of Curtasye, 641. It had, however, become common in Elizabethan English, as in the familiar Shakspearean phrase in Taming of Shrew, IV. iv. 52, and Richard III. II. iv. 37. A. MACALISTER.

PITHOM (פִּתּוֹם; B Πειθώ, A Πιθώμ).—In Ex 1<sup>11</sup> it is said that the Israelites built for the Pharaoh of the Oppression the cities of 'Pithom and RAAMESSES,' to which the LXX adds, 'and On, which is Heliopolis.' They are called תְּרֵי עָרֵי חַיִּי, usually rendered 'treasure (AV) or store (RV) cities,' but the exact signification of the term is doubtful, and the LXX makes it πόλεις ὄχυρα, 'strong or fortified cities' (see also 1 K 9<sup>19</sup>, 2 Ch 8<sup>4</sup>, where the same Heb. is tr., in the first passage π. τῶν σκηνωμάτων, and in the second π. ὄχυρα). The site of Pithom has been the subject of much controversy, which, however, has been finally set at rest by the excavations of Dr. Naville for the Egypt Exploration Fund in 1883.

Herodotus (ii. 158) describes the canal made by Necho to connect the Red Sea with the Nile as starting 'a little above Bubastis' (now Zagazig), and passing 'Patumos, a city in the Arabian nome' (Πάτουμον τῆν Ἀραβίην πόλιν). 'Arabia,' or the Arabian nome, was the 20th nome of Lower Egypt, called Soped-Qemhes in Egyptian, whose capital was Qosem or Goshen, now Saft el-Henna. Patumos is evidently the Pa-Tum or Pi-Tum, 'the house of Tum'—the ancient sun-god of Heliopolis—of the Egyptian texts. At Dendera the city of Pi-Tum is described as in the land of Ro-Abt, 'the entrance to the East,' a name which Dr. Naville suggests may be the origin of the Greek 'Arabia,' when used to denote the 20th nome (see Mariette's Denderah, iv. 75. 12). The name Pi-Tum is first found in monuments of the age of the 19th dynasty; thus a letter dated in the 8th year of Menephtah II. the son and successor of Ramses II., and translated by Brugsch (History of Egypt, Eng. tr. 2nd ed. ii. p. 133), speaks of Edomite nomads being allowed to pass the Khetam or 'fortress of Menephtah in the land of Thuket' (Succoth), which protected the eastern frontier of Egypt, and to feed their flocks near 'the lakes (birkata) of Pi-Tum of Menephtah in the land of Thuket' (Select Papyri in the Hieratic character from the Collections in the British Museum, pl. cxxv.-vi.).

Chabas had already, in 1864, pointed out that the Pithom of the OT must correspond with an Egyptian Pi-Tum, and suggested that its site should be sought at Abu-Keshéd or Tel el-Maskhúta in the Wady Tumilát, 17 kilometres southwest of Ismailiya (Mélanges, p. 162), a suggestion which he afterwards withdrew in favour of Tmuil el-Emdid, the ancient Thmuis. So far as the form of the name was concerned, however, the conclusion of Chabas was soon afterwards confirmed by the publication of various geographical texts by Brugsch, Dimichen, Mariette, and others, from which it appeared that the capital of the 8th nome of Lower Egypt, Nefer-Abt, had the civil name Thuket and the sacred name Pi-Tum. Tum, the setting sun, was worshipped there under the form of a serpent, and its chief temple was accordingly termed Pi-Qereht, 'the house of the snake.' According to Brugsch (Zeitschrift für Egypt. Sprache, 1876, p. 127), the sacred lake or canal bore the name of 'Crocodile Lake' (Kharmu), the domain-land being Annu or On.

Brugsch first showed that Thuket is the biblical SUCCOTH, the Egyptian th being, as elsewhere, represented by the Hebrew z, and the vocalization of the name having been assimilated to that of the word which means 'booths' in Hebrew (Zeitschr. für Egypt. Sprache, 1875, p. 7). Succoth was the first stage of the Israelites in their flight from Egypt before they encamped at ETHAM, the Egyptian Khetam or 'fortress,' which commanded the approach to 'the wilderness' (Ex 12<sup>27</sup> 13<sup>20</sup>). Pithom, accordingly, must have been in or adjoining the land of Goshen.

When the Fresh-water Canal was made almost on the lines of the old canal of Seti I. and Necho, it passed through the Wady Tumulât, and skirted the ruins of Tel el-Maskhûta ('the mound of the Image'). Various monuments of the age of Ramses II. were discovered in the Tel, including the one from which it derived its name, and were removed to Ismailiya. Lepsius had already proposed to see in the Tel the site of the city of Raamses (Chronologie, p. 348); and Maspero, who published some of the inscriptions in 1877 (Revue archéologique, nouv. sér. xxxiv. p. 320), arrived at the same conclusion. But the study of the monuments at Ismailiya, all of which were dedicated to Tum by Ramses II., led Dr. Naville to suspect that the Tel really represented Pithom, and not Raamses, and accordingly he commenced excavations on the spot. The result was the discovery of a temple, as well as of storehouses, private habitations, the walls of the city, and various inscriptions. The city and temple proved to have been built by Ramses II. of the 19th dynasty, and to have lasted down to the Roman era. They proved also to be the Pi-Tum or Thuket of the hieroglyphic texts.

The discovery was important, as it not only settled the site of Pithom, and so threw light on the route of the Israelites, but it also showed that Ramses II., the builder of Pi-Tum, must have been the Pharaoh of the Oppression. Unless we deny the historical character of Ex 1<sup>11</sup>, the date of the Exodus is definitely fixed.

Dr. Naville's discoveries further showed that Pithom changed its name in the Greek age. It became Heroopolis, which the Romans abbreviated into Ero, as is proved by inscriptions, which confirm the statement of Stephanus Byzantinus (s.v.) that the Heroonpolis of Strabo was also known as Hêrô. An explanation is thus afforded of the reading of the LXX in Gn 46<sup>28</sup> 'he sent Judah before him unto Joseph to meet him at Heroonpolis in the land of Ramesses,' where, it is noticeable, the Coptic version substitutes 'Pithom the city' for Heroonpolis. D'Anville (Mémoires sur l'Égypte, p. 121 ff.) long ago suggested that Heroopolis was to be sought at Tel el-Maskhûta, and the suggestion was adopted by Quatremère, Champollion, and others. In the inscription of the obelisk of Hermapion, quoted by Ammianus Marcellinus (Champollion, Grammaire égyptienne, p. 361), 'the son of Tum' is translated 'son of Hêrôn' (or 'Hêrô'). Pi-Tum or Heroopolis was the capital of the 8th nome of Lower Egypt; consequently Herodotus was mistaken in placing Patumos in 'Arabia.' It adjoined the Arabian nome, but was not actually in it. The high priest of its temple had the title of Herti-sonti.

The city was in the form of a square, containing about 55,000 square yards. The temple of Tum occupied a small space in the south-western angle of the enclosure, and seems never to have been finished. To the north was a series of brick buildings, in which Dr. Naville sees storehouses in which the provisions were gathered 'necessary for armies about to cross the desert, or even for caravans and travellers which were on the road to Syria.' The chambers composing them had thick walls, and were without communication with one another, the access to them being from the top. The whole city was ruthlessly levelled when the Romans formed a camp on the site of it, and founded the later Heroopolis on the north-eastern edge of the camp immediately to the south of the present Fresh-water Canal.

PITHON (פִּיתוֹן).—One of the sons of Micah, the son of Merib-baal, 1 Ch 8<sup>35</sup> (BA Φιθών) || 9<sup>41</sup> (פִּיתוֹן, B Φαιθών, A Φιθών).

PITIFUL.—Pity is the same word as piety, the Eng. having followed the Old Fr. in separating the one word pietas into piété 'piety,' and pitie pity. The adj. 'pitiful' was formed after the separation, and is simply 'full of pity.' But pity may be given or received, and 'pitiful' is used about 1611 in three ways: (1) showing pity, compassionate; (2) exciting or deserving * pity, miserable; (3) contemptible, despicable, the modern use of the word. Shaks. has all three—

(1) Rich. III. I. iii. 141—

'I would to God my heart were flint, like Edward's;
Or Edward's soft and pitiful, like mine.'

(2) Othello, I. iii. 161—

'Twas passing strange,
'Twas pitiful, 'twas wondrous pitiful.

(3) Hamlet, III. ii. 49—'That's villainous; and shows a most pitiful ambition in the fool that uses it.' In AV 'pitiful' is used only in the first sense, compassionate; La 4<sup>10</sup> 'The hands of the pitiful women have sodden their own children' (פִּיתוּלֵי נְשֵׂי, LXX γυναικῶν οἰκτεριμῶν); Sir 2<sup>11</sup> 'The Lord is . . . very pitiful'; Ja 5<sup>11</sup> 'The Lord is very pitiful' (πολύσπλαγχνος, RV 'full of pity'); 1 P 3<sup>8</sup> 'Be pitiful' (εὐσπλαγχνοί, RV 'fender-hearted').

The subst. 'pitifulness' occurs in Job 16 heading in the sense of misery. J. HASTINGS.

PITY.—See COMPASSION. In Ezk 24<sup>21</sup> 'that which your soul pitieth (marg. 'pity of your soul') is equivalent to 'object of affection' (cf. v. 25). There is a play upon words in the Heb. (mahmad 'enêkhem umahmal naphshêkhem).

PLACE OF TOLL.—See TOLL (PLACE OF).

