The “Inquiry touching the Tempter,” appeared in the Advent Harbinger of June 19th, of the current year. The worthy querist is of opinion, that what has been presented in Elpis Israel, on the subject of the Devil and Satan, “is general and indefinite.” That it is general, and does not go argumentatively into the support of the doctrine there exhibited, is indeed the case; nevertheless I think, that what I have set forth is sufficiently definite for the reader to perceive what I believe the scriptures to teach concerning the devil, in the several passages where it is alluded to. However, I do admit with my friend, that what I have said about the Devil and Satan is not as definite as I could have made it. I was not writing upon that topic particularly; nor did I care to say more than was necessary to the comprehension of the general matter of the book. In treating of Israel’s Hope, or the Kingdom of God, I could not avoid saying something of evil, and “that having the power of death,” which the full fruition of that hope is to eradicate from the earth, from society, and from the moral and physical constitution of flesh and blood. But I did not lay a heavy hand upon the subject, knowing how much “the Devil” is respected by some, worshipped by others, and venerated in some way by nearly all. Not that this abstractly considered would have deterred me from giving him his due; for I have no favour for him though he may approach me as a minister of righteousness, a professor of Sacred History, or an angel of light—2 Corinthians 11: 13-15; I see in him only one causing men to fall, and an adversary to the truth, that is, to the gospel of the kingdom in the name of Jesus. I wished to get this all important topic systematically before the British public, as I am now endeavouring to do before the American, in Elpis Israel; therefore, I did not wish to offend their prejudices by being too explicit touching their idol, lest they should close the book before they got at “the things of the kingdom of God.”

I have said little, or nothing that I recollect, in any other writings concerning “His Satanic Majesty.” The time had not come, and no one sought to bring me out upon the subject. I have in past years had so many devils of one sort or another to contend with, that I did not care to increase their host by denying their master’s existence in the popular sense. But, “steadfast in the faith,” I have successfully resisted the scripture devil, and he has fled from me—James 4: 7; 1 Peter 5: 9. The antidikos diabolos, or OPPONENT CAUSING (me) TO FALL, if he could, with all his satellites, are either hors du combat, or so used up, that they have left me free from the necessity of defending myself lest I should be devoured. They have done their worst; and no clamour that they can raise can do more than induce me to serve them up for the entertainment of my readers, by way of recreation in the severer study of the Law. The time is come, then, when the outcries of “the Devil’s” clients may be disregarded. He is, doubtless, a very “potent, grave, and reverend signior” with the world, with whom it is a point of expediency not to offend him, if possible. Men, therefore, like to hear him spoken of with respect; and as the terror of him is very useful in keeping evil doers in awe, and compelling some of them to “seek religion,” they do not like the fear of him diminished: and by way of recommending themselves, we presume, to his tender mercies, if he should happen to get everlasting possession of them, they make a great clamour, and persecute with hard speeches, those who can see no other devil in the Bible than Sin incarnate in flesh and blood, and manifested in the personal, social, and political works of mankind—and no other Satans, than personal, and politically organised, adversaries to the righteous and the truth. But I am not careful to avoid offending “the Devil” or his friends now; neither shall I regard their conclamation. My desire is to make men hate the devil, speak unrevilingly to Satan, and to fear none but God and his Christ; whom to know is love and to obey unto eternal life.

During my residence in London I became acquainted with a physician, somewhat famous in the scientific world and a believer in the kingdom of God, who purchased a copy of Elpis Israel, and at the same time presented me with a pamphlet he had published, entitled “An Inquiry into the existence of a personal Devil.” It consists of twelve lectures and an appendix, making ninety-six octavo pages. It contains much good sense on the subject; and as far as I think its contents in accordance with the scriptures. I shall reproduce them in these columns. In the first lecture are some very excellent remarks on the investigation of truth, which very appropriately precede the examination of the subject, and which I beg leave to introduce in this place in order to propitiate a candid consideration of what I have to say.

“Sound thinking,” says he, “that is, cultivated and well-directed common sense, applied to the discovery of truth, either natural or revealed, has followed the rule, that Nothing ought to be believed as true unless its truth can be demonstrated by an appeal to the facts recorded in the Book of Creation, or to the Book of Revelation.

“The Naturalist, that is, the student of the truths written in the book of creation, says, “To the book of creation: if any man speak not according to this book, it is because there is no light in him.”—(Homo, naturae minister et interpres, tantum facit et intelligit quantum de natura ordine re vel mente observaerit; nec amplius seit, aut potest. —Bacon.)

“The Spiritualist, that is, the student of the truths written in the book of revelation, says, “To the Law and to the Testimony: if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them”—Isaiah 8: 20.

“Rigid adherence of late years by the naturalists to the above rule in reference to the subject of natural, or creation-written, truths, has been the cause of immense progress in natural science: and is it not, without any improper presumption, to be inferred, that a similar rigid adherence to this rule in matters relating to the spiritual Bible-written truths, in other words, in matters relating to the moral and religious condition of man, will be attended with equal progress?

“It is a lamentable fact that, in this matter of rigid adherence to this rule of truth-investigation and truth demonstration, “the children” who study the things of the natural world are far in advance of, “are wiser in their generation than are the children” who study the things of the spiritual world.

“It is from this cause that such diversities of opinion prevail among professing christians: an evil not to be remedied, as the Romanists would remedy it, by squeezing all men’s minds into one universal square impudently called the mind of the church; or as Milton describes the patent uniforming process, “starching them into the stiffness of uniformity by tradition.” (Milton’s Prose Works; Speech for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing.) This is not the method; but the only method is to establish as binding upon all christian inquirers the rule already recorded, that Nothing in spiritual matters ought to be believed as true unless its truth can be demonstrated by an appeal to the original scriptures, and this to the satisfaction of every well-constituted, truth-loving mind.

“This rule once generally recognised and practically carried out, will make the candid and ingenuous all of one mind; will establish uniformity, the true uniformity of belief, one founded on the conviction, and not on the suspension of the understanding.

“Sincere men of science are of one mind in regard to chemical, mechanical, and mathematical facts; this oneness having been arrived at by rigidly adhering to the prescribed rule in studying the Book of Creation. What, then, is there in spiritual subjects to prevent men pursuing revelation-recorded truths, arriving at a similar oneness of mind in regard to those truths, recorded by the same Divine Mind, and guided by the same God of Order, as dictated the other book of instruction?

“Taking this rule as the guide, and holding the principles that, revelation being “information from God,” being a truth discovery, its truths are therefore for discovery, and that these truths are to be discovered with a certainty as great as that connected with the creation-truths, it is proposed to consider

THE DEVIL.

“As a consequence of being guided by this rule it will be essential to throw behind us, and as far as possible to banish from our mental condition, all the various notions that have been instilled into our minds, in conjunction with the Devil, by means of nurse-stories, pictures, and even by the pleasing religious romance writer, Bunyan, and by that stupendous-minded poet, Milton. The descriptions, however beautiful, and the notions thence derived, however strong, must be to us as inquirers after truth, as though they were not.

“Knowing, however, how strong early impressions are, how constantly they obtrude themselves whenever the subjects with which they were originally introduced into the mind are brought before the view, we require to be continually on the alert lest when we, in relation to the influence of mental associations, are asleep, they may enter in and divert our minds from the good old way—the Law and the Testimony.

“Formerly, the miseries of the world led some to imagine and to believe in the existence of some powerful malignant spirit. The Magi taught the existence of a good and of an evil spirit, between which existed an irreconcilable enmity: an opinion constantly discernible in the Egyptian and Grecian mythologies; and, modified by circumstances, and consequently, in manifestation, traceable in the mythologies of almost all nations, the more uncivilised the nations the ideas associated being the more absurd.”

Though, as the Doctor truly says, nothing can be learned of the existence of a personal Devil from the Book of Creation, yet the mythological dogma might be deduced from an observation of existing facts. Natural evil, such as earthquakes, floods, pestilence, famine, &c., human wickedness, and death, contrasted with natural good, was seen to prevail everywhere. Inquisitive brains speculating upon this would naturally attribute the one to an evil cause, and the other to a good one; and as these causes were manifestly superhuman, the carnal mind being unenlightened by revelation on the subject, rushed to the conclusion that the causes were two intelligent, powerful, and antagonistic Spirits, one of which, the author of good, they styled Oromazd, and the other, the author of evil, Ahriman. The latter became the Devil of the Gentile world; and as men stand more in awe of the terrific than of the good, they invented superstitions to propitiate the Devil rather than to do honour to the author of all the benefits they enjoy. This was the origin of the dogma of an omnipotent, omnipresent, and personal Devil in the East; whence the nations of the west imported it when their fathers migrated to the “isles of the Gentiles afar off.” They represent him in their statuary and pictures as half goat and half man, with horns and hoofs, and forked tail, and black as soot, with a three pronged pitch-fork in his hand! The three myths, the mythologies of the pagans, of the papists, and of the protestants, represent the object of their terror under the same form substantially; * and all of them assign to him a local habitation in what they call “hell.”-----

* In Leviticus 17: 7 and 2 Chronicles 11: 15, the word “devils” is seirim, rendered daimonai by the Seventy, and signifies He-goats, which were worshipped by the Hebrews in Egypt and Palestine, after the example of the Egyptians. They were adorned as the representatives of satyrs, or wood-demons, supposed to resemble them, and to live in deserts. In Isaiah 13: 21, speaking of Babylon the prophet says, “Satyrs (seirim) shall dance there,” that is, He-goats shall do so. The Egyptian He-Goat worship was adopted by the Greeks and Romans, who adored him as the representative of Pan, the prince-demon of the woods, and principle of all things. Pan is described as a monster in appearance, having two small horns on his head, a ruddy complexion, and flat nose, with the lips, thighs, tail, and feet of a goat. “It is not improbable,” says Parkhurst on the word sahir, “that the christians borrowed their goat-like picture of the Devil, with a tail, horns, and cloven feet, from the heathenish representations of Pan the terrible.” Thus the Devil of the vulgar superstition was dug out of the grave of paganism by the early corrupters of Christianity, the charnel house of “all the abominations of the earth.”-----

The things affirmed of the mythic Devil have been commingled with scripture phrases, applicable only to the devil and satan of the Bible; and with tradition. Stripped of the former, the Devil of “Christendom” is essentially the Devil of the Mohammedan and Pagan worlds; the latter being the sire of the Devil of our contemporaries, against which we have more particularly to protest as an existence as fabulous as “the immortal souls,” or “separate spirits” of ancient and modern mesmerism bewitched. These popular fancies are all of one and the same visionary origin—the phronema tou sarkos, THE THINKING OF THE FLESH, termed in the common version of the scriptures, “the carnal mind,” which Paul avers is “enmity against God, and unsubject to his law”—Romans 8: 7. Hence, its thoughts are not God’s thoughts; and its conclusions, in every particular, at variance with his. Show me an opinion, a principle, or an article of faith, originated by the carnal mind, or agreeable to it, and I will prove it to be false by the law and testimony of God. Creation’s book interpreted theologically by speculators, ignorant of the ideas revealed in “the oracles of God,” the word of the prophets and apostles, is the source of all the foolish notions which have perverted the public mind in regard to religious subjects. We must purge ourselves from these upon all topics, that of the Devil among the rest, if we would bring our thoughts into harmony with the thoughts of God.

The mythic devil-dogma of the Gentiles, I have said, has been combined with tradition. Between Oromazd and Ahriman, that is, between God and the Devil, say the Orientals and their disciples of the west, “there is an irreconcilable enmity.” This doctrine of “enmity” is a truth handed down from Noah, to go no further back, and misapplied. The irreconcilable enmity is that which God said he would put between the Serpent and the Woman; and between the Woman’s Seed and the Serpent’s Seed; that is, between the serpent-adherents of falsehood, and the righteous constituents of the Bride; and between the Chief of the political organization of the serpent-community, and the Great Captain and Husband of the Bride—Genesis 3: 15. These are the two great parties into which mankind were to be divided; and between whom there was to be irreconcilable enmity, until one or the other of them should be exterminated from the earth. The two chiefs are the Heads of each contending party contemporary with each other upon the earth—contemporary at the bruising of the heel of the one; contemporary also at the bruising of the Head of the other: two adverse POWERS incarnated in two irreconcilably hostile organizations of mankind. The people of the east, though “become vain in their imaginations, and darkened in their foolish heart,” still retained this tradition derived from their ancestors, when, with “a mind void of judgment,” they fabricated their theory of Oromazd and his enemy Ahriman. They did not retain God’s knowledge in its purity, but perverted it, and turned it into a mythology of the Devil.

The believers in the Devil of the Gentiles could do no more than they have done towards explaining the origin of the world’s miseries. The thinking of the flesh attributed their origin to the God-hating malevolence of a personal devil existent before the formation of man; the Bible, on the contrary, refers them all to SIN as their cause, and to divinely appointed EVIL as the punishment of sin. The popular notion is a clumsy effort of the carnal mind to explain things too high for it; and the scripture testimony it adduces to sanctify its absurdity only exposes it to contempt. It tells us that this pre-existent immortal Devil was "Lucifer, son of the morning," who "fell from heaven!"—Isaiah 14: 12—(Alluding to the Devil a writer says, "the height of capacity in Lucifer only increased the fall of that Son of the morning.") Would any one that understands the prophets be so infatuated as to dream of proving the pre-adamic existence of the Devil by such a passage as this? The record concerning Lucifer is part of a prophecy of the overthrow of Nebuchadnezzar's dynasty by the Medes and Persians, commencing with the beginning of the thirteenth of Isaiah, and ending at the twenty-seventh verse inclusive of the next chapter. Lucifer is Belshazzar, who was so named 181 years before his fall, because he was the light-bearer, or sun, of the Chaldean heaven. The prophet, in vision, seeing him prostrate as "a carcass trodden under feet," exclaims, "Is this the man that made the earth to tremble, that did shake kingdoms; that made the world as a wilderness, and destroyed the cities thereof?" How dark must that mind be that can press a prophecy of the fall of a man from the throne of a pagan empire, into the service of demonstrating the existence of a personal Devil before the creation of man upon the earth! What absurdity is too great for the credulity of the carnal mind after this!

The Bible doctrine of the devil is its teaching concerning sin. This is certainly an important subject, and one which it is desirable every one should understand. The Gentiles do not understand the teaching of the scriptures concerning Sin; it is impossible, therefore, that they can know any thing about the devil and satan exhibited in the testimony of God. Sin is the synonym of devil in the text we placed at the head of this article; I do not mean it to be inferred, however, that I hold that the word sin is the meaning of the words devil and satan wherever they occur in the English version of the scriptures. The words, devil and devils, occur about one hundred and twenty times in the English Bible, but they are by no means in the original scriptures. Two distinct words are used; and in eighty-two passages of the one hundred and twenty, the word employed is quite distinct from that which, in the remaining thirty-eight and the above text among the number, is the representative of the word devil in the common translation. In the eighty-two texts the word is daimon, and its derivatives, which ought never to be translated devil either in the sense of a personal devil or of sin. Of these eighty-two only four belong to the writings called "The Old Testament," in which it is devils and not devil. In the thirty-eight passages the original word is diabolos. Now, if the word devil be the correct rendering of diabolos, it is certain that it cannot be the proper interpretation of daimon; and consequently to render daimon by devil must lead into error. I do not, therefore, affirm that sin is synonymous with devil and devils in those texts which have daimon for their representative in the Greek; but that where the original is diabolos the radical idea is sin. I conclude, then, that distinct Greek words being used in the eighty-two texts, and the thirty-eight texts, the ideas represented in the two classes are distinct, although rendered by the same word in English; and that consequently, all arguments in relation to the Devil, as derived from the eighty-two, would be deceptive and of no weight, because the Devil is not referred to therein at all.

The thirty-eight texts in which diabolos occurs are—Matthew 4: 1, 5, 8, 11; 13: 39; 25: 41: Luke 4: 2-3, 5-6, 13; 8: 12: John 6: 70; 8: 44; 13: 2: Acts 10: 38; 13: 10: Ephesians 4: 27; 6: 11: 1 Timothy 3: 6-7, 11: 2 Timothy 2: 26; 3: 3: Titus 2: 3: Hebrews 2: 14: James 4: 7: 1 Peter 5: 8: 1 John 3: 8, three times in this verse: Jude 9; Revelation 2: 10; 12: 9, 12; 20: 2, 10.

In our prefatory text the words are ton to kratos echonta tou thanatou, toutesti, ton diabolon—“the having the power of the death, that is, the devil.” Ton echonta is masculine to agree with diabolon, not because the thing having the power of death is a male; but because the word by custom of the Greek tongue is in that gender. The thing having the power of death is it not him; unless by prosopopeia the it is converted into a person, as in this text—Romans 7: 13, kath hyperboleen hamartolos, pre-eminently a sinner. This diabolos, or devil, whatever it may mean, the apostle says, Jesus came to destroy. It is therefore, not an immortal devil; but one which will sooner or later be annihilated by the power of Jesus, the Woman’s Seed. To destroy the devil is to take away the devil from the world; that is, to take away the Sin of the World; hence, said John the Baptist concerning Jesus, “Behold the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin off the world.” This is the mission of Jesus, to take away every curse from the earth—Revelation 22: 3; 21: 5; and certainly when this is accomplished, Diabolos and all his works will be destroyed—1 John 3: 3.

Now, to accomplish this great work of destroying the devil and his works, Paul says, Jesus became flesh and blood, therefore subject to death like his brethren, that he might die. I can understand this if the devil mean sin; but on the hypothesis that diabolos means the Gentile Devil, I confess I can see no sense in it. Why should Jesus become flesh and blood to destroy such a devil as the world believes in? Why should he become mortal to conquer the immortal Devil? —The devil which men suppose is to torment their species in fire and brimstone in all eternity? Will any one of his friends make this mystery intelligible, if they can? If the devil to be destroyed be such an one as is supposed, Jesus ought to have appeared in the nature of angels, and not in the weakly nature of the seed of Abraham. He would then have been strong and invulnerable; and an overmatch for the foul fiend perhaps; though if mere strength were required, I see not why the angels could not have given him his quietus thousands of years ago.

But no. The angels, even all the hosts of them, could not, and cannot, destroy diabolos, or the Bible-devil, which torments our race, upon the principles laid down by eternal wisdom. This diabolos is the thing that has “the power of the death,” which subjects all the living to corruption. It has this power now, even over the saints, though the King of Saints is no longer holden of it. It will retain this power till their resurrection, when they will be subject to its control no more. It will still, however, retain its hold upon humanity for a thousand years longer; but when that long period is accomplished, the rest of the dead, who are to inhabit the earth for ever with the Saints and their King, will be extricated from its deadly embrace; for “the last enemy, DEATH, shall be destroyed.” Ah! Death is the last enemy; yes, and the first enemy was Sin, who introduced it into our world; for “the wages of Sin is Death.” Here are cause and effect face to face. Human tradition makes the popular Devil the first enemy and the last, the Alpha and the Omega of all their woes; but not so the Bible, Sin was the first, and Death will be the last; because Sin being taken away, Death, its penalty, will be abolished as a matter of course. As far as possibility is concerned the matter might be reversed. If death were taken away and not sin, sin would then be immortal—Diabolos would live for ever—a result, however, that cannot be; because it was to prevent the immortality of sin on the earth that the flesh and blood called Adam and Eve, were expelled from Paradise—Genesis 3: 22-23. Sin must be destroyed. This is a victory that must be obtained before God can with honour to himself abolish death. But the destruction of sin has a deeper meaning than simply putting down rebellion. Death cannot be abolished so long as sin exists in the flesh; for “the body is dead because of sin”—Romans 8: 10—it is the physical principle within us that makes us mortal. But enough for the present. In the next number I will resume the subject.

VISIT TO BRITAIN.

THE FORLORN-HOPE DEFINITION OF THE GOSPEL—THE DECLARATION OF THE GOSPEL FILED BY PAUL DEMOLISHES IT—PREJUDICE AGAINST US ON THE WANE IN EDINBURGH—A PUBLIC DEMONSTRATION OF RESPECT—VISIT TO HOLYROOD AND TO THE CROWN ROOM IN THE CASTLE—THE REGALIA AND CROWN-JEWELS OF SCOTLAND'S KINGDOM—A WEEK AT HARROWGATE—LETTER FROM EDINBURGH.

The forlorn hope led on by the lawyer and the deacon against our position, was based upon the following words of the apostle— 1 Corinthians 15: 1-4.

“Moreover, brethren, I declare unto you the Gospel which I preached unto you, which also ye have received, and wherein ye stand; by which also ye are saved, if ye keep in memory what I preached unto you, unless ye have believed in vain. For I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures; and that he was buried, and that he rose again on the third day according to the scriptures.”

I had stated that the things concerning the kingdom to be restored again to Israel under the New Covenant, and concerning the name of the anointed Jesus, were the subject-matter of the Gospel to be believed for salvation; and that to omit the things of the kingdom was to mutilate the gospel, and to make it of none effect. This was a deep thrust into the consciences of those who were either ignorant of the things of the kingdom, or, if they knew them, did not believe them. The lawyer and the deacon, both Baptists, I suspect were in this predicament, which is, indeed, a pretty universal dilemma. They felt themselves, therefore, bound to justify themselves, and to show, if they could, that the gospel was restricted to three facts and a single truth concerning Christ—the facts being the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ; and the doctrinal truth that “he died for our sins:” so that if a man believe these, he believed the gospel, and would be saved if he did not forget them. To prove this they adduced the passage above quoted as an obvious demonstration of their position, and an unanswerable, and triumphant refutation of mine. But “he that is first in his own cause seemeth just: but his neighbour cometh and searcheth him.” This happened to them and we searched them to the following effect.

They laid great stress, as is usual, on the phrase “first of all,” to prove that when Paul preached the gospel, the first thing he did was to deliver himself concerning the crucifixion and death of Jesus for our sins, which is called “preaching him crucified.” But to this I objected that Paul did not say “first of all;” but en protois, “among the first things”—“I delivered to you among the first things that which I received, how that Christ died for our sins, &c.” It is not true that Paul delivered this in the Gentile sense of the phrase “first of all,” that is, that the first thing he preached was the crucifixion of Jesus for sins. When he went among those who had the scriptures of the prophets, and professed to believe them, the first thing he did was to lay before them the things concerning the Christ; and when he thought he had sufficiently enlightened them upon these matters, he then submitted to them the things concerning Jesus, and his name. But when he went among idolaters, who knew not the prophets, he first showed them the absurdity of idol-worship, endeavouring in so doing to turn them from dumb idols to the living and true God, whose messenger he announced himself to be; he then proclaimed God’s future vicegerent reign over the nations by A RIGHTEOUS MAN whom he had prepared for the purpose, having raised him from the dead; which resurrection was an assurance that said Divine Kingdom would certainly be established. Having thus introduced the subject of the King’s resurrection, he then preached to them Jesus, that is, the things concerning him; who confirmed the apostle’s testimony “with signs, and wonders, and divers miracles, and distributions of the Holy Spirit, according to his will.”

The foregoing statement is proved by Paul’s course at Thessalonica, Athens, and Corinth; for thus it is written, “And Paul, as his manner was, went into the synagogue of the Jews, and three Sabbath days (or Saturdays) reasoned with them out of the scriptures (of the prophets, the only scriptures then in being,) opening and alleging that it behoved the Christ to suffer, and to rise from among the dead (ek nekroon).” While he confined himself to this, the general question, he was listened to without tumult. The Jews had no objection to listen to the discussion of the question, “Is the Anointed One to suffer death, and to rise from the dead, before he assumes the reins of government over Israel and the nations?” This is clear from Paul’s adventures at Corinth as well as at Thessalonica. There he reasoned with the Jews for several Sabbaths, during which all was peace and quietness, and obviously, because he said nothing about Jesus. He spoke only of the Christ, without affirming whether he had appeared or not. But when Silas and Timothy joined him from Macedonia he was encouraged, and, being pressed in spirit, could no longer forbear to affirm that the Christ had appeared, and that the crucified and resurrected Jesus was He. This avowal threw the hitherto peaceable Jews into an uproar, as the announcement of the same truth had at Thessalonica. It is evident, therefore, from the effect produced at both places, that Paul did not preach the things concerning Jesus first of all. If he had, his first discourse would have resulted only in tumult. He would not have convinced a single Jew. He had first to prepare the minds of the Jews by convincing them from the prophets that, whoever the Christ might be, and whenever he should appear, he must prove himself worthy of exaltation to David’s throne by obedience unto death, from which God would deliver him by a resurrection to everlasting life. If he could get the Jews to believe this he would remove the great obstacle in the way of their confessing that Jesus was the Christ. This obstacle consisted in their belief that the Christ, whenever he came, would appear at once in power and great glory. If Jesus had appeared thus they would have received him gladly; but because he appeared in humiliation, contrary to their expectation, he became an obstacle, “a stone of stumbling and rock of offence.” Knowing the state of their minds upon the subject, Paul proceeded cautiously and wisely; first opening to them the prophets, that is, expounding the scriptures that they might understand their teaching concerning the Christ. When they comprehended this, they perceived that the King expected by the nation was to appear as “a poor and needy man,” despised and persecuted by his contemporaries to an ignominious death, and afterwards to rise from the dead; and that this crisis of his fate was to be made the foundation of a mystery, through which remission of sins, and a right to share with the Christ in his kingdom for ever, might be obtained. A mind so prepared would have no difficulty in assenting heartily to the proposition that the Jesus whom Paul preached was that Christ, when the declaration was confirmed of God by the miracles wrought in his name before them.

Now, the things first preached by Paul, namely, concerning the Christ, were the things of the kingdom; for Christ is equivalent to king, because kings are anointed ones. In preaching Christ to the Thessalonians, he taught them that there was another king than Caesar—Acts 17: 7, who should come from heaven with the angels of his power, taking vengeance on those who obeyed not the gospel he preached—1 Thessalonians 1: 10; 2 Thessalonians 1: 7-10. He invited them to a participation in his kingdom and glory—1 Thessalonians 2: 12, a resurrection from the dead if accounted worthy of it, and deliverance from the wrath to come—1 Thessalonians 4: 16; 2 Thessalonians 1: 5; 1 Thessalonians 1: 10. In preaching Jesus Christ, he taught them that Jesus was that king in whom would be fulfilled all the things written concerning him in the prophets. This doctrine of a king from heaven to rule the nations upon the earth, as Jehovah's vicegerent, sounded out from Jerusalem to every part of the Roman dominion until it reached the ears of the reigning emperor, whose jealousy it excited so much that he made decrees, forbidding any one to proclaim it. Now, I would like to know, if Paul had taught that Jesus was king of a dominion in the skies, or beyond them, would the Roman emperor have forbidden his subjects to affirm it? On the contrary, is it not clear, that Paul preached the establishment of a kingdom on the Roman territory, and that it was this that alarmed Caesar? What would Caesar, a pagan, have cared about the kingship of Jesus so long as he supposed it was to be confined to the heavens, and not to interfere with his jurisdiction? He would have regarded it with as little concern as Victoria does the preaching of the kingdom by the dissenters, who declare that the Lord's kingdom is not of this world, but purely spiritual and ethereal.

Paul had a special reason for reminding the Corinthians that he delivered to them the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ for sins, "among the first things." It was this. There were some of Hymenaeus and Philetus's disciples among them, who affirmed that "the resurrection was past already"—2 Timothy 2: 17-18, and that consequently, "there is no resurrection of the dead"—1 Corinthians 15: 12—hereafter. They had embraced again that old clairvoyant fable of heathenism concerning souls, or “separate spirits.” They affirmed that man had a soul in him which was capable of a disembodied existence, which it actually assumed at death. This was the current and universal opinion of the day, which made Paul’s doctrine of the resurrection of the mortal body so absurd in the estimation of the people.

 Titus, who was contemporary with Paul, in his speech to the Roman soldiers before the attack on the tower of Antonia at the siege of Jerusalem, thus addresses them: “For what man of virtue is there who does not know that those souls which are severed from their fleshly bodies in battles by the sword, are received by the ether, that purest of elements, and joined to that company which is placed among the stars: that they become gods, demons, and propitious heroes, and show themselves as such to their posterity afterwards?”—Wars of the Jews, by Josephus, book vi., c. i., sec. 5. Good orthodox doctrine, is it not? Titus would have made quite a capital divine for our day, if he would just have interlarded his sermons with a few bible-phrases, and instead of speaking of Jupiter and the gods, called them Peter and the Saints!!

The holders of this fabulous tradition argued from their assumption to conclusions subversive of the truth. As souls are received by the pure ether, and joined to the company among the stars, a resurrection of the body to inherit a kingdom in the land of Israel, is unnecessary. Manifestly. They denied it, therefore; and so rejected both the resurrection and the kingdom. Now, it was to vindicate the truth concerning these, and to demolish their “philosophy and vain deceit,” their “science falsely so called,” to the conviction of every right-minded reader, that he wrote the fifteenth chapter of his letter to the Church at Corinth. In the eleventh verse he reminds them that he preached a resurrected Christ, in whom they believed. He did not preach a Christ who died for sins, whose soul was received by the ether, and joined to a company among the stars. The Christ he preached was raised bodily from the dead, not from among the living in a world of spirits; but the same bodily person who was buried, and continued buried till the third day, after which he was seen by five hundred and twelve persons, and last of all by himself, as one born out of due time. “Now,” says he, this being so—“if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead?" Here is the reason for his reminding them that Christ's resurrection was preached to them "among the first things." It was to elicit from them self-condemnation for obviously stultifying themselves in, at one and the same time, admitting the resurrection of Christ the first-fruits, and denying the resurrection of the dead in him! He did not introduce the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ for sins, as a definition of the gospel; but as among some of the first things of which the gospel treats. The gospel stated in the fewest words is, "In Abraham shall all nations be blessed"—Galatians 3: 8; Genesis 12: 18; but if there be no future resurrection, there can be no blessing of the nations in him and his seed—Daniel 12: 2; Galatians 3: 29; for both he and they are sleeping in the dust of the earth, where they must forever remain if the dead are not raised.

Though I object to the third and fourth verses containing a definition of the gospel, I admit that the chapter at large contains a declaration of the gospel preached by Paul. It is evidently so, for he informs the reader in the first verse, that he is about to declare, or make known, the gospel which he had preached to them. It had become necessary to do so; for some of them were letting slip the things they had once believed. Now look at the items of the declaration, and behold the topics treated of by the apostle when he preached the gospel. Here they are—the death of the Christ for sins, his burial, and resurrection; the future resurrection of the dead by him at his coming; his subsequent reign till the end comes; his subjugation of all enemies during his reign, and the destruction of death at the end of it; the delivering up of the kingdom to the Father then, when the mediatorship shall be abolished, so that God may be all and in all; the kind of body the resurrected saints shall possess, and their glory, to fit them for the possession of the kingdom of God; the transformation of the faithful contemporary with the resurrection; and the church's victory over "the gates of hell" through Jesus Christ the Lord. These are the great gospel-truths contained in that word which Paul taught in Corinth for a year and six months; and which "many of the Corinthians hearing, believed, and were baptised"—Acts 18: 11, 8. There is not a syllable here about "separate spirits," and sky-kingdoms; but every thing to the contrary, adduced, too, to refute them. The major part of the Corinthians remained faithful to the things declared, as the apostle says in reference to them, “wherein ye stand;” and adds, “by which ye are saved if ye hold fast to a certain word I preached to you, unless ye have believed in vain.” In the common version these italics read, “if ye keep in memory what.” They are two words in the dative case in the Greek answering to “what,” namely, tini logo, “to a certain word”—the word of God, that is, “the law and the testimony” bound up and sealed among the disciples—Isaiah 8: 16, from which, by the reasoning of the apostle, were brought out the things set forth in the declaration of the gospel of the kingdom, so interestingly filed in the fifteenth of Corinthians. “I worship the God of my fathers,” said he. How did he worship him? “Believing,” he adds, “all things which are written in the Law and in the Prophets”—Acts 24: 14: and as he believed so he preached, “witnessing both to small and great, saying none other things than those which the Prophets and Moses did say should come”—Acts 26: 22. This was that “certain word” which he preached, and upon the holding fast to which the salvation of men is predicated.

The death, burial, and resurrection of Christ for sins, according to the prophets, is only an item of the declaration filed. The great multitude of professors believe this in our day in a certain sense: that is, they assent that in some way remission of sins is connected and dependant on the death of Jesus; though of the prophetic and law-instruction in the case, they know nothing. But while this is credited, they ridicule the other items of Paul’s declaration with Epicurean and Stoic mockery. If they assent to the resurrection of Jesus, they nullify the resurrection of the dead at his appearing, and a posteriori his, by their animal-magnet-ismalism about “separate-spirits” and “spirit-world,” making it perfectly unnecessary and superfluous; which is in effect denying it—nay, numbers say boldly, that all the resurrection there is, is the awakening of the soul at its final separation from the body when the heart ceases to beat. The item of the declaration about the appearing again of Jesus in the world, is one against which they are particularly spiteful. They crack fool-jokes at the idea of his coming to this cursed, and sin-polluted, earth again; not having wit enough to perceive, that it is this very defilement of earthly things that makes his return absolutely necessary, that he may take away the sin which curses them. The kingdom meets with no more favour at their hands than the appearing of its king. This is an item of the declaration they have nullified as completely as the resurrection of the first fruits. Paul preached one kingdom only. He said nothing about a “kingdom of grace” distinct from a “kingdom of glory.” Moses, the Prophets, John the baptiser, Jesus, and the Apostles, and the whole Israelitish nation, hoped for, and discoursed about but one kingdom, namely, “the kingdom of God.” This, our contemporaries say was set up on Pentecost, and that men enter it when they are immersed! I would like to know if men are not in possession of the kingdom when they are in it? So the leaders of the people teach; for they say, the apostles ascended the thrones of the Twelve Tribes of Israel on Pentecost, when they entered and possessed it! According to this, flesh and blood can and do inherit the kingdom of God, which is contrary to the declaration filed by the apostle, which says, “they cannot;” in other words, that the putting on of incorruptibility and immortality are indispensably necessary to the inheriting of the kingdom. Then as to the nature and place of the kingdom, they resolve it into principles assented to, and locate it among the stars; while the apostles, being in the promised land, placed it at the coming of Christ to reign over his enemies, not at his going to; and exhibit it as a proper kingdom with the Twelve Tribes as its subjects, the nations for its empire, and Jesus and his brethren as Jehovah’s kings and princes throughout all the earth. Look at the declaration, item for item, and analyse the reasoning which elicits them, and after comparing the whole with the pulpit-gospels, then let any man of sense and candour conscientiously deny my position if he can, namely, that the thing now preached for gospel, and assented to by the people, is not the gospel preached by the apostles at the command of Jesus, but “another gospel,” which can give no one that trusts in it remission of sins and a right to eternal life in the kingdom of God. If the apostle worshipped the God of his fathers, modern “christians” do not; for they not only do not believe all things written in the Law and the Prophets; but they are destitute even of respect for their authority, treating them as old, musty, unintelligible, records, which have long since answered their end, and consequently of no further account to the generations of an age so enlightened as the nineteenth century!

My exhibition of the declaration filed in this remarkable chapter had the effect anticipated. The forlorn hope was paralysed, and those who led it, if not convinced, had nothing more to say; and as midnight was fast approaching, a move was made that terminated the evening, leaving all in apparent harmony with themselves and one another.

I discoursed to the people in Edinburgh about ten times, and seemed to gain credit with them the longer I remained among them. This was better than being received with a great character, and leaving with none. They had received me hesitatingly, but relinquished me with regret; as will appear from the following epistle written by one, who, though an officer in the Queen's navy, rejoices in righteousness and the truth.

Letters

Dear Sir and Brother:

Myself and ----- are anxious to express to you the interest we feel in your welfare and progress. We had our share of the unfavourable impression produced by certain rumours, and we are thankful we were not suffered to listen to the voice of the "accuser of our brethren," who is at the bottom of all mischief. Having seen and heard for ourselves, we can now bid you "God speed," and hope you will not be discouraged, either by the craft of designing men, or the mistakes and short-sight of ignorant ones; but pursue steadily the path you have marked out for yourself, "despising the shame," and "overcoming evil with good;" so that when your course is finished, you may say with Paul, "I have kept the faith."

We will esteem it a favour if you will accept a pencil case as a memorial of your visit here, and specially of our personal regard and esteem. I wish I had been so circumstanced that I could have exercised a greater degree of hospitality towards you: ----- joins with me in wishing you health, peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit; while for myself, I remain your brother in the faith and hope of the gospel.

J.W.S.

The writer of this letter and his friend, both members of South Bridge Hall congregation, were not the only persons whom our discourses had dispossessed of the evil which had been created in them by the enemy of all righteousness. A desire was created in many to give a public testimony in our favour as an expounder of the prophets and apostles. They proposed to hold a soiree, or evening, at the Waterloo Assembly Room. Although I do not like to be the subject of public demonstrations I acquiesced, as it seemed to be much desired; and on the ground also that it would give no aid or comfort to the accuser and adversary in America and Britain, who was doing all he could to close the ear of the people against me as an utterly worthless fellow. A very considerable and respectable company of the odds and ends of Edinburgh society assembled on the occasion to express their gratitude and good will towards us for our work of faith and labour of love in their behalf; and to bid us "God speed" in our future enterprises connected with the interpretation and defence of "the Testimony of God." The business of the evening was very well and orderly conducted under the auspices of Alexander Melville Bell, Esq., who presided as chairman of the soiree. Speeches were made appropriate to the occasion, and in the intervals the audience was charmed into the blindest disposition by the sweet strains of instrumental and vocal music furnished con amore for the evening. It was "a quiet tea party" on a large scale, at which music, refreshments, speeches, and the questioning of our humble self for the resolution of doubts and difficulties, were the entertainment of the friends. There was a little bit of display, however, which as far as my feelings were concerned, would have been more satisfactory in the breach than the observance. It was the unexpected presentation to me of a purse of six sovereigns, with a complimentary speech by the chairman. A man cannot travel in Britain without money, and as I was "running to and fro" for the benefit of the public, and not of myself, * I had no hesitation in accepting it; but then, I had rather it had been given in a more private and business-like way. All who are acquainted with me know that I do not labour for gold and silver, or present reward. I can neither live nor get along without it any more than other people; not having discovered the art of paying printers, steam companies, and domestic necessities with air and ether, however pure and abundant the supply. But, though it is indispensable as a means of operating, a public presentation of gold to a labourer in the gospel has an unseemly appearance. It looks as though he had been labouring for that as his reward; a semblance, which, although it might not be observed by others, the practice being familiar, was perceived by myself, and made the acceptance of it, under the circumstances, more painful than agreeable. The intention was kind, though its expression was not the happiest; I therefore made the best acknowledgment I could, in hope that it would be the last time my friends, in being "at charges with me," would give it the appearance of a reward conferred, rather than a contribution to a common enterprise, in which the only persons advantaged were themselves. * See next page.

* This is proved by the fact that my receipts did not cover my return voyage to America, &c., having not received more than four shillings over travelling expenses in the island. Much money was raised, but it was necessarily expended in printing, hiring assembly rooms, and paying board for me during my sojourn in divers cities: the surplus just accomplished what I have said.

About 11 P.M. the soiree was brought to a close by the chairman proposing a vote of thanks to me, for the instruction and edification they had received in the interesting lectures they had heard; and at the same time suggesting that a committee of gentlemen be formed, whose business it should be to get subscribers for the publication of the book I had promised to write at the request of many of the citizens of Glasgow, setting forth the great and important truths they had listened to with so much delight. The proposal for a committee was adopted, and fourteen of the audience were named, who agreed to serve. But before the vote of thanks was put, a very zealous philanthropist arose in the midst, and objected to the vote being taken until I defined my position in regard to American slavery; as though the favours conferred on the modern Athenians were lessened or increased by the complexion of my opinions upon that exciting topic of the day. Zeal without discretion has but one idea, which it obtrudes under whatever circumstances, without regard to time, place, or fitness. This was the case with the objector, and the chairman perceived it. He therefore pronounced the objection irrelevant, and not to be entertained at that crisis. Dr. Thomas had laid the audience under obligation by his disinterested endeavours to enlighten them in the scriptures of truth. They appreciated his services, and did not at all conceive it necessary to ascertain what were his opinions upon all the debatable questions of the day, before they expressed their heartfelt thanks for what had been accomplished in their midst. He should therefore submit the motion, which had been seconded, to the company, which would doubtless respond to it unanimously. The motion was agreed to nem. con. Save the philanthropist, who persisted in withholding his thanks, which, of course, left us a prey to the most poignant grief! Our friend then vacated his seat, and his able conduct in the chair being testified and approved in due form, the evening was closed, and the company retired to their respective abodes.

During my sojourn in Edinburgh I visited some of the lions of the place, such as Holyrood House, the Castle, the Regalia there, &c. I shall not occupy space with a description of these things, which is amply detailed in the popular guide-books of the day. Holyrood is a gloomy looking place, with the ruin of the old Abbey attached. To one acquainted with its history it is an object of disgust and abhorrence. It was the royal residence in past ages of ignorance, superstition, barbarism, and crime, incarnate in the kings, queens, and courts of Scotland. It was once a very splendid abode of royalty, when men's ideas of greatness and magnificence, could soar no higher than the barbaric pomp of a Faustin, or the rich vulgarity of a country town. It is an object of national veneration, which is considerably heightened in the popish mind of the country as being the occasional residence of that lady of easy virtue, Mary Queen of Scots. The blood-stain is still shown on the floor where Rizzio, her Italian favourite and musician, was murdered in her presence by Darnley and his associates, who afterwards buried him under the floor off the passage leading from the palace to the Abbey. Tourists look upon these relics of former ages with a sort of superstitious worship; but to a mind accustomed to contemplate the glories of the Age to Come, they are but the mementos of human wretchedness and vanity, which the sooner they perish the better, with the recollection of all the viciocities they memorialise. We have said enough in a former notice about the Castle of Edinburgh, standing on “The steep and iron belted rock,

Where trusted lies the monarchy's last gems—
The Sceptre, Sword, and Crown that graced the brows, Since father Fergus, of a hundred kings.”

These precious, but useless, baubles are deposited in the Crown-Room of the Castle. They rest on a marble slab in a dark place, enclosed, beyond the reach of the longest arm, by a circular iron palisade extending from the floor to the ceiling, and illuminated by a lamp so placed as to bring them into view. Besides the sceptre, sword, and crown, are four ancient jewels, bequeathed to George IV by the late Cardinal York, the last male descendant of James VII of Scotland. These jewels are “the St. George,” “the St. Andrew,” a Sapphire Ring set round with diamonds, and a golden collar of the Order of the Garter. The St. George is a badge off the order off the Garter, of gold, richly enamelled and set with diamonds. On one side of the St. Andrew is the image of Scotland's patron Saint, or mahoz, finely cut on an onyx, set round with diamonds; on the other, a secret opening under which is placed a fine miniature of the Queen of Denmark. The Sapphire Ring is the coronation ring of Charles I; and the Collar that presented to James VI by Queen Elizabeth.

The Crown, supposed to have been made in the reign of Robert the Bruce, is of a remarkably elegant form. The lower part consists of two circles, the undermost much broader than that which rises over it, both are composed off the purest gold, and the uppermost is surmounted or relieved by a range of lily flowers, interchanged with flowered crosses, and with knobs or pinnacles of gold, topped with large pearls, which produces a very rich effect. The under and broader circle is adorned with twenty-two precious stones, betwixt each of which is interposed an oriental pearl; the stones are topazes, amethysts, emeralds, rubies, and iacinths, set plain in the ancient style of jeweller's work. The smaller circle, which surmounts this under one, is adorned with small diamonds and sapphires alternately, and its upper verge terminates in a range of the crosses, lilies, and knobs topped with pearls. James V surmounted these circles with two imperial arches crossing each other, and closing at the top in a mound of gold, which again is surmounted by a large cross patee, ornamented with pearls. The bonnet, or tiara, worn under the crown, is of crimson velvet, turned up with ermine. The tiara is adorned with four superb pearls set in gold, and fastened in the velvet, which appear between the arches. The crown measures about nine inches in diameter, twenty-seven in circumference, and about six inches and a half in height from the bottom of the lower circle to the top of the cross. The whole appearance of this ancient type of sovereignty does great credit to the skill and taste of the age in which it was formed.

The Sceptre is a slender and elegant rod of silver, about thirty-nine inches in length, the stalk being of hexagon form, divided by three ornamented rings, and surrounded by an antique capital of embossed leaves, supporting three small figures, representing the Virgin Mary, Saint Andrew, and Saint James. The ornamented niches, in which these Mahuzzim are placed, are again surmounted by a crystal globe of two inches and a quarter in diameter, and yet again by a small oval globe topped with an oriental pearl. When laws were passed in the Scottish Parliament, they were presented by the chancellor to the king, who ratified them by touching them with the Sceptre, in token of the royal assent.

These Honours of Scotland's kingdom have passed through many vicissitudes of an interesting kind. They were in the custody of George Ogilvy, lieutenant-governor of the castle of Dunnottar in 1652, when it was besieged and closely blockaded by the Cromwellians under General Dean. There was every prospect of their falling into the hands of the English republicans; and would have done so, but for the ingenuity of Mrs. Ogilvy and others. Christian Fletcher Granger, the wife of the minister of Kinneff, some five miles from the castle, obtained permission from the English general to visit the governor's lady in the fortress. The crown was given to her, and the sword and sceptre, concealed in bundles of lint to her maid, to take home. She took the crown in her lap, and on arriving at the camp where she had left her horse, the English general himself assisted her to mount. Her maid followed her on foot, both clearing the army without any discovery being made. They buried them in the kirk of Kinneff, where they remained undisturbed till the restoration. Such is the information in the Description of Scotland's Regalia, published in 1848.

I left Edinburgh November 11th, 1848, and arrived at Harrowgate, a celebrated inland, fashionable, watering-place in England, about 8 P.M., where, at Prospect House, I enjoyed the hospitality, and intelligent society of the sisters Carter, for about a week. The waters here are very sulphurous and saline; and exceedingly nauseous to the taste. The "season" was over; so that the population was reduced to the ordinary residents of the place, whose admiration of the waters is in proportion to their power of attracting affluent invalids to their vicinity. The country around is well adapted to pedestrian rambles, and drives for the infirm. The roads and side-walks are good, and picturesque. I visited Knaresboro and its castle, some three miles distant, in company with my friends. The castle is in ruins. It is celebrated as the fortress where the slayers of Thomas-a-Becket took refuge. Not far off is the dropping well, which I also visited. The water of this well holds a great quantity of calcareous matter in solution; so that birds and small animals suspended under the dropping are petrified in a comparatively short time. Fort Montague is hard by. This is an abode hewn out of the rock by a labourer, where he is permitted by the proprietor to live rent free for his pains. From this spot is seen in the distance the place where Eugene Aram, the hero of a novel of that name, was hung in chains for a murder committed in the neighbourhood. These, with St. Robert's chapel, a hermit's abode in the rock, and other notabilia which have slipped my memory, are the curiosities of the vicinity, or the shrines to which the fashionable pilgrims of Harrowgate resort, in seeking the recovery of the health they have lost in the violation of the laws of their physical and moral being, which is the rule of their existence in "good society!"

I spoke once or twice to a private collection of a few friends. I found the scriptural intelligence, and astuteness, all on the side of the ladies in Harrowgate, whose interest in the things presented to them became lively and abiding, as the following note from one of them, who is now numbered among the dead, will sufficiently evince.

Harrowgate, Yorkshire,
November 25th, 1848.

Dear Brother:

Now that we have become acquainted, and seen you face to face, need I tell you, (or must our characters prove) that we are deeply interested in the Heavenly Truths you are so indefatigably engaged in promulgating, both orally and through the press. There are numerous rumours current in this place arising from your presence here, which seems to have excited considerable curiosity in various quarters. Some say you are "a Joanite," (I don't know whether the word is spelt correctly) others a Latter Day Saint! I wish we had more copies of the Lincoln lectures, or some tracts, to give the people; they would prepare the way for another visit.

We have read "The Two Hopes," and "The Things Elaborated from the Word." They are most welcome to my reason so far. They have drawn my attention more closely to the scriptures. We feel greatly obliged to you for leaving us so valuable a legacy. If it please the Lord we should meet again, we shall rejoice to elicit more information on the things of the kingdom. Till then I remain, Yours faithfully,

M. E. C.

Before leaving Harrowgate, the following information of the effect of my lectures in Edinburgh came to hand from a South-Bridgian now in Wisconsin, U. S.

Edinburgh, November 23rd, 1848.

Dear Brother:

I am anxious to hear how you are getting on. Several persons have been inquiring for you since you left. The committee appointed at the Soiree meets on Monday night for the first time. I have seen no notice yet in the newspapers of the evening. They are all tied to party, and priest-ridden. There is not an independent paper published in Edinburgh. Since you left the clergy have commenced lecturing on prophecy. Some of them make but a poor hand of it. In the first lecture that was delivered only one reference was made to the scriptures during the whole discourse. If it is not too much trouble let me have a few lines from you respecting your future course.

Trusting this will find you and our friends in Harrowgate all well, I remain, Yours in the hope of life,

JAMES MAIR.

ISRAEL'S HOPE.

The following has been recently inserted as an advertisement in the "British Colonist," published in Halifax, Nova Scotia, by a friend to Elpis Israel. I insert it here because of the excellent digest it presents off the great truths they contend for who believe in the Hope of Israel.

"Elpis Israel is a book recently published by John Thomas, M.D., of surpassing merit, and most interesting and invaluable to every person, lay or clerical, who may desire to understand the Bible as a whole, and to be able from the sure prophetic word, "whereunto," Peter says, "ye do well to take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until THE DAY (of Christ) dawn,"—to note and understand the signs of the times. "Behold I come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth,"—saith God's Anointed King—"that man whom God hath ordained to judge the world in righteousness," for a thousand years. He that revealed to Daniel what should happen in the latter days, told him that "the words were closed up and sealed," that is, their meaning would not be understood, until "the time of the end:" when "the WISE shall understand" them.

"Elpis Israel demonstrates that the time predicted by Daniel, is near, when "the God of Heaven shall set up a Kingdom which shall break in pieces and consume all other Kingdoms," when "Michael, the great prince, shall stand up for the children of Israel," and when "many that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake." All the important prophecies referring to the awful and wonderful events which are to transpire on the earth, during the time of the end of "the times of the Gentiles," preparatory to the bringing in of the Jews and the restoration of the Kingdom again to Israel, are rendered intelligible and harmonious, and deeply interesting to the present generation.

"THE THINGS CONCERNING THE KINGDOM OF GOD AND THE NAME OF JESUS CHRIST," are fully and ably treated of. Messiah's reign personally on the earth when "the Lord God shall have given him the throne of his father David," when "he will return and build again the tabernacle of David which is fallen down, and will build again the ruins thereof, and will set it up, as in the days of old;” the rebuilding of Jerusalem, which will then be “the city of the great King,” and be called as prophesied by Jeremiah, “THE THRONE OF GOD;” the Ezekiel Temple, into which “the glory of the God of Israel is to come from the way of the east and enter at the east gate,” and which will far transcend in splendour and magnificence, its great type, the Temple of Solomon; the restoration of the ten lost tribes of Israel, and their Second Exodus from Egypt and passage a second time through the Red Sea, as foretold by Isaiah; the fearful destruction of the nations which go up to spoil the Jews, referred to in Ezekiel, under the names God and Magog; the establishment of the dominion of Christ and “the people of the saints” over the whole earth for a thousand years; the utter destruction of the Satanic confederacy of the nations; styled also by John, Gog and Magog, who at the end of the thousand years, “compass the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city;” the second resurrection and final judgment: the delivering up of the Kingdom to the Father: and the “new earth” in which is to be “no sea,” and which only those who have attained to immortality will dwell in; all these, with a vast amount of information, interesting and important, and which can be found in no other book, are clearly set forth and scripturally demonstrated.

“The unscripturality and consequent “foolishness” of many prevailing religious notions and opinions, is made evident; and the Bible as a whole being opened up to the minds of the uninitiated, becomes at once a book, the most interesting and absorbing that can possibly be imagined, and the study of it truly delightful. Every person who feels any interest in the things which concern his future state, by studying Elpis Israel with the Bible at his right hand, as the Author requests, can be assured of what he must believe and do, in order to inherit eternal life, be constituted a joint heir with Christ; “and at his appearing and his kingdom,” share with him “the power and the glory” of his Kingdom, in “the Age to Come,” and in the ages of the ages which follow. Truly “great and precious” are God’s promises, “to him that overcometh!” What a glorious hope is the Christian’s!”

THE PRELATES OF ENGLAND.

Having well described the wickedness of the Pope and his Bishops, Mr. Lord proceeds to speak of the king of England's bishops. Comparing them with the popish spirituals, he says, "They arrogated a similar right to legislate over the prerogatives and laws of God, and a similar authority over the liberties and consciences of his worshippers, and acquiesced in their assumption by the civil rulers; they were animated by an equal ambition, and guilty of an equal violation of the rights and peace of those under their sway. The pride, intolerance, and tyranny with which for ages they pursued and crushed the dissentients from their creed and rites; the malignity with which they sometimes attempt to debase the ministers of their own communion, illustrious for learning, piety, and usefulness, and swerve them from their allegiance to the Almighty; and the cruelty with which they consigned their families to disgrace and beggary, and strove to hunt them from existence, have no parallel in the history of any other Protestant nation. Large as the number is of great and good men who have held the Episcopal office in that church, vast as the myriads are who through divine grace have washed their robes under their ministry, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb, and gone up from the conflicts of this stormy scene to the rest of heaven, she is yet among the guiltiest of usurpers and tyrants. Her crown is sullied, her stole is purpled with the blood of multitudes of the witnesses of God whom she has wantonly slain, and thence, like her persecuting sisters, (Scotland's church of course among the number. —Editor) she is ere long to be struck by avenging justice from her throne."

History attests the truth of the above concerning the bishops of the English national church; but we are at a loss to conceive where Mr. Lord obtained his information, that vast myriads of that church had washed their robes white in the blood of the Lamb under the ministry of its proud and lordly prelates, and are now in the rest of heaven. This is a piece of history we have never met with; nor have we discovered any where in scripture that those who are "defiled with women"—Revelation 14: 4—are saved in, by, or through the Harlot Churches to which they belong. This is a stretch of

So much for the strongest argument for the existence of spirits separate from material bodies—an argument which with all its strength is but general debility in the presence of God's testimony, and Messrs. Karsten and Draper's experiments of the coins. Separate spirits! —mere spectral impressions on magnetic haloes! —hidden, indeed, from light-stimulated optics; but disclosed to electro-magnetically excited brains! How are the "wise" with the ignorant entrapped in their own foolishness! And the "pious" too—the "great and good divines," with their adorers—how are they taken in the craftiness of their own pietism! Oh the worth of the immortal soul, who can calculate it! —of that soul evoked from the magnetic halo of a clairvoyant's sensorium! Such is the phantom-soul, for whose salvation from Pluto's realm of fire and brimstone, the whole machinery of clerical superstition has been erected in ages past; and is now maintained at the expense of the liberty, intelligence, and wealth of the nations; and is sought to be imposed upon all semi-barbarians and savages as a means of introducing the long-looked for millennium upon earth! A mighty superstition—a great mountain filling the globe—a stupendous fabric of moonshine—a pious cheat for the salvation of a magnetic spectre! Still out of evil God educes good; for if he did not, where on earth would the good come from? Even this vast imposition on human credulity He turns to a good account. The generations of mankind having yielded themselves to their propensities; or, as the scripture expresses it, "instruments of unrighteousness to serve sin"—their intellectual and moral sense has become so darkened and unfeeling, that they cannot comprehend or appreciate the goodness of God, so that order in the absence of the divine majesty might be maintained among them by its influence over them. There is, therefore, but one of two things remaining—either the earth must be left a prey to anarchy, which would be "hell;" or, order must be established by acting upon the fears of the multitude. The existence of "hell" here would defeat the divine plans destined to eventuate in blessedness upon all nations. The world became hell before the flood. It was therefore destroyed to become heaven: therefore, order was elaborated; and "the powers that be," as they appeared from time to time from amid the storm of human passion, were controlled and ordered of God. Without approving their words, He permits them to exist as a terror to evil-doers until the appointed time arrives to punish them for their wickedness, and to set up His own kingdom in the earth which shall rule over all, administering His will in truth and righteousness over all nations. At present the popular superstitions are an important element in "the terror" by which evil-doers are restrained. The clerico-priestly dogmata of immortal disembodied ghosts; heaven in a spirit-world; hell somewhere; and the necessity of faith in these wares as administered by an ordained ministry, or "sacred order," on pain of the soul's exclusion from the joys of the one, and eternal fiery torment in the other—are the staff of the spiritual police, which co-operating with the imperial sword, keeps the world in awe, and maintains order until the Lord comes. It is the fear of punishment, not the love of truth and hope of reward, that makes men behave with social decency and order. This is the general rule, to which doubtless there are exceptions; but they are such as to establish the rule.

Our worthy correspondent thinks that the answers obtained by the dead-seekers from the spectres before the medium's sensorium is "the strongest argument for the existence of spirits separate from matter." I grant it. It is doubtless the strongest, and but weak at that. It is the argument of a dream to prove a fact. But the argument cannot be received as valid; for the dream-answers are not always right, as he testifies in the case of the second gentleman. Answers from God are infallible. His spirit never makes mistakes; nor is it presumable that any intelligences of a true spiritual nature, in harmony with His spirit, are ever guilty of untruthful utterances. The "spirits," therefore, whatever they be, are neither of God, nor of "the just made perfect." But, may they not be the spirits of the wicked or unjust; if they be, then, the disembodied existence of spirits is as much proved as though they were the spirits of the just? Granted. If by a spirit is to be understood no more than a spectral impression on a medium's sensorium, mesmerically evoked by the thinking of the dead-seeker, I grant that such spirits do exist separately from the persons they represent, as the spectral impression of the coin exists on the halo of the mirror separately from the coin itself. All the phenomena observed belong to spirits of this class, and prove only their existence under mesmeric excitation. Before their evocation before the medium's sensorium, they exist only as images before the seeker's mind when he thinks of them. I can now see before my recollecting faculty a child of three years old, standing with a ruler in his hand with which he had just struck me over the head. This child, a little brother, has been dead over thirty years. I see his image, and if I were placed en rapport with a medium I could make him see the child's appearance; but would it be logical to conclude that he saw the child himself, or the real individual, which a spirit is supposed to be? If the spectral impressions, or spirits, seen, were real persons, and had cognisance of human affairs, they would make no mistakes in their responses; they would speak truth only, unless they were wicked persons. It is admitted that they err, and on theological subjects it is notorious that the mediums utter the most stupid nonsense; hence I conclude, that they are not of God, nor of his saints, whatever they be.

Now, it is not my business to prove that these lying spectres are not real persons. I do not undertake to prove negatives. I have shown that they may be philosophically accounted for. It is for the spirit-mongers to prove that the forms observed by their clairvoyants are realities, and therefore not appearances only; and that they were formerly embodied in human clay, and lived in the world as men, women, and children, now exist therein. The kind of proof must be different to anything they have produced yet however. The declaration of the spectres through the clairvoyants cannot be received; because in a multitude of instances they have proved themselves to be liars, and therefore unworthy of credit; besides that unsupported self-testimony is incredible. It may be true, and it may not. If, then, the spectres say they lived in human clay as its animating, thinking principle, let them give us proof from God that their assertion is true. Jesus Christ, the sinless man, did not require his unsupported testimony to be received; shall we then admit the self-testimony of the lying spectres of the wicked dead? Perish the thought! "If," saith the Lord, "I testify concerning myself my testimony is not credible" (John 5: 31). We demand, therefore, confirmation of spectral assertions strong as Holy Writ; because assertion is no proof. They tell us, or rather mediums do, that they are the ghosts, or spirits, of dead men, and that they know a great many things, and much more than the living. But upon this point the word of God gives them the lie direct. It testifies, that "the dead know not anything;" (Ecclesiastes 9: 5) and that "there is neither knowledge nor wisdom in Sheol," (Ecclesiastes 9: 10) whither we go. Now "divines" make this word Sheol equivalent to Hades, which they say is "the place of departed spirits." Well, let us accept their definition for the present; how then reads the latter text? Even thus: "There is neither knowledge nor wisdom in the place of departed spirits," which theological mesmerists term "the spirit-world"! This is, with me, authority outweighing the testimony of all the spectres in creation, with all the opinions to boot of the 30,000 simpletons in the east, judges, lawyers, doctors, parsons, and less distinguished dupes, who vainly imagine they converse with living spirits from the vasty deep.

Our correspondent thinks, that "the whole system promulgated in our writings goes down, if the claims put forth by these spirit-mongers be established." By established he means proved to be God's truth; or else, established as true in the estimation of all men. If the latter be his meaning, the system we advocate only goes down in regard to mere human opinion. Its truth is not at all affected by mankind's opinion of it; because men who are ignorant of the true Bible-doctrine, judge according to the thinking of the flesh, which knows not the things of the spirit, because they are spiritually discerned; (1 Corinthians 2: 9-15) that is, they are discerned by the light shed upon them by the spirit in the prophetic and apostolic testimony, or writings. We advocate the system exhibited in this testimony, which went down in the estimation of their contemporaries, in whose judgment the spirit-mongers of the apostles' day established the notion, that the spectres seen by the clairvoyants in the idol temples were the disembodied immortal souls of the dead. As this notion went up, the apostolic doctrine of the immortality of the body at the resurrection went down, as at this day. It ate out the truth of immortality at resurrection only, as a gangrene; (2 Timothy 2: 15-18) and left in its place nothing but a fetid, ill-conditioned ulcer, which has reduced the patient to a gasping state. The gangrene is everything; the apostolic doctrine scarcely to be found beyond the lids of the Bible. On the other hypothesis it is doubtless true, that if the spirit-mongers' claims be proved to be God's truth, the system we advocate will be exploded. No doubt of it. It ought to be; for if their claims be true, the system we exhibit must be false, utterly and entirely false. There is no agreement between spirit-worldism and the Bible; so that if mesmerized theology be God's truth, God is not the author of the Bible; and, as we advocate the things taught in this book, which are all together at variance with the spectre-revelations of clairvoyants, we must go down with the Bible, and share with it the misfortune that peradventure might befall it. But such an hypothesis is monstrous. God can be the author of no doctrine at variance with bible teaching. This He has plainly declared in the text below (Isaiah 8: 19-20). The Bible is not to be tested by the peepings and mutterings of familiar-spirit mediums, and the table-tappings of mesmeric circles; but their utterances on the contrary, by its word, which is the truth. We stand or fall by this; and feel no apprehension of the result, though a thousand millions of spirits, a thousand times told, pronounce the reveries of the possessed, the infallible and eternal truth of God.

THE QUESTIONS ANSWERED.

In conclusion, I present the following replies in brief to the questions propounded through our correspondent:

1. To question No. 1, I respond, that I have nothing to do but to believe Matthew's testimony in regard to the Transfiguration and its attendant circumstances. I have nothing to do with the claims of spirit-mongers in the case. Matthew says nothing about "forms," or "souls," or "spiritual bodies," being seen there. He says, "there appeared unto Peter, James, and John, Moses and Elijah talking with Jesus"—Matthew 17: 3. Luke testifies substantially, the same thing, saying, "There talked with him two men, who were Moses and Elijah, who appeared in glory, and spake of his decease which he should accomplish at Jerusalem. But Peter and they that were with him were heavy with sleep: and when they were awake, they saw his glory, and the two men that stood with him"--Luke 9: 30-32. Now I ask any man, not crazed by spirit-worldism or "theology," when he is awake in the midst of a crowd on court days, what does he take those living things to be which he sees around him? Would he not reply, "men to be sure?" Suppose, I were to say to him, "No; they are spirit-forms, or souls, that once inhabited human bodies; they are not men, but the ghosts of men, which became "spiritual bodies" when the hearts of their old bodies ceased to beat"--would he not say I was either a madman or a fool? Or, if neither, that, on the supposition of his being a dupe, I was amusing myself at his expense? If rational, would he not argue that they must be men, because they presented to the eye all the marks by which men are ordinarily known? The apostles were matter-of-fact men, and reasonable withal. They judged of Moses and Elijah as they did of other men, and therefore called them by the right words, styling them "two men." Whatever quibble might be raised about Moses, because he died, cannot at all affect Elijah, who never died; and therefore never experienced a resolution into two parts. But we need add no more. Moses died, and must have been raised from the dead, or he could not have appeared as a man before three witnesses wide awake who called him such. There is no difficulty or mystery in the case, except with those whose minds are spoiled by "philosophy and vain deceit."

2. The sudden appearance and disappearance of the Lord's body, or the Lord rather, for the Lord and his body are one and the same, was the result, not of any change upon him, but of an effect produced by him upon the eyes of his disciples. "Their eyes were holden that they should not know him," until he thought proper to release their sight from the restraint. Mary saw Jesus but did not know him for the same reason. (Luke 24:16; John 20:14; 21:4) The eyes of the disciples going to Emmaus were holden. The meaning of this is given in the words, "And their eyes were opened, and they knew him." Hence to hold the eyes is to shut the sight, so that though the lids be unclosed, certain objects shall be invisible. I have performed an experiment similar to this upon the eyes of a person now in this city in the presence of many witnesses. I first mesmerized him by looking at him steadily in the eye. By this process the lids were closed so that he could not open them. I allowed him to remain in this state for some time, and then brought him out of it by a wave of the hand upwards and backwards. He could now see, and converse with anyone. I told him to look at my finger which I held before him, and about six inches above the level of his eyes. While he was doing this I carried it obliquely upwards and forwards as far as I could conveniently reach, and then suddenly withdrew it from the line of vision. This left him staring with the eyes wide open upon vacancy, with a countenance as blank and inexpressive as a corpse. He was now in the state of ecstasy. His eyes "were holden" completely; for he could see nothing. In proof of this a lighted candle was passed almost near enough to singe the lashes, but without causing a wink. Everything in the room vanished from his view with the jerk of my finger from the line of vision; and appeared again as suddenly as I waved my hand upwards before his eyes, which "opened them" to the objects by which he was surrounded. The Lord Jesus, who understood man's physique better than all the living, operated upon the disciples more skilfully. He could close their sight upon some objects at once, while he left them capable of discerning others. In this way he made himself invisible to them, and entered with them unseen into their room, where he continued to hold their eyes until they shut the doors for fear of the Jews, when he opened them and was discovered standing in their midst to their no little amazement, as may be supposed. When he parted with the disciples at Emmaus, he did not vanish as a figure from a magic lantern; but as the margin of the text reads, "he ceased to be seen of them;" that is, he took his departure. Just men, made perfect at the resurrection, will doubtless have the same power over mortals to make themselves visible or invisible as they please, by holding or opening their eyes; for of them, it is testified, "they shall be like him." He was never seen so as to be recognized by others than his disciples, because it was contrary to God's plan that he should be seen by any others. He was only to be seen by witnesses, that his resurrection might be a matter of testimony and faith, that believers might walk by faith and not by sight; therefore, the eyes of all men were holden except "the witnesses chosen of God," (Acts 10: 40-41) and the Roman guard.

3. Elisha's servant saw on the mountain near Dothan "horses and chariots of fire," such as Elijah ascended to heaven in. They descended to Elisha, and at his instance, in obedience to Jehovah's command, their riders smote the Syrian host with blindness. The servant's eyes were made more open, and the Syrians' were closed by the same spirit. The patriarchs and prophets saw angels as they saw men, by their natural sight. When men do not see them, it is either because there are no angels present to be seen; or because their natural sight is holden that they may not see.

4. Paul was not removed from earth when he saw Paradise. When he is writing about the Third Heaven and Paradise, he tells us he is treating of "Visions and Revelations of the Lord;" that is, of things represented and communicated to him by the Lord, as they were of old time to the prophets, and afterwards to John in Patmos. He was so absorbed in the contemplation of what he saw and heard, that he was altogether unconscious of his present existence. He had a Vision of Paradise, or a Vision of the Third Heaven, in which he heard things not communicated for utterance. He did not see Paradise or the Third Heaven, but a representation of them as they will be when the Kingdom is established by the God of heaven in the land promised to Abraham, and shall be in continuance after the thousand years shall have passed away. The "heaven of angels" is their abode in some of the stars. Hence they are styled "the Morning Stars;" but which of the heavenly bodies is not testified; therefore I cannot tell. Paul's body could have been taken any where God pleased; but, as I have said, it, that is, he never left the earth. He was wrapt in vision unconscious of where he was.

5. In his argument with the Sadducees, Jesus meant to prove the resurrection of the dead from Moses' writings; and he did prove it triumphantly. He does not even hint, much less affirm, that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob "are already risen." He said, "that the dead are raised even Moses has shewn at the bush, when he called the Lord the God of Abraham, etc.;" that is to say, "that there is to be a resurrection of the dead, Moses teaches in calling Jehovah Abraham's God." How so? Because Jehovah is not a God of dead men. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are dead men; therefore, for Jehovah to become their God they must become living men; for Jehovah is a God of the living, not of the dead. Hence their resurrection is necessitated, as that is the only way in which the dead can become living. This being so, He is called the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, while they are actually dead, "because they all live to him" in the sense of rising from the dead to live; for "God who makes alive the dead, calls ta me onta things not existing as though they were" (Romans 4:17). The Lord of glory dealt not in "catches" nor "dishonesty;" these are the weapons of spirit-mongers, and of those who have more respect for the foolishness of men, than the words of the living God.

QUERY.