PLAGUE (i.e. πληγή 'blow,' 'stroke').—A general term for a penalty inflicted by God. It is often used as a synonym of 'pestilence,' but is usually more comprehensive and used of other punishments as well as diseases. It is employed to indicate the last of the Egyptian plagues (Ex 11<sup>1</sup>), and is here the tr. of נֶגַע nega', literally 'a stroke.' In Lv 13 and 14 this word occurs 59 times as descriptive of leprosy, as also in Dt 24<sup>8</sup>. It is used (in the verbal form) of Divine chastisement in general in Ps 73<sup>14</sup>, as a synonym of 'pestilence' in 1 K 8<sup>37-38</sup> and Ps 91<sup>10</sup>, and it denotes the punishment inflicted on Pharaoh in the matter of Sarah in Gn 12<sup>17</sup>.

The word נֶגַע is six times translated 'plague.'

It is used in Jos 22<sup>17</sup> of the plague of Baal-peor; in Nu 16<sup>46-47</sup> [Heb. 17<sup>11-12</sup>] of that following the rebellion of Korah. Elsewhere its meaning is more general, as in Ex 12<sup>13</sup> 30<sup>12</sup>, Nu 8<sup>19</sup>. The verb נָקַח (AV 'plague') in Ps 89<sup>23</sup> is tr<sup>d</sup> by RV 'smite.'

In Nu 11<sup>33</sup> the judgment at Kibroth-hattaavah is called מַכָּה makkāh, a word usually translated 'wound,' 'smiting,' 'chastisement,' etc. In Dt 28<sup>61</sup> it is employed for any disease inflicted as a penalty, as in Lv 26<sup>21</sup>, Dt 28<sup>29</sup> 29<sup>22</sup>. In 1 S 4<sup>9</sup> it refers to the plagues of Egypt, and in Jer 49<sup>17</sup> 50<sup>13</sup> is used of the plagues to be inflicted on Babylon and Edom, over which the enemies of these countries are to hiss in derision and astonishment.

In 22 other passages 'plague' is the rendering of מַגְגֵּפָה maggēphāh, used of the Egyptian plagues in Ex 9<sup>14</sup>; of the disease that slew the spies, Nu 14<sup>37</sup>; or that which slew the rebels who followed Korah, Nu 16<sup>48</sup> 49-50 [Heb. 17<sup>13</sup> 14. 15]; of Baal-peor, Nu 25<sup>9</sup> 18 26<sup>1</sup> 31<sup>16</sup>, Ps 106<sup>29-30</sup>; of the infliction on the Philistines, 1 S 6<sup>4</sup>; and of that which followed David's census, 2 S 24<sup>21-25</sup>, 1 Ch 21<sup>17-22</sup>. It is also prophetically employed of the punishment of those that neglect the ceremonial law, Lv 14<sup>12</sup> 15. 18.

'Plague' in Hos 13<sup>14</sup> is deber, usually tr. 'pestilence.' In 1 Co 15<sup>55</sup> κέντρον, 'sting,' appears to be the rendering of נָקַח; the LXX in Hosea uses κέντρον as the translation of נָקַח, and δίκη as that of deber.

In NT the issue of blood is called a 'plague' in Mk 5<sup>39-44</sup>, where the Greek term is μάστιξ, literally a 'scourge.' This word is used of other diseases in general in Mk 3<sup>10</sup>, Lk 7<sup>21</sup>. In RV the word πλῆγη is 12 times rendered 'plague' (AV wants it in 9<sup>16</sup>). See, further, MEDICINE, p. 324.

PLAGUES OF EGYPT.—The judgments inflicted upon the Egyptians by God on account of their oppression of the Israelites and refusal to release them. They are detailed in Ex 7<sup>8</sup>-12<sup>31</sup>, and given in epitome in Ps 78<sup>42-51</sup> 105<sup>27-38</sup>. In the longer narrative ten successive plagues are enumerated: (1) the turning the river into blood, (2) frogs, (3) lice, (4) flies, (5) murrain, (6) boils, (7) hail, (8) locusts, (9) darkness, (10) the slaying of the first-born. In Ps 78 the list consists of 1, 3, 2, 8, 7, 5, 10; that in Ps 105 includes 9, 1, 2, 4, 3, 7, 8, 10. Philo gives them in the following order: 1, 2, 3, 7, 8, 9, 4, 5, 10, but that is to suit an obviously artificial classification (Vit. Mos. i. 17). The Jewish teachers use as a mnemonic the words דָּרַךְ עָרִישׁ כְּהֹנֵן רַבִּי, the initials of the plagues in the order given in the text.

Egyptian history is silent concerning these as well as the other incidents of the Exodus; but that is not surprising. There were, however, evidently several ancient versions of the story, which have been collated and combined by those to whom we owe the text in its present form. It is probable that the groundwork of the narrative (J) was a document giving an account of seven plagues, viz. 1, 2, 4, 5, 7, 8, 10. The infliction of each of these is preceded by an interview of Moses with Pharaoh at which its onset is threatened; and the sign is brought to pass by Jahweh directly (see art. MOSES, p. 439<sup>b</sup>). With this is combined another version (E), whose record embraced four, possibly six plagues, viz. 1 (Ex 7<sup>15b</sup> 17<sup>b</sup> 20<sup>b</sup>), 7 (8<sup>22-23</sup>), 8 (10<sup>12-14</sup>), 9 (10<sup>20-23</sup>); there are also traces of its influence in the account of 10, and perhaps in that of 3. Moses in these is the thaumaturgist, and works by stretching forth his hand or his rod (see art. MOSES, p. 441<sup>a</sup>). The third component document (P) couples Aaron with Moses; and, in general, attributes the carrying out of the miracle to him and his rod. The accounts of six plagues 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 10 seem to be taken in whole or in part from this (see art. MOSES, p. 443<sup>a</sup>). It will be seen from this analysis that 3 and 6 are peculiar to P, 4 to J, and 9 to E. 1, and possibly 10 are found in all three, 2 and 5 in P and J, and 7 and 8 in J and E. This list suggests the possibility that the list set forth in the Massoretic text may contain reduplicated narratives.

The district affected by the plagues is called in Ps 78<sup>12</sup> 43 'the Field of Zoan' (מִצְרַיִם). This may be either a limitation to the eastern part of Lower Egypt, or, more probably, a poetical synecdoche. J and P in several places refer the influence of these visitations to all the land of Egypt, meaning probably Lower Egypt. In 4, 5, 7, 9, 10 the immunity of the land of Goshen is specially mentioned. The interval between the first plague and the Exodus is not stated. The actual duration of the 1st and 9th plagues is given, but not of the others. It has been supposed that the first was connected with the early stages of the Nile overflow, possibly the end of June, and that the others occurred at intervals between that time and the following Passover, which was the definite terminus in point of time. The presumption in the narrative is that of a fairly regular and quick succession of stroke upon stroke.

The plagues have been variously classified. Philo divides them into four groups: 1st, those in which God asserts His power over the grosser elements, earth and water, intrusting the bringing of the plagues to Aaron (= 1, 2, 3); 2nd, plagues of air and fire inflicted by Moses (= 7, 8, 9); 3rd, one plague hurtful to mankind inflicted by both together (= 5); 4th, those inflicted directly by the hand of God (= 4, 6, 10). The first three were admonitory, characterized by uncleanness and discomfort; those following were more or less destructive to property and injurious to man, leading up to the overwhelming catastrophe of 10.

The story of the plagues is preceded by the account of a series of signs which Moses was instructed to perform: these were twofold: (1) two were for the purpose of attesting the reality of his Divine mission to his own countrymen; (2) the other was for the purpose of influencing Pharaoh. With the former pair, the conversion of his own rod into a serpent, and the leprous hand, we are not at present concerned. The last, the conversion of Aaron's rod into a serpent, is a part of the same group of signs as the plagues. This sign Moses caused to be performed in the presence of the advisers of Pharaoh, who are called חֹכְמֵי הַדְּבָרִים 'learned men,' מְכַשְׁשֵׁפִים mēkashshēphīm or 'sorcerers,' and חֹרְטָמִים hartumīm or 'sacred scribes.' While the first two names are undoubtedly Semitic, the last may possibly be the name of an order of Egyptian priests, a derivative of the native name herdot, but this is unlikely. In the Gr. these are called ἐπαοιδῶν [in Dn 1<sup>20</sup> σοφιστῶν]; see, further, in vol. ii. p. 773<sup>a</sup> note **. There is a tradition that two of these were chosen to confront the two wonder-working Israelites, namely, Jannes and Jambres (see vol. ii. p. 548). These last two names occur in very many forms both in Jewish and Gentile literature. When these variants are compared, the constant elements are Ane or Ani and Mre or Mri, which are two of the commonest names found on the monuments of the 19th and of the immediately succeeding dynasties. In Lieblein's list, Ani or some allied form of the name occurs 24 times, and Mri 23 times. The Gospel of Nicodemus calls them ἀνδρες θεράπωνες. It is suggestive that Ambres was the name of an Egyptian medical book known to Numenius and Clement (see Horapollo, i. 38).

The first sign, that of changing a rod into a serpent, was the converse of the common magical trick of rendering snakes rigid like rods. The African Psyllæ, who had control over serpents either by natural power or artificially by the use of herbs (Ludolf, Hist. of Ethiopia, Gent's tr. ix. p. 49), are mentioned by many classical writers: Herodotus (iv. 173), Dio Cassius (li. 14), Lucan (Phars. ix. 890, 925), Ælian (de Nat. Anim. xvi. 27), Vergil (Æn. vii. 753), Solinus Polyhistor (Memor. xl.), Aulus Gellius (xvi. 2), Silius Italicus (i. 411, iii. 302, v. 354, viii. 498), Pliny (vii. 2), and several others. The same form of serpent-charming is still practised in Egypt and North Africa, and has been described by several travellers, for example, von Schubert (ii. 116), Trotter (p. 174), Antes (p. 15), etc. For other observations on the snake as symbol and wand, see Böttiger's Kleine Schriften, 1837, p. 112. The writer has seen both a snake and a crocodile thrown by hypnotism into the condition of rigidity in which they could be held as rods by the tip of the tail.

(1) The First Plague, the defilement of the river, was a severe blow to Egyptian prejudices. The river was a god to whom offerings were made (Stern, Zeitschr. Egypt. Spr. 1873, 129) and adorations addressed (Maspero, Hymne au Nil, 1868). According to the narrative in J and E, the transformation was confined to the water of the river, killing its fish (7<sup>17-18</sup>, 21, 24, 28), but P states that it extended to the canals, pools, ponds, and cisterns of wood and stone (v. 19). It is noteworthy that vessels of earthenware are not mentioned, and perhaps this may be connected with the statements of Alpinus (Med. Æg. i. 166), Norden (i. 52), Sonnini (i. 124), Troilo (472), and Volney (i. 20), that it is only in earthenware vessels that the discoloured waters of the Nile-flood become clear and can be kept clear. See also Galen, de Simpl. Med. Facult. i. 3, § 2. The former narrative (JE) says that the people dug beside the river for supplies, and although it says nothing of the kind of water in these wells, it does not say that it was blood; the latter (P) declares that the water in these also was changed into blood, and Philo paraphrases this by comparing these wells to blood-vessels, from which the blood was flowing, as in a hæmorrhage. Volney says that the water found by digging wells is brackish and unfit for use (i. 16). Such a change was plainly miraculous, and this is also shown by its definite duration of seven days and its sudden disappearance.

In the normal condition of the river, as its waters rise in the third week of June, they become discoloured. This has often been described by travellers. Abd-al-latîf says that the water becomes green from the fragments of vegetable matter suspended in it, and remains discoloured until August (de Sacy's tr., p. 333), and Makrizi refers to this alteration in colour and to the offensive exhalations from the water at a later stage (quoted by de Sacy, p. 345). Vansleb adds that in process of time the water changes in colour from green to a dull ochreous red (1677, p. 53). Many other travellers confirm this observation. See Maillet, p. 57; Tourtechot, 14; Hartmann, 128; Pococke, i. 199; Savary, 1786, ii. 179. The last author speaks of the unwholesomeness of the waters in this stage, and this is confirmed by Pruner (p. 21). These changes in colour are probably due to the wasting down of some great accumulation of vegetable matter high up in the river, like the Sudd or great Nile dam described by Sir S. Baker (Lake Albert Nyanza, ii. p. 329). Ehrenberg attributes the red coloration to a minute organism, Sphæroplea annulina Agardh, which multiplies in the water after the inundation, and he has described a large number of cases of red discoloration of water in Poggendorf's Annals for 1830, p. 477. This reddening of ponds by minute organisms is not uncommon. Swammerdam tells us that he saw a pool in the Bois de Vincennes made crimson by minute crustaceans. Schuyt describes the same at Leyden, and Hjaerne at Dalecarlia (Bybel der Natuure, 1737, pp. 89, 90). The present writer has seen a similar discoloration in a pool in the Phoenix Park, Dublin, on account of enormous quantities of a species of Peridinium. The example in 2 K 3<sup>23</sup> may be quoted here. It has recently been shown that in many of these coloured animals the pigment is contained in parasitic bacteria.

Changes in the water of the Nile were not unknown in the legendary history of Egypt. Manetho states that in the days of Nophercheres (about B.C. 4000) the Nile for eleven days flowed with honey. Eusebius mentions the same change as occurring in the reign of a nameless king 200 years earlier.

The plague must have been a serious calamity to the whole population, not only on account of the lack of water, but also because of the killing of the fish, as these formed an important element in the diet of the Egyptian. There is a little obscurity in the description, arising probably from the different standpoints of the original authors of the narratives. In v. 17 Moses was instructed to say to Pharaoh that he would cause the plague by smiting with his rod on the waters (E), while in v. 19 (P) Aaron is instructed to bring the plague by stretching forth his rod.

The plague lasted seven days and was apparently then suddenly removed. It was imitated by the magicians, which seems to imply that not all the water of the land was transformed. As to the time of year of its occurrence, if the phenomenon had any relation to the natural discoloration, it probably took place about the height of the flood in the month of Epiphi (beginning June 25), or, if Ehrenberg's hypothesis be adopted, probably in the month of Thoth, beginning about the 29th August.

(2) The Second Plague, that of the frogs (Ex 8<sup>1</sup>, J, P), was preceded by an interview with Pharaoh, at which Moses announced the visitation. This was at once brought upon the land by the agency of Aaron stretching forth his hand. Frogs are in most years plentiful in the Nile, and the ponds and canals connected with it, but do not usually wander far from the water; but now they suddenly swarmed on the land, invading the houses, even the bed-chambers, ovens, and kneading-troughs. In Ps 78<sup>45</sup> they are said to have destroyed the Egyptians, hence some Rabbinical authorities suppose these were other than ordinary frogs, but the word used, zēphardca (LXX βάρπαχος), is the name of the ordinary amphibian. It was noticed by some Hebrew writers that while the word is used in the plural in general, it is singular in v. 6, literally, 'and the frog ascended,' hence Akiba says in Semoth Rabbah that there was but one frog, so rapidly prolific that it filled the whole land. The word is obviously used as a collective, as it occasionally is in Arabic. The magicians imitated the miracle, but, as more than one commentator remarks, when the land was full of frogs, who could tell those brought by the Israelites from those of their Egyptian imitators? The plague must have been one of great irritation, not only from the discomfort, but from the croaking noise which at times frogs utter continually. The Nile frogs make a sharp sound like two pieces of wood striking together (Hasselquist, pp. 68, 254, 304). The frog was not reckoned unclean by the Egyptians, nor was it specially venerated in Lower Egypt as far as is known. In the Egyptian language the figure of a frog was used as a numerical symbol for 100,000 with the phonetic value hfnu. In Upper Egypt there was an obscure goddess represented with a frog's head and named

Hkt, but we know little of her, except that in the Middle Empire the superintendents of nomes in Upper Egypt are called her priests, especially about the 12th dynasty. Horapollo says that the frog was the symbol of Ptah because it is the representative of man in embryo (Hierogl. i. 25), but there is no native confirmation of this. A frog-headed figure, called 'Ka, the father of waters,' is figured by Wilkinson and thought by him to be a form of Ptah (iii. 15). In Papyrus Ebers iii. a frog boiled in oil is recommended as an external application for swelling of the abdomen.

Several species of frog inhabit the Nile, the commonest being Rana esculenta, R. Nilotica, and R. Mosatica. They are called in Egyptian 'bēh and in Coptic ΧΡΟΨ. The sagacity of the Egyptian frog is said to exceed that of all others. See Ælian, Variæ Historiæ, i. 3.

Plagues of frogs were known in ancient times. Pliny (viii. 43), Orosius (iii. 23), Ælian (de Nat. Anim. ii. 36), Diodorus (iii. 29) give instances of these. Athenæus quotes from Heraclides Limbus an account of an invasion of frogs in Pæonia and Dardania, which drove out the inhabitants; and Justinus, in his epitome of Trogus Pompeius (xv. 2), speaks of a similar occurrence in Thracia Abderitis. Showers of frogs are often referred to by the old writers. Ælian tells us that he experienced on his way to Dicaearchia a fall of rain mixed with tadpoles and mud (Hist. Anim. ii. 56). Several such occurrences are referred to in Beyerlinck's Theatrum, under the head of Pluvie extraordinarie. See also Valentinus Albertus, de Pluvia Prodigiosa. Similar occurrences are reported in recent times, one in London, in the Mirror for 4th Aug. 1838. Several others are collected in Andrews' Book of Oddities, 1892, and some well-authenticated Scottish instances are given in the Glasgow Herald for 19th July 1894 and several succeeding issues. A plague of toads in the upper Nile Valley is reported by Haggard (Under Crescent and Star, 1895, p. 279). For Egyptian frogs see Seetzen (Reisen durch Syrien, etc., 1854, iii. pp. 245, 350, 364, 490, 501); see also Cameron, Across Africa, i. 267.

At Moses' entreaty the frogs were removed, and their dead bodies were gathered in heaps which made the land to stink, and probably gave rise to plagues. Appius tells us that when the people of Antareia had offended Apollo, he sent, among other plagues, an immense host of frogs, which, when they decomposed, poisoned the waters and caused a pestilence which drove them from their homes (de rebus Illyricis, 4). See also Ælian, de Nat. Anim. xvii. 41.

(3) (4) The Third and Fourth Plagues consisted of insect pests, the former of קִנְיִם kinnim, or קִנְיָם kinnām, tr. lice AV and RV, 'sand flies or fleas' RVm; the latter of אַרְבֵּב 'arōbh, tr. flies AV and RV. The account of the Third Plague is derived from P (Ex 8<sup>16-19</sup>), that of the Fourth from J (v. 21-31). The kinnah was probably a stinging fly, mosquito or gnat, such as was, and still is, common in Egypt (Herodotus, ii. 95). A cognate word is applied in Psalm to a grain-fly. This plague was sent without any warning to Pharaoh, and was brought about by Aaron smiting the dust with his rod, as God commanded him. The insects attacked man and beast (v. 17), devouring them (Ps 78<sup>46</sup>). The interpretation in AV and RV, 'lice,' is an ancient one, as it is found in Jos. Ant. ii. xiv. 3, and in many other Jewish writings. LXX renders the Heb. words by σκνίφες, σκνίπες, or κνίπες, the name given to small insects found in figs and other fruits (Theophrastus, Hist. Plant. ii. 9, iv. 17), and the Vulgate calls them ciniphes. Κνίπες and ψῆρες are mentioned by Aristophanes as fig-parasites (Aves, 590). Philo (Vita Mosi, i. 17) says that they were small insects which not only pierced the skin, but set up intolerable itching and penetrated the eyes and nose. Origen describes them as little flying insects (Hom. in Ex. iv. 6). That they were not lice in the ordinary sense of the word is shown by their attacking beasts as well as men, for none of the three species of human pediculi will live and multiply freely on animals. It has been argued in favour of the ordinary interpretation that they came out of the dust, but while lice are not generated naturally in dust, the eggs of some species of the common small stinging flies are found in dried pools. Most travellers in Egypt speak of these gnats as one of the most troublesome of pests (see Troilo, 774; Prosper Alpinus, Hist. Nat. Egypti, i. 4. 3; Wittman, ii. 135; Scholz, 93; Lepsius, 93; Russegger, iii. 13; Lane, i. 4, and others). Such flies are always worst after the recession of the inundation in October (Hartmann, i. 250), the larvæ living in pools and the perfect insects emerging as these dry up.