Jehovah, by the prophet Ezekiel, declares that the kingdom of Israel shall be an overturned kingdom until He (Christ) receives it whose right it is. It is evident, therefore, that the kingdom promised to David's Son and Lord is a kingdom once existent, but afterwards in ruins. But the sky-kingdomers say, that Christ is now in possession of the promised kingdom. Will they be kind enough to inform us, if it was an overturned kingdom till the epoch of Christ's assumption? We wait for a reply, but "guess" we shall wait in vain!

CRITICISM.

“LORD, WILT THOU AT THIS TIME RESTORE AGAIN THE KINGDOM TO ISRAEL.”

Edinburgh, Scotland, June 11th, 1852.

Dr. Thomas:

Dear Sir—I have been requested to extract the following from Dunbar’s Greek and English Lexicon, to be sent for your consideration. He says in his preface, “I need offer no apology for endeavouring to explain several passages in the Greek Testament. I have taken a different view of them from our translators, and all the commentators that I have had an opportunity of consulting. Some of them submitted to distinguished scholars have met with their approbation. I would particularly refer to the observations on Acts 1: 6, and James 2: 1.” His observations on the former passage are the following: “The verb apokathistano occurs in Acts 1: 6, “Kyrie, ei en to chrono touto apokathistancis teen basileian to Israel?”—‘Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the Kingdom to Israel?’ as if apokathistaneis were the future of the verb. Dr. Bloomfield, in a note on the passage says, “Some explain ei by num; others by anon. The former may be considered a more accurate version. The idea seems to have arisen from the blending the oratio directa with the indirecta. I have great doubts if ei in an interrogative sentence ever signifies either num or anon. The interrogative particle ee may be so rendered, but not ei. I apprehend the meaning of the passage is generally misunderstood. It is evident that the Apostles were still looking forward to a temporal sovereignty to be established by our Lord; and that they expected to receive from him offices of power and authority in it. This, I think, is evident from the answer returned by our Saviour: the first part of which has reference to the time when the Kingdom of Israel was to be restored, which, he says, “the Father retained in his own power;” the other to the kind of power which they should receive. Their aspiring thoughts after temporal power had been formerly checked, and their views directed to a heavenly kingdom. These thoughts had again revived after his resurrection from the dead. Still, however, they were fearful of putting the question in a direct manner, but had recourse to a supposition evidently implying, in their own minds the certainty of the event, leaving it to be understood what was their real aim. There is, therefore, an apostopesis in the expression, which our Lord perfectly understood. Supposing this to be the case, the words may be thus translated, “Lord, if at this time thou art engaged in restoring the kingdom to Israel?” The object they had in view, but which they were afraid to name openly, may be thus expressed, tina dynamin en autee leep sometha? What power shall we have in it? Our Lord replied, “alla leepsesthe dynamin epelthontos tou hagion pneumatos eph’ hymas.” There is a similar apostopeesis in a conditional statement with ei in Philippians 1: 22. See Dr. Bloomfield’s Note on the verse.”

I remain, in haste, yours,

J. CAMERON, Junr.

SOMETHING ANNIHILATED BY NOTHING.

“God hath chosen things that are not, to bring to nought things that are: that no flesh should glory in his presence.”—PAUL.

I am much obliged to Mr. Cameron for the above copy; and as the best acknowledgment I can make for the trouble he has taken, I will offer a few remarks upon its contents.

No doubt there is ample scope for views of passages in the Greek New Testament different from any yet presented by translators and commentators, the most highly esteemed in the theological world. But whether Mr. Dunbar has juster ideas than they off the true import of those passages, I am not prepared to admit, if Dr. Bloomfield's criticism on Acts 1: 6, be endorsed by him as a specimen of his own. Dr. Bloomfield ranks as a distinguished scholar, profoundly skilled in Greek; but, deep though he be in human lore, his apostopesian critique proves him to be, like all other State-Bishops, a very shallow divine. If Mr. Dunbar approve the criticism, I can make no exception in his favour; but am strengthened in the conclusion to which I have been led by observation, that no philologist, however skilled in Hebrew and Greek, is competent to render a critical and accurate version of the scriptures, who is ignorant of the true import off the sure word of prophecy. This is illustrated by the case before us. Dr. Bloomfield is a spiritualist; and therefore infidel of what his class terms, the "temporal," which is the only kingdom of God promised to Jesus and his brethren. Spiritualists use the word temporal in contradistinction to spiritual. A temporal kingdom with them is a veritable kingdom on earth, existing in time, as Victoria's, or Otho's, exists; while by a spiritual kingdom they understand a reign of evangelical principles in the hearts of men. Hence, they style the existing church of Christ as defined by them, his spiritual kingdom, and the only one he will ever have on earth; his everlasting and glorious kingdom being the receptacle of disembodied spirits among the stars. The apostles, as Dr. Bloomfield admits, looked forward with certainty to the establishment of a veritable kingdom in the Holy Land, even the kingdom which had once been possessed by Israel. The Bishop assumes that the apostles were altogether mistaken. Mr. Dunbar also, by invoking the doctor's criticism, seems to participate with him in this assumption. But there is nothing in the text or context, nor in the Old or New, Testaments, to justify it. They can adduce no testimony to convict the apostles of error; therefore, as the only resource, they rack their ingenuity in the treatment of Greek particles and tenses, to fetch out such "a supposition" as will give their spiritualism the benefit of a doubt in its assumption and implication against the "temporal sovereignty" in which the apostles so firmly believed. If the critics understood and believed the prophets, we should have heard nothing off their apostopesis; but being ignorant of "the gospel of the kingdom" testified by them, Messrs. Bloomfield and Dunbar have entertained us with an hypothesis upon ei; which, we were almost tempted to add, "is all my eye," and so forth.

Mr. Dunbar takes exception to the rendering of apokathistaneis by the future sign of the verb; as thou wilt restore again. It is true that apokathistaneis is of the present tense active; and should be, independently of position, thou restorest, or dost restore again. Suppressing the note of interrogation, and rejecting the ei, the question proposed affirmed the conviction of the apostles' minds; as "Lord, in this time thou dost restore again the Kingdom to Israel." From this it is clear, that they regarded the restoration as a future event; and that when it should come to pass, Jesus, the Lord, would be the Restorer. This, it is admitted by Dr. Bloomfield, was their certain conviction. Hence, though the verb is in the present, the facts of the case and the conviction of the inquirers, convert the present into the future, and fully justify the king's translators in rendering apokathistaneis by the words thou wilt restore again—thou dost restore again, and, thou wilt restore again, are evidently equivalent, especially under the circumstances of the case.

The representation of the present tense by the future is a notable occurrence in the Hebrew; and will excite no astonishment when it is understood, that Hebrew verbs have only past and future tenses. They have no present tense to their moods. Thou restorest again, though represented by the present of the Greek verb, is obviously a future action; and therefore, Hebraistically, in the future tense; so that, had the question been written in Hebrew, it would either have been expressed by the past, converted into the future by wav conversive, or by the future absolute. Mr. Dunbar, then, is welcome to all he can make out of the discovery, that apokathistaneis is of the present, and not the future, of the Greek verb. It does not strengthen the spiritualist assumption an iota.

Messrs. Bloomfield and Dunbar admit that apokathistaneis occurs interrogatively. I would ask then, what word in the sentence converts it into an interrogative? There is but one, and that is this same particle ei. And yet Dr. Bloomfield says, "I have great doubts if ei in an interrogative sentence, ever signifies either num or anon." For the English reader it may be remarked, that num is a Latin adverb, generally used in interrogations to which a negative answer is expected. If ei were rendered by num the question would be, “Lord, what? Dost thou in this time restore again the Kingdom to Israel?” The inquiry put in this form would imply incredulous astonishment; as if the apostles should have said, “Lord, is it possible that you are going to restore the kingdom to Israel now: surely not?” Ei cannot be taken in this sense, certainly; for the admitted mentality of the apostles forbids it. The idea of restoration did not astonish them; and believing that the time thereof was come, they sought confirmation of their conviction from the declaration of the Lord. But though ei may not signify num in the sense of an expected negation, it may still be regarded as an untranslatable interrogative particle; that is, a particle introduced into the sentence to transform it from an affirmative into a simple interrogative, just as it stands in the Common Version, untranslated except by the note of interrogation. I do not doubt that ei represented to the ear in speech, what “?” represents to the eye. In this sense, it is fairly expressed by anon, or an; as abiit, he is gone; an abiit, is he gone? So apokathistaneis, thou dost restore; ei apokathistaneis, dost thou restore? Dr. Bloomfield does not consider ei an interrogative particle at all; but merely a particle “in an interrogative sentence;” and therefore not representable by num and anon, which are interrogative particles; though in opposition to ei, he patronises ee, which he says is interrogative. His words are, “the interrogative ee may be so rendered (by num or anon) but not *ei.” In the sentence before this, he says, he has “great doubts” about ei; and immediately after he has no doubts at all, asserting positively that ei may not be rendered interrogatively.

But the translators of the Common Version say, that ei is an interrogative particle, and is to be rendered as such; for they treat it after this view. If the question had been taken out of the verse where it exists, and, deprived of the note of interrogation, presented to them, they would have known it to be a question, because of the interrogative particle ei; but Dr. Bloomfield would not, not knowing the nature of it. He only knows the sentence to be interrogative from the words, “they asked of him, saying, Lord, wilt thou, &c.” His opinion about ei is therefore mere speculation. But for the context he would not know if ei were in an interrogative sentence, or not. But with all his doubts, he thinks num a more accurate version of ei than anon; because num is more favourable to the apostopeesis he seeks to establish from a context of his own fabrication.

Having got rid of ei as an interrogative particle to his own satisfaction, if not to ours, he then proceeds to lay the foundation of a theory which is intended to afford aid and comfort to spiritualism, by reducing the apostolic question to nonsense.

He begins the work by intimating that “the meaning of the passage is generally misunderstood.” This general misunderstanding is, that the apostles meant what is obviously expressed in their question; an idea he attributes to “the blending of the oratio directa with the indirecta.” The transition from what is styled the oratio indirecta to the oratio directa occurs in the fourth verse. Thus, the indirect discourse is supposed to refer to the Kingdom of God, about which Jesus had been conversing with his apostles for forty days after his resurrection; and the direct to the baptism of the Holy Spirit. But the reverse is the fact; for the fourth and fifth verses come in incidentally between the third and sixth. The oratio directa is,

“Jesus being seen of them forty days, and speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God; they asked of him, saying, Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?”

But Jesus not prepared to satisfy them on the subject, turns their attention to the work they had soon to engage in when they should be duly qualified. In doing this, he finished his conferences with them about the kingdom with the oratio indirecta about the gift of the spirit, introduced by Luke in the place referred to. They do not seem to have expected that the Lord would be taken from them; but concluded that, as they were to be endued with power from on high, it was for the purpose of cooperating with him at that time in the restoration of the kingdom Israel had once possessed. Hence the reason why they put the question to him. Dr. Bloomfield admits that the apostles were looking for the establishment of this temporal sovereignty, under which they should be promoted to power and authority; but extracts from the Lord’s reply, that the kingdom was a heavenly one, in the spiritualist sense; and the power to be received the gift of the Holy Spirit. But Jesus said nothing about “a heavenly kingdom.” He declined to tell them the time when the kingdom should be restored to Israel; and made no allusion to “the kind of power” they should receive under its sovereignty; neither did they ask concerning it.

It is amusing to hear a State-Church Bishop speaking with pious flippancy about “the aspiring thoughts of the apostles after temporal power,” which the Lord had checked on a former occasion! If it be quite compatible with the fitness of things that “Christian Bishops” should be lords, live in palaces, make laws for nations, and shine in the courts of royalty; why not for the apostles, their alleged predecessors, to reign with “the King of the Jews” as “kings and priests” over Israel and the nations? Are Jesus and his apostles to be excluded from all power, authority, glory, and honour, among nations upon earth; in other words, maltreated and tormented here, and exiled by violence of men as pestilent fellows to “the spirit-world,” as the only condition compatible with the spirituality of their doctrine: while their pretended “successors” may figure as the honourable of the earth, possessing power over the nations now, ruling them with an iron-rod; and, having waxed fat with all the good things of the present world, join the redeemed company among the stars, and rejoice in glory and honour for ever? Is this the nature, genius, and character of Christianity? Yea, verily; it is of the natural religion so styled of spiritualists: but not of the religion of Christ. Those who have power and authority under existing temporal sovereignties, will have no more of them under Christ’s reign, than Jesus and the apostles have now. The Day of Christ and the Night of Antichrist are rival and hostile periods. Antichrist’s time is now—a period in which Sin and Evil are triumphant; and during which Jesus and his brethren are excluded from their rights, and made the pious sport of learned fools. Antichrist’s is the Duomillennial reign of Spiritualism—a sort of Fools’ Paradise, in which “the thinking of the flesh” revels in all the delights of self-deception, and devotion to its own conceits. For Jesus and his apostles to be supposed to have been anything but spiritualists—to have had a looking forward to temporalities—excites all the contempt latent in those who now possess them. Like the old Pharisees, they have a misgiving that, if Jesus and his brethren lay hold of “temporal sovereignty,” there will be no chance for them. Hence they hate the doctrine; and charge the apostles with ignorance, and unjustifiably ambition, for entertaining so unheavenly an idea! But the times will soon be changed, and the order of things reversed. The Day of Christ, when the apostles' expectation expressed in their question will be realised, is at hand; a day of justice and intelligence, of peace and blessing, which will dawn upon the world like the rising sun, shining into oblivion all word-corrupting "suppositions," and superstitions; and exhibiting to mankind the nakedness and shame of the "wise and prudent" who propound them.

Among these, it cannot be doubted, will be numbered the patentees of the Bloomfield apostopoesian supposition, so craftily and sophistically exhibited in the document in hand. One might imagine, from Dr. Bloomfield's representation, that the apostles in the presence of Jesus, were like so many parish beadles in the presence of the Pope, or the lordly Archbishop of Canterbury, trembling before these sons of pride. There is not the least evidence from the passage that there was any fearfulness about the apostles at all. Forty days familiarity with the Lord after his resurrection had fully reassured them. Their timidity had all vanished when they found he was no phantasm; but "the Lord the Spirit"—a substantial, flesh-and-bones, person like themselves, only incorruptible and deathless, whom they handled, ate, drank, and conversed with as their Elder Brother. Dr. Bloomfield's apostopoesian supposition is based upon their assumed timidity. "They were fearful," says he, "of putting the question in a direct manner, but had recourse to a supposition evidently implying, in their own minds, the certainty of the event, leaving it to be understood what was their real aim." This is mere fiction, as any one unspoiled by a spurious criticism, may see by reading the account. The timidity not existing, there is no scope for the conversion of ei into a suppositious "if," as though they inclined their heads obliquely downwards, and leered archly at Jesus from the corners of their eyes, and in a subdued and timid tone, said, "Lord, if at this time thou art engaged in restoring the kingdom to Israel, wouldn't it be nice!" Ridiculous! Why Dr. Bloomfield must think they were a set of craven-spirited bishops, fishing for court favours at the hands of royalty! Edging on the king, as it were, to an enterprise in which they would come in for a considerable share of the loaves and fishes. Removing the note of interrogation, and converting the bishop's rendering into an affirmative declaration, because of the present tense of the verb, it reads, "Lord, thou art at this time engaged in restoring the kingdom to Israel.” This affirms an untruth. Throw in the ei, and the text is converted into the hortatory hypothesis, “Lord, suppose thou art at this time engaged in restoring the kingdom to Israel.” This was calling upon Jesus for an impossibility; for being perfectly sane and conscious, he could not suppose he was doing what he well knew he was not engaged in. But if ei be admitted to be an interrogative as well as hypothetic (which interrogative quality Dr. B. greatly doubts, and then denies) the sentence becomes interrogatively suggestive, as, “Lord! Suppose at this time thou art engaged in restoring the kingdom to Israel?” Although the sentence is very much enfeebled by Dr. B’s rendering of apokathistaneis, it is equivalent to, “Lord we expect the kingdom to be restored again to Israel, wilt thou not engage in the work at this time?” This is equivalent to the common reading. There is no figure of rhetoric in the passage. It is a plain, straightforward, common sense, question, growing out of the forty days’ converse on the kingdom of God. The figures are all in the critics’ brains, which are so full of a spurious rhetoric, that they can see nothing in its obvious and unsophistic reality. “Thou art engaged in restoring” is a very verbose rendering of apokathistaneis, which is correctly enough translated thou restorest, or thou dost restore; but the verbosity is created to make the timid indirection of the apostles more supposable.

Dr. Bloomfield says, that in putting this question as he has rendered it, “the object the apostles had in view, but which they were afraid to name openly, may be thus expressed—tina dynamin en autee teepsometha—What power shall we have in it?” He then represents Jesus as replying to this question in the words, “but ye shall receive power, the Holy Spirit coming upon you!” What a wonderful thing is an apostopesis! Surely it is a sort of philosopher’s stone in its way, turning O into X, though in the nature of things having not the least resemblance to each other. “Lord, restorest thou at this time the kingdom to Israel?”—means, according to Dr. B., “Lord, what power shall we have in the kingdom?!” Dr. B., as “a Right Reverend Bishop,” and communicator of the Holy Spirit to college candidates for “Holy Orders,” ought to know, that the apostles knew what power and authority they were to have in the kingdom; and therefore needed not to seek any information of the kind. They had inquired through Peter, what was to be their reward for forsaking all they possessed on earth, and following Him. Jesus told them without any apostrophe, that they should have power and authority as immortal kings over Israel when the kingdom should be palingenized, or renewed; as it is written,

*“In the new-birth day (of the nation) when the Son of Man may have sat upon the throne of his glory, ye shall also sit upon twelve thrones, ruling the Twelve tribes of Israel * * * and shall inherit eternal life”*—Matthew 19: 28-29.

Then again,

“Fear not little flock, it is the Father’s good pleasure to give you the kingdom.”

And when he was about to suffer he repeated the promise, saying,

“Even I am covenanted for you, since my Father has himself covenanted a kingdom for me, that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit upon thrones ruling the Twelve Tribes of Israel”—Luke 22: 29-30.

After these plain, unfigurative, declarations before the crucifixion, the apostles were at no loss to know “the kind of power” they were to exercise in the restored kingdom. It was this very knowledge that prompted them to inquire of Jesus, whether the time had now come to fulfil his promise to them, seeing that he was now risen from the dead, and all authority (exousia) was his. He did not evade their question, but replied directly to the point. He did not give the remotest hint that the restoration was not to occur. He knew it would, and that He, being the Christ, would have to do the work; as it is written in the prophets,

“The many with thee shall build; the ancient ruins of past generations thou shalt raise up; and thou shalt be called, THE BUILDER of the breach, THE RESTORER of by-ways to rest in:” # and, “Jehovah hath formed Me from the womb to be his *Servant to bring Jacob again to him * * * to raise up the Tribes of Jacob, and to restore the branches of Israel” * * * to be “for a Covenant of the people to restore the land, and cause to possess the desolate estates”—Isaiah 49: 5-6, 8.*

Therefore,

“In that day, I will restore (ahkim) David’s dwelling place that is fallen; and I will wall up its breaches; and I will restore its ruins, and make it a city (benithah) as in the days of old: for the purpose of possessing the survivors of Edom, and all the nations where my name was proclaimed, saith Jehovah, who doeth this”—Amos 9: 1-12.

Jesus and his apostles understood these things, and one another when they conversed upon them; which “right reverend” and “reverend” philologists do not. There was nothing reprehensible in the inquiry about the time, nor in their desiring to be put in possession of the honour and glory of the kingdom. The Lord was no doubt as gratified at the interest they took in the restoration, as he would be grieved, if now on earth, to see the apathy, indifference, and infidelity respecting it, manifested by “the pious,” who profess to be his disciples. He sent out his apostles to infuse into mankind an aspiring disposition; a high ambition, which would be satisfied with nothing short of equality with the angels, and joint-heirship with God’s own Son. He ordered them to invite men to his kingdom and glory. Aspiration after these is quite compatible with peacefulness and humility among themselves, benevolence to their enemies, and faithfulness and meekness before God.

Isaiah 58: 12. —Nethivoth lah-shahveth, by-ways for resting; that is, the country made so safe for travellers that they may, without danger, traverse the by-ways leading to resting places.

The scriptures justify us in saying, that at the time the apostles put the question, the Lord was unable to fix the time of restoration. In his rejoinder, he tells them plainly that the Father was the sole depository of the secret.

“The times and the seasons of the restitution,” says he, “the Father hath retained in his own power.”

Before the restoration of the kingdom to Israel could take place, Daniel’s prophecy of the destruction of the city and temple, and of the people off the Holy Ones, by the Lord’s army of Romans—Daniel 9: 26; 8: 24, had to be accomplished. This was the passing away of the heaven and earth constituted by the Mosaic law, in the generation contemporary with Jesus and the apostles; a dissolution and vanishment necessarily to precede the setting up of the “new heavens and earth in which dwells righteousness”—a constitution under which “Jerusalem shall be created a rejoicing, and her people a joy,” in every land where formerly they had been put to shame—2 Peter 3: 13; Isaiah 65: 17-18; Zephaniah 3: 19. Referring to this day of vengeance on Judah and Jerusalem, of which he spoke in his Olivetan prophecy, Jesus said,

“Of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels who are in heaven; neither the Son, but the Father. Take ye heed, watch and pray: for ye know not when the time is”—Mark 13: 32-33.

Jesus knew the order of events, but he did not then know the time of them. He knew that the coming of the Son of Man to destroy and take vengeance, was to precede his appearing as King in his glory to build up Zion—Psalm 102; 16—and to redeem Israel; but the times and the seasons he did not know, as he avers; and therefore, he could only tell the apostles that they had asked him for information he could not impart.

He could inform them, however, so much as this, that whenever the restoration off the kingdom might happen they had a work to do before it could come to pass. The kingdom would require “a people” to administer its affairs righteously—a necessity, which makes it impossible, therefore, that the unrighteous can inherit it—1 Corinthians 6: 9; Ephesians 5: 5. It would be their business, therefore, to collect this people together out of Judah and the nations—Acts 15: 14—by the proclamation of the gospel of the kingdom in his name, witnessing to him, that He is the man ordained of God to rule the world with them in righteousness. He knew they were unable of their own ability to make this proclamation to the nations, being ignorant of their several languages; and moreover, had they been able to speak all tongues, their proclamation would not have been regarded, as they were devoid of power to prove that they were heralds sent of God, and that the word they preached was his message to the world. Till the Day of Pentecost, then, they were powerless to execute the work of announcing the good news to every creature. “Tarry ye therefore in the city of Jerusalem,” said he, “until ye be endued with power from on high”—Luke 24: 49, by the Holy Spirit coming upon you—Acts 1: 8. They obeyed; and from the history of that notable day, we find that they became fully equipped on the reception of the Spirit, for the work of faith and labour of love before them; a faithful performance of which is to be rewarded by exaltation to the thrones in Israel, when the kingdom is restored to them in the palingenesia, or “times of restoration (apoktastaseos, a word of the same family as apokathistaneis) of all things”—Acts 3: 21, 25—pertaining to the nation.

But I need add only a few more words at present. A little scripture testimony, intelligently applied, is worth a library of spiritualism, with all its rhetoric, logic, and classic lore, to boot. These things, useful enough in their way, become in the hands of those who “grind divinity” for the multitude, the means of “darkening counsel by words without knowledge.” Dr. Bloomfield ranks as the most accomplished Greek scholar of his age. But for his skill in Greek, it is probable, he would never have been heard of. His ability to translate a Greek MS. which had foiled some “learned divines” caused his introduction to Earl Spencer, whose patronage eventually helped him to the Right Reverend Father-in-Godship of “London’s famous town.” But of what value is his Greek for scripture criticism while ignorant of the prophets? It is positively injurious. A single testimony from these upsets his whole hypothesis. A mere professor of heathen Greek undertakes to define the apostopeses of the New Testament, the idea is preposterous! There are many points there on which the apostles “keep silence;” but where the meaning cannot be gathered from the context. In this case it can only be collected from Moses and the Prophets. Let, then, a Gentile bishop or professor, with his pagan Greek, who is ignorant of the “sure word of prophecy,” undertake to interpret the apostolic silence by suppositions, and criticisms on particles, does the reader imagine he would be enlightened by the effort? Nay, it would only make darkness visible, as in the case before us. Criticism on Greek particles is no sufficient substitute for the prophetic testimony. Nothing can supply the lack of this in the interpretation of the New Testament. It is the pagan criticism off the unlearned in the prophets, that is the parent of spiritualism; and that wrests the scriptures to the destruction of the critics, and of them who heed them. There is much written at the present time, in this country, about giving the people a faithful and thorough translation of the Bible! I would like to know the man of this generation, who, being ignorant of the prophets, could do it. If he could, then he must have received spiritual gifts, as the word of knowledge, the word of wisdom, and the gift of tongues. He would then be qualified to translate by inspiration; but in default of these gifts, and a correct understanding of the prophetic word, there exists on earth no man that can accurately transfer the mind of God from Hebrew and Greek into his mother tongue. All translations, therefore, are of necessity more or less imperfect, owing not so much to ignorance of the language (though of this there is no little in the best of scholars as their controversies prove) as to stolid imbecility in the teaching of the prophets. The agitation, therefore, about a new and thorough translation of the word, is much ado about nothing; for if accomplished in the spiritualist sense, it will only be a monument of complacent foolishness, demonstrative of the presumption off the carnal mind, whose ethereal speculations are subversive of the truth of God. Let us, then, eschew the Grecian critics and their spiritualism; and take heed to the prophetic light that shines from the vernacular lamp, imperfect as it is. The light is brilliant enough to show us the divine purpose, and our interest in it; and to show us how we may obtain inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God; when they shall have seized upon the temporal sovereignties of the world; and have bestowed the spoils of the enemy upon the apostles, and on them who believe on Jesus through their teaching. In hope of a speedy fruition of this expectation, we conclude this article with the kindest feelings and best wishes for all concerned.

That diabolos, rendered devil in the Common Version, is SIN, appears from the expressions of Paul in various parts of his writings. He says “*that having the power of death is diabolos.” The power of death is that which causes death. In a venomous serpent the to kratos, or power of death, is in its fang or sting. Remove this, and the most deadly reptile is perfectly innocuous. It has lost its power, not of locomotion, but of inflicting death. So if the power that makes death work strongly within us could be removed, we should never die. It is that power Paul styles diabolos. It is not death but the death-producing power, which is in every man, young and old, saint and sinner; therefore diabolos is in every human being.

Having ascertained, then, that the power of death resides in diabolos, if we can ascertain what is the death-power, we at the same time learn who or what diabolos is. Let us then, ask Paul a few questions. Thus, “Venerable Brother, you have said that diabolos hath the power of death, will you kindly inform us, what that power is?”—Readily. It is death’s sting; and that sting is SIN, which is strengthened in its workings by the law of God, which is contrary to it—1 Corinthians 15: 55-56. —“Why do you triumphantly inquire, “O death where is thy sting?”—Because, in speaking of the mortal and corruptible body common to all the saints, putting on incorruptibility and life, I saw that the sin in our flesh, which stings us to death, would be extracted, and the body consequently healed; and that, although we had been severely wounded in the heel, so to speak, we should recover and so cheat death of many victims. In other words, in the case of Christ’s brethren, they would get the victory over him, and verify the saying, “Death is swallowed up in victory.”—“You have said that “the body is mortal because of sin”—Romans 8: 10-11, pray how does the body get quit of this deadly principle, so as to be pronounced victorious over death?”—In two ways according to the believers acted upon; first, by dissolution into dust, and reorganisation thereof into body incapable of decay; and made to live by the creative Spirit of God in the hands of the Lord Jesus. This is resurrection. And secondly, by an instantaneous change wrought in living flesh and blood by the energy of the Spirit which will destroy the Sin-power, or sting, which gives place to that which hath the power of life, that is, the Spirit. This is transformation. —“But if the Spirit have the power of life, how is it that Jesus styles himself “the life?”—And so he is;

“For as the Father hath life in himself, so he gives also to the Son to have life in himself”—John 5: 26.

The Spirit, which “imparts life because of righteousness,” is placed at the Lord’s disposal “that he should give eternal life to as many as God has given him”—John 17: 2. The spirit-life, therefore, of the Saints is hid with Christ in God; and when he who is their life shall appear, then shall they appear with him in glory—Colossians 3: 3-4.

“Sin in the flesh,” then, and the Spirit of God, are the two antagonist principles to which human nature is amenable in the present and future states. The former hath the power of death, and is termed diabolos; the latter hath the power of life, and is styled “the Lord the Spirit”—2 Corinthians 3: 18; 1 Corinthians 15: 45.

Human nature is styled “sinful flesh”—Romans 8: 3, that is flesh full of sin; and Paul speaking of himself as sharing therein, says,

“In me, that is, in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing”—Romans 7: 18. Sin in the flesh, then, is a very evil thing. It is that principle which works within us what is not good in thought and feeling; and these workings, the apostle styles “the motions of sins”—ta patheemeta toon hamartioon—the physical and mental emotions which when yielded to work transgressions of the law of God. So that when a man is tempted, he is not tempted of God, nor of such a monster as the gentile Devil; but as the apostle says, “Every man is tempted, when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed. Then when lust hath conceived, it will bring forth sin: and sin, when it is perfected, bringeth forth death”—James 1: 14-15.

This is the philosophy of temptation, so to speak. Man is made up of certain desires. He desires what he sees, hears, feels, tastes and smells; in other words, he desires the gratification of his senses. There is nothing essentially evil in this. The evil lies in their inordinate gratification. Now, between the ordinate or regular, and inordinate or excessive, God has placed his law. He has said, you may desire, but you may not inordinately desire; or if you do, you may not gratify that desire contrary to my law, under penalty of death. Abstractly, there was no harm in picking up sticks on Saturday; but when God said “thou shalt do no manner of work on the seventh day,” this absolute harmless thing, became a high crime against heaven; and brought forth death to him who perfected the desire to gather on that day. Thus the divine law defines what is irregular, and therefore not to be done by those who would enjoy the favour of God.

Now, if God had given no law to his people (and he has given law to none else) they would not have known what he deemed regular and what excessive, what right or what wrong. In truth, there would have been no such distinction. There would have been neither virtue nor vice; and the only course would have been for a man to follow his instincts. In this there would have been no sin; because “sin is the transgression of law;” and where there is no law there can be no transgression. Had the Lord God not forbidden to eat, there would have been no sin in Adam’s eating of the fruit of the Tree of the Knowledge of good and evil. The pleasantness of the fruit in Eve’s sight, the appreciation of its goodness for food, and a desire to be as wise as the gods or Elohim, were things in harmony with the nature God had given them and which he had pronounced “very good:” but when he said, “Ye shall not touch the tree under penalty of death,” there was a law given that made the gratification of that nature sin. Hence, it was as true of them as of the apostle, who says,

“I had not known sin, but by the law: for I have not known lust (inordinate desire) except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet.”

They coveted, being enticed by their own lust, which drew them away from the Eden-law. The desire to eat was conceived within them, by the suggestion from without setting the flesh to think and reason without subjection to the given law. The thinking and reasoning in harmony with their nature alone, was sophistry; and led them to conclusions in direct opposition to the divine law: had they allowed the commandment to guide their reasoning, they would have reasoned logically; and God’s thoughts and ways would have been approved, and cheerfully acquiesced in. But the reverse of this was the fact; and sophistry led them in the way of death, as it has all their posterity ever since.

“By the law is the knowledge of sin;” therefore those who are ignorant of the law, do not know when they sin. This is the case of those “without law;” who are consequently under “times of ignorance.” Nevertheless, they sin, though they know it not; and sin and ignorance work death, and “alienation from God’s life”—Ephesians 4: 18; for “the wages of sin is death,” and renewal unto life is by knowledge—Colossians 3: 10. Thus, sin had the power of death in Adam’s case, and in that of all his descendants. There was no sin in the terrestrial system till he eat. The serpent could not sin, because no law was given to it; and where there is no law there is no sin, and can be none. Sin entered the world not by the Serpent, but by Adam; as it is written,

“Sin entered into the world by one man, and death by sin; and so death penetrated into all men, because in him all sinned”— Romans 5: 12.

Adam’s nature was animal. Very good of its kind, as was the nature of all the other creatures. These did not sin, yet they returned to the dust whence they came. So probably would Adam, if he had been left to the ordinary course of things as they were. But he would not have returned to dust if he had continued obedient. He would doubtless have been “changed in the twinkling of an eye” on eating of the Tree of Life. But, being disobedient, his sin determined his fate, and that of the creatures. It doomed them all to death according to law, and “nature” unchanged was permitted to take its course. This sin became the death-power; for had there been no sin there would have been no death. Though death could have ensued without sin, it would not have been permitted to do so; but desire being conceived for an unlawful object, this unlawful desire enticed to a forbidden action; the enticement was yielded to, and shame and fear, the evidences of guilt, resulted. Thus a new mode of thought, the sophistry of sin, took possession of human nature, and caused it to fall. Sin reigned, and Adam obeyed it in the lusts of his body, yielding his members instruments of unrighteousness to sin. The sophisticated thinking of the flesh gained strength, and became in him and his posterity the rule or law of their nature. This is termed in scripture "the law of sin;" the presence of which, within him, every man may know by the passions, or "motions of sins," at work there to bring forth fruit unto death. Because of this, it is also styled "the law of sin and death," to which the flesh of humanity is subject. Cain was conceived under the activity of this law of nature; hence he is said to have been, ek tou poneerou, from the evil, that is, from sin. This was his origin. Had he been begotten before that tempest arose in his parent's nature which caused them to fall, he would not have been a murderer. But like produces like, and sin in activity produces pre-eminent sinners. The storm of passion had subsided, and a repentant mind had been established, ere Abel was conceived. When he was born, he was welcomed as "from the Lord," and though born of sinful flesh, he did not derive his origin under the impulses of transgression, but in parental reconciliation to the divine law. Thus, these two sons were the one from the evil, the other from the good; that is, of the devil, and of the Lord.

The word sin is used in two senses; first, to represent that combination of principles within us which in excitation is manifested in passion, evil affections of the mind, diseases, death and corruption. They are called sin, because their manifestation was permitted as the consequence of transgression. And this is the second sense of the word; as it is written, "sin is the transgression of law." Transgression was the effect of the unbridled inworking of humanity; and when the transgression was complete, or "finished," that inworking and its result were both styled sin.

This unbridled inworking yielded to is licentiousness, and excessively deteriorating to flesh and blood. It degenerates the human organization, and produces what is observed in the barbarous, and savage races of mankind. Man left to himself can never improve; but must always get worse and worse, because his nature is subject to "the law of sin and death," which is degenerating in its operation. The only real antagonist to this law is divine truth—"the word of the truth of the gospel of the kingdom." If this can be made to take root in a man's heart, it becomes there a rule of thought and action, incessantly antagonising "the law of sin." This rule is termed "the law of the Spirit of life." Between these two laws there is a deadly enmity; for "the law of the Spirit of life" is "the law of God;" and the other law, the law of sin, is rebellion against it. God's law is from without; sin's law is born in us. The law of God is implanted by reasoning the mind into conviction of his testimony alleged. It is the gospel transferred from the prophets and apostles to the believer's heart; and is contrary in every particular to "the thinking of the flesh," which is sin thinking within us. Now men the least fleshly can understand these things best. Hence Paul was well skilled in the matter. "I find," says he, "a law that when I would do good, evil is present with me. For I delight in the law of God according to the inward man"—the "new creature" formed within him by God's knowledge: "but I see another law in my members"—the law of sin "warring against the law of my mind"—the law of the Spirit—"and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members." A man in whom the truth has no place cannot understand this; because he is subject to only one of these laws, namely, the law of sin and death. His experience, and that of the apostle does not agree. It is only the true believer can sympathise with the apostle—he in whom the truth is most active; he can discern the evil of his nature most acutely. It is such a man can exclaim with Paul, "O wretched man that I am! Who shall deliver me from the body of this death"—from this law of sin and death to which my body is subject? There is but one that can deliver, even Jesus Christ the Lord, who partook of flesh and blood that through death he might destroy this law of sin and death from the body, that is, diabolos. Paul fully aware of this, therefore, thanks God in prospect of it. And there he leaves it in the patience of hope, continuing "for his mind" (the mode of thinking erected within him by the truth as opposed to the unenlightened thinking of the flesh) subject to the law of God; but for the flesh to the law of sin." This is the wretchedness of our case, that, however, approved of God for character, our flesh, because still subject to "the law of sin," or "law of nature," in the language of "philosophy," is still burdened by that innate power, or diabolos, which reduces us to death, corruption, and dust.

But, how does Jesus through his own death destroy the devil? I could not answer this question if by "devil" is to be understood the Gentile Devil. But the devil Paul refers to in Hebrews is "that having the power of death," which we have seen is Sin. The question therefore is How does Jesus through his own death destroy Sin? By making his life-blood an offering for sin, which offering is perfected by his resurrection; as it is written, “he was delivered for our offences, and raised again for our justification.” Now this sacrifice of Jesus becomes sin-destroying in every one who believes the gospel of the kingdom preached in his name; and is sprinkled with his blood in being baptised into him. All the past sins of such a believer are cancelled, or forgiven; and there is engrafted in him a principle, even the word believed, called “the law of the Spirit of life,” which in the remission has “made him free from the law of sin and death;” so that sin no longer reigns in his mortal body that he should obey it in the lusts thereof. He is “made free from sin” as the sovereign of his mind and actions; and has become the servant of God, whose will it is his study to learn and obey in all things; thus bringing forth fruit unto holiness, the end of which is everlasting life, when he shall be planted in the likeness of the resurrection of Jesus Christ. Such a resurrected man is like Jesus, incorruptible and immortal. The power of death is no longer in him; but thoroughly eradicated from his nature, which is now “equal to the angels:” and as he is then, so will all the brethren of Jesus be, freed from diabolos, and therefore subject unto death no more.

But though at the resurrection of the just diabolos be destroyed to this extent, it is still strong and rampant in the rest of mankind; and consequently has then yet to be eradicated from among them: for it is Christ’s mission to destroy diabolos* and the works thereof, in other words, to take away the sin of the world. This is his honour as the result of his obedience unto death. The first part of the work is to restrain sin, apocalyptically styled binding the Dragon, the old Serpent; who is designated also by the words diabolos and satanas; the former being rendered devil; and the latter left untranslated. The last part of the enterprise is to destroy sin; so that thenceforth there shall not exist upon the earth a single man having diabolos, or “that having the power of death,” in his nature; that is, that all the inhabitants of our planet, without exception, shall be incorruptible and deathless. The restraining of sin or diabolos, is to be effected a thousand years before its destruction; the destroying process consummating the work of the Millennial Reign.

The sin-power in an individual man, uncontrolled by the law of God, is strong for evil and ferocious as a beast of prey. It converts a man, as the phrase is, “into a devil;” and permits him to stick at nothing. The works of such a man are “Adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, envyings, murders, drunkenness, revellings, and such like;” the doers of which, the apostle says, “shall not inherit the kingdom of God.” The Gentile Devil cannot be fabled to do worse than this. Now, if instead of one such reprobate, there are two hundred millions of the like associated together in one community, the power of the evil is increased so many million times. The increase of the power does not alter the nature of the evil—it is still sin in the flesh having the power of death, and therefore diabolos. Now, what things that community of sinners wills, contrives, and does, are the works of Sin, termed by John, ta erga tou diabolou, “the works of diabolos.” These works are civil and ecclesiastical institutions, styled in the scriptures, “things in the heavens and things in the earth, visible and invisible, thrones, dominions, principalities, powers.” They are political aggregations of the works of sin, or diabolos. In short, every thing that is not of the seed of truth of God is a work of sin; and destined finally to be destroyed. The institutions or polity of the two hundred millions are a fair and just representation of the character of the vast majority of them, and therefore of their nationality. The individuals being sinners, and for the most part desperate ones, the community they constitute is pre-eminently diabolos, or SIN POLITICALLY INCORPORATE. The excessive wickedness of such a Body Politic is illustrated by the Inquisition, and the popish priesthood—associations of adulterers, thieves, murderers, idolaters, and blasphemers; hypocritical pretenders to piety, but as “earthly, sensual, and devilish,” as their own “Devil” is supposed to be. Now, a community like this, with an Emperor, Pope, and Ten Kings, at the head of it, is represented apocalyptically by a Dragon with Ten Horns; and to show its sin-origin, Sin’s symbol is associated with it, and it is styled “the Dragon, the old Serpent;” and to show furthermore, its antagonism to God and his people, it is termed “diabolos and satan.” In the aggregate it is represented in Daniel by the image of a man, which Nebuchadnezzar saw in his dream. This man-Image is diabolos and satan in the climax of Sin’s power, glory, and wickedness; and styled by Paul, ho anomos, THE LAWLESS, whose manifestation is the result of the energy of the adversary, which is not fully developed till the near future. When the premillennial autocratic empire foretold by Ezekiel shall be fully organised, the SIN-MAN, perdition's son, will stand God-defiant within the walls of Jerusalem. This Sin-Power, called the Devil and Satan in the English version, is "that having the power of death" manifested in full political and military array. And, who shall bind this strong one? There will be no power on earth equal to the enterprise. Britain, and the United States (notwithstanding their present professed adherence to Washington's foreign policy, too antiquated for the terrible future) will, on the principle of self-preservation, contend against him. But, their efforts will be in vain. The Binder of the Sin-Man must from heaven descend, as the apocalyptic angel, having "great power," symbolised by "a great chain," and "enlightening the earth with his glory." When He appears he will strike him such a blow on the feet as to send him maimed, halt, and crippled to the west. After this blow, which is the battle of Armageddon, by which Jerusalem and Israel's land are delivered, no more is heard in scripture of the Dragon; for, deprived of the dominion of the East, the Sin-Power can no longer be represented by "the Dragon." What remains is diabolos and satan, the Sin-Adversary, represented by "the Beast, the False Prophet and the Kings of the Earth, with their armies;" styled in Matthew, diabolos kai hoi angeloι autou, anglice, "the Devil and his angels," but properly the Sin-power and its messengers, or agents. These are the broken "pieces" of the Man-Image, which the Sin-Binder will have to reduce to powder subsequently to the fracture of its feet.

We see from these hints that diabolos, or "that having the power of death," appears in divers parts of scripture in a sort of personal manifestation. The personality, however, is not that of a single individual; but the personification of a power in man, and in society antagonist to God and his people. Treating of sin in the flesh, the apostle speaks of it reigning, deceiving, and slaying its victims. While sin has the power of death, he says the strength of that power is the holy, just, and good law and commandment of God. That is, sin would have had no power to work death in a man for coveting, if the law had not said "Thou shalt not covet." It is manifestly good not to covet any thing that is your neighbour's; therefore the law that forbids it is a good law. But if there had been no such law given, to be covetous would not be punishable with death and exclusion from the kingdom. Hence the apostle says, "the good law was not made death unto me; but it made sin appear sin working death in me; that Sin through the commandment might become pre-eminently A SINNER.” In the common version kath’ hyperboleen hamartoolos is rendered “exceeding sinful.” This is a version, but not a translation of the words. Hamartoolos is “one who deviates from the path of virtue, a vicious person, sinful, detestable.” It is a substantive; not an adjective, as rendered in the English version; and therefore ought to be translated as above.

Now, this exceedingly great sinner, Sin, working death in man, the scripture styles diabolos: and it may be pertinently asked, Why is it so called? The following I conceive to be the reason. The attribute most characteristic of Sin’s character is deceitfulness; as it is written,

“Exhort one another daily lest any of you be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin;”

“Sin taking occasion through the commandment deceived me;”

“Eve being deceived was in transgression;” and

“The Serpent beguiled her through his shrewdness.”

Eve being deceived, the Serpent’s part in the transaction was finished. He held no conference with Adam, who, the apostle says, “was not deceived.” Sin, the Seducer, approached him through Eve, whose eyes were open to evil. Sin incarnate in Eve was Adam’s tempter.

“With her much fair speech she caused him to yield, with the flattering of her lips she forced him.”

She gave him of the tree, and he did eat; and eating, fell. Thus Sin caused him to fall in casting him across the law-line; and therefore it is called diabolos. For diabolos is a noun derived from the verb diaballo, which is equivalent to the Latin trajicio, to throw or cast over, or across. Diaballo is from dia and ballo, to throw, cast; and in the perfect passive, to be thrown, or cast down. Diabolos is one who casts over the line; in a scriptural sense, by misrepresentation and subtlety, which is lying. Hence, diabolos stands for “slanderer, accuser, and whatever else may be affirmed of sin. This is the proper signification of the word and intelligible to every one; its improper meaning is devil, and understood by none. Sin is the devil of our planet; which few, perhaps, will believe, being so much in love with it, and delighting in its pleasures wherever they can be found. Gentile superstition is terribly afraid of its Devil; but it loves Sin dearly, and serves it in all its ungodly lusts. The scripture saith, however, “he that committeth sin is of the devil”—he is a child of sin; “for the devil sinneth from the beginning”—sin transgresseth ever. This is the unhappy lot of all the world, composed almost exclusively of the children of sin. Therefore, the apostle saith, “Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him.”

But here we must pause till our next, when we shall resume the subject from some other point of view.

EPISTOLARIA.

INTERESTING FROM SCOTLAND.

Glasgow, June 11th, 1852.

My Dear Sir:

I have long intended repeating my communications, but many things have occurred to prevent it. I have been, however, noticing how you yourself have been progressing. You really deserve great credit for your perseverance and energy. It is a pity you should apparently be so poorly reciprocated with; but it is only too common for christians to applaud and commend, and decline going further. Money is one of those things so suitable for all purposes, as to make men loth to part with it. One is reminded of one of our English comic writers' idea of the land of Turveytop, a place to which he describes the inhabitants of the world as being sent after death, where they were put to school to be re-educated. It seems that one old gentleman, who while here, had followed the profession of a banker, used to annoy the poor old dominie exceedingly by always spelling the word good in a very wrong way. It seems that he never could spell it otherwise than as gold. The scholar was so dull, or pervert, that he was incapable of spelling it in any other way. So the world has generally got wrong as to what is good, and among other things has taken to spelling it as gold!

We have not been lazy here. The meeting presided over by Mr. Gilmour has become a church, and assembles in the large hall of the Mechanics' Institution, North Hanover street, a place nearly as large as a fourth of the City Hall. We had a long series of lectures and conversation meetings; the latter very successful. Some of the subjects treated of in the lectures were such as follow: —“Jerusalem the future Metropolis of God's (terrestrial) Universal Empire;” also, “Who are to be the Royalty and Aristocracy of this Universal Empire of the Heavens and Earth.” Lecture third is to be “The Battle of Armageddon.”

The interest excited by these lectures has been quite unmistakable; and many by them, and more especially by the conversation-meetings, have been induced to profess publicly their acceptance of God's truth of the Hope of Israel—God's future universal Ruler and Empire of the Heavens and earth—by being baptised. It is, indeed, no wonder that such should be the case, seeing that the earth is languishing, and the world mourning, because of man's (alias the devil's) rule or rather misrule. Truly creation travaileth and groaneth to be delivered of its burden of sin and sorrow.

The Hope of Israel, God's own righteous ruler, is thus the hope of the world; and the wonder is that intelligent men, who profess to be Bible students, and zealous for God's glory, don't see it! They see clearly that man's rule during 6000 years nearly, has been an out and out failure; and yet persevere and cling to the vain hope of man still establishing the Millennium by Gospel preaching, Free Trade, Political Unions, Peace Societies, and all numerous nostrums of the imagination apart from God.

My dear sir, we are now more than ever required to press upon men's minds the near approach of God's times, and of the near finish of men's, or the Gentiles' times.

You will, doubtless, be interested to know how the churches here now stand anent the all important query, "What is truth?" The old church (Known in America as the Campbellite church. —Editor Herald.), I mean the one presided over by Mr. Paton, has been split into three sections; to particularise which I will for convenience name their presidents—first, the party which removed under Mr. Paton; another under Mr. Linn; and the third, which I prefer distinguishing by the name of Millennial Baptists, with which Mr. Gilmour is connected. The first two have remained very few in number; the latter have been very successful both as to attracting numbers, in influence, and efforts. They have had evening meetings, always attended by hundreds; numerous baptisms into the Hope of Israel—into God's own king, the Seed of Abraham, David's Lord and David's everlasting Seed, the true royal and immortal ruler of God's future universal Israelitish empire of the heavens and the earth. They also published, during the greater part of last year, a monthly periodical named "The Prophetic Student;" which was only discontinued for want of time to carry it on. It sold very well, and treated exclusively on the glorious subjects of prophecy. The same little representative of the interests of the sure word is intended yet to be continued, and that very soon. This little church found it necessary in May last to remove to a larger hall, the Mechanics' Institution hall, capable of holding several hundreds; and this hall, as I have already informed you, has been filled during the evening, ever since its opening. Not a seat to spare. Our speakers have also been (in accordance with invitations received from these places) visiting Hamilton, Stirling, Paisley, Airdree, &c., and delivering lectures on the Kingdom of God in connection with all its aspects of Territory, King, Aristocracy, subjects, laws, &c., &c., and are still continuing. One of them occupies by invitation of the Rev. Mr. Lichose of Paisley, his pulpit on Sunday next, morning and evening. It would cheer your weary, though unmistakably zealous spirit, to know the interesting, and in many cases romantic, incidents attending these exertions in both preaching and writing; so true is it, that truth gives a body, a substance to religion, which overcomes the circumstances of birth, position, and every thing else, exciting in the heart grateful appreciation of God's grace in the glorious future of, not ethereal nothings, but of divine realities.

By-the-bye, I send you a Glasgow paper containing an intimation of the purchase of the land of Canaan by M. Rothschild. If this be true, we have indeed a very marked sign; for its purchase will undoubtedly be followed by events that will affect the world. There will be the withdrawal of Jews from all parts with their means, which may politically affect very much other countries; for the riches of the Jew being generally in gold and silver, may yet necessitate Jerusalem becoming the seat and deposit of the world's wealth—the great Bank of the World; and then the Holy City will become important both politically and commercially. And independently of these comparatively important things, there is its position in fulfilling of prophecy; for it is certain that the Jews will be in part as a nation, settled in an unconverted state in their own land at the appearing of the Lord, referred to among numerous other passages in the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth chapters of Zechariah. * * * How soon, how very near, may not the appearing of the Lord be; and if so all its accomplishments; such as, the establishment of the Nebuchadnezzar-Image empire, on the Feet of which the destroying Stone power is to fall—Daniel 2: 34-35; the resurrection of the dead; the translation of the church—1 Corinthians 15: 23; 1 Thessalonians 4: 16; and so forth. My earnest desire is, that you and I, and all who love God, and, if it were possible, all men, may be, as the apostle comforts the Thessalonians with being in reference to that time, even in rest with God.

I have heard that your intention is to be in Scotland soon; so soon as to be likely now upon the way. I shall be glad to know if this be your intention. If you do come, the success of your last visit would be far exceeded. Since your departure, an increasing inquiry into the glorious realities of prophecy has been widely progressing; and the signs of the times being ominous, have prepared men for at least hearing of these heavenly realities, with which their ethereal nothings are as dross to the pure gold. The principle introduced by the devil of spiritualising, or explaining away, alias commentaryism upon God's plain sayings, is now as then the source of man's ruin. Man has now lost the power to enjoy God's truth, because he has denied his sayings by making them mean otherwise than what they obviously import, forgetting that God will be justified, not in the meanings men put upon his words, but in his sayings, that he may overcome when they are judged—Romans 3: 4.

Expecting to hear from you soon,
I remain yours sincerely,
ROBERT LATTA.

REMARKS.

The above is indeed cheering. Intelligence in the Word with earnestness can do much in arresting the attention of the public. But besides this there must be something in the Scottish mind predisposing it to the consideration of the sure prophetic word. As far as my experience has gone, the scripture testimony has a far more ready access to the Scotch, than to the English, or, people of this country. —Wealth and the pride of life have corrupted the heart of England; while in America, a “devil-may-care” indifference to everything that does not tend to money-making, or self-glorification, has made the public mind callous, and irresponsive to the truth. Religion in Scotland is a passion, in England a fashion, and in the United States a profession. Perhaps the difference in these three things may explain the reason of the truth creating greater interest in Caledonia than in any other country in the world. May it continue to have free course, and be glorified.

I have no present intention of revisiting Britain. The conducting of the Herald depends upon my personal attention; and its continuance at this crisis seems to be necessary. It teaches the truth in places to which I cannot obtain access; and discourses to a far more extensive circle than that defined by its own list. Through its means the truth is establishing itself in the hearts of many who may in other places, as at Glasgow, bestir themselves in its behalf. Scripta manent written words remain; and though preaching is good, written instruction is better. The preaching of the prophets and apostles was highly useful to their generations, but it is their writings only remain to do us good. My conviction is that people and preachers require instruction in the word, which they cannot get at meetings, colleges, and schools, and which if they could, the latter have neither time nor means to procure. I believe that the Herald supplies this instruction, which it is more important to furnish just now, than for me to be travelling about speaking to crowds who forget what is spoken almost as soon as uttered. I must, therefore, not neglect the Herald, though the difficulties to be contended with arising from the wordy, but unsubstantial, cooperation of its friends, often tempt me to leave them to instruct themselves as they best can. But for the sake of what I heartily believe to be the truth, I devote my time to the Herald as though my daily bread depended upon it. I know no one that will or can become my substitute in this matter. I cannot therefore absent myself in long tours, or journeys consuming much time. Consequently at present, or until providence raises me up a helper, I must decline the invitations I have received in Louisiana, Iowa, and so forth, and deny myself the laborious pleasure of touring it through Britain. Those in that country who care to see me again, or to know what I teach, may for the price of the Herald promote their own gratification.—The means are within their reach, and they can serve themselves. An interest in what is written, will be an earnest, of a sincere desire to see the writer, and hear his words again.

Our friends in Scotland have found that even a little original periodical requires time for its preparation; more than they could bestow. Much time, however, is not needed in conducting magazines of the common sort. A pair of scissors, plenty of exchanges, and pretty numerous communications from persons, who, though neither teachable nor competent to teach, are desirous of appearing in print; will enable an editor to make up a number in a very short time. But where the articles are mostly original, and God's mind is the subject of interpretation, time, thought, and nervous energy, are consumed to a far greater amount than is perceived by the reader. The conducting of a periodical whose function is to subserve party purposes is a light affair; but to sustain one that is to teach the Word, not to gabble about it, but to make it intelligible to minds spoiled by philosophy and vain deceit, as most are, is an onerous work, a flesh-wearying, and time-consuming, labour; and places the labourer in a position in which he can attend to little else. This is my experience with the Herald. So that when its friends are inefficient, and having no time to attend to private interests, I am in a straight betwixt two. It seems a pity that there is not some one in Britain who has the ability and information, and can devote his whole time and energy to the press. There is a fine field there for interpreting the word, and "putting to silence the ignorance of foolish men;" such as papists, puseyites, political theorists, spiritual milleniumists, and so forth. One that would enter into the strong man's house, and bind him hand and foot, or be bold enough to try, is the sort of truth-advocate demanded by the times. A milk and water scribe may suit the nervous old ladies of a party; but a warrior is needed to handle the Spirit's two-edged sword with a sword's effect. Such a person, not allowed to starve, and sustained by earnest fellow-soldiers, would produce a stirring effect in Britain; where, as far as I know, there is no unshackled, independent, and manly writer on things scriptural and ecclesiastical. But the Lord knows what is best; when the crisis needs the services of such, he will doubtless be produced.

Good news is always cheering to the believer. I trust, therefore, it will not be long ere brother Latta favours us with a like report.

REVISIT TO BRITAIN.

The following is an extract from a letter July 16, 1852, just received from England, which we publish by request of the writer and other friends —“I have been spending a short time in Nottingham lately, and met in fellowship with our friends there. Some among them were “wishing Dr. Thomas would come again;” and wondering “if he were likely to revisit Britain within a year or so.” I remarked that, “new manifestations on the Continent might bring him.” They “hoped so;” they “should rejoice to see and hear him again.” A brother then observed that, “Dr. Thomas must incur considerable expense in revisiting them; that it could not be expected that he should sustain this unaided; that he ought not to do so; that if they wished his return they should assure him against pecuniary loss when he came at much personal sacrifice to minister to their instruction and edification.” These remarks led another to suggest the raising of a fund to be gradually laid up, and appropriated on Dr. T’s return to the disbursement of his travelling expenses, the hire of a lecture room, &c.; the fund to consist of the surplus of the weekly contributions at communion, after the expenses of room rent, &c., were defrayed, and the wants of the poorer members supplied, and the extra voluntary donations of all who wished to see Dr. T., amongst them again, and were able to give. The proposition was approved by those present, and was afterwards formally made, submitted to the church, and carried unanimously.

“Thinking that the consideration and liberality of the Nottingham church might furnish an example worthy of imitation to other churches in this island, among whom you have laboured, and will, I trust, labour again; I proposed that it should be made known to them through the medium of the “Herald,” and offered to request you to permit us to do so. You will therefore oblige us by making this communication public. It may serve as an incentive to some of our friends in the truth, who desire to hear you once more proclaim “the Gospel of the Kingdom” among us; and will at least testify to the christian love and gratitude of the community of believers in Nottingham for and towards their beloved brother and instructor far away. I have only to add their affectionate remembrances to you.”

E. M. D.

If it is desired that my visit to Britain should be repeated this is a move in the right direction. Our friends in Nottingham take a very sensible view of the matter. Though it is my duty to “contend earnestly for the faith” without regard to profit or reward, it is the privilege of those who believe it, and their duty likewise, to do the same; and if they wish any special benefit to themselves and those of their nation, to contribute according to their ability to enable those to confer it who they think are competent so to do. — I am glad to find our friends in Nottingham so considerate. Jesus had to work a miracle to pay the tax for Peter and himself; and I have but little more of this world’s goods than they: it is evident, therefore, if my friends wish me to travel to the ends of the earth for their instruction and edification, and to try to open the eyes of their people, they must furnish me with the means to do it. I have the knowledge they approve; they the funds; I am willing to diffuse it among all classes to the end of the world; if, then, it remain with me, no one can justly impute the monopoly to my disposition to make merchandise of the truth.

If I were ever so rich it would be my duty to spend freely and be spent for the gospel’s sake; but it would still be equally the duty of the poor of their poverty liberally to contribute towards the diffusion of it. The poor should never permit the rich to monopolise the support of the truth; nor should the rich refuse to allow the poor the honour of sharing with them in its expenses. The Kingdom is for the poor, and the glory of the vindication of its doctrine against all its enemies is their’s. With these views, I have no hesitation in admitting my friends in Britain to a fellowship in the enterprise of a second visit to their country on the plan proposed; and of commending it to all who wish to see me there again.

LETTER FROM TENNESSEE.

Dear Brother:

You understood my communication aright, though it was not humorous but playful. Nor do I blame you for answering it more gravely; for you are engaged in a grave and heavy business! As certain moderns have said, you are “about a great work and cannot come down.”

Now, I am not disposed to beat out my brains against any man’s castle, so I shall not try to expose the flaws, either in your platform or that of your opponents! I am for a fair fight; and whether it is ultimately proven that Heaven is to be on earth, or in the Sun, (as some incline to think,) or away in some remote region beyond this visible diurnal sphere, I shall be content, so that it be a “goodly land,” and I am admitted there.

Your Elpis Israel is well written. I like its didactic style. You use no argument of the debating kind, but just lay down how the matter is, ex cathedra, as one having (if not authority) full knowledge of the subject; then very aptly add your proof, and then go on. This is to my mind. For I have ever thought that a proposition which, when fully stated, needs argument to support it, or a man’s character where he is known, a law suit to sustain it, were at least very doubtful, and not worth the trouble; and, what is more, were seldom made any better by it.

My wife is much pleased with your book, and is cramming it into her neighbours, hands; but there I think it will stop. It will be hard work to put it into either their hearts or heads! I have told several preachers, and (in this I am very serious) now tell you, that your works must make many adherents or deists. I am inclined to think many of both.

However, my wife has teased me into sending you $5.00 more. She wants the worth of it, sent on in the HOPE, for distribution; or rather loaning first to one, then another. Were I sending on for myself, I should look for a great many copies, as I can buy lots of theology for that sum. But as she thinks so highly of the work, you have the game all in your own hands.

Wishing you health and success according to your merits,
I remain benevolently yours, &c.

ROBERT MACK.

Columbia, Tennessee, June 8, 1852.

REMARKS.

“Adherents or deists, many of both”—that is, believers in the Hope of Israel, or rejectors of Gentilism, many of both. I believe, and trust, this will be the result of reading Elpis Israel. If a man understand its teaching and admit that it is sustained by the scripture, he can certainly no longer adhere sincerely to the popular superstition; and if he do not embrace what he admits to be proven, he occupies a deistical position; or that of a believer in the existence of God without professing any particular faith. Thus Elpis Israel is at once, constructive and destructive. It builds up the truth in the hearts of some; and destroys sectarianism in others. In both cases the subject is benefited; for if we believe not the truth, it is bad; but if at the same time, we are burdened with falsehood, it is worse; because we have no liberty here; and none in the Age to Come.

I trust that our friend Mack’s neighbours will prove more impressible of heart than he thinks. However, we cannot but approve of Mrs. M’s resolution to see what can be done. Much greater effect might be produced on the public mind, I doubt not, if all Elpis Israel’s male friends would beg, borrow, or perhaps steal would be no harm, a little of the energy and interest she displays. But I will leave them to settle this affair with her, returning her for myself many thanks for what she and they have already done.

“Although,” says Mr. Campbell, “we never immersed any person in water into the name of the Father, &c., who does not confess his faith in the person, mission, death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ—or what is implied in “believing that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God,” they (the Episcopalians, &c.) have the reckless assurance to charge our Brotherhood with the belief of Baptismal Regeneration.”—Millennial Harbinger Volume 2 No. 7. page 404. The italicism is ours for the sake of emphasis.

Mr. Campbell’s “baptismal regeneration” is doubtless not of the same kind as that of his sectarian brethren. Their’s is the being born again of an eight day old without even the form of a birth. The subject of their theological fiction is “a chip off the old block;” that is, a piece of “sinful flesh,” called a babe, without sins, unthinking, consequently without faith, whose motions are instinctive like all new-born animals. The being born again of this faithless, repentanceless, ignorant, unthinking, instinctive subject, consists with them in the physical operation of Spirit upon it in some undefinable way, in, at, or during the sprinkling and signing of its face and forehead with church-font water in the name of the Father, &c. —The design of this God-dishonouring and ridiculous farce is the forgiveness of sins, and the ingrafting into the body of Christ. The action of the spirit or water, or of both combined, does not touch the “original sin,” for it dies and corrupts nevertheless. Besides this, it has nothing in the form of sin to be forgiven. Forgiveness of sins, therefore, is out of the question. —Perhaps the rhanism is for the forgiveness of sins committed when its “immortal soul” tenanted some other body in a previous state—that for instance exhibited by the man who was supposed to be born blind because of his sins! —John 9: 2. I suppose a babe derives its “soul” from its parents as well as its body; perhaps, then, it is sprinkled for the remission of that proportion of sins still holding on to the compound soul-particle detached from the parents’ souls into the babe’s body. If this be not the “philosophy” of the affair, I am at a loss to explain how a babe without personal transgressions can be “baptised for remission of sins.” Perhaps “His Holiness” of Rome, or his more enlightened protestant “Grace of Canterbury;” or his father-in-godship of Exeter, can exhibit the scripturality of the thing. If they cannot, it is useless to seek for light even from the posthumous hierarchy of the spirit-world! We give it up.

The “brotherhood” of which Mr. Campbell claims to be the Supervisor, cannot certainly be charged with “the belief of” such “baptismal regeneration” as this. It would doubtless, as he says, be “reckless assurance to charge” any such thing upon them. Having been mixed up with them very intimately in former years, we can add our testimony to the truth of their innocency of so gross a stultification of the human intellect. But while people may be guiltless of perpetrating one particular absurdity, they may be justly chargeable with sins upon other points of law; so that “whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all.” Now Mr. C. and his brotherhood do not make a baptismal subject of a faithless babe; but, notwithstanding his plausible statement above, I know that they immerse man and women as ignorant of the mission of Christ as an eight-day old. Now I am prepared to prove from the apostles and prophets that a subject ignorant of this, though immersed a thousand times, is as unbegotten of the Spirit, and therefore unregenerate, as any rhantised suckling. I do not deny that Mr. C. and “his brethren preach a view of the Christ’s mission, which is implied in their version of Peter’s declaration that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; but I do deny, unqualifiedly, that their view and version are “the faith” by which a subject can alone be justified. — According to them, the Christ was to be sent to accomplish in person here no more than what it is testified Jesus effected, save that at some indefinite and remote period he will come on an escorting expedition at the end of all things. This is the Christ they preach. They ask their proselytes, by implication, if Jesus is the Christ having such a mission as this? — This is what “is implied in” their notion of “believing that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God.” They immerse a subject confessing this belief, and pronounce him born of water and the spirit, and therefore, of course, “spirit,” or regenerate. — The immersion of such a subject for remission of sins, I affirm, is practically “baptismal regeneration;” for when I analyse his “faith,” as it is called, I find it an assent to a view of the Christ’s mission which is no where revealed in the scriptures of truth. If then, he be regarded as born again, he is first begotten of untruth, and then born of water, which is not the regeneration of Scripture; and therefore, in effect, as much aqueous regeneration for remission as baby-immersion: for adult-belief of untruth brings even a piously disposed subject no nearer to spiritual begettal than physical incompetence to believe at all. The adult and infant subjects, (from different causes indeed,) are both faithless of the truth, and therefore unbegotten of it; their immersions only remain—they are both born of water without faith in the Bible mission of the Christ; therefore their regenerations are both baptismal, and nothing more.

Mr. C., and his co-labourers, do not know what the mission of the Christ is. This is a grave charge against men so wise in their own conceits. But we have a graver charge against them than this; that, if it be granted that they do know it, they not only do not believe it, but are opposed to it, and persecute those that preach it. —Let us put them to the test—Do they believe that the Christ will restore the Twelve Tribes of Israel to the glorious land, and build again the dwelling place of David AS IN THE DAYS OF OLD? This is part of Messiah's mission, as we can prove abundantly. Believing that Jesus is the Christ, this also is his mission. They ridicule the idea, and “take up an evil report against” its advocates, “and reproach their principles and character, and neither give them a hearing, nor make the amende honourable;” they are, therefore, infidels and persecutors, and mere baptismal regenerationists notwithstanding the appearance of verity in the extract before us. “Do you believe in the mission of Christ?” What is easier than to say, “yes?” But change the form of the question and say—“What is the mission of the Christ as revealed in Moses and the prophets?” Mr. Campbell himself, though the ecclesiastical chief of 300,000 people pretending to apostolicity of faith and practice, cannot begin to answer the question; it is not likely, therefore, that the proselytes he immerses would be more knowing than himself.

DR. MCGUFFEY AND THE SOUL.

When we lectured some months since at the University of Virginia, we very emphatically denied that any such doctrine was taught in the Bible as that there existed in mortal man an essence capable of an independent and incorporeal existence after death, commonly styled “the immortal soul.” We affirmed, that though man consisted of “body, soul and spirit,” yet that these were when uncombined without personal entity; but that when we declared this it was not to be supposed that we affirm that there was no immortality for man, or that immortality was not taught in the Bible. What we maintained was this: that the scripture doctrine is incorruptibility of the body refashioned from its original dust, and thus organised, endowed with endless life—as it is written, “this corruptible shall put on incorruption, and this mortal shall put on immortality,” or deathlessness: that this incorruptible life of body is a good thing, and an item of “the great recompense of the reward” promised only to the righteous; that it is to be sought after, and will be granted only to those who “seek for it” “by a patient continuance in well doing;” and that the righteous are those who believe the gospel of that Kingdom which the God of Heaven has promised to set up in the land covenanted to the fathers of the Twelve Tribes of Israel, and who obey it.

We were pleased to hear that not long after this doctrine was propounded to the students in full audience assembled. —“The Rev. W. H. McGuffey, D. D.,” one of the professors of the University, delivered to them certain lectures on “the immortality of the soul.” What he made of the subject we have no means of judging; it is probable, however, that he “handled it with marked ability;” though of this we are certain, that he must have proved himself markedly unable to demonstrate its truth from the word of God. It is not there, and the wisest advocates of the dogma admit that it is not a scripture revelation.

The Rev. Dr. McGuffey has recently visited this city, and delivered a lecture at the Athenaeum on this subject. We would have heard him had we received intimation of time and place sufficiently early. It happened otherwise, however; therefore we must content ourselves with presenting the reader with the following notice of the lecture from "The Times and Compiler." The reporter says: —

“The Rev. Mr. McGuffey delivered his lecture on the Immortality of the Soul, Thursday night, to a crowded auditory of ladies and gentlemen. As we took no notes, we will not do the speaker the injustice of attempting a synopsis of his remarks. It is scarcely necessary to say that the subject was handled with marked ability. But with due deference to the reverend and learned gentleman, we must be permitted to express our doubts whether the discussion of the Immortality of the Soul, on natural evidence, is likely to be productive of much good. The christian religion is the rock upon which this sublime doctrine stands, and there we think it should be permitted to rest. Why impose upon our weak and erring faculties, the task of demonstrating this dark and intricate problem, when a messenger from above has solved it for us? We cannot help regarding it as a species of grave trifling for a christian philosopher of the nineteenth century to abandon, in the discussion of the topic, the high and impregnable ground of divine revelation and to wander darkling through the metaphysical mazes which 2000 years ago perplexed the subtle disputants of the Portico and Academy.”