The magicians were unable to cope with these insects or to produce them, as they themselves were attacked by them, so they called them the 'finger of God.' In Egyptian dd ntru = the phrase in the text, is found in several papyri (see Papyrus 438 Boulaq), and is used of anything sent by the divinity. The magicians meant thereby that the plague was sent by their own gods, not by Moses.

The account of the plague is imperfect, as there is no mention of Pharaoh's entreaty for its removal, or of Moses' intervention for this purpose; but in the case of the Fourth Plague, that of the 'arōbh or 'swarms' (8<sup>20a</sup>, P), these lacunæ are supplied. There Moses is recorded to have threatened the infliction, and the LORD is said to have brought up the swarms, and at Pharaoh's entreaty they were afterwards removed. The nature of these pests is not mentioned, nor is there any reference to the magicians. These insects are called by LXX and Symmachus κνίβωια, 'dog-flies,' interpreted by Jerome in the last paragraph of his epistle to Sunnia and Fretela 'omne genus muscarum,' as if it were κνίβωια. Aquila in Ps 78 calls them ἀμμικτος, 'a mixed multitude,' a word used of crowds of men by Æschylus, Persæ, 53, 'a motley host.' Josephus (Ant. ii. xiv. 3), Jerus. Targums, Sa'adya, and other Hebrew authorities call them different kinds of pestilent animals, but, as Knobel remarks, some particular creature must be meant.

Flies of many kinds abound in Egypt and are common pests, as testified by Sonnini (ii. 320), Carne (i. 77), Rüppell (73), etc. Such swarms are often brought up by the south wind, filling the houses and appearing in clouds. Comparison of the descriptions of these two plagues given in the passage renders it probable that 3 and 4 are both accounts of the one plague given by different writers. Ps 105 groups them together, while Ps 78 makes no mention of the kinnim. With this plague began the sundering of the land of Goshen from the rest of Egypt.

(5) (6) In like manner there is a probable connexion between the Fifth Plague (Ex 9<sup>1b</sup>, J), the murrain, and the Sixth (9<sup>8</sup>, P), the boils. Neither of these is explicitly mentioned in Ps 78 or 106, unless they are the 'evil angels' mentioned between the hail and the tenth plague in the former; and, considering the connexion between disease and demonology in the Jewish mind, this is probable. Plague 5 was heralded by an announcement to Pharaoh, while there was no such for 6. The Fifth was sent directly from the hand of the LORD, while Moses and Aaron are the instruments in the Sixth. It is also explicitly stated that 6 was upon beast as well as man (v. 10). All these considerations strengthen the probability that these are respectively the Jahwistic and Priestly records of the one plague.

The nature of the murrain is not given; it was 'אֵפְרָתָא 'a very grievous pestilence' (see PESTILENCE and PLAGUE, pp. 755, 865), but the word deber is too general to give a definite idea of its species. Leyrer has conjectured that it might be anthrax or milzbrand (Herzog, RE, viii. p. 251). It was a disease affecting flocks, herds, camels, horses, and asses, evidently very fatal (though v.<sup>28</sup> shows that 'all' is not literally intended). Severe cattle plagues have been recorded in Egypt by many writers. Pruner says that splenic fever, anthrax, and rinderpest occasionally prevail, and speaks of an epidemic of the last in March 1842, which lasted nine months, and was very destructive, but it did not affect camels or horses. Camels are not very liable to epizootic diseases, but suffer sometimes from tuberculosis, and often from itch (102 ff.). They were, however, at the time of Moses not plentiful in Egypt, if they were found there at all (see Chabas, Études sur l'Antiquité Historique, 1873, p. 398 ff.; and Dillm. on Gn 12<sup>16</sup>). Lepsius mentions the same outbreak of cattle-plague in 1842, which had been fatal to 40,000 oxen (p. 14); and it is also graphically described by Mrs. Poole (The Englishwoman in Egypt, i. 59, 114; ii. 32).

We have no mention of the removal of this plague, which probably worked itself out; but immediately succeeding it, if not a part of the same infliction, was the outbreak of the שְׁחִינָא or 'boils' on mankind and beast. This came without warning, Moses and Aaron being instructed to sprinkle handfuls of the ashes of a furnace towards heaven. Although probably for the most part derived from P, there are signs of the influence of E in v.<sup>8</sup>. This plague affected all classes, but we do not read that it was very fatal. Its nature has been discussed already in MEDICINE, p. 324, and references to similar diseases in Egypt will be found in Niebuhr (Descr. d'Arabie, i. 133). Little blister-like swellings on the skin are described by Döbel (Wanderungen, ii. 184); a more severe form is recorded by Berggren (Reisen in Äg. ii. 121). Similar diseases are described by Vansleb (Voyage en Egypte, 1677, p. 58), Volney (Travels, Eng. tr. i. 248), Wittman (who notices the pestilential effects produced by the putrid carcasses of camels, horses, etc., around the Ottoman camp, leading to malignant fever, etc., and whose 'Medical Journal' is most valuable), Travels with the Turkish Army, 1803; Russegger (i. 247); Seetzen (Reisen, iii. 204, 209, 377), etc. In view of the recently discovered capacity of mosquitos and gnats to carry contagion, it is striking to note that disease of man and beast so quickly followed the swarms of flies. Josephus puts the distemper of animals as a supplement to the plagues of the swarms.

(7) (8) Egypt was essentially an agricultural country, as we can gather from the monuments, especially from the tomb-pictures; therefore the two plagues which followed affected the material prosperity of the country in its most vital point. The Plague of the hail was foretold to Pharaoh by Moses at his next interview (9<sup>18</sup>, J), and by the warning he gave the Egyptians the opportunity of saving their cattle. On the day following, Moses, by God's command, stretched forth his hand to heaven (v.<sup>22</sup>, E), and the storm of lightning and hail burst over the land, beating down the crops, breaking the trees, and killing the cattle left by the murrain (v.<sup>29</sup>). Visitations of this kind, though not unexampled, are exceedingly rare in Egypt (see HAIL, vol. ii. p. 282). Pruner saw hail showers only three times in twelve years, and these were slight, while he knew of only one fatal case of lightning stroke in that time (p. 36). Sonnini describes a thunderstorm accompanied by snow (hail?) in January (ii. 133), Niebuhr in December (i. 497), as also Thevenot (i. 344). Wittman says that on 20th November 1801 'we had a tremendous storm of rain, thunder, and lightning, which began at two o'clock and continued near two hours' (p. 577). Another storm occurred in March. Lepsius relates that in December 1843 there was a sudden storm growing into a hurricane 'such as I had never seen in Europe,' and a hail which made the day dark as night (p. 26). Monconys also describes a lightning storm in January (p. 180); Pococke notes lightning and rain in the Fayyum in February (p. 92). Seetzen experienced it also in March (iii. 98); Vansleb heard thunder only twice in Egypt, in January and May 1673 (p. 39).

The destruction of the cattle was due to their being in the field in spite of the warning. Niebuhr says that the herds are put out in the field from January to April (i. 142), and Hartmann that they are generally kept in their stalls from May to the end of November (i. 232). See also Diodorus Siculus, i. 36). The date of this plague is fixed by v.<sup>31-32</sup> (E), which say that it happened when the barley was in the ear and the flax in bud ('balled,' AV), but the wheat and spelt were not yet in ear, or sufficiently forward to be destroyed. Flax is sown usually in mid-November or December, rarely as late as in January (Russegger, i. 231), and flowers in February (v. Schubert, ii. 137; Forskål, Flora, p. xliii) or March (Russegger); it is usually pulled in April (Seetzen, iii. 241), according to Wilkinson about 110 days after sowing. Knobel quotes Sicard for its flowering as early as December, but this must have been exceptional. Denon found the barley in flower in December (p. 143). Sonnini says that the barley is nearly a month earlier than the wheat (ii. p. 20), and Brown, that the wheat is beginning to bud at the end of January (ii. p. 138). Wheat, spelt, and barley are generally sown in November. The barley harvest is early in March, sometimes 90 days after sowing. In Olivier's journey to the Pyramids in April, he found the barley already cut, the flax mostly pulled, but the wheat was ripening (iii. 125). Von Schubert (ii. 175) and Forskål confirm these observations, and state that the barley is ripe by the end of February or beginning of March, while the wheat is not ripe until April (Flora, p. xliii). The spelt (AV 'rye') ripens at the same time as the wheat (Forskål, p. xxvi). The deduction from these data is that the plague took place probably about the middle of January. Confirmatory observations as to the ripening of crops in Egypt will be found in Radziwill (Hierosolymita Peregrinatio, Brunsberg, 1601, 159), Nordmeyer (Comment. Calendar Egypt., Göttingen, 1792, 23-29), Shaw (ii. 171).

The Eighth Plague, that of locusts (Ex 10<sup>4-6</sup>, 12-15, J, E) followed while yet the devastation of the last plagues was fresh in the memories of the people, who said to Pharaoh, 'Knowest thou not that Egypt is destroyed?' (v.7). Pharaoh was warned of its imminence, but Moses and Aaron were driven from his presence (v.<sup>11</sup>). The plague followed the stretching forth of Moses' hand (v.<sup>12</sup>) or rod (v.<sup>13</sup>) over the land, and the locusts were brought from the Arabian side by an east wind. The coming of locusts from the East has been mentioned by Shaw, as it was in olden time by Agatharchides (Mare Rubrum, ch. v.) and Diodorus (iii. 29). Strabo likewise speaks of the locust-eaters of the Galla country, to whom the west wind drives the great clouds of these insects on which they live, and the unwholesome nature of that food (xvi. p. 772).