From this it would appear that “the reverend and learned gentleman” rested his argument in favour of the tradition “on natural evidence,” without appealing to divine revelation at all. In adopting this course the “crowded auditory of ladies and gentlemen” were enabled to mark well his ability as “a christian philosopher!” But after all the philosophy exhibited, the reporter cannot help saying that the whole affair was “a species of grave trifling.” This was doubtless the case. Only look at it! A crowded auditory gravely, perhaps proudly, listening to a reverend and learned professor of an University, and an ordained interpreter of Moses and the prophets, of Christ and his apostles, wandering darkly through the heathen mazes of 2000 years ago, to prove the existence of a nonentity! But, the wisdom of the Egyptians to the contrary nevertheless, there is no natural evidence of the verity of immortal-soulism. “The flesh profiteth nothing” — “in the flesh dwelleth no good thing.” The reverend and learned gentlemen ought to know this; and to know also, that the immortality of man is a truth peculiar to the gospel of the kingdom, covenanted to Abraham and David, and to all who shall constitute their seed in Christ, —a truth, specially revealed and attested, unsustained by a particle of natural evidence, but shining forth abundantly from Genesis to the Apocalypse, and visible to every one that is not blinded by a spurious “christian philosophy,” college divinity, and the subtleties of the old heathens. The reporter seems not at all to like “the reverend and learned gentleman’s desertion of divine revelation for natural evidence in the case. But he should remember that learned divines know least of revelation than of any other subject. They are weak there, but think themselves strong in “philosophy”—Colossians 2: 2, 8, because this is their chief study. They are not workmen that need not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth. They feel conscious of this, and, therefore, deal more in philosophy, such as it is, than in the scripture. Dealing in this wise is more taking with ladies and gentlemen who are too polite and well bred to be ravished with the homeliness of scripture truth. —“The reverend and learned gentleman” (we wonder, if we may be so vulgar, whether Paul was ever so styled by his contemporaries,) is too well instructed in the rules of decorum to seek any other evidence for immortal-soulism than the natural, in the presence of a fashionable auditory. It would have created a panic to have introduced an apostle saying, that “life and incorruptibility were brought to light by Jesus Christ in the gospel!”—1 Timothy 1: 10. —This would have upset all the natural evidence, and the Egyptian wisdom, and the Greek subtleties, and made the learned gentleman to look foolish, and all the ladies and gentlemen to faint when they found that immortality was an affair of gospel, and not a matter of flesh, and consequently that immortally they had “no pre-eminence over the beasts!”—Ecclesiastes 3: 19. The reporter thinks it a dark and intricate problem to demonstrate, although the messenger from above has solved it! Yes, he has brought it to light, so that it is no longer “dark and intricate.” The true doctrine is easily demonstrated. It shines like the sun from the sacred page, but gives no light to him who knows not the gospel of the kingdom, and is indoctrinated with the Egyptian superstition of “the immortality of the soul.”

“PROVE ALL THINGS.”

Our article on the “Scarcity of Gold in Turkey, &c.,” published in our sixth number, has been reproduced in the Advent Harbinger, of Rochester, N. Y., with the following “Remarks” appended to it by our worthy friend the editor; and which we take the liberty of inserting here under the caption of

NO PRE-ADVENTUAL COLONISATION OF JUDEA.

As we suppose the above article was written in view of what has been published in the Harbinger on this subject, and as the questions embraced are highly important and not well understood by some honest minds, we in the spirit of kindness, and for the sake of eliciting light, offer the following remarks on the several points noticed in the article before us.

1. Whatever may have been the ‘original plan for settling the question of the holy places,’ by selling the land to M. Rothschild, it is evident that that plan has proved a failure: for from subsequent authentic accounts which we have published in recent numbers of the Harbinger, according to the absolute wishes of the Emperor of Russia and the imperial decree of the Grand Turk, no change in the ownership of the Holy Places is permitted at present to take place. And besides, it has been credibly announced that Rothschild, at the last account of him, was ‘dying at Frankfort on the Main.’ And further, as we understand prophecy, the land of promise cannot be purchased, nor possessed by a Jew or Jews, before the Lord shall come, for it is to be trodden down by Gentiles, until their times shall be fulfilled, and then Christ whose right it is, will come and possess it by right of inheritance. The Jews can never possess that land on any other principle than by right of inheritance. If they can, where in the sacred volume is that right guaranteed? Echo answers, Where?
2. If the ‘twelve tribes shall be redeemed without money,’ as the word of prophecy predicts, and as the Herald admits, it is reasonable to infer that their city and land must be purchased of their oppressors. Are there any such stipulations in the Gentile lease of two thousand five hundred and twenty years' continuance from a certain date, or of its repetition of two thousand and three hundred years, from another period, or in any reference to it in the Bible, which justifies them in asking a price for that land, when their lease expires, or their times end? We know of none. They are usurpers, and have held and trodden down the land by mere sufferance; hence no Jew is under any obligation to purchase it of them at any time, and more especially when the time has come when they are suffered to hold it no longer.

3. We fully endorse the expression of Bro. Thomas, that 'the restoration of Israel will not take place until after the appearing of Messiah in power.' But we cannot believe that there will be a restoration, or as he expresses it, 'A lifting up of an ensign,' or a 're-settlement of the land by the Jews to a limited extent before the battle of Armageddon,' or 'before Messiah returns,' as Bro. T. teaches. Certainly the texts he has quoted, as we understand them, do not prove such a position. We will look at them.

Isaiah 30: 17. 'One thousand shall flee at the rebuke of one; at the rebuke of five shall ye flee; till ye be left as a beacon upon the top of a mountain, and as an ensign on an hill.'

Mark, this text does not speak of 'a lifting up,' nor of a 're-settlement,' of a limited number of the Jews to constitute 'an ensign,' but it predicts that after they should be wasted or cut off by wars and other judgments for their often repeated and unrepented of sins, as 'a tree bereft of branches' or boughs, (margin.)—So they would be 'LEFT as an ensign on an hill:' not 'an ensign,' but as an ensign that had been deserted by the power that had sustained it. Precisely in this manner has a small remnant of Judah been 'left' in the land of Palestine ever since the nation was cut off and scattered. This remnant that has been 'left' like a deserted ensign on an hill, is not to constitute a 're-settlement,' for they have ever been there, neither are they to become an, nor the ensign to which the dispersed tribes of Israel and Judah in a limited capacity even, are to be gathered, for Christ is to fill this high station: for 'unto him shall the gathering of the people be.' And 'in that day there shall be a root of Jesse, which shall stand for an ensign of the people.' 'I Jesus . . . am the root and offspring of David.'—Isaiah 11: 10 and Revelation 22: 16.

Ezekiel 39: 9, 11-12. ‘And they that dwell in the cities of Israel shall go forth, and shall set on fire and burn the weapons, both the shields and the bucklers, the bows and the arrows, and the hand-staves and the spears, and they shall burn them with fire seven years.’

‘And it shall come to pass that day, that I will give unto Gog a place there of graves in Israel, the valley of the passengers on the east of the sea; and it shall stop the noses of the passengers: and there shall they bury Gog and all his multitude; and they shall call it, The valley of Hamon-gog.’

‘And seven months shall the house of Israel be burying them, that they may cleanse the land.’

We cannot conceive how these texts sustain Bro. Thomas’ position; for they say nothing about Judah or Israel becoming or being ‘an ensign,’ or there being a ‘re-settlement’ of them ‘to a limited extent’ ‘before Messiah returns,’ but they do speak of the battle of Armageddon that does not take place until after the Lord comes—and instead of Israel being gathered to ‘a limited extent’ at that time, the 28th verse of the same chapter clearly shows that they will all be gathered then, for it says, ‘I have gathered them unto their own land, and have left none of them any more there.’

That the great events predicted in the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth chapters of Ezekiel will take place subsequently to the coming of Christ, we think is incontrovertibly proved in our reply to Bro. Grew, under the head, ‘The Advent Near,’ in the Harbinger for May 22, to which we refer the reader, and also to our reply to Bro. Magruder, under the same heading in the Harbinger for May 8. All will do well to read those articles with care.

4. If the ‘proposal’ relative to the Rothschilds purchasing Palestine is to ‘become an accomplished fact,’ and if ‘that fact’ ‘will be a sure and certain sign of that speedy appearing of the Son of Man in power and glory,’ then it must be a clear subject of prophecy, and as the prophetic Word is sure, Rothschild must purchase the land of Palestine before the Lord shall come; for all ‘sure and certain signs of his speedy appearing’ must be fulfilled. —

But if it should turn out that Rothschild is dead, or that the imperial decrees of the emperors of Russia and of Turkey have defeated this plan, what then? Has a 'sure and certain sign' failed? Or has Dr. T. been mistaken relative to its being such? The latter must be the case.

5. If "no one need expect that appearing to be manifested until a Jewish colony be lifted up 'as an ensign upon an hill,'" the Bible must plainly reveal the fact. —But we say, fearless of contradiction from any one, that no such revelation has been made in that Book. If we are mistaken, we would kindly thank Dr. Thomas, or any other person, to set us right by giving the proof; not however in inferences, assumptions, nor mystical expositions, but in the PLAIN WORD OF THE LORD. We can make nothing else the foundation of our faith, for 'faith comes by hearing, and hearing, and hearing by the word of the Lord.'

6. If 'the present calm—is for the blossoming forth of Judah's plant,' or that a colony of them may 'be lifted up as an ensign upon an hill'—we would be exceedingly thankful to be convinced of the fact, by the plain word of the Lord; for we now have no faith that such is the case, for the very good reason that no such thing is taught in the Bible, and furthermore its infallible testimony is against such a conclusion. For the Jews were to be captives among all the world, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled. —Luke 20: 21. Then their next, second, or final gathering is not to be a 'limited' one to be succeeded by a third, for a third gathering is no where promised in the Scriptures. But a second is, (Isaiah 11: 11) which is to take place after Christ stands as an ensign, (Isaiah 11: 10) and is to embrace the entire remnant of Judah and of Israel, 'from the four corners of the earth.'—Isaiah 11: 12.

7. 'Still we should like to see him M. Rothschild adorn his brows with the diadem of Judah's kings. It would be to the believer, an earnest,' &c. How this sentiment can be in harmony with the following prophetic word, we cannot conceive; we think they are in direct opposition to each other; and if the 'diadem of Judah's kings,' should 'adorn Rothschild's or any other Jew's 'brows,' excepting the Lord Jesus, it would prove the prophetic Word untrue, which says:

*'Thus saith the Lord God, remove the diadem, and take off the crown; this shall not be the same: exalt him that is low, and abase him that is high. I will overturn, overturn, overturn it; and it shall be no more, until HE COME WHOSE RIGHT IT IS, and I will GIVE IT HIM,' (Ezekiel 21: 25, 27.) not to M. Rothschild, nor suffer him to purchase it.

Hence, should he 'adorn his brows with the diadem of Judah's kings,' instead of its being to 'the believer an earnest, that the crown of David would ere long illustrate the majesty of his Son and Lord'—it would shake the very foundation of his faith, relative to his ever being thus adorned, or wearing the crown on David's throne.

8. We see no greater difficulty in the way of Rothschild 'rebuilding Solomon's temple,' or 'the temple of Jehovah' and being a 'king and priest' on David's throne than we do of his adorning 'his brows with the diadems of Judah's kings.' And indeed we cannot see why he must not do all this before the Lord shall come, providing that the 'proposal' if it 'become an accomplished fact,' will 'be a sure and certain sign of the speedy appearing off the Son of Man in power and great glory,'—for that 'proposal,' contemplates the 'rebuilding' of the 'temple of Jehovah,' as clearly as it does the adorning 'the brows' of Rothschild with the 'diadems of Judah's kings.' All such contemplations doubtless will fail, for they are not justified by the inspired Word, but opposed by it.

Finally, we heartily concur with Bro. Thomas, that the recent discoveries of gold in vast amounts, in different quarters of the earth, indicate that God is making preparations to carry out his purpose as predicted in Isaiah 60: 17, and other parallel prophecies. But we are far from supposing that these predictions will have their fulfilment until the Lord shall come; for the heaven is to retain him until the times of restitution, which God hath spoken of by the mouths of all his holy prophets, since the world began—Acts 3: 20. Here is an invulnerable point from which we all shall do well not to depart: there can be no restitution, of either the people, land, or city, in full or to a 'limited extent,' until the great Restorer shall come. This he will soon do, for the times of the Gentiles are nearly out. May we be counted worthy by him to take a part in the great and glorious work, and to share in its inconceivable blessings.

THE REMNANT OF A PRE-ADVENTUAL JEWISH COLONY, THE REFINED THIRD PART ADVENTUALLY DELIVERED.

“Two parts in the land shall be cut off and die, but the third shall be left therein. And I will bring the third part through the fire, and will refine them as silver is refined, and will try them as gold is tried: they shall call on my name, and I will hear them: I will say, It is my people: and they shall say, The Lord (Jesus) my God!”—Zechariah.

The remarks in the preceding article are offered, the writer says, “in the spirit of kindness, and for the sake of eliciting light.” I accept them in the same spirit; for I am sure the editor of that Harbinger (I wish I could say the same of the conductors of all Harbingers) is too honest a student of the word, too sincere a lover of truth, and too much imbued with the benevolence of “the gospel of the kingdom,” to find it in his heart to be ill-natured towards a fellow-student, who does not see eye to eye with him in all things, nor occupy the same position as he. I am satisfied he wants to be convinced if in error. The progress he has already made from mere anti-creedism to the belief of the gospel of the kingdom, proves this. —He has found himself on the wrong side of a question more than once, and when aware of it, has honestly confessed that the position was untenable, and magnanimously abandoned it. This is the sort of a man I like to talk with; because his object is to get at the truth; and so is mine. Neither he nor I is infallible; for I have made a “confession and abjuration” of errors as well as he: so that we can meet upon an equal footing in this respect, and endeavour to enlighten one another.

Now, at present he firmly believes that I am in error upon a certain point connected with the restoration of Israel, which leaks out in the aforesaid article; which, however, was not written, as he supposes, “in view of what had been published in the Harbinger on the subject;” but as corrective of the notion of a general restoration of the Jews, and a rebuilding of the temple before the eternal king of Israel shall appear; as well as by way of comment on the latest news from the east. My friend’s idea is, that there will be no return of Jews at all (save as they have journeyed thither as pilgrims for ages) before the Lord appears. We agree that the Twelve Tribes will be restored to the land promised to their fathers; but he considers it entirely post-adventual, and immediately subsequent to the battle of Armageddon. I differ from him in believing, that there will be a pre-adventual limited colonisation of the country by Jews, under the protectorate of Britain; and that the prosperity of this colony, together with a desire to cripple or subvert the British power in the east, will be the cause of the country’s invasion by the Russian ‘Clay,’ styled Gog, &c., by Ezekiel. I consider that this colonisation is going on while Russia is engaged in the conquest of the west—while it is mixing with a fragile union the iron leg and toes there with the ‘miry clay.’ The invasion of Israel’s land, and conquest of Jerusalem, is the end of the formative process; for then the eastern and western legs and the ten toes are fashioned into feet, being combined together by Russo-Assyrian Clay.

This is the crisis to which things are now working out, and by which a necessity is created for the appearing of the Lord. The Anglo Jewish colony is just ‘an element in the situation.’ It is planted in Palestine in the interests of Britain, providentially as an ingredient in the bait to tempt the Gog-nations to come up to battle against Jerusalem, that the Lord may “plead with them for his heritage Israel.” The invasion will be a time of great trouble to the colony; for ‘two parts in the land will be cut off and die; but the third part shall be left therein’—Zechariah 13: 8. It is this third part that calls upon Jehovah’s name for help. The Lord says, ‘I will hear them;’ and in consequence of so doing, descends, and smites the assembled host; and, by Michael, their great prince, delivers them—Daniel 12: 1. Then comes the resurrection. They who cry for help are in the land; to be there they must have previously returned; they cry because of the oppressor; they cry of necessity before they are heard; and the oppressor is broken in pieces in answer to their cry.

In the battle of Armageddon, which breaks the feet, the Jews fight 'because the Lord is with them'—Zechariah 10: 5; 14: 14. These combatant Jews must therefore have returned to Judea before the battle; and consequently before the coming of the Lord, as our friend admits that his advent and the battle are contemporary.

The post-adventual restoration of the Twelve Tribes is a work of time. It will not be consummated till the end of forty years after the battle of Armageddon. I have shown this in an article soon to appear in the Herald. This forty years occupies the space between the advent and the commencement of the thousand years; and affords scope for Elijah to 'restore all things,' and for Jesus and his brethren to torment 'the devil and his angels.' These things may sound strange in unpractised ears; but let such wait till they have examined what I have to publish on the subject before they presume to judge. There is more in the divine testimony than Gentiles of this age have thought of yet.

From what is now presented the reader may gather some of the points at issue. I need not, therefore, dilate upon them more just now.

The latest news from the east is but a shadow of coming events. What I have written concerning it was hypothetical. I said, 'it is probable that the financial scheme of the Turkish government may be the initiative of the preadventual colonisation of the Holy Land.' 'If the proposal become an accomplished fact, that fact will speak in unmistakable and infallible terms to the believer.' The initiative result of the Turkish policy has been to unsettle the whole question; and to stir up the Autocrat. The interference of the latter only affects the present aspect of the case. When he gets his hands full in strengthening Austria and the Pope, with the ulterior view of restoring the Bourbons, Britain will have something to say that will be pre-eminently anti-Russian, and promotive of her own policy in the east. There are several Rothschilds. The London Rothschild is the alleged purchaser; not he of Frankfort on the Maine, who is said to be dying. However the colonisation be brought about, it will be the sign of the time indicative of the speedy coming. There are signs that the practiced eye can already see; but that will be a sign, which, if men were not stone-blind, no one could fail to discern aright.

It is just because the colony I speak of, will not possess the land by faith, (which is what, I suppose, my friend means by ‘right of inheritance,’) that they are so terribly disturbed in their possession by Gog. There can be no continued peace and prosperity there for Jew or Gentile, till the land is inherited by right of the Covenant dedicated by the blood of its future king.

I have but little confidence in the idea of settling the land as the result of a money transaction with the Porte. It may, and it may not. Britain may subsidise the Turk against Austria and Russia, and assume the protectorate of Egypt and the Holy Land, as she does the Ionian Islands, in return. I do not see the details off the affair in prophecy; but the colonisation itself I perceive without obscurity. This is the great thing; the measures leading thereto, are merely matters of interesting speculation as they arise.

I do not adduce the text in the thirtieth of Isaiah to prove that the settlement of a colony is to be the being ‘as an ensign on a hill,’ referred to there; but to show that a small number of Israel as compared with the whole nation, is in scripture language likened to ‘an ensign on a hill,’ or ‘a beacon on the top of a mountain.’ To be ‘left as an ensign,’ and to be ‘lifted up as an ensign,’ are different ideas. I speak off the colony being as a pre-advantual ensign. This will be composed of the remnant left, (which our friend admits is as a deserted ensign, abandoned by the power that had sustained it,) and of the new colonists, whose aggregation to the old remnant does not at all affect its ensign, or beacon, resemblance. Now before the Lord appears, the fair ensign, so gaily wafting in the breeze under the shadowing wings of Britain, is torn down, and trampled under foot by the Prince of Ros. The silver and gold, cattle and goods, unwallled villages and peaceful dwellings, become a prey to the spoiler. The ‘merchants of Tarshish, and the young lions thereof,’ that is, the British power, as I have proved in Elpis Israel, threaten and oppose the destroyer in vain. There is none can save, or lift it up, but the Lord God of Israel. He comes to do this; and when he comes, ‘all the men that are upon the face of the land shall shake at his presence’—Ezekiel 38: 20. The result is the destruction of the army of the Gog-nations, of which only ‘a sixth part’ escapes; and the setting up of the ensign erect again, no more to be trampled under feet of the Gentiles. Thus, 'the Lord their God shall save them in that day as the flock of his people; for they shall be as the stones of a crown, LIFTED UP as an ensign upon his land. For how great is his goodness and how great is his beauty! Corn shall make the young men glad, and new wine the maids'—Zechariah 9: 16. The colonisation I termed, 'a lifting up of an ensign,' (a phrase of comparison of course, 'as' being understood,) to distinguish it from the lifting up of the Lord, and by the Lord—an ensign lifted up by the British power; itself, however, unconscious that the colonisation was a sign.

The passage quoted from Ezekiel by our friend, proves a settlement of the land to some extent before the advent by implication. The battle of Armageddon, which breaks the Image, is at the Lord's coming; the war, which reduces its fragments to chaff, is after his return. Ezekiel speaks of the battle in particular; and in the conclusion of his prophecy announces the result of the general war, which is not only the comminution of the whole image, but the full accomplishment of the work of restoration, as expressed in the words, 'I have gathered them unto their own land, and have left none of them any more there' in the enemy's country. 'They that dwell in the cities of Israel,' who go forth to burn the weapons and bury the slain, are precisely the survivors of that colony residing in the land at the time of the battle, to save whom the Lord strikes the blow. The salvation of this third part by the Advent victory is the beginning of deliverance to the whole nation. It must have been pre-adventually settled in the land, or it could not be there to witness the fight. It would be very incongruous for there to be so great a carnage, and all the survivors fled, and no Israelites at hand to put Gog's multitude under ground. The circumstances of the case evidently necessitate a pre-adventual settlement to some extent.

True; the Jews were to be 'led away captive into all the nations,' (ta ethnee,) but it does not say that they were all to continue captives in exile, without remission, till the times of the Gentiles were fulfilled. They were led away by the Roman power into all the nations of that dominion; but not into 'all nations,' and 'all the world,' in the modern Gentile sense of those phrases. It is Jerusalem that is to be trodden down of the Gentiles until the fulfilment of their times. A little transient good fortune to the city in no way affects the verity of this. Jerusalem, in the days of the Saracens and Crusaders, became the throne of a kingdom which continued many years. 'King of Jerusalem,' is one of his Austrian Apostolic Majesty's titles, derived from his ancestral relation to that Kingdom. Hence, as in the days of Pontius Pilate, the Jews acknowledged 'no other king but Caesar;' so now, Caesar, the imperial chief of 'the Holy Roman Empire,' claims the same sovereignty. His 'rights' will in due time be assumed by the Russo-Assyrian Gog, whence comes his present sensitiveness in regard to the eastern question; so that none, be he Jew, Turk, or infidel, can become Emir, Bey, or King, of Judea without having the Autocrat for his inveterate foe. But Britain will see to this in due time. I refer to Jerusalem's middle-age royalty here to show that her transient independence is quite compatible with a continuance of the Gentile times. But a colony, with Jerusalem for its provincial capital, is still a Gentile dependency. A Jewish colony surrounded by the Ottoman, the Russian, the Persian, the Arab, and the Egyptian, could not sustain itself unless protected by a strong maritime power. It must therefore be like Judea under the Persians of old, a province of a Gentile dominion until the Lord shall come. But its prosperity under the power shadowing with wings—Isaiah 18: 1—will soon pass away. The Assyrian river will overflow it even to the neck, and breach the very walls of the Holy City, which Sennacherib could not do; for 'the city shall be taken'—Zechariah 14: 2. The worst of the Gentiles then trample it in the dust. Its brief colonial well-being will have vanished like a dream; and have given place to a barbaric degradation, evincing that the 'wickedness' of her captors is indeed 'great'—Joel 3: 13; for 'the houses shall be rifled, and the women ravished,' and half of its inhabitants sent off as prisoners by the enemy. This semi-deportation of the people by the chief of the 'all nations' assembled at the siege, characterises the future capture of the city. Zechariah prophesied after its Chaldean overthrow, and during its restoration under the Persians. He must, therefore, have referred to a future overthrow. His prediction could not have been fulfilled under Titus, because all the people who remained were led away captive; and the city was wholly destroyed: whereas the prophet intimates, that the city will not be destroyed, in saying that 'the residue of the people shall not be cut off from the city.' The city therefore remains, and half the Jews with it, earnestly desiring their Messiah to appear, and deliver them if ever they did. There has been no siege since the Roman armies (who were the Lord's hosts for the destruction—Daniel 9: 26, explained by Matthew 22: 7) destroyed it, in which the Jews withstood a Gentile assault; it can therefore only be a future event, and contemporary with the going forth of the Lord to 'fight against those nations.' He did not fight against the Romans; but on the contrary, fought against Judah and Jerusalem until they were destroyed utterly: but in the future siege he will fight against the Gog-armies of the nations 'as when he fought in the day of battle'—Joshua 10: 11, in victorious defence of Jerusalem and the Jews of the third part. It is 'then'—after the coming capture of the city garrisoned by Jews and their protectors—that the Lord goes forth with his mighty ones—Joel 3: 11; 2 Thessalonians 1: 7, and stands with his feet on the Mount of Olives, the place from which he ascended to 'the right hand of power.' His electric tread evokes an earthquake that divides the Mount, as a mountain was divided on the west of the city by the earthquake in Uzziah's reign. All these things characterise the siege and capture as one unexampled in the history of the world. The deliverance of Jerusalem and the fall of Rome are the glorious incidents that mark the fulfilment off the Gentile times; and until they happen no arithmetical calculation of the 1335 days can be admitted which does not stretch forward to that desirable consummation.

It is readily agreed, that there are but two gatherings of Judah from captivity, and one of the Ten Tribes, which is subsequent to Judah's second; for 'I will save the tents of Judah first,' saith the Lord. But the colonisation, I speak of, will not be a gathering of the tribe of Judah. The great bulk of the tribe will be shut up in the nations subject to Gog—the north and the south, which 'keep back,' and refuse to 'give up.' But there will be sufficient for British policy forthcoming from other parts. The Lord saves the Tribe of Judah, while Elijah is fulfilling his mission with the Ten; which will be perfected by the reunion of the Twelve into one stick in Messiah's hand, by the Lord himself—Ezekiel 37: 16-28.

When I spoke of M. Rothschild adorning his brows with the diadem of Judah's kings, on the hypothesis of the news being true that he might assume the title of emir, bey, or king, in the event of the purchase being made; I did not refer to the crown of David, which none can wear but one of David's lineage, and that one will not be Zedekiah, but Jesus, the only living descendant of David, who is both David's Son and Lord. Judah has had Kings not of David's lineage. For 129 years Judah was governed by Jewish Kings of the tribe of Levi, the Asmoneans; whose race gave place to the Gentile dynasty of Herod. These were Kings of Judah, that is reigning over Judah's commonwealth until the sceptre departed from it; but who wore not the crown or diadem of David. My remark therefore does not at all clash with Ezekiel's celebrated prophecy of the abasement of David's crown and kingdom until the appearing of the Lord to restore, and take possession of them. If Rothschild, or any other Jew or Gentile, were to become governor of a colony of Jews in Palestine with the title of King, he would be either adorning his own brows, or some power would have done it for him, with the diadem of Judah's king, in the sense in which I used the phrase. Jerusalem is traditionally, as I have shown, a precious stone in the diadem or crown of "His Apostolic Majesty" of Austria; which would be plucked from thence by any one who should assume the title and possess the power. It would be an earnest as it were of returning royalty to the Jews; and be very far from shaking the faith of any one who regarded the present but as shadows of the substance which is of Christ.

The colonisation of Judea by Jews under the protection of a Gentile government, is neither "restitution," "restoration," nor "regeneration." Nothing short of a national establishment in the land, under Messiah and his brethren, constitutes either of them in the scriptural sense. The settlement of a colony there has no more to do with restitution than Meshullams farming in Artor's valley. A hundred thousand Meshullams in Judea would be no restoration. Restitution is not simply a return of the race, but the setting up again of institutions that once existed there—the restitution or restoration of the kingdom again to the Twelve Tribes; this is the re-institution, or restitution spoken of by all the prophets from Moses to the revealer of the Apocalypse to John. No Gentile powers can accomplish this, though aided by all the Jews on earth: for the Restored Kingdom exists under an amended Mosaic code, whose emendation (diorthrosis) can only be defined, administered, and adapted to the exigencies of the world, by the King of Israel himself, and his associate priests and kings. Our worthy friend of the Advent Harbinger is, no doubt, very anxious for the appearing of the King in power and great glory. So am I, and for more reasons than need be expressed. But we must take care not to allow our wishes, or desires, to lead us to conclusions not in harmony with the testimony and sound reason. I would have no delay; but I am compelled to confess that there will yet be some. The working out of the approaching judgment upon principles illustrated in God's past dealings with nations, and empires, requires time—a dozen years at least; and in these days of steam and electricity how much may be accomplished in that period! This brief delay will, perhaps, be the salvation of many; for, how numerous are they who are praying for the appearing of the Lord, who have not even began to prepare for his appearance. Let us not therefore be impatient of arguments that do not confirm us in our wishes. “Thy will, O Lord, not mine be done!” should be pre-eminently the disposition of the student of the prophetic word. I see a war among the powers resulting from an antagonism to French ambition, which must precede the battle of Armageddon; the Great City has also to be divided into three parts; and the Feet of Nebuchadnezzar's Image have to be fashioned into shape out of the materials that exist. This requires time; and during this time the colony is forming and prospering to tempt the spoiler to his destruction by the stone power, on the mountains of Israel. But I need add no more at present, than to say, that these explanations of points of difficulty are submitted to my friend and his readers in the same frank and benevolent spirit, so graciously manifested on his part, by his sincere well-wisher the

THE BIBLE DOCTRINE CONCERNING THE TEMPTER CONSIDERED.

We have ascertained satisfactorily, because scripturally, as it appears to me, that the thing, styled in the Greek New Testament diabolos, and rendered devil in the English version, is SIN IN THE FLESH, He that “walks according to the flesh” “serves sin,” diabolos, or the devil. The mortal body is “the body of sin,” or Sin Incarnate, which with its affections, lusts, and transgressions, is styled “the Old Man,” than whom no imaginary devil can be more wicked, and defiant of God and his law. The Old Man in his individual, social, and political manifestations is the diabolos or devil of the New Testament mystery—1 Timothy 3: 16—(The New Testament is the exhibition of the great mystery of godliness.), and treated of accordingly. Destroy the ascendancy of the sin-principle of the flesh over the thoughts and actions, and you have a moral development of the New Man, and then eradicate it from the flesh by the Spirit in a resurrection or transformation to eternal life, and you the New Man in combined moral and physical manifestation, “isangelos,” “equal to an angel”—Luke 20: 36. There is no sin in the flesh of the angelic nature; therefore it cannot die. No element of it has “the power of death,” so that diabolos exists not in angelic society. The devil has no place there. Being nothing in their nature causing them to transgress, or Cross the line of the Divine will, there are no ta erga diabolon, works of sin, among them. But all is just as God would have it; and it would be so here but for the disturbing principle called Sin. Eradicate this, and “the will of the Father will be done on earth as it is in heaven,” that is, in angelic society.

From what I have set forth on this subject, our worthy friend will see that I do not speak in Elpis Israel of the agency in the original temptation as only an animal. If there had been nothing in the constitution of the original nature of man impressible by the suggestions of the Serpent, there could have been no transgression. Had Eve’s nature been isangelic instead of animal, there would have been no internal response to the external enticement. That internal something was not essentially evil; because, though possessing it, Adam and Eve was pronounced “very good.” It is not evil to admire the beautiful, and to wish to possess it; to desire to gratify the taste, and to aspire to the wisdom of “the gods,” or Elohim: but all this becomes evil when its attainment is sought by crossing the limit forbidden of God. The seeking to attain by crossing the line, Paul teaches was the result, not of innate wickedness, but of deception. The Serpent beguiled Eve. Had she been certain of the consequences she would not have transgressed. She had no experience of evil. It might be a very agreeable thing for any thing she knew; and highly promotive of happiness. God had warned her of danger in the pursuit of knowledge through disobedience; but then, if they were to go back to the dust, that is, to die, what was the meaning of that Tree of Lives? Did not God mean something else? If they crossed the line in relation to the Tree of Knowledge, could they not eat also of that other tree, and live forever? There seemed to her mind to be an uncertainty about returning to the dust, when she lost sight of the law. This was “the weakness of the flesh.” There was no uncertainty of consequences so long as she thought God meant what he said; but being deceived on this point, and so made doubtful of it, she ventured to experiment. But, however doubtful of what might be, if she had adhered strictly to what God had said, she would still have continued “very good.” “Weakness,” mental and physical, is an original element of animal nature; as “power” is of the angelic. Adam’s nature was “very good” as an animal nature; but still it was weak, and therefore deceivable and terminable. This weakness is founded in the unfitness of air, electricity, blood, and food, to maintain organised dust, or flesh, in life and power forever. The life-principles being weak, the flesh is weak in all its operations, mental and physical. The life of the angelic nature, or spiritual body, is not maintained on animal principles; but by the direct action of God’s Spirit on dust so organised as to be adapted to its operations. It is therefore strong. When Adam’s weak nature began to think and act, independently of the divine law, its weakness, before an undefiled weakness, became evil in its workings, and deteriorating in its effects; and acquired the name of Sin from its having brought forth sin, or transgression of law.

The undefiled weakness of the flesh, enticed and deceived by sophistry from without, is, in few words, the definition of the original temptation. The law of God was weak through the flesh—Romans 8: 3, not through the strength of the Serpent. Had the flesh been strong, the Serpent would have been powerless with all his sagacity. But the weakness thrown into a ferment by serpent-subtlety became beguiling; and the beguiling subtlety, taking occasion by the commandment, deceived them, and by it slew them—Romans 7: 11. What I have said about the Serpent in Elpis Israel stands as it was. I have affirmed neither more nor less than what Moses and the apostles say. “It was more subtile,” or acute, “than any beast, of the field which the Lord God had made.” It is generally supposed that the serpent was employed by the Devil to beguile the woman. “It cannot be doubted,” says Calmet, “but that by the Serpent, we are to understand the Devil; who merely employed the Serpent as a vehicle to seduce the first woman.” This teaches the existence of an invisible devil before the Serpent. The Bible, however, does not teach this. Diabolos had no existence before the formation of man; but the Serpent had. Moses gives not the slightest hint of the existence of a devil before the creations of the sixth day. The Serpent first; then man; afterwards, woman; and lastly, diabolos, or devil. This is the scriptural order of their manifestation, the revelation in the flesh of the incitant to transgression, or diabolos, being coeval with the Fall. Man existed before the devil, and will flourish in eternal glory after his destruction, when Sin and all its works are eradicated from the earth.

“The beginnings” of Genesis 1: 1; Matthew 19: 8; John 1: 1 and 8: 44, are manifestly not all the same. The “beginnings” of Genesis, Matthew, and John 1: 1, have relation to the creation week; but that of John 8: 44, to the conversation of the Serpent with Eve, and the murder of Abel. The Fall was probably several years after the creation week; and Abel’s murder certainly many. Father diabolos was not a murderer before he brought our first parents under sentence of death. It was then he slew them by the commandment. The beginning referred to in this text is the apo kataboles kosmou, or formation of the world, laid in its sin-constitution—Genesis 3: 14-21. Jesus is there talking to the Jews of their father, Sin, whose servants they were. They regarded themselves as the freeborn descendants of Abraham; but he told them, they were bondmen to their father, Sin. “Whosoever committeth sin, is Sin’s doulos or bondservant.” He offered to make them free of this yoke by the truth. “I know,” says he, “that ye are Abraham’s seed; but ye seek to kill me, because my word hath no place in you.” This murderous disposition constituted them the seed of a living father, as well as of the dead Abraham; for Jesus says, “I speak what I have seen with my father, and ye do what ye have seen—with your father.” Here was a question between them of fatherhood. Jesus claimed to be seed of Abraham and God; while he charged them with being seed of Abraham and Sin—they were in other words, begotten of sinful flesh, while he was begotten of God, sinful flesh being the matrice of both parties. They said, “Abraham is our father,” or begetter; but Jesus objected to this, because they did not do the works of Abraham; showing that he was speaking, not of lineage, but of sonship based on disposition and character. They contended for purity of lineage—that their fatherhood was not of Gentile idolaters, but Jewish believers in God, which constituted them children of God. Jesus charged them with doing the deeds of their father, which they understood to mean, of their Gentile paternity; for they said, “We be not born of fornication: we have one Father even God.” They considered that purity of descent from Abraham constituted them children of God, without regard to character; but Jesus taught them that “the flesh profiteth nothing.” If man would be “the children of God, being the children of thee resurrection,” it was by being like Abraham in faith and obedience; which they were not: but being Sin’s bondmen, he said to them in the words of the forty fourth verse, substituting Paul’s definition of diabolos for “devil,” “ye are of the father, Sin, and the lusts of your father (the lusts of sinful flesh) ye will do. Sin was a murderer from the beginning (or from the Fall) and caused not to stand (hesteken) in the truth (or law) because truth is not in it. When Sin uttereth a lie, it speaks of its own things; for it is a liar, and the father of it.” This is perfectly intelligible. All men are Sin’s children who are born of blood, of the will of the flesh, or of the will of man; and they continue such until they “become sons of God” by becoming Abraham’s seed through Jesus as the Christ—John 1: 12-13; Galatians 3: 26-29.

From what I have said under this head, our good friend will perceive that I teach that the devil or diabolos had a place in the beginning; as really as the Serpent; and that place was in the flesh; while the serpent was somewhere not far off from the woman and the tree.

3. I come now to Mr. Cook’s third inquiry, “Does not the New Testament teach there is a Tempter, as really as a “Christ”—the tempted?” In reply to this, I remark, that in the case of Jesus, diabolos and satan were both concerned. When he was filled with the Holy Spirit he was led, Mark says “driven,” by the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted, or properly, to be put to the proof under Sin—hypo tou diabolou. Their nature was his nature; for “the children of God being partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same”—Hebrews 2: 14. Hence, he was sent forth “in a form of Sin’s flesh”—en homoiomati sarkos hamartias—Romans 8: 3; and thus God made him sin, (that is, flesh and blood) for us—2 Corinthians 11: 14, and on account of sin, gave judgment against sin in the flesh of Jesus.

The testimonies show that Jesus was “under sin” as a man under a burden. —He groaned under it in painful travail. While among the wild beasts of the wilderness a (similar situation to the first Adam’s) he felt the danger, and desolation of his situation, and the cravings of a long protracted fast. He ate nothing all this time, his life being sustained by the Spirit: and at the end became very hungry. Luke terms this, “being forty days put to the proof under diabolos,” or sin; that is, in his case, under the perturbation of weakened flesh and blood. This was before the adversary came to him. His nature was severely tried during this period; and it remained to be seen, whether his flesh thus weakened would stand in the truth; or like Adam’s, seek present gratification by transgressing the divine law. The end of the forty days appears to have been the prepared crisis of the trial. At this junction, one came to test him. Jesus styles him, as he termed Peter, “Satan,” that is, adversary. This individual, probably, was an angel; for angels were concerned in the matter, as appears from the testimony; and Paul says, “the very adversary (Satan) transforms himself into an angel of light,” or knowledge—2 Corinthians 5: 21. Christ’s visitor was evidently a person of scriptural information; and as he appeared as a tester at a time especially prepared for the trial, I have no doubt he was sent by the same Spirit that led Jesus into the wilderness there to be put to the proof. I conclude then, that he was “an angel of light,” not shining with brightness, but appearing as a friendly man, well instructed in the word.

Now Luke attributes what this concealed adversary suggested to diabolos, or one causing to transgress, but in this case without success; for they were suggestions to Jesus under the workings of sin's flesh, seeing that "he was in all things put to the proof according to the likeness without offence." The visitor, though styled "devil," was not diabolos within, as in our case, but an excitant thereof; in "the likeness," or sin's flesh; therefore his sayings are recorded as those of diabolos. Jesus being begotten of God, as was Adam the first likewise, and not of the will of sin's flesh, the promptings to transgression did not proceed from within. In this the form of sin's flesh he assumed, differed from the form we possess. The promptings in our case do often proceed from within. In the two Adams they came from without—from the serpent in the one case; and from the angel of light in the other. These occupied for the time the position of the then as yet unbegotten diabolos relatively to their flesh, till the lust they might excite should by the strength thereof bring forth sin, when their personal missions would be terminated, and sin enthroned as the conceived diabolos of the form, or likeness of sin's flesh.

In the second Adam's case the testing adversary failed to move him from the stand he had taken of absolute obedience to the will of God, whatever might ensue. He appealed to the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life, but all without effect. The law of the Spirit of life within him was too strong for these appeals. He extinguished their effect by the word of faith, which was his shield, and emerged from the trial undefiled. The tester of his allegiance then left him; and whatever perturbation may have been excited, it subsided into the peacefulness of a conscience void of offence towards God.

In studying Christ's trial it is important not to forget what I have intimated above about his nature; because it was the point of difference in the nature of the two Adams from ours that caused the ordeals they were subjected to, to assume the forms narrated. No one has ever been put to the proof through a speaking reptile since Adam's fall; nor has any one been tried by an angel of light since Jesus successfully resisted his suggestions. — Paul's phrase "in the likeness of sinful flesh"—en homoiomati sarkos hamartias—I have rendered more literally "in a form of Sin's flesh." "Sinful" is an adjective expressive of the quality of the "flesh," and signifies flesh full of sin. —This is a form of flesh common to all mankind, and indicated by Paul in the words, “in me, that is, in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing.” But Adam’s flesh before his fall, and the Christ’s flesh, were forms of flesh and blood to which the English word “sinful” is inapplicable. — They were not full of sin. The first Adam’s was a form in which there was no sin at all, but only a physical weakness inseparable from flesh and blood. Luke styles him “Son of God,” because he was begotten by his Spirit from mother earth. Having transgressed, his weakness was defiled, and became sin, and his flesh “Sin’s flesh”—sarx hamartias—a form afterwards inherited by Abraham in common with all mankind. But Christ’s was still another form of Sin’s flesh than either Abraham’s or Adam’s before his fall. The homiomal difference of his flesh from Adam’s consisted in its maternity. Adam’s came directly from the dust of the ground; Christ’s from that form of Sin’s flesh styled “the seed of Abraham”—Hebrews 2: 16. It differed from this, however, in its paternity. Abraham’s daughter, Mary, was “begotten of blood, of the will of the flesh, or of man;” but her son Jesus, of the will of God by his creative power, which constituted him a peculiar form of Sin’s flesh; and hence the propriety of my more literal rendering of en homoiomati sarkos hamartias—a form of Sin’s flesh—even the third form under which flesh and blood has been manifested since the creation-week.

In Hebrews 4: 15, the phrase “form of Sin’s flesh” is expressed by the single word homoiotes, “likeness, resemblance, or similitude;” as, kata panta kath, homoioteta, “in all things according to the likeness.” One thing may resemble another without being identical in every particular. This was the case with Christ’s flesh. It was Sin’s flesh so far as its maternity was concerned, but not as to its fatherhood. In this he differed from the Jews, who had Sin’s flesh for their parentage on both sides, which they illustrated in their persecution of their maternal brother, who was “born after the Spirit;” thereby proving that they were the children and slaves of father, Sin, or diabolos. Still Christ’s paternity did not destroy the physical likeness of his flesh to Abraham’s seed; it only removed from it the reigning principle hereditarily transmitted by the will of man, called diabolos, or “devil.” His flesh, however, was still reduced in strength below that of Adam’s original nature, because of its maternal defilement. Hence, to place it on a par with the first Adam’s, that there might be equality of strength, Jesus was anointed or Christened, by which he became “full of the Holy Spirit.” This filling did not destroy the homoiotēs or likeness to Sin's flesh. It was still possible for Christ to feel the force and influence of sophistical appeals to the lusts of Sin's flesh with which he was burdened as with "a loathsome disease"—Psalm 38: 6-7. Hence, says the apostle, "he was put to the proof in all things or according to the likeness," or resemblance of his flesh to his brethren's in its susceptibilities, "without offence."

There being no reigning *diabolos, "devil," or Sin, transmitted by the will of man in Adam or Christ, as in the flesh of all mankind, that causing not to stand in the truth, or diabolos, is in their cases, and in their's alone, to be referred to the Serpent and the Angel of light. But this does not constitute them what the Gentiles call "the Devil," or "His Satanic Majesty." The Serpent, because of his agency in the affair, became the Bible symbol representative of the evil he had done in the unconsciously immoral use he had made of what he knew by observation, and was able to express in speech. —It would be very injudicious to rush to the conclusion that, because the Serpent and the Angel of light stood related to the two Adams as the diabolos, or that causing to err, therefore, whenever the word diabolos occurs, it means the serpent or angel of light. If it did, it by no means follows that it would signify the Devil of gentile "organised theology," which is as dissimilar from them as they are from one another. Christ was not put to the proof by a serpent, nor by the serpent; nor was Adam by an angel of knowledge, nor by the angel of light, who offered his suggestions to Jesus. They were both probed to the quick; but by provers suitable to the times, place, and circumstances around them.

But, though the proving agents in the trials of the two Adams have never experimented upon any others of our race, Christ's brethren stand related to a power, styled ho peiradzoon, which is rendered in the English version, "the tempter"—1 Thessalonians 3: 5. —By reference to the passage it is manifest that the tempter alluded to there was not an invisible Devil, but a persecuting power under which the disciples lived in Thessalonica. They were suffering persecution when Paul wrote to them for their encouragement. "Let no man," says he, "be moved by these afflictions: for yourselves know that we are appointed thereunto." He then refers to what he had told them before, and not them only, but all others; that "it is through much tribulation that they (the baptised) must enter the Kingdom of God.” But he reminds them that they are not alone in their trouble, but are “suffering like things of their countrymen” that Christ’s brethren on Judea had of the Jews. This saying reveals the power as that of the Gentile authorities in Thessalonica, who, stirred up by “lewd fellows of the baser sort,” were carrying into effect as far as they could “the decrees of Caesar,” with all the pains and penalties annexed, against the refractory—Acts 17: 5-8; 2 Thessalonians 1: 4-5. These were torture, imprisonment, and death, which served to prove their inseparable devotion to the doctrine of God’s Kingdom, for which they suffered. These “persecutions and tribulations” might be avoided upon one condition which was offered to them by the enemy—if they would renounce the faith, and burn incense to Caesar’s image. This was the temptation offered to them by the tempting power. If they yielded to the temptation, they saved their lives, but lost “God’s Kingdom and glory.” Fearing this result in some cases, Paul says, “I sent to know your faith, lest by some means the tempter have tempted you, and our labour be in vain.”

In the case before us the tempter was the imperial pagan Roman power, styled in the apocalypse, “a great red dragon,” and “*the great Dragon, the ancient Serpent, the surnamed diabolos and the Satan.”—Revelation 12: 3, 9. The Dragon, or Serpent, was the symbol of the Roman Sovereignty selected by the Romans themselves as representative of its imperality. Chrysostom, who flourished in the 4th century, says that “the Emperors wore among other things to distinguish them silken robes embroidered with gold, in which Dragons were represented.” Gibbon also says, speaking of the procession of Constantine from Milan to Rome, “He was encompassed by the glittering arms of the numerous squadrons of his guards and cuirassiers. Their streaming banners of silk, embroidered with gold and shaped in the form of Dragons, waved round the person of the emperor.” The emperor Constantine speaks of the Dragon as the symbol of the pagan Roman Sovereignty in his epistle to Eusebius and other bishops concerning the rebuilding and repair of churches. “Liberty being now restored,” says he, “and that Dragon being removed from the administration of public affairs, by the providence of the great God, and by my ministry; I esteem the great power of God to have been made manifest even to all.”

Moreover, on the testimony of Eusebius, we are informed, that a picture of Constantine was set up over the palace gate, with the cross over his head, and under his feet “the great enemy of mankind, who persecuted the church by means of impious tyrants, in the form of a Dragon,” transfixed with a spear through the midst of his body, and falling headlong into the depth of the sea. Hence it is evident that the species of serpent called the dragon was as much the symbol of the Roman power, as the lion is of the British at this day. The Romans probably borrowed it from Egypt, which had become a province of their dominion. When an independent monarchy under the Pharaohs, its majesty was represented by “the great dragon, that lieth in the midst of his rivers.” The annexation of so ancient and renowned a kingdom was very likely celebrated by the adoption of its ancient symbol into the Roman heraldry. Hence, the Roman dragon is styled “the ancient serpent,” or the Egyptian—Revelation 11: 8—The great city, or Roman empire, is here figuratively styled Egypt.

Whether God in his providence influenced the governments of the world to represent their several sovereignties by peculiar symbols, I cannot say; but that he has adopted them in his word when treating of their policy and destiny relatively to Israel, and the Saints, is beyond all question. The Egyptian serpent, the Assyrian lion, the Persian ram, the Macedonian goat, the French frogs, &c., are all examples that he has done so. The adoption by the Romans of the serpent, styled in the prophets, “the piercing serpent, even leviathan that crooked serpent; the dragon that is in the sea”—Isaiah 27: 1, as the symbol of the sovereignty that rules the imperial territory, is singularly appropriate. Its scriptural fitness is seen in the fact, that “all the power of the enemy” with which God’s people have had to contend on the arena of prophecy, originated in the sophistry of the serpent; and is found civilly and ecclesiastically organised in the ancient and modern imperial dominion of the Roman earth. This power has ever been the adversary of Israel after the flesh and spirit, and of the truth, since the Holy land became a Roman province; and will so continue to be “until the Ancient of Days shall come, and judgment shall be given to the saints of the Most High; and the time comes that they shall take the kingdom, and possess it”—Daniel 7: 22, 18. It is not only their Adversary in making war upon them as a people who will hereafter seize upon its dominion; but when it gets them into its clutches, it endeavours to turn them from the faith, and to compel them to embrace its own superstition, and so cause them not to stand in the truth. It is, therefore, a power causing to cross the line, or to transgress the divine law, that is, a diabolos, as well as THE ADVERSARY, or ho Satanas. It is for this reason the Spirit has “surnamed,” the imperial serpent, in the words of the English version, “the Devil and Satan,” or more articularly, “the surnamed Devil and the Satan”—ho kaloumenos diabolos kai ho Satanas. —And here we will pause till our next issue.

MISSION TO THE DEAD.

Immortal-Soulism is producing its own peculiar fruit in the sectarian churches and denominations, or Brotherhoods, Pagan Mesmerism, which is its ancient sire, and the parent also of all the spiritologies of our day, is possessing them with confounding effect. The brotherhood theologies have prepared professors for any and all of the speculations arising out of surrounding chaos. They have alienated the people from Moses and the Prophets; so that being disarmed of the Spirit's sword, they are falling defencelessly, by thousands, before Mesmerism, theologically interpreted. Mesmerism proves all things conceived by the fleshly mind, because it is of and from the flesh. It begins in the flesh and ends in the flesh. Thus the circle is complete. Animal magnetism reveals the flesh to the flesh, being the spirit of the flesh. It is the magic lantern to the thalami off the optic nerves, passing before them the spectralia of "philosophy and vain deceit." Hence, sky-kingdom heavens, aerial sheols in outer darkness fifty miles sky-high, subterranean hobgoblin hells, spirit-worlds, immortal souls in mortal sinful flesh, baby-spirit salvation, pre-resurrection ghost-life, adult salvation without belief or obedience of the gospel, and a thousand other modifications of foolishness, are all satisfactorily proved in the opinion of the carnal mind by mesmerism. The brain thinks mesmerically, so that in the absence of scriptural knowledge, it approves them all. Thus, great flaming revivalists, to whom the bible was more or less of an embarrassment, have become so illuminated by animal magnetism as to reject the scriptures altogether. Now, it is a notable fact, that while they have done this, they continue brawling advocates for the "immortal soul" of the flesh, and the "spirit-world" adapted to it. This is consistent enough, for the Bible gives no aid and comfort to immortal-soulism; so that by throwing it aside as of inferior authority to mesmerism, or of no authority at all, their position is strengthened in argument with those who argue against immortal-soulism on natural grounds. The only immortality the Bible reveals is immortality of a resurrection, or transformed, body. It promises this only to the saints of God, to qualify them for an endless possession of his kingdom. The Bible is therefore unencumbered with the foolishness of Mesmeric Theology. It teaches nothing that the flesh approves in relation to the world to come. This conviction relieves us of much lumber, and enables us to make short work of otherwise interminable logomachies.

Mesmerised theology seems to be preparing troublous times for the Campbellite Brotherhood, among the rest. For years past Mr. C. has been labouring in a certain direction, which the editor of the "Christian Magazine" appears determined to alter. Mr. C., I believe, holds to a hobgoblin hell, in which immortal-souls writhe and shriek in eternal torture. He regards this as a Bible truth, and quite consistent with the attributes of God! The "Magazine's" theory is opposed to this. "Speculations," says J. B. F., "as to the exact nature and duration of punishment are unwise, because neither is clearly revealed. The Spirit which dictated the Bible, seems to have intended that an indefiniteness should spread itself over the whole subject."—M. H., p. 393. These few words, if received, tell with humbling effect upon my friend at Bethany. They tell him, in effect, that he has misconceived the whole matter; which is doubtless true, without adding an atom of credibility to the Magazine's assumption. Mr. C. has been contending for "the exact nature and duration of punishment" for a long period; but his editorial brother in faith tells him that they are not revealed: therefore all he has been writing hitherto is mere speculation; and "speculations," says the Magazine, "are unwise." Well, I do admit that my friend has been a very unwise and even weak speculator in his time, upon a multitude of topics; but with all his wanderings and meanderings, it must be confessed that he is right in repudiating the notion of the "indefiniteness" of the whole subject of punishment. Though Mr. C. cannot define the nature and duration of the punishment revealed in the Bible, its definiteness is nevertheless exhibited there. But to understand the subject, the mission of the Christ must be understood; concerning this, however, Mr. C. and the Magazine are, both of them, in the dark—therefore neither of them can be expected to talk any thing very sensible in the case. In regard to them it can only be a question of relative erraticism—whether the old absurdity or the new one, be the more unscriptural!

"Heaven and hell are in our midst every day," says the Magazine, as quoted by Mr. C., who regards the saying as no evidence of its editorial wisdom. But there is more truth than fiction in the conceit. The present world is the Sinner's Heaven, and the Saint's Hell; hence it is styled "an evil world." If hell be a place of suffering, the Saints have certainly had it here for ages. God has chastened them; and the Sin Power, and all in whom Sin's spirit reigns, have tormented and destroyed them with dreadful cruelty. While the present state has been the hell of the Saints, it has been a place of Paradise for their enemies. These have the glory, and honour, and power, and riches off the system, at their control. They possess fine farms, well stocked and tilled, and yielding abundance of wealth; splendid mansions; accomplished families, and all that heart can wish. It is the Sinners who possess these things in superfluity; and so much do they enjoy themselves, that they would hold on to them for ever if they could. This is all the heaven they will ever possess, unless they embrace the gospel of the kingdom, and devote their substance to the Lord, and become his stewards of the same. Heaven in this world or state, and heaven in the next, is an allotment granted to none of the sons of men who would partake of the joy of the Lord. Heaven now and hell hereafter; or Hell now and heaven in a future state, are the alternatives presented to mankind under times of knowledge. Who that understands 'the word of the kingdom' would prefer the Sinners' Heaven to the Saints'? Or, who would not rather endure the past and present torments of the Saints in body and estate, than encounter the terrors of the Lord in the Sinner's hell to come? It is better to pass from a terrestrial heavenly state, as the Saints will do; than to descend from the Sinner's into a hell to be manifested in the territory of the Fourth Beast of Daniel, for the torment of the goat-nations and their rulers at the appearing of the Lord. A heaven and a hell, then, 'are in our midst every day;' but not the heaven of the Saints, nor the hell of the wicked. These have neither of them an existence yet; and can have none till the Lord comes, and literally turns the world upside down.

But the foolishness of the Magazine becomes flagrant in its notion of a 'posthumous mission to the dead, (who have not before heard the gospel,) in order to translate them from a miserable prison to heaven.' The ghosts, or disembodied immortal souls, of dead evangelists, I suppose, are to be sent to immortal miserable, or hellish spirits, in the spirit-world, to preach the gospel to them, to induce them to repent, and to exchange their misery for bliss! I do not find what sort of a gospel is to be preached in that mesmeric world; but I suppose the same sky-kingdomism, with spirit-baptism in spirit-water, for spirit-remission of fleshly sins, as contended for by the brotherhood to which the editor of the Christian Magazine belongs! Nearly all hell will doubtless be emptied in twenty-four hours, if the gates be wide enough for the out-rushing crowd, after the spirits of the missionaries arrive, preaching translation to heaven; nearly all, I say, for it is the vast majority alleged to be there, who have never heard of gospel truth.

A gentleman of Pittsburgh, rejoicing in the name of the Church, who constitutes himself 'armour-bearer' to my friend the Supervisor, writes concerning the Magazine's 'hallucination,' in the following words: —'I am truly sorry to see that bro. Ferguson has got a maggot in his brain'—the Caledonians say 'a bee in his bonnet,' which is decidedly more elegant. 'This,' he continues, 'will destroy his usefulness and influence,' that is, in propagating Campbellism; 'and probably end in his becoming a wandering star, like Mr. Thomas. This figment of bro. Ferguson's is, in my estimation, infinitely worse than Thomasism. If there be 'a damnable heresy' this is unquestionably one. I can see in it a perfect Pandora box. I regard the propagation of such a sentiment as the destruction of all that is vital in religion.'

Poor Mr. Church! What dost thou know of what thou callest 'Thomasism!' Many years ago thou didst see a few things from my pen when I was in fellowship with the darkness out of which thou hast not discovered star-light enough to wander for the last twenty years. Thou hast read all the foolishness palmed upon me by thy Supervisor; but of what I really believe and teach, thou art as ignorant as the 'maggot' in thy brother's brain. Whatever it be, it seems there is something 'infinitely worse' than what constitutes me 'a wandering star.' But if thou knewest what I teach concerning thy religious system, I doubt if thou wouldst favour my supposed views with the admission of an infinite betterment compared with the 'unquestionably damnable heresy' before us. Thy religious system is without vitality, and can never live unless what thou dost ignorantly style 'Thomasism,' be infused into it, that is, 'the gospel of the kingdom.' The bee in thy brother's bonnet can do the vitality of a corpse no harm. His religion is thy religion, and for all it can offer, a man who understands Moses and the Prophets, would not exchange a pinch of snuff.

Since the above was written, the eighth number of the Magazine has come to hand. The editor declares that my friend C. has misrepresented him. I regret to be compelled to testify, from dear-brought experience, that he is quite capable of doing so. ‘There is not a statement,’ says the editor, ‘which he makes, with regard to our views, that is true.’ We doubt not but the Magazine knows its own sentiments best; and is quite competent to say if fairly represented or not. Mr. C. does not faithfully quote the scripture; therefore it is not to be expected he will do the fair thing by an opponent. This is a pity; for no end is promoted but evil. But I almost despair of teaching him better manners. Let the Magazine take him in hand, and see if it can make anything of him; may be he is not incorrigible.

The editor cries out for justice, sheer justice, as all he asks; but this, we opine, he’ll never get. We never could obtain it; and his heresy is pronounced to be ‘unquestionably damnable,’ and ‘infinitely worse than’ ours—being destructive of all vital religion. Mr. C. never acknowledges that he has committed, or is in the wrong.

The editor says, that the substance of the whole matter between him and his opponents is the utterance of ‘an opinion, that men who have not heard the gospel will hear it before they are condemned by it.’ By ‘men will hear it,’ I suppose he means disembodied immortal souls will hear it in prison, or hell, as he may define it. For this opinion there is not the shadow of a foundation in the Bible. It is absolutely true, that men who have not heard it will not be condemned by it. They are ‘condemned already’ by the Adamic sentence under which they are born—Dust thou art, and to dust thou shalt return. From this sentence, nothing can deliver men but the gospel of the kingdom, faithfully obeyed in their present corporeal entity, in the times before Christ appears and shuts the door. Men are not held responsible under ‘times of ignorance,’ for ‘the ground of condemnation is that light has come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light.’ This implies the offer of knowledge and its rejection. Where it has not been offered, there will be no resurrection to gospel-condemnation; this is reserved for those who sin against the light.

We are happy, from the evidence of the present number of the Magazine, to be able to acknowledge that we were mistaken in supposing, that the editor was a mere echo of our Bethanian friend. We have, however, still to complain of misrepresentation at his hands. But Mr. C. is repaying him in full for the measure he meted out to us. I have received no justice from the Magazine, and the Supervisor in return will grant him none. How admirably things work round in this crooked world of ours! "Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord." So let it be!

“SPIRITS IN PRISON.”

“Not the spirits ‘now’ in prison, but the spirits once in prison, while the Ark was preparing, which is, indeed, the key of interpretation. Peter’s key must open Peter’s lock.” But this happens not to be Peter’s key. It is Mr. Campbell’s, and completely fails of even passing the key-hole. He says, the prison was “a figurative prison.” True it was not a gaol; but then a gaol is not the only literal prison. Any place of confinement is a literal prison, be it a gaol, a grave, or a nation enclosing a captive nation. The prison referred to by Peter is manifestly literal; for in speaking of “the spirits” he says they are “in prison.” It is admitted that by “the spirits” are meant “the antediluvians;” now while the ark was preparing they had as much liberty as the unbelieving Jews of Peter’s day, or the people of the United States in ours. They did just what was right in their own eyes. In Noah’s time, they married and gave in marriage, caroused, and enjoyed themselves to their heart’s content, but how was it in Peter’s? They were literally in prison “body, soul, and spirit.” They knew nothing and could do nothing; and so they remain to this day—literally “in prison.”

To ascertain the nature or character of the prison, instead of referring to Moses and the Prophets, Mr. C. speculates on words in usu loquendi. He finds that “the specific idea” of the Greek family of words to which phulakee, “prison,” belongs, “is confinement.” This is doubtless a great discovery. The next revelation is, that “confinement has respect to time, as well as to place.” He ought to have said, “it has reference to place as well as to time,” for a place cannot be a prison independent of time. You may call a building a prison; but if it is to receive persons for no time it never can have an inmate, and therefore cannot be in fact a prison. Thus, whenever men are confined involuntarily for a longer or shorter time, there they are imprisoned, or in prison. Mr. Campbell says, Noah’s contemporaries were imprisoned for 120 years, unless they repented during that term; and he represents the deluge as the limit, or bound, or wall, as it were, of their figurative prison. He does not say where they were to go when set at liberty on repentance or death. Noah, I suppose, was set at liberty when he entered upon a year's confinement in the Ark! But let that pass. If Noah's contemporaries were in prison only for 120 years, were they set at liberty when engulfed in the deluge? Will Mr. Campbell tell us? And where do they enjoy their freedom? For liberty implies enjoyment. But, if the antediluvians were "in prison" while they were doing their own pleasure for 120 years, it is evident that Peter's contemporaries of Israel were also "in prison" "on pain of destruction by a deluge" of war—Daniel 9: 26. Peter's generation was the antitype of Noah's; so that if the latter were in prison during Noah's preaching by the Spirit for 120 years; the former were likewise for the forty years the same Spirit preached to them by Jesus and his apostles. "Noah," says he, "by word and deed, preached to them repentance or death." He preached to them in prison, did he? Yes. They did not repent? —No; therefore they were put to death at the end of their imprisonment! If this be granted, when sentence was executed they were then no longer in prison! This is the conclusion we are led to by Mr. Campbell's premises!

Death, in the scriptures is styled "captivity" which was "led captive" by Jesus in rising from among the dead as the first fruits of a future resurrection. But Mr. Campbell's speculation makes death, liberality; and by consequence, all the dead, freemen escaped from the figurative prison above ground! This is "the key of interpretation" Mr. Campbell uses in his attempt to demonstrate, that his own former rendering of Peter's phrase "the spirits in prison" by "the spirits now in prison," is "a mere speculative fancy." This is another among many instances adducible, of "Campbell against himself." But there is no telling what lengths a man will go to in stultifying himself when he undertakes to interpret the apostles without regard to Moses and the Prophets. He has not found Peter's key yet. The apostle's is a lock that cannot be picked by any human invention. Immortal-soulism is a pick that cannot reach the bolt; and disables all that work by it from opening the prison door. But for this crotchet, Mr. C. would not have forged so fanciful an interpretation, which he has just constructed for the occasion to get quit of the editor of the "Magazine's" opinion, which is a natural inference from his own speculations upon "Life and Death."

There is nothing in the text or context to prove that the antediluvians were in prison in any other sense than that all mankind are in the "bondage of corruption,” during Noah’s preaching. Speaking of the Holy Spirit it says “*having gone he preached to the spirits * * * formerly disobedient.*” When? “In the days of Noah.” Where were they in Peter’s day? “In prison;” therefore they are called “spirits in prison.” Where the prison is must be determined by “the law and the testimony,” not by reference to “the established laws of” sectarian “criticism,” however “sound” it may be supposed to be.

SALVATION WITHOUT FAITH!

“He that believeth not shall be condemned.”—JESUS CHRIST.

Dear Brother:

Conversing a few days ago on the merits of Elpis Israel, one of the brethren who had read it, stated his concurrence in most of the things therein contained. But after all, he says he cannot assent to the exclusion of the heathen, &c., from the salvation promised in the gospel.

The salvation of the heathen then became the subject of discussion between us; brethren D. and B. contending for their salvation on some other principle than that of faith in the gospel; and I for it on no other.

I attempted to prove, and I think did prove, that the faith was the only principle laid down in the Old and New Scriptures upon which a man can be saved; and that they made no exception in relation to the heathen. To this they objected; and in support of their opinion quoted the second chapter of Romans. I demurred to this, that “Gentile” there spoken of as keeping “The righteousness of the law,” could not mean the Gentiles in the sense understood by them, —a good, conscientious, virtuous, benevolent Gentile; but a gentile christian. In support of this I attempted to show that, if a gentile could, without ever having heard, or read the law, keep the righteousness of the law, so might a Jew have done; and then there would have been no need of having the law given to them; and thereby much trouble and expense have been saved. —Upon this we separated without coming to any agreement.

I write these few words, therefore, to request you to interpret the Bible teaching on this subject. The term “nature” seems to be the stronghold of the two brethren, and, indeed, of all natural religionists; and the second of Romans the chapter most relied on to prove this most mischievous of all traditions, “Natural Religion.” If you can spare time, we should like to know if the heathen, by beholding the works of the Great Architect of the universe ever came to a knowledge of the living and true

God, so as acceptably to worship him, or attain to salvation; or, has the mind of a gentile ever been so operated on by the contemplation of the wonderful works of creation as to impart to him a right to incorruptibility and life?

The doctrine of the Kingdom and Hope of Israel as exhibited by Jesus, the apostles, and yourself, is gaining ground here. I have returned hither (after an absence of three years) where once I met with such decided opposition from the brethren of “the reformation” in the advocacy of these sentiments; and now I meet with but few who do not entertain the same: not that I feel a pride in having first contended for them here; but because I rejoice in the spread of the gospel, and delight to see the Kingdom preached though for the sake of contention only.

Yours faithfully,

E. J. H. WHITE, M. D.

HEATHEN DEFINED—THE GOSPEL IS FOR THE SALVATION OF THE HEATHEN THROUGH BELIEF OF IT—NONE SAVED BUT THE DOERS OF THE WORD—IGNORANCE ALIENATES FROM ETERNAL LIFE—NATURE’S LOGIC—NATURE DEFINED—ORIGIN OF NATUTAL RELIGION—ITS INVENTERS INDICATED—THINGS IN WHICH THEY AGREE—NATURAL RELIGION AND GOD’S RELIGION IRRECONCILABLE ENEMIES—“BY NATURE” EXPLAINED—HEART CIRCUMCISED GENTILES AND JEWS TO INHERIT THE PROMISES.

Heathen is the Saxon equivalent for the Greek word ethnos, and the Hebrew goi, and properly signifies nation. It is in this sense that it is used in the sacred scriptures. The word Gentile is of the same import, only derived from the Latin gens. All nations, except Israel, being under “times of ignorance,” were merged in hopeless superstition; so that to be of the nations was equivalent to being an idolater: the word heathen, therefore, came to represent a man, or nations, worshipping idols; though the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin originals, are never used in this sense in the scriptures.

The salvation promised in the gospel is the salvation of Israel and the Heathen, in the sense of blessing all nations in Abraham and his Seed, on the principle of individual and national faith and obedience. The gospel has been preached for eighteen centuries to the nations for the salvation of heathen, in the sense of idolaters and natural religionists—“to take out from the Gentiles a people for God’s name.” This people are to be the immortal rulers of the nations, or heathen, in the Age to Come; when the heathen, no longer idolaters and natural religionists, shall be enlightened and “servng the Lord with one consent.” They are then “the nations of the saved,” sitting under their own vines and fig trees, with no tyrants to destroy them, and make them afraid as now. The separation of mankind into nations, however, is finally to cease; and all of the race who attain to eternal life will be merged into Israel then become immortal, by “the adoption, to wit, the redemption of the body;” as it is written, “I will make a full end of all nations whither I have scattered thee, O Israel, but I will not make a full end of thee”—Jeremiah 30: 11. The last eighteen centuries has been “the Day of Salvation,” the “accepted time,” a day of probation for individuals, who aspire to the glory, honour, and immortality of the Kingdom, as the reward of “the righteousness which is by faith:” the coming thousand years will be a day of blessedness and probation to the nations, saved from the evils now besetting them; in which vastly greater multitudes than now or heretofore, will become heirs of immortality and earth-inhabitation for ever, when the thousand years shall have passed away.

But, what the brethren D. and B. want to know is, is there not salvation from hell for idolaters, and natural religionists, idiots, and sucklings, now, without believing the gospel and being baptised? —They, and not they only, but all antichristendom, say there is salvation for them. —But the Bible has nothing to do with the soul hell they speak of. The salvation it proclaims is the deliverance of God’s people from sin, death, and the grave, and the bestowal upon them of glory and honour forever in his kingdom; and the deliverance of the nations, as already stated. —If they modify their proposition, and affirm that the parties indicated have part in this salvation without faith and its obedience, there is something tangible to lay hold of. Well, if it be so, it can be easily proved. There are the scriptures, show us the testimony; for the burden of proof lies upon D. and B. and the natural religionists. Ah, here they come with the second chapter of the letter to the Romans, telling us that the salvation of sinners without the obedience of faith is taught there! Now behold the proof—

“When the Gentiles having not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves: who show the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts the meanwhile accusing or else excusing one another.”