The species of locust was the אֲרָבָה 'arbeh, or common migratory locust (see above, p. 130*).

The peculiarity of the plague was their coming in such immense numbers, for Egypt is by no means so liable to devastation by locusts as Syria; and they swept clean all the remnants of vegetation that the hail had left, including the wheat and the spelt. The ground was darkened, that is, concealed by the multitude of the locusts. Burckhardt has described such a locust-plague in the Haurân (Syria, p. 381). Lepsius also, in March 1843, while engaged in opening a sarcophagus in a mummy pit, was suddenly overshadowed by a cloud of locusts from the south-west, which darkened the heavens (p. 45). Denon saw in May an immense mass of locusts flying from east to west a little over the ground (p. 286). Volney's description of the locust-plague in Syria is well known (i. 305).

At Pharaoh's entreaty Moses prayed for their removal, which was accomplished by a strong wind from the Mediterranean, which swept them into the Red Sea, for, destructive as they are, they are the sport of the winds so much that 'tossed like a locust' is a proverbial expression (Ps 109<sup>23</sup>).

For other references to locusts in Egypt see Tischendorf's Reise im Orient, i. 252; Shaw, 165; Hasselquist, 254; Niebuhr, 168; Forskål, 81.

(9) The Plague of darkness was sent without warning, and was brought on by Moses stretching forth his hand (10<sup>21-23</sup>, E). For three days the land was covered with a palpable cloud which shut out all light from sun, moon, and stars. This condition is described in the words  $\pi\eta\eta\ \sigma\kappa\tau\eta\sigma$  'that one may feel (the) darkness' (LXX  $\psi\eta\lambda\alpha\phi\eta\rho\nu\ \sigma\kappa\tau\eta\sigma$ ). Of this plague there is a graphic account in Wis 17.

It has been supposed that the author of J did not know of this plague, from the words 'only this once' in v. 17, but it may have been immediately after the locusts, as if a part of the same visitation. The condition of darkness referred to is strikingly like that brought about by the severer form of the electrical wind hamsin. This is a S. or S.W. wind that is so named because it is liable to blow during the 25 days before and the 25 days after the vernal equinox (hamsin = 50). It is often not so much a storm or violent wind as an oppressive hot blast charged with so much sand and fine dust that the air is darkened. It causes a blackness equal to the worst of London fogs, while the air is so hot and full of dust that respiration is impeded. There are excellent accounts of these storms of darkness in Prosper Alpinus, Medic. Egypt. i. 7; Savary, ii. 229; Niebuhr, i. 468; Legh, 48; v. Schubert, ii. 409; Ruppell, 270; Sonnini, ii. 166; Pruner, 35; Wittman, ii. 54; Volney, i. 47; Poccocke, i. 306. Denon says that it sometimes travels as a narrow stream, so that one part of the land is light while the rest is dark (p. 286). In such a way the Land of Goshen was left unclouded while the rest of Egypt was dark. As the first plague showed God's power over the river, so did this over the light of the sun, who as Ra was one of Egypt's chief deities. At Pharaoh's request this plague was also removed. Three days is not an uncommon duration for the hamsin.

(10) The Death of the Firstborn.—In his last interview with Pharaoh, Moses was dismissed from his presence with the threat of death if he again appeared on behalf of Israel, whereupon he announced God's last judgment (11<sup>4</sup>). The plague followed at midnight on that day. God claimed all the firstborn of humanity as His own, and ordained that in Israel they were to be redeemed by sacrifice (13<sup>13</sup>). In this plague the unredeemed firstborn of Egypt were sacrificed in one great slaughter. It affected all classes from Pharaoh on the throne to the maid at the mill (11<sup>5</sup>, J), to the captive in the prison (12<sup>29</sup>, J, P) as well as the domestic cattle. By this final catastrophe the obstinacy of Pharaoh was overcome, and, as Moses had foretold, the Egyptians not only freed Israel, but commanded their exodus.

There are many traditional and historical records of sudden outbreaks of plague. See Syncellus (i. 101-103), Diodorus (40), Thucydides (ii. 48), Procopius (ii. 22), etc. Modern outbreaks in the month of April, or a little after the vernal equinox, are reported by Bruce (iii. 715), Sonnini (i. 277), Tobler (Lustreise, i. 137), Legh (113). It is worthy of note that many authorities say that the plague often is worst at the time of the hamsin wind (Prosper Alpin. i. 7; Thevenot, i. 375; v. Schubert, ii. 138; Lane, i. 3; and Pruner, p. 419). The coexistence of cattle disease with the plague is mentioned by Döbel (Wanderungen, ii. 205).

The account of this plague bears internal evidence that it is compiled from materials from all three sources.

This catastrophe has been regarded by some as a sudden outbreak of pestis siderans, but according to the narrative it cannot have been a natural plague, but on account of the peculiarities in its course and incidence it was evidently a direct interposition, and one the memory of which was meant to have a lasting effect on the conduct of Israel (13<sup>14-15</sup>).

In reviewing the narratives of these Divine judgments, we have seen not only that there are reasons to believe that they consisted of eight episodes, 1, 2, 3 (4), 5 (6), 7, 8, 9, 10, but that there is a certain thread of connexion running through the series. If the first took place towards the end of the period of high Nile in August, it is probable that the second occurred in September, which is still the month when frogs are most abundant. The insect plagues may conjecturally be supposed to follow in October or November, and the disease plagues in December. The notes of time of the hail-plague give us surer ground to refer it to January. The locusts and the darkness intervened between this and the 14th of Abib (the date of the Exodus).

In some of the series, and possibly in all, it is to be noted that the Divine power used the ordinary seasonal phenomena in a miraculously intensified form as the instrument of judgment. If the narrative of J, which confines the blood-change to the Nile, be taken as the oldest account, it is possible that it may have been due to some special detachment of a dam of vegetable matter like the Sudd above referred to. This, with the organisms which must exist in myriads in it, might well have caused the discoloration and fetor of the waters. Such a mass of organic matter with its concomitant animal life would be the condition under which frogs would multiply rapidly, and may have been the antecedent used to bring about the condition of the Second Plague. The decomposing masses of frogs could not fail to have been the best possible breeding grounds of very many kinds of insects, a veritable 'motley multitude' fulfilling the name of the Fourth Plague. The results of recent bacteriological observations show how great a factor in the spread of disease these insects are, and so 5 and 6 would follow as the sequences of 3 and 4. The Seventh inaugurates a new series, and is followed by the two other plagues, depending on atmospheric conditions. The onset of the east wind brought the locusts, and the shift to the west removed them, while the dropping of the wind to the south-west brought up the dreaded hamsin, carrying the plague in its train.

In the Apocalyptic visions of the trumpets and vials (Rev 8 ff.) much of the imagery is taken from the story of the Plagues in Egypt.

A. MACALISTER.

PLAIN.—This word (as a subst.) stands in AV, in some cases inaccurately, for several very different terms in the Heb., which it has been the aim of RV, though with only partial success, to express and distinguish correctly. The following are the words which are tr<sup>d</sup> 'plain' in AV:—

1. מַעְדָּן 'meadow' in Jg 11<sup>23</sup> ('the plain of the vineyards,' RV 'Abel-cheramim').

2. אֵילָן 'oak' (in accordance with an old Jewish interpretation), in 'plain(s) of Moreh,' Gn 12<sup>6</sup>, Dt 11<sup>30</sup>, and 'of Mamre,' Gn 13<sup>18</sup> 14<sup>13</sup> 18<sup>1</sup>, RV in each case 'oak(s),' marg. 'terebinth(s)'; also in Jg 4<sup>11</sup> 9<sup>6, 37</sup>, 1 S 10<sup>3</sup> (RV as before). See MOREH.

3. מַעְרָבָה (from קָרַע 'to cleave'), a broad plain between hills ('a surrounding of hills seems necessary to the name Bik'ah, as if land laid open in the midst of hills,' HGHL 655, where mention is also made of a small upland plain, surrounded by mountains, on the E. of Jordan, called the Bek'a, or [dimin.] the Buke'a; see also Stanley, SP, App. § 5). In AV bik'ah is rendered 'plain' in Gn 11<sup>2</sup>, Neh 6<sup>2</sup> ('the plain of Ono'), Ezk 3<sup>22, 23</sup>, Am 1<sup>5</sup> (RV 'valley'), Dn 3<sup>1</sup> (Aram. מַעְרָבָה,—the plain of Dura'). Elsewhere in AV and RV 'valley,' by which, however, must then be understood not a ravine (מַעְרָב), but a broad vale. The Bik'ahs mentioned by name in the OT are those of Jericho, Dt 34<sup>3</sup> ('the Kikkār [see below], (even) the plain of Jericho'); of Mizpeh, Jos 11<sup>3</sup> (prob. the Merj' Ayūn, N.W. of Dan, between the Litāni and the Ḥasbāni); of Lebanon, Jos 11<sup>17</sup> 12<sup>7</sup> (probably the broad flat plain between Lebanon and Hermon, even now called in Arabic by a nearly corresponding word, el-Bekā'a); of Megiddo, 2 Ch 35<sup>22</sup>, Zec 12<sup>11</sup> (the plain of Esdraelon, girt by hills on all sides; see HGHL 385 f.); of Ono, Neh 6<sup>2</sup> (7 m. S.E. of Joppa); of Aven, Am 1<sup>5</sup> (the broad plain between Lebanon and Hermon; see AVEN); and of Dura, Dn 3<sup>1</sup> (near Babylon). Bik'ahs without names are referred to in Gn 11<sup>2</sup>, Ezk 3<sup>22, 23</sup> 8<sup>4</sup> 37<sup>1, 2</sup> (in the vision of the dry bones: prob. the same as the bik'ah of 3<sup>22</sup> etc.); the word occurs also, without reference to specific localities, in Dt 8<sup>7</sup> 11<sup>11</sup>, Ps 104<sup>3</sup>, Is 40<sup>4</sup> (see RVm), 41<sup>18</sup> 63<sup>14</sup> (all). The retention of the two renderings 'plain' and 'valley' in RV is to be regretted; but it is no doubt due, at least in part, to the fact that there is no exactly corresponding English term. 'Plain' is, on the whole, preferable to 'valley.'