But I object to this as perfectly irrelevant, having not the least reference to idol worshippers, or the unenlightened. It refers to Gentile “doers of the law,” in the sense of their being justified by that system of righteousness which is “testified by the law and the prophets.” The “work of the law is written in the hearts” of such persons only, be they Jews or Gentiles. Of Israel under the New Covenant Jehovah says,

How is this done? Take an illustration from the doings on Pentecost. —The righteousness testified by the law and the prophets was put into the mind of the assembled multitude by the voice of the apostles; and written indelibly on their hearts by the divine attestation which miraculously confirmed it. The same thing occurred to the Gentiles afterwards at Cornelius’, where the work of the law was written on the hearts of all his company. When the law was thus written, they “showed the work of the law” in loving the Lord their God with all their heart, and with all their soul, and with all their mind, and their neighbours as themselves, in which all the law and the prophets are obeyed—Matthew 22: 37-40; 7: 12; “for love is the fulfilling,” or doing, “of the law”—Romans 13: 10.

The natural religionists do not fairly quote their proof text. They should quote the whole passage. Their text is a reason given in support of the affirmation contained in the preceding verse, which they ought to have quoted to show what the apostle was writing about. The omitted words are, “not the hearers of the law are just before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified.” And even this is but the reason of another affirmation in the verse before, which declares that “as many as have sinned without law (that is, the Gentiles, who were never within the jurisdiction of the law) shall also perish without law; and as many as have sinned in (or under) the law (that is, the Jews to whom it was enjoined) shall be judged by the law; in the day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ according to my gospel.” This declaration is contained in the twelfth and sixteenth verses, the proof text of the natural religionists being the fourteenth and fifteenth, which, with the omitted thirteenth, are a parenthesis between. But again, all these verses even are but illustrative off the eleventh; which is itself the reason why God will render to both Jews and Gentiles according to their deeds, as stated from the seventh to the tenth verses both inclusive, that is, “Because there is no respect of persons with him.” Now, from the sixth to the sixteenth verses of the second chapter the doctrine taught is, that Jews and Gentiles are all in the same category with respect to the gospel; because, from the eighteenth verse of chapter one to the fifth of chapter two, the apostle had there “proved, that they are all under sin,” none being righteous, “no, not one;” and “all the world” consequently “guilty before God”—Romans 3: 9, 19. Mankind, then, being none of them “doers of the law,” none of them are justified; and without justification there is no salvation.—What remains, therefore, is only a question of condemnation. Are Jews and Gentiles, equally vile in their conduct before God, to be subjected to execution in the same way? No; the Jews sinning against light, deserve a sorer punishment than the Gentiles who sin under “times of ignorance;” therefore, the Gentiles die and perish; while the Jews are reserved for judgment and execution till the day yet future, when Jesus Christ shall judge them “at his appearing in his Kingdom,” as taught of Paul in the gospel he preached. This implies the non-resurrection of those who being without law sin in times of ignorance; and the resurrection of those who sin under law. Of the former class, it is written in the prophet,

“They are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise; therefore hast thou visited and destroyed them, and made all their memory to perish”—Isaiah 26: 14:

But of them under law, it is written,

“All they in the graves (pantis hoe en tois mnemeiois) shall hear of the Son of Man’s voice, and come forth; they having done good things for a resurrection of life; but they having worked evil things, for a resurrection of judgment”—John 5: 28-29.

So much for the guilty who are all under sin, and therefore heirs of death, being “condemned already.” But, whether that death shall be “unto death” so as to end therein; or, the sinners without law, and under law, shall pass from under sentence of death, and come under a sentence unto eternal life, depends upon both classes becoming obedient to the truth, or “doers of the word:” for it is “he who looks narrowly into the perfect law of liberty, and perseveres, not becoming a forgetful hearer, but a doer of work, he shall be blessed in his doing”—James 1: 22, 25.

The Jews and Gentiles in the days of the apostles were all in the same state with respect to God that the idolaters and natural religionists are at the present time—

“Having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them, because of the perverseness of their heart”—Ephesians 4: 18.

Truth is ever the same. It is therefore as true now as when written, that ignorance alienates from God’s life. Let D. and B. look at this principle without blinking. —Their theory demands the salvation of creatures in their ignorance of “the knowledge of God, and of Jesus the Lord;” but the scriptures place an emphatic veto on the notion, and declare that, “Except a man be converted, and become as a little child, he can in no wise enter the Kingdom of God;” and out of that Kingdom there is no salvation. And again, “Except a man be born of water and of spirit, he cannot enter the Kingdom of God;” which is equivalent to saying, ‘Except a man believe the gospel of the Kingdom, and is baptised, and raised from the dead incorruptible and immortal, he cannot be saved.’ There is no bliss in ignorance of God’s truth; if there were it would be folly to be wise; because wisdom and knowledge make responsible. —If the ignorant were in a salvable state, it was cruel to send Paul to them, “to open their eyes, to turn them from darkness,” or ignorance, “to light,” or knowledge, because, in so doing, he was bringing them into the jeopardy of persecution, and the hazard of the sorer punishment which is to devour the adversaries at the coming of the Lord. But the truth is, that neither Jews nor Gentiles, of any age, sex, or condition, can be saved, or “inherit the Kingdom,” which is the same thing, who live and die in their ignorance of the truth.

“This is life eternal, that men should know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent.”

Paul was therefore sent “to turn them from the power of Satan to God” by enlightening them, “that they might receive forgiveness of sins, and inheritance among them who are sanctified by faith that is in Jesus”—Acts

26: 18. Now, I argue that if this was necessary for the salvation of the heathen then, it is equally so for their salvation now; and that it was necessary, is proved by the testimony before us. To say that creatures may be saved without faith is to blaspheme, or speak evil of, God and his Christ, and to pronounce the scriptures a falsehood; for they testify that, "he that comes to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them who diligently seek him." And again, "without faith it is impossible to please God;" and again, "no man cometh to the Father," says Jesus, "but through me:" but these are all vain words, and they who uttered them liars, if human creatures "who know not God," who do not seek him, and are ignorant of the faith; and not only so, but are "filled with all unrighteousness," have inheritance with the sanctified—if we say, that these may be saved in their ignorance, we in effect proclaim our own faithlessness in the oft-repeated and positive declarations of God to the contrary—we declare it in defiance of testimony, sound reason, and common sense; not the common sense of the unthinking and fleshly multitude, for that is foolishness; but that natural sagacity which is common to the thoughtful and sober-minded among men.

But "nature" is truly the stronghold of natural religionists, although they profess to believe the scriptures. What they call "nature," that is, their interpretation of nature, is of greater authority with them than a "thus it is written," or a "thus saith the Lord." It is their rule of Bible-interpretation; so that if God's testimony does not speak in accordance with their interpretation of nature, they either reject it with contempt; or, give it a mystical signification; or, admit its truth, and at the same time contend that some contrary and nullifying supposition may be equally true. This last alternative is the gossamer that mantles the hypocritical infidelity of the age. "It is true," say they, "that 'he that believes the gospel, and is baptised, shall be saved;' but it is also true that, if a man sincerely thinks he is right, he will be saved too, although he may not happen to understand the gospel!" "O yes, it is right to be baptised in the name of Jesus Christ for remission of sins," says another; 'but then, baptism in the name is not indispensable to forgiveness!' 'We admit,' say others, that 'without faith it is impossible to please God;' but then, kind-hearted heathen, and babes, who are 'germs of an immortal development—Chr. Mag. Vol. V. No. 7, p. 208, may be, yea are, saved without it!' 'Yes, we believe in the resurrection of the dead; that is,' says the ‘Swedenborgian Christian,’ ‘the awakening of the soul at the last pulsation of the heart in the article of death;’ or, says some other mystic, ‘the revival of the dead in trespasses and sins when they get religion;’ or, says a third, ‘the restoration of the ancient gospel some twenty or thirty years ago!’ Thus it goes in all the world. There is scarcely a single truth admitted, but there is some nullifying hypothesis tacked on to it, by which it is rendered of none effect. And they who practice this call themselves logicians and philosophers. Precious logic to admit the truth of A, and at the same time to contend that B, which denies it in toto, is equally true! Yet such is the reasoning (save the mark!) of nature’s worshippers, who presume to subject the mind of God to the suppositions of their foolish hearts! Surely, it may be truly said, that

Truth hath fled to brutish beasts;
And men have lost their reason.

But, this ‘nature’ the perverters of the gospel so devoutly worship, what is it? In the universal sense of the word, it is what God has caused to exist subject to unvarying necessity—the existence in nature; the necessity, its laws. Persons who see but little of God in any thing, are accustomed to attribute the phenomena they observe to Nature, as though Nature were the God in whom they live, and by whom all things consist. Nature, however, is a mere necessity, and exists simply because it is God’s will and pleasure. Those who are ‘taught of God’ never look to nature as an authority in regard to things spiritual and moral, because they do not venerate the creature rather than the Creator.

Man, as he exists by procreation, is part of that terrestrial nature called animal. When allowed to ripen into maturity under the uncontrolled influence of his innate propensities, ‘he has no pre-eminence over a beast’—Ecclesiastes 3: 19. His ideas and reasonings, if he have any, upon God, morality, his own constitution, origin, and destiny, are the workings of his veneration, conscientiousness, &c., styled by Paul ‘the thinking of the flesh;’ and the conclusions he arrives at are the teachings of nature, or Natural Religion. This religion begins in the flesh, and ends in gas; which is all the spirit it contains. Confucius, Zoroaster, Mahomet, the Council of Trent, Luther, Calvin, Wesley, Campbell, and Joe Smith, not to mention a host of others, are all naturalists, whose systems of religion are all essentially the same. The reason of this is, because they have all come to their several conclusions by natural reason, to whose dictates the least foolish among them have paid more deference than to the written testimony of God. It is remarkable that all these systematising naturalists believe in disembodied immortal souls, heaven in the skies, a hell of fire and brimstone for separate spirits somewhere, the same sort of a devil, the salvation of creatures of all ages, &c. The thinking of the flesh upon its own consciousness, and the phenomena of animal magnetism, the means by which nature teaches, have conducted them to this universal and boasted uniformity. How common is it to hear them adduce 'the universal belief of mankind' in proof of an immortal soul in man, capable of a disembodied existence among the stars! They do not see that this is a substantial reason against the notion, seeing that all mankind are in a state of ignorance, and therefore think only the thoughts of nature, or the flesh, which God says are not his thoughts. The only difference between Confucius, or Zoroaster, and Mr. Campbell is, that the latter mixes up the sayings of apostles with the thinkings of his flesh, which the former were unable to do, not having the scriptures. This is the essential difference between that form of Natural Religion, called Campbellism, and the others styled Magianism, Buddhism, and so forth. Let me not be misunderstood. I do not say they are the same in detail; but the same in origin, and that origin the thinking of the flesh, and not the revelation of the mind of God.

As the heresiarchs named were mere naturalists, the religions that go by their names, are mere natural religions. This is the nature of the religion of anti-christendom, call it Mohammedanism, Grecism, Romanism, or Protestantism. The thing is the same, whatever designation taste may give it. This is the reason why they are at variance with the Bible. The scriptures are from God, and reveal the thoughts, ways, and purposes of God; but the theologies, or orthodoxies, or whatever you may call them, are of the unenlightened flesh, and reveal the thoughts, or opinions, of the flesh concerning the Bible. Now, the thoughts of men and the thoughts of God, are as diametrically opposite as flesh and spirit. They do not, and can not, think in harmony; for 'the carnal mind (to phronema tou sarkos, the thinking of the flesh) is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. So, then, they that are in the flesh (think and act according to the dictates of nature) cannot please God.'

From this it is clear that men cannot 'do by nature the things contained in the law,' in the sense of doing them from the dictates of unenlightened flesh. Nature, in this sense, would impel them to do the very reverse, for all the precepts of God are in contrariety to the dictates of the fallen humanity we possess.

'My thoughts,' says he, 'are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways; for as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts.'

'If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me.'

'The grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world; looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ.'

These are not the dictates of nature, but of the spirit. Nature could not dictate such principles of conduct. It is as impossible as for a river of its own tendency to ascend a mountain.

The word used by Paul, and translated 'by nature,' is physei from phuo, 'to cause to be.' Physis is that which is caused to be; hence, to do by physis is to do that which is caused to be done; that is, to do in effect.

'When the Gentiles do in effect the things contained in the law, they show the work of the law written in their hearts.' This is intelligible enough. The writing the law there, causes them to do the things it contains, which is doing as the effect of the writing; or doing in effect, that is, by physis or by nature. The Jews had the law, but did not do its work; the Gentiles had not the law; but yielding its fruit in their lives, they showed forth the law's work; and in so doing 'kept the righteousness of the law,' and put the Jews to shame. The Gentiles who obeyed the gospel, proved themselves to be better Jews than the hereditary sons of Abraham who had the law; 'for he in the appearance is not the Jew; neither is the circumcision in the appearance, in the flesh: but he is the Jew in the hidden man; and circumcision is of heart by Spirit, not by letter; whose praise is not of men, but of God.’ He that is a Jew by becoming Abraham’s Seed, through Jesus Christ, is the Jew to whom glory, honour, and incorruptibility in the kingdom for ever, with Messiah, is promised in the covenant made with Abraham before the times of the jubilees were arranged. Such is the solution of the matter as it appears to me.

QUERY CONCERNING THE “GREAT TRIBULATION.”

Dear Sir:

The ‘Synopsis of the Kingdom,’ in volume 1 page 193, is estimated here very highly. Two or three passages struck me as especially beautiful and touching; one particularly, where your pencil, by the light of testimony, studied and believed, portrays the entrance of Israel’s King into his dwelling place. ‘Tis a joyous, heart-thrilling scene. I seemed in reading it, as if already listening to the glad shouts of Israel’s sons, and witnessing, as these re-echoed round the world, the joy of the earth, and the gladness of the isles, because the Lord reigneth. Oh, my beloved brother, shall we be present with that rejoicing throng, and behold the fulfilment of all that we have hoped and prayed for? I often think this is too glorious a destiny for me—one that I can never be accounted worthy of. Yet, I have resolved long since not to abandon hope, or let the anchor go. It is always our wisdom to eschew despair, since we cannot possibly gain any thing by it, and may lose all.

I have lately met with some ideas on Matthew 24 that please me. These are that the ‘great tribulation’ must not be understood to have reference simply to the calamitous period of the destruction of the Hebrew Commonwealth; but as beginning then, and terminating only with the completion of ‘the Times of the Gentiles,’ being thus co-extensive with the dispersion; and that the word ‘this,’ in verse 34, referring in the original to the thing last mentioned, the ‘generation’ there spoken of, is that which sees the signs indicating the Lord’s return, and the nearness of his kingdom; and not as you suppose, the generation contemporary with the passing away of the First Heavens and Earth. What think you of this view of the subject?

PERSIS.

England.

REPLY, WITH REMARKS ON “THIS GENERATION.”

If our friend will turn to Matthew he will find from the context that it is impossible that the 'tribulation,' referred to there, can be co-extensive with 'the Times of the Gentiles.' The sixteenth, twentieth, and twenty-first verses say, that the 'great tribulation' shall be 'in the winter and on the Sabbath-day,' at a period of 'flight from Judea to the mountains.' This winter period is termed 'those days' in the twenty-second verse, which 'were shortened' that the whole nation might not be destroyed. The tribulation being shortened for the elect's sake, we are told that 'immediately after,' the luminaries of the Hebrew polity were eclipsed and shaken from their spheres—verse 29. The tribulation must therefore have preceded the actual suppression of the Commonwealth—a suppression, however, which is co-extensive with the times referred to; for 'Jerusalem shall be trodden under foot of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled,' and then the throne and kingdom of David will be restored.

The genea autee of verse 34 is manifestly the 'this generation' Jesus had been treating of in his previous discourse, which led to the reproduction of Daniel's prediction concerning Jerusalem and the Temple (see chapter 9: 26,) in the 24th of Matthew. 'Serpents, generation of vipers!' said he to the Scribes and Pharisees, 'how can ye escape from the judgment of Hinnom's vale?' 'Generation' here is genneema in the sense of offspring—they were the Serpent offspring of that genea, who were to fill up the measure of their fathers' iniquity, so that upon them might come vengeance for all the righteous blood shed upon the land from the death of Abel to the murder of Zacharias, son of Barachus, between the Temple and the Altar, during the siege of Jerusalem, as related by Josephus. The particulars that filled up 'the measure of their fathers,' and made up the krisis, or judgment, are termed 'all these things' in the thirty-sixth verse of the twenty-third chapter; and because they affected Christ's 'prophets, wise men, and scribes,' as well as their persecutors, and therefore all classes of the nation, Jesus said, 'Verily I say unto you, All these things shall come upon this genea, or generation.' Thus we are presented with the relation of genneema to genea. The latter includes the former, as the whole includes a part, or the greater the less.

In Matthew twelfth, and forty-fifth verse, Jesus likens the then living race of Jews to a man in two states of diabolical possession, divided by a brief interval of sanity. In the first state he was wicked, but not totally depraved. He was therefore relieved of his malady for a time. His cure however was not permanent. Excitement revived, fear supervened, madness seized upon him, and he became sevenfold more desperate than before; so that the last state of the man was worse than the first. 'Even so,' said Jesus, 'shall it be also unto this wicked genea or generation.' And even so it was. When John the Baptist had fulfilled his mission he had 'emptied, swept, and garnished' the generation; for 'there went out unto him all the land of Judea, and they of Jerusalem, and were all baptised of him in the river Jordan, confessing their sins'—Mark 1: 5. Judah thus prepared, 'the people were in expectation, and all men mused in their hearts of John, whether he were the Christ or not'—Luke 3: 15. The unclean spirit was gone out of them for a time; and when Jesus first appeared among them, 'they heard him gladly.' In process of time, however, the spirit that beheaded John gained strength, and possessed not Herod only, but all the rulers of the people, and at length all the people too. They crucified Jesus, killed his disciples, and abounded in all iniquity, so that their last state was worse than the first, when John came to them 'preaching the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins.' What was to be done with such a generation? Was it not condemned by the example of Nineveh, which repented at the preaching of Jonas; by that of the wisdom-seeking Queen of Sheba, who came from the far-south to hear the words of Solomon? For seven years John, the greatest of all the prophets, and Jesus, the 'greater than Solomon,' proclaimed repentance and the wisdom of God; and then almost for forty years, a great company took up the word and preached it to the people; nevertheless iniquity abounded, and even the love of the many who had embraced the gospel of the kingdom cooled. Was not the generation incorrigible—hath there ever been a generation of Israel like it before or since? Well, therefore, might Jesus liken it to Noah's, and say, 'This generation shall not pass away till all my words concerning it shall be fulfilled.' History attests the fact. The heaven and the earth of the Hebrew Kosmos passed away with a great noise, but not a jot or tittle that he had spoken failed of its entire accomplishment.

They who look for 'the signs' enumerated in the first twenty-nine verses of Matthew 24 as indicative of the Lord's return in majesty and power, may as well look for the signs that preceded the Deluge as indicative of the same event. They will see the one as soon as they will see the other, which will be as soon as they shall see the shadow of the degrees upon the dial of Ahaz go backward ten degrees. The signs of 'the coming of the Son of Man in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory,' are not significative of Judah's overthrow, but of the destruction of the Papacy, the fall of the Ottoman dominion, the subjection of the kingdoms of the west to the Autocrat, preliminary to the redemption of the whole Twelve Tribes of Israel, and the resurrection of the dead. The signs of these events are not in the sun, moon, stars, and constellations; but in 'the unclean spirits like frogs, which go forth to the kings of the earth and of the whole empire to gather them together to the war of the great day of God the Almighty,' whose operations may be discerned by all who 'watch' the progress of things in the light of scripture truth.

TIMELY NOTICE.

There are three more numbers after this to the end of the volume. We have thought therefore that it is time to remind our friends in Britain, Nova Scotia, and Canada West, that our rule is to discontinue all papers to subscribers in those countries at the end of the volume. The reason of this is because we have to prepay the postage on all we send out of the United States. We discontinue, that we may not lose subscription and postage; the latter amounting to nearly 30 dollars a year. We have no fault to find with our present subscribers. We adopt the rule to prevent embarrassment; and apply it without partiality.

All then, in Britain, who wish the next volume, will please send in their names, residences, and subscriptions to R. Robertson, Esq., in orders on the Dock Head Post Office, Bermondsey, Surrey. Those in Nova Scotia, to Messrs. Lithgow & Jenkins, to either of them, Halifax; and Canadians, to Geo. L. Scott, Paris, C. W; or direct to the editor. By attending to this promptly we shall make a fair start again in January 1853.

QUERY CONCERNING THE RIGHTEOUS.

Dear Brother:

We have not forgotten you, nor the many occasions of intellectual enjoyment, nor the precious truths we learned while in your society, and attending your public lectures in Dundee, Illinois. They are of priceless value, and such that neither time, nor the fiendish jeers of ecclesiastical leaders of the populace can ever erase. We have kept a close and anxious watch upon your course since the time you left Illinois; and we regret that we have not patronised your publications more fully, which we would have done had it not been for our unsettled condition. But we hope we are now permanently situated in this far southern district, whence we may assist you more liberally in your great and important work of manifesting, and disentangling, the Gospel of the Kingdom from the traditions of men; and serve our Heavenly Father to the best of our ability, looking forward to the appearance of our Lord and Saviour, when he shall come again without sin unto salvation, and reign with his Ancients gloriously.

A friend wishes us to put a question to you, which you can answer at your convenience: —‘When do the righteous live who are to be raised at the second resurrection? And are the righteous subject to death during the Christ’s thousand years’ reign in Jerusalem?’—We remain yours in the Hope.

JOHN OATMAN, Senr. And Jnr.

Bastrop, Texas.

POST-MILLENNIAL HOPE OF THE MILLENNIAL RIGHTEOUS.

The resurrection, termed in common speech ‘the second,’ occurs at ‘the end when the Christ shall deliver up the Kingdom to God, even the Father;’ that is, one thousand years after he ascends the throne of his father David. The righteous who are raised then are they who have died during the previous thousand years—righteous, according to the law and testimony then established as the rule of faith and practice. The hope set before them during the reign, is the kingdom under its post-millennial constitution. They walk by faith of this in hope of attaining citizenship therein, as immortal subjects of 'God even the Father,' when sin, death, and priesthood, with its appurtenances, shall cease to be; but when Jesus and his brethren, though no longer priests to God, will continue pre-eminent as the cherubim and seraphim of terrestrial glory. The second-resurrection righteous live thenceforth on the renovated and sealess earth for ever, God being all in all of them as in Christ the Lord.

The word 'righteous' is applicable to two classes of the redeemed from sin and death. The first class is composed of those believers of the gospel of the kingdom who live upon the earth at and before the coming of the King of Israel in power and great glory; the second, of those who believe and do while He reigns Vicegerent of Jehovah as High Priest upon his father David's throne. The first class are immortalised at his coming, and are consequently no more subject to death. They, with Jesus, are the rulers, or 'kings and priests to God' over the nations—the dispensers of the blessedness which is to come upon them through Abraham and His Seed. — Editor.

TRANSLATING SCRIPTURE.

In reply to an inquiry, our learned friend of Bethany says, that a philologist who does not understand the scriptures is not competent to translate them currently. We are glad to see that we agree with him in something. No pagan Greek, nor blind Hebraist, can transfer the thoughts and purposes of God from the tongues of Moses and Plato, into the Queen's English. Hence our friend's utter incapacity for the work, which is much to be deplored, seeing that he is Supervisor of 300,000 'immortal souls,' or more, who look up to him as an oracle. A man who is ignorant of what Christ's mission is, may 'speak Greek' with as much facility as 'pigs squeak,' and make a speech on every line of Homer in the same tongue, and yet be baffled by a New Testament query of a single sentence. The world will never behold a critically trustworthy version of the Bible till the Lord comes. That event will confound all orthodox criticisms, and leave our learned friend and his Memphis associates among the dunces!

PREACHING TO SPIRITS IN PRISON.

“In which having gone, he preached to the Spirits in prison.” —PETER.

“To this also was the gospel preached to dead ones.”—PETER.

The editor of the Christian Magazine says that the apostle Peter teaches that after his decease Christ Jesus ‘preached, having the imprisoned dead as his congregation.’

Speaking of the dead who ‘never heard of Jesus while in the flesh,’ he says, because he was appointed their judge, ‘therefore they must hear of him in the Spirit in order to their acquittal or condemnation.’

Again, ‘in the Spirit Jesus preached to the dead.’

Referring to those that suffer for the truth, even unto death, he says, ‘by death they cease from sin, and like Christ, may enter upon an extended ministry among the dead.’

These notions he considers as sustained by the doctrine of scripture, which teaches that ‘Christ died to reconcile’ ‘things in heaven’ even ‘the invisible.’ He refers to Colossians 1: 20, and Ephesus 3: 10-13, and concludes from the premises, that ‘God is the God of the DEAD, as well as of the living.’ If so, Jesus has made a slight mistake; for he says, ‘God is NOT a God of the dead, but of the living: for all live unto him’—Luke 20: 38; that is, by resurrection unto life, which he was arguing to prove.

Speaking of ‘ministering angels,’ whom he styles ‘bright and joyous stars,’ he says, ‘Ranks and hosts of these spread themselves throughout the spiritual world, like beings of different grades in this, and under Christ carry on the scheme of his redemption for the benefit of millions, who either by age, or tyranny, or imbecility, could never hear of him while in the flesh.’ By this agency his theory provides for the salvation of ‘infants, idiots, and pagans.’

He says furthermore, “We never commit the body of a single human being to the grave, for whom it is not a pleasure for us to know that his soul has already entered where the knowledge of Christ may yet be his; and that if at last condemned, it will not be for any thing that was unavoidable in his outward circumstances on earth.” And on the hypothesis of his own salvation, he continues, ‘our happiness, we apprehend, will consist in giving knowledge to all to whose capacity and advancement we may be, there as here, adapted.’

The foregoing novelty is taken from an article on “Spirits in Prison.” In defending it against an attack made upon it by the President of Bethany College, he says, ‘I have uttered an opinion, that men who have not heard the gospel will hear it before they are condemned by it. This is the substance of the whole matter’—and a very gospel-nullifying ‘substance’ truly!

This novelty appears to be based upon a rendering of Peter’s words, which the editor says, was authorised by Mr. Campbell in his controversy with me some years ago; but which the same learned gentleman now finds it convenient to repudiate. The words are, en ho kai tois en phylakee pneumasi poreutheis ekeeruxen, rendered in the ‘New Version’ (Third Edition)—‘by which also he made proclamation to the spirits in prison.’ In this, Mr. Campbell has thrown out the word ‘poreutheis’ as I find the same omission in Jones’ ‘revised and corrected edition’ published in London in 1842. Why have these critics omitted this word? The common English version retains it, and renders the text ‘he went and preached.’ Mr. Jones is dead; but Mr. C. still lives to answer for himself. —The other words of Peter in the premises of the new theory are, eis touto gar kai nekrois enegeenlisthee, rendered by the above critics, ‘For to this end the gospel was preached to the dead;’ in James’, ‘to them that are dead.’ ‘The dead’ is not the literal rendering of the adjective nekrois; it should be ‘to dead’ with ones, or persons, understood. Dead ones are a particular class of the dead in general.

While the editor of the ‘Magazine’ accepts the rendering of the King’s Version, ‘to them that are dead,’ he adopts the sentence, ‘in which Spirit, also, he went and preached to the spirits now in prison,’ as the true representative of the original. This, he says, clearly to his mind ‘conveys the idea that Christ, by his spiritual nature, or by the Spirit, did preach to the spirits of the invisible world.’ To this he adds, ‘and if as to include all, the apostle refers to those who died in disobedience in the days of Noah, which would make his language equivalent to all the dead.’—These words show that he considers the phrase ‘the gospel was preached to the dead,’ as importing that it was preached to all the dead—‘to those now dead, not ‘in the flesh’ (but) now in prison.’

The English of this seems to be, that the editor considers that there is in man an ‘immortal soul’—‘his spiritual nature’—capable of disembodied existence, an existence which begins at the last pulsation of the heart. Next, he believes in ‘a Spirit-World,’ into which ghosts, or separated human spirits, or souls, are received at death. He believes also that there are good and bad human spirits, and some that are neither good nor bad, such as baby-souls. Now, in all this he is approved by all pious Musselmen, all devout Papists, and all sincere pagans, and others. But he does not appear to believe in the ‘Hell,’ which, we hesitate not to say, is falsely ascribed to ‘Jesus Christ and his apostles,’ and is thus indicated in the words of Mr. Campbell; ‘everlasting torment, in utter seclusion from the presence of the Lord, and of everlasting agony, without one ray of hope forever and ever.’ M. H. p. 440. The editor of the ‘Magazine’ is horror-struck, as he may well be, at such a not worthy, I suppose, of being translated destiny in reserve for non-believers of the gospel, which God in his providence had never ceased to be proclaimed to them. —He rejects such a fiendish dogma; and, therefore, instead of dividing his Spirit-World after the Bethanian fashion, he constitutes it more after the model of the present visible ‘evil world,’ save that here is all matter, while there it is all naked spirit. Heaven and hell in the spirit world are very much like heaven and hell here, said to be in our midst every day—a state of mentality be it good or evil. The Spirit-world of evil consciences, is the newly discovered hell, or “prison,” in which are provisionally confined the dead-alive spirits of infants, idiots, and pagans, with all other sincere unfortunates, who are yet uncondemned by the gospel, because they have had no opportunity of hearing it!

The issue between the editor of the Magazine and the editor of the Harbinger seems to be purely hellish; that is, whether all unbelievers, without distinction, shall everlastingly agonise in torment, mental and physical, without one ray of hope; or, some of them, and that a vast majority, be afforded an opportunity of repentance and deliverance? The Harbinger's prison has no back door; the Magazine's has, and this seems to be the tweedledum and tweedledee of the matter. They may dispute about the merits of their respective theories for ever, and each denounce the other for heresy till doomsday; but they will neither of them be any nearer the truth than when they began. It lies beyond their grasp, and must ever do so while they despise Moses and the Prophets, and make immortal-soulism the fulcrum upon which their levers rest.

The passage they are disputing about is an interesting one, and difficult of interpretation only to those whose minds are spoiled by 'philosophy' and 'science falsely so called.' Leaving the editors for the present to play at single stick undisturbed, we will turn from their logomachies to the words of truth and soberness indited by the apostle.

The 'elect through sanctification of the Spirit' to whom he wrote, were 'in heaviness through manifold temptations,' or persecutions. The Gentiles spoke against them falsely as evil doers, and therefore buffeted them. He terms this 'suffering in the flesh' 'for righteousness sake,' which was an evidence that they had 'ceased from sin,' not by returning to dust, but by unwavering obedience to the truth; and intended no longer '*to live the rest of time in flesh to the lusts of men, but to the will of God' The living in flesh to the will of God is living to God in spirit; and to be persecuted for so doing is to be 'condemned by men'—a condemnation which in apostolic times often resulted in death. It did so in the case of Christ. He was put to death in flesh, 'but made alive by the Spirit.' Now unto suffering the elect are called; because '*it is through much tribulation they must enter the Kingdom of God:' and the reason is, because "Christ also suffered for them, leaving them an example, that they should follow his steps." No suffering, no kingdom, seems to be the rule; as it is written, 'if ye suffer with him, ye shall also reign with him.'

To be 'called of God unto his kingdom and glory,' is to be called to suffer for it; according to the saying, ‘that ye may be counted worthy of the Kingdom of God, for which ye suffer.’ Therefore says Peter,

‘Think it not strange, beloved, concerning the fiery trial which is to prove you, as though some strange thing happened to you: but rejoice inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ’s sufferings; that when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy. If ye be reproached for the name of Christ happy are ye; for the spirit of glory and of God resteth upon you.’

They were, therefore in the Spirit.

This persecution for the Kingdom’s sake, he styles ‘judgment beginning at the house of God.’ It was judgment inflicted on the elect by ho antidikos diabolos, the legal adversary causing to transgress—the public prosecutor of the day, who sought to devour them judicially. The ordeal to which they were subjected through him was so fiery, that it was too much for the faith of some, and almost overpowering to all.

‘The time is come,’ says the apostle, ‘that judgment must begin at us, what shall the end of them be that obey not the gospel of God? And if the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?’

In the Spirit-world to be saved by preaching, if they have not heard the gospel before! But this is manifestly foolish. We will therefore proceed.

The reason, then, why the gospel of the kingdom was preached to Jews and Gentiles was that they might constitute the house of God in this present evil world, and by suffering in flesh for a time prove themselves worthy of the Kingdom. —When Peter wrote his epistles, many of these Christian heroes were mouldering in the dust. They were the nekrois, or dead ones to whom the gospel had been preached, and who in flesh had been ‘condemned by men;’ but all the time of their warfare had ‘lived to God in Spirit;’ for ‘though they walked in flesh, they did not war according to flesh.’ They were a strange spectacle to their former boon companions, who refused to subject themselves to the obedience of faith; spoke evil of them, and maltreated them. But this conduct God will not wink at, as he winked at their evildoings in their ignorance. For the apostle says, living and dead ones. For to this end also was the gospel preached to dead ones, that in flesh indeed they might be condemned (to suffering) by men, but in spirit live to God.'

Peter does not mean by this, that the gospel was preached to their ghosts while their bodies were rotting in their graves; but preached to them while working the will of the Gentiles, but since deceased, and dead while he was writing about them. Jesus is in readiness to judge living and dead ones. Not the dead universally; for those to whom the gospel has not been preached the scriptures teach are not to rise—

'They are dead, they shall not live, they are deceased, they shall not rise; thou hast visited, and destroyed them, and caused all the memory of them to perish'—Isaiah 26: 14.

The living and dead ones to be condemned at their resurrection, are the 'all' who have sinned wilfully against the truth; the rest are 'condemned already,' to sleep eternal in the dust.

Now to elect living ones before they become dead ones, he says,

*'Holily reverence (hagiasate) the Lord God in your hearts: and be always ready with an answer to every one asking you a reason for the hope that is in you with forbearance and respect; having a good conscience, that whereas they speak evil of you as evildoers they may be put to shame who accuse falsely your good deportment in Christ. For it is better, if God's purpose require it, to suffer for well-doing than for evil-doing. Because Christ also suffered once for all on account of sins, a just one in behalf of unjust ones, that he might lead to God, having been put to death indeed in flesh, but made alive by the Spirit: in which also having gone he preached to the Spirits in prison, having formerly refused belief at the time the long-suffering of God waited once for all in the days of Noah, while an ark was being built, in which few, that is, eight souls were preserved in safety through water, an antitype to which baptism also now saves us * * through the resurrection of Jesus Christ, who, having gone (poreutheis) into heaven, is at the right hand of God, angels and dominions and powers being placed at his disposal.'*

Such, I believe, is a rendering of Peter's words that cannot be improved. The exhortation with which they begin is excellent, and worthy of all reception by our contemporaries. I wish the two editors in question would attend to it, and in presenting their answers, 'speak as the oracles of God;' and let them remember that, when Peter wrote these words, the only oracles so recognised were the writings of Moses and the Prophets. As they therefore profess to contend for apostolicity of practice, will they be so good, for the sake of truth and the salvation of themselves, and of those who hear them, as to speak according to Moses and the Prophets? If they will only do this, and abandon their vain logomachies, or strifes about words to no profit, they will speak in harmony with the apostles also; for the apostles said 'none other things than what Moses and the prophets testified,' save that to some extent as yet, they found a partial accomplishment in Jesus. If they will kindly consent to this course, all 'profane vain babbling' about endless agony in torment, preaching to ghosts, sky-kingdom heavens, spirit-world hells with postern gates, immortal souls, and all that sort of foolishness, will fall into desuetude. Let them cease then to 'despise the word' as 'an old Jewish almanac,' or a system of 'thundering Jewish phrases.' The 'christian scriptures' are contained in the Book of the Abrahamic Covenant, with the New Testament as a codicil attached for the illustration of the mystery. While they neglect Moses and the Prophets, they are doomed to blindness and the blackness of darkness for ever.

Jesus, the holy and the just one, suffered hyper, not 'over,' as the editor of the Magazine renders it after others, but 'for or in behalf of' persons, who were in an unjustified state at the time of his sufferings, which were sacrificially consummated in his death and resurrection. It was peri 'for or on account of,' their sins that he suffered hyper, in their behalf; that being justified from their past sins 'through his name,' they might be, the rest of their time in this evil world, in a state of reconciliation with God. Christ did not suffer in their stead, that is, that they should not suffer, as their being made 'partakers of his sufferings' by a 'fiery trial,' proves. Had he not died and risen again, they would have perished as the beasts; but by his stripes applied, or inflicted, so to speak, upon the old man of sin within them, by faith in the gospel of the kingdom in his name presented, they are healed in conscience; and will hereafter be healed also of that 'loathsome disease' that imprisons them in the dust. ‘For the transgression of my people was he stricken,’ saith the Lord. ‘By his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many; for he shall bear their iniquities.’ Of this ‘many’ Isaiah was one. Hence he says, ‘He was wounded for our transgressions (or sins;) he was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed.’ Paul also was one of this ‘many,’ of which all mankind are not—a many which is constituted of persons whose justification proceeds ek pisteos, out of faith in the kingdom and name, and is consummated in the sprinkling of the heart from an evil conscience with the blood of Jesus, when faith in his blood is counted to a believer of the gospel of the kingdom for righteousness, in the act of putting on his name in baptism. The apostles were of this ‘many;’ the living ones to whom they wrote were also of the number; as well as those of their company who had been devoured by the executors of Caesar’s will. These ‘dead ones’ of this ‘many’ had been ‘washed, sanctified, and justified by the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of God;’ and had resisted the enemy ‘steadfast in the faith.’ Bruised in the heel, they lie sleeping in the dust, waiting for the trumpet sound to wake them into life. In behalf of this ‘many,’ Paul says, ‘God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died hyper, for us;’ ‘when we were enemies we were reconciled to God through the death of his Son;’ ‘being reconciled, we shall be saved in his life,’ by being planted in the form of his resurrection.

‘That he might purge our conscience from dead works to serve the living God, He is the Mediator of the New Will, that being subjected to death for redemption of the transgressions against the First Will, THE CALLED might receive the promise of the age-inheritance.’

No man ever kept the law of Moses but Jesus, and he came under its curse by what was done to him. That law being weak through the flesh could give no one a right to eternal life as a consequence of justification thereto. Devout and undevout Israelites, therefore, were all upon the same footing in relation to it—all of them cursed; as it is written,

“Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things written in the Book of the Law to do them.”

‘From faith’ in the gospel of the kingdom, the justification of the devout transgressors of the first covenant proceeds; as ‘through the faith,’ beginning in the Christ and ending in Jesus, comes the justification of the Gentile constituent of the 'many.'

I have made the above remarks for the especial benefit of the editor of the 'Magazine,' who, by his handling of the Greek particles, forcibly betrays his want of understanding in 'the righteousness of God.' In other words, he does not understand the doctrine of justification; that is, how a man may be accounted righteous before God; nor the purpose for which righteousness is proclaimed. The other editor is not much ahead of him in this particular; or he would not advocate the traditions he does. The common idea of religion haunts their imaginations, and makes them see strange sights 'beyond the skies,' and in their spirit-worlds beneath. The popular notion is, that religion is for the keeping of the 'immortal souls' of all who get it, out of the bottomless pit of burning brimstone; and for the translating of them to an ethereal heaven beyond the skies. The alternative it offers to the world is get this religion, or be damned to this hell for ever and ever, men, women, and children, infants and sucklings, idiots and pagans. Ferocious minds revel in this alternative, always flattering themselves that they are safe. They call it one of the sanctions of the gospel; and are ready to hang, draw, and quarter with satanic fierceness, the unlucky wight that shall breathe a doubt of the scripturality of their speculation. Calling upon such to do justice, is like seeking mercy at the jaws of a dragon. There is neither justice nor mercy for their opponents in the hearts of men who would attribute to God the decretal of such an alternative. Benevolent and justice-loving minds revolt at it; and hence arise universalism, restorationism, baby-salvationism, salvation without faith in the gospel, and preaching deliverance to the damned. But 'they err not knowing the scriptures;' that is, Moses and the Prophets, the only scriptures extant when Jesus uttered the words. There is no such alternative in them. God does not propose to reap where he has not sown; nor to punish them for not working whom he has not hired; nor to reward those to whom he has made no promise. He intends to found a kingdom and empire on earth; and he intends that they shall be governed by men chosen upon certain well-defined principles—that is, by the 'many.' He does not invite all mankind, nor every creature of all mankind, to the possession of this kingdom; but 'every creature' of the 'all nations' of the Roman dominion, contemporary with the apostles; and those of after ages and generations, who can discover the truth by the study of the word—the remnant of the Woman’s Seed. There are, and have been, systems of nations to which he has never spoken. These need no gospel to condemn them because of its rejection. They are ‘condemned already,’ but not to the same condemnation which the gospel threatens. They are condemned to return to the dust, and to abide there for ever; but the gospel condemns its rejectors to a resurrection to punishment in the judgment of the Beast, and the False Prophet. The alternatives of the Bible are:

1. Possession of the kingdom with all its appurtenances, by a resurrection to eternal life; or,
2. Resurrection to punishment, consequent on rejection of the gospel and unworthiness, of the kingdom; or,
3. A return to original dust, and sojourn therein for ever, consequent on necessitated, and therefore unavoidable, ignorance of the whole matter.

With the third class, or that characterised by the ignorance of necessity, the gospel has nothing to do; therefore we need not trouble ourselves about them. But with the first and second it has. They both stand related to it as acceptors or rejectors, by believing, refusing to believe, or believing and walking unworthy of it. The gospel can only be accepted or rejected in this present world; because, when the kingdom, which is the subject of the gospel, is established in the resurrection-period, ‘the world to come’ will be an existing fact, and there will be no more good news about inheriting the kingdom, to preach. The good things that are now promised, will then have been performed in the bestowal of them upon the saints. The acceptors and rejectors of the gospel are either living or dead. If they be living, they are above ground among the living; if dead, they are in the ground, or ‘spirits in prison,’ ‘sleeping in the dust of the earth.’

They are well termed ‘spirits’ as contrasted with organised flesh and blood; for they are without form, image, likeness, or substance. They have evaporated into divers spirits or gases; and nothing of them remains, but ‘dust and ashes,’ and their characters written in the book of God’s remembrance. Like the spectral impression of the coin upon the mirror, though invisible, it is there, and can be brought out by breathing upon the surface; so the men and women are, as it were, spectrally in the dust, but knowing nothing, and as unsubstantial, save their ashes, as nonentity itself, till the afflation of God's formative Spirit refashion them; and, as in the case of the few loaves and fishes which increased in quantity sufficient to feed thousands, from a little dust give them the bulk and stature of adults with their former identity restored. They will then be no longer 'spirits in prison,' but 'the dead cast out of the earth.'

That the 'prison' is the tomb, or place where dead bodies are laid, must be apparent to every one. They are fettered there by the necessity that binds them, and they can not come forth. The grave is their prison-house, and they the captives or prisoners of death, which has taken them captive.

'My flesh shall rest in hope; because thou wilt not leave my soul in the grave (nephesh le-sheol;) neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption.'

Here 'flesh,' 'soul,' and 'Holy One,' are all regarded by the prophet as confined in the grave (sheol;) the lowest dungeon of which is 'the pit,' called also 'the lowest hell,' indicative of the state of invisibility as the result of corruption being complete. Hence the Holy One's resurrection, or release from prison, is again referred to by David in these words,

'Thou hast brought up my soul from the grave (min-sheol nepheshi;) thou hast kept me alive (preserved me from decomposition) that I should not go down to the pit.'

And again,

'Thou hast delivered my soul from the lowest grave (sheol.)'

In another place the Holy One in prophecy supplicates Jehovah in these words,

'Attend unto my cry, for I am brought very low: deliver me from my persecutors; for they are stronger than I. Bring my soul out of prison, THAT I MAY PRAISE thy name.'

There needs no more testimony to prove that Christ's 'flesh' was his 'soul,' and that when it was dead, and walled up in the sepulchre, it was in prison; and that as 'in death there is no remembrance of God,' and '*in the grave no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom,' it is clear that Christ neither in body nor soul 'preached to a congregation of imprisoned dead;' for while in prison he could say nothing in praise of his Father's name.

Let it be remarked, that Peter does not say that Jesus preached to the spirits in prison, but that Christ did so; that is, that which 'made Jesus both Lord and Christ,' namely, the anointing or Holy Spirit. The apostle distinctly indicates the time when the Spirit that made Jesus alive preached to them, to wit, about 2400 years before Jesus was born, that is, in the days of Noah. And why does the apostle cite the case of Noah at all? Because as Jesus had predicted it had even come to pass. Peter wrote his epistle when 'the end of all things was at hand'—the end of all things constituted by the Law of Moses: and James, referring to the same crisis, says, 'the coming of the Lord draweth nigh.' Now, Jesus on Olivet also speaking of the fall of Jerusalem and ruin of the State, says,

'Of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels of heaven, but my Father only. But as the days of Noah were, so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be. For as in the days before the flood they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage until the day that Noah entered into the ark, and knew not until the flood came, and took them all away: so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be.'

From James' and Peter's two epistles it is evident, that the Jews, with a few exceptions only, were as demoralised as the antediluvians. The Spirit had been preaching to them through the apostles of 'judgment to come' for nearly forty years; but they heeded his proclamation no more than the antediluvians did when he preached to them through Noah. Christian Jews said, 'My Lord delayeth his coming,' and became iniquitous; while others scoffingly inquired, 'Where is the promise of his coming?' But they were willingly ignorant, or unmindful of the events of Noah's age. They resisted the Spirit in refusing to believe the apostles; therefore the fate of the antediluvians overtook them, and a few of the baptised only escaped, who, like Noah, believed the word.

When Peter brought up the case of the antediluvians they were as now, 'spirits in prison;' but when the Spirit went and preached to them through Noah, they were like the contemporaries of the apostles, living men and women at large upon the earth, enjoying 'the pleasures of sin for a season.' 'The dead know not any thing;' what then is the use of preaching to them? They must be made alive by the Spirit as Jesus was—and then something might be done. When they come forth they will indeed hear the words of the Lord; but there will be no mercy in his speech; for he will pronounce them 'cursed,' and command them to depart from his presence. There are other prisoners, however, who will rejoice in the year of liberty and release. They are styled 'the Lord's prisoners,' in the pit where no water is. Thus, Jehovah addressing the king who rides the ass into Jerusalem, says, 'As for thee, by the blood of thy covenant I have sent forth thy prisoners out of the pit wherein there is no water.' He also styles the Jews scattered among the nations which keep them back from the occupation of their country, 'prisoners of hope;' as it reads,

*'Turn you to the stronghold (to Zion,) ye prisoner's of hope * * * when I have bent Judah for me, and filled the bow with Ephraim, and raised up thy sons, O Zion, against thy sons, O Greece, and made thee as the sword of a mighty man. And the Lord shall be seen over them,' &c.*

Here, then, are two classes of prisoners—the one class, in the prison-house of the captive dead; and the other, in the Gentile prison-house of the living captives of Israel. Jesus being the Christ is therefore to perform the Christ's mission, which is, 'to be a covenant for the people (Israel) a light to the nations; to open the blind eyes, to bring out the prisoners from the prison, and them that sit in darkness, Show yourselves.' This will be the proclamation of a two-fold liberty to the Lord's captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound—to Death's prisoners in Sheol, of the dust; and Death's captives in the Sheol of Israel's political bondage among the Gentiles. The Spirit, through Jesus, will make this proclamation to spirits in prison at his appearing in power and great glory; for 'the dead shall hear his voice and come forth'—the dead in their graves, literal and political; and this is all the preaching to the spirits in prison Jesus will deign to do.

WHO BAPTISED THE APOSTLES?

In 'The Christian Age,' one R. Brown writes to its editor, and asks, in relation to John 3: 22, 'whether Jesus baptised the Twelve Disciples, or who did baptise them?' Evidently unable to answer the question, the Editor, in what he calls a 'reply,' says, 'I suppose you mean who baptised the twelve at Ephesus! !' Would such a supposition ever enter thy head, O reader, from such a question? When a man asks, 'Did Jesus baptise Twelve Disciples?' would any man in his senses suppose he meant, 'Did Jesus baptise twelve disciples at Ephesus twenty-five years after his ascension?' R. Brown wants to know about those disciples mentioned in John 3: 22, and not about disciples mentioned in Acts 19; but editor D. S. Burnet supposes he inquires about what Jesus did at Ephesus, although, as the lesser light of 'this reformation,' he ought to know, that Jesus was not sent to the Gentiles, but only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, and was therefore never at Ephesus, nor in any of the cities of the Greeks. It will not help the editor out of his bewilderment to say, that he supposed the twelve at Ephesus were twelve of the disciples named in John 3: 22, who, twenty-five years after, were found by Paul at Ephesus. The only disciples mentioned in the New Testament, called 'the twelve,' are the Apostles. R. Brown wants Mr. Burnet to tell him, if Jesus baptised the twelve disciples, and if he did not, who did baptise them? But he does not even suppose that the Ephesian twelve were of the disciples named by John, for he says, 'I am disposed to think that Apollos, who then only knew the baptism of John, baptised those twelve at Ephesus.' He has a disposition to think this, and consequently does not think it; and therefore has no demonstration to offer: in other words he is stone-blind upon the subject, which is sufficiently obvious.

But why not have the candour to confess his ignorance? A man, though an editor and a satellite, had better do this, than publish such an egregious blunder as that before us. Does he think that the intelligence of his readers is so completely prostrated and perverted by Bible, missionary, college, and publication speculations, that he can safely publish any absurdity without liability of detection? Men, like himself and brethren, experimented after this fashion even in the days of the apostles and succeeded; and from the signs of the times among 'reformers,' we discern that the experiment is being repeated and with like success. We were informed lately by letter from Washington, D. C., that many of the members of the Campbellite church there believe the things we advocate, to some extent, but dare not avow it publicly for fear of Alexander Campbell! Alas! And do such people call themselves free Americans, to say nothing of their being free-men because the truth has made them free! Afraid of A. Campbell! O 'tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon; lest the daughters of the Philistines rejoice, lest the daughters of the uncircumcised triumph!' In this same church a member in speaking made use of Daniel and the Apocalypse in reference to setting up the kingdom, but he was told he had no business to use Daniel and the Revelation, as they were highly figurative! Thus the testimony of God is silenced, and intellectual torpor is the result. 'Reformers' have apathetically surrendered themselves to their scribes, among whom there is not one who dare tell them truth unpalatable to their Bethanian Papa. Instead of adding 'knowledge' to their faith and goodness, they are fast letting slip the little they ever knew. Their periodicals are a standing proof of their deep declension. Their 'pure literature,' as D. S. Burnet styles it, is puerile and unreadable; and if read, leaves the reader as much in the dark concerning the thoughts and purposes of Jehovah, as if the page were a perfect blank. Some of their editors lament that the scriptures have fallen into neglect among them. This testimony is true; and as a consequence, editor D. S. Burnet can, with impunity, suppose any sort of reply to questions he pleases, even to the supposition that his brother, R. B., is an ignoramus, and that John 3: 22, had a reference to twelve disciples at Ephesus!

After telling R. Brown he supposed he meant the Ephesian twelve, when he asked about Jesus and the twelve, he refers to John 4: 2, as proof that Jesus did not baptise with his own hands; from which the reader is left to infer that Jesus neither baptised the twelve at Ephesus, nor the twelve apostles. But R. Brown inquires 'Who did baptise the Apostles?' for he asks no question about the Ephesian disciples at all. In his 'reply' to this query, his 'dear brother Burnet' deposes not a word! He gives it the go-bye as completely as though R. B. had never made the inquiry. It is fair then to conclude that the editor of the C. A. knows nothing about the matter; and as he gives it up, probably as ‘an untaught question and speculation,’ untaught that is in his divinity, we will see what we can do with it for the instruction of D. S. B., his brother Brown, and our own beloved and right worshipful readers.

Who then baptised the Apostles? The answer to this question is emphatically, John the baptiser. The apostle Andrew is styled by the apostle John, one of John’s disciples—John 1: 35, 37, 40. This testimony is decisive as to him; but how are we to get at the certainty that the twelve were all baptised of John? We reply, that John’s baptism divided the Jews into two classes—the first class comprised ‘all the people that heard, and the publicans;’ the other, ‘the Pharisees and Lawyers.’ The former class was very numerous; for ‘Jerusalem, and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan, were baptised of John in Jordan, confessing their sins.’ Referring to the completion of this work, Luke says,

‘Now when all the people were baptised, it came to pass that Jesus also being baptised, and praying, the heaven opened.’

The other class being composed of the ‘upper ten thousand,’ were ‘respectable’ and few. They were ‘the righteous,’ who, in their own estimation, needed no physician, having no occasion for repentance. As a class, they despised the people as cursed, knowing not the law. They regarded a baptism of repentance for remission of sins as quite unsuited to them; so that ‘they rejected the counsel of God against themselves, being not baptised of John;’ while the people, on the contrary, who thought more humbly of themselves, ‘justified God, being baptised with his baptism’—Luke 7: 29-30.

The testimony saith that ‘the publicans,’ or tax-gatherers, were baptised of John as well as all the people. Now the apostle Matthew was one of the publicans of Judea, and styled in the list of the twelve, ‘Matthew the publican;’ we may therefore safely infer that he, as well as Andrew, was baptised of John.

The apostles were all attendants upon John’s preaching. One of them says,

*‘That which was from the beginning which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled of the Word of life * * that which we have seen and heard declare we unto you.’—*

1 John 1: 1-3.

John affirms this of himself and the rest of the apostles. Matthew and he have written accounts of some of the things they saw and heard ‘from the beginning’—a beginning indicated by Mark as characterised by the commencement of John’s baptismal proclamation, which he styles ‘the beginning of the glad tidings of Jesus Christ’—Mark 1: 1. All the apostles were ‘witnesses unto Him,’ therefore what John and Matthew and Andrew saw and heard, they were all able to testify to from personal observation. John and Matthew heard John preach, saw him immerse Jesus, saw the Spirit descend upon him, heard the Father’s voice, &c.; and because they saw and heard these things they were able to declare them. Peter also intimates, that he and the ten were well acquainted with the things that pertained to ‘the beginning;’ and declares that it was necessary that the candidates for the twelfth place in the apostleship should be as familiar with them as themselves.

‘Of these men,’ said he, ‘who have companied with us all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us, beginning from the baptism of John unto that same day that he was taken up from us, must one be ordained to be a witness of his resurrection’—Acts 1: 21-22.

He must be able to testify the things concerning Jesus in connexion with John’s baptism as well as with his resurrection. If he were unable to do this, how could he testify that God had anointed him, or made a Christ of him? The conclusion, then, is certain that all the apostles heard John’s proclamation that the King of Israel was about to appear, and that they should prepare to receive him; that he came baptising in water to the end that God might set his seal or mark upon that one of the baptised whom he should choose for king; and that having witnessed the promised sign descending upon Jesus, he testified that Jesus was the Son and Lamb of God, whom he had chosen to take away the sin of the world. The apostles all heard this, and having heard it have declared it unto us.

This being admitted, then, it is equivalent to admitting also that the apostles were baptised of John's baptism; for the testimony we have already quoted says, 'all the people that heard justified God, being baptised with the baptism of John.' The apostles were of the people, not of the ruling class, they heard, and believed what they heard, and were therefore baptised in the hope of the king's making his appearance soon. Nor were they long held in suspense. When John pointed to Jesus as the king, Andrew and another introduced themselves to him and had the honour of an invitation to spend the day with him at his abode. On leaving, he sought his brother Simon Peter, and told him they had found the Messiah, that is, the Anointed. Peter then went to see him, and having entered his service received a change of name. After this Philip, a fellow-townsmen of Andrew and Peter, was enlisted. Philip then told his friend Nathaniel, 'we have found him, of whom Moses and the prophets did write;' and when Nathaniel had conversed with Jesus, he recognised him as Son of God and King of Israel.

But it is further certain that the apostles were all disciples of John, (and they only were his disciples who were baptised of him.) before they were disciples of Jesus, from the consideration evinced in the answer to the following question—From which of the two classes above mentioned is it certain Jesus would select his apostles? Would it be from that class which rejected the counsel of God against themselves in not being baptised? From the Pharisees and Lawyers? No; these were they upon whom he pronounced his woes. It follows then that he selected his apostles from those who 'justified God in being baptised with John's baptism.' There is no other conclusion open to us. It is this or none at all.

But one may say, Were the apostles not afterwards rebaptised in the name of Jesus, and if so who immersed them? No, they were clean without it. Their case was peculiar, and cannot occur again. Jesus did not baptise in his own name. Indeed there was no baptising into any name before Pentecost There could be none; for although Jesus had power on earth to forgive sins, his name had not acquired a sin remitting efficacy, because he had then as yet neither died nor risen again. John's baptism was the immersion of believers into repentance for remission of sins; so was the baptism Jesus preached. The difference existing between them was in that believed by the disciples of John and of Jesus. Both classes believed in the Hope of Israel; John's, however, expected the coming of Messiah to put the nation in possession of its hope; while the disciples of Jesus believed that he was already come, and that Jesus was he. Many of John's disciples, it is likely, though expecting the King whom Jehovah had provided, did not receive Jesus as that personage; but to 'as many as did receive him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God.' Among these were the apostles, and those on Pentecost and afterwards 'who believe on his name.' The faith that served for baptism before Pentecost would not suffice on that day. It must expand, for it had to comprise the king's death for sin and his resurrection for justification unto life, in addition to what was believed before. The baptism of believers into repentance for remission of sins was the nature of the three baptisms administered first by John, then by Jesus, and afterwards by the apostles on Pentecost; while the faith of John's disciples was positive; that of Christ's, comparative; and of the apostolic converts, superlative.

The case of the apostles, we have said, was peculiar. John the Baptist was not immersed at all; not even by Jesus: but Jesus was immersed by him, how much more necessary therefore for the apostles. They had all bathed religiously in Jordan's bath. After this Jesus took them under his especial care. He instructed them in 'the mysteries of the kingdom of God,' and indoctrinated them with the divine testimony. This had a cleansing effect upon eleven of them, but not upon Judas. As the three years and a half of his ministry drew to a close, he proceeded to perfect the work he had commenced upon them. Two days before the Passover, being at Bethany, he supped at Simon the leper's. After supper he began to wash the apostles' feet, for a double purpose; first, to complete their cleansing; and secondly, to teach them a lesson of humility. Peter, however, objected, judging that Jesus was humbling himself too much. He did not perceive what was intended by the act; but his Lord told him he should know afterwards. He still declined, saying, 'thou shalt not wash my feet unto the age;' to which Jesus replied, 'If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me;' that is, in that age. It is evident from this remark, that there was more in this particular feet-washing than a mere lesson of humility. Peter's salvation depended on his compliance; for to tell him he should have no part with Jesus, was the same as telling him he should be lost if his feet were not washed by Jesus. When Peter heard this all objection not only vanished, but he rushed into an extreme of willingness, offering not only his feet, but his hands and head. But Jesus reminded him that this was unnecessary, on the ground that he and the rest had already bathed, and bathers when they had left the bath needed only to wash their feet, and were then clean every whit. His words are, 'He that is bathed (holoumenos) hath no need but to wash (nipsasthai) the feet.' This being the case with the apostles, Jesus refused to do more than wash their feet. John had bathed them in Jordan, and Jesus completed their investiture by the word he had spoken to them, and the washing of their feet. Their feet were now 'shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace.' Before, they were girded with truth, and had on the breast-plate of righteousness; but they were not shod. The word spoken to them by Jesus let them into the mysteries of the gospel of the kingdom, which are 'the preparation of the gospel;' for no man can have part with Jesus in that kingdom, which is his joy, unless he is prepared by indoctrination into the Mystery. Thus indoctrinated, bathed and washed, Jesus addressed them saying,

'Ye are clean, but not all. For he knew who should betray him; therefore said he, Ye are not all clean.'

But Judas had heard the same things, been bathed by John, and washed by Jesus, why was he not clean even as the rest? Because, not being a man of honest and good heart, the word sown there could not germinate and grow. What he understood had no genial influence upon him. It found him a thief and left him a thief and a traitor, therefore his bathing and washing proved of no account. But it was not so with the eleven. After their washing Jesus said to them,

'Ye are now clean through the word which I have spoken to you.'

Their cleansing was complete and permanent by the water through the word.

Thus by reasoning on the testimony we come to the full assurance that the apostles were baptised of John, and cleansed by Jesus with water and the word. He exhorted them to wash one another's feet, as a memorial, doubtless, of their being shod, and of the humility he exemplified for their imitation. Such a feet-washing was never before or since, nor will ever be again. The lesson inculcated remains in all its force. Jehovah's future king of the world washing the feet of the thief, who he knew, within two days, would sell him to his enemies that they might put him to death! No meekness and humility ever exceeded this. But here we must pause till a more convenient season.

OUR VISIT TO BRITAIN.

FIRST TOUR CONCLUDED. —RETURN TO LONDON. —WRITE ELPIS ISRAEL. —ATTEND A PEACE MEETING, WHICH PROVES VERY WARLIKE.

Having completed a tour of nearly five months, I again found myself in London, with health considerably impaired from the fatigue I had undergone. Recuperation was therefore the first thing to be attended to. Rest of mind, and a little medicine (for however professional it may be to prescribe much, I have a very great aversion to the conversion of my own interior into a receptacle for the quantities usually exhibited on the placebo-principle) to restore the cerebro-organic equilibrium of the system, effected this in two or three weeks; so that by the beginning of the new year I was enabled to commence the composition of Elpis Israel. I did not allow the grass to grow; but worked while it was called today, and much of the night also. For six weeks the world without was a mere blank, except through a daily perusal of the London Times; for during that period I had no use for hat, boots, or shoes, oscillating, as it were, like a pendulum between two points—the couch above, and the desk below. In about four months the manuscript was completed; but whether it would ever hold the light of the public countenance, or remain in the obscurity of an old chest, with the blessing of the enemy upon it so long as it mouldered there, depended on the humour I should find the people in on visiting them again. With the exception of two discourses at Camden Town, and two at a small lecture room near my residence, and an opposition speech at a peace society meeting, (See Chapter 36.) I made no effort among the Londoners to gain their ears. I distributed printed bills, indeed; but a few hundreds or thousands of these among upwards of two millions of people were but as the drops of a passing cloud to the ocean. For the truth to create a sensation in London, its advocates must have a large purse, or be introduced to public attention by some influential religious party. The latter alternative is an impossibility; for there is no party in that great city of any weight on the side of truth. The press, secular and ecclesiastical, is dead against it; the former, because it is satisfied with what exists, or has no faith in anything but its own faithlessness; and the latter, because, like Ephraim, it is joined to its idols, and welcomes no truth at variance with them. Could I have hired Exeter Hall for a hundred and twenty-five dollars a night, and have placarded the town in all its thoroughfares, from the India House to St. James's Palace and Hyde Park; and from Shoreditch Church to the Elephant and Castle, I might have obtained a crowd. But the expense would have been equal to the purchase of a small Virginia farm; and though by charging something for admission, as the custom is, the cost might have been reduced, perhaps covered; still I did not feel justified in encountering the alternative of success, or incarceration in the Bench prison for debt. This would have been too gratifying to the enemy; for he would then have got the advantage over us, indeed; being seized of one's body, wind and limb."

The Peace-Society people seemed to be the only available medium of access to the public on a large scale. They were trying to convert the world to the 'peace and safety' cry which precedes the sudden destruction from the Lord; and to bring about a system of arbitration for the settlement of national differences, faith in which would of necessity prevent faith in Moses and the Prophets, who preach peace only to the righteous; and to those generations of humanity which shall be blessed in Abraham and his Seed, when Christ shall have 'subdued' them to himself by the energy of God. This Society is treading upon gospel-ground; and by its emissaries hardening the hearts of the people against the kingdom of God, which is to 'grind to powder and bring to an end' all the dominions of the world. I felt called upon, therefore, though but one feeble voice in the vast wilderness of the people, to protest against their utopian and unscriptural conceit.

On Thursday evening, Feb. 22nd, 1849, a public meeting was to be held at the British Institution, Cowper Street, City Road, for the purpose of adopting a petition to Parliament in favour of Mr. Cobden's motion for special treaties of arbitration instead of war in the settlement of national disputes. I determined to attend the meeting. But as I intended to oppose the adoption of the petition, which would, perhaps, bring down the anathema of all present (for the leaders of public meetings are generally intolerant of every thing that does not glorify their crotchet, and the peculiar 'wisdom' that sanctifies it) I deemed it best that my presence should be sanctioned by authority. I therefore addressed the following letter to the Chairman:

Mr. Charles Gilpin,

Sir: In one of the morning papers I perceive an advertisement of a public meeting at which you are to take the chair. The object of the meeting is stated to be the adoption of 'a petition to Parliament in favour of Mr. Cobden's motion for special treaties of arbitration to supersede the cruel and costly war system.' As one of the public, I write respectfully to inquire, whether the originators of the meeting advertise the public to convene to discuss the principles of peace and war as the basis of a petition expressive of the sentiments of the majority; or, merely to come together to hear speeches in favour of the foregone conclusions of a party, and to vote its petition as a matter of course? In either case would it be considered improper to grant me the liberty of showing cause why such a petition ought not to be adopted? An answer at your earliest convenience will confer a favour on, Sir, very respectfully yours,

JOHN THOMAS.

In reply to this, I received the following note, enclosing bills headed 'Arbitration instead of War,' and with the inquiry 'What does it cost?'

'Charles Gilpin begs to refer John Thomas to the Secretaries of the Peace Congress Committee, 15 New Broad street, for any information respecting the subject of his note beyond what is conveyed in the enclosed.

5 Bishopgate Without,

2 Mo. 21st, 1849.'

I next addressed the Rev. Henry Richard, one of the Secretaries referred to, from whom I received the communication annexed:

'Sir: In reply to your question relative to the public meeting about to be held, I may say that the object certainly is not 'to discuss the principles of peace and war,' but to adopt a petition in favour of Mr. Cobden's motion for treaties of arbitration, the very phraseology of the bill, as it seems to me, very clearly implying, that the parties invited to be present, are supposed to require no discussion on the evils of war or the desirableness of peace. At the same time while replying thus to the question so directly put by you as to the object of the meeting, I do not presume to say, that you will have no right to move an amendment to the resolution proposing a petition should you think fit to do so.

I am, sir, yours respectfully,

HENRY RICHARD.

15 Broad street, February 21, 1849.

Arrived at the place of meeting, I found an audience assembled of about two thousand men, principally of the working class. Two persons from America were expected to address them. These were a Mr. Clapp from Massachusetts, and Elihu Burritt, 'the learned blacksmith.' After the chairman had opened the meeting, and the petition had been read, the former delivered his speech, which was chiefly remarkable for its length of wind. Though the meeting was convened for 'no discussion on the evils of war, and the desirableness of peace,' Mr. Clapp's speech was a discussion of the subjects from first to last. But I found afterwards that by 'no discussion' was meant discussion in solo, but not in duobus. If a speaker's arguments were all in favour of Peace Society principles, the utmost liberty of speech was granted; but if the arguments were contrary to these, the clamour became deafening, and speech impossible. Mr. Clapp's address, like all others on the same subject, resolved itself into three heads; first, the costliness of war; second the cruelty of war; and third, its anti-christian character. It would be very unprofitable to occupy our space with any of his sayings. He talked a good deal about Christianity and its adaptation to all national emergencies; but being entirely ignorant of the 'mystery of godliness,' his speculations were all wide of the mark, and by no means worth the trouble of transferring them from the notes before me."

"When he had concluded, I rose to speak. On this there was a call for Elihu Burritt. I remarked that I had the floor with the consent of the chair, and was desirous of addressing them before Mr. Burritt. He was the great Peace Society apostle, and consequently, no doubt, a very efficient advocate of its principles. Now, I intended to controvert those principles, and I wished him to attend to what I had to say, that when I had done he might point out to them wherein I had failed in sustaining the anti-peace society principles to be submitted to them in the amendment I was about to propose. But the clamour was still for 'Elihu Burritt'; and as speech was impossible in the midst of so much tumult, I yielded. Mr. Burritt, however, refused to present himself. He had a cold, or a headache, or something, and therefore begged to be excused. I was then suffered to proceed in quietness for a few moments. I invoked their patience while I made a few remarks introductory to the amendment I held in my hand. The objection deemed to be the strongest against war by the advocates of peace, seemed to be its costliness. This was an appeal to the pocket, as though the public conscience were chiefly, or mainly, accessible through that useful receptacle alone. The cruelty of war, and its anti-christian character, were indeed treated of; and appeals were made to the scriptures to prove the abominableness of its practice; but still the great peace-gun discharged against it, was the suffering inflicted upon acquisitiveness by the expenditure incurred. War in itself is an evil; and so is the amputation of a limb. They are cruel inflictions to those who suffer by them; but often salutary in their results. Institutions are not to be judged of by their immediate workings, but by the remoter purposes they are to establish. War, punishments, and surgery, are three institutions, without which, though evil and painful operations, society would be greatly damaged. Surgery, which is cruel work, and often practised with little or no feeling, has saved the life of many a useful member of society. Men do not petition for its abolition, because it is costly, and cruel to the patient's feelings, and no where sanctioned in the Bible. On the contrary, notwithstanding these things, they regard it as a blessing, because, though a severe remedy, it saves the lives of men. The punishments of imprisonment, transportation, and death, are costly to the state, excruciating to the feelings of their victims, and often ruinous to their families; but are they not, nevertheless, beneficial to society? Now war is to nations, what punishment and surgery are to society and the subjects of them—a necessary evil and 'blessing in disguise.'—The world could not progress without it. This day is the anniversary of Washington's birth. Would Messrs. Clapp and Burritt say that the Republic he is styled 'the Father' of, was a too-costly, cruel, and anti-christian thing? Would they say it was no blessing to the world? Would they not say rather it was a blessing in which, sooner or later, all mankind would be blessed? And how, pray, was this inestimable blessing procured? By the extermination of the Indians, the sacrifice of 100,000 combatants, called 'christians,' and at a cost of £136,000,000 sterling to this country, to say nothing of what it cost the successful colonists. You see, then, that war in its results is a blessing to the world, notwithstanding its costliness, cruelty, and supposed antichristian character, even peace society advocates themselves being judges!