4. קִיקְקָר (properly a round, e.g. of metal, i.e. a 'talent,' or of bread, i.e. a loaf or round cake), used specifically of the 'round,' or as we should probably say, the 'oval,' of Jordan, the (approximately) oval or oblong basin into which the depression (el-Ghôr) through which the Jordan flows expands, as it approaches the N. end of the Dead Sea: it must also, if the 'cities of the kikkār' are rightly placed at the S. end of the Dead Sea, have included the Dead Sea itself.* The expressions used are 'the kikkār of Jordan,' Gn 13<sup>10, 11</sup>, 1 K 7<sup>46</sup> (= 2 Ch 4<sup>17</sup>), and 'the kikkār' alone, Gn 13<sup>12</sup> 19<sup>17, 25, 28, 29</sup>, Dt 34<sup>3</sup> (cited above), 2 S 18<sup>23</sup>. The word occurs also, perhaps in the same sense, in Neh 3<sup>22</sup>; but probably in a more general sense in 12<sup>28</sup> (see Comm.: AV 'the plain country'). In RV always 'Plain' (usually with a capital P). Cf. SP 284, 287, 488; HGHL 505 f. No doubt this is the region meant by ἡ περὶ κικκῶρος τοῦ Ἰορδάνου in Mt 3<sup>5</sup>; for LXX renders קִיקְקָר by ἡ περὶ κικκῶρος in Gn and 2 Ch (ἡ π. τοῦ Ἰορδάνου in Gn 13<sup>10, 11</sup>), and by τὰ περὶ κικκῶρα in Dt.

5. מִישֵׁר a smooth and level tract of country (from מָשַׁח 'to be level'): the general meaning of the word appears well from Ps 26<sup>12</sup> 27<sup>11</sup> ('a path of evenness'), 143<sup>10</sup> (RVm), also from 1 K 20<sup>23, 25</sup> (where it is opposed to the 'hills'), Is 40<sup>3, 23</sup> RV ('level'; || מַעְרָבָה), Zec 4<sup>7</sup>. With the art., this word is used specifically of the elevated plateau, or table-land, of Reuben or Moab, E. of the Dead Sea, Dt 3<sup>10</sup> 4<sup>43</sup>, Jos 13<sup>9, 16, 17, 21</sup> 20<sup>3</sup>, Jer 48<sup>8, 21</sup> (in the prophecy on Moab), 2 Ch 26<sup>10</sup>. AV and RV in all these passages render 'plain,' except Dt 4<sup>43</sup>, Jer 48<sup>21</sup> 'plain country,' and 2 Ch 26<sup>10</sup> AV 'plains.' RV has sometimes the marg. 'Or, table land.'

6. מַעְרָבָה (in poetry, Is 35<sup>1, 6</sup> 40<sup>3</sup>, Jer 17<sup>6</sup> al.), with the art., as a proper name, מַעְרָבָה, the Arābah, the name given to the gravelly, sandy, and generally unfertile floor of the valley through which the Jordan runs, and which extends southwards to the Gulf of 'Akabah (see ARABAH; and HGHL 483 f.), now called el-Ghôr (the Hollow, or Depression), in AV nearly always 'the plain,' in RV 'the Arābah,' Dt 1<sup>7</sup> 2<sup>8</sup> (here of the same valley, S. of the Dead Sea, now el-Arābah), 3<sup>17, 17</sup> + 4<sup>49, 49</sup> 11<sup>30</sup> (AV 'the campaign'), Jos 3<sup>16</sup> 8<sup>14</sup> (see Dillm.) 11<sup>2, 16</sup> 12<sup>1, 3, 3, 8</sup> 18<sup>18, 18</sup> (AV 'Arabah,' RV 'the Arabah'), 1 S 23<sup>24</sup>, 2 S 2<sup>29</sup> 4<sup>7</sup> 15<sup>23</sup>, 2 K 14<sup>25</sup> 25<sup>4</sup> (= Jer 39<sup>4</sup>=52<sup>7</sup>), Ezk 47<sup>8</sup> (AV 'the desert'), Am 6<sup>14</sup> (AV 'the wilderness'), Zec 14<sup>10</sup>, RV (fig. of a level; MT, however, as Baer shows, points both here and in Is 33<sup>9</sup> without the art., i.e. 'like a steppe'); see also Is 33<sup>9</sup> RVm.

The same word, in the plural, occurs also in the two expressions, 'the plains—better steppes, or desert parts—of Moab,' Nu 22<sup>1</sup> 26<sup>3, 48</sup> 31<sup>12</sup> 33<sup>48, 49, 50</sup> 35<sup>1</sup> 36<sup>13</sup>, Dt 34<sup>1</sup> (see Driver), v. 8, Jos 13<sup>32</sup>, and 'of Jericho,' Jos 4<sup>13</sup> 5<sup>10</sup>, 2 K 25<sup>5</sup> (Jer 39<sup>5</sup> 52<sup>8</sup>), of the parts of the same depression, on the opposite sides of the Jordan, in the latitude of Jericho. In the case of the plur., RV retains the rendering 'plains': in 2 S 15<sup>23</sup> 17<sup>16</sup> ('plains of the wilderness'), however, it follows the Kethibh (מַעְרָבָה) and renders 'fords' (with marg. 'plains'). There may not be a precise English equivalent; but 'plains,' it should be remembered, does not at all express the distinctive idea of the Hebrew word (bare, desolate, and unfertile soil; cf. HGHL 483, 485).

7. מַעְרָבָה (from מָשַׁח to be low), the lowland, the technical designation of the low hills and flat valley land stretching down towards the Mediterranean Sea in the W. and S.W. of Judah. This term is in AV rendered 'plain' only in Jer 17<sup>26</sup>, Ob 1<sup>9</sup>, Zec 7<sup>7</sup>; 'low plains' in 1 Ch 27<sup>28</sup>, 2 Ch 9<sup>27</sup>; 'vale' in Dt 17, Jos 10<sup>40</sup>, 1 K 10<sup>27</sup>, 2 Ch 1<sup>15</sup>, Jer

* Cf. under Lor, pp. 150, 151.

33<sup>13</sup>; 'valley(s)' in Jos 9<sup>11</sup> 11<sup>2</sup>. 16. 16 12<sup>9</sup> 15<sup>33</sup>, Jg 1<sup>9</sup>, Jer 32<sup>44</sup>; 'low country' in 2 Ch 26<sup>10</sup> 28<sup>18</sup>: in RV it is rendered uniformly 'lowland.' The reference in all these passages is the same, except in Jos 11<sup>2</sup>. 16<sup>9</sup>, where the context shows that a locality further to the N. must be intended, probably a group of similar low hills, between Carmel and the high central range of Samaria (HGHL 49 and 203 n.). The LXX represents הַשְּׁפֵלָה mostly by ἡ πεδινή (cf. 1 Mac 3<sup>40</sup>), but by ἡ Σεφηλα in Jer 32<sup>44</sup>, 33<sup>13</sup>, Ob 1<sup>9</sup>, 2 Ch 26<sup>10</sup>, which also occurs in 1 Mac 12<sup>38</sup> (AV 'Sephela,' RV 'the plain country').

The region commonly known as 'the Shephelah' must have been a fairly definite one: in Jos 15<sup>33-44</sup> it forms a distinct district of Judah (side by side with the 'Negeb,' v. 21<sup>8</sup>, the 'hill country,' v. 48<sup>8</sup>, and the 'wilderness,' v. 61<sup>1</sup>), and 39 (40) Judahite cities contained in it are enumerated, those at present identified being (beginning at the N.) Gimzo (a little S.E. of Lydda), Aijalon, Gederah, Eshtaol, Zor'ah, Beth-shemesh, 'En-gannim, Zanoah, Jarmuth, Socoh, 'Adullam, Marëshah, 'Eglon and Lachish (W.S.W. of Marëshah), and Beth-tappuah (a little W. of Hebron): Adida (included in it in 1 Mac 12<sup>38</sup>) is a little N. of Gimzo (Hadith); Emmaus (ib. 3<sup>40</sup>) is very near Aijalon; and Timnah (2 Ch 28<sup>18</sup>) is close to 'En-gannim. All these cities are between the high central range of Judah on the E. and the Philistine plain on the W. The W. limit of the 'Shephelah' has, however, been disputed. It has generally (e.g. by Dillm. on Jos 15<sup>33</sup>) been held to include the Philistine plain, and the Phil. cities are certainly enumerated after those of Judah in Jos 15<sup>45-47</sup>; on the other hand, Ob 1<sup>9</sup>, Zec 7, and 2 Ch 28<sup>18</sup> imply that it was outside the Phil. territory. Hence G. A. Smith insists strongly that though the term may sometimes have been used more widely, it was limited more properly to the intermediate region indicated above, consisting of a mass of 'low hills,' varied often by stretches of 'flat valley land,' which, as viewed from the Phil. plain and the sea, appear 'buttressing the central range all the way along,' but which are separated from it in fact by a well-defined series of valleys, running from Aijalon to near Beer-sheba' (HGHL 49, 211 ff.; cf. Buhl's criticism, Geogr. 104, with Smith's reply, Expositor, Dec. 1896, pp. 404-406). This 'maze' of hills 'curves round the Phil. plain from Jaffa to Gaza like an amphitheatre': it is pierced by five important valleys running up from the plain into the heart of Judah: viz. (1) the road from Joppa and Lydda, through the hollow Vale (קָרַע) of Aijalon, and then up through the hills, past the two Beth-horons, to Gibe'on and Michmash; (2) the Wady es-Surâr, or valley (בְּקָעָה) of Sorek, up past Beth-shemesh and Kiriath-je'arim, to Jerusalem (the course taken by the modern railway from Jaffa); (3) the Wady es-Sunt, leading up from Tell es-Sâfi, through the Vale (קָרַע) of Elah, past Socoh, and then either up the Wady el-Jindy to Beth-lehem, or (turning S.) along the Wady es-Sur, past 'Adullam, to Ke'ilah; (4) the Wady el-Afranj leading up from Ashdod, past Eleutheropolis, to Beth-tappuah and Hebron; and (5) the Wady el-Hesy, starting a little N. of Gaza, passing Lachish, and leading up to a point 6 miles S.W. of Hebron. The historical and strategical importance of these valleys is well drawn out in HGHL 209-236: the first, especially, is a route along which have passed many times the hosts of both invading and defeated foes.

8. τόπος πεδινός, Lk 6<sup>7</sup>; RV 'a level place.'

Of the words rendered 'plain,' even in RV (Nos. 3, 4, 5, 6), each, it will now be seen, has a definite and distinctive meaning of its own: the environs of Jericho are indeed described (from different points of view) as a kikkâr, a biq'ah, and 'arabôth; but the mishôr, for instance, could never have been called a biq'ah, nor could a biq'ah, speaking generally, have been called an 'arabâh; and the 'plain' (mishôr) inhabited by the Moabites (Jer 48<sup>8</sup>) was geographically quite distinct from the 'plains' ('arabôth) of Moab. The only term which really corresponds completely to our 'plain' is mishôr. S. R. DRIVER.

PLAIN.—The only unfamiliar occurrence of the adj. is in Gn 25<sup>27</sup> 'Jacob was a plain man, dwelling in tents.' As RVm ('or quiet or harmless, Heb. perfect') shows, the Heb. (נָפֵץ) is the epithet so frequently applied to Job and tr<sup>d</sup> 'perfect' (Job 1<sup>1-8</sup> 2<sup>3</sup> 8<sup>20</sup> 9<sup>20</sup>. 21; cf. 9<sup>22</sup>, Ps 37<sup>27</sup> 64<sup>4</sup>). The idea expressed by the word is completeness or flawlessness. 'In the present context,' says Dillmann, 'it can neither mean morally blameless nor ἀπλᾶστος, ἀπλοῦς, simplex, simple, unsophisticated; for Jacob, in what follows, appears always, on the contrary, as sly and cunning.' He compares the German fromm (pious), and considers the meaning to be ἡμερος, 'quiet' or 'peaceful,' in antithesis to 'wild.' The tr. 'plain' is from the Geneva Bible, which has the marg. alternative 'simple and innocent.' 'Simple' is Tindale's word, and the marg. note in Matthew's Bible reads, 'He is simple that is without craft and deceit and contynueth in belevyng and executyng of godes wyll.' J. HASTINGS.

PLANT, PLANTS.—See NATURAL HISTORY.

PLAY.—The verb to play had a wider use formerly than now. Tindale has: Ex 1<sup>10</sup> 'Come on, let us playe wisely with them, lest they multiply'; Ex 5<sup>5</sup> 'Beholde, there is much people in the londe, and ye make them playe and let their worke stonde'; Ex 10<sup>2</sup> 'the pagiantes which I have played in Egipte, and the miracles which I have done amonge them.' And in AV to 'play' is used in the sense of 'sport,' not only of 'boys and girls' (Zec 8<sup>5</sup>) or a 'sucking child' (Is 11<sup>8</sup>), but of men and women in worship. Thus Ex 32<sup>6</sup> 'The people sat down to eat and to drink, and rose up to play' (קָרַע),* quoted in 1 Co 10<sup>8</sup> παίζετε; 1 S 18<sup>7</sup> 'The women answered one another as they played' (קָרַע),† RV 'in their play'; 2 S 6<sup>5</sup> 'And David and all the house of Israel played before the Lord on all manner of instruments made of fir wood [or, better, 'with all their might, even with songs,' reading, with parallel passage in 1 Ch, בְּקִלְיוֹת וּבְקִלְיוֹת וּבְקִלְיוֹת instead of בְּקִלְיוֹת וּבְקִלְיוֹת, even on harps, etc. (the playing here is not playing on the instruments as AV, but sporting and dancing to the accompaniment of the music on the instruments, as shown in 1 Ch 13<sup>8</sup>; RV 'with all manner of instruments'). See GAMES.

The phrase 'play the man' occurs in 2 S 10<sup>12</sup> 'Be of good courage, and let us play the men for our people' (קָרַע וְנִתְקַח), LXX ἀνδρίζου καὶ κραταωθήμεν), a phrase which comes from the Douay Bible, where, however, it is the tr. of the first

* This verb קָרַע in its Qal conjug. is the usual verb in Gn (where alone it is found) meaning to laugh (Gn 17<sup>17</sup> 18<sup>12</sup> 18. 15 18<sup>14</sup> 21<sup>6</sup>); in its Piel conjug. it occurs Gn 19<sup>14</sup> 21<sup>9</sup> (RVm 'play') 29<sup>14</sup>. 17 (followed by בְּ) where it is tr. 'mock'; 20<sup>9</sup> 'sport'; and Jg 16<sup>25</sup> 'make sport.'

† This, a later form of קָרַע, is the verb translated 'play' (in the sense of sport) throughout the rest of OT (except Is 11<sup>8</sup> 'the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp,' שָׁעַר), 1 S 18<sup>7</sup>, 2 S 21<sup>4</sup> 6<sup>5</sup>. 21, 1 Ch 13<sup>8</sup> 15<sup>29</sup>, Job 40<sup>20</sup> 41<sup>5</sup> (here and in the following passage with בְּ = 'play with.' Followed by בְּ, קָרַע means 'mock at,' e.g. Ps 37<sup>13</sup> 59<sup>9</sup>, Pr 31<sup>25</sup>, Job 5<sup>22</sup>. Margoliouth surely forgets this when [p. 17 of The Origin of the 'Original Hebrew' of Ecclesiasticus] he renders בְּ קָרַע 'played with'), Ps 104<sup>26</sup>, Zec 8<sup>5</sup>.

Heb. word, 'Play the man, and let us fight for our people,' after Vulg. 'Esto vir fortis et pug-nus.' The phrase is not uncommon, especially in echoes of this passage, as Foxe, Martyrs, vii. 550, 'At the stake Latimer exhorted his fellow-sufferer, Be of good comfort, Master Ridley, and play the man'; Herbert, 'The Church Porch,' lxxvii.—

'In brief, acquit thee bravely, play the man: Look not on pleasures as they come, but go; Deferre not the least virtue: life's poore span Make not an ell by trifling in thy wo.'

PLEAD.—To plead in AV never means to pray or beseech, but always to argue for or against a cause. Thus Job 16<sup>21</sup> 'O that one might plead for a man with God,' and 19<sup>5</sup> 'If indeed ye will magnify yourselves against me, and plead against me my reproach.' The verb most frequently tr. 'plead' is רָבַב, which is also rendered 'contend,' 'strive with' or 'strive against,' etc. It is the verb used in Job 13<sup>10</sup> 'Who is he that will plead with me' (RV 'contend with me'); Is 1<sup>17</sup> 'Plead for the widow'; 3<sup>13</sup> 'The Lord standeth up to plead'; Jer 2<sup>9</sup> 'I will yet plead with you, saith the Lord'; 2<sup>29</sup> 'Wherefore will ye plead with me?'; Hos 2<sup>2</sup> 'Plead with your mother, plead.' Amer. RV usually prefers 'contend.'

The subst. 'pleading' has the same meaning in Job 13<sup>6</sup> 'Hearken to the pleadings of my lips' (רְבִיבָה).

Plead is to be traced back to Lat. placitum, an opinion (fr. placere, to please); in Low Lat. a writ summoning a court of justice, in the form quia tale est nostrum placitum, 'for such is our pleasure.' Then placitum came to mean the court so convened, and also the pleading or business done at it. Placitum became plait in Fr., whence Eng. 'plea' and 'plead.' An older spelling of plead is 'pleate,' found in Ps 35<sup>1</sup>, Pr. Bk. (in mod. editions printed 'plead').

J. HASTINGS.

PLEASURE as a verb is found in 2 Mac 2<sup>7</sup> 'for the pleasuring of many' (διὰ τὴν τῶν πολλῶν εὐχαριστίαν, AVm 'to deserve well of many,' RV 'for the sake of the gratitude of the many'); and 12<sup>11</sup> 'promising both to give him cattle, and to pleasure him otherwise' (ἀφελῆσαι αὐτοῦς, RV 'to help his people'). The Rhemish translators speak (on Lk 16<sup>9</sup>) of 'the farmers whom the il steward pleased.' Cf. Shaks. Timon, III. ii. 63—'I count it one of my greatest afflictions that I cannot pleasure such an honourable gentleman.'