But while war ultimates in civilisation and blessedness to the non-combatants of our race, it is the fiery indignation and wrath of God upon nations for their wickedness, and cruelty to his people. Let the nations, if it were possible, forsake the evil of their doings and turn to him, and there would be no war. But this they will not voluntarily consent to do, therefore war is necessary and indispensable. —You profess to be groaning under the cost of former wars. And why should you not? War has generally been popular with this nation. Your forefathers endeavoured to rivet a yoke upon the necks of the Trans-Atlantic colonies which they were unable to bear. This cost you £136,000,000. The French having taken vengeance upon the Power that reeked with the blood of the Huguenots, drew the sword against the destroyers of civil and religious liberty in foreign lands. Instead of rejoicing in so righteous a retribution, in which God was giving them blood to drink, and scorching them with fire—Revelation 16: 6, 8, for their cruelty to his saints and prophets, you expended £1,625,000,000 sterling in sustaining the Continental tyrannies against the Corsican firebrand and Gallic sword of God. And now you cry out about the cost of war! Those who make war in support of Austria and the Papacy, and therefore against civil and religious liberty, ought to suffer. The retribution under which you groan is just.

The objection to war on the ground of its anti-christian character is fallacious. —The doctrine concerning the Christ and his mission is Jewish; and is taught in Moses and the Prophets. The New Testament writers were all Jews; and they taught no other doctrine than what agrees with the Law and the Testimony. Now these holy writings show that war is in perfect harmony with Christ's mission. —They also teach, however, that during his absence from our planet his disciples are not to take the sword, nor to avenge themselves. Christ's mission extends beyond the past. It belongs especially to the near approaching future. He is intitled the Prince of Peace—Isaiah 9: 6; and as a prophet was sent of God to preach peace—Acts 10: 36, not immediate, nor through the schemes of a peace society, but through the restoration of the Kingdom again to the Israelites. Though he came to preach peace, he did not come to bring it.

‘Think not,’ says he, ‘that I am come to send peace upon the earth: I came not to send peace, but a sword’—Matthew 10: 34.

Christ has not yet earned his title of Prince of Peace; for as yet he has given no peace to the world, nor will he give any, until he has purified it with judgment, and rebuked the strong nations of the earth—Micah 4: 3. We have been told tonight, that ‘the time has arrived to establish peace among the nations.’ This is an unscriptural notion. —The Bible rule is ‘first pure, and then peaceable.’ This is the divine principle, applicable to the consciences of men, and to peace on earth. ‘There is no peace for the wicked, saith God;’ they at present possess the nations, which of right belong to Christ—Psalm 2: 8; Daniel 7: 14; —therefore their destruction must precede his speaking peace to them—Zechariah 9: 10; that they may ‘learn war no more’—Isaiah 2: 4. There can be no peace until his Kingdom is established. Nor is it desirable; for such a peace implies the permanent establishment of Satan upon the throne of the world. —I for one protest against peace until he is dethroned, and shut up in the abyss—Revelation 20: 1-3. I long to hear the signal gun of that coming strife, which shall bring down Christ from ‘the right hand of power,’ to mingle in the combat, with Israel for his battle axe—Jeremiah 51: 20; Isaiah 41: 15, and Judah for ‘his goodly horse in the battle’—Zechariah 10: 3; Revelation 19: 11. Had his Kingdom belonged to the kosmos, or constitution of things, contemporary with Pontius Pilate, his servants would have fought that he should not have been delivered to the Jews—John 18: 36. It belongs to the coming crisis looming ahead—to the kosmos, represented by Nebuchadnezzar’s image standing upon its feet ‘in the Latter Days’—Daniel 2: 28. Then his servants, Israel and the Saints, will fight—Psalm 149: 6-9; Daniel 7: 22; Zechariah 10: 5; 12: 6; 14:14; —and ‘break in pieces the oppressor,’ ‘because the Lord is with them,’ in person as well as power. The idea, therefore, of war being of anti-christian character in the abstract, is a mere notion. The righteous dead who have been murdered by the Sin-Power cannot be avenged without it; nor can the Kingdom of Christ, which is to be the medium of peace to the world, be established in the earth, if arbitration be resorted to instead of war. I therefore, beg leave to protest against all Peace-Society contrivances for the abolition of war in the world's present condition; and to repudiate their cry of 'Peace and safety, when sudden destruction is at the door'—1 Thessalonians 5: 2-3. —I would therefore also advise you to have nothing to do with their petition, but to adopt the amendment I shall now read to you in its place.

The reader is not to suppose that while these ideas were being expressed, the peace-meeting was in a very peaceable state. Peace was in the petition, but war in the people's hearts, and on their lips. —The audience proved to be nothing more than a mob of anti-tax fanatics. They were prepared to applaud any absurdity provided that its key-note was anti-taxation and the costliness of war. The leading sections of the peace-socialists are the 'financial reformers,' and the Quakers. —The former are for cutting down the taxes at all hazards. The head of this faction in Parliament is Mr. Cobden, the apostle of Free Trade; and a man who can conceive of no millennium other than unbounded scope for getting rich by commerce and manufactures. This is the one idea of Free Trade policy, which is struggling to establish its ascendancy in the government. With this party, manufactures are the basis of commerce, and must be fabricated at the least possible expense, that the British manufacturer may be able to sell as low, or a little lower, than his foreign rivals in the markets of the world, whose workmen feed on the cheap bread of an unprotected agriculture. To attain this minimum of fabrication-cost, free traders have obtained the repeal of provision laws, so that workmen can get as much food as before for less money, and masters can lower prices for labour to a certain proportionate degree above actual starvation. Still wages are not considered low enough. Hence, free traders have got up a scheme of 'financial reform,' to reduce the taxes on tea, coffee, tobacco, &c. But as this cannot be effected without reducing the expenses of the state, they go in for lopping off all institutions that are not productive, or manufacturing, as it were. In this work, they come in contact with the fanatical element of Quakerism. This is a system that combines the worship of Mammon with a species of Spiritualism, characterised by non-resistance and passive obedience; the abrogation of Christ's institutes, baptism and the supper; and the subjection of the Holy Scriptures to natural reason, which they absurdly style, 'the light within!' — This was just the system to sanctify financial reformism in the estimation of 'the pious,' who are opposed to Church and State. Quakerism and Financialism formed an alliance in the scheme of lowering wages to the minimum of existence for the enriching of capitalists by encompassing the globe with British commerce and manufactures. But, as I have said, this scheme cannot be carried out to the desired extent without materially reducing the expenses of the State. Financialism, therefore, lends itself to the Quaker cry off the cruelty and anti-christianity of war, though it cares for neither its cruelty nor supposed Christlessness; for acquisitiveness being the key-note of financialism, it has the heart of Mammon, which cares only for getting rich. On the other hand, Quakerism chimed in against the costliness of war by which it greatly captivated its ally. Now financial reformers are people of all sects and parties, political and ecclesiastical, that are the partisans of a manufacturing and commercial, rather than an agricultural, England. Hence it consists of Whigs, Radicals, Chartists, and religionists of all sorts, possessed of the demon-principle, 'with all thy gettings get money at all risks.' This is the supreme good! And that cotton lords, bankers, and silk marquises, may be more abundantly enriched, they set the unthinking multitude to clamouring against war, and for the abolition of the army and navy, militia and armed constabulary, that the £21,000,000 a year which they cost the state, may find their way into their pockets.

It was Mammon shouting and hissing, and yelling through this unthinking multitude, who made the delivery of my protest almost an impossibility. When I could get a chance, I told them they might just as well hear me peaceably, as I intended to maintain my ground, if I had to stand there till morning. I saw a well-dressed, white-headed man in the centre, gymnasticising with awful energy. Of course I could hear not a word he said; but by the shaking of his head, beating the air, and flourishing, now his cane and then his fist, I interpreted his signs as very ominous to the security of my cranium, were it within his reach. The tumult was terrible, and I doubt not instigated by peace-loving enemies to peace, except according to their own crotchet. I had expected to meet a respectable, religiously-disposed, and sober-minded audience; but it proved the very reverse. It was a mere mob of swine, to whom it was not only useless, but dangerous, to cast the pearls of truth. But I was engaged in the fray, and being single-handed, I had to open for myself a way out as best I could. Having at length got through my remarks by snatches, I promised to conclude if they would agree to hear me read my amendment peaceably. They seemed to assent to this, so I read as follows: -

‘AMENDMENT.’—

‘Resolved, that war being an institution of Divine appointment for the bruising to death of the Serpent-power, though disastrous to the subjects of it, has proved of great benefit to the human race; that civil and religious liberty have been won by the war power in connection with the advocacy of truth, which it has often protected; that the rights of God in the earth, the vengeance due to the blood of His people poured out like water in past ages, the chastisement and overthrow of civil and spiritual tyrants, the defence of liberty, and the establishment of peace based upon the ascendancy of right over wrong, of knowledge and faith over ignorance and superstition, and of a well ordered and enlightened liberty over despotism—are things of infinitely greater value than gold or human life; —that those who rule the nations, being men who have been trained in the school of State superstition, arbitrary power, covetousness, and contempt of the laws of God, and the rights of humanity, are malprincipled, seared in conscience, and amenable only to fear; that natural wars to avenge the injured, and defend liberty, are neither impious nor impolitic; —that while a Bible Christian must not fight in the absence of the captain of his salvation, the Scriptures leave the nations to do as they please, holding them, however, NATIONALLY RESPONSIBLE for the principles and manner in which they make war; —that the nations of Europe, being Papal, Protestant, Infidel, and Mahomedan, and NOT CHRISTIAN, the question of international war as compatible or incompatible with the spirit of Christianity, is extraneous; —that while taxation to maintain an extravagant and luxurious regal establishment; to enrich a pampered and vicious aristocracy; official sinecurists in Church and State; to bribe religious sects with costly endowments; and to build royal and episcopal palaces in the midst of impoverished and almost breadless populations, is odious and abominable—taxation to maintain an efficient military and naval force in the present condition of the world is wise, prudent, and indispensable; —that an army and navy are as necessary to the body politic of nations as at present constituted as the right and left arms to the body natural; —that considering the known traditionary ambitious designs of the Court of Russia, and the threatening attitude of the Autocrat in relation to Schleswig-Holstein, Transylvania, Turkey, and Persia, in which countries its ascendancy would be to bring the Cossacks to the gates of Britain in Europe and India, a reduction in the army and navy of England is loudly to be deprecated by all the real friends of liberty and humanity in the TWO WORLDS: that these things being so, it is the enlightened and sober-minded conviction of this meeting that whatever may be the merit of Mr. Cobden's financial speculations in other respects, 'special treaties of arbitration instead of war' is a visionary, utopian, and impracticable project; and that his 'motion' to that effect ought not to be sustained by petitions in its favour.

This amendment having been seconded, it was put from the chair, whether it should pass as the resolution of that meeting? The show of hands was multitudinous against it. The reader, doubtless, will be curious to know, how many were in favour of it? I do not know exactly, but I do not think there were more than half a dozen. Myself and the seconder, it is probable, would have made eight; which was a large minority in the two thousand, compared with the Noachic minority in a world. One of the reporters asked me for a copy of the amendment, which I gave him, having furnished myself with two. From this, I was encouraged to hope it would appear in one of the London papers; but the expectation was vain. Nothing is admitted there unpaid for that calls in question the cherished crotchets of the day. In its report of the meeting, the Morning Advertiser, simply remarked, that an amendment was moved by Dr. Thomas, which was not adopted. Seeing, however, that it had taken so much notice as this, I faintly hoped it might do more, if personally addressed. But no, I could not stir up a controversy with the enemy in the interest of the Kingdom. As it is here, so there, the leaders of the people are satisfied with what exists; hence their motto is 'disturb not what is quiet,' which has been well said to be 'a capital maxim for a rotten cause.'

The following is the letter which I forwarded to The Advertiser under the anti-peace caption of WAR A DIVINE INSTITUTION.

To the Editor of the Morning Advertiser

Sir: Among the utopian speculations of the day, the introduction of the reign of peace among the nations, by the Exeter Hall-philanthropy of the 'Peace Society,' is not the least remarkable. The supporters of the scheme are, no doubt, many of them persons of large 'benevolence'—high in the medio-superior frontal region—and of feelings, which find much gratification in the contemplation of tranquillity and prosperity at any price among men. Their peculiar organization may be actuated by a pure and disinterested affection for their fellow-creatures, or it may not; for 'benevolence' may be actuated by 'acquisitiveness,' 'love of approbation,' 'self-esteem,' or by the nobler and more exalted sentiments of 'veneration' and 'conscientiousness.' Benevolence actuated by acquisitiveness produces that Commercial Philanthropy which would effect the abolition of war, because it interferes with the money-making business; actuated by 'love of approbation,' the benevolence of ostentation is the result; by 'self-esteem,' a self-important philanthropy, a self-complacent and self-glorifying benevolence; and actuated by 'Veneration' and 'Conscientiousness,' and a concern for human happiness and love of man, may be the consequence, having their origin in a conscientious regard for the law of the Almighty controller of human affairs. Now, if all men were of a uniform cerebral organization, we might say, that Peace Society efforts sprang from a common ground of action; but as this is not the case, we are justified in saying, that they result from a combination of various impulses as the basis of their operations. We cannot therefore censure or commend peace-socialists individually; but must speak of them in the aggregate as of a Society of the far-famed utopia.

This compound benevolence of the society professes to have one common object, namely, the abolition of war. Its orators appeal to their audiences arithmetically, commercially, religiously, and lastly and subordinately, to scripture. The strongest arguments I have heard are addressed to the pocket; as though the system of the world was constituted only with reference to cash! There has doubtless been a great deal of 'filthy lucre' wasted in war, and most burdensome debts entailed upon posterity that are certain never to be paid; but money, though it seeks to be omnipotent, both in secular and religious affairs, was never designed by him who laid the foundation of the world, to be the gauge of right and wrong. 'The love of it is the root of all evil;' and, I apprehend, that this idolatry of gold has more to do with peace speculations, than either love for man as man, or conscientious regard for the word of God.

That prismatic affair, current in the world called 'conscience,' is one of the greatest eccentricities extant. It is conscientiousness biased by prejudice; hence the phenomena which define the kind of conscientiousness are as varied as there are sects and parties in the several grand divisions of the earth. Men may act conscientiously, and yet be guilty of great impiety and folly. The Bible recognises but two kinds of conscience, a good and an evil conscience. Conscientiousness trained in error is evil and its acts cannot manifest that *'wisdom which cometh from above, which is first PURE, then peaceable, gentle and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without hypocrisy.' Conscientiousness enlightened by the wisdom and knowledge of God is a good conscience, which it is easily demonstrable is not the conscience of the Peace Society. These following points are the virtual consequences of its proceedings; —

1. While it appeals to the Scripture, it advocates a doctrine at variance with it;
2. It perverts the Scripture to establish its speculation;
3. Its success would militate against the veracity of God, and the best and permanent interests of the human race.

1. War was instituted as a part of the terrene system by Jehovah himself. Its appointment is thus decreed. Addressing the serpent he says, 'I will put enmity between thee and the Woman; and between thy Seed and her Seed: He shall bruise thy head, and thou shall bruise his heel.' Is not that war when two parties at enmity undertake to bruise one another? Or is it peace? Here then Jehovah declares there should be war between the Two Seeds; a war of enmity which he implants between them. In the first place, this passage is exactly literal, and secondarily, allegorical. The literal enmity is seen in the desperate hatred of man towards poisonous serpents; the allegory of this is the uncompromising and deadly enmity of mankind in their wars for 'religion' and liberty. Political and Scriptural Truth is the ground of enmity between the Serpent party and its opponent. The opponent party is composed of two classes; the one which 'contends earnestly for the faith once delivered to the Saints,' as commanded of God; and the other which does the fighting. The contention of the faithful brings down upon them the enmity, cruelty, and destructiveness of the Serpent Power, which is often vigorously antagonised by those who fear not to wrestle with it in desperate and bloody fray. To this providential arrangement, we, in England, America, and elsewhere, are indebted for all we have to boast of called civil and religious liberty, as the records of the past abundantly testify. But for the sword on the side of principle, the earth would have been the habitation of demons instead of men; things are bad enough in all conscience; but without war, they would have been reprobate of all good.

Does the Peace Society imagine that the present condition of things is a finality? That the fairest portion of the earth, the most magnificent countries, and the most genial climes, are destined to be forever what they now are, the productive soils of ignorance, superstition, oppression, and cruelty? It vainly imagines that nations can be persuaded into a millennium of peace and righteousness! A more unscriptural conceit never entered the heads of the wildest schemers. Even the Prince of Peace himself, and his Apostles could not persuade the masses into reason and virtue; and does the Peace Society imagine it can compass more than they? Nations never have been persuaded, nor ever will be, voluntarily to submit to 'the wisdom that is from above which is first pure and then peaceable.' Jehovah has a controversy with them for past offences yet unsettled; and he has placed it on record that 'they shall lick the dust like a serpent.' Can the Irish Priesthood be persuaded to loose the chains that bind the Celt to the papal car; will persuasion induce the continental rulers, even if they knew how, to reign in righteousness, to succour the poor and needy, 'and him that hath no helper,' to take care of the orphan and the widow, to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly before God? Will persuasion 'bruise the Serpent's Head?' No; the Serpent Dominion must be broken up by violence, the old heroes of the faith slain in ages past in combat with 'the Beast' must be avenged, and oppressors brought to retribution; and this can only be effected by that armed enmity which Jehovah instituted when he laid the foundation of the world.

2. The Prince of Peace has declared,

'I am come to send fire upon the earth; think not that I am come to send peace on earth; I came not to send peace, but a sword. I am come to set a man at variance against his nearest relative, so that a man's foes shall be they of his own household.'—

Here he declares he came to send fire and sword upon the earth; and if the Peace Society would only avail itself of history, it would have before it the illustration of this divine mission faithfully portrayed even to 1848, the annus mirabilis inclusive. This Society, however, seems most complacently blind to facts; and in conformity with its amiable darkness is virtually usurping the rights and honour of the Prince of Peace. The King of Israel has proclaimed war against ignorance, superstition, oppression, and against every high thing that exalts itself above the knowledge which comes from God; and which war he has ordained shall continue until his return. But this Pseudo-Peace Society says 'No, there shall not be war, if we can help it. We regard human life and commercial prosperity as of more importance than the vindication of the civil and religious rights of mankind by the sword of judgment; blood is more precious than principles; therefore we proclaim, Peace, peace, throughout all the earth.' How remarkably are the words of scripture fulfilled in this saying,

'The day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night. For when they shall say, Peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them as travail upon a woman with child, and they shall not escape.'

Thus this Peace Society sets up for Prince of Peace, and hurls the rightful potentate from the right hand of his Father's throne.

The Society errs in not understanding, that the Lord Jesus is styled

Prince of Peace, not because peace was intended to result from the preaching of the Gospel of the Kingdom in his absence; but because he would conquer a permanent and lasting peace when he should revisit the world. —Persuasions having failed, He will compel mankind to respect his Father's laws; for—

'He shall judge among the Nations, and shall rebuke many people; and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more'—Isaiah 2: 4.

He assumes his functions of Prince of Peace, when, as King of Israel, he shall sit upon the throne of the Restored Kingdom of David, as it is written,

'Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his Kingdom, to order it; and to establish it, with judgment, and with justice henceforth (from its restitution) even forever'—Isaiah 9: 7.

3. If the Peace Society's speculation were carried into effect, the mercy and goodness of God could not be developed, and his promises would fail. He has promised that peace shall be established on the earth as a fruit of righteousness; good will also among men; and that his will shall be done here as it is in other orbs of his universe. But this cannot be until evil in its various political, civil, and ecclesiastical forms is suppressed. Evil and sin will not regenerate themselves; neither can they be regenerated; they must be subdued and extirpated. 'The wicked are the Sword of the Lord;' and 'there is no peace for the wicked, says God.'—These are revealed truths—anti-Peace Society principles. War is the Almighty acting through human agency and subduing things to himself; by which he will prepare the way for the victorious establishment of a divinely implanted righteousness and peace among mankind.

Let then war prevail until the Serpent's Head be crushed; until every form of diabolism, secular and sacerdotal, be subjugated throughout the earth, though it might raise taxes to enormity, and destroy the commercial mammoths of every nation of the globe. The world had better far be poor, independent, and justly ruled, than be splendidly victimised by oppression; and be the bond slaves to a bowelless acquisitiveness, a crotchety sentimentalism, and a fallacious spirituality.

In conclusion, the only peace at present desirable is peace among Bible christians; these ask no peace of the world, or for the world, and make no pretensions to greater spirituality or philanthropy than already sanctioned by the great Captain of their salvation. Their affectionate allegiance concentrates only in him; and they would lead men to that peace of mind in him which 'the world can neither give nor take away,' by considerations derived, not from electrical discoveries, locomotive inventions, or arithmetical calculations—(See Burritt's speech in Morn. Advert. Jan. 16;) but derived from the absorbing realities, which they only understand, who are acquainted with 'the things noted in the scriptures of truth.' That many well-meaning, but manifestly, errant familiars off the Peace Society, may be converted to the divine peace which comes from purity alone, is the sincere wish of yours, respectfully,

JOHN THOMAS.

THE BIBLE DOCTRINE CONCERNING THE TEMPTER CONSIDERED.

NUMBER 4.

From the premises now before us the inquiries concerning the tempter, may be analytically, numerically and concisely answered as follows:

1. When is ‘the beginning?’

Answer. It covers a space of several years, and includes the Creation-week; the probation before the fall, perhaps forty years, after the analogy of the forty days of Christ’s probation in the wilderness; Israel’s forty years under Moses; Judah’s forty years to the destruction of the temple; and the future forty years probation for the ten tribes under Elijah: it includes also, the Fall; and the subsequent murder of Abel, when he had attained to manhood and ripeness of character, at some time before the birth of Seth, Adam being then 130 years old.

2. Has not the ‘Devil’ a place ‘in the beginning’ as really as ‘the Serpent?’

Answer. If by the ‘Devil’ is meant the devil of the Bible, and by ‘the Serpent’ the reptile of which Moses writes, I answer, Yes: but, if by these terms is meant the gentile ‘Devil’ operating in and through a serpent, I answer that such a Devil possessed Serpent has no place at all in the alpha or omega of our world.

3. Was there not a tempter in Christ’s case personally distinct from Jesus?’

Answer. Yes. But that tempter was not a Serpent, nor ‘the Serpent;’ but one sustaining the character of a personal adversary to him.

4. If the tempter be distinct from Christ, the tempted, can we be safe, or justified, in departing from that idea?

Answer. We are not justified in so doing; therefore I have been careful to abide by what is written without regard to the glosses of ‘theology,’ and the petitio principii of ‘divines.’

5. Does not the term ‘Dragon’ in Revelation apply to Rome as the oppressor of Israel and the Church?

Answer. If by ‘Rome’ is meant, an imperial power established first on the totality of the Roman territory; afterwards restricted to the eastern division of it; and hereafter extending far into the western—with first, the city, ROME, and subsequently and finally, CONSTANTINOPLE for its throne—it does: but, if by ‘Rome’ is understood that city, and the imperial power of the west connected with it, since the removal of the throne to Constantinople, by Constantine, it does not. Rome is the Episcopal ‘throne of the Beast;’ Constantinople, the throne of the Dragon.

6. Did not the term ‘Dragon’ anciently represent the Sovereign of Egypt as well as its sovereignty?

Answer. Pharaoh, was the title common to all the meleki Mitzraim, or Kings of Egypt, as Czar is of all the Autocrats of Russia. It does not therefore define a particular person, any more than Czar means Peter the Great rather than Nicholas 1. In Egyptian, Pharaoh signifies the King; hence, ‘the Pharaohs’ indicates all the Kings of Egypt to its conquest by Nebuchadnezzar. The Pharaoh, then, is a power incarnate, defined in Ezekiel as that of ‘the great dragon that lieth in the midst of his rivers’—Ezekiel 29: 3. The Pharaohship was the Egyptian Sovereignty—the kingly power symbolised by the most remarkable animal of the country, the Crocodile or Dragon of the Nile. The man, who was king for the time being, was the eyes and mouth or heading up of the power, nothing more. He did not give inspiration to the power, as ‘the Devil’ is supposed to have done to the Mosaic Serpent; but the power or Nile Serpent, inspired him. Without the pre-existence of the Egyptian Dragon, the man who was drowned in the Red Sea—the oppressor of Israel—would have been nothing. Jehovah addresses the power, not the individual who is the breath of the power, when he says,

‘I am against thee, Pharaoh, King of Egypt, the great dragon that lieth in the midst of his rivers, which hath said, My river is mine own, and I have made it for myself.'

A certain man might have occupied the throne contemporary with the delivery of the prophecy, while another might have been the actual ruler at the time of its accomplishment. That made no difference, however; the prophecy being spoken against the power, whenever it was fulfilled, whoever might occupy the throne, would fall with it.

The Gogue—Ezekiel 38: 2—is to the Assyro-Roman—Revelation 20: 2 what the Pharaoh was to the Dragon of the Nile—a Gentile Dynasty without regard to the particular man who happens to occupy the throne. The prophecy is against the power which gives inspiration to a man as its head, chief or prince, who is the Gogue for the time being. Like the Pharaoh ap aionas, at the beginning of the Mosaic kosmos, or world, the Gogue is 'the oppressor of Israel' in the latter days—he is the 'Head of the Serpent' or Roman Dragon, a power causing to transgress, and therefore DIABOLOS, or incarnate sin politically embodied. This Assyro Roman Dragon to which the Gogueship belongs is Isaiah's Dragon of the Sea, represented by him as contemporary with the resurrection of Jehovah's dead ones.

'In that day,' saith the prophet, 'Jehovah with his sore, and great, and strong SWORD (Messiah and his host) shall punish Leviathan the piercing serpent, even leviathan that crooked serpent; and he shall slay the Dragon that is in the Sea'—Isaiah 27: 1.

The Egyptian and Assyro-Romaic dragons are both alluded to by David—Psalm 74: 14, and the leviathan also as having a plurality of heads. Of these the Gogueship is the last. 'Thou brakest the heads of leviathan in pieces, and gavest him as meat to the people inhabiting the wilderness.'—These people are the twelve tribes under Moses; and their descendants hereafter under Jesus, 'the Lord of hosts,' and Elijah, the restorer of all things; who shall break in pieces the seven-headed leviathan, even 'the Assyrian, who shall fall with the sword, not of a mighty man, not of a mean man'—Isaiah 31: 8, but of God the Almighty; 'for, by fire, and by his sword will Jehovah plead with all flesh; and the slain of the Jehovah shall be many'—Isaiah 66: 15-16.

Our friend, the inquirer touching the tempter, seems to think that a man called Pharaoh was to the Nile-Dragon, as the supposed person, called 'the Devil,' was to the Eden-Serpent; therefore he inquires,

7. Why not allow 'the Serpent' and 'the Devil' both the precise place they occupy in Scripture?

Answer. That is exactly what I have aimed to do. 'Divines' have studied Milton more than the Law and the Testimony on this subject; hence they have got hold of it at the wrong end. They have assumed the pre-existence of devil; so that it is with them first devil, then serpent; but the scriptures exhibit it as the serpent first and then diabolos. This is equally the order of things political as of things Mosaic. The dragon serpent of the Nile, or Rahab, and the dragon-serpent of the Sea, or Assyria of the Latter Days, are both antecedent to the diabolism and Satanism ascribed to them. 'Devil and Satan,' are surnames bestowed upon the Dragon-Serpent. Adam called the Mosaic reptile nahchahsh, or Serpent, most likely from its power to charm. This was its original name. But when its suggestions were responded to, and Adam by his act sinned, or crossed the law-line, and so introduced sin into the world, which, acting in, by, and through, mankind, originated and organised, politically, the dragon-power, that power retained the name Serpent as its patronymic; and because of the relations it sustains to God's nation and land, which are deceitful, enticing, and adverse, it has received the additional names, expressive of its character, diabolos and satanas. These surnames are descriptive of a power, not of a person, in the texts where they occur. Its first appearance in the Apocalypse is as 'a great red dragon' 'in the heaven,' 'having seven heads and ten horns, and seven crowns upon its heads.' John saw this in vision, and styles it a semeion, or 'sign in the heaven;' and therefore representative of something there. It was the Sign of a destroying power; for it sought to destroy a certain child about to be born, 'in the heaven' also. A war 'in the heaven' ensued between this destroying power and the partisans of the new born child. Its object was the expulsion of the great red dragon-power from the heaven. The enterprise succeeded, and no place was found any more for it and its adherents there.

This great red dragon power was of considerable antiquity. For 280 years antecedent to its expulsion, that is, from the crucifixion, it had been the adversary, and JUDICIAL ACCUSER (ho kateegoros) of those who 'kept the commandments of God, and the testimony of Jesus Christ,' styled by the partisans of the child who expelled him, 'our brethren.' His accusations were incessant, giving them no rest by day or by night. But 'steadfast in the faith,' they resisted him valiantly; yea, with a valour that ought to put to shame the downy, drowsy, narrow-souled, professors of our day. Their faith in the Lamb and the testimony overcame all the Dragon-power's endeavours to turn them after itself. Their constancy was victorious, 'for they loved not their souls (teen psycheen autoon) unto death.' Their Souls were tortured unto death, because they 'would not accept deliverance' at the price of apostasy, 'that they might obtain a better resurrection'—Hebrews 11: 35. This savage power, a principal element of which were the institutions of a cruel and debasing idolatry, 'deceived the whole habitable,' civilised, or Roman, world (ho planoon teen oikoumeneen holeen.) These things being affirmed of it; that is, its being the deceiving power of the world, and the adversary and judicial accuser of the Saints, and the enemy off Israel's Commonwealth, God has surnamed it ho Diabolos and ho Satanias.

This apocalyptic sign probably suggested the notion elaborated in Paradise Lost by Milton, of Satan with his rebel hosts being once holy angels in heaven, whence before Adam's day they were expelled for impiety and insurrection against God! ! But the conception is as wild and unscriptural as a poet's imagination can well be without actual insanity. It is true, that certain 'angels kept not their beginning, but deserted their own abode,' and that 'having tartarised,' or cast them down (tartaroosas) God 'committed them to perpetual bonds under intense darkness in accordance with a judgment of a great day.' But the judgment executed upon these angels has consigned them to destruction. They are all prisoners of death, none of them having liberty to roam over God's universe as the Devil is fabled to have done, seeking what portion of his glorious work they might throw into confusion in revenge for the overthrow they had received. This is a mere fiction of the poets. Jude does not say that they are 'reserved unto the judgment of the great day;' but eis krisin megalees heemeras—'by, or in accordance with, a judgment of a great day—God hath consigned them to perpetual bonds under intense darkness.' There is no escape from this sentence; so that, wherever the gentile Devil, or Satan of the poets, hales from, he cannot trace his genealogy to the archangel of the rebel host, whose fall was not from heaven, but a repression to his original sphere which it was unlawful for him to leave. Their bonds are aidian or perpetual; as existent now as when first imposed. 'The Devil and Satan' of the Bible are yet unbound. They are in rampant liberty, and will continue free, until the earth-enlightening angel, the Messiah, shall descend, and bind their original for 1000 years.

This original, the great red dragon, surnamed the Devil and Satan, did not, like the pre-Adamic angels, voluntarily leave his place in the heaven, but was forcibly expelled. He was cast out off the Apocalyptic heaven into the apocalyptic earth by intestine war. He kept his place as long as he could; but being defeated by Constantine, he lost the throne off the habitable, called 'the throne of God,' because it was conquered from the dragon by his people. But, though defeated, he had not lost all power, though his time was short, as he well knew. The imperial Roman idolatry had lost the throne, but it still retained the provinces of 'the earth and sea.' These were still under his jurisdiction, which he exercised in 'great wrath,' especially upon those 'inhabiters' of them, who, by their devotion to Christ, were known to be in sympathy with the enemy that had expelled them from the heaven of the Roman world—Revelation 12: 3-12.

With these words, I think I may now dismiss the further consideration off the inquiries touching the tempter, without incurring the imputation of indefiniteness, or evasion. The subject of diabolos and Satanas is far from being exhausted. In leaving behind me Mr. Cook's queries, I shall not therefore turn my back upon the topic in hand; but, requesting the reader to correct for himself a few typographical errors that have escaped the eye of my compositor, not, however, affecting the sense at all, I propose to continue the investigation of the matter in the ordinary course of publication.

Many strange things have been proved true in our day. An open mind is the best mark of a philosopher. But we regret to say that indications of a philosophic temper have been nowhere so rare as in connection with the question, what is the truth, the great leading truth, of Moses and the Prophets? The closest students of their writings have been denounced, the most honest men discredited, the plainest testimonies scouted, and a dogged determination as far as possible shown that the evidences should not be examined. Such is the infatuate devotion of blind attachment to “organised theology”—it fears to investigate lest its discoveries should reveal the worthlessness of the system by which its zeal is kindled and sustained.

MODERN SERMONISING.

As a faithful chronicler of what is passing in the religious world, especially among those who claim to be par excellence Bible Christians, and to plant themselves on the Bible alone, as their exclusive rule of faith and practice, the 'Herald,' may be expected to keep your readers informed of the kind of faith and preaching, the 'Reformers' now serve up to the public in their stated ministrations. Tributary to this object, I ask space to say that about a week ago, I heard a 'sermon' delivered in this town by Mr. R. L. Coleman—one of the authorised expositors off the Reformation creed—a brief sketch of which only, I propose to offer.

After reading portions of Luke's testimony in 18th and 19th chapters, stopping at the 11th verse of the latter chapter, just in time, it would seem, to save from utter confusion and contradiction, his cherished dogma of a Pentecostian Kingdom; the verses following, from the 11th to 16th inclusive, proving incontestably that the kingdom could not be set up until the Lord (the 'nobleman' of the parable) should 'return' (15th verse) from the right hand of God, where he now sits, he commenced his address by declaring that 'Matthew, Mark, Luke and John wrote to convince the world that Jesus Christ was the Messiah—the Son of God.' I marvel that one so well acquainted with the testimony in the case, should have again stopped short of giving the Evangelists' whole testimony as to the object of their biography, as stated by one of them. 'These are written that you might believe that Jesus is the Christ—the Son of God and believing ye might have life through his name.'—John 20: 31. Was the omission to quote these last words of the verse occasioned by the Preacher's belief in the Pagan dogma of an 'immortal soul' already in man, which, of course, renders the having 'life through his name,' a matter of but little moment. If so, Mr. Coleman is consistent, for truly, if we have life—even eternal life—as we must have in our immortal souls, the mission of Jesus is among the Romish 'works of supererogation!' to that complexion, it must come at last. Truly, may we not ask, of what profit is it to us, to know that 'Jesus is the Son of God,' unless we learn also, that 'through HIM we may have life'—that He only 'hath the words of eternal life' and that 'this life is in (not out of) God's Son.'

Discarding all connexion between Jesus—his name and Mission and our having life through him—which his immortal soul creed obliges him to do—the preacher gave a loose rein to his fancy in setting forth the object of the Christ's Mission into this world. This he described comprehensively in these words, 'Jesus Christ came down from Heaven to carry men up to Heaven.' Alas! alas! what is become of the creed of 'this Reformation' which used to embrace this prominent item. —'If any man speak let him speak as the oracles of God'—1 Peter 4: 11. Where, let us pause and ask, where do 'the oracles of God' declare that such was any part of the Mission of Jesus? Is it in John 3: 13, where Jesus himself says 'No man hath ascended up to Heaven?' or in Acts 2: 34, where it is written, of a better man than this age can probably furnish, 'David is not ascended into the Heavens?' or in Proverbs 11: 31, where it is written, 'The righteous shall be recompensed in the earth; much more the wicked and the sinner.'

Is it not incumbent on Mr. Coleman to show his authority for the assertion above quoted? He is of age that we may 'ask him.' He is the editor of a paper, where he can be heard before the public and he is as all know, a gentleman of intelligence and independence—has been for many years a student and an expounder of the Scriptures, and there is no reason to doubt his sincerity and honesty in advocating the system he preaches. Let him show himself a man of candour, and willing to bring his creed to the test of the written word, by presenting these objections to his readers and proving they are unfounded. —The Bible does not contradict itself, yet what is quoted above is directly and flatly contradictory to his assertion that Jesus came to carry men up to Heaven. If He came for this purpose, let him show how men went to Heaven before Jesus came—such as Abraham, Noah, Moses, Job, &c., or does he mean to say that they have ascended since Jesus came. If so, where is the proof? If indeed good men go to Heaven at death, as he affirms, let him explain or account for Paul's strange sayings, on that hypothesis, in 1 Corinthians 15: 16-18, 'If the dead rise not, then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished.' How can the dead christian be said to have 'perished,' if he be alive in Heaven, seeing that this is so, whether he be raised or not? Truly, 'wisdom is justified of all her children,' but confusion and every evil work attend the gloomy pathway of error.

A GOD OF GUARDIANS.

'In his estate shall the King honour a god of forces, even a god whom his predecessors knew not shall he honour with gold, and silver, and with precious stones, and things desired.'—Daniel 11: 38.

The Old Testament name for the Eyes and Mouth of the Little Horn—Daniel 7: 8, which are commonly called the Pope, is in Hebrew ELOAH MAHUZZIM, rendered in the common version, 'a god of forces.' He is also termed ELOAH NAIKAR, a Strange or Foreign God. The King or Little Horn was to honour him in his estate or kingdom, to acknowledge him, and to increase him with glory. All this has been literally accomplished as we have abundantly shown in Elpis Israel.

Eloah Mahuzzim is a very appropriate title for the Italian Overseer. Eloah is a passive participial noun, and used as a title to Christ as cursed by the law for his hanging upon a tree—Meshiach eloah limmennoo—Messiah cursed for us. Hence ELOAH signifies an accursed one, or a god, accursed because he would speak marvellous things against the God of gods—Ail ailim. Christ and Antichrist therefore are denominated 'cursed,' but on different grounds—Christ, because he became a curse for us by hanging upon a tree—Galatians 3: 13; and Antichrist, because of his blasphemy against God.

The papal Eloah is styled the Accursed One of Mahuzzim. This word signifies protectors, defenders, guardians. The Pope is the Head of these—the Chief on earth of the clan of Guardian Saints, therefore a god of guardians. These guardians are thus spoken of by Chrysostom in his Homily on the Martyrs of Egypt; 'The bodies of those saints fortify the city more effectually for us than impregnable walls of adamant, and like towering rocks placed around on every side, repel not only the assaults of enemies that are visible, but the insidious stratagems also of invisible demons, and counteract and defeat every artifice of the devil as easily as a strong man overturns the toys of children.' The Greeks and Latins made the most of these wonderful martyrs. They sent their ghosts to heaven to act as mediators and intercessors, and kept their bones and dust on earth to guard them from the ills that flesh is heir to! They were a cheap fortification for a city, church, or country, requiring no rations, and more effective, if Chrysostom be believed, than a whole host of living warriors armed to the very teeth! St. Patrick of Erin, St. George of England, St. Andrew of Scotland, St. Denis of France, &c., with the reigning Pope, is the definition in fact of Daniel's ELOAH and his Mahuzzim.

ELEGANT EXTRACT.

‘Dr. Thomas, in his vainglorious speculations, terminating in his Elpis Israel, rather than in the discovery of some new world, on which to inscribe his fame, has covered himself with shame, and reduced his metropolitan church in Richmond to less than half the twelve apostles. In such cases, with a slight modification, we may say with the poet—

“O Sons of earth, attempt you still to rise,
By fables piled on fables to the skies.
Heaven still with laughter the vain toil surveys,
And buries builders in the heaps they raise.’

A. Campbell, Mill. Harb. P. 329.

There is a little defect in the above, and that is, its entire want of truth. — What our friend styles our ‘speculations’ have very far from terminated in Elpis Israel, as every reader of that book and the Herald well knows, and as he knows too. Neither have we ‘covered ourself with shame,’ save in the estimation of himself and satellites; which is an affair of little moment. We have never owned a ‘church’ in Richmond, or elsewhere; and therefore could not reduce such an one. And as to the ‘fables piled on fables to the skies,’ they are all on his side; and from hell beneath to kingdoms in the stars—presently threaten to overwhelm him and his ‘reformation’ in the confusion of Babylon worse confounded. Our friend is in a pitiable plight. He would like to ‘cover us with shame, indeed, by reducing Elpis Israel to an absurdity, if he could; but he dare not make the venture. His profound ignorance of Moses and the Prophets paralyses him. His only alternative therefore is, to give currency to the gossip of lewd fellows of the baser sort.

AN EYE-BEAM EXTRACTOR OF MOTES.

“We cannot,” says our hyper (?) critical friend of Bethany, “but suspect any man’s want of confidence in himself, or of candour, who will take up an evil report against his neighbour, and reproach his principles and character, and will neither give him a hearing, or make the amend honourable.” M. Harb. V. 2 No. 7.p. 413. These are our sentiments exactly. In the same article, he says, “Mr. Anderson of the New York Recorder cannot defend himself, and therefore dare not allow his readers to hear us.” This is, doubtless, the logical conclusion from the premiss.

In view, then, of this, and of our friend’s own practice, we respectfully commend the following words of the Lord Jesus to his grave consideration—

*“Judge not, that ye be not judged. For with what judgment ye judge so shall ye be judged. * * * And why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother’s eye, and considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye? Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out off thy brother’s eye.”*

These are wholesome words which should be memorised by all Eye-Beams, great and small. The Eye-Motes never forget them; because the Eye-Beamers are continually at work upon them practising their spiritual chirurgery, with irritating, but unsanitary, effect. —Their unsuccessful practice is doubtless owing to their neglect of the Great Physician’s prescription. They may be very dexterous mote-extractors, but then, unfortunately, the cataract in their own crystallines are so opaque that they are apt to mistake their own lesions for that of the wretched patient who happens to fall into their otherwise pretty skilful hands. The principles of our friend’s symptomatology are quite accurate. We commend them to the favourable regard of all his fellow-craftsmen, for whose daily use we reduce them to the following convenient form:

1. A man who combats an opponent with any other weapons than testimony and right reason is utterly devoid of self confidence, and candour.
2. When an editor, preacher, or any other person refuses to permit audiences to hear in defence those they assail, it is proof that they know that their cause is too rotten to sustain without damage an examination which truth always courts from its opponents.

LUTHER'S CITADEL.

In addressing Charles V. and the great princes of the German Empire at Worms in 1521, Luther said, “since, great Caesar and illustrious princes, you require a specific answer, this is my decision. Unless I am convinced by proof from the sacred writings or evident reason, I cannot recall anything that I have written, or taught, for I cannot do what would wound my conscience. On the other hand, I have no faith in the Roman Pontiff and mere councils, and do not regard them as of authority, for they have frequently erred and contradicted themselves in their decrees, and are liable to misjudge and be deceived.”— Strange that any one should ever have doubted so obvious a liability. Luther was right to yield only to testimony and reason. These were the citadel of his strength as they are ours. They were the apostolic weapons, as it is written,

“Paul as his manner was, went into the Synagogue to the Jews, and reasoned with them out of the scripture, opening and alleging.”

Human authority, lay or clerical, is not to be regarded in an inquiry after truth. If all who profess to admire Luther would work by the rule he adopted, it would be more creditable to their understandings, and more profitable to their hearers, than the present mar-text expositions by which they stultify themselves.

LAMB.

A lamb in the Apocalypse does not represent a lamb, but a man whose name comprehends the attributes of innocence and sacrifice for sin. “A lamb as it had been slain, having seven horns and seven eyes, which are the seven Spirits of God sent forth into all the earth”—Revelation 5: 6, represents that same Man as once dead, but alive again; and henceforth the depositary of the unmeasured Spirit of God, by which (in the time of the vision) he is almighty and seeing over all.

ISRAEL'S HOPE.

Mr. B. C. Carillon, minister of the Jewish Synagogue at St. Thomas', in a letter to the Occident, in which he repudiates the divine authority of the Talmud, and contends for the supremacy of the Law and the Prophets, says, 'The divine, pure, and perfect code of Moses is destined to be at a future period the code of all mankind.' He concludes his letter to the editor by 'Hoping that the God of our fathers will soon reunite us with our blessed Palestine, under the sway of our King Messiah.'

There is more truth than fiction in Mr. Carillon's prediction concerning the Mosaic Law. The Feast of Tabernacles and Levitical Sacrifices are enjoined by the code of Moses; and Zechariah testifies that—

*'Every one that is left of all the nations, which came against Jerusalem, shall even go up from year to year to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, and to keep the Feast of Tabernacles. **

 * And they that sacrifice shall come and take of them, and see the therein'*—Zechariah 14: 16, 21.

The Mosaic Law amended so as to harmonise with the truth in Jesus, but not the entire original statutes, will become the code of all nations, in the time when 'it (the Law) shall go forth from Zion, and the Word of the Lord from Jerusalem.'

The conclusion to his letter is one in which every one can heartily join who believes the Gospel of the Kingdom. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are his 'fathers,' in a higher sense than Mr. Carillon, as a natural Jew, can claim. Palestine is the land of the true believer's adoption, and he longs to be united to it, not simply to be 'under the sway' as a mere subject, but to be associated with Messiah in his kingly and priestly offices, as joint-rulers with him of Israel and the nations of the earth.

ROMISH IDOLATRY DEFINED.

‘The images of Christ, and of the Virgin Mother of God, and of other Saints,’ saith the Council of Trent, ‘are to be kept and continued in temples especially, and due honour and homage paid to them. Not that it should be believed there is any divinity or virtue in them for which they should be worshipped, or that any thing is to be sought from them, or that trust is to be placed in them, as was formerly done by the pagans who put their hope in idols; but because the honour shown them is referred to the prototypes whom they represent: so that we adore Christ through the images which we kiss, and before which we uncover the head and kneel, and pay homage to the Saints whose similitude they bear.’

Such is the way in which the Council endeavours to relieve Papists of the charge of idolatry. But they may refine as much as they please about the distinction that exists between their views and the ideas of Pagans in the adoration of images, the acts still remain. Papists and Pagans, brethren of the same great synagogue, namely Satan’s, both ‘kiss,’ ‘uncover the head, and kneel’ to idols. These are acts of adoration before the senseless stocks they hallow; and by these acts they constitute themselves idolaters—payers of honour and homage to ‘statues of gold, and silver, and brass, and stone, and of wood; which can neither see, nor hear, nor walk,’ which are due to God alone. The law which convicts them of idolatry is,

“Thou shalt have no other gods before me. Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or that is in the water under the earth: thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them.”

Papists do all this. They have ‘other gods,’ they make graven images; and they make likenesses of Christ, of the Virgin, and of ‘Saints,’ whose ghosts they say are in heaven above. They bow down to them, and serve them in divers ways, celebrating days to their honour, making votive offerings on the shrines, and ‘saying prayers’ to them: and more besotted and stupid than the old pagans themselves, they do honour and homage to worm-eaten skull bones and shins of the dead! The ghosts of their deceased patrons are the ‘other gods before Jehovah’ whom they honour with worshipful fanaticism far above him.

Such is the idolatry, the soul-debasing superstition, blasphemously styled Christianity, against which a word is forbidden to be published by the Jesuitical friends of ‘Order and Religion,’ as it is called, in the dark places of the earth! Even ‘enlightened protestant Britain’ endows Maynooth, a hot-bed of papal treason against its institutions and the freedom of its people, for the inculcation of its diabolism! And in the United States, the ugly monster that crushed the Protestantism of Hungary, is flattered by intriguers of all parties for the sake of its votes. But we rejoice to know that ‘Jehovah is a jealous God;’ and that for the honour of his own name he will not permit such an outrage on truth and reason to curse the earth with its presence a single day beyond the appointed time of its destruction.

ARGUMENT FOR ETERNAL TORTURE.

BY ALEXANDER CAMPBELL.

President of Bethany College, Professor of “Sacred History,” and “Supervisor of the Reformation.”

A Campbellite paper intitled the ‘Christian Intelligencer,’ is republishing the speculations of the Reverend Alexander Campbell, issued some years ago in a pamphlet called an ‘Extra’ to the Millennial Harbinger. The title of it was ‘Life and Death.’ It exhibited his opinions on ‘Eternal Punishment;’ and his ‘arguments’ against ‘Everlasting Destruction,’ which he prefers to call annihilation; and in favour of the dogma of Eternal Life in Torment by Fire for all ‘Spirits’ continuing impenitent till their separation from their bodies at death. Thus in effect he defines the eternal punishment spoken of in scripture: and in his essay endeavours to prove that it is the ‘Death’ which awaits those who do not attain to the ‘Life’ promised to the righteous; and hence the title of his pamphlet, ‘Life and Death.’ Our obliging friend says, he wrote it in honour of our theory—‘I honoured his theory,’ says he, ‘by an Extra on Life and Death, which as far as I know he has not attempted to answer.’ I quote from memory, not having his paper at hand. He professes to think it an unanswerable performance; and it is so accepted by the 300,000 disciples, whose supervisor he claims to be. Seeing, then, that it is being reproduced in the columns of the Intelligencer, I have thought it might not be altogether unprofitable to present our readers with a specimen of this wonderful treatise—this chef d’oeuvre of logic and criticism, with which its author plumes himself so fantastically, to the admiration of a multitude that cannot think, and will not learn.

He says, ‘it is assumed by some of the advocates of destructionism that an annihilation of personal existence IS misery.’ For myself, I have never read or heard of such an assumption being entertained by any advocate of what Mr. C. styles 'destructionism.' Misery implies consciousness; and is defined, 'Great unhappiness; extreme pain of body or mind.' Now, I cannot think, that any 'advocate' would use the word misery as descriptive of the state of a person whom he regards, when annihilated, as nonentity—mere dust without consciousness. The assumption attributed to such advocates is convertible into the proposition that, When persons are reduced to dust, and cease to know any thing, they are very unhappy, and suffer extreme pain of body and mind. This is the assumption Mr. C. imputes to 'some of the advocates of destructionism!' But in this, he is too willing a witness against them, and renders his testimony incredible. He impeaches his own veracity by stultifying his own statements. In stating the views of his opponents, or of those from whom he differs, he is not worthy of belief. The assertion that destructionists assume any such thing, is so palpably false and ridiculous, that Mr. C. is at once convicted of untruth. Look at it! To make destructionists affirm that 'an annihilation of present existence is misery,' is equivalent to saying that annihilation is torment, which is the punishment contended for by tormentists, which destructionists deny. If Mr. C. say that destructionists affirm that, 'the prospect of an annihilation of personal existence is misery,' he is correct. They do affirm this. But Mr. C's words will not admit of this construction, though the context seems to intimate it. That 'an annihilation is misery,' is tantamount to, misery is an annihilation of existence, or 'the state of not being is misery.' 'An annihilation of personal existence' is the subject proposed; 'misery' is the predicate affirmed of this subject; and 'is,' which is a verb indicating a state of being, or what exists, is the copula: hence, being in misery is an annihilation of personal existence, is the unambiguous assumption charged upon some destructionists by Mr. C., which if justly affirmed of them would prove them to be fools; and if not, their accuser any thing but a reputable opponent.

Mr. C's policy in argument is to impute something to his adversary palpably absurd, as above; and then to argue against the assumption as if he were reasoning against the real thing believed by his opponent, but not expressed or contained in the imputation. This diabolical procedure excites a prejudice against the adverse party, which in itself establishes a sympathy between the prejudicants and himself, which is half the victory, where the debate is to be decided by a vote. He proceeds in this ad captandum vulgus fashion, so peculiarly congenial to his phrenology, in the paper before us, where having uttered the imputation to prejudice the reader, he goes on to argue against the prospect of annihilation being misery, which all (not some only, but all,) destructionists believe. By sophistry, which with him is logic, he makes the prospect happiness rather than misery! He works out this conclusion upon the principle that the prospect of falling down dead without warning is perfect enjoyment to the expectation of being skinned alive; so that a relative negation of suffering with him is positive enjoyment and felicity!

Having then presented the assumption to the reader, we may now introduce Mr. C., that he may speak to him in his own person. He proceeds as follows:

“In the fourth place, I argue against this assumption from the fact that it amounts to an annihilation of the sanctions of the gospel, and directly contradicts the positive declarations of the Saviour concerning eternal punishment. With destructionists there can be no eternal punishment, for with them there is no eternal fire.

“This is truly a very grave charge against any system of doctrine, and requires to be well sustained. What, then, let me inquire, is indicated by the term punishment? It is not mere animal suffering; for then the lamb would be punished for its innocence, and the dove for its meekness. Both these frequently endure great animal sufferings. There must, then, be some other pain than animal sufferings to constitute punishment. There is mental pain as well as physical pain. The martyr at the stake, though enduring much animal pain, suffers no mental agony. There must always be consciousness of guilt, or a sense of crime committed, in order to punishment.

“Punishment, it appears, begins and ends with the feeling of pain inflicted for the commission of crime. If, then, at any time consciousness of guilt, or the feeling of pain, mental or physical, because of sin, should cease, that moment punishment ceases. Punishment begins and ends with the consciousness of pain inflicted because of guilt contracted through the violation of law or the neglect of duty. Now as the destructionists assign an end to the endurance of pain because of sin, they of course incontrovertibly deny ‘everlasting punishment.’ But Jesus Christ says, ‘The wicked,’ at the final judgment, ‘shall go away into everlasting punishment,’ and the righteous ‘into life eternal.’ The same word, aioonios, everlasting, ascertains the continuance of the punishment and of the life. Can any thing, then, be more evident that the destructionists have formed a direct issue with Jesus Christ on the subject of eternal punishment? The Messiah says it is everlasting; the destructionists say it will come to an end at the second death.

“For the sake of a few mere pretenders to sound argumentative discrimination and great logical acumen, I shall give this argument the regular form, that any one disposed to attack it may immediately perceive what he has to encounter! Logically expressed it stands thus: —

“No one dispossessed of conscious guilt can be punished. But persons annihilated are dispossessed of conscious guilt; therefore, no one annihilated can be punished.

“Annihilation, or personal extinction, may, indeed, be an end of punishment, but never the beginning of it. This single argument, unless fairly met and refuted, annihilates the whole theory of destructionism. We build this argument upon no ambiguous premises. We have the word of the Saviour and Judge of the world for it. In giving an account of the final judgment, he says all on his left hand shall depart ‘into everlasting punishment.’ He uses the word kolasis to indicate what sort of punishment he means. The word occurs but twice in the New Testament. In a passage found, 1 John 4: 18, it is translated ‘torment.’ They all go into everlasting torment. How weak or how vicious the head that thence infers that torments are to end in a second death?

“It is worthy of remark that eternal life, as the reward of the righteous, is the contrast with eternal punishment, the reward of the wicked: and that this is infinitely greater than death, we learn from another passage, which we ought to regard as a distinct argument or evidence of the doctrine of everlasting punishment.”

Response by Dr. Thomas

ENDLESS TORMENT REFUTED, AND “EVERLASTING PUNISHMENT” EXPLAINED.

The preceding ‘argument’ is quite a flourish of trumpets; a very windy blast, full of uncertain sound, having no scriptural significance. If our valiant friend would talk less about logic and be more logical, he would pass for a better logician than he appears to be from his argument; but pluming himself so much upon his fancied proficiency in the syllogistic art, he tempts one to a scrutiny of his pretensions, to ascertain if it be all gold that glitters in his sentences! The odour of the extract before us is very redolent of that species of logic styled sophistry by the professed. Its argument seems to be founded on a fallacy of that class styled ‘material,’ or non-logical, where the conclusion, indeed, follows from the premises, which, however, ought not to have been assumed.

Strange as it may appear, it is nevertheless manifest, that Mr. C. errs, not knowing what the word punishment imports. No man can reason correctly if he do not understand the signification of the terms he employs. These must be correctly defined, so that an accurate idea may be formed of what a man is talking about. The thing in dispute is that represented by ‘punishment,’ or kolasis. In what sense are these words used in English? A man who aspires to the renown of having given to his contemporaries a faithful and thorough translation of the scriptures, ought to be able to answer this question. It is evident, however, from the above, that Mr. C. is not. He ‘errs not knowing the scriptures,’ nor the words he employs; therefore his logic is but a non-logical fallacy, as I shall show.

He is evidently very partial to ‘eternal fire,’ and to eternal consciousness as indispensable elements of the thing represented by the word ‘punishment.’ Because, these ideas haunt his imagination like ghosts, or like the remembrance of the shade he saw when a dyspeptic student, that told him all that should befall him to the end, he therefore conceits they were as certainly a part of the Lord’s mind when he spoke of ‘eternal punishment!’ But with our experience of Mr. C., we cannot admit that his mind and the Lord’s are one upon a single important particular. A great change must come over us before we can admit that, to reject Mr. C's opinions is to 'annihilate the sanctions of the gospel, and directly to contradict the positive declarations of the Saviour concerning eternal punishment.' With Mr. C. there can be no eternal punishment unless fire co-exist; if then it should turn out that the fire is not eternal, he denies eternal punishment, and therefore the doctrine of the Lord. Thus we throw back his 'very grave charge' against 'destructionists' upon himself; and in opposing assertion to mere assertion, we affirm that a co-eternal fire is not necessary to eternal punishment such as it is represented to be in the scriptures of truth.

Mr. C. undertakes to sustain well the 'truly very grave charge' he has made against those who reject his speculations. We like to see a thing 'well sustained;' and when we read his intimation to sustain his charge well, we were all on the qui vive to see how well he would do it! To accomplish this, the first thing he very properly inquires is, What is indicated by the term punishment? He asserts that it is not mere animal suffering. I, for one who believe in destruction, never imagined that it did. There is no dispute between Mr. C. and myself here. I believe with him that punishment is not mere animal suffering. Next he says, there is mental pain as well as physical pain in punishment. Here again we are agreed in part. There is, provided the offender be of sound mind and have time for reflection; but it is quite conceivable that, a man may have inadvertently transgressed a law, and suffer instant death before he had time to reflect upon the penalty he had incurred by the act. In this case there would be punishment without either physical or mental pain. The case of Uzzah is in point here. He stretched forth his hand to steady the Ark with the seemingly good intention of preventing its fall. But it was contrary to law for any one to touch the Ark but a priest, under penalty of death. This was the law-punishment, which in Uzzah's case took instant effect. He sinned inadvertently, thinking, doubtless, of nothing less than the law and its penalty, and the punishment of death followed as a flash of lightning.

Again, a fool, idiot, or madman, may transgress a law whose penalty is death, but in their case commuted into imprisonment for life. Instead of suffering mental pain because deprived of liberty, they would probably enjoy themselves very much; and might conceit themselves to be kings and princes in a palace. Cases of this sort are numerous in asylums. They would be suffering the punishment of the law, being in the passive voice, but without pain of any sort, unless they should happen to fall sick of a painful disease; but in this case the pain would be no part of the legal infliction, but consequent upon the infraction of a law of health. These are obvious truths, and form the exception to our full acquiescence in the idea that there is always mental pain in punishment. It is self-evident that there is not.

But, I admit there may be mental pain sometimes. Thus, if a conscientious, or a conscious, person know the law, and the punishment which is sure to follow its neglect or transgression, and nevertheless violate it, then his punishment begins with the transgression. He may be free from physical pain, but be crucified with mental agony by 'a certain looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries.' And when he comes to appear in that judgment, his anguish of mind will increase, not from apprehension of physical pain only, but from 'seeing Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and all the prophets, in the kingdom of God, and he himself cast out.' This will cause 'weeping and gnashing of teeth,' evincing great mental suffering. This is punishment, but not all the punishment. Physical pain follows mental, and for a time co-exists with it, until both end in death and corruption. But of this hereafter; the points admitted are, that punishment is not mere animal suffering, or bodily pain; nor is it exclusively mental pain; nor always mental and physical pain combined, though it is sometimes; but it may exist without either. And this harmonises with the meaning of the word 'punishment' as given in the dictionary, though not with Mr. C's theory. It is defined by lexicographers as 'Anything inflicted on a person for a crime or offence, by the authority to which the offender is subject, either by the constitution of God, or of civil society.' The person in this case is a sufferer, because he is in the passive voice, being a person acted upon. His being a sufferer does not necessitate that he should be conscious of what he is undergoing. Criminals have been hanged in unconsciousness from fainting; they were nevertheless sufferers in the true import of the term, and are therefore said to have 'suffered death,' or the punishment inflicted by the law they had transgressed. We use the word 'punishment' in the received sense, which

Mr. C. and his brethren, the eternal-tormentists, do not. They say, ‘there must always be consciousness of guilt, or a sense of crime committed, in order to punishment.’ We have seen in the case of Uzzah that no such necessity exists—there may be punishment, and no co-existent consciousness.

From what has been said it is evident, that our friend Campbell is like a mariner who has lost his course, completely out of his reckoning in saying, that ‘punishment begins and ends with the feeling of pain inflicted for the commission of crime;’ so that any time the feeling of mental or physical pain should cease that moment punishment ceases! No pain no punishment, is the dogma of tormentists—a tradition of their fathers, so manifestly false and ridiculous that, if it were not for the extraordinary kind of admiration we have for their brother Campbell, so ‘profoundly skilled in analytic,’ we should be tempted to class them among those ‘foolish men’ whose ‘ignorance,’ the learned Paul commanded his son Timothy to ‘send to Coventry!’

Presuming that no pain no punishment is good logic, and a first principle of the oracles of God, but which I have shown to be a mere conceit, Mr. C. turns upon the ‘destructionists,’ and charges them with incontrovertibly denying the everlasting punishment taught by Jesus in rejecting his dogma! This is certainly quite presumptuous. Destructionists believe what Jesus says about punishment; but they do not believe the tormentists-interpretation of what he said on the subject: nor are they convinced that the opinions of the fire-and-brimstone men are entitled to the same respect as His teaching. In denying the no pain no punishment theory, they do not deny that the ‘these’ referred to ‘shall go away into everlasting punishment’—Matthew 25: 46. They believe they will; and that the punishment will be as permanent as the ‘everlasting destruction’—2 Thessalonians 1: 9, and ‘second death’—2 Corinthians 2: 15-16; Revelation 20: 14; 21: 8, threatened by Paul and John.

But to return to our logician. When shall we get him to stick to the text? He quotes Jesus as saying, ‘the wicked’ (at the final judgment) ‘shall go away into everlasting punishment.’ We beg leave to remark that Jesus says no such thing. His words are, 'these shall depart into everlasting punishment.' Mr. C. has substituted 'the wicked' for 'these,' and thrown in parenthetic words fixing the time of going away into punishment at what he calls 'the final judgment.' By the wicked is generally understood all who are not righteous. Though the wicked are unquestionably unrighteous; yet all that are not in a justified state, are not styled wicked in scripture. The 'these' referred to by Jesus are doubtless wicked persons; but they are not 'the wicked' in the popular Gentile sense of all mankind who are not righteous. Hence, the Lord Jesus was not speaking off the punishment of all 'the wicked,' or unrighteous; but only of those who sustain a relation to him in being in some way related to his disciples, whom they allow to suffer from hunger, thirst, desolateness, nakedness, sickness and imprisonment, without attempting to relieve them. They are in fact the 'many who shall say, in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied (or preached) in thy name? And in thy name have cast out devils? And in thy name done many wonderful works? And then I will profess unto them, I never knew you: Depart from me'—Matthew 7: 22. —Where to? Into the fire mentioned in the twenty-fifth chapter, 'prepared for the devil and his angels;' and why? Because 'ye work iniquity.' These are they who depart into the punishment; and not all the sons of Adam who die in sin, or being sinners.

But some one will say, 'if the 'these' be unrighteous professors only, all 'the wicked' in the Gentile sense are certainly comprehended with 'the Devil and his angels' who suffer in the same fire?' I answer, not so. 'The Devil and his Angels' are powers on earth, incarnated in the goat-nations on the King's left hand. They are 'the Beast with the False Prophet, and the Kings of the earth, and their armies, gathered together to make war' with Him—Revelation 19: 19-20. Turn to this passage. The reader will there see, that the powers represented by the symbols of 'the Beast' and 'False Prophet,' are to be cast into the same place as 'the Devil and his Angels'—eis teen limneen tou pyros teen kaiomeneen, 'into the lake of the fire being inflamed with brimstone.' That region of the earth where the Powers assemble to contend with the King in war, is the territory which will be converted into a fiery lake by the warfare which is to rage there until the Powers be consumed, with the armies that strengthen them. The Nations from which those armies are drawn, though subject to many calamities, will not be destroyed—Zechariah 14: 16. They will be subdued, when their kings can no more raise armies out of them for battle; and when their conquest is complete, they will joyfully accept the law of the victor, and become blessed in Abraham and his Seed. The horrors of the contest in the lake of fire, the great battle-field of the age—AION—will be awful. The fiery indignation of the Lord, by pestilence and famine, fire and sword—Isaiah 66: 15-16; Zechariah 14: 12, will there devour the adversaries; and thither, to share in 'the terror of the Lord,' will the cursed professors, but not doers, of the word, previously awakened from the dust of the earth, be exiled, and overwhelmed in the torment of the crisis.

The Eternal-tormentists err in assigning the period of the departure into the punishment into what they term 'the final judgment.' By this they mean, a judgment to occur when Jesus comes with all the ghosts of the righteous, to reunite them with their bodies; also to rejoin the hell-bound spirits with their bodies, and to send them back to fire and brimstone to burn in pain, physical and mental, without end; and to conflagrate the earth and all the wicked upon it, immediately after he has separated the living righteous from among them, and added them to the newly embodied ghosts he brought with him from the skies: —a judgment which, when perfected, will have been a work of destruction of one of the fairest planets of the universe, leaving Jesus and his company no more to do with earth, nor earth with them: so that now all things being finished, nothing else remains, but that he should turn his back upon the smoking ruins, and the piercing shrieks of Hell's burning myriads, and 'escort his friends to a new paradise of God, in which the tree of life, in all its deathless beauties, shall bloom and fructify for ever!' O merciful God, what savages must they be who can frame, and earnestly plead for such a crisis of humanity; and how dishonouring to thy character, as thou hast revealed thyself in thy word, to attribute such diabolism to thee! It is the ferocity of wolves superadded to the folly and imbecility of creatures who are wise in their own conceit, and unsubdued to the spirit of thy truth! No wonder their enmity is so fierce against them that believe it.

Such is 'the final judgment' elaborated by the thinking of beclouded brains. They don't pretend to say exactly when it will come to pass; though taking the apocalyptic thousand years as symbolic time, to be estimated on the day for a year principle, some of them say, it may be 360,000 years to come! Precious interpreters are these! Well, whenever it is to be, they assign the scene predicted by the Lord to the epoch of 'the final judgment;' so little do they know of any thing to happen before then! Yet this assignment is vastly strange! The Lord himself says, that this going away into punishment and life, is 'When the Son of Man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him.' And he tells us when this coming is to happen; for he continues, 'then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory.' But how do the spiritualisers get along with this? They say, that Jesus ascended to the throne of his glory before the Day of Pentecost, and has been sitting upon the throne of his kingdom for ages! If we grant it, then the 'these' he speaks of went away into everlasting punishment then; which, perhaps, even they, who are accustomed to assent to the most fabulous incongruities with implicit credulity, would say is absurd. It is absurd, just as much so as to affirm, that the Son of Man ascended his throne of glory on the day of his ascension to heaven, or that he sits on it at the present time. Let the reader turn to Matthew 25: 31, and study it. He does not go from earth to sit thereon, but He comes in his glory; not alone, but accompanied by his angels; He comes escorted by them to ascend the throne of his glory and to sit on it till, as Paul says, he shall have put down all enemies; for he must reign till he has accomplished that. Jesus was in Israel's land when he said he would come to sit on the throne of his glory. Mark that, ye sky-kingdomers! This text teaches, that the throne of glory which he is to sit upon is to be a throne in Israel's land; and that when he comes to sit upon that throne, the context further informs us, that the 'anathema maranatha,' the accursed when the Lord comes—1 Corinthians 16: 22 (verse 41,) are exiled from his presence into the age fire, which is, as already explained, the punishment of the age. It is clear, that the judgment referred to in this chapter is not a final judgment; but one introductory of the Kingdom, the preparation of which is then complete. This appears from the thirty-fourth verse, where the Heirs of the Kingdom—James 2: 5—promised them, are told to come and take possession of it—a kingdom prepared for them. But the 'taking possession of the kingdom, and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven'—Daniel 7: 27, by the Heir and his associates, cannot be effected without judgment. It is therefore written in Daniel, 'the Ancient of Days came and judgment was given to the Saints of the Most High; and the time came for the Saints to possess the kingdom.' This is the judgment of which Jesus speaks in the twenty-fifth of Matthew—not a final judgment; but the judgment on THE POWERS represented by Daniel's Fourth Beast with its Little Horn, and its Eyes and Mouth, and its Ten Horns; summarily designated by the Lord, 'the Devil and his Angels,' because what they represent constitutes SIN'S BODY POLITIC; and styled by John, 'the Beast, the False Prophet, and the Kings of the Earth'—the Little Horn being 'the Beast;' the Eyes and Mouth, 'the False Prophet;' and the Horns, 'the Kings of the Earth.' So long as these Fourth-Beast Powers retain their dominion, 'the blessed of Christ's Father' cannot inherit the kingdom; because its territory and people, the Twelve Tribes, are in their hands. Hence, 'the judgment' must first 'sit, to take away their dominion, to consume and to destroy it to the end.' When this is accomplished as represented by John—Revelation 19: 11-21; 20: 2-3, 'the Father's blessed Ones' are in possession of the kingdom, and thenceforth 'reign with Christ a thousand years' without any further change. In consuming Sin's Body Politic, and destroying it out of the way, scope is afforded for the punishment of individuals, who will be raised for this purpose. The rapidly approaching judgment which introduces the Age to Come, is 'a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation to that same time'—Daniel 12: 1. When it is manifested, it will be 'the everlasting fire prepared for the Devil and his Angels,' in the lake or territory of the Fourth Beast. At this crisis, three things occur of joyful interest to the believer—Michael, who is Jesus, stands up for Israel; Israel is delivered; and many of the dead awake. Not all of them, but 'many;' they are the dead once constituted righteous, some of whom continued 'faithful unto death;' while others, who began to run well, were hindered; and returned like 'dogs to their vomit, and like washed hogs to their wallowing in the mire:' the former 'some,' awake from the dust in which they are sleeping, to everlasting life; while the latter, arise to be exiled from the King's presence with shame and contempt, to share in the punishment of the age.

The final judgment, scripturally considered, is the last to which the inhabitants of earth will ever be subjected. It occurs a thousand years after the judgment treated of in the twenty-fifth of Matthew. The territory on which the decision will be determined will be the arena of the pre-millennial judgment; for 'the devil' of that crisis, is to find his destruction where the Beast and the False Prophet encountered their's a thousand years before. The final judgment is the epoch of the destruction of the last enemy, death; so that thenceforth there shall be no more death upon the earth. The destruction of death is represented in the symbolographic sentence saying, that 'Death and the Grave were cast into the lake of fire,' that is, 'the rest of the dead' to be raised, but who had no part in the resurrection of the First Fruits, with the unjust who died during the thousand years, these at the end of them are awaked, and driven into exile where they come to their end with the devil, who seduced from their allegiance the millennial nations at the end of that age. 'This is the second death.'

The words in which Matthew's Greek translators record the expression used by Jesus are eis kolasin aionion. Mr. C. says, 'the word aioonios, everlasting, ascertains the continuance of the punishment, and of the life.' This is as much as we could expect from one who is ignorant of the gospel of THE AIOON, or glad tidings concerning the blessedness of the nations in the Age to Come. I object, that it does not define the continuance of either; but indicates the epoch of the punishment and the life. The mind of Jesus, the apostles, and of the Jewish nation, was full of the Future Age, styled Aioon Mellon in the Greek. They were of one mind on this subject. Referring to the future Aioon, the prophet styles Messiah AVI AD, the Father or founder of the AD or age—Isaiah 9: 6. Hence, when they wrote 'for ever and ever,' they expressed it by LE-OLAHM WAH-ED, or a long time even to the Age. If the words are affirmed of these things before the age, the long time is terminated at the age; but if of things established at its introduction, the long time ends at the introduction of the next, or succeeding age, which is an Ad, comprehending Ages of Ages without limitation. When Jesus offered to wash Peter's feet, he declined, and said, in the words of the English version, 'thou shalt never wash my feet.' But this is not the translation of Peter's words as recorded in the text. He said 'Ou mee nipsees tous podas mou EIS TON AIOONA'—John 13: 8, thou mayest not have washed my feet unto the age. The age in this instance was the limit of Peter's 'never.' Again, the psalmist speaking of the continuance of the throne of the Mighty One says to him prophetically, kisakah elohim olahm wah-ed—‘thy throne of the gods is a long time even to the age.’ Paul applies this to Jesus and his brethren. The signification of it is, ‘Thy throne, O mighty God, is a throne of the gods, thy brethren, a long time until the Ages of Ages,’ which Paul styles ‘the end, when the Son shall deliver up the kingdom to the Father, that God may be all in all’—Psalm 45: 6; 1 Corinthians 15: 24.

The Lord Jesus was well aware that he was to be the Founder of that Age; that all his glory pertained to it; and all the good things promised to man in the gospel were inseparable from it. Even the gifts of the Spirit bestowed in the apostles’ day Paul styles dynameis mellontos aionos, ‘powers of the Future Age’—an earnest of the powers the saints shall then possess. Hence, Jesus said to Peter that a man who made sacrifices ‘for the kingdom of God’s sake, should receive in the Age to Come age-life’ (en too aiooni too erchomenoo zoeen aioonion.) Thus, it was Age-life and Age-punishment at the introduction of the Age to Come of which he treated in his discourse to the people.

AIOONIOS, I have said, indicates the epoch of the substantive, not its continuance. In addition to what has been said illustrative of this, I may cite the words evangelion aionion, in the English version rendered everlasting gospel. Now, it is not to be conceived that aionion expresses continuance here. The proclamation called gospel is not to be an everlasting proclamation; for when it is rejected it will cease to be proclaimed; and when the kingdom of which it treats is set up, it will have ceased to be a matter of faith; it will be an accomplished fact, and consequently there will be no more good news to announce for faith concerning it. The ainoonian gospel is THE GOSPEL OF THE AIOON, or the Age-Gospel—the glad tidings of the coming Age, of which Jesus is the founder. The life promised to believers belongs to this age; it is therefore aioonian. It does not belong to the Mosaic Age, nor to the Times of the Gentiles; so that men dying under the Law, and under the reign of Antichrist, even if they had ‘spirits’ capable of a disembodied existence, could not enter into the promised life at death. It belongs to the Age treated of in the gospel, and cannot be obtained till then; for it is not till the introducing of that Age that the dead are raised. It is the Age-Life of the Age-Gospel, and therefore ainoonian.

But, while I deny that aioonios indicates the continuance of punishment, I admit that there are other words which note persistence in connexion with it. I adduce the following passage as an example.

‘If any worship the Beast and his Image, and receive his mark in his forehead, or in his hand, the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation; and he shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb; and the smoke of their torment ascendeth for ever and ever; and they have no rest day nor night’—Revelation 14: 9-10.

Thus the passage stands in the English version. It is parallel with the text in Matthew which speaks of the Devil and his Angels, and giving us additional information respecting those who are to suffer with them in the torment. The first eleven verses of this chapter of Revelation enumerate the events in the order of their development, for which those ‘who keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus,’ are waiting with all the patience they can exercise. First, the Lord appears in Zion with his angels, and resurrected brethren; next, a proclamation of the Gospel of the Age is made to the nations and their governments, the effect of which is to divide them into sheep-nations and goat-nations; thirdly, the Goat-nations having rejected it, their Great City Babylon, or Rome, is overthrown; and fourthly, the Goat-nations having prepared for battle, march against the Lamb and his army—Revelation 19: 11-21, by whom they are met at the seat of war and in this way they come into ‘the presence of the holy angels, and the Lamb.’ This seat of war is the place of their torment, which begins and ends with the war. The Goat-nation confederacy is represented by ‘the Beast and the False Prophet.’ As I have said before, these are powers, or dominions. They are the Imperial and Pontifical sovereignties, which exercise civil and ecclesiastical jurisdiction over those nations which do reverence to the emperor and the pope. These nations are characterised by a sign, or ‘charagma,’ impressed or signed upon them. Few individuals belonging to them are without the sign. Perhaps none. It is ‘the Sign of the Cross,’ or accursed tree, * which is signed upon the forehead of every subject of the Beast and his Image when he is sprinkled, or ‘baptised,’ as they absurdly style it; and upon the palm of the right hand of those of them, who may be afterwards ordained priests to buy and sell in the Bazaars of the Patron-Saints, or Mahuzzim, of their superstition. These are ‘the goats,’ who, in their civil and ecclesiastical organization, are symbolised by ‘the Beast and his Image,’ ‘the Beast and the False Prophet,’ or by ‘the Devil and his Angels.’ The resurrected who are driven from the Lord’s presence, commingle with the goats, and share with them in the torment prepared.

* Papists call it “Holy Cross;” but how can that be holy which makes him accursed who hangs upon it! See Galatians 3: 13.

ENDLESS TORMENT REFUTED, AND “EVERLASTING PUNISHMENT” EXPLAINED.

The armies of the goat-nations being gathered before Him, their torment (basanismos, not kolasis) begins. They are permitted to have no rest, or truce, day nor night. The war having commenced, is carried on unceasingly; so that no overtures of peace are listened to, and none will be granted, until the powers that threw down the gauntlet are exterminated. Finding every avenue closed, the conflict becomes, with them, the resistance of despair. Hail, pestilence, fire, and sword, inflict the ‘physical pain,’ or torment, of the kolasis or punishment. The ‘mental pain’ can more easily be imagined than described. It will be torment of mind and body to the goats and the exiles among them, unassuageable by art or man’s device; and will continue till the war is ended by the extermination of them all, when death and corruption will have consummated their fate; for so it is written, ‘*He that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption’—Galatians 6: 8; which is made by the apostle, in the same text, the contrary to ‘life everlasting.’ Here is the passage complete.

‘*Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting.’

Here is age-life opposed to corruption; and vice versa. If then, the tormentists will have aioonios to indicate continuance without end, here is corruption contrasted with endless life. I admit the age-life is endless; because it is life manifested through incorruptible body. The tormentists also claim that the punishment is as endless as the life, because aioonios is associated with it as well as with life. Granted. What then? That the corruption is endless, and the subjects of it, consequently, mere dust for ever; for a resolution into dust is the consummation off the corrupting process. This is punishment everlasting in its effects.

But when does the torment of the age-punishment terminate? We have said at the end of the premillennial war. But it may be asked, when is that? When the Beast shall have been slain, and his body consumed by the burning flame; a memorial of which is predicted to continue in these words off the text before us—Ho kapnos tou basanismou autoon anabainei eis aioonas aioonoon; ‘the smoke of their torment ascends to ages of ages.’ Now, previous to the commencement of the tormenting war, we have seen that Rome falls into the abyss like a millstone into the sea. In other words, she sinks like Sodom into the fiery chasm beneath her. This is a cause of great rejoicing to the resurrected apostles and prophets, and other saints; because it is God’s avengement of them upon her—Revelation 18: 20-21, 24; 19: 2. They are represented as praising God on account of her overthrow, saying ‘Alleluia!’ It is then added, ho kapnos autees anabainei eis tous aioonas toon aioonoon—‘the smoke of her ascends to the ages of the ages.’ Hence, I conclude, that the volcanic smoke mounting from the abyss in which Rome, the holy city of the goats, shall have been engulfed, is thenceforth regarded as the memorial of their judgment, as the Dead Sea has been hitherto of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the other cities of the plain. Rome’s volcanic smoke is the smoke-memorial of their torment. The reader will observe that, it is not the torment that is said to continue to the ages of the ages, but the smoke thereof. The torment ceases with the war: but the memorial of it continues to the end of the Age; that is, for a thousand years, at the termination of which the ages of the ages will be introduced.

To this it may be objected that, in the twentieth of the Apocalypse it is said, ‘they shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever;’ and that this continuance is affirmed of the tormenting, and not of smoke.’ True. But the text does not refer to the same event. It relates to what is to happen a thousand years after Rome’s destruction, and the judgment of the goat-nations. It has reference to the time, called ‘a little season,’ during which SIN exalts itself among the nations. The text affirms concerning the fate of the Sin-Power and its adherents, summarily styled ‘the devil,’ and says that, ‘the devil who deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the Beast and the False Prophet (were destroyed,) and they (the deceived) shall be tormented day and night to the ages of the ages.’ From this we learn, that the last war that earth will ever know, is to be waged on the same territory, where the premillennial ‘devil and his angels’ encountered their fate; secondly, that the tormenting of the postmillennial devil and adherents, is to be concurrent with the alternations of day and night; thirdly, that it is to continue during ‘the little season,’ which terminates at the epoch when the nightless Ages of the ages begin. This postmillennial torment will probably be shorter than the premillennial one. The sulphurous fumes of Rome's catastrophe commingle with the torment of the postmillennial insurgents; and disappear in the same consummation. The 'rest of the dead' awake to life and judgment in the 'little season;' and they who deserve the fate share in its torment; while the righteous inherit the renovated earth during 'the ages of the ages,' which begin when the torment ends, and are interminable. This 'little-season' judgment is the final judgment of scripture, and has nothing to do with the Age-punishment of Matthew twenty-fifth. It is the end of the Day of Christ which begins with the establishment of the 'great white throne,' and terminates in bringing forth from the grave the sleeping dead whose names are not written in the Book of Life, and casting them into the lake of fire where the devil is destroyed—Hebrews 2: 14. The Age-punishment binds him; the final judgment annihilates him, and by consequence death.

Mr. C. remarks that the Lord in using the word kolasis indicated what sort of punishment he meant. This may be granted so far as this, that the punishment was not to be taken in the sense of paideia, which is the chastisement of a father for the correction and improvement of his children. There is no Age-paideia; paideia is now—the discipline God's accepted children are subjected to in the times of the Gentiles. They are not subjected to kolasis; because kolasis is for dogs, and swine, and goats, not to reform them, but to exterminate them. There is nothing reformatory in kolasis, because it is punishment unto death by violence, the apprehension of which is called kolasis in 1 John 4: 18, as well as the punishment itself.

But, the radical idea of kolasis is not torment, though so rendered in English in the text just quoted. It is repression, keeping within bounds, checking, curbing, restraining; as, archei tou harmatos kai koladzei tas toon hippon hormas, 'he guides the chariot and curbs the impetuosity of the horses.' The Age-punishment is to repress the wickedness of the nations, and bind the Sin-Power; a process which affords scope for the recompensing of resurrected evil doers according to their deeds. If the Lord had said, 'these shall go away into endless basanismos,' that would have been delivering them over to eternal pain, or torment; and have implied their conscious existence in torment without end. But kolasis does not. The kolasis may even be endless, but consciousness is not therefore necessarily implied; because, as we have seen in Uzzah's case, there was punishment without probably the least bodily, or mental pain.

We learn, then, the peculiar fate of the subjects of Age-punishment, as far as it can be learned from a word, not from kolasis, but from basanidzoo, which indicates the kind of kolasis, or punishment, they shall endure. Revelation 14: 10 says, 'he shall be tormented (basanistheesetai) in fire and brimstone;' and 'the smoke of their torment (basanismou) shall ascend.' These words come from basanos, which signifies 'a species of stone from Lydia, which being applied to metals was thought to indicate any alloy that might be mixed with them, and therefore used in the trial of metals; hence examination by the Lapis Lydius, or by torture.' Thus it came to stand for torture, torment, severe pain, &c., and is so used in the New Testament. The basanism of the goats and exiles is the examination of them by torture, so as to make the survivors of the goat-nations confess that Jesus is Lord. —To basanise nations (the verb which signifies to apply a touchstone; to inflict torment; and in the passive voice, to be tormented, pained, &c., by diseases, or anything else) implies great loss of individual life, but not necessarily the extinction of the national polities themselves. This appears from the use of the word in the following text—

'It was given to the Locusts that they should not kill the men who have not the seal of God in their foreheads, but that they should be tormented (basanisthoosi) five months: and their torment (ho basanismos) was as the torment (basanismos) of a scorpion when he striketh a man. And in those days shall men seek death, and shall not find it: and shall desire to die, and death shall flee from them.' —Revelation 9: 5.

This was kolasis by basanismos, or punishment by torment that lasted 'five months' of years without abatement.

Now it is well understood by the best interpreters of prophecy, that the Locusts represent the Saracen invaders of the Greco-Roman territory, styled 'the earth.' The history of their career illustrates the torment to which they subjected their enemies. They were not to kill, or extinguish the Greco-Roman dominion; that was reserved for their successors, the Euphratean

Cavalry, or Turks; but they were to harass the catholic idolaters— Revelation 9: 20-21—with all the calamities of a fierce tormenting war. — From this use of the word, then, in the Apocalypse, it is evident, that the torments, or basanisms, it predicts before and after the Future Age, with whose terrors the evil-workers who partake in the premillennial and postmillennial resurrections, are to be overwhelmed, are wars of the most terrific and destructive character, in which 'men shall seek death, and shall not find it,' until the purposes of God are fully accomplished upon them.

If the reader have read attentively what has gone before, it will be evident to him, that whatever 'destructionists' may have done in Mr. C's estimation, he is decidedly wrong in accusing me of having 'formed a direct issue with Jesus Christ on the subject of eternal punishment.'—Jesus taught the torment of corruptible persons by war and pestilence, in the Age-punishment to be inflicted by himself and company. I believe this. Mr. C., and most other sectarians teach, the torment by material fire and mental anguish of disembodied ghosts in a spirit-world hell burning with brimstone to be inflicted by an immortal personal Devil eternally. He calls these notions, 'the sanctions of the gospel;' and by help of his peculiar logic, would palm them upon his contemporaries as the doctrine of the Bible! 'Destructionists' do not believe a word of it; because it is mere pagan foolishness, and opposed to scripture and reason. Mr. C., the great modern champion of eternal ghost-torment, feels his weakness in regard to scripture. Hence, he makes very little use of it. Look at his 'Life and Death' speculation, and indeed, at all his writings, and behold what 'a famine of the word' they present. They are full of reasonings, but his dialogisms are not scriptural analyses of scripture; but speculations of his brain, styled by Paul, 'the thinking of the flesh' (which 'divines' say, cannot think; for with them it is what they call 'the soul,' that is, 'the thinking I' that cogitates;)—the cogitations of a mind, darkened by tradition, and vaunting itself in its logic, philology, and science; so that, 'not having the Spirit'—'not knowing the Scriptures' which exhibit the mind of the Spirit—it brings forth nothing but sophistry and vain conclusions. And the worst of it is, that there is no cure for our unfortunate friend, the supervisor; at least so long as he continues to repudiate 'Moses and the Prophets' as a sort of effete almanac of old Jewish times! This is the chief source of all his errors, he is ignorant of the Law and the Testimony; and therefore he cannot speak according to them; and as a necessary consequence, 'there is no light in him;' and even that which may be supposed to be in him, becomes mere darkness visible. All the logic, Greek, Latin, and Hebrew, and all the science in the world, will not compensate an expounder of the New Testament for ignorance of the meaning of the Old. He can neither understand the gospel, nor 'the sanctions of the gospel.' If Mr. C. would talk rationally about punishment, he must humble himself, and as a little child begin to learn what 'the Gospel of the Kingdom' is. There is no getting along in the work of interpretation without this. He is floundering up to his neck in the bogs of old paganism, in which he will be assuredly suffocated, if he accept not the friendly hand extended to him by those 'Destructionists' who understand 'the gospel promised through the prophets in the Holy Scriptures.' And what we say of Mr. C. we affirm of all eternal ghost-tormentists. We speak of him more particularly, because he is their Magnus Apollo in this country. If we make goose of him, they all become goslings of necessity; for he is the modern incubator of syllogisms for their noisy utterance against what Mr. C. designates, the weak and vicious heads that infer that torments cease in a second death!

Speaking of syllogisms, let us glance at that one Mr. C. has incubated out of his spermology 'for the sake of a few mere pretenders to sound argumentative discrimination, and great logical acumen!' How condescending, and how polite! We shall see if Mr. C. is anything else than a 'mere pretender.' Hitherto we have seen nothing to the contrary; but rather that his weakness is that of pretending to things which are too high for him. But let this pass. We have got a syllogism here which condenses his argument into 'regular form;' and now, says he, look at it, ye Destructionist pretenders to reason; see what ye have got to encounter, and tremble! —Oh! What will become of us!

Behold the redoubtable syllogism:

"No one dispossessed of conscious guilt can be punished.
But persons annihilated are dispossessed of conscious guilt;
Therefore, no one annihilated can be punished."

The major premiss of this syllogism thrown into an interrogative form, is the question at issue between the eternal-tormentists and their opponents—Can a person dispossessed of conscious guilt be punished? The tormentists take the negative, and say that, no person unconscious of guilt can be punished. This is their syllogistic conclusion, as expressed in the above. Their major premiss and conclusion are ‘No one dispossessed of conscious guilt can be punished; therefore, no omne annihilated can be punished because he is dispossessed of conscious guilt: that is, no thing can be; therefore nothing can be, because it can not be. This is all that can be extracted from the major premiss and conclusion; that is, they are mere assertion which previous argument has failed to prove. The minor premiss affirms a truth admitted by ‘destructionists’ and eternal-tormentists, that ‘persons annihilated are dispossessed of conscious guilt:’ and, if there were no fallacy in the major premiss, they would be bound to admit the conclusion; which would involve them in the guilt of denying all punishment, which Mr. C. desires to convict them of.

But as I have abundantly proved in this article, there is an egregious and ridiculous fallacy in the major premiss. I have shown that, persons dispossessed of conscious guilt can be punished by whatever law. This having been proved, Mr. C’s syllogism is converted into moonshine, or rather into visible darkness; and a better ‘regular form’ takes the place of it; thus:

Any one dispossessed of conscious guilt can be punished;
Persons annihilated are dispossessed of conscious guilt:
Therefore, any one annihilated by law is punished.

The ridiculousness of the fallacy which converts Mr. C’s logic into sophistry, will be seen from the conversion of his syllogism into the following forms:

No one is punished who is dispossessed of conscious guilt;
Uzzah, when breached upon, was dispossessed of conscious guilt;
Therefore, though Uzzah was struck dead for transgressing the Law, he was not punished!

Again,

No one is punished who is dispossessed of conscious guilt;
When a man is hanged he is dispossessed of conscious guilt:
Therefore, hanging is no punishment!

But, whence comes it that so great a logician as my friend C. should be guilty of such an absurdity as to teach, in effect, that hanging is no punishment; or perhaps therefore, a very agreeable thing! —What crotchet has he got into his head that has so perverted his intellect! That makes him contend for eternal consciousness of guilt and pain as the 'everlasting punishment' of scripture? The crotchet that perverts him and all eternal tormentists is, the supposition that the 'natural man' is a compound of a mortal body and an immortal soul. They teach that this soul is the sinner, who lives after the body dies in heaven or hell; or according to certain, in some intermediate places in 'the spirit-world,' where it is happy or miserable short of the full degree it is capable of, according to the deeds it made the body do! They say that the gospel-salvation and damnation is for this soul; hence, assuming that it is immortal, they convert the 'everlasting life' of the gospel into eternal blessedness; and its 'everlasting punishment' into eternal torment. As they have assumed the existence of this sort of a soul in man; and assumed also that the good things of the scriptures whatever they be, are for that soul—they have soulised the words and sayings of God, and his messengers. Hence, they have converted 'death' into life in misery; 'destruction' into always destroying; 'perished' into coming to nothing but never arriving there; 'everlasting punishment' into eternally punishing, &c.; for the obvious reason that if death, destruction, perished, torment, &c., be affirmed of a thing which is essentially deathless, and indestructible, they can mean nothing else. It is this canker-eating assumption that is the crotchet of their bewitchment. While they hold on to this fiction of the flesh they can never understand the Bible, which is silent as the grave on the existence of an hereditary immortal soul in mortal man. The most logical immortal-soulists know they cannot prove its existence from the Bible. Hence, they fall to speculating upon their own consciousness, or fly for proof to animal magnetism! There, on the sensoria of clairvoyants are mesmerically reproduced, the thought-images of their own brains; and this is the highest evidence they can obtain. It is upon this shade of animal magnetism called 'the soul,' first observed by the idolaters of old Egypt, that the superstitions and theologies of our age are founded. Expunge this fleshly conceit from the mind, and priestcraft with all its fooleries, against which the advocates of the punishment, the life, and Kingdom of the approaching Age, contend, become the contempt of him, whom the gospel has dispossessed, and endued with a hale and sober mind.

As the 'everlasting punishment' is supposed to be for 'an immortal soul,' eternal-tormentists can see nothing of it till after death. But this does not accord with the Lord's teaching. The 'these' of whom he was speaking were persons who had risen from the dead, and who were corporeal existences. They had been dead for ages, and from their own showing do not appear to have known their fate till they attempted to justify themselves in his presence. During all that time previous to their resurrection, it is clear, they had not been in a state of punishment; but being sentenced, they are commanded to 'go away into age-punishment.' Now, as Jesus comes to Israel's land, and is there at the resurrection, when he shall say, 'Depart from me, ye cursed, into the Age-fire,' 'go away into Age-punishment,' they are driven out of the country to a region afar off. This is termed in another place, being cast out of the Kingdom, into outer darkness which is a cause of 'weeping and gnashing of teeth'—Matthew 8: 12; Luke 13: 28. The 'punishment' occupies the interval between the resurrection and the commencement of the thousand years, a period of some forty years; and is the judicial torment of living men for the evil of their doings. It has nothing to do with ghosts, or 'separate spirits,' or 'disembodied souls;' but with men, flesh and blood, like ourselves. It is the appearing before the judgment seat of Christ, and the receiving bodily the things threatened for evil doing—2 Corinthians 5: 10.

Such is 'the Terror of the Lord'—resurrection to torment by hunger, thirst, pestilence, fire, and sword, until payment is made of all that is due—Matthew 18: 34. The tormentors (basanistai) who are the Lord's messengers—Matthew 13: 41, will know how to execute judgment with due severity. The guilty rise from the dead full grown men and women, as Adam and Eve when they first breathed the vital air, with a life of forty years before them; to receive just such a retribution as they would have experienced had their offences when committed been immediately followed by the penalty due.

The covetous, for example, though idolaters, are not punished before death. The day of their calamity is when they rise from the dead. Being rich at death, they are 'sent empty away' into the country of the Beast and False Prophet; and as beggars there, suffer all the torments of poverty, and disease amid social disruption and distress, with all anguish of mind on account of their cursed folly in sacrificing life and glory, and honour in the Kingdom for the sake of their fleshly lusts; and with no prospect before them but unmitigated evil and death eternal. Men are horror stricken when such calamities seem to threaten them in the present state, and do all in their power to avoid them, or obtain deliverance. But now they have hope. — Then, however, the covetous wretch is hopeless. Though he worshipped his wealth, and looked upon the necessities of his brethren without sympathy, before his death; at his resurrection, he finds society in dismay, and himself unknown, uncared for, a homeless outcast, cursed of God and man, with the words ever echoing in his ears,

'No covetous man, who is an idolater, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God'—Ephesians 5: 5; 1 Corinthians 6: 9.

He will seek death, and shall not find it; and shall desire to die, but death will flee from him, until he has paid the last mite. Thus, while Lazarus and his friends are comforted in the kingdom, he is tormented—Luke 16: 25—with the worshippers of the Beast.

But enough for the present. Who is there among the eternal tormentists, that assume the custody of the public conscience, dare publish this article in any of their papers for the information of their readers? The exposition is new to this generation; but amply sustained by scripture. Its novelty should command attention, as that is the attractive principle of the age; and its scripturality a minute examination. Will our friend, the supervisor, venture to republish it, and treat it to a reply! It will be pastime, surely, for so magical a logician to parade its fallacies, and prove our logic mere pretence! Come, ye 'wise and prudent,' take up the pen and try!

UNFAITHFUL SHEPHERDS REBUKED.

Dear and Respected Brother:

Many thanks to you. I trust I may yet have it in my power to prove my attachment and love to you, as having been the means of showing me the way of life: and above all, as being champion of the faith. Every day I feel stronger in the conviction that ours is the 'one faith'—'the truth,' which, when understood and believed in, makes a man 'free indeed:' free from all the superstition and priestcraft, doctrines of devils, &c., which enshroud in darkness and mystery the poor deluded creatures, who hope to inherit they know not what.

When I read some of the 'commentaries' on the scripture—'explanatory notes' of those who set themselves up as teachers and pastors, I am filled with something akin to indignation, seeing the manner in which the plain word of God is wrested, spiritualised, and made void, in order to suit their theories. Zeal for the truth, I trust it is, which causes this feeling to arise. 'The meek shall inherit the land,' says our blessed Redeemer. He means any thing else but what he says, the learned commentator would have you to believe. Oh, I believe they will have much to answer for this on this score. I do not believe, but that in studying the scriptures, time and again, their judgment and conscience have protested against their so wilfully perverting the word of God to suit the doctrine they held and taught: and I am satisfied this is the secret of their abhorrence of controversy. They know their weakness; learned in the wisdom of this world as they may be.

I can imagine how that one who 'knows and understands the Law and the Testimony' would 'use them up,' if they would dare to try the rotten wooden swords of 'the fathers' and 'tradition,' with 'the two-edged sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God.' Catch them at it! Their ideas of 'earnestly contending for the faith,' seem to consist in denouncing every thing as heretical, soul-destroying, and awful doctrine, which clashes, or is opposed to, their theories; instead of proving them to be such from scripture.

You would be much pleased to read some portions of a book by Dr. Candlish, the great Presbyterian Free Church preacher of Edinburgh, on the Book of Genesis. It is wonderful how clear he is about ‘the inheritance promised to Abraham.’ If I thought he had never seen Elpis Israel, I would mail him a copy of it. Oh! That absurd, and vain conceit, immortal-soulism, what bright minds and noble intellects has it overshadowed and darkened! Were it not for this, how many would quickly see the truth! I am led to exclaim thus, when I perceive how the mind of Candlish is spoiled by this vain philosophical notion. The subjoined extracts I hope will please you if you can manage to decipher them, my only excuse for their hieroglyphical appearance being extreme haste—stolen time in fact.

Next Lord’s day Mrs. H—becomes obedient to the faith. I believe I am to be privileged to assist her. I conceive it to be the duty, as well as a privilege, for a baptised believer of the gospel of the kingdom to assist another in rendering this indispensable obedience. Nor is it necessary, I judge, that a person should be ‘set apart’ by any body of believers, and retained as a minister, in order to qualify, or privilege, him to baptise.

Hoping soon to hear from you, I remain yours sincerely and affectionately for the truth’s sake, as well as your own,

“THE INHERITANCE PROMISED TO ABRAHAM.”

BY ROBERT S. CANDLISH, D. D.

“The Lord appears to Abraham, and makes him expressly the Heir of the Land; saying,

‘Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art, northward and southward, eastward and westward; for all the land which thou seest; to thee will I give it, and to thy Seed FOR EVER.’

And again still more pointedly,

‘Arise, walk through the land in the length of it, and in the breadth of it; for I will give it unto thee.’—

He is, we may say, enfeoffed in the land. It can scarcely be doubted that there is something more here than the promise of the earthly Canaan to Abraham’s Seed after the flesh. Twice the Lord repeats the express personal assurance to Abraham individually—‘To thee will I give it.’ That the hope of an inheritance for himself individually did actually form a part of the faith of Abraham, as also of the faith of Isaac and Jacob, the apostle Paul most expressly testifies. ‘He looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God;’ and this was the promise of which he was the heir. And the same is said of Isaac and Jacob, of Sarah and of all the ‘strangers and pilgrims’ of that olden time. Such a city, and such a country, the apostle Paul distinctly assures us, Abraham looked for and desired at a time when, as Stephen says, ‘God gave him none inheritance in Canaan, no, not so much as to set his foot on.’ He died in the faith of that city and country being his. It is plain, therefore, from the apostle’s statement, that Abraham had promises given to him of a country and a city, since he died in the faith of these promises. But no such promises are on record in the Old Testament, unless we hold such an assurance as this. Nowhere does Abraham receive any promise whatever of future good, or of a future inheritance for himself, if it be not in the announcement, ‘I will give thee this land.’ That this announcement does convey such a promise, may be argued from an expression used by the apostle when speaking of Abraham’s call, he says, ‘he was to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance;’ for it is to be remarked, the apostle makes no reference in this whole passage to Abraham's posterity as inheriting the land: he speaks throughout of Abraham as an individual. Abraham 'sojourned,' as he says, 'in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tabernacles as did Isaac and Jacob;' but it was in the land of promise still. He had been called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance; and this was that place. He knew and recognised it as such. On this ground alone he had to rest his personal and individual hope for eternity. This was his warrant for expecting and looking for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God. (The kingdom which the God of heaven shall set up in the land. —Editor.) Thus we learn to connect the promise of a heavenly city and a heavenly country, which Abraham undoubtedly had, with the declaration respecting the place to which he was called to go out, that it was the very place which he should afterwards receive for an inheritance. And with this inspired commentary, we cannot now hesitate to understand the words, 'I will give thee this land,' as conveying to himself, personally, the promise of a country and a city.

“Still further, the apostle's reasoning would lead us to place the fulfilment of the promise now before us after the resurrection: for he says, 'Wherefore,' by reason, or in consequence of this promise, 'God is not ashamed to be called their God.' When he consents and condescends to be called 'their God,' it is because he has some great things in store for them—something worthy of himself to bestow, something corresponding to so near a connection as is implied in his being 'their God,' and their being his people, his sons, and therefore, his heirs. But according to our Lord, this same title, 'God of Abraham, God of Isaac, and God of Jacob,' conveys also a promise of the resurrection. It is only of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, not dead, but living, that he is, or can be, the God. The promise, or preparation of a city, in respect of which he alone assumes that title, was secured to them, not as disembodied spirits, but as living men in the body. It was with Abraham in the body, that God graciously dealt in the way of becoming his God. Whatever privilege or whatever promise that relation or title implies, belongs to Abraham in the body: and hence, if the Lord is still his God, it must be with reference to his living again in the body; since 'God is not the God of the dead,' he never assumed this name, or gave any of the pledges or promises which it implies, in relation to the dead or disembodied spirits. 'He is the God of the living;’ it is with the living, with men alive in the body, that he has to do. Such is the import of our Lord’s argument. God was not merely the God of Abraham while he sojourned as a pilgrim upon the land; he is his God still. But this cannot mean that he is the God of Abraham’s disembodied soul only; for he never constituted himself the God of Abraham in that sense. It was of Abraham in the body that he condescended to become the God; that is, of Abraham in the body that he is the God still; and it is to Abraham in the body, that he is pledged to make good all that that name denotes. Abraham must therefore yet live in the body to receive the fulfilment of the promise which God gave him in the body, and in respect of which God says not I was, but ‘I am the God of Abraham.’”

Dr. Candlish concludes thus, “there may be a risk of making the eternal state, in one conception of it, too gross and material; but there is danger also in the dreamy and ideal spiritualising which would refine away all matter, and which ultimately comes very near the notion of absorption into the infinite spirit. The personal reality of hope, as well as the personal responsibility of sense, is turned into a dim abstraction. But the resurrection of the body, and the renewal of the earth, realised as events still to come, stamp a present value and importance upon both: and the reflection that the very body I now wear is to rise again, and the very earth on which I tread, is to be my habitation hereafter, arrests me when I am tempted to make my body the instrument, or the earth the scene of aught that would but ill accord with the glorious fashion of the one, or the renewed face of the other.”

After reading this it might be inquired, ‘what place is there in Dr. Candlish’s system for immortal-soulism?’ It is probable he would reply ‘the intermediate state’—or, that soul-existence which is supposed to be mediate between the death of the body and its resurrection to life eternal. His reasoning, however, which is excellent, leads to the conclusion that God, on the supposition of Abraham’s disembodied existence, in the spirit-world, is not now his God; and that consequently Abraham has been living ‘without God’ since he died, and will continue to do so, till he lives again in the body. Dr. Candlish truly says, It is only of Abraham living in the body that God is or can be God. And again, He never assumed the name, ‘God of Abraham,’ or gave any of the pledges or promises it implies, in relation to disembodied spirits. It is clear then, that between God, and the ghosts called Abraham and so-forth, by immortal-soulists, there exists no affinity or relationship whatever. Dr. Candlish's adhesion, therefore to Platonism serves not to assist him in his interpretations, but rather to preserve his orthodoxy from being mobbed by craftsmen, whose zeal for their inventions is inflamed in proportion to the intensity of the selfism jeopardised by the prevalence of the truth.

THINGS IN THE ANGLO-BETHANIAN JERUSALEM.

Dear Brother:

I am glad I can address you as such, in hope of a reunion in the general assembly of the saints, if not before. I cannot feel sufficiently thankful to you for your honest endeavours to enlighten us in the truly glorious things of the Spirit of God. I can say in sincerity with your other correspondent from this country, 'you hold a place in our hearts none else can ever occupy.' Thankful am I you ever came to England to proclaim 'the Gospel of the Kingdom.' It has not, nor will it be in vain. I delight to meditate on the glorious things spoken of Zion in the word, and to give myself wholly to them.

Many have read Elpis Israel, but by not studying it with the scripture references, and watching passing events, they often mistake your meaning. I am satisfied, however, it is the right exposition of the prophetic word in relation to the nations of the Latter Days. The Heralds are most interesting indeed. We devour them here with great avidity, and generally at one meal. Permit me to thank you for the 'Synopsis of the Kingdom,' and your replies to queries respecting the 'Restoration of Sacrifices,' &c., in the previous volume. 'Study the word,' was your parting advice to me on leaving England. Yes, dear sir, the word is worth studying. I have found it so. The king, rulers, subjects, territory, throne, and service of the kingdom, are topics of the deepest interest; and the testimony of God abounds concerning them.

I hope the liberality of the friends of truth and independence will enable you to carry on the war through the Herald. It is, as you say, pastime to hew Agag in pieces; and it ought to be done. It is an honour to bear the burden and heat of the battle; but it is an honour which the soldiers of the faith should be careful to see shared by them all, and not monopolised by one. If they be poor in houses and lands, they must be rich in faith, bearing fruit unto eternal life. But there are scarcely any of them so poor, but they can contribute something to sustain the advocacy of that truth through which alone they can inherit the kingdom of God. It is a good work, and affords them an opportunity of proving, in helping to sustain it, what they would do if the Lord himself were present and in need of their support as in the days of old.

Since you left here we have had some changes, as you know. The word, I think, has purged out nearly all the old leaven, and made us a new lump. Some have been made partakers of God's promise in Christ by the gospel. We number from twenty to thirty; and meet every Lord's day to read, and to endeavour to understand, and explain the scriptures. It has been proved to a great extent among us, that the truth can only dwell with those of an honest and good heart.

Madame Bethany's daughter in this place has some trouble. A division has taken place at Barker Gate. About thirty off the members refused to submit to Mr. Wallis' tyranny. Some time since, a coloured evangelist came over from America (Wonder if his name was Geary?) with anti-slavery ideas. He found an opponent in James Wallis, which resulted in a division; the split-offs declaring they would not fellowship slave owners. So much for peace and union in "this reformation."

I perceive you have noticed Alexander the Great's attack upon you. Really he is scarcely worth noticing. It is sickening to read his libels, they are so mean and contemptible. He does not attack Elpis Israel in a fair and legitimate way, because he feels he cannot. There are some writers who copy after him in the British Millennial Harbinger. The editor of the periodical has got the titbit about David's throne and the 'big head' in his pages, as a matter of course. Any slander against Dr. Thomas, or the Hope of Israel, is most acceptable to this gentleman. Like his patron in America, he can denounce us as materialists, teaching soul-withering speculations; but, sir, he cannot reason. He declares that the Hope of Israel is all a humbug. He was very hot when he said this. But 'let God be true, and every man a liar,' says the apostle; and his sons and daughters may yet live to say, 'Surely our fathers inherited lies.' Mr. W. can find abundance of room for all sorts of vain speculation on Demonology, the Devil a fallen angel, Coronation of Christ in heaven, and so-forth; but for any soberminded exposition off the divine testimony, he has no place. These are subjects on which Mr. Campbell's imagination runs riot. Had he not better write a few essays on the sayings as well as the acts of the Apostles. The Bethanists might then learn something beneficial. Philip preached the things of the kingdom; let Alexander tell his disciples what these are.

But I must conclude in offering you my best wishes; and in expressing the hope, that it may be our happiness to sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of God.

WILLIAM OWEN.

Nottingham, England, May 1852.

I am quite in the dark in regard to the onslaughts in the British Millennial Harbinger upon Elpis Israel and myself. I have not seen a number of the periodical since I left England. It is characteristic of the Knights of the Wooden Sword, that they flourish their weapon most stoutly when they imagine the enemy is out of sight! This is signally the case with the Knight-Commander, and Knight-Lieutenant of the Order. We like a little relaxation occasionally from more serious work; so that if we could only catch a glimpse of them now and then, when they were most valiantly hacking and hewing, and thrusting, the air; or doing the wonderful against windmills and flocks of sheep—we might just step in and, by way of recreation, run them off the field. Our knightly braves are desperate cowards when they see double-edged steel glancing in heaven's light. They have no armour that will stand it. Cloud-caps are their head gear; filthy rags their breasting; a flimsy gauze-stretching their shield; and a worm-eaten sap-stick their weapon for a fight! Surely poor fellows were never in worse plight for combat with the truth. They know it, and feel keenly what they know. Hence they take care never to let us see what they say or do. Some of our friends, however, might just send us word when they are in plukken by transmitting their manifests; and we would do them the honour of a cut up for the simples, by way of illustrating the impregnability of our position, and the foolhardiness of those who after them would venture an attack.

ANALECTA EPISTOLARIA.

ELPIS ISRAEL APPRECIATED.

Dear Brother:

I want you to send me another copy of Elpis Israel as I have parted with the one I had to a mutual friend. Do not unnecessarily delay sending it, as I feel quite at a loss without it. I prize it far more than gold or silver. I want to take the Herald of the Kingdom as long as I live and can raise two dollars to pay for it. I am a poor man, but if I had the funds your writings should never be suspended for want of means. Though you have many difficulties to contend with, I hope the truth in your hands will gain the day, and bring all its enemies and yours to naught. It is mighty and will prevail sooner or later; therefore you need not fear. I am single-handed here, but I hope I shall not stand so much longer; for Elpis Israel is gone out, and is able to confound, confute, and convert many. It will go into the hands of some of the learned, as they are esteemed. But I think after they have read that valuable book, if they would act according to honest conviction, they would give up their vain theories, or perversions which they preach for gospel.

I remain yours truly in Israel's Hope,

J. D. DRAKE.

ELPIS ISRAEL AMONG THE DOCTORS.

Dear Brother:

My copy of Elpis Israel has been circulating nearly all the time since I received it several months ago. Not a few of the clergy here have had the perusal of it. It is not to be expected that Presbyterian, Baptist, and Methodist, preachers could read it, and have no objections to its contents. 'It is a smart work,' say they; or, 'on the whole an interesting book; but the Sabbath,' or 'the Devil,' or some other minor objection is suggested; all agree, however, that it is ‘a most interesting work;’ and several of them have got Dr. D—, of the First Presbyterian church, to send to Baltimore for one after reading mine. This gentleman has left this country for a year on a visit to Europe and the Holy Land. He is a whole-souled Millenarian, and correct as far as a Presbyterian can be. I have frequent intercourse with him. He was much delighted with your letter to Kossuth. He sent for me to come and see him; and gave me a manuscript copy of a letter he addressed to the great Magyar about the same time. He was astonished at the similarity of sentiment. We have had a Baptist preacher here for the last year or more, who has read my Elpis Israel twice. He has, for the time I mention, boldly and eloquently advocated the appearing of the Lord, and various other matters very much as Elpis Israel exhibits them. I supplied him with the Herald as I read it. He has gone to Hamilton, C. W. Go on brother Thomas. Care nothing about Mr. Campbell’s spitefulness. He can’t write so excellent a book. The spirit of blind party zeal unfits him for the enterprise. Notwithstanding the injustice of himself and friends, who condemn without reading, which is disgraceful, Elpis Israel is, and will be, a blessing to the world. A bitter party spirit is the spirit of Campbellism. As in Bethany, so it is in Detroit. The Campbellite disciple is like his master. Would that they knew the truth, and what a glorious thing it is to the impracticable and selfish schemes which distract and divert their attention from the word!

The last number of the Herald is most interesting, both as regards the Devil and Spirits. I feel anxious to see the next. Your views of Satan and the Devil, I think, are correct. Your articles on ‘Odology’ are splendid. They kill Spirit-Rappings completely; and explain many passages of scripture not easily understood. So say several that have read my Herald. The view of the book of life is grand. A gentleman who read the article on returning the paper said, ‘I never read anything that pleased me more; it is first rate.’ I hope you will elaborate the subject still more, as bearing on Spirit-Rappings, Swedenborgianism, &c, &c. Your exposition is the best, or rather, it is the antidote to these old delusions newly revived.

That your valuable life may be long spared to advocate the whole truth, and to correct public sentiment wherever it tends to make it of none effect; and that the truth’s friends may do themselves the honour, and gladly avail themselves of the privilege of keeping the pen in your hand, by according to you the ‘material aid’ necessary to carry on the great and important work in which you are engaged—is the earnest prayer of your brother in the hope of the Kingdom.

J. DONALDSON.

ELPIS ISRAEL LUCIFEROUS.

Dear Sir:

Last April I left England on a visit to this country, where I have found Elpis Israel. I have begun to study it, and am fully convinced of that which I have studied.

I may be called home any day, so I write to ask if you will give me the address of some believer residing in Liverpool, of whom I may enquire concerning things I may not understand; because when I return, I shall have none to teach me, but all will be against me.

Previous to coming out here, I was a member of the Church of England; but thanks be to God that light has come in upon me, even the light of life.

Thinking you may desire to know something of my character before introducing me to any one I subjoin the copy of a letter I bear from my former pastor.

He writes—“I have much pleasure in certifying for the satisfaction of all whom it may concern, and especially any of the clergy in foreign parts, that Mr. James Whitehead, of this place, who is leaving England for America, is a young man of most exemplary character, a regular attendant and communicant at the parish church, and well reported of by his late employers, the Messrs. Akroyd & Son, the largest manufacturers in this large and populous parish—and that he carries with him the good opinion and best wishes of all with whom he has to do.

Signed. "Charles Musgrave, D. D.
"Vicar of Halifax and Archdeacon of Craven."
Halifax Vicarage, April 5, 1852.

A reply as soon as convenient will much oblige, as I may have to return to England in a few days.

I remain, yours truly,

JAMES WHITEHEAD.

ELPIS ISRAEL AMONG THE DIGGINGS.

Dear Sir:

I have Elpis Israel with me here in the mountains of California. I have read it, and claim to be one of its greatest and most devoted admirers. A person's realisation of my attachment to the work, would be to him a sure commendation in its author's behalf, with the expressed wish that all, or many at least, might be no less favoured than with the benefit it helps to bring in their way. Others may delight in what seems to them, 'good light reading,' but let me indulge in the substantial. This being only a slip I have not room for detail. What I have suggested is sufficient, I trust, to assure you of my hearty cooperation in the promulgation of that only good so much needed among mankind. I hope my friend and agent will send you full means to cover the expense of the volumes of the Herald for the past and future, &c., as also sufficient to prepay postage for some time to come, as I cannot leave California yet.

In conclusion allow me to say, that from the first of my acquaintance with your teachings, I was captivated with their coincidence with 'the word,' and especially with the subject of 'the Future Age.' This is to me of all absorbing interest; and engages my attention more than all other subjects whatever. You will hear from me again. In hope of the restitution of all things, spoken of by the prophets since Moses, I remain yours,

ALBERT H. OTIS.

Centreville, Grass Valley, California.

THE SIMPLE MADE WISE IN THE WORD BY ELPIS ISRAEL.

Dear Brother:

I feel it my duty to return to you my thanks for the much trouble and pains you took in answering my inquiries concerning 'the gospel of the kingdom' in our February Herald. The pamphlet you sent me intitled 'The Wisdom of the Clergy proved to be Folly,' answered my purpose. I discovered as soon as I read it, that I had understood the gospel, and had been contending for it with the preachers here for twelve or eighteen months. I am happy to inform you, that I have not only understood and believed it, but I have obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine which has been delivered to me; and am now rejoicing in the hope, that when the Lord Jesus appears in power and great glory to re-establish Israel's kingdom, and ascend the throne of his father David, and in Mount Zion and Jerusalem to reign before his ancients gloriously—he will raise me from the dead, (for I have no expectation of living to witness his descent, as I am old and very infirm) give me a body incorruptible and immortal, 'equal to the angels,' and honour me with a share in the kingdom, that I may live and reign with him a thousand years over the nations of the earth.

You intimate the probability of the Herald of the Kingdom and Age to Come being discontinued unless those who believe it advocates the truth sustain it better than they did last year. This will never do. We can't begin to think of its discontinuance so long as it sheds such a flood of light on the divine testimony of the Prophets and Apostles. I am not able to do as much as brother Lemon; but I will give ten dollars.

As for Elpis Israel, I do not know what estimate to place upon it. It is valuable indeed; for since I have understood the gospel, and read Elpis Israel, the Bible is like another book; the prophecies of the old, and parables of the new, scriptures that were formerly mysterious and unintelligible, are now plain to me.

Old friend-----is getting along in the faith of the kingdom. I think he will get straight after a while. I applied to him to immerse me. He sent out, and convened his brethren, and spoke beautifully on the Restoration of the Kingdom to Israel, and the subjugation of the nations to their king. He supposed some persons might blame him for immersing me as I had been immersed before; but he could not refuse to immerse a man, who had added more to his faith than he.

Wishing you health and length of days, I subscribe myself, in the hope of the speedy appearance of the King,

Your Brother,
NATHANIEL ANTHONY.

Fayette County, Tennessee, August 5, 1852.

TESTIMONY AGAINST METHODISM.

BY ONE WHO WAS A METHODIST.

Dear Sir:

I take the liberty of writing these few lines as an humble acknowledgment for the scriptural light and knowledge I have derived through you, both by your lectures in Birmingham, and by carefully perusing your talented writings. Truly I have found them what you designed they should be, 'Books to open the understanding that the scriptures may be understood;' for before I heard you lecture and read your work, I was as profoundly ignorant of 'the Gospel of the Kingdom' as any infant suckling the Bishop of Exeter ever sprinkled for its baptismal regeneration. And yet, sir, enshrouded in theological darkness as I was, I laboured under the impression that I was basking in the bright sunshine of gospel light; because I was a member of the Wesleyan Methodist Society, conforming to all their rules and usages in attending regularly to the preaching of their gospel, going regularly to class meeting, paying my penny per week and shilling per quarter, as well as to the numerous collections, &c., &c.; and besides I had undergone their process of conversion in having been dragged up to the penitent bench, and there, with the assistance of some of the pious brethren, I was persuaded into the spurious belief that God had, for Christ's sake, pardoned all my sins; and consequently, ready at death for my soul to wing its way to mansions in the skies, as preached from their sacred desks, and sung with pious strains by a willingly ignorant congregation, in such words as the following from Wesley's hymns:

“Beyond the bounds of time and space,
Remove me to that heavenly place;
The Saints' secure abode.”

Under this belief, teaching, and training, I continued three and a half years, and perhaps should have still continued; for although I could perceive very great discrepancies between their teaching and the word of God, yet the 'ministers' were, as I then considered, men called of God, and wholly set apart for the expounding of his word. I generally concluded that they ought, and did know better than I; and as I was only a poor illiterate layman, I had no business to question their decisions; in fact, such thoughts as doubting their teaching, or authority, I was led to believe to be nothing but suggestions of the Devil, and consequently a dangerous sin.

At length, one day as I was perusing a newspaper, I saw that a certain Dr. Thomas had come from America to England for the special purpose of denouncing the curses of God upon all Catholic and Protestant Europe; but more especially on Ireland; that the judgments of God would fall thick and heavy upon all these nations, and would end in the Advent of Christ! So stated the Stamford Mercury. I had heard of Johanna Southcott, Joe Smith, and many other similar impostors, and accordingly I only considered Dr. Thomas the latest edition of the fraternity. But as there was something novel in the newspaper paragraph, and as I had never yet heard any of the said fraternity, I resolved that for once I would go and hear one, if you should ever visit Birmingham. A short time after I saw a placard announcing that you would deliver a course of lectures at the British School Room, Ann street; but by some means or other I was prevented from going to hear you at that time, but in June following you were again announced to deliver a course of lectures in the same room on the Great European Earthquake: accordingly I resolved to attend and hear what I considered would be the ravings of a fanatic; but when you made your appearance, and began, with your calm and forcible manner, to explain and show the things of the Kingdom from the word of God, in such a way as I had never before been shown, I confess that I became riveted, and felt overwhelmed with shame and confusion; for instead of hearing a wild fanatic as I had expected to do, I found a cool, calm, reasonable, and really a sensible, man, expecting us to believe nothing but what the scriptures testified of; and that, too, set before us with such force, eloquence, and reasonableness, that no man unspoiled with philosophy and vain deceit, could gainsay or resist. I soon perceived that instead of my having for three and a half years basked in the sunshine of gospel light, I had been overwhelmed in a fog of mysterious superstition and folly, groping in the mazes of error and delusion.

At length your Elpis Israel came out. I obtained a copy and read it carefully, comparing it with the scriptures to see if the teachings it contained 'were so,' and I soon found that instead of Wesleyan Methodism being a system of Christianity, it was only one of the various forms of superstition constituting the aggregate of the strong delusion through which we believe a lie. As soon as I became thoroughly convinced of this, I renounced all connection with Wesleyanism, and endeavoured to find out a people whose teachings and practices were more in accordance with the teachings of scripture. Such a people I expected to find meeting together in the room you lectured in; but alas! I only found there a people like myself, just emerging from the labyrinth of error. They had broken up their little society, and had just formed what they called a class for the investigation of the scriptures; this they did by commencing with reading a chapter, each one reading a verse in rotation, and when any difficulty presented itself some explanation was endeavoured to be given by any one that considered himself competent to give it. This, instead of bringing about an acquaintance with the things of the kingdom, and an unity of the faith, only led to the development of each one's peculiar ideas, which ultimately ended in discord and disunion, and the breaking up of the class, through the lukewarmness and apathetic spirit displayed by those that took the most prominent part in its proceedings; and who ought to have been the very life and soul of it in keeping it together. Since its final break up, about half a dozen of us have met together on each Lord's day, in my house, to break bread, &c., and for our mutual instruction and edification; and four of us have been immersed into Israel's hope, for which Paul was in bonds; which with two that had been previously immersed, make up all that at present meet together in Birmingham.

Now, sir, the great stumbling-block to some of the friends is: they say we are not baptised into Israel's hope, because the brother that immersed us was himself immersed before he believed in the restoration of the tribes of Israel, and that we ought to have sent somewhere for some one duly qualified to immerse us, i.e., some one that you yourself had immersed. Now, sir, would you please to state through the Herald, at some convenient time, whether you consider the legality of our immersion in any way affected by our brother officiating in immersing us into Israel's hope? My opinion is, that it is the faith which we who are immersed possess that justifies, independent of the faith that the officiating brother may possess; otherwise I cannot at present see any way of our being legally baptised save through apostolic succession; for if my salvation rests on another man's faith, (and as it is impossible for me to know the heart of any one but myself,) it must be by some one that is duly authorised and appointed by God; and as I cannot find that God has appointed any since the days of the apostles, then, as a matter of course, it must come through succession, and this is too much of a camel for me to get down at present.

Perhaps, sir, a few lines from your able pen may help us over the difficulty; in the meantime I shall do my best towards promulgating the truth, by endeavouring to obtain as many subscribers as possible for the Herald, as I believe it to be the only true exponent of the truth, and herewith I annex a list of subscribers for the present volume as an earnest of what may come.

Hoping to meet you in the kingdom of God, I remain yours in Israel's Hope,

GEORGE HATFIELD.

ADMINISTRATORS OF IMMERSION.

“By grace are ye saved through the faith.” —PAUL.

We who believe that ‘the testimony of God’ is truthfully expounded in this paper, and who desire that its voice shall not be silenced for want of adequate support, return brother Hatfield sincere thanks on its behalf for the encouragement his list affords. I trust that all, both in Britain and America, whose eyes have been opened by our humble endeavours, will follow his example; and thus, not only evince their own gratitude for benefit gratuitously conferred, but show their devotion to the truth they have confessed, in yielding to it their best services for its diffusion, and ascendancy in the world. The first thing is to enable the Herald ‘to stand;’ the next, to run to and fro to the ends of the earth ‘preaching the kingdom of God.’ ‘Understandest thou what thou readest?’ said Philip to Candace’s treasurer, whom he beheld reading in the prophets. ‘HOW CAN I, EXCEPT SOME MAN SHOULD GUIDE ME?’ This inability of the Ethiopian is the almost universal condition of the public mind at the present crisis. ‘Moses and the prophets, &c.,’ are in their hands, but even if they read them, they understand not what they read; and though abounding with teachers, they have none to guide them to the saving comprehension of the purpose and promises of Jehovah therein revealed. Shall no effort be made to supply them with an interpreter? Shall Christ’s sheep among them, if any there be in this cloudy and dark day, hear no voice of warning, or invitation to the coming kingdom and glory? Shall the still small voice of truth be overpowered by the senseless noises of surrounding chaos? We trust not. The believers of ‘the gospel of the kingdom’ say that the Herald is an intelligent, faithful, and fearless preacher of this glorious truth; the enemy, of course, denies it: but then, we have not now to do with Satan. We expect nothing else from him. It is to believers we speak, when we say, res non verba quoeso—deeds, not mere words, I pray.

Mr. Hatfield is doubtless right. “It is,” as he says, “the faith we who are immersed possessed that justifies.” “By faith are ye justified,” says Paul.

It is desirable to have an unexceptionable administrator if possible; but if this cannot be obtained, the next best thing to be done is to get the least objectionable we can. Better be immersed by an unimmersed believer, or by one who turns out to be a Judas or a hypocrite, than not to be immersed at all. The great thing is to believe the gospel of the kingdom before immersion, that when our belief of the truth may be "counted to us for righteousness." It is the subject's pre-immersional faith in the gospel preached by Peter and Paul, that constitutes immersion "the obedience of faith"—Romans 16: 26, not the administrator's. If the subject be without that faith, his immersion is not the "obedience of the truth" which purifies the soul—1 Peter 1: 22, though the administrator himself may "believe all things." If then, the purity of the administrator compensates not for the imperfection of the subject's faith, it is not to be supposed that the soundness of the latter can be made of none effect by the administrator's short coming. Have an immersed believer of the gospel of the kingdom to baptise you, if you can; if he is not to be obtained, have an unimmersed believer of the same truth to do it: if you can get neither of these, request an immersed professor of good standing, who reveres the bible as the only book of God among men, and admits the claims of Jesus to the Messiahship, to do it after such a formula as this: As a believer of the gospel, I immerse you in water at your request, that in the act you may be immersed into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, as the Lord Jesus hath enjoined upon all believers of the truth. In these words the administrator appears in his real littleness, that is, simply as the dipper, or burier of the dead to sin—the faith, the act, and the name, are everything; but as you value the "great salvation" promised, see that you yourself believe "the things of the kingdom of God and the Name of Jesus Christ" before you apply for immersion; for it is only your faith in these can make your immersion anything else but "a form of godliness without the power."

Immersion is the uniting act by which a believer in the Kingdom and Name is married to that name. None but such a believer can, in the nature of things, be so united; for the act is only made uniting where faith in the gospel of the kingdom in the name of Jesus is found in the subject. Immersion once made uniting by the "one faith" must not be repeated. It is only the spuriousness of the subject's previous faith, that is, of his faith at the time of his immersion, that makes its repetition necessary; and when repeated, it is equally powerless for union, if he be still ignorant or faithless of the kingdom of God. See to it then, that you be "in the faith," having a faith that works by love and purifies the heart: no administrator, however excellent, is a substitute for this.

From what has been said, Mr. Hatfield will see that I do not regard his immersion, and that of his friends, as vitiated by the administrator's want of faith in the restoration of Israel previous to his immersion. He believed the truth when he immersed his friends. His former denial of Israel's restoration vitiates his own baptism, not theirs; for he that denies that, denies the kingdom of God, for without their restoration there is no kingdom, because they are "the children of the kingdom," being its subjects in their land. But more of this anon. Let our friends in Birmingham be content. Having obeyed the truth in good faith, they will doubtless "inherit the kingdom," and "enter into the joy of the Lord," if they continue to walk worthy of the high exaltation set before them in the gospel, and devote themselves energetically to the truth they have believed.

WHERE IS THE EVIDENCE?

The individual experience of every thoughtful person, we are told, affords convincing evidence of mind working apart from matter. But where is the evidence? Who ever witnessed the phenomena of thought when no nervous matter was present? Name your authority, give a single instance, give a single argument. All we know of mind is in connexion with a living brain. Give us an instance of a brainless mind, and we will thankfully acknowledge it. —Leader.

THE FATE OF AN IMPARTIAL WRITER.

“If I might give a short hint to an impartial writer, it would be to tell his fate. If he resolved to venture on the dangerous practice of telling unbiased truth, let him proclaim war with mankind—neither to give nor to take quarter. If he tells the crimes of great men they fall upon him with the iron hands of the law; if he tells them of virtues, when they have any, then the mob attacks him with slander. But if he regards truth, let him expect martyrdom on both sides, and then he may go on fearless: and this is the course I take to myself.”—Author of Robinson Crusoe.

To tell unbiased truth, without respect to party or person, is our determination to the end of the chapter, as it has been our practice from the beginning; and our experience in the venture hitherto, has convinced us of the verity of De Foe’s prevision—it places one in antagonism with the devil and his angels, and with all his works. From these we ask no quarter, and intend to give none. Take from him the power of inflicting political pains and penalties, as in this country, and he is found to be a mean and contemptible coward; enticing to transgression for the sake of present advantage; but failing in this, instead of boldly meeting you in argument, he hypocritically charges you with “a bad spirit,” “bitter severity,” and “discourtesy,” and calumniates you with all manner of lies and evil reports. Whoever draws the sword against such antagonists, should throw away the scabbard; and, as De Foe intimates, be prepared for martyrdom on every hand, and in every shape. Such combatant need expect neither justice, mercy, nor real sympathy from any but the impartial and unbiased freedmen of the truth. Advances from any other sources, are but stratagems to make him fall.

THE HABITS, MISSION AND DESTINY, OF CAMPBELLISM.

“Our brethren,” saith Mr. Walter Scott, “have a mission: they are a people of principle. As such, their destiny is doubtless to convert the world: and in the prosecution of their mission, to suppress all sects and schisms, and finally tranquillise the Kingdom of God. This is awarding to our brethren high ground, but I believe it is their destiny.” On reading this, the student of the prophets can but exclaim, what infatuation! What utter ignorance of the truth, and purposes of God!

HOW THE MILLENNIUM IS TO BE BROUGHT IN.

Speaking of those Baptists and Campbellites who go in for “union” and a new version of the scriptures, Mr. Walter Scott remarks, “God’s seventh and last blessing on those who love the truth, may be to change the spirit of the age, and replace the spirit of schism by that of union: then christians will, on the original principles of the gospel, flow together like kindred drops, and the church become one in all the earth, and so bring the millennium.” Alas! If the millennium come not till then, farewell to it forever!

IMMORTAL-SOULISM AN EGYPTIAN SUPERSTITION.

INQUIRIES CONCERNING THE NATURE OF MAN AND OTHER MATTERS.

Dear Sir:

I am very glad that you have given an opportunity for correspondence on the contents of your invaluable Elpis Israel. In common with many others, I heard your lectures in Glasgow; and although your hearers could not agree with you in all the views you expressed, I feel convinced that they universally hailed your visit to this country as an omen of better times—of times in the history of theological investigation in which common sense, instead of dogmatism, would be used in the examination of the best volumes, that is, the Bible.

For years I have been a member of a strict Baptist church in this city. But, the union of pure principles with a lax practise, as well as a growing disregard to the institutions of Jesus, found in most of the churches of this sect, have induced a few of us, of kindred sentiments on these matters, to leave that communion, and to meet on the first day of the week, that by mutual reading and examination of the scriptures, we might divest ourselves of the traditions of our fathers, and learn, and practice the faith once delivered to the saints. We feel much indebted to you for your valuable hints on many subjects in which the 'christian world' is confessedly astray; for your lucid exposition of the Millenarianism of the New Testament; and, generally speaking, for the third part of Elpis Israel. Yet we cannot, really, get over the things contained in the first. Much of it is really new and startling to your Scottish readers; yet, in our experience, as well as that of others, it must lead to good results. We have gone over the entire Hebrew scriptures, and extracted the original words translated 'Lord God,' &c., in our version, in order that by a comparison of the various passages, we might find out the meaning of the word, 'Elohim' as used by the Spirit. Judging scripture to be the best interpreter of itself, we resolved to put your opinions through their ordeal, and, if found scriptural, to adopt them. You will, I have no doubt, pardon us for this freedom of speech about your views. Indeed, as co-believers, striving for the faith, we feel that we have much in common with yourself. Believe us, brother, we have no sinister object in view in writing thus. Our simple, and undivided desire is to ‘buy the truth;’ and having found it, to practise it, in order that we may have an abundant entrance administered to us into the everlasting kingdom of our Saviour at his appearing. We have individually and collectively been much maligned since we have seen it to be our duty to leave a Baptist church for principle’s sake, by those who bear the name of Christ. We say this, not in the language of boasting, but that you may be convinced of our honesty in writing to you for a clearer exposition to our apprehension of some parts of Elpis Israel. God knows, that in our hearts, we feel too much ignorance and prejudice, and depravity, to think of boasting in such a matter. We allude chiefly to your remarks on the nature of man.

We will, then, first reproduce here in brief a few passages from your work, as sources of information from which we gather your ideas of the constitution of man. In your view of the matter, animal life seems to be a combination of three elements: first, the body formed of clay; second, the vitalising principle, or neshemet el; and third, the ruach, or spirit, generally found in combination with the foregoing. With regard to the body, you say, on page 32:

“But, at present, we have to do with animal or natural life, which is all the life the fleshly sons of the first Adam can boast of. Enough, however, I think, has been advanced to show the Scriptural import of the text already quoted, that ‘the Lord God formed man, the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of lives; and man became a living soul.’ The simple, obvious, and undogmatic meaning of this, is, that the dust was first formed into ‘clay,’ which was then modelled by Jehovah Elohim into the form of the soul called ‘man,’ as a potter shapes the substance of his vessels. Thus, Elihu said to Job, ‘I also am formed out of the clay’ (Job 33:6); and again, ‘we are the clay, and Thou our potter; and we all are the work of Thy hand’ (Isaiah 64:8). The fashioning of the clay being accomplished in all its component parts, which in the aggregate constitute man; that is, the dust being animalised, and then organized, the next thing was to set all the parts of this exquisite mechanism into motion.

With respect to the neshemet el, you say on page 33:

“This (the setting the parts into motion) was effected by the inrush of the air through his nostrils into his lungs according to the natural laws. This phenomenon was the neshemet el, or ‘breath of God,’ breathing into him; and as it was the pabulum of life to all creatures formed from the dust, it is very expressively styled ‘the breath of lives’ in the plural number. Some imagine that Jehovah Elohim placed his mouth to the nostrils of the yet clay-cold man-soul prostrate before him, and so breathed into them. Be this at it may; of this, however, we are without doubt, that God breathes into every man at his birth the breath of lives to this day; and I see no scriptural reason why we should deny that he breathed it into Adam as he hath done into the nostrils of his posterity, namely, by the operation of the natural, or pneumatic, laws. Hitherto man, though a soul formed from the ground, had been inanimate; but as soon as he began to respire, like the embryo passing from foetal to infant life, he 'became a living soul,' not an everlasting, but simply nephesh chayiah, a living breathing frame."

With regard to the ruach or spirit, on page 30, you remark:

"From these testimonies it is manifest that the ruach, or spirit is all pervading. It is in heaven, in sheol, or the dust of the deepest hollow, in the uttermost depths of the sea, in the darkness, in the light, and in all things animate, and without life. It is an universal principle in the broadest, or rather in an illimitable sense. It is the substratum of all motion, whether manifested in the diurnal and ellipsoidal revolutions of the planets, in the flux and reflux of the sea, in the storms and tempests of the expanse, or in the organism of reptiles, cattle, beasts, fish, fowls, vegetables, or men. The atmospheric expanse is charged with it; but it is not the air: plants and animals of all species breathe it; but it is not their breath: yet without it, though filled with air, they would die."

"Thus from the centre of the earth, and extending throughout all space, in every direction, is the Ruach Elohim, the existence of which is demonstrable from the phenomena of the natural system of things. It penetrates where the neshemet el, or atmospheric air, cannot."

Such, we think, is man generically considered by you—first, made up of dust; second, vitalised by atmospheric air, combined with which is third, the ruach or Spirit, an unknown something existing everywhere, and in which is the source of all motion. As such, then, there is no difference between him and the inferior animals, being all made of dust vitalised in the same way. Proofs of this are found every where through your first part of Elpis Israel, particularly on pages 28 & 33. But specifically there is an essential difference; in other words, you consider that specific difference is the superior phrenological development of man above the inferior animal. The following extracts clearly show this: on page 33 you remark, that “Man differs from other creatures in having been modelled after a divine type or pattern. In form and capacity he was made like to the angels, though in nature inferior to them.”

Again, on page 34, “Seth was also ‘in Adam’s own likeness.’ While image, then, hath reference to form or shape, ‘likeness’ hath regard to mental constitution, or capacity. From the shape of his head, as compared with other creatures, it is evident that man has a mental capacity which distinguishes him above them all. Their likeness to him is faint. They can think; but their thoughts are only sensual. They have no moral sentiments, or high intellectual aspirations; but are grovelling in all their instincts, which incline only to the earth. In proportion as their heads assume the human form in the same ration do they excel each other in sagacity; and as in the monkey tribe, display a greater likeness to man. But, let the case be reversed; let the human head degenerate from the godlike perfection of the Elohim, the standard of beauty in shape and feature; let it diverge to the image of an ape’s, and the human animal no longer presents the image and likeness of the Elohim; but rather, the chattering imbecility of the creature most resembling it in form. Adam’s mental capacity enabled him to comprehend and receive spiritual ideas, which moved him to veneration, hope, conscientiousness, the expression of his views, affections, and so-forth.”