PLEDGE.—1. קָבַל (once Ezk 18<sup>7</sup> קָבַלָה) noun, קָבַל verb (LXX ἐνεχέωρασμα, -μός, ἐνεχέωρα(ω)). The primary meaning of this root is 'to bind,' hence 'to hold one by a pledge.' The taking of a pledge for the repayment of a loan was sanctioned by the Law (Ex 22<sup>26</sup> [Book of the Covenant], cf. Dt 24<sup>6, 10<sup>11</sup></sup>), where, however, in v. 10<sup>11</sup> the term for 'pledge' is עֲבָד, see below); but it was enacted that when this pledge consisted of the large square outer garment or cloak called simlah or salmah, it must be returned before nightfall, since this garment often formed the only covering of the poor at night (cf. the reproaches uttered in Am 2<sup>8</sup>, Job 22<sup>24</sup>, and see Ezk 18<sup>6, 12, 16</sup> 33<sup>15</sup>). In Pr 20<sup>16</sup> we read, 'Take his garment that is surety for a stranger, and hold him in pledge (AV and RVm 'take a pledge of him') that is surety for strangers' (m. 'a strange woman' [following Kerē], so AV, omitting 'that is surety'). The same saying recurs in 27<sup>13</sup>, where both AV and RV have 'a strange woman.' The Heb. reads קָבַלְתָּ חֵטְאֵי כִּי־עָרַבְתָּ וְרֵעֶיךָ וְקָבַלְתָּ חֵטְאֵי חֵטְאֵי לְרֵעֶיךָ (LXX of 27<sup>13</sup> (20<sup>16</sup>) is wanting) ἀφελού τὸ ὑμῶν αὐτοῦ, παρήλαθεν γὰρ ὑβριστῆς δοῖς τὰ ἀλλότρια λυμάλνεται. This appears to be a reflection on the folly (cf. Pr 22<sup>27</sup>) of becoming responsible for another man's debt (see Toy, ad loc., who would read, 'for a stranger or strangers' [masc. sing. or plur., not fem. sing.] in both passages). It was forbidden to 'take the mill or the upper millstone to pledge,' as this 'was tantamount to taking 'a man's life to pledge,' Dt 24<sup>6</sup> (see Driver's note). A similar provision is found in v. 17, which forbids taking the widow's garment (קָבַל) in pledge; cf. Job 24<sup>3</sup>, where the taking of the widow's ox is condemned.

2. עָבַד occurs four times, Dt 24<sup>10, 11, 12, 13</sup> (LXX ἐνέχυρον). In vv. 10, 11 it is prescribed that when an Israelite lends to his neighbour on the security of a pledge, he is not to go into the house for the purpose of fetching his pledge, but the borrower is to have the right of selecting the article. Vv. 12, 13 contain the same provision as Ex 22<sup>26</sup> (see above). The primary sense of the root עָבַד (Qal 'borrow or pledge,' LXX δανείζομαι; Hiph. 'lend on pledge,' LXX δανείζω) is doubtful.

The word 'pledge' is also introduced by RV in Hab 2<sup>6</sup> as tr. of עָבַדְתָּ in the phrase עָבַדְתָּ עָלַי וְקָבַדְתָּ עָלַי וְקָבַדְתָּ עָלַי וְקָבַדְתָּ עָלַי (LXX καὶ βαρῶν τὸν κλοιὸν αὐτοῦ σιβάρῶς): RV 'and that ladeth himself with pledges' (sc. which he has taken from the nations, and whose restitution is at last compelled [cf. Job 20<sup>10, 15, 20</sup>]). AV 'thick clay' and Vulg. lutum denseum are due to understanding עָבַדְתָּ as two words, עָבַד (constr.) and עָבַד 'clay,' cf. Ex 19<sup>9</sup> קָבַד וְקָבַד 'in a thick cloud.'

3. עָרַב, Qal and Hithp., 'to be surety,' 'to give a pledge,' 'to make a wager.' Thus in 2 K 18<sup>23</sup>—Is 36<sup>8</sup> the Rabshakeh says in his message to Hezekiah, 'Now, therefore, I pray thee, give pledges (AVm 'hostages') to my master the king of Assyria' (הִתְעָרַב, μίχθητε). The correct sense is undoubtedly that given in RVm 'make a wager,' by handing over a pledge to be forfeited in case of failure to furnish men to mount the 2000 horses offered by the Assyrian king. The noun עָרָבָה is tr. 'pledge' in 1 S 17<sup>18</sup> 'Look how thy brethren fare and take their pledge' (אָחֵי עָרָבָה אֲנִי, Ἄδρα ἀνὰ χρηστῶν γυνώσκω, Luc. καὶ εἰσοίσεις μοι τὴν ἀγγελίαν αὐτῶν), i.e. 'bring back some token of their well-fare' (Driver), which had probably been agreed upon beforehand. This yields an excellent sense, and there appears to be no sufficient reason (with many scholars, including H. P. Smith) to doubt the correctness of the MT. The cognate form עָרָבָה (LXX ἀραβῶν, cf. the NT use of this word for the 'earnest' of the Spirit in 2 Co 1<sup>22</sup> 5<sup>5</sup>, Eph 1<sup>14</sup>; see art. EARNEST) is used in Gn 38<sup>17, 18, 20</sup> of the pledge (consisting of his staff and signet ring) which Judah gave to Tamar as security for the fulfilment of his promise to send her a kid.

J. A. SELBIE.

PLEIADES.—The three passages (Am 5<sup>8</sup>, Job 9<sup>9</sup> 38<sup>31</sup>) which contain the proper noun קְבִילָה (Kēṣil, Orion) also mention קְבִימָה (Kīmā), and the Eng. Versions have in each case taken the latter to be the Pleiades, their rendering, 'the seven stars,' in the first of these passages, obviously pointing to the asterism which they call Pleiades in the other two.* The Pleiades are a group of stars, seven larger and some smaller, in the constellation of the Bull, near the ecliptic, belonging to the northern hemisphere. To the ancients the rising and setting of this group announced respectively the beginning and end of the season of navigation. Hence their name is usually derived from the Greek πλέω, 'to sail,' though others would connect it with πλέος, 'full,' and understand the reference to be to their being apparently closely packed together. Josephus, in one of his rare references to astronomical phenomena, employs 'the setting of the Pleiades' to mark a date (Ant. XIII. viii. 2). The common Arabic name for these stars is el-negm, i.e. the star group par excellence, because they serve * Lockyer, The Dawn of Astronomy, p. 134, remarks: 'The seven stars are held by many to mean the Pleiades, and not the Great Bear; but this, I think, is very improbable.' Yet Lockyer has admitted, p. 133, that the Pleiades are mentioned in Job 38<sup>31</sup>, and there is no good reason why the original word should have diverse senses in the two passages.

the nomads and peasants as calendar and time-measurer, especially by their monthly conjunctions with the moon. It has been shown recently that in Egypt the rising of the Pleiades was watched for astronomical purposes 'even in pyramid times,' and that three Greek temples—the archaic temple to Minerva at Athens (B.C. 1530), the Hecatompedon (B.C. 1150), on whose site the Parthenon was subsequently built, and the temple of Minerva at Sunium (B.C. 845)—were orientated, the first two to the rising and the third to the setting of  $\eta$  Tauri in the Pleiades [see Lockyer, pp. 418, 419].

The verb kām, from which Kīmā must be derived, is not found in biblical Hebrew. In Syriac the cognate verb is frequently employed in the sense of 'heaping up.' In Arabic kumat = 'a heap.' In Assyrian kīmtu = 'a family.' The name Kīmā would thus seem peculiarly appropriate to the Pleiades. The ancient VSS of the Bible, though somewhat wavering, are on the whole in favour of the identification. The LXX at Job 9<sup>9</sup> has Ἀκροῦρον, at Job 38<sup>31</sup> Πλειάδα, at Am 5<sup>8</sup> it follows a corrupt text. The Pesh. and the Targ. retain the Hebrew word. Aq., Symm., and Theod. all use Πλειάδα at Am 5<sup>8</sup>. Jerome varies between Hyades (Job 9<sup>9</sup>), Pleiades (Job 38<sup>31</sup>), and Arcturus (Am 5<sup>8</sup>). An attempt has been made by Hoffmann ('Versuche zu Amos,' ZATW, 1883) to prove that Kīmā is Sirius. The chief arguments are that Sirius, Orion, the Hyades, and the Pleiades—the order which, on this interpretation, is followed at Job 38<sup>31</sup>.<sup>32</sup>—are ranged in the sky in this order, almost in a straight line; and, moreover, that an accurate picture of natural phenomena is thus obtained. 'Dost thou keep bound the refreshing influences of Sirius, and dost thou let loose the outpourings of Orion?' The reference would then be to the rise and overflow of the Nile, which was heralded each year by the heliacal rising of Sirius on the day of the summer solstice. But this interpretation depends partly on the conjectural alteration of the word מַכְיָמִים into כַּכְיָמִים, which we have felt constrained to reject [see art. ORION], and partly on a mistaken derivation and explanation of מַכְיָמִים (LXX δεσμός), which does not mean outpourings, but 'bands,' 'links,' 'knots.'

As might have been expected, this conspicuous group of stars arrested the attention and exercised the imagination of many peoples. The Australian saw in them a group of girls playing the corroboree. The North American Indian thought of them as dancers. There is some reason for believing that at one time in Egypt they were connected with Isis. The Greeks represented them as sisters flying before Orion: the maidens prayed for deliverance from the giant hunter, and were heard by the gods, who changed them into doves, and placed them amongst the stars. In this mythology their names are Electra, Maia, Taygete, Alcyone, Celæno, Sterope, and Merope. The Arabs pictured them as a group of riders mounted on camels; and Wetzstein (in App. to Delitzsch's Book of Job) points out that they named the star immediately in front of the cluster hadi, i.e. the singer who rides in front of a troop of camels and stimulates them to swift movement by his song. The Persians compare them to a cluster of jewels or a necklace. Their mention in the Bible has no mythological tinge. At Am 5<sup>8</sup>, Job 9<sup>9</sup>, the constellations are adduced as forming part of that wonderful complex of creation the existence of which bears testimony to the Maker's almightiness. At Job 38<sup>31</sup> they are signs of the seasons, and the recurrence of these seasons year by year is altogether beyond the control of man. He cannot tie the bands which hold this group together—another proof of that impotence which should lead him willingly to submit to God.