“And what use,” you inquire, “should we naturally expect such a creature would make of this faculty? Such an one, certainly, as its cerebral constitution would enable it to manifest. It was an intellectual, but not a moral, creature. It had no ‘moral sentiments.’ No part of its brain was appropriated to the exercise of benevolence, veneration, conscientiousness, and so-forth. To speak phrenologically, it was destitute of these organs; having only 'intellectual faculties' and 'propensities.' Hence its cerebral mechanism, under the excitation of external phenomena, would only develop, what I would term, an animal intellectuality. Moral, or spiritual, ideas would make no impression upon its mental constitution; for it was incapable from its formation of responding to them. It would be physically impossible for it to reason in harmony with the mind of God; or with the mind of a man, whose reasoning was regulated by divinely enlightened moral sentiments. Its wisdom would be that of the untutored savage race, whose 'sentiments' by the desuetude of ages, had become as nothing."

Again, on page 79, you remark that,

"The Serpent had propensities and intellect, and so had the woman; but her mental constitution differed from his in having 'moral sentiments' superadded to her propensities and intellect. By the sentiments she was made a morally accountable being; capable of believing, and able to control and direct her other faculties in their application. The propensities enabled a creature to propagate its species, take care of its young, defend itself against enemies, collect food, and so-forth: intellect enables it to do these things for the gratification of its sensations; but when, in addition to these, a being is endowed with the sentiments of Conscientiousness, Hope, Veneration, Benevolence, Wonder, &c., it possesses a spiritual or sentimental organization, which makes it capable of reflecting as from a mirror, the likeness and glory of God. The appropriate sphere of the propensities is on things sensual and fleshly; while that of spiritual, or sentimentalised, intellect is on 'the things of the Spirit of God.'"

Now, thus far, we think, we understand and agree with you, at least, that man's body, vitalised by the atmospheric air, &c., is mortal or subject to death; but we are at a loss what to say with regard to his thinking part, or what is usually called the mind. We earnestly hope that you will favour us anew with your views on this subject. We are, we confess, immaterialists; and we have ever considered that the scriptures countenance this doctrine. We are willing, however, to revise this as well as other things. We will state our difficulty as distinctly as we can.

To proceed then. The three elements which have been already referred to, are called by you 'the Flesh.' Now when on page 114 you say that the flesh thinks, we are at a loss to know to which of the three elements you allude, since one of them must do so, seeing they are essentially different. Again, on page 80, you quote Paul's phrase to phronema tees sarkos, 'The thinking of the flesh,' as proof that the brain thinks, or is the thinking substance if we are to take this expression absolutely, there is an end to all reasoning in the matter. The brain truly is flesh or matter. Doubtless, then, the matter of the body thinks. But motion at least takes place in thinking. Now in treating of the ruach (which is certainly not the brain) you say, on page 30, that it is 'the substratum of all motion' whether in animate or inanimate creations. Now we are anxious to know, how these two statements can be reconciled. Besides we would like to know also, what you would make of the next clause of the same verse, to phronema ton pneumatos, 'the thinking of the Spirit.' If the apostle's sarx, or flesh, be a substance, so must his pneuma, or spirit, be; for they are contrasted as causes of certain results. Here then are two thinking substances in man. We apprehend, however, that the apostle is here speaking, not so much of the thinking substance, as of the channels or media through which thoughts are effected. His idea may be paraphrased thus;—just as water takes its qualities from the bed it flows over, so are the affections and thoughts tinged by the fleshly or by the spiritual medium through which they must proceed before they are represented by the action, which action always depends for its moral nature on the state of the affections, &c. in another place—Matthew 6: 22, it is said, ho luchnos tou soomatos estin ophthalmos, 'the light of the body is the eye.' Is not this a passage of similar construction to the one you quote? If so, does it prove any thing else than that the eye is the medium through which we see? But, must not your next clause on page 80, modify your absolute expression 'the brain thinks.' The brain, you say, is termed by Paul, the fleshly tablet of the heart. So indeed it is. We know, however, that the tablets to which Paul referred, served the same purpose as our slates, or sheets of paper, do now. It was on them that the ancients wrote. In the same way the heart's tablet is written upon by the heart, and therefore cannot be the heart itself; but only the medium through which the heart acts.

But again, we are at a loss to know why you fix upon the brain in particular as a corresponding expression for the apostle's sarx, or flesh. The only proof you allege, as far as we can see, is that contained on page 114, where you say, quoting the same language, to wit, "The apostle says that the flesh thinks, to phronema tees sarkos, that is, the brain thinks, as all who think are well assured from their own consciousness." Now we would inquire, Is not this abandoning your own principles of reasoning, and resorting to the wooden swords of the schools, against the use of which you caution your reviewers? Assuredly I am conscious of thinking; but I am far from being conscious of the thinking of my brain. Besides, we would like to know if there be not in the New Testament a corresponding expression for the Old Testament word ruach? One would think that if 'life and immortality were brought to light' in the New Testament, some discoveries might be made there in things which are mysterious in the Old. Are the ruach and the pneuma not identical? They are certainly both similarly translated, and for any thing that we can see, they are synonymous in their meaning. Thus in 2 Kings 3: 17, and in Jonah 4: 8, the word ruach is translated 'wind.' Now, I need not quote the passages in the New Testament where pneuma is thus rendered. From testimonies of this kind are we not intitled to say, that they both denote the same agent? We must confess that we do not like your definition of the word spirit. You appear to us to confound it with spiritual body. The Swedenborgians pursue an opposite course, and with the most unblushing effrontery, declare that the immaterial part of man is what Paul means by 'spiritual body!' Does the truth not lie between you? I must, however, acknowledge that your notions of the ruach have shed a flood of light on many passages of the scriptures, which hitherto were an enigma. Yet, I think you will see cause to modify them. In such passages as 'Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Spirit.' What are we to make of the Spirit's individuality?

Your views, too, of the Elohim are worthy of all praise. There is only one passage on which we would like to hear your opinion—Deuteronomy 6: 4. Is the word Elohainoo dual or plural? We certainly can see no objection to translate the phrase Jehovah Elohim by the corresponding one in English Lord of the Rulers, understanding by the rulers, the angels or spirits into whose hands are committed the affairs of this present world during the current ages.

By-the-bye, one good christian brother is much displeased because you say on page 114 that ‘the body of Jesus was as unclean as the bodies of those he died for.’ He cannot see how the texts you quote as proof have any connexion with the body of Jesus, namely John 3: 6, and particularly, Psalm 51: 5. Perhaps you would drop a hint on this matter.

The same brother requests me to ask you if any reviewers of Elpis Israel have made their appearance; and what magazines they may be found in?

And now for the present we say, adieu. When this evil age is passed away, we trust we may have an opportunity of conversing about these matters, if not before. In the mean time, it is ours to fight the good fight of faith, laying hold of eternal life. Then we shall have rest. We wish you more and more success in your present enterprise; and hoping that you are well, we unaffectedly subscribe ourselves, yours in the hope of eternal life.

“ELEMENTS”—“SOUL”—“VITALISING

UPON THE HEART.

Although the foregoing epistle is three years old in March ’53, the matter it contains is as fresh and timely as when originally conceived. Other affairs, which wholly occupied me, left me no leisure for a reply as early as desired. I therefore put it aside for a more convenient season. Since then, however, I had lost sight of it, until looking over some old letters recently, it unexpectedly turned up; and, on being re-read, seemed to merit a respectful and serious attention.

The writer, who speaks for others as well as himself, has very fairly stated what he and his friends conceive to be the views set forth in Elpis Israel on the constitution of man. He speaks of his being regarded there as a compound of three elements. I should allow this to pass as admitted, if I did not apprehend that the reader might misconstrue the sense in which I admitted the use of the word element as expressive of the views I hold. I do not admit the use of the word in its chemical sense. I do not mean by element that which cannot be reduced to any thing more simple than itself. I admit that the ruach is strictly elementary—a principle that, however it may be diluted, or modified in its manifestations, cannot be resolved by analysis into more simple or elementary matter. But this cannot be said of the body of man, and the neshemet el. The apostle styles the former ‘vile body,’ which is strictly true; and this villainousness is attributable to its non-elementary, or composite nature; its constituents being incompatible when the combining influence of the ruach is withdrawn. The neshemet el, or atmospheric air, styled in scripture ‘the breath of God,’ is also compound, consisting of oxygen, nitrogen, and some carbon. It is evident, therefore, that a living man cannot be scientifically said to be compounded of three elements; nor can animal life be said to result from a combination of only three. Elements, then, must be taken with grains of allowance. The subject is animal life, or the life of an animal. Without the animal, of course, there can be no animal life. In this sense, therefore, we may admit that the animal is a constituent or element of the life, or existence. But drain from it its blood, and though the body remain undecomposed, there will be no life, though neshemet el, or air, and ruach or spirit, may abound. Blood, air, and spirit are the elements, or constituents, by whose affinities alone motion is produced in the organs of the body, through their operation upon the nervous system, which is composed of the brain, spinal chord, and sympathetic, and other nerves. This motion is so subtle as to be almost imperceptible, perhaps quite so in the matter of thought where no lesion exists; at other times very obvious. Motion is the effect of the operation of two forces. It is therefore a duodynamic effect, and in common parlance, called life; which, more strictly speaking, should be applied to the forces, or to that which develops or sets the forces free, than to the ordinary phenomena so styled. Nephesh havbahsahr baddahm hiv, ‘the soul of the body (is) in the blood itself.’ Nephesh is the Hebrew word for soul: dahm is blood, and bad-dahm, in the blood. There can be no mistake, therefore, about the above rendering. Theologians may speculate about the body's soul till they lose themselves in immaterialism beyond the skies; we believe Moses, who was God's interpreter of truth, that the soul of man is in his blood. Jehovah, speaking to him, is very explicit upon the subject—nephesh, says he, kol-bahsahr dahmo be-naphsho hoo, 'the soul of all flesh (is) its blood for the soul thereof.' And again in the same verse, nephesh kol-bahsahr dahmo hiv, 'the soul of all flesh (is) its blood itself.' It is soul makes atonement for soul; hence, it is written in the law, haddahm hoo bannephesh yekaphpair, 'the blood it expiates for the soul'—Leviticus 17: 11-14. When, therefore, the blood of Jesus was poured out from his cross-suspended bahsahr, or body of flesh, the words of the prophet were fulfilled, he-erah lammahveth naphsho, 'he poured out his soul unto death; and again, im-tahsim ahshahm naphsho, 'verily, his soul thou shalt cause to made an expiation'—Isaiah 53: 10, 12. Soul is sometimes used for body or flesh as well as the sense above written; as, lo-thaazov naphshi le-sheol, 'thou wilt not leave my soul in the grave'—Psalm 16: 10. But to return.

It is manifest that the corporeal element of animal life is blood; and that consequently it may be received as an axiom in psychology that where there is no blood there is no living soul. This compound fluid it is, which, acted upon by the air and electricity of our atmosphere, and permeating the minutest tissues, and diffusing itself every where throughout the body, is the divinely appointed source of human life. It matters not how much 'immortal soul' may be imagined to exist in the body—yea, it may be saturated with it—yet, unless the brain be duly supplied with arterial blood, there can be no 'thinking of the flesh,' nor can any thing be inscribed on the tablet of the heart; and if withheld a sufficient length of time, motion would cease in all the organs, which would be death. Blood, air, and electricity, then, are the matters from which life is kindled in 'all flesh.' They are necessary to constitute life; hence they are the elements of life, and in this sense I am willing to tolerate the word in the statement of what I am supposed to teach is revealed in the scriptures concerning the constitution of man.

I am supposed to say that the neshemet el, or air, is 'the vitalising principle.' This is not an exact representation of my view of the matter. I regard no one natural simple element as the principle of life. Oxygen alone, diluted or undiluted with nitrogen; nor ruach or pure spirit; nor blood, separately considered, is the principle of life. It requires all three to vitalise flesh such as sin's body is composed of. Chemical decomposition is the beginning of life, as observed in the phenomena of digestion. By this process, added to respiration, living blood is generated; and becomes the soul or life of the heart, liver, lungs, brain, and all other parts of the body, which are collectively styled 'sin's flesh,' and sometimes simply 'flesh.' It is the immortal-soul theory that vitalises the body by a single principle—a physiology well befitting the science of old Egypt, but worthy of no respect since many have run to and fro, and knowledge has been increased—Daniel 12: 4. A child lives by the life-development of its maternal flesh; an existence which is continued after birth, not by being born with an immortal vital principle hereditarily derived, or by the inrush of an immortal spirit with its first breath, but by the same process that continues in being 'the soul of all flesh,' from man to a mouse. Let the reader take the following remarkable phenomenon as an illustration of creature-formation, and animal life, the result of a due combination of principles according to some unknown existing law to which matter has been subjected in the wisdom of God. I extract the notice from the Tribune, where it appeared recently under the caption of “A great deal of discussion has lately taken place in the scientific world in reference to certain experiments of Mr. Crosse, an amateur philosopher of Somersetshire, England, who was said to have created insects called the Acarus Crossei. It was a mistake, however, to suppose that Mr. Crosse claimed the creation of the insects, for he only alleges that he has been enabled to develop insects under the most singular circumstances. Our Consul at Liverpool, Mr. F. F. Ogden, has recently visited the house of the philosopher, and, in a letter to The National Intelligencer, gives this account of what he saw:

“I own to utter incredulity until I had the opportunity of a thorough examination of the process and a full explanation of the means. No room was left for doubt. No delusion, no self-deception, no favourite hypothesis to be carried out, had any influence in the result. On first witnessing the result, Mr. Crosse would not believe his own senses. He locked up his laboratory and took a long walk in the open air to assure himself that he was not labouring under some illusion. On his return he beheld the actual living insect in various stages of its formation. The apparatus was prepared for the purpose of producing crystals from the silicate of potash.

“A tubulated retort, with its long end plunged in a glass dish of mercury, has a platina wire passing through it, connected with a negative pole of a weak galvanic battery. Through a neck in the retort, hermetically sealed, another platina wire, immersed in the caustic solution, communicates with the positive pole. The bulb of the retort is two-thirds filled with a most carefully prepared caustic solution of silex and potash. Pure black flints and caustic soda, after being subjected to a white heat, are pulverised and melted into a glass, which is soluble in distilled water. In this solution no animal life can possibly exist, nor can there in mercury. The whole was then placed upon a shelf for constant inspection. A gelatinous substance was first observed to have formed around the bottom of the positive wire. Then No. 1 made its appearance, gradually expanding into Nos. 2 and 3, when flexible filaments were observed. No. 4 began to show animal life, and, after one hundred and forty days' watching through all its changes, the perfect living insect crawled up the wire!—not singly, but in sufficient numbers to dispel all doubt, if any could have existed, and prepared for another stage of life. Like our mosquitoes, that merge from the element in which they are produced, and are drowned in it if they return, any unfortunate straggler that missed his hold immediately perished. The Acarus Crossei is now known as a distinct species.”

Here is the formation of living animals from materials in which animal life could have by no possibility previously existed. A great outcry was raised against Mr. Crosse by the religious when the phenomenon was first announced in the British journals. He was denounced for an atheist for revealing the fact that a physical law existed by which living creatures were produced by galvanism. Mr. Crosse did not affirm that galvanism was the creator; nor did he claim to be the contriver of the law, but simply the discoverer of its existence. But superstition and fanaticism are without reason as they are regardless of scripture. Mr. Crosse has doubtless stumbled on the verge of a great fact—on the principle according to which Jehovah Elohim form living souls from the dust, and waters of the sea. The ruach, like the galvanism in the above process, directed by superhuman intelligence, is formative and life-enkindling, no matter what the substance operated upon may be; so that, as John observed, ‘God is able of these stones to raise up children to Abraham.’ He employs means in all he does by himself and others. These means are laws to a vast extent completely hidden from his creatures. The law of soul-creation from the dust is known only to Jesus of all the sons of men. The law exists though hidden; and awaits its application by him for the resurrection of the dead. Jesus, as God’s representative, will re-create their souls from their original dust by God’s spirit—2 Corinthians 4: 14. ‘God,’ says Paul, ‘shall make alive your mortal bodies by his ruach,’ pneuma, or spirit—Romans 8: 11. He will not require the mechanical contrivance used by Mr. Crosse to bring the formative ruach or spirit into formative and life-enkindling contact with their dust. His spirit-directing finger, is enough for this. He wills it, and it is done; not without law, or contrary thereto, but in harmony with latent physical principles whose modus operandi is known only to Him that appointed them, and is prepared and authorised to apply them. The formation of a living soul from dust, called Adam; and the reproduction of everliving souls from mortal dust, by resurrection, is demonstrated to the infidel to be possible by Mr. Crosse's insects. He admits the formation of these by the positive and negative forces of galvanism applied to a solution of calcined silicate of potash and soda in condensed steam, or distilled water. —This is wonderful; and the resurrection of the dead is but a similar wonder on a grander scale. That the dead will rise is a matter of testimony; that they can be raised, is demonstration; and how? no one is stumbled at who can trace the 'worm Jacob' to his manhood, the Acarus Crossei from animal nonentity, and believes that 'all things are possible with God.'

Our intelligent correspondent confesses that he and his brethren are 'Immaterialists,' and believes that immaterialism is taught, or countenanced by the scriptures. But they are not like immaterialists in general; for they mix candour and teachableness of mind with their immaterialism, 'being willing to revise it as well as other things.' They do not assume that they are infallibly right, and that all who do not assent to their system are mere disciples of French materialism, which recognises neither God, a future state, nor rewards and punishments to come. This is the antipodes of their theory, though it recognises all these things, 'the truth of the gospel' has no affinity with either.

This will appear when we consider what the nonentity is, if I may so speak, that passes current under the term 'immaterialism.' As defined by Webster, it signifies 'the doctrine of the existence or state of immaterial substances or spiritual beings.' Now if any one can comprehend this, it is more than I can. "Immaterial" is defined to signify, 'not consisting of matter;' and 'substance,' 'something material, real, solid, 'body, corporeal nature or matter.'' 'Immaterial substance,' therefore, must be a phrase signifying no matter matter, unsolid solid, incorporeal body, &c. Now, this is a fair specimen of 'words without knowledge,' or positive absurdity. And such 'immaterial substances' form the idea entertained by immaterialism of 'spiritual beings!' It beggars all speech to give expression to immaterialistic conceptions. 'Beings!'—What sort of beings are immaterial substances? Nonentical entities! And these are the spirits of immateriality! The immortal souls of metaphysics! From this the reader will perceive that it is only necessary to define the terms of the hypothesis to show what absolute nothingness is wrapped up in conceit. Most assuredly, the scriptures countenance nothing so palpably absurd; and I doubt not, that, if so sensible a writer as our correspondent were to reconsider the matter, he would hasten to disclaim all affinity with an hypothesis whose vocables are so indefinite, and manifestly foolish.

I come now to the difficulty of our friends the Immaterialists. They assume that I call ‘the three elements’ the flesh: and that as I affirm that Paul says the flesh thinks (which is indeed evident to all) they want to know to which of the three elements I allude as the thinking principle of the flesh—whether to the brain, the neshemet el, or to the ruach. This difficulty would very naturally arise in the mind of an Immaterialist, whose hypothesis regards life and mind as a single principle capable of incorporeal existence and intellectual operations. A difficulty of this sort, however, would not occur to one unperverted by the notion. He would answer, that abstractly considered neither of them thinks—neither the brain alone, nor the neshemet, nor ruach at all, alone or combined, with the brain or without it. Brain or flesh alone is mere dead matter. Neither Paul, nor I after him, ever hinted that inanimate flesh thinks. To say this would be like saying that a locomotive is self moving independently of fire and steam. The brain-flesh is the machinery of thought, the thinking apparatus, the intellectual locomotive, which ‘goes ahead’ only under the forces generated by the mutual affinities of blood, air, and electricity. Man has formed the railway locomotive from crude unsightly iron ore, that it can move forward or backward, with the slowness of the ox, or the velocity of the wind. Show an ancient man of a thousand years ago a mass of ore, and tell him that a moving machine could be constructed from it capable of running at the rate of sixty miles an hour with a burden two hundred horses could not move on a common road, and he would conclude you were either in jest, practising on his credulity, or beside yourself. —‘What! That iron ore move itself at sixty miles an hour!’ This would be as astonishing to him as it is to immaterialists to say that God has constructed a thinking machine from the dust of the ground. —‘What!’ they exclaim, ‘tell us that matter thinks!’—that the dust which the wind can blow away with a puff can compose the Principia, Milton’s Paradise Lost, or Shakespeare's plays!' And why not? —Is that more surprising than the raising up of children to Abraham from stones; or the production of living animals by the galvanic forces from calcined silicate of soda and potash dissolved in distilled water? 'All things are possible with God.' It is much more reasonable that solid matter should think, than that neshemet el, or air, or ruach, electrical spirit, should. —But unorganised matter is as incapable of thought as unorganised iron ore is of moving sixty miles an hour. When Paul speaks of 'the thinking of the flesh,' it is of organised matter in living action he affirms the thinking. And so do I. When I use the phrase 'the flesh,' in speaking of mind, I mean the brain, the thinking apparatus, set in motion by the vital forces. The brain does not originate its own power to think, any more than the railway locomotive its own power to move; but they are both so formed that under an appropriate stimulus, the one can think, and the other run sixty miles an hour. The locomotive, however, cannot regulate its own movements. It requires a hand directed by intelligence. Once started, and it would run till its forces were exhausted, or it was arrested by an obstacle it could not overcome. So the brain requires guidance in right thinking by some other influence than the vital forces. Under the mere impulse of these its thinking is instinctive, in other words, the actions of the creature are generated by physical impulses spontaneously arising in the organs of the brain. Brain, whose fibres vibrate only under the excitation of natural forces, is incapable of right thinking. Worked after this manner it is brutish. Its thinking is wrong, and without the admixture of a single spiritual idea; and manifested in the actions of the creature, exhibits to view man in the savage state. This is 'the thinking of the flesh' in genuine physical manifestation. Left to itself, it runs like the unguided locomotive, into headlong excess. This is seen in the savage varieties of our race, among whom Paul's to phronema tou pneumatos, or thinking of the spirit, cannot be found. The spirit referred to in that phrase does not exist in them in the sense in which it is so used. —If by 'the spirit' we are to understand 'the immortal soul,' which immaterialism plants in all human beings, then there would be no savage, or semi-barbarous, or unenlightened, ungodly, people on earth; for under that hypothesis, the thoughts of all men, women, and children would be 'the thinking of the Spirit,' which Paul says 'is life and peace,' as opposed to 'the thinking of the flesh,' which is 'enmity against God.' Immaterialism teaches that what it terms 'the immortal soul' is 'a particle of the divine essence,’ and the originator of human thoughts and actions; for with this ism it is the thinking principle, and principle of life! Hence, it elevates every man, Indian, Hottentot, New Hollander, and Thug, into an incarnation of the deity, which is mere God-blaspheming Pantheism. The phrase ‘immortal soul’ imports a deathless soul. Now, for a soul to be deathless it must be incorruptible; and the living thing that is incorruptible is essentially pure, holy, and undefiled. Does the reader imagine that such a soul or ‘Spirit’ in savage, semi-barbarian, or civilised man, presiding over his thoughts and actions, could coexist in them with the characters they are known to possess? Their diabolism triumphantly refutes the immaterialistic notion of men being in any sense immortality incarnate. —No; the principle in his flesh is not a deathless one, but mortal sin; and hence all the enmity against God, and wickedness in the world from ‘the thinking of the flesh.’

Our correspondent says truly, ‘If we are to take this expression absolutely, there is an end to all reasoning in the matter.’ By ‘absolutely’ he means without limitation; that is, if we are to interpret the phrase, ‘the thinking of the flesh,’ as meaning simply what it says. And why should we not? Because, says Mr. Greenlees, in thinking there is motion; and you say that the ruach, or spirit, is the substratum of all motion: therefore, as the ruach produces the motion, it must do the thinking. This seems to be his argument as deduced from what he says. —The ruach doing the thinking through the flesh, is the immaterialist interpretation of ‘the thinking of the flesh;’ but if so, then what do they mean by ‘the thinking of the spirit?’ These two thinkings are antithetic; but immaterialism makes them the same; therefore their results must be identical, which according to Paul, is not the fact. Immaterialism has no taste for absolute significations; because they leave no scope for speculation, or ‘thinking of the flesh;’ I am, however, particularly partial to them, because in the thinkings of the Spirit of God they remarkably abound.

I have indeed said that ‘the ruach is the substratum of all motion.’ But by ‘substratum’ is meant ‘that which supplies the basis in which are inherent the qualities from which motion results under certain conditions. But without the blood and the air, the ruach would not cause a single fibre of the brain to vibrate a thought; nor would the blood and the air without the ruach. The substratum of motion in flesh is, indeed, made up of these three; and under the influence of their resultant the liver secretes bile, the stomach gastric juice, and the brain thinks. The resultant does not perform the thinking any more than it does the secreting of bile and gastric juice; yet without it all three operations would cease. From this it will be seen that there are no diversities of statement to reconsider.

'The thinking of the spirit' is a divine superaddition to the 'thinking of the flesh.' The latter is common to all men and beasts, in a greater or less degree of perfection; while the former is peculiar to the prophets and apostles; and the saints of the living God. This is the reason why there is so much diversity between true believers and the world. The world's mind is the unenlightened thinking of Sin's flesh, the propensities being ascendant; while that of the true believer is thinking which results from the understanding and earnest belief of the things of the Spirit of God. In this case, the intellect is enlightened, the sentiments elevated, and God's truth enthroned. The thinking is then in harmony with that truth; and as the truth is the Spirit's, the thinking is the Spirit's likewise. This explanation, I hope, will remove Mr. Greenlees' supposition, that I teach that there are two thinking substances in man, unless by substance we are to understand the truth as well as the brain. The apostle is certainly not speaking of channels of thought, but of the sources of thought in the believer, on the one hand, and in the unenlightened man subject to his propensities, on the other. The Spirit-truth is the light, the eye of the brain body in things divine, as the eye is the light of the same organ in regard to things without. —When a man is indoctrinated with it, it is the true light within which restrains him from running off into wild excess of thought, word, and deed; and conforms his thinking to the mind of God.

Mr. Greenlees is manifestly mistaken in saying, that 'the heart's tablet is written upon by the heart; and therefore cannot be the heart itself; but only the medium through which the heart acts.' Paul speaks of two kinds of tablets—stone tablets, and fleshly tables of the heart. On the former, the Mosaic law was written; on the latter 'the epistle of Christ.' It is worthy of remark here, that the scripture divides heart-tables into two kinds—stony heart tablets, and fleshy heart tables. The former are like the tables of the law, hard and insensible; the latter, soft and sensible as flesh. Israel now, and of old time, seeking a justification by the law, is an illustration of the old stony heart in the flesh; being unbelieving, perverse, and stiffnecked —‘uncircumcised of heart, and ears.’ The Gentiles are like them. God, however, has promised to give Israel ‘a new heart,’ which he styles ‘a heart of flesh’—Ezekiel 36: 26, upon which he will write his law—Jeremiah 31: 33, that they may fear him forever—Jeremiah 32: 39. This new heart was given to the apostles, and to those, both Jews and Gentiles, who believe the gospel of the kingdom, and in Jesus ass the king, through their word. — There was a congregation of these new hearts of flesh in Corinth. In the second letter which the apostle wrote to them, he tells them they ‘are the epistle of Christ written with the Spirit of the living God on fleshy tables of the heart’—2 Corinthians 3: 3. It was not the heart, then, of each disciple that wrote upon his fleshy table, as our ingenuous correspondent supposes; but the Spirit of the living God that inscribed upon it ‘the law of the spirit of life’—Romans 8: 2. Does the reader inquire, How did the Spirit write the epistle of Christ upon the Corinthian heart? Paul says, he did it by him and Timothy. They were the Spirit’s amanuenses or secretaries. ‘Ye are the epistle of Christ,’ says he, ‘ministered by us.’ The way they wrote the letter at the dictation of the Spirit is set forth in the narrative of the introduction of the gospel of the kingdom into Corinth. ‘He reasoned in the synagogue every Sabbath, and persuaded the Jews and the Greeks.’ He went to them ‘declaring the testimony of God,’ ‘teaching His word among them,’ and ‘testifying that Jesus is the Christ’ (or king)—Acts 18: 4 ‘in demonstration of Spirit and of power’—Acts 18: 11, 5. He did not bring them to the acknowledgment of a theory by eloquence or a display of worldly wisdom. Their reception of the truth was the work of the Spirit through him and Timothy. The testimony was God’s, the power was God’s, and the demonstration his Spirit’s; the reasoning alone was the apostle’s, who testified also that he had seen Jesus and conversed with him, since his crucifixion, and that consequently he was indeed risen from the dead—1 Corinthians 2: 1-4. ‘Many of the Corinthians hearing, believed, and were baptised.’ Their heart tablet, stony before, became fleshy, and inscribed so notably with Spirit-truth, that they were known and read of all men as Christ’s in whose hearts he dwelt by faith.

When a man thinks, and at the same time his brain is in an aching state, he is conscious of thinking with that organ. —Observation also proves that the brain is the thinking substance of the body; for pressure upon it suspends all thought and sensation.

The scriptures do not say that 'life and immortality are brought to light in the New Testament;' but that Jesus Christ has brought them to light 'through the Gospel;' which, the same apostle whose words these are, says, 'God promised before by his prophets in the holy scriptures.'

Strange that any one should say that I confound 'spirit' with 'spiritual body.' Spirit has many meanings in the scriptures, and one of these meanings is spiritual body; as apo kyriou pneumatos, 'from the Lord the Spirit,' and 'that which is born of the Spirit is Spirit;' and again, 'the last Adam was made into a life-imparting Spirit.' But these texts are not immaterialistic; hence confusion arises in the minds of immaterialists, whose idea of spirit is mere incorporeal invisibility. —Swedenborgianism is mere mesmerism bewitched—a contemptible crotchet, unworthy of a scripturally-wise man's consideration for five minutes. It is as absurd for them to style 'the immaterial part of man' the spiritual body, as it is for immaterialists to affirm that there is any part of man that is immaterial! The only difference I can see is that they synonymise nothing with something, while the others leave something out of their system altogether. I find the word spirit used in the Bible for what science styles electricity, galvanism, magnetism, &c.; for mind, natural courage, natural force, life, instinct, ambition, apparition, demon, breath, disposition, a disease, words of truth, God, teaching-unction, angels, the gospel, conscience, &c. any one may see that spirit is not to be rendered by one meaning in all the texts where it occurs. Its signification must be determined by the subject in text and context. This is the rule I work by; and by its aid I find no difficulty in making sense of all the passages where it is found.

'What are we to make of the Spirit's individuality?' Why, just what the Bible makes of it. It is as inseparable from God himself as his wisdom, knowledge, life, and power. It is the medium of connection between Him and all his works; so that by it he is everywhere present, though corporeally a million of years removed from some parts of his universe. By it He is cognisant of the fall of a sparrow upon earth, and at the same instant, of events in the stars billions of leagues remote. 'There is nothing hid from him.' No man hath seen God at any time; but by his spirit he makes himself known, as to his 'holy men' of ancient time.

Elohainoo in the sentence, 'Shema yisrah-ail Yehowah Elohainoo Yehowah echahd, 'Hear, O Israel, Jehovah our God is one Being,' is neither dual nor plural. —Elohah is singular with the plural pronoun ainoo, our, affixed—'our God,' not our gods, two or more. The plural would have a Yod between ai and noo. Yehowah ail elohim, Jehovah, God of gods, is the God of Israel; not God of idols, but of angels, the provisional superintendents of human affairs.

The 'christian brother' is unnecessarily 'displeased.' Paul says the body of Jesus was 'the nature of Abraham's seed.' I have said no more. Was this clean or unclean? Jesus was 'born of the flesh,' and was therefore flesh, whatever that may be. This is the connexion of John 3: 6 with his body. Psalm 51: 5 is prophetic of his being so born.

I am not aware of any reviews of Elpis Israel having appeared. There have been occasional notices showing that it is a book the reviewers don't like to meddle with. Prudence is sometimes the better part of valour.

THE ADVENT HARBINGER'S "REMARKS" ON OUR "REPLY."

We have delayed publishing this reply, hoping to find time to give that attention to it which the magnitude of the questions under investigation demands; but in this we have been disappointed, and as our time will be all taken up in making necessary preparations for our eastern tour, and as we desire to have our readers see the article, all we can do now is to give it to them with the following brief remarks:

1. We very highly prize the spirit of christian kindness manifested in this 'reply.' It is a rare grace among religious disputants in these degenerate times: may it more and more abound in us and our worthy friend of the Herald, so that we may be enabled to 'keep the unity of the Spirit,' though on some minor points we may differ in sentiment.
2. We profess to be 'grounded and settled' in the great fundamental doctrines of Christianity, for they are plainly taught in the inspired Word; we therefore expect to make no essential changes in reference to them. But relative to unfulfilled prophecy, we freely confess that we are a learner, and as a matter of course are not perfect in knowledge in this respect—and should be willing to be taught more perfectly by any one; and we are happy to be assured that the editor of the Herald possesses this teachable disposition; and we would that we could say the same of the editors of other Heralds. Were they willing to learn of Christ, they would become wiser and much better qualified to teach others than they now are.
3. Bro. Thomas is mistaken in saying that we hold that the 'Twelve Tribes will be restored to the land promised to their fathers . . . immediately subsequent to the battle of Armageddon,' for we have supposed they would be gathered previous to that battle. We have viewed the order of events thus, 1. The personal advent of Christ and the resurrection of the saints, &c. 2. The gathering of Israel to their Messiah at Jerusalem, (whom they would not know at first, any more than Joseph's brethren at first knew him.) 3. The kings of the earth, or Gog and his confederates, make war with the Lamb, or the battle of Armageddon is fought, on the mountains of Israel, and the Lord and his people are victorious. 4. Christ, or the anti-typical Joseph, then reveals himself to his brethren according to the flesh, and they mourn, &c.

4. Bro. Thomas agrees with us that the general gathering of Israel, &c., will not be perfected until after the advent, but thinks it will be sufficiently commenced previous to that event, to have a colony of Israelites in Jerusalem and Palestine when the Lord shall come; 'two-thirds' of which (the people in the country) will be cut off—and the city will be taken, &c., by the invading army of Russia, and at this time of sore trouble of the Jewish colony, the Lord will come to their deliverance, and to the destruction of the army of Gog. At this crisis Gentile times will terminate, and the 'times of restitution' begin.

We will, when we shall have time to do so, compare these views more thoroughly if possible, than we hitherto have done, with the sure word of prophecy, and endeavour to follow its light wherever it may lead us, for every other way is dark, and ends in disappointment. We would not be too sanguine on these great matters, which are yet in the future. We may be mistaken, and Bro. Thomas in the right, on certain points, and vice versa; or both may be incorrect in some respects, and the truth may lie between us. The order of events may stand thus:

1. The advent of Christ into the atmospheric heavens.
2. The resurrection of the righteous, who with the living saints, will be caught up to meet the Lord in the air.
3. The gathering of Israel to their own land, &c.
4. The indignation of the Lord, or vials of wrath on his enemies, while his saints are secure with the Lord in their 'chambers.'
5. The gathering of the army of Gog on the mountains of Israel, by which Jerusalem will be taken, sacked, &c., two-thirds of the inhabitants of the land be cut off, as predicted in Zechariah 13 & 14.
6. At this time of trouble of Israel, the Lord with all his saints, (who were caught up to meet him in the air, at his first manifestation) will descend to Mount Olivet, destroy the hosts of Gog and deliver Israel, who will then acknowledge him to be their Messiah, and mourn on account of their sins, &c.

Let us candidly compare these different views with the revealed word, with a child like disposition, willing to receive the truth, however much it may cross our most dearly cherished opinions, and the true light on these important matters will so shine upon the eye of our understanding as to enable us, beyond all doubt, to decide which is the right way.'

COMMENTS.

It will be seen from the above that our friend of the A. H. does not expect the battle of Armageddon to be fought at the appearing of the Lord of Hosts; but subsequently to that event, and 'the gathering of Israel to their Messiah at Jerusalem.' His difficulty in the case, I think, may be referred to his regarding the phrase 'the battle of Armageddon' as a single fight, instead of a series of bloody campaigns. The apocalyptic words are eis ton polemon tees heemeras ekeinees tees megalees ton Theou tou pantokratoros, that is, 'unto the war of that great day of the almighty God'—Revelation 16: 14, 10. The kings of the Roman territory are gathered by the agency of the Frog like spirits, not to a machee or pitched battle, but to a polemos or war; and this war is styled 'the war of Armageddon,' because the symbolic angel of the sixth vial through the Frog-Spirits 'gathers them into the place (or country) called Hebraistically Armageddon.' The Armageddon war begins with the striking of Nebuchadnezzar's image on the clayey feet at the appearing of Christ; it continues during the comminuting of its fragments to dust; and ends with the utter destruction of the Powers which now rule the goat-nations of the earth. A war precedes the Armageddon war which is being prepared for the world by the ambition of Napoleon. This Napoleon war will ultimate in the gathering of all the goat-nations' armies against Jerusalem under the Russo-Assyrian Gog, who will take possession of the city, as predicted by Zechariah—Zechariah 14: 1-2. Thus the crisis is formed which necessitates the coming of Michael, or Jesus, to deliver Daniel's countrymen and their city, which deliverance of the city begins the Armageddon war, which is Christ's and his Saints' war against Israel's foes. During this war the work of Israel's restoration under Elijah as Christ's forerunner to the Ten Tribes, progresses to its consummation—a work which will have been accomplished when peace is granted to the world.

The sacking of Jerusalem after the Lord's appearing in the air, the fifth thing in the order of our friend's theory, cannot by any means be admitted. The enemy will be in the possession of the city when the Lord appears. He comes to drive him out. But to permit him to sack the city in his very presence, would be to inflict a discomfiture on Israel's king, which would fill the hearts of his followers with dismay.

In reasoning upon all these events it must not be forgotten, that Jesus is to be 'a stone of stumbling and rock of offence to both the Houses of Israel'—Isaiah 8: 14. This has been fulfilled in relation to the House of Judah; but as yet he has never been so to the Ten Tribes. Scope must therefore be afforded for this work; so that any theory that leaves it unprovided for must be defective in some important element of interpretation.

REMOVAL TO NEW YORK CITY.

This number closes our engagement with our subscribers for 1852; yet renewable, we trust, from year to year until the king of Israel comes to his own in power and great glory; when the instruction and warning of the press will be required of us no more; and we shall exchange the pen for the two edged sword of judgment—Psalm 149: 6; Daniel 7: 22, when 'judgment shall be given to the Saints of the Most High.'

Circumstances beyond our control, (through which, we take it, God gives expression to his providence concerning us) render it expedient that we transfer the publication of the Herald of the Kingdom and Age to Come from Richmond to New York City. Whether the move will be for the better, we cannot say. We are not hypersanguine, seeing that the fortunes of the truth will not be materially benefited until 'the time comes for the Saints to possess the kingdom.' There will be there, however, more ample scope for our well meant endeavours. In Richmond, we have been long convinced, there is none; and have therefore ceased for years to make it other than a place of publication, our post office, and a sort of caravanseral abode. We spend, however, necessarily many Lord's days in the year in one place, being detained there writing, and superintending the Herald. These days require to be more profitably employed than they can be here in the nature of things. We have advised with our friends in Eastern Virginia and elsewhere on this subject; and though they express regret at our removal farther off, yet considering the cheap and rapid facilities for locomotion, they say they doubt not the change will be for the better in every respect. We hope it will. Here there are only 16,000 whites out of a population of 32,000 to operate upon. These are subdivided into papists, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Methodists, Baptists, universalists, Campbellites, politicians indifferent to all sects and principles, and 'the baser sort,' styled by Jesus, 'dogs and swine.' In New York there are all these in proportionately greater numbers; but then there are more abounding 'odds and ends,' who believe that truth is more precious than gold and popularity, and who are willing in a Berean spirit to 'search and see.'—The population of New York and its suburbs is over half a million, with great facilities for divergence to all points of the compass. The Jews also are concentrated there in considerable numbers; and printing is cheaper than in this city. The field presenting these attractions is not to be neglected. Its cultivation is worth a trial, we have therefore concluded to go, and sow 'the word of the Kingdom' in hope of some fruit springing up to everlasting life. By this change, however, expenses will be considerably increased. We trust, therefore, that the friends of the Herald, both in America and Britain, who profess themselves to be under great obligation to Elpis Israel, for the knowledge they have obtained of the 'great salvation,' will redouble their diligence in its behalf; and remember that the press cannot be kept in operation without money to pay the expenses of the work. The friends of truth are few, and fewer still the friends who believe and love 'the truth.' It is necessary therefore for them to do more, to devise more liberal things, and that spontaneously as cheerful contributors, than if their numbers were of a large amount. —We are reproached by the Adversary because we are few, as if that were an evidence against the truth of the things we plead! We accept the reproach, and follow Jesus, who is 'the truth,' without the camp forsaken of all his friends. He died for that truth, and maintained it by his single testimony. We are not yet reduced to one; but are hundreds. Will it not be to our eternal disgrace, if we allow our public testimony in the face of the scoffing world to be suppressed for the want of funds, seeing that many of us have enough and plenty to spare? Let not this be our reproach, whatever else may come. Let us all put our shoulder to the wheel with cheerfulness. The truth has nothing to fear from the enemy. Let its friends be true, and it defies the world.

To New York, then, we remove after the issue of the present number. Our correspondents after its receipt are therefore respectfully requested to direct their letters and papers for us to the care of Mr. Stacy, 234 Wooster Street, N. Y., until further notice. The January number will be issued thence; and when received will be a hint, tendered in the most respectful manner possible, that the season has returned for sending on subscriptions in advance according to the usual terms.

EDITOR.

Subscribers in Britain and the Provinces will receive their papers for 1853, when their names are forwarded to us by Mr. R. Robertson, 89 Grange Road, Bermondsey, London; and by our other agents, according to our 'Timely Notice' on page 215.

“THE LOVER OF ZION.”

The Lover of Zion is the title of a paper just issued at Hartford, Connecticut, by Henry Heyes, at 50 cents per 12 numbers, payable in advance. The word ‘Zion’ in the above title is not used by the editor in the sectarian sense, for a gentile denomination of religionists who fancy themselves to be the church of God; but in its genuine import as the name of ‘the city where David dwelt,’ and where Jehovah has decreed—Psalm 2: 6-9—the Son of David shall reign as his King over Israel and the Nations for a thousand years.

The number before us, which is the first number, abounds in intelligence from the Holy Land, and goes to establish the fact, that that highly interesting country is being colonised; an event which no one can be indifferent to who believes ‘the Gospel of the Kingdom.’ The way is preparing for the return of the kings of the east to the land promised to Abraham and Christ for an everlasting possession. The Lover of Zion, we presume, will glean all the information available upon this subject, that his readers may see how events are striding onwards to the political resurrection of the great nation of the east; which, under the Lord of hosts and his associate kings, as his sharp two-edged sword will smite the nations, and overturn the kingdoms of the world. But we will let the editor state his object in his own words:

‘Our object in publishing the lover of Zion is—to exhibit the true hope of the Christian Church; to maintain the literal principle of Bible interpretation; to set forth the bearing of passing events upon the near crisis of nations, and the certain and speedy advent of Messiah to take the throne of his father David, and to rule the world in righteousness; to urge the disciple of Christ by every meet consideration, to take heed that the day come not upon him unawares; to warn against the dangers of the present hour, especially the rapping spirit delusions, ‘clairvoyance’ and the soul-poisoning instructions often conveyed through ‘Phrenological’ lectures and publications; to expose and rebuke the sins of the age: in short, to testify to the Truth, according to our ability, wholly and thoroughly.'

The Lover of Zion is to be issued monthly. All remittances of money, letters and communications must be directed post-paid to Henry Heyes, Hartford, Connecticut.

We wish the editor all possible success in the accomplishment of the object proposed.

“CONTRAST BETWEEN PROTESTANTISM AND THE GOSPEL.”

This is the title of a pamphlet of 82 small duodecimo pages written by Mr. N. M. Catlin of Smith’s Basin, New York, and issued from the Advent Harbinger office, at Rochester, N. Y., by its editor, Mr. Joseph Marsh, who will furnish it at $9 per hundred copies.

We have read it, and can commend it to our readers as setting forth the kingdom’s gospel in lively contrast with that incongruous affair current by the name of Protestantism—a thing which, while it protests against Popery, and is more favourable to civil and religious liberty than that hateful ‘Mystery of Iniquity,’ is equally gospel-nullifying in its traditions, and powerless for the salvation of the soul, and the redemption of the world.

In a letter accompanying the copy transmitted to us, Mr. Catlin says: ‘It was your writings led me to the consideration of the subject, and which finally resulted in my totally repudiating protestant faith; in fact, so many ideas gathered from you were in my mind at the time I was writing ‘The Contrast,’ that I hesitated lest I might be guilty of plagiarism: and it was a query with me whether to give you credit by quotations, or otherwise. I finally determined to make my reference to the matter in the preface, and so save the cumbrance of quotations, especially as I had reason to believe you were not a sensitive man about small matters.’ Our brother has well judged in this. So that the truth finds circulation we rejoice, even though stolen from our treasury without acknowledgment; still we would prefer to see it credited, that we may be able to note the result of our endeavour to illustrate it to the conviction of the public mind. —Bro. Catlin has satisfactorily acquitted himself of all discourtesy in the case in saying, ‘I have been materially aided by the writings of Dr. Thomas, editor of the Herald of the Future Age.’ Preface.

The author of The Contrast is evidently sound in the faith of the gospel, both in theory and in practice. The following extracts may afford some clue to his doctrine and position relative to the truth:

‘It is evident, that to believe the gospel a man’s faith must embrace the hope contained in ‘the Word of the Truth of the Gospel.’ In another form, he must believe the unfulfilled promises relating to the Kingdom of God; that believing he may ‘wait for the hope of righteousness by faith.’

‘And if a man would successfully preach the gospel, he must understand ‘the things concerning the kingdom of God.’

‘Now, reader, mark the contrast. Protestantism makes the belief of the doctrine of Christ crucified, and freedom from sin and perdition through his sacrifice, the standard of gospel faith. It knows nothing of the ‘glad tidings’ of the kingdom of which we speak, and have many things yet to say. We admit, that the man who believes the gospel, necessarily believes the things concerning the Lord Jesus; but one may believe these facts as taught by Protestantism, and yet be as ignorant of the doctrine of the kingdom of God as an uninstructed heathen, having his mind blinded by the popular belief of going up to heaven.’ P. 49.

His relation to the kingdom’s gospel appears from what follows:

‘Let those that can afford it get along with a baptism into a false hope received before being enlightened in ‘the Gospel of the Kingdom of God.’ The writer, and many others have felt it a privilege to correct a mistake in this respect; and thus, as it were, exchange a bad title for one that reads in harmony with the divine plan. —It is right at any time to do right.’ P. 82.

‘Baptism into a false hope’ is immersion into the hope of the soul’s ascent to heaven at death there to inherit kingdoms beyond the skies. This is not only an unfounded, unscriptural, and false hope, but subversive also of the one true hope of the calling. It is ‘another gospel,’ for it is the hope that defines the character or nature of the gospel believed. A false hope makes a false gospel; for ‘gospel’ is glad tidings of or concerning a hope: if therefore the hope believed be a false hope, and therefore ‘no hope,’ its gospel is false, or in fact, no gospel at all. 'Baptism into a false hope' is consequently baptism into a false gospel, which is equivalent to no baptism at all. This is Mr. Catlin's conclusion, and a perfectly logical and correct one it is. He could not afford to get along with such a baptism, and therefore corrected the mistake he made in submitting to it, by being immersed again into the 'one hope of the calling' to the kingdom and glory of God.

We are very much astonished at many good and honest people, who believe 'the gospel of the kingdom,' not being able to see into this matter. They have faith now, but they are so tenacious of the doings of their old 'piety' and sincerity, that they cannot see their insufficiency. Their cherished notion is, that belief of the truth after an immersion predicated upon ignorance of it, will amend all its defects. —This belief may not take possession of them until twenty or twenty five years after their immersion into a false hope; yet so enamoured are they of piety, sincerity, and dipping, that they will tell you that had they died in their ignorance of the kingdom's gospel they would have risen from the dead to inherit it! From this, it is clear, that 'the truth' is less esteemed by them than their piety, sincerity, and immersion into a false hope. Surely, they must possess some talisman, or charm, or open-sesame, some private interest in the king's court, by which they can gain admission into the kingdom upon other terms than those granted to the apostles and their contemporaries! Mr. Catlin cannot afford to get along through this world on such a presumption. He is wise to make his calling and election sure, and to leave nothing to a mere hypothesis. He has done right in being baptised into the true hope, and so putting off his false one. —Scripture and reason say, 'Seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness,' and then the addition of the 'all things' shall follow. But the fashion is to invert the king's order, and seek first God's righteousness and then his kingdom; not understanding that 'the righteousness of God' is accessible only to those who believe the word of the kingdom; and without that righteousness no flesh living can be saved. We therefore congratulate Mr. Catlin and all others who have purged out the old leaven, and become a new lump. First believe the gospel of the kingdom, and then obey it. This is the order laid down by Jehovah's king; for it is the belief of that gospel that justifies the immersed, and not immersion into piety and misbelief.

Let those, however, who have ‘become obedient to the faith’ remember that baptism into the one hope of the calling to the kingdom and glory promised, is but the first step to immortality. Henceforth they serve mammon at the peril of their lives. Friendship with the world places them in hostility to God. The kingdom is for those only who illustrate their faith and perfect it by their works; for while the great father of the faithful’s belief of the gospel was counted to him for righteousness or remission of past sins, his faith was made perfect afterwards by his works; so that ‘Ye see how that by works man is justified, and not by faith only’—James 2: 20-26. It is these postbaptismal works by which the saints are justified. Sinners are justified from all their past sins, and become heirs of God, by an intelligent belief of the gospel of the kingdom counted to them for righteousness in the act of immersion into the Holy Name. Thus they become saints, and dependent upon a patient continuance in well doing, through evil and good report, for acceptance and exaltation in the Day of Christ. The way, therefore, to the kingdom is plain, though beset with suffering, difficulties, and trials. It is a very unfrequented path; still there are a few wayfarers there. They like company, and therefore put themselves to some trouble and expense to obtain it. This is their mission in the world till Israel’s king appears. The straight gate will then be closed; and the glory and honour, the incorruptibility and life, of the kingdom, will be inaccessible to the sons of man for a thousand years. Their principle is to ‘work while it is called today.’ It is the duty of them all to work, for ‘he that will not work, shall not eat.’ They must all therefore work in some way. He that can neither write nor speak in behalf of the faith must enable those to do it who can. And it must be done cheerfully too; for ‘the Lord loves a cheerful giver:’ and what is done, must be done as to the Lord, and not to man. It is the Lord’s truth, and the Lord’s people must sustain it; or be condemned for covetousness, and consequent exclusion from his kingdom. — ‘Buy the truth,’ then, ‘and sell it not;’ that is, don’t part with it for any present advantage; and do your utmost to disseminate it, for by so doing, you prove that were He in your midst who has styled himself ‘THE TRUTH,’ you would be indeed devoted to his cause. But he who in Christ’s absence leaves the truth to eke out a feeble, lingering, existence, would leave Him to pine away in a common gaol without relief.

Bro. Catlin's brochure is one of the few things issuing from the press that we can commend to the patronage of our readers. The copy sent to us is a defective one, being deficient of sixteen pages; but judging from the sixty six we have read, we feel able to trust him for the goodness of the rest. It is his testimony for the gospel of the kingdom. Let those who have the means give it a circulation; and however, extensively they may do it, after they have done all, let them say from the heart, 'O Lord, we are unprofitable servants!'

THE ADVENT AND THE VIALS.

I see it stated in the Advent Harbinger of October 30, over the signature of 'J. B. C.,' that 'many fix on the event at the Fifth Vial as the Advent—I refer to Dr. Thomas and others.' If by this is to be understood that I refer the appearing of the Lord Jesus to the opening of the fifth vial, I would say that the supposition is altogether erroneous. I consider the third, fourth, and fifth vials as being poured out through the agency of the French under Napoleon 1. The throne and kingdom of the Two-Horned Beast were the Germano-Papal, which suffered so severely that for several years previous to the battle of Waterloo, this dominion, styled the Holy Roman Empire, was darkened; and its dignitaries, spiritual and temporal, the blasphemers of God and his saints, truly 'gnawed their tongues for pain,' but 'repented not for their deeds.'

Between the fifth and sixth vials was an interval of six years; that is, from Napoleon's last battle to the breaking out of the Greek revolution, which ultimated in bringing out the ninth horn of the Ten Horned Beast. This sixth vial has been emptying its contents upon the Ottoman dominion from that time to this; and will continue to do so until it is blotted out from the dynasties of nations. The Seventh Vial began to pour out in 1830, and was marked by the fall of the elder branch of the Bourbons, and the establishment of Belgium as the tenth horn of 'the Scarlet Coloured Beast.' I consider the Sixth as the vial of judgment or wrath upon the eastern Roman territory; and the Seventh, that on the western. They have been dropping upon these two divisions of the prophetic earth collaterally since 1830; and will so continue to do until the East and West coalesce into the dominion represented by Nebuchadnezzar's Image, when the Seventh vial affects the whole territory indiscriminately till the crowning victory of the Faithful and True One over 'the kings of the earth, and their armies,' by which the wrath of God is stayed against the nations.

The mission of the Frog Power headed up in the embryo emperor of the French, is to commingle the streams of these two vials that the manifestation of Nebuchadnezzar's Image may result. They are the last vial, or wrathful periods of the Seventh Trumpet, which is subdivided into seven such. That is, when the First Vial commenced, the Seventh and Last Trumpet began to sound; and when the Seventh vial shall be exhausted, the sounding of the trumpet will cease: so that from 1793 to the conquest of the kings by Him 'who doth judge and make war in righteousness' are 'the days of the voice of the seventh angel—holan mellee salpidzein—when he shall sound (not 'begin to sound,' as in the English version) in which the mystery of God is finished, as he hath declared to his servants the prophets.' In these days, not in the Fifth Period of them, however, nor at the beginning of the Sixth, but when the Sixth and Seventh have commingled, and Gog, the Russo-Assyrian Head of Nebuchadnezzar's Image, shall be in possession of the Holy City, will the Advent, or appearing of the Lord Jesus Christ in his kingdom, become manifest to the armies of the Goat-nations encamped upon the mountains of Israel's land. His power indicative of his presence will be manifested in the plagues of their overthrow. Only one sixth part shall escape to proclaim their, to them, unaccountable discomfiture; while the third part of the Jewish residents in the land (all that remain of the colonists now beginning to settle the country in hope of a speedy national restoration) will rejoice in the Deliverer, saying, 'Blessed be He that cometh in the name of the Lord.'

I shall esteem it a favour if my friend of the Advent Harbinger will insert this correction in his paper. What 'others' may say of the synchronousness of the Advent and Fifth Vial, may be as brother 'J. B. C.' affirms; it is not so, however, as to my view of the matter. Though the Fifth Vial's effects are still felt, it has a long time since ceased to flow, and Christ has not yet appeared. He stands, however, 'knocking at the door,' saying to the children of light, 'Behold I come as a thief,' open unto me; 'Blessed is he that watcheth and keeps his garments.' The working of the Frog-Power is the loud-sounding reverberation of the Sixth Vial period indicative of the manifestation of Israel's King in the Seventh. 'Keep your garments,' then, if you have on the garments of salvation; if not, O Reader, delay not to divest yourself of your 'filthy rags' by not only 'believing the things of the Kingdom of God and the Name of Jesus Christ,' but by obeying that kingdom's gospel, that oil may be found in your lamp when the cry is heard

'Go ye out to meet him!' Make ready, then, for 'the time is at hand.'

ANALECTA EPISTOLARIA.
CANADA ASLEEP.

Dear Sir:

Having made up a small subscription list for a dozen copies of Elpis Israel, I hasten to send it to you. The parties belong to nearly all denominations in this place.

The people of Canada generally, that is, so far as I have observed them, are very much priest-ridden. Their whole time is consumed in gathering wealth; and they seem to think that it pays them better to get their thinking done by the minister. —The ‘disciples’ are much under Bethany influence, and many of them cold as icicles—they have all much need to be aroused from their lethargy. I had some thought of sending a copy of Elpis Israel for the view to the editor of the----- ----, * the most popular reform journal in Canada West. He is a ‘disciple,’ and professes to be very liberal; perhaps he might give it a candid reading.

Yours, very truly,
G. L. SCOTT.

Paris, C. W., July 3, 1852.

* We suppress the name of the paper, as ‘Bethany influence’ might be exerted upon its editor, as that of Bar-Jesus the sorcerer on Sergius Paulus, to turn him away from a candid examination of the faith; or indeed, to prevent an examination of Elpis Israel at all. —Editor.

ELPIS ISRAEL A PIONEER.

Dear Brother:

I consider Elpis Israel to be the most valuable book, except the Bible, I have ever read. It has been instrumental in removing many difficulties that laid in the way of my understanding many portions of the scriptures, especially the prophecies.

It would afford me much pleasure to see you, and to have your company at my house; if you ever find it convenient, be sure and call on me. I pray that the good Lord may preserve you in body and mind unto his appearing in His kingdom and glory; and that you may be instrumental in his hand of accomplishing much good, that may redound to the glory and honour of his great name.

In hope of the Kingdom and Age to Come, I remain very respectfully yours,

NELSON WALTON.

Louisa, Virginia.

I'LL READ AND JUDGE FOR MYSELF.

Dear Brother:

When I commenced reading the Millennial Harbinger, &c., some of my Baptist brethren told me, if I wanted to be bitten with the frost of infidelity to continue reading A. Campbell's writings. I have continued to do so to the present time, and I am inclined to believe I have been greatly benefited. I am now told that the Herald is a paper of the like kind by brother Campbell and his friends. I mean such a paper as the Baptists used to tell me his was. When I read his, I had to read and judge for myself. I am only doing so by yours. I am now an old man, and have behaved myself tolerably well. I hope yet to be a worthy man and a christian; and so far as I may gain information, I am willing to impart it to others; and I hope you and brother Campbell will indulge me in reading what each of you write; and that so long as I behave well, you will give me credit for so doing; and if I should understand somethings different from both of you, I hope I shall not be less worthy. I have always been sorry that you and he have differed so much, and that such hard feelings have been indulged in, as it seems to me, by both of you. Now it may seem strange that while you and he love each other so little, that I should love both of you; I fear, however, sometimes lest some day I may lose the love of both of you, because I love you both. But, be it so—I want to do right; and I have no good reason for not highly esteeming you both.

I remain yours in the Redeemer, MATTHEW W. WEBBER.
Shelby, Tennessee.

Our good friend was a young man when he began to read Mr. C's writings, and he has read them till he has become old. If he had read them exclusively, however, it is much to be feared, from thousands of cases extant, that he would not now in his senility have much love or esteem for us or our works. He sees that we are not what our opponents evilly represent us to be; therefore, being of an honest and good heart, he cannot hate us as they do. But, however much he may love them, he may depend upon it they entertain no real love for him after avowing his love for us. The world hated the apostles because it hated their Lord. And so it is now. Men hate the champions of the faith, and all that sympathise with them, because they hate the truth. —Mr. C. hates what we contend for, that is, 'the gospel of the kingdom,' and does all in his feebleness he can to destroy it. Because he hates the gospel of the kingdom and its principles, he hates us; and would crucify us tomorrow if he could, as the Sin-power crucified 'the truth,' when it nailed the King of Israel to the cross. —Nevertheless, our friend does well to love him, in the sense of loving his enemies. —We love him in this sense likewise; and therefore do all in our power to convince him of his errors, and to 'turn him from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God.' This we conceive is the best way possible of proving our love to our greatest enemy. This love, however, he has never reciprocated; but leaves us to perish without the least effort to snatch us as a brand from the eternal burnings in which he believes! We believe that the truth is so intelligibly exhibited in the Herald, that 'the ordained to eternal life' may easily come to the comprehension of it. Not knowing whether he be of that number or not, we send it to him, that running he may read it. It is to be supposed, that he thinks the truth is more intelligibly set forth in the Millennial Harbinger than in the Herald, where he would deny that it can be found at all. But, alas for his philoposy, he leaves our 'never dying, immortal soul' in hopeless ignorance, refusing to send his paper in exchange for ours. This editorial discourtesy of his, though a small affair in itself, shows that his spirit is not so loving towards us as ours is to him. We desire his salvation, and therefore treat him as we do. We pry not into his private affairs or relations. This is the function of lewd fellows of the baser sort; with us the domestic economies of our adversaries are tabooed. We care not, nor inquire about them and their parents, their wives, their children, their debts, and their profits. In argument, these things are no concern of ours. If they killed their parents, divorced their wives, starved their children, and cheated their creditors, the truth or falsity of their opinions would not be at all affected thereby. We inquire what is said, not who says it. We war against the thing; not against the person; but so long as the latter sticks to the thing, he becomes an Agag against the truth, and must be hewed in pieces. —There is no help for it. There is no mercy for the truth's enemies until they sue for quarter, which will readily and lovingly be granted when they confess and yield obedience to the faith.

Our worthy friend in Shelby ought not to be sorry for the difference that has developed itself between us and Mr. C. —That difference has been the means of elaborating 'the gospel of the kingdom,' which could only have been brought out by the kind of warfare that has prevailed between us. 'Hard feelings' are inseparable from war of every kind. The war has been carried on by our opponents in a cowardly and dishonourable manner. Sin always fights in this way. We have protested against it, but to no purpose. We have felt hard while suffering Sin's injustice and malevolence; and have done the best we could under the circumstances to show up the enemy in his true colours, and to expose the sophistry and shallowness of his pretences. We have put him to silence as far as argument and testimony go; though he still occasionally gnashes his teeth and growls in wrath against us. His feelings no doubt are hard, very hard. But we can't help that. It is the fate of the mortally wounded. Truth and Error have had a battle, a series of combats. — Truth, though crushed to earth, and over and over again declared to be dead, has risen again; and Error is dying amidst its worshippers. Can these things be, and 'hard feelings' have no place? The gospel of the kingdom stands strong in the name of the Lord; while Immortal Soulism, Sky-kingdomism, and Spirit-worldism, have received a deadly wound, and their advocates cut up hip and thigh. If our beloved friend; love the combatants on both sides, what ground does he himself occupy? Suppose the controversy had to be decided by vote, and the casting vote were with him, into which urn would he put the lot? We are glad he has resolved to read and judge for himself. We always rejoice in this; because truth must by this process be the gainer in some way. We shall never quarrel with him, or any other person, for pursuing this course. —Read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest, if you would rejoice in the truth. It is only Sin that is opposed to investigation; for it is by ignorance he keeps his slaves in bondage. Our friend will never lose our regard by thinking independently, and judging for himself.

“A WILD, CRAZY, VISIONARY.”

Dear Sir:

I forget whether I paid up last year’s subscription, or not. Please inform me, for I want to keep even with my dues, if possible, though I hardly have money enough to defray the necessary expenses of my family. Yet I want your Herald, and will pay for it, if nothing prevents. —I commenced my subscription during your absence in England and the Continent, merely as a trial; thinking, very probably, you were but a wild, crazy, visionary, the depths of whose imagination I had a great desire to fathom. Hence, I have continued my subscription to the present time. But please to accept my confession. There was ‘more in your philosophy than I dreamed of’ in mine. Hence with much gratitude, and with great pleasure, I remain your subscriber still, if you will accept me; and also yours very truly in this glorious Hope,

J. J. D.

Batavia, N. Y., March 26, 1852.

We insert the above as an example of honesty, due appreciation of the truth, and nobleness of mind and disposition. Surely brother D. is, a man of ‘honest and good heart.’ Would that all who regard us as ‘wild, crazy, and visionary,’ would do likewise! They would, we doubt not, benefit themselves greatly by the effort. —They would perhaps find, as he has done, that we are ‘not mad, but speak forth the words of truth and soberness,’ and that the wild, crazy, and visionary, mentality is on the side of our traducers. What can be more wild and visionary than immortal-soulism in all its principles and details! —What more truthful, reasonable, and demonstrative, than 'the gospel of the kingdom,' and all its consequents! This is 'the wisdom of God in a mystery;' that, the merest foolish thinking of proud, conceited, ignorance—the foolishness on which is based all the superstition of this evil world.

We thankfully accept brother D., and all like him. A paper sustained by such subscribers would have no valuable space consumed in dunning; and no cause of complaint against 'patrons,' who read, approve, and pay postage, but nothing more!

CANDOR.

Adaline, Illinois, October 25, 1852.

Doctor Thomas,

Dear Sir: —Enclosed you will find five dollars which you will apply on my subscription to the 'Herald.' This is all that I have paid you with the exception of one dollar and fifty cents for the first volume of the 'Herald of the Future Age.' The balance due you I shall send you this winter, and sooner than the 'Herald' shall be discontinued, I will give at least ten dollars a year towards its support. The cause of my delinquency has not been my not being able to pay, for I am abundantly able; but the fact is, I never took much interest in the matter; I merely received your paper, paid the postage, and skimmed over the contents, and filed them away, until within the last year I began to study them a little, (I have each number of each volume since 1844.) and I begin to see, as far as I understand, that you have been advocating the truth, and that truth appears to be your whole aim; not what this man believes, or that man holds forth; but what do Moses and the Prophets, Christ and his Apostles, teach. You are the only man that I know of who is devoting his whole time and energies to spread God's truth through this benighted, bewildered, and ignorant world. I notice when you get an idea from the Scriptures you give it as your knowledge of the matter; and if any person can produce a more scriptural one, you are ready and willing to receive it. Such is not the case with your opponents; they first get an idea from Plato, Calvin, or Wesley, then bend the Scriptures in support of it.

Go on in the good cause, truth is mighty and will prevail some day.
Your sincere friend and well-wisher,

J. A. E.

EUROPEAN PROSPECT.

Dear Sir:

Your article entitled the 'European Prospect,' in Vol. 1 page 223 is very interesting. I expect to get it inserted in one of our principal newspapers. I fear, however, we are all here, politically, so enthusiastic in our sympathy with the leaders of the democratic portion of the European world, that it will be difficult to get the public to believe that the cause of despotism (alias the Czar) will ultimately triumph. —However, truth will be found to outlive all error. God in the end will not only be justified in his deeds, but in his words, or 'sayings' also; as it is written, 'That thou mightest be justified in thy sayings, and mightest overcome when thou art judged.'

Glasgow, Scotland.

SHALL CONSTITUTIONALISM, DEMOCRACY, OR ABSOLUTISM, PREVAIL?

The universal public will not believe, nor is it expedient that it should. If the European public believed that the democracy would be eventually and finally defeated, it would not enter into combat with the enemy. In this event the purposes of God could not be carried out according to the plan he has devised and revealed in the Bible. The blindness and perverseness of the people and their leaders is a condition that guarantees the execution of his will. Would not the Socialists rather be content with things as they are in France, imperio-republican as it is, and despotic too, than seek to unfurl the banner of Red-republicanism as the national ensign, if they understood that the temporary triumph of their policy would ultimate in the annexation of France to the Autocrat's domain? Why then seek to enlighten mankind on the destiny that awaits them? Eis martyrion autois 'for a testimony to them' who believe not, and for the salvation of the 'few' who have ears to hear, and hearts to understand. —We have nothing to do with consequences. The pleasant duty imposed upon 'the wise' is to 'contend earnestly for the faith.' There may still be some of Christ's sheep among the people yet to be manifested. —The truth must therefore be forced upon public attention that all the members of his flock not yet separated from the goats may hear his voice, and be saved. For this cause, it is well to attack public foolishness in all its departments, and to show its subversiveness of the 'testimony of God' and 'the faith of Jesus.' It has been customary hitherto for men to confine their disputations to mere abstractions in theology, as though 'the faith' had nothing to do with the politics of the world. Hence the insipidity of theological disputes, and the careless indifference of the majority to their verity or falseness. Next to the worship of Mammon, speculations in politics are most absorbingly interesting to the people. 'What's the news?' is the Athenian characteristic of the Nineteenth Century; so that newspapers are vastly more interesting to mankind than the Bible, which they regard as an unintelligible mystery about souls in fire and brimstone, or singing psalms beyond the skies! Now we should avail ourselves of this condition of things as far as practicable in order to attract public attention to the Gospel of the Kingdom. It is a great political as well as religious question—a key in fact to the right understanding and solution of all the movements of the age, and the consequences that must necessarily follow. We are glad that our friend intends to get 'the European prospect' before the news loving public in Glasgow. If we could afford it, we would purchase the right to a column in the most extensively circulated newspaper in New York, in which we would keep the politics of God's Kingdom as opposed to popular political theories, and the political purposes of the world's rulers, constantly before the public. But the parsimony of professors cripples all enterprise, so that the testimony can only be declared in a very limited degree. We cannot therefore do what we would, glad are we then when we find one here and there cooperating in this direction. Truth, like murder, will out at last, and then those who have laboured and made sacrifices in its interests will have reason to rejoice.

Absolutism will certainly triumph, and the propagandism of the leaders of the democracy in both worlds, will expedite the crisis. The scribe well instructed for the kingdom of heaven will desire all speedy success to their efforts, and the as speedy subjugation of the democracy of absolutism; not however because he loves despotism, but because he loves truth and righteousness, and sighs for its permanent establishment over the nations. But, is Russian despotism a truthful and righteous incorporation? The very reverse. In its full manifestation it is 'the Dragon, the old Serpent, the surnamed Devil and the Satan'—Revelation 20: 2—a hideous tyranny, more terrible than any that hath yet calumniated the truth and played the adversary against all righteousness. But 'the wise who understand'—Daniel 12: 10 know that 'the kingdom,' which they pray 'may come' that 'God's will may be done upon the earth as it is in heaven,' cannot be established until that despotism—the absolutism of Gogue—Ezekiel 38—shall be revealed in all its magnitude and power; and, possessing the city of Jerusalem, shall prepare to grasp the sceptre of the farther land. Upon this ground it is, and upon this alone, they say, 'Down with the Democracy and success to Absolutism for a little time.' The amputation of a limb is a severe operation, but sometimes necessary to the life of the patient; even so the trouble coming upon this generation is terrible, but it is an element in the regeneration of society, and its future blessedness in Abraham and his Seed, that cannot be dispensed with: if therefore the cure off the world's maladies be 'a consummation devoutly to be wished,' in the same ratio is it desirable that Democracy and Absolutism should come to blows, and that the latter should prevail.

CLERICAL WRATH AGAINST ELPIS ISRAEL.

Halifax, N. S., November 1st., 1852.

Dear Sir:

It is with mingled feelings of pleasure and admiration that I now take the liberty of addressing you, and I hope you will pardon the same. I have purchased a copy of 'Elpis Israel,' and although I have received a scriptural baptism by being immersed for the remission of sins, and I trust, a believer in the faith once delivered unto the saints, I was very much in the dark respecting some off the most important portions of the law and testimony, especially the prophecies; but since I have perused your invaluable work I have received more perfect knowledge that way. I heard you every time you lectured in our city last autumn, and I rejoice at the news that we shall soon have the pleasure of hearing you again. Our Doctors of Modern Divinity are quite alarmed at the circulation of 'Elpis Israel;' one of them has anathematised the work, forbidding it to be read by his congregation; another has declared that it contains 'damnable doctrines.' My object for addressing you is to inform you that I have reduced your advice to practice, by making a whole burnt-offering of all my books of curious theological arts, creeds, and confessions, of my former faith. When Hogan quitted the church of Rome, he committed all his creeds, and confessions of faith, to a good warm hickory fire; I have done the same with mine to a good warm coal one. 'Elpis Israel' and 'the law and testimony' alone now constitute my library. The grand reason why our Doctors of Modern Divinity are so wrathful is, they are afraid their craft is in danger, the silver shrines being much more an object with them than 'the truth as it is in Jesus.' At the opening of Salem Chapel the Rev. Mr. Geikee informed his congregation, that the Church of Christ was made up of all the sectarian parties of the day, four excepted, which he enumerated as follows, viz: Roman Catholics, Universalists, Mormons, and Adventists. These, he said, could not be saved for the following reasons, viz: Roman Catholics were priest-ridden, their clergy would prevent them from coming to a knowledge of the truth. Secondly, Universalists, because hell was too warm a climate. Thirdly, Mormons, for they resided at too great a distance to be reached. Lastly, Adventists, because they entertain wrong views of the scriptures. This pretended successor to the faith of the Apostles, denies that which was their hope, joy, and glory, and brands all with heresy, who now advocate these views, the second appearing of Christ and the re-establishment of David's throne and kingdom. But we do not allow the Rev. Mr. Geikee to be a judge in these matters, seeing that judgment belongs to the day of Christ, which is so rapidly approaching; and as he is connected with that branch of the Apostasy, styled Congregationalists, we leave him to that day, when there will be a howling among the false shepherds of the deceived flocks. If one doctrine stands forth more prominently than another in the scriptures, it is the clearly revealed second appearing of Christ our Lord from heaven, to rule the world in righteousness, and administer justice amongst the nations of the earth. It was this grand doctrine which made our forefathers in the faith endure the loss of all things, defy the tyrants' zeal and bigots' rage, and seal the testimony with their blood. What our Lord said of the Scribes of his day is perfectly applicable to the Doctors of ours, 'ye have made my Father's house a den of thieves.' It was this great truth which animated the apostle to the Gentiles in all his labours, sustained him in all his adversity, and inspired him with the most sublime hopes, and soothed him in his expiring hour. We would advise the Rev. gentleman to study more minutely the following text. 'Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many, and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time, without sin unto salvation.' May we be followers of them who, through faith and patience, will yet inherit the promises. That you may be instrumental in adding many jewels to the crown of Christ, in the day of his appearing, is the sincere prayer of your brother; and may the Lord grant us all a glorious resurrection from among the dead, or a translation from among the living, according to whatever state we shall be found in at his coming, and an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

Yours in the hope of the gospel, and the Lord's appearing and kingdom,

LUCAS.

IMMORTAL-SOULISM AN EGYPTIAN SUPERSTITION.

The Egyptians conceded immortality to souls in general—this is evident, in part, from their mythology even. As among most other heathen nations, so also among the Egyptians, Polytheism originated chiefly from the notion, that meritorious persons are gifted with a divine principle, and that their soul, after its separation from the body, actually becomes endowed with divinity. So were Osiris and Isis, according to Plutarch, * transformed only into gods out of good spirits. Herodotus calls the Egyptians the first who recognised the human soul as immortal # Egyptian superstition the parent of the dogma! Moses was well acquainted with the idea, being learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, yet he gives not the remotest hint concerning it from Genesis to the end of Deuteronomy. He had evidently no faith in it.

JEWISH OBJECTIONS TO JESUS CONSIDERED.

In The Occident, an Israelitish periodical, there is a series of letters written by a Mr. Dias, the maternal grandfather of Miss Grace Aguilar, a distinguished daughter of Israel, against the authenticity and infallibility of the New Testament, and against the claims of Jesus of Nazareth to the Messiahship. In one of his epistles he remarks: “Until the Jews admit the divine authority of the New Testament, nothing can be urged from it for their conversion: for in controversies, neither party can, with the least shadow of reason, make use of any authority which is not admitted, or granted by the other. A Mohammedan as consistently urge the authority of the Koran for the conviction of the Christian, as a Christian make use of or urge anything from the New Testament for the conviction of the Jew.” Though there is some truth in this, it is not free from fallacy. Mr. Dias says —“Nothing can be urged from it.” He might as well object, that nothing can be urged for the conviction of a modern Chinese of the existence of Alfred the Great, and of his right to the throne of England, until he admitted the divine authority of the testimony of those who had seen Alfred, and who chronicled the events of his life and reign. The narratives known by the names of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, are evidently worthy of all reception as authentic history; and rest upon at least as good a foundation as any other history extant, that of Moses not excepted. Whatever argument can be adduced to prove the genuineness of the facts reported in Moses’ writing, is equally available to prove the authenticity of the facts concerning Jesus as related in the four testimonies, call them by whatever name you will. The Old and New Testament stand or fall together, as far as what is called the “external evidence” is concerned, a less amount of which would seem to be necessary to establish the historical accuracy of the New, seeing that it is so much more modern or nearer our own times in its details, than the Old. It is too late in the day for our Jewish friends to call in question the validity of the New Testament history. It is quite competent for them to dispute its doctrine; but to deny its facts is to convict themselves of illiteracy and unreasonableness, for there is no contrary testimony extant, calculated to cast a shadow of doubt upon the facts and events narrated in either the Old or

New writings of the Jews.

Mr. Benjamin Dias and others labour unnecessarily to set aside the authority of Councils in the settling of the canon of the New Testament. The Christian receives nothing upon their authority, though Catholics and Protestants may. The oracles of God, styled the Old Testament, were committed to Judah, from whom we received them; the Jewish writings of the New, were received by the apostolic congregations of believers from sources satisfactory to them, and carefully preserved and handed down to the times of Huss, Wickliffe, and Luther, by those “who kept the commandments of God, and had the testimony of Jesus Christ”—Revelation 12: 17, called the Two Witnesses. They had the testimony, and preserved it from destruction and mutilation by both pagans and papists. The genuine Christian accepts it from them, as modern Israelites receive the book of the Law and the Prophets from their co-religionists of past ages. Papists and their Councils in all times are the enemies of the Old and New scriptures, which they have ever sought to suppress and mutilate. Hence their decrees in favour of the canonicalness of the scripture books, is the extorted approving testimony of the adversary, extorted by the influence of the Witnesses, in whose presence they dared not venture to do contrary.

The New Testament, then, being genuine history—and, in a Christian’s esteem, divine doctrine too—no further confession need be required of a Jew in the controversy between him and the Nazarenes. If he deny so much as this, there can be no discussion with him on the claims of Jesus to the Messiahship; for it is tantamount to denying that Jesus ever existed at all; for, with the exception of the testimony of Josephus, their own historian of the destruction of Jerusalem, which some of them affect to doubt, there is none extant to prove the existence of Jesus, save the testimony of contemporaries, many of them once bitter enemies, but converted into his warmest friends and adherents, by the power of the evidence current before their eyes. If the Jew admit the existence of Jesus, the genealogies of Matthew and Luke taken from his own scriptures, the miracles Jesus exhibited, his crucifixion, and resurrection, he admits no more than what thousands of Jews believed in the days of Pilate without admitting the Messiahship of Jesus or embracing the faith. These were undeniable things. Even the resurrection was believed; for the rulers bribed the soldiers to lie it into doubtfulness.

But, the grounds upon which Jews found their objections to Jesus as their king, differ in the first century and in the nineteenth. Annas, Caiaphas, and their brethren would not acknowledge Jesus, because they perceived that if he ascended the throne of David they would have no share in the government, as promotion to the honour and glory of the kingdom was predicated by Him on righteousness, which, he declared, they did not possess: for he said,

“Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of the heavens. Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the land. Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled. Blessed are they who are persecuted for righteousness’ sake: for the kingdom of the heavens is theirs. Rejoice, and be exceeding glad: for great is your reward in the heavens.”

“They which be first shall be last, and the last shall be first.”

Had Jesus been a man of like disposition with themselves, they would doubtless, if they had deemed it safe, have been willing to cooperate with Him in re-establishing the throne of David. But he was not. He announced the glory, honour, incorruptibility, and life of the kingdom to the poor. He consorted with publicans and sinners; while the self-righteous respectables of the age he turned over to the judgment of Hinnom’s Vale. Hence it was a class enmity that grew up against him, arising, indeed out of the natural enmity of the human mind to the things which be of God, and fostered and matured by the pride of life, which rejoices in wealth, and power, and a vain show.

But the circumstances of the Jewish people now and for ages past, no longer admit of objection to Jesus, because of his humble, afflicted, and poverty-stricken condition, as contrasted with the nobility of the nation. Rulers and people have been trodden into the dust. The ignorant, superstitious, and cruel Gentiles have trampled them like mire in the streets. They are “a people scattered and peeled,” humbled, persecuted, and, in most countries, miserably poor. The despised Nazarene, though fed and clothed by the contributions of his friends, and without any certain habitation, or place to rest his head, was not so miserable, so enduringly wretched, as his countrymen in that same Jerusalem where he was put to death. A fraternity of woe has been established for ages between the Jews and Him who claims to be their King. Hence, the national fortunes being changed, the case is changed. An objection to him now is, in the words of Mr. Isaac Leeser, that “an only son of God could not exist by any possibility. We reject the idea,” says he, “of God’s parting with any part of himself to constitute a personage to whom the name of his son could with any propriety be applied. We do not recognise any division in the Godhead.” This objection has grown out of the crude and vain speculations of Athanasius. But the New Testament nowhere teaches a division of the to Theion, or Divine Nature. Paul taught “one Lord,” that is, Jesus Christ; and “one God,” who is “the Father of all, above all, through all, and in all,” so that he styles him, “the Father of our Lord Jesus the Messiah,” and the Father of the children, both Jews and Gentiles, whom he gives to Jesus to be his brethren. He dwelt in Jesus by his Holy Spirit, as he will hereafter dwell in all his brethren, that he may be all things in all. He did not “part with any part of himself” in the begetting of Jesus, any more than in the begetting of Adam, who is styled “Son of God,” as well as Jesus. The difference between Adam and Jesus in the origin of their humanity is, that God formed Adam by his Spirit out of the dust, while he formed Jesus by the same Spirit out of the substance of David’s daughter, who is styled in the Psalms, Jehovah’s handmaid, and her offspring, “the Son of thine handmaid”—Psalm 86: 16; 116: 16, which is equivalent to “Son of God.” He is Son of God also by his begetting from death to life as His first-born from the dead; as it is written in the second Psalm, “Yehovah ahmar aly, Beni ahtah ani hyyom yelidtikah”—“Jehovah hath said to me, My Son thou art; I this day have begotten thee,” i.e., the day of his resurrection. The particles of the Greek New Testament rendered as they ought to be, make the expressions of Paul concerning Jesus in perfect harmony with what is affirmed concerning the lord Jesus in all passages of the Old Testament. Hence, the Jewish objection to Jesus derived from Athanasian foolishness, is as baseless as its origin. The New Testament and the Old altogether agree as to the nature of the relationship subsisting between Jehovah and his Messiah, as the Father and the Son.

Another objection to Jesus being the Messiah is founded likewise on Gentile ignorance and unbelief of Moses and the Prophets. The writings of these personages are almost entirely disregarded by professors of Christianity, and but little understood even by those who profess to study them. They are treated as mere Jewish annals—once prophecies, but now fulfilled in Jesus, and consequently a mere matter of history; to use the words of a certain divine esteemed “great” by people unlearned in the word, a sort of “old Jewish almanac!” Hence, professors of Gentilism say, that “the New Testament is their only and sufficient rule of faith and practice.” This is tantamount to saying, that “all the prophecies concerning the Messiah are fulfilled in Jesus, and therefore recorded in the New Testament;” for if this be not the case, then there are things to be believed concerning the Messiah which are not there, and the New Testament is not the sufficient rule of faith. Assuming, however, that the Gentile notion is a true statement in relation to Jesus, it is taken as a ground of objection to his claims as King of the Jews and Redeemer of Israel. “We,” say the Jews to the Gentiles, “agree with you, that there is but one personal advent of the Christ. Jesus appeared once in our country; and his biography has been sketched by four of his contemporaries, which, you say, is a record of all that need be expected to happen in regard to him upon earth. Now this being so, with what we know is actually on record in the holy prophets, concerning the office and character of Messiah, and which no one will pretend to say has ever been fulfilled in, by, or through Jesus, we cannot recognise in him the personage of whom Moses did write in the law.” “Only prove to us that all the prophecies concerning the Messiah were fulfilled in Jesus,” says Mr. Benjamin Dias; “the Jews will then be converted; for they require nothing else.”

If the assailants be professors of Gentilism, who deny the second personal appearing of Jesus, the restoration of Israel, and the establishment of David’s throne and kingdom in the Holy Land, this position of the Jews is impregnable. All things spoken concerning the Messiah by the prophets were not fulfilled in Jesus; yet he says, that all things spoken there must be fulfilled. The truth is, that comparatively few things spoken there were fulfilled in him. The Messiah’s mission is prophetic, sacrificial, sacerdotal, military, regal, and imperial. Jesus came as a prophet, suffered as a sacrifice; and now performs the functions of a High Priest in the Most Holy, but to those only who believe the gospel and are united to his name. He has yet to appear as High Priest of the Twelve Tribes, as a conquering hero, reigning king of Israel and Emperor of the world. But more of this anon.

MEDIATORSHIP.

BY THE EDITOR

“THE LAW” is a term applied in the Scriptures to that system of things enjoined by Jehovah upon the Twelve Tribes of Israel through Moses. “The Law was given through Moses”—John 1: 17, and hence it is styled “the Law of Moses;” not because it originated from him as the French code did from Napoleon, or certain laws of Greece from Draco and Solon; but because it was transmitted through him as the medium of communication between the lord of the Universe and the descendants of Abraham in the chosen line of Isaac and Jacob, whom He surnamed Israel, of whom He condescended to become the King. “He gave them a fiery law”—Deuteronomy 33: 2, which he caused to be delivered to Moses for promulgation. He did not leave his throne in the light to commune with Moses in his own proper person; for “no man shall see Him and live”—Exodus 33: 20; 1 Timothy 6: 16: but he imparted his will to the angels of his presence, “who do his commandments, hearkening unto the voice of his word;” and these, as faithful ministers of his pleasure—Psalm 103: 20-21, handed to Moses his high, and holy, and just decrees, with all the sanctions of Sinai recorded in “the Book.” Thus “the law was ordained by angels in the hands of a Mediator”—Galatians 3: 19, who was Moses, occupying middle ground between Israel and their King. Terrified with the thunder-tones in which the Decalogue was delivered, which made even Moses quake with fear, they besought Jehovah to speak to them only through the medium of their brother. In making this request they proposed a Mediatorship, and suggested the appointment of Moses to the office. They had acknowledged themselves Jehovah’s nation, and now they wished that the communication between them should be through an intermediate person with whom they could confer without terror. The proposal pleased Jehovah, who said “they had well spoken what they had spoken,” and their request was consequently complied with. From this time the Mediatorship became an ordinance in Israel. Moses was the first that held the office, in which he officiated as a priest, prophet, legislator and king. After the nation was planted in Canaan, the high priests acted in the character of mediators, being Jehovah’s supreme magistrates over the people, for the pontificate was always above the kingly office, though many of the kings treated the high priests with indignity. Moses was the only complete representative of a mediator that has yet appeared in Israel. He was Jehovah's representative in all his relations to the nation. David and Solomon shared the mediatorship with Zadoc the high priest, but it was only as kingly, not priestly and legislative, representatives of Jehovah. They were mediatorial administrators of Moses' law; and representative men in the offices they sustained—Jehovah's representatives, individually representative in their historical outlines of the mediator like unto Moses, who shall hereafter appear as king in Jeshurun.

No other nation besides Israel has received a law "ordained in the hand of a mediator." The constitutions and laws of the nations have been given to them by evil men who have subdued them; or by men no holier, whom they may have chosen to rule over them. Hence their organizations are evil, and the spirit which actuates them, satanic. The supreme power is one, and the people is another, and there is no mediator—"no daysman betwixt them that might lay his hand upon them both." Their laws and institutions being human, purely so, or rather devilish, they have no intercourse with God; for if they spoke to him and he should answer, seeing that they have no mediator, they would be as terror-stricken as Israel of old, and cry out, "Let not God speak with us, lest we die!" Never did a people before hear the voice of God speaking out of the midst of the fire and live; nor besides Israel has any nation heard him speak at all. Jehovah speaks only to Israel, in Israel, and through them; and if the nations are addressed, it is through the mediation of the tribes; for what Moses was to them, so are they to the world at large.

Mediation being an Israelitish institution, and there being no other between Jehovah and the population of the earth; and it being admitted that no man can come to God save through a mediator approved of Him; it follows, that both individuals and nations can obtain access to "the throne of the Majesty in the heavens" only through the mediation which pertains to Israel. Now this mediation is in no way practicable on the old basis, that is, through the Mosaic law. Obviously so; because according to that law there is no acceptance except through sacrifice offered in Jerusalem by the priesthood of Levi. So long as Jerusalem is trodden under foot of the Gentiles, this is impossible; Israel therefore, like the rest of the nations, although they trust in Moses, is as destitute of mediation as though the mediatorship pertained to the Chinese and not to them. If blindness had not happened to them, they would certainly see this; for it is written in Moses,

But what one thing, not to mention all things, do they observe in the letter or spirit of it that is written therein? They practice circumcision. But that is not of the law; yet by the practice they become debtors to do the whole law. By offending in the least they are guilty of the whole; for Moses curses every Israelite who continueth not in all. Cursed, then, are they of Moses in whom they trust; yet were they ever so willing to obey him, they are circumstantially prevented. The Turks possess their holy city and land, and by the sword are prepared to suppress every attempt to re-establish the Mosaic commonwealth. Alas for Israel! They are “without a king, without a prince, without a sacrifice, without an image, without an ephod, and without teraphim”—Hosea 3: 4, and the king, prince, sacrifice, image of the invisible God, they will not receive! But, if Israel’s case is forlorn, that of the nations is worse; for while Israel refuses Him who speaks from the right hand of God, the Gentiles, who profess to acknowledge him, pay no regard to what he says. Redemption awaits Israel—Daniel 12: 1—but anger and wrath, and sore distress, to all the world besides. How shall this trouble be eschewed?

Escape there is none save for those who obey the truth. The door is not yet shut. “He that believes and is baptised shall be saved;” but mark the words which follow—“He that believes not shall be condemned.” What is that thing which when not believed brings condemnation to a man? The context answers this question in two words—“THE GOSPEL”—Mark 16: 15-16; Romans 1: 16. So that you see, you may even be baptised, or rather immersed, but if you believe not “the gospel,” you cannot be saved. That gospel announces to every man, both Jew and Gentile who believes it, access to Jehovah and his restored kingdom through his son Jesus, on his accession to the mediatorship in Israel. The law of Moses was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator. But that law as originally ordained has been impaired by the manifestation of some of its antitypes; and being therefore no longer an exact representation of the knowledge of the truth, and incompatible with the nature of things as modified by the appearance of the prophet like unto Moses, —it needs to be amended. This emendation is ordained by Jehovah in the hand of a mediator, as well as the original promulgation of the law. Moses received it from the angels as the ministers of God; but Jesus, who is greater than Moses, “being a son over his own house,” in which Moses was only a servant—Hebrews 3: 5-6, receives the amended law direct from Jehovah; for says God,

“I will put my words in his mouth; and he shall speak unto them (Israel) all that I shall command him; and whosoever will not hearken to my words which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him.”

Angels brought the words of God to Sinai, and there delivered them to Moses for him to speak to Israel; but the Holy Spirit, in the form of a dove, descended from before the throne, and abode on Jesus. He needed no angels to tell him what to speak, for the Father dwelt in Him by his spirit, and moved his tongue to utterance.

“The Father is in Me. I speak not of myself; the Father dwelling in me doth the works.”

Though that Spirit forsook him when he yielded up his life upon the cross—Matthew 27: 46, 50; Luke 23: 46, it was only till he rose again by its life-imparting energy—Romans 8: 11. The fullness of the Godhead now dwelleth bodily in him; and of that “fullness have we all,” says an apostle, “received, even gift for the sake of gift—charin anti charitos”—Colossians 2: 9; John 1: 16. When he shall depart from “holy ground” to revisit the arena of suffering and reproach, angels will escort him to his kingdom, full of Jehovah’s words of truth and mercy to his people; for—

“He shall roar out of Zion, and utter his voice from Jerusalem; and the heavens and the earth shall shake: but He will be the hope of his people, and the strength of the children of Israel. So shall they know that He is the Lord their God dwelling in Zion his holy mountain: Jerusalem shall then be holy, and strangers shall pass through her no more”—Joel 3: 16-17.

Thus will he utter his archangel voice from Zion, amid the echoes of Jehovah's trumpet sending forth its blasts as on Sinai in the days of old. That trump will awake the dead—1 Thessalonians 4: 16; 2 Thessalonians 1: 7-8. And where will be his foes? Though gathered together to battle against Jerusalem a mighty host, of what account will they be, when the crashing thunder of that dead-awakening shout, rattling through the flaming heavens, shall boom upon their ears? Madness will seize upon them, and upon their horses blindness and astonishment. The burden of Jerusalem will be heavy upon them, and a cup of trembling to them all—Zechariah 12: 1-7; 14: 1-21. But drink it to the dregs they must; for their wickedness will be great—Joel 3: 13. Jehovah's first interview with his nation at Sinai was attended by a terrific demonstration preceded by the overthrow of Israel's enemies. Under the sanction of this display of power and glory he presented Moses to the people as his representative over them. But the time is not very remote, when the crisis that is now forming will necessitate a second interview between Jehovah and the Tribes. They have to be delivered from those that hate them; and to be impressed with a spirit of prompt obedience and submission to the Moses-like prophet, who is to be the mediatorial representative of Jehovah in their midst for a thousand years to come. Nothing short of a Sinaitic demonstration will accomplish this; for Israel is as stiff-necked a people today as thirty-four centuries ago. The battle of Armageddon and the war which it inducts, with all the attendant manifestations of power and great glory, will inaugurate, with all-subduing majesty, Jehovah's king in Zion, the hill of His holiness. The mediatorship will then have reappeared in Israel under the new covenant, dedicated upwards of eighteen centuries before by the blood of the Mediator, who speaks the words commanded of the Father in sending forth the amended law from Zion, and the word of Jehovah from Jerusalem—Isaiah 2: 3; not to Israel only, but to the residue of men who then seek after the Lord, and to all the nations called by his name—Acts 15: 17. Great, glorious, and free, will Israel then be in the midst of enlightened, obedient, and happy nations. The Kingdom of God, for which Jesus taught his apostle to pray, will have come to Zion, and his Father's will performed on earth as it is in heaven. As the woman's seed he will have bruised the serpent's head, and have delivered his brethren from evil, because the kingdom is his, the power and the glory for ever, amen.

Thus then will the amended law be ordained by Jehovah in the hand of Jesus, the Mediator of the New Covenant, —even the law initiated by Moses for a single nation; but perfected and adapted to a consociation of all nations, by the prophet like unto him, the future king and lord of all the earth —Zechariah 14: 9. When that which is perfect hath come, the ordering of things terrestrial will have obtained the permanency of a thousand years, as exhibited in the following descending series: —

JEHOVAH,

Lord of the boundless universe;
Dwelling in unapproachable light;
Whom no man hath seen, or can see and live:

JESUS,

Jehovah's High Priest and King over all the Earth on David's Throne in Zion:

THE SAINTS,

Associates with Jesus in the enlightenment
And government of the world:

LEVITICAL PRIESTHOOD,

Priests to Israel and the Gentiles who come Up to worship Jehovah at the Temple in Jerusalem:

TWELVE TRIBES OF ISRAEL,

The Kingdom of God, or Jehovah's First Born of the many nations constituted His

“THE ANGELICAL SOCIETY.”

(A Society for the transformation of the “immortal souls” of babies into “guardian angels” in Sky-kingdomia.) —Editor

And now, the better to understand “Romanism as it is,” let us look at the way in which it expends its pecuniary resources in places where it is free from the control of Protestantism, and the restraints of the general spirit of the age. In the Chinese missions, Perrocheau, vicar apostolic of Su-tchuen, under date September 4th, 1848, writes to the conductors of the society for the propagation of the faith at Rome, in the following terms:

“In spite of the obstacles which the mandarins throw in the way of the conversion of the infidels, we have received as catechumens 1,280 neophytes, and baptised 888 adults in the year. God be praised. But our angelical society it is which gives us the greatest consolation. The number of the children of the infidels baptised in danger of death continues constantly to increase; this year it amounts to 84,416, about two-thirds of whom, already in possession of unutterable felicity, will love and praise God eternally. The more we receive aid from Europe, the more will this work extend its benefits. We have opened in several cities, small shops where Christian (catholic) physicians gratuitously distribute pills for young persons who are sick, and generously give attentions of all kinds to the children brought to them. This work produces marvellous effects, causes a very large number to be baptised, and singularly pleases the heathen. In order to explain the prodigious success of our angelical work, you must be informed that all China is covered with poor persons, reduced to the last degree of wretchedness, and burdened with numerous families. Their children lack everything: no food, no clothes, almost no shelter. The mothers die of hunger and cold; the infants they support perish with them. It is these nurses which give an abundant harvest to our baptisers, who seek those poor wretches in preference to others, accost them with kind words, testify a warm interest in their young families, give pills, and sometimes add alms; they are therefore regarded as angels descended from heaven, and are easily allowed to baptise the perishing little ones. Some of our physicians have often effected wonderful cures, and though their skill is small, enjoy extraordinary repute. Hippocrates was not lauded so much. Sponges are here unknown. We fell upon the idea of getting some from Macao, as more convenient than cotton for baptising. The pagans admire these sponges, and regard them as an infallible remedy. They are delighted at seeing the foreheads of their sick children laved with so marvellous an instrument. We hope that next year the number of our baptised infants will reach a hundred thousand; by-and-by it may amount to two hundred thousand a year, if you send us good support. In no other part of the world can your money achieve the salvation of so many souls. After the conversion of China, which contains more than three hundred millions of inhabitants, you may compute the multitude of little Chinese which every year ascend to heaven. In Europe, perhaps, surprise will be felt at so great a disposal of pills in China. But the astonishment will cease as soon as it is known that the Chinese have a taste for medicine just as Europeans have for tea and coffee.”

Lamentable superstition! Children sent direct to heaven by baptism procured by pills! Such is sacramentalism in its full growth. Such maudlin and degrading formalism to be represented as the religion of the Saviour of the world: and to be substituted here and in all protestant lands for the vital practical faith of Cranmer, Leighton, Jeremy Taylor, Barrow, Locke, and Howard! How little do these Romish fatuities differ from fetishism! A venerated pill, and a miraculous sponge, as means of effecting Christian conversions! Other resources of the same unworthy kind are employed. Thus in the missions of Tong-King, the Romish bishop and vicar apostolic, Retord, after reporting the baptisms, during the year 1849, of 9,649 infants of the infidels, states as among the causes of this success the following: —

“A collection is made, and a small capital acquired. This capital is employed in trade, or laid out in the purchase of a piece of land. With the income we purchase boards to make coffins, and religious and funeral tokens; then, when the children of the pagans die, the society gives them a solemn interment, with music, and a drum and a troop of little children of both sexes who follow the procession. The heathens are ravished with this pomp; so that when one of their children falls sick, they, of their own accord, intreat us to go and baptise it. There is in the mission at present a great zeal for this work: but to sustain this ardour, I must get many books, images, and chaplets made. All the objects of the kind you have sent me are used for the purpose. But they are not enough. I am getting made here many chaplets for this purpose. Nevertheless, we shall never reach the number of baptisms in China, for the people here are very fond of their children.”

The dumb show of a funeral parade a means of conversion! A drum and fife beating up for infant recruits in the army of Christ! Images in place of the primer! Chaplets over a tomb instead of the word of the living God in the heart! Yet only comparative success; for the parents “love their children” and, hence it would seem, are anxious to save them from this parade and mummerly. And in China the saved souls are so numerous because parents do not love their children! In other words, they care not what becomes of them; and therefore let them fall into the hands of the Romanists. No matter, being in those hands, and being baptised by those hands, they pass at once from earth to heaven! This is sacramentalism in all its destructiveness. No! there is no qualification in the absurdity. Witness the words which follow, and which proceeded from another missionary bishop and vicar apostolic, “Miche, bishop of Dansare:”—

“When on the point of separating from these savages, I perceived a woman carelessly stretched on a mat, and near her lay an infant which was at her breast. This poor creature, about a year old, was nothing but skin and bone. A part of its body, devoured by scrofula, was a prey to putrefaction, and exhaled a fetid odour. I told the mother that I could do her child good, and begged her to take it into her arms. Then I baptised that poor little one, of its tribe the first-born for heaven. May that child, predestined for celestial bliss, when once in possession of eternal happiness, intercede with Jesus Christ in favour of his countrymen, and become the guardian angel of his nation.”

This poor, wretched, dying child “the guardian angel of his nation!” Well, he might be as fit and render services as good as many others who hold the same post in the Romish hierarchy of heaven. St. George, the guardian angel of England, should be worshipped blindfold, if he is to have worshippers at all. In this particular of guardian angels we find that pagan element which so largely enters into Romanism; and both pervades and pollutes the whole system. Repeatedly does it present itself in the instructions offered to the people in the works which lie before us. In the catechism, entitled Dottrina Cristiana breve, originally composed by Bellarmin at the command of Clement VIII., and in 1839 newly edited and published at Rome, in answer to the question, “Do you not fly for refuge to the other saints besides Mary?” this reply is given by the scholar, “I fly for aid to all the saints, and especially to the saints of my own name, and to my guardian angel.”—Journal of Sacred Literature, pp. 23-25.

The writer of the above thinks it is a lamentable superstition that sends children direct to heaven by baptism procured by pills. And so it is. It is a blasphemous superstition that sends ghosts, adult or juvenile, to heaven, direct or indirect, by baptism or rhanthism procured in any way. But paidorhantist protestants admit the validity of such baptisms, and would not repeat them; for the Romish, they say, is a true church, only corrupt. Its ordinances are therefore valid. If this were denied, it would play havoc with the Christianity of the Reformers; for Luther, Melanethon, Calvin, Knox, &c., had no other than Romish baptisms to constitute them baptised. The baptism being esteemed valid, what boots it how it is procured! Whether “by pills,” or by indoctrinating the parents with superstitious notions about infant-soul-damnation to the flames of hell? The procuration is a mere question of relative absurdity. Pill-procuration, and funeral drum-and-fife parade, are harmless absurdities; and quite as rational an introduction of infant ghosts to the spirit-world as any protestant invention extant. Romanists will not admit unrhanthised infants to funeral honours, and sepulture in consecrated ground; neither will the Church of England Protestants; and both classes believe in the angelisation of their “Immortal Souls!” The Chinese have faith in the pills, because they sometimes cure, but none in their religion; the “outside barbarians” think everything of this; and thereby convict themselves of less sagacity than the Celestials, in re Superstition versus Common Sense. Before ignorant pagans are consigned to eternal torment without one ray of hope, let intelligent professors off the faiths of Antichrist’s dominion, styled “Christendom” by misnomer, ask themselves how they can possibly escape.

What stupid ideas mankind have got into their heads about angels! Angels made out of infant ghosts! And the process, too, of angel manufacture, how thaumaturgical and instantaneous! The following is the receipt: —Let a priest or clergyman take a pagan or outside barbarian of eight days old, and then, dipping his hand, or a sponge, or a piece of cotton, into water, shake or squeeze the same over the face, and sign its forehead with the sign of a cross, repeating the words, “I baptise thee, &c.” After this, it may be pill-poisoned, cast into the Tiber, Thames, or Ganges, &c., or disposed of in any other way resulting in the separating of soul and body, and its immaterial spirit regenerated by the holy water, will fly on the down of an angel’s wing to glory, and expand into an angel there! And this is “the true faith of a Christian,” which qualifies for a seat in the orthodox Parliament of Britain, made up of papists, protestants, and infidels, of all shades of delinquency, to the exclusion of the more rational and conscientious sons of Israel. O, Gentilism, by whatever name expressed, how long shalt thou hoodwink the nations, and betatter the wise and prudent with thy filthy rags! That thy destruction may soon come as a whirlwind from the east, be the effectual and fervent prayer of all who love the truth, and hate hypocrisy and sin.

THE EARTH THE FUTURE DWELLING-PLACE OF THE REDEEMED.

BY R. S. CANDLISH, D. D.

“Let it be well remembered and considered, that the only hope connected with the future world, which Abraham had, was bound up in the promise that he was himself personally to inherit the land. When he went out, at the call of God, not knowing whither he went, it was upon the faith of his receiving an inheritance. When he came into Canaan, he was expressly told that this was the country destined to be his inheritance. But he was also informed that while his descendants, four hundred years after, would possess the land, he was to have no inheritance in it on this side of the grave.

‘He was to go to his fathers in peace, and be buried in a good old age’— Genesis 15: 15.

Still he had the outstanding promise that he himself personally was to inherit the land. He believed, and continued to believe, the promise. But he learned to interpret it as a promise to be fulfilled, not in the life that now is, but in the life that is to come. For he knew that though he was to die before he obtained possession of the land, —and so far God might seem to fail in fulfilling the promise, on the faith of which he had called him out of Charran, —still that God was able to raise him from the dead, and to fulfil the promise in the resurrection state, or, in other words, in the world to come. He acquiesced in that arrangement. He was reconciled to it. He reposed in it. He would willingly consent to the postponement of the promise, so that he should have his inheritance in the new heavens and new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness, rather than in this earthly Canaan, as it now subsists, where, at the very best, all is vanity.

“Still, let it be observed, it is the promise of that very earthly Canaan which alone is the foundation of Abraham’s hope for eternity. There is no trace, no hint, in all the patriarch’s history, of any other promise whatever, relating to the world to come. It is scarcely possible to entertain a doubt on this point. What Abraham was taught to expect was the inheritance of the very soil on which he trod, for so many long years of pilgrimage, as a mere stranger and sojourner. It was to be his at last.

“Nor was it to belong to him in any remote and indirect sense merely,—and as he might be held to be represented by a nation that after all never got full and absolute possession of it. For the Israelites, at the best, were but tenants in the land—tenants at will upon their good behaviour, as God expressly testifies, using the very expression:

‘The land is mine; for ye are strangers and sojourners with me’—
Leviticus 25: 23.

It was to himself personally that the land was to be given as an inheritance—to himself, as an individual believer, and as it were in his own right. That very land was to be his inheritance. But when? Not in this state of being, in which man is himself mortal, and the ground is cursed for man’s sake. But in that other state of being, in which this mortal has put on immortality, and the face of the earth is renewed. *

* There is confusion of ideas in Dr. Candlish’s mind here. The curse is not removed until a thousand years after Abraham and the righteous have put on immortality. “The state of being,” or the present, is scripturally contrasted with “that other state of being” which obtains in the Millennium, or world to come. —Editor Herald of the Kingdom.

“Yes! It is when death is swallowed up in victory—it is when the dead in Christ are raised—it is when this globe, already baptised with water, has undergone its final baptism of fire—it is then that the patriarch is to possess the land. * And then at last in the possession of it, —being himself raised incorruptible, and receiving his portion in the renovated earth—receiving it, moreover, for an everlasting inheritance, —then is he to reap the reward of all his work of faith, and labour of love, and patience of hope here below, in God’s open acknowledgment of him as a son, and therefore an heir—an heir of God and joint-heir with Christ, —as well as in the full enjoyment of God throughout the ages of eternity.

“Such, as it would seem, was Abraham’s high and heavenly hope—a hope heavenly, in one sense, as having respect to the world to come—the heavenly or resurrection state; but yet, in another sense, having a substantial local habitation in the new earth, in which, as well as in the new heavens, righteousness is to dwell. * *

“And now, does not this hope give a peculiar and precious meaning to Abraham’s determination that Sarah shall not be buried in a strange, or in a hired, or even in a lent or gifted tomb, but in a sepulchre, most strictly and absolutely his own. He is taking infetment in his inheritance. It belongs not to him living. But it belongs to him, and to his, when dead: While he is alive in this world, he has no interest in the land, but to walk in it as a stranger and pilgrim—to ‘walk before God, and be perfect.’ But death gives to him, and to his, a title to it; and he will vindicate that title for his dead. Living, he can but use it as the strange country of his pilgrimage; but when dead, he claims all proprietor’s right in it, and his kindred dust is entitled to repose in it as a home.”

* This is an error. The globe is not to be baptised with fire at the appearing of Christ, though the goat-nations are—that is, with a baptism of fiery indignation manifested through war, pestilence, desolation, and famine. The “final baptism of fire” is at the epoch of the removal of the curse, and the destruction of the devil, who shall have been previously bound for a thousand years.

* * A new heavens and a new earth is a phrase signifying a new civil, ecclesiastical, and spiritual constitution of Israel and the nations. It continues 1,000 years, and is then succeeded by another which is unchangeable.

A WORD FITLY SPOKEN.

“There is a generation that are pure in their own eyes, and yet is not washed from their filthiness.”—Proverbs.

Dear Brother, —May I be permitted through you, to express a few thoughts to our fellow-believers of the glorious gospel of salvation.

The close of one year and the commencement of another, are generally regarded by persons of every class with some feeling of interest. The children of this world mark the season according to their different dispositions—the gay with increased gaiety, the devout with increased devotion; shall we then, the children of light, suffer such a period to pass unnoticed, we to whom every year is fraught with things of the deepest interest seeing that our relationship is not merely with such things as are “passing away,” but that we are so closely allied with the invisible and eternal? The past year, to many of us, has been one of trial and of change. Some dear ones have been hidden from our eyes in the dark cold grave—some have been stricken, but not unto death: yet we are called upon to give thanks alike for those who are fallen asleep in Jesus, and for such of us as are yet spared to improve the talents wherewith we are entrusted. Doubtless, the future year will bring its individual trials and sorrows, but may we not look for something more? The death-like calm that has, for some time, seemed to hush the vast sea of nations, cannot be expected to last much longer. Peace may smile on the opening year, but is it not a false and a fleeting smile? May we not, ere its close, see the sword unsheathed wherewith the Lord will subdue all things unto himself? Will not the storm have begun which must rage in unremitting fury, till every high thing shall be uprooted and extinguished that exalts itself in opposition to Jehovah? In view of these probabilities, doth it not become such as are enlightened with the knowledge of God, to look to their own position? “Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments”—much need have we to wrap them tightly about us when we see the storm clouds gathering in the distance. “Look to yourselves that ye lose not those things which ye have wrought, but that ye receive a full reward,” seems a word in season to all the saints of God. “The time is short,” so that we all need to do at once whatever we can to improve our talents, thus increasing our honours. What we can do for the truth should be done now, lest the time pass by and find us in the position of “the unprofitable servant.” I would, dear brother, say to all who are in Christ Jesus, let us not, for lack of exertion, run the risk of losing that bright destiny which awaits the faithful. And, truly, what a destiny is ours! To be exalted to the high places of the earth—to take our part as princely potentates in the grand and universal empire of David’s Son and Lord, which is soon to supersede the pigmy and unstable governments now existent. “Behold I come quickly,” saith our unseen and beloved Lord. Do not our hearts respond, “Even so come, Lord Jesus?” Blessed, thrice blessed, the heart whose breathings are thus in unison with the Lord’s own mind and will. But, dear brother, I greatly fear that all who believe and know the truth cannot thus “look for, and haste unto the coming of the day of God.” I speak of such as profess to believe the one true gospel, yet have not obeyed it. Their conduct is to me perfectly incomprehensible. If they believe it to be the truth, wherefore linger in obedience? We cannot address them in the words of Elijah, “How long halt ye between two opinions?” seeing their opinion is, decidedly, that the gospel of the kingdom is the one gospel, concerning which an apostle saith, “If we or an angel from heaven preach any other gospel, let him be accursed!” They acknowledge, also, that the baptism into the name of Jesus of one who believes this gospel, is the only way to obtain remission of sins. In opinion they hesitate not to express themselves on the Lord’s side, but wherefore enlist they not under the banner of our salvation? We may, indeed, say to them as Ananias to Paul, “Why tarry? Arise and be baptised, and wash away your sins, invoking the name of the Lord.” Believers of the glorious gospel of God, yet disobedient thereto! Is it so light a matter to rest under the condemnation of the Most High? Are ye so in love with your sins that ye remain content therein? Wherefore do ye not hasten to put on Christ Jesus? Grovelling, indeed, would ye think the beggar clad in filthy rags who would refuse to change them for clean and wholesome clothing, and behold what a garment is suffering to lie neglected by you, even that name which is above every name, with all its attributes and privileges! Ye know that He comes to take vengeance on them that OBEY not the Gospel, and yet do ye linger from day to day, and month to month, yea some even from year to year, knowing but not doing. What sort of love for the Lord Jesus is shown in remaining disunited from him? Is the sense of reconciliation with God, and the answer of a good conscience so small a boon? Oh, surely the closing year may see an end to such delay! Surely many weeks of the new one may not pass ere all who believe the truth may be found clothed with it! I am sure that you, dear brother, who labour so much in the Lord, would join in the above words of expostulation to the apparently faint-hearted and lukewarm, and I feel convinced that you and all our brethren and sisters in the Lord would rejoice to see an end to such unaccountable conduct. In conclusion, I desire to say to all who are in Christ Jesus—Let us continually rejoice in the Lord—let us see that we abide in Him, “for we are made partakers of Christ if we hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end.” Scattered we may be, and are, even to the four winds of heaven, but our hearts are one in Him, and whether our lot be cast in the crowded scenes of civilised life or in the new and enterprising regions of the south and the far west, we know that it is our own fault if our path be not “as the shining light which shineth more and more unto the perfect day.” And to you, dear brother, in congratulating you on having been the means of usefulness to so many, allow me to express my earnest prayer and desire, that you may be the honoured instrument of adding more jewels to the diadem of your Lord, so that they may be to you a joy in the day of His appearing. You have much to contend with and many trials, but “He that now goeth forth and weepeth bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again, with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him.” Trusting that you and all of us called to be saints, may, in the storm that is about to burst, be hidden in the hollow of Jehovah’s hand, until He again shall “make the storm a calm, so that the waves thereof be still,” and that then we may enter abundantly into the joy of our Lord.

I remain, yours in Christ Jesus,

ARISTOBULUS.

ENGLAND, December 10, 1852.

OUR FUTURE POST-OFFICE.

MOTT HAVEN, WESTCHESTER, NEW YORK.

MOTT HAVEN is a suburb of New York city at the termini of the Third and Fourth Avenues, and divided from Manhattan Island (the whole of which is subject to that municipality) by the Harlem River. It is about eight miles from the City Hall, which can be traversed by omnibus to Harlem bridge, less than a mile distant from the village; or by rail every half-hour from the city station on the Bowery. An hour and a half is about the time occupied in going to and from the city to Mott Haven, which is quite a pleasant locality on the New York and New Haven Railroad.

It is at this suburban village that I have found a domicil, where it is my present intention to reside, if spared, until the Lord comes, which, from the signs of the times, cannot be a very distant event. When “at home,” then, as the phrase is, I am at Cottage-street, Mott Haven, Westchester, New York. After the receipt of this number of the Herald, all letters and papers for the editor must be sent post-paid to that address. They are no longer to be sent to 234 Wooster-street, which is six miles off, but to Mott Haven as above. Owing to the cheap, frequent, and rapid communication established by omnibus and rail with the city, I shall be enabled, when at home, to cooperate with the friends of the Kingdom’s gospel there. Though few feeble as yet, they have deemed it a duty and privilege to do what is possible in bringing the word before the public. To accomplish this they have taken a hall, and announced their purpose in the city papers to their fellow-citizens in the following words: —

“Israel’s Hope, or the Kingdom and Age to Come. —Chelsea Hall, 186 West Eighteenth-street, will be opened on Lord’s day, December 19, for the weekly exposition of this great subject, and as a place of worship for those who believe therein. The mornings will be occupied from half-past ten to half-past twelve in scripture reading and interpretation, “breaking of bread,” and prayers; the afternoons, from three till five, in the exhibition of “the things of the Kingdom of God, and the Name of Jesus Christ,” (Acts 8:

12,) usually by Dr. John Thomas, (late of Virginia,) the well-known author of Elpis Israel, and editor of the Herald of the Kingdom and Age to Come; and the evenings from half-past seven till nine for the investigation of important scriptural questions. To these several meetings that portion of the public is respectfully invited which is of a Berean mind, and desires to know what must be believed and done to the obtaining of eternal life.” In addition to this they have struck off the following bill for circulation in the vicinity of the hall:

“Salvation is of the Jews.”

To all that are heavy laden and oppressed.

That portion of the public interested in the Holy Scriptures, and desirous to know what they reveal concerning the destiny of Man and the Earth he inhabits, is respectfully informed that has been engaged as a place of worship and instruction where inquirers can be accommodated every Sunday, and addressed on their important and wonderful contents. Jesus Christ, who is “KING OF THE JEWS,” in saying that salvation is of that people, has indorsed Israel’s hope as true. Now Paul saith there is “One hope of the calling”—Ephesians 4: 4, and defines that calling or invitation to be to God’s Kingdom and Glory—1 Thessalonians 2: 12. Israel’s hope is therefore the “one hope” exhibited in the Bible—the only one, in fact, that in its manifestation can redeem the believer from the power of death, and cause the nations to sing for joy. How important, then, that it should be understood; for “without faith,” which “is the substance of things hoped for”—Hebrews 11: 1, no man can please the Lord.

CHELSEA HALL,

186 West-Eighteenth-street,

The meetings commence at half-past ten in the morning; three in the afternoon; and half-past seven at night. In the afternoon Dr. J. Thomas (late of Virginia) will usually speak. The evening meetings will be devoted to the free investigation of important scriptural subjects.

SCRIPTURE INVESTIGATION MEETING.

“Prove all things, and hold fast that which is good.”—Paul.

In accordance with the above notice meeting was held thrice at Chelsea Hall for the first time on December 19. In the afternoon I addressed about sixty people there on the 19th of Luke, dwelling principally upon salvation coming to the house of Zaccheus “forasmuch as he was a son of Abraham;” and upon the partial accomplishment of Zechariah 9: 9-11, in the entrance of Jesus, Zion’s king, into Jerusalem, “riding upon a colt the foal of an ass.”

In the evening I spoke to them on the fearful consequences of ignorance, and the blessed effects of the right use of the knowledge of God’s truth. This was demonstrated by reference to the passage read at the beginning, in which Paul tells the Thessalonian disciples that “he would not have them ignorant,” and exhorts them to “prove all things;” and for the reason given in his letter to the Ephesians, namely, because that a darkened understanding alienates from the life of God, and hardens the heart against all that he approves. Eschew ignorance of the truth, then, as a man in love with life would avoid death. “Buy the truth,” therefore, if it can be procured in no other way, and seize on every opportunity Providence presents of making it your own. “If the gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost.” This is tantamount to saying that the ignorant are lost if they continue ignorant, for if the gospel be hid from a man he is ignorant of it. He does not believe it, and therefore cannot be saved, as the Lord Jesus has affirmed. How perilous and damnable a thing is ignorance! When voluntary it is punishable, when helpless it is pitiable, but still alienating from the life of God. This is the natural condition of all the sons of Adam. Ignorant of that system of truth which the Bible teaches, they are all heirs of death interminable. “In the congregation of the dead they shall remain.” Ignorance is degrading—it is soul-degrading; it is a horrible, an awful thing. Look at savage men on the isles afar off. Nay, look at the savages at home—in the purlieus of this city, and then say if ignorance of the knowledge of God be not the great brutaliser of the human heart. What rational man, then, would continue ignorant when knowledge is brought to his very door? It is offered to you. You are invited to come to this place every Sunday night, and in a free and friendly manner to examine what the Scriptures teach, to make you “wise unto salvation.”

Thus we spoke with respect to ignorance and its consequences. I then presented the brighter view unfolded by the Scripture testimony concerning knowledge, and its divine results when rightly used.

“This is eternal life, to know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent.”

“Search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life; and they are they which testify of me.”

These were the Scriptures of Moses and the prophets; for when Jesus spake the words there was no New Testament extant. Of these same Scriptures Paul said to Timothy,

“Thou hast known them from a child, and they are able to make thee wise unto salvation through the faith which is in Christ Jesus.”

The knowledge they reveal is wonderful in its nature and in its influence upon the heart of man. It is miracle-working. It can slay the old Adam, and compel one to put him off with his deeds; and create a new man instead after the image of God who hath revealed it. The Colossians were at one time mere children of the flesh, subject to the thinking of the flesh, and doers of its deeds. But Paul carried the Kingdom’s gospel to them. They believed it, and obeyed it too; and so put on the second Adam, becoming new men in him, as saith the apostle,

“Ye have put off the old man with his deeds; and have put on the new, which is renewed by knowledge after the image of him that created him.”

Thus they became “partakers of the divine nature.” Not by the belief of mere facts, for they will renew no man. This is manifest from daily observation. The wretched papist who worships dead men’s ghosts and bones, and saint-idols, believes, or rather credits the word of his priest, who tells him that one Jesus lived in the days of a certain Pontius Pilate, the Son of God by the blessed Virgin, who was crucified, dead and buried, and rose again on the third day, and then ascended to the right hand of God, where he has been ever since. But this credence has no renewing effect upon his heart any more than it hath upon the hearts of Protestants who luxuriate in all earthly things, and enjoy a pious siesta in “the dim religious light” of some fashionable conventicle once a week. The renewing knowledge of God propounds something more heart-renovating than “sacred history;” it plants within us full assurance of faith in the exceeding great and precious promises he has made in regard to his kingdom and glory. “By these”—by faith in these, the apostle Peter avers it is, that men become partakers of the divine nature—not by the breathing of a particle of the divine essence into a babe’s nostrils, but by a rational and intelligent man’s hearty belief in the covenants of promise, that a goodness of disposition is elaborated such as was in the man Christ Jesus, the image of the invisible God, whose nature was strikingly displayed in his character before the eyes of men. Who, then, that aspires to the dignity of divine manhood would continue in ignorance of the exceeding great and precious promises of God? Who would neglect to search the Scriptures where they may be found? Far be it from any listening to my voice this night. Rather let us assemble here with all diligence, and help one another and ourselves to understand the words of God, and he will aid us; for God helps those who help themselves. The book of his testimony is in our hands. The leaders off the people are confessedly unable to expound or interpret it. Shall we perish for lack of knowledge because of their incompetency? Nay, my friends, if they be content to dream away their lives in the strong delusion of ignorance, let us be up and doing. You are invited, be ye Papist, Protestant, Infidel, or Jew, to meet here every Sunday evening at half-past seven to examine the Scriptures. Not to dispute about theories, or to propound crotchets; but to search into God’s knowledge that you may come to understand the truth and be saved by it.

Will you accept the invitation? Can you find it in your hearts to refuse a call so beneficial to yourselves? While many are running to and fro, and knowledge is increasing on every side, a feature so characteristic of the times in which we live, denoting that “the time of the end” is come, can you consent to stand still, and to remain without understanding in “the deep things of God,” which every one must do who contents himself with the pulpit oratory of the day, and does not search the Scriptures with a Berean mind? What extraordinary encouragement is set before us to become wise!

“The wise shall inherit glory.”

“They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever.”

As we have seen, “the Scriptures,” that is, Moses and the prophets, elucidated in part by the writings of the apostles, “are able to make us wise,” if we will study them, and it is written that “the wise shall understand.”

Now, to afford you such facilities to this end as we can command, or place at your disposal, we have taken this hall. Compared with the palatial temples of this city, it is a very humble and insignificant place. It is, however, the best accommodation we can offer you at present. It is water-tight, capable of being well warmed, and is well lighted by day and night. The truth resides not in palaces and stately mansions, and its friends have been for the most part less comfortably and conveniently housed than in this room. We think it will answer the present purpose, and prove no obstacle to the acquisition of the truth.

Next Lord’s day evening, then, we propose to meet here to commence our free and friendly examination of the Holy Scriptures. The chair will be taken precisely at half-past seven by one appointed by the society which has rented the hall. The members will sing a hymn, and one whom the chair shall invite will offer prayer to God for a blessing upon our endeavours to understand his word. After this the Scripture investigation meeting will be considered as opened. The chairman will then read the portion of Scripture to be examined, upon which he will invite any one present, who believes that the Bible is a true and faithful record of the past, and an infallible exponent of God’s purposes in regard to the future, to favour the audience with what appears to him to be the obvious meaning of the passage. He may occupy as much time as he pleases not exceeding fifteen minutes; at the expiration of which he will give place to another, who will conform to the same regulation. Speakers will be careful to expound, not to dispute. They will be expected to explain the passage read as they best can without criticising the expositions of those who have preceded them, for they must remember that the meeting is an assembly of learners, not of teachers—the only teacher recognised being the word itself. This is the only doctrinal authority admissible; hence every exposition to be convincing must be sustained in all its points by a “thus it is written,” and a “thus saith the Lord,” in the plain, grammatical, parallel, and contextual signification of the words. After the passage has been sufficiently handled, the chairman will then present his understanding of the matter, which will close the subject for the evening. He will then notify the audience what will be the topic or passage for consideration at the next meeting, that individuals may think over it during the week, so that they may not rise to speak without reflection. The members will then sing, and the meeting will be dismissed with thanks to God through the Lord Jesus Christ for his word, and the privilege enjoyed of thus publicly investigating it in security and peace.

Having spoken to this effect, we announced the first chapter of Genesis as the portion to be examined at our next meeting. We then sang a hymn, and having supplicated the blessing of God, dispersed to our several abodes, very well satisfied with the commencement we had made in this great heart of the American Union.

THE FRENCH EMPIRE.

“SPIRITS OF DEMONS DOING WONDERS.”

BY THE EDITOR.

The text at the head of this article occurs in Revelation 16: 14, and signifies the same thing as “unclean spirits” in the preceding verse. An unclean spirit is a power, or political jurisdiction or influence paramount in a country. I do not mean to say that “unclean spirit” would be correctly defined thus in all texts where it occurs; but this I do say, that when the phrase occurs in a prophecy which treats of things political, it signifies a potential influence belonging to some particular government.

This use of the phrase is manifest in Zechariah’s prophecy of the deliverance of Israel’s land from the desolating abomination at the time when Judah “shall look on him whom they have pierced and mourn for Him”—Zechariah 13: 2. His words are—

“And it shall come to pass in that day, saith the Lord of hosts, that I shall cut off the names of the idols out of the land, and they shall no more be remembered: and also I will cause the prophets and the Unclean Spirit to pass out of the land.”

It is clear that this still refers to the future, seeing that “the names of the idols” are yet remembered in Israel’s land. The “images of the saints” are still worshipped or remembered there by Catholics, Latin, Greek and Armenian. Their prophets pervade the land, “speaking lies in the name of the Lord,” and the “Unclean Spirit” protects them in their ministrations from destruction by each other’s hands. This is the present condition of Palestine, but as the prophet teaches, not its final one. The Ottoman, nor the power destined to supersede him for a short time, is not always to reign lord paramount there. It is to “pass out of the land,” and to defile it no more for ever.

The answer to the question then, “What is the unclean spirit now in Israel’s land?” is that it is the Ottoman power’s, which power is for the time being answerable to the Dragon, out of whose “mouth,” or government, an unclean spirit is seen by John to go forth. Three unclean spirits are three political emanations or policies proceeding from those several governments exercising jurisdiction over the territory off the Great City, known in history as the Roman Empire. Rome, Constantinople, and Vienna, are the seats or thrones of these dominions, symbolised by the Dragon, the Beast, and the False Prophet. Their heads, or chiefs, are the daemons, (not devils) who enunciate the “spirits” characterised as “unclean.” They are evil demons because the spirits that issue from them are unclean, and consequently unholy. The Emperor of Turkey, the Emperor of Austria, and the Pope, are the genii or demons, who preside over the utterances of the symbols indicated; and if the reader have been observant of old-world affairs for the last four years, he will not have failed to remark, that their “spirits,” or several policies, have been and continue to be, originated and shaped by the movements of the French nation, the symbol of which I have before shown to be THREE FROGS. For this reason John styles them, like to Frogs—policies, Turkish, Austrian, and Papal, adopted in consequence of events in France.

These three Frog-like Spirits of Demons are said by the apostle to be miracle-workers; that is, poiounta semeia, demon-spirits, effecting prodigies. In Revelation 13:13, the Two-Horned Beast is said to “do great wonders,” (seemeia,) which in the next verse are termed “those miracles which (ta seemeia ha) he had power to do in the presence of the Beast” with ten horns. This power of the two-horned dominion to work prodigies was manifested in its “causing fire to descend from the heaven,” by which it compelled the dwellers upon the earth out of which it arose, to set up an Image of the Sixth or Imperial Head of the ten-horned dominion; which image it so energised by its power as to enable it to speak, and cause to kill the rebellious. History shows that this was effected by prodigious wars—the fire descending from the heaven; which is the apocalyptic mode of representing war originating from the powers that be. Paul refers to seemeia of this kind in speaking of the appearing of the lawless power, when he says its coming is according to the energy of the Satan in all authority, (dynameis,) and prodigies, (seemeia,) and false miracles, (terasi pseudous;)—political authority, wars, and falsehood of every kind, emanating from the civil and ecclesiastical Satan, or adversary of the saints, are the well-known historic energy which has established the two-horned and image, or Little-Horn-of-the-West, dominion existing upon the earth, or Holy Roman territory, at this day.

The middle-age image of the old pagan Roman imperality being set up and vitalised, it becomes a worker of prodigies in its turn. In Revelation 16 and 19 its mouth is styled "the False Prophet," and is, in the latter text, said to "have worked the prodigies in the presence of the Beast" with two horns; that is, by its policy it has involved the two-horned dominion in wars with other powers, ultimating in great changes, and them with it.

The mission of the three Frog-excited spirits is warlike. They are to "go forth to the kings of the earth and of the whole habitable (tees oikoumenees holees,) to gather them together for the war (eis polemon) of that great day of the Almighty God." Their sending thus defined presents them with an arena coextensive with the Turkish, Austrian, and French empires, together with the kingdom and principalities of papal and protestant Europe. An imbroglio will be formed from which no European state will be exempt. Its results will be politically wonderful, the earnest of which is found in the rapid and extraordinary resurrection of the Napoleon empire. The Frog-power has proved itself wonder-working in the development of its own imperality; we need not therefore be incredulous or surprised at the idea of future and greater wonders being manifested as the result of its policy antagonised by the daemons of Constantinople, Vienna, and Rome.

Wonder-working is characteristic of the times. The revolutions of 1848 were extraordinary. They proposed results which have remarkably and signally failed in every instance. After the shaking the thrones experienced, the triumphs of absolutism must astonish even the tyrants themselves. The people have accomplished nothing they desired, and the governments have succeeded beyond their most sanguine expectations: the purpose of God alone has progressed in the confusion of the times. That purpose has been the re-establishment of the French Empire, which, as I have already shown, is the democracy armed and imperialised. L'empire c'est la paix—"the empire is peace"—is the mission proclaimed for it by its chief. But this, like all the public professions of Louis Napoleon, is unworthy of belief. The empire is war and not peace. “There is no peace for the wicked, saith God.” He hath revived it in his providence as his sword, which he is about to bathe in the blood of nations. The time has come to gather their armies against Jerusalem, and the resuscitation of this empire, which was never peace, is the preparation initiative of that tumult of the world whose uproar will at length encompass the holy city.

But the end is not immediately. The map of Europe must be first politically changed. That is, Belgium, Spain, Portugal, Sardinia, Naples, Switzerland, the States of the Church, the Italian States and Principalities, and Greece, are to be distributed temporarily among three imperial rivals. The treaties of 1815 will be repudiated, and the old Roman territory subdivided into three parts. This is deducible from the saying which is written, “And the Great City was divided into three parts.” Peace cannot effect this. Wars, and they desolating ones too, must supervene. The policy of the new empire will disturb everything, and leave nothing settled but the purpose of God. Already the shadow of coming events may be discerned. Since writing our article on the Tripartite Division of the Great City, its territory acknowledges the sway of three emperors. His Highness the Sultan of the Sublime Porte has changed his title to that of Emperor of Turkey; and the President of the imperial republic has assumed the style of Emperor of the French. So that, with the Emperor of Austria, there are now three to claim imperial sovereignty over the rest of Europe. In the coming strife, however, the Sultan will doubtless give place to the autocrat of Russia, whose manifest destiny is to overshadow and eclipse the glory of the other two. The shock of embattled hosts must be fearful ere this conclusion can be arrived at. But it is inevitable. No peace policy can be devised by the powers to avert this war. It must come. God has not prospered Louis Napoleon’s policy for the advantage of Napoleon the Third; but for the execution of that purpose represented in the going forth of the unclean spirits like frogs to the kings of the earth.

The French Empire, then, is not to be regarded as an olive branch, but as a great sword, with which the angels of God (to whom is subjected the present world, and whose administration is His providence) are about to advance him in affairs another stage toward the fulfilment of the times of the Gentiles. French intrigues in Belgium, Sardinia, and Constantinople are bringing the hands of the world's rulers to their swords' grasp, by which they are in motion towards the preparation of that war to which they are exhorted by the prophet Joel—Joel 3: 9-17—a war which is begun by the policy of the Frog-power, and terminated by the King of Israel and the saints, whose hope he is, as well as the strength of Israel's tribes. The French Empire is a meteor. It will blaze forth with dazzling lustre to be extinguished in the blackness of darkness for ever. Its mission accomplished, and it will perish to rise no more. When "the cities of the nations fall," its overthrow will be imminent, and its "mountain" a dissolving view.

There are some expecting the appearing of the Lord, and the resurrection of the dead in 1853. They will find this expectation as fallacious as that of 1843. They err, not knowing the Scriptures concerning "the time of the end." The event is not far off, but it is not so near as we would have it. The work of dividing the great city into three parts will take time. Host will encounter host, and many battles fought and victories won, ere such a subdivision will be acquiesced in by the powers that be. After this the fall of the nations' cities supervenes, by which the formation of the Feet of Nebuchadnezzar's Image is effected, and the Toes attached to them. The seat of war is then transferred to Israel's land, and Jerusalem is besieged and taken by the army of the Goat-nations confederated under Gog. When these predicted events have become history, there will then be reason in the expectation of the immediate, the daily, appearing of the Son of Man in power and great glory. The great thing for the believer to attend to now is preparation for appearance in his august presence. No one, however pious, is fit to stand there who has not obeyed "the gospel of the kingdom," as well as believed it. Put on the wedding garment and keep it clean, if you would be approved when the Lord comes. How readest thou the wholesome words of Jesus? Is there such a passage in the book of God as be immersed and believe the gospel, or "He that is immersed and believeth shall be saved?" No. Faith in the kingdom's gospel must precede immersion if you would be invested with God's robe; styled in his word—

"The righteousness of God witnessed by the law and the prophets; even the righteousness of God which is through faith of Jesus Christ to all and upon all that believe”—Romans 3: 21-22.

Blessed are such who watch, having garments to cover them when the Lord appears. Being wise, they will understand and discern these portentous times aright.

ELPIS ISRAEL'S WANDERING STAR.

The Bethanian Professor of “Sacred History”—Divinity says, that “the Wandering Star of ‘Elpis Israel,’” has had “administered to him his second or third baptism;” and predicts that the administrator “may yet dispense to him another into repentance of all his day-dreams about a returning Lord to the ruins of the old Temple.”

We quote the above from the Millennial Harbinger for September, which has fallen accidentally into our hands. It is another specimen of its sly hits at Elpis Israel, which being invincible, vexes its editor as a prick in his eye, and a thorn in his side. Hopeless of effecting anything against it argumentatively, he shoots his unpointed arrows at its author with the most convenient secrecy. We have given him a copy of the work, and sent him the Herald for six years, being equal to fourteen dollars, yet we cannot obtain from him even a copy of a number in which he unbends his bow with full intent to slay us. Such warfare as this is unfair, and unworthy the pretensions of Mr. Campbell to superior sanctity and intrepidity.

“The wandering star of Elpis Israel,” as he styles us, has been immersed twice, not three times, as he insinuates; and has no intention of being immersed again, though the administrator of his second immersion should sell himself to Bethany for a mess of pottage! For what purpose has Mr. Campbell, in former years, re-immersed persons who applied to him? Why was Mr. Walter Scott, his colleague and former leader, immersed a second time? To speak of more honourable men, why were the twelve Ephesians re-immersed by Paul? Why, but for the simple and obvious reason that they had not believed “the truth” when first immersed. Mr. Campbell has said that “the popular immersion is no better than a Jewish ablution;” and that “the popular preachers preach another baptism.” (Chr. Bapt., page 656.) Will Mr. C. say that the believers of such a gospel and the subjects of such a baptism should be content when they come afterwards to believe the true gospel? That they should not be immersed a second time? That belief of the truth after such an immersion will react upon it, and make that effective which was worthless before? This is too absurd even for him to affirm; on the contrary, in his better days, when he believed in “the Lord’s return to the ruins of the old Temple,” he has said, “The truth to be believed is one thing, and the belief of the truth another. Both are pre-requisites to immersion. The truth must be known and believed before we can be benefited by it— Ibid, page 446. This is precisely what we contend for. When ignorant of “the truth,” we were immersed into what we now see was mere Scotto-Campbellism; but when we came to understand Moses and the prophets, and, by consequence, the writings of the apostles, we attained to the belief also of “the gospel of the kingdom” promised in the Old Testament, and preached in the New. Enlightened by this, we perceived that the Campbellite gospel and baptism administered by their inventor, Mr. Walter Scott, were as much “another gospel and another baptism” as any administered by “the popular preachers;” and believing with Mr. Campbell, that “the truth must be known and believed before we can be benefited by it,” we determined to renounce his baptism as worthless; and to be immersed a second time, that we might be benefited by the gospel of the kingdom then as now assuredly believed. As we have said elsewhere, we repudiate the repetition of an immersion on any other ground than this. If a man have believed “the truth,” that is, the gospel of the kingdom in the name of Jesus as its covenant, priest, and king, before immersion, he should never be immersed again; but if he “understand not the word of the kingdom,” immersion endlessly repeated, will leave him unbaptised, dead in trespasses and sins, and without any scriptural hope of resurrection to eternal life. If such an immersed man come to understand and believe the truth after his immersion in his ignorance, let not such an one deceive himself by supposing his immersion is any better than a Jewish ablution. It is no better. It is utterly worthless; and being convinced of this, we were immersed a second time by one who had been re-immersed, and who declared to us he believed the gospel off the kingdom we desired to obey. We permitted him to do nothing but pronounce the words of Christ, and, having put us under the water, to raise us up again. We confessed to God before we went down into the water, and with our own voice called upon his name. We accepted neither prayer nor exhortation from him; but confined him strictly to the act defined. It is certain, for many reasons, he will never dispense to us in any form or shape again. He is in the hands of him who will deal with him according to his deeds; and there we leave him, being well assured that whatever may become of him, truth will be vindicated, and malice put to shame.

Mr. C.'s supposition of a third immersion into repentance of all our "day-dreams" detailed in Elpis Israel and the Herald, is childish and vain. If our "day-dreams" were to vanish as the morning dew, whither should we turn? Scripture, reason, and experience, all concur in testifying the absurdity of the Bethanian system. We could not, therefore, turn to that as a vision of peace and righteousness. Nor could we turn to any other form of sectarianism, for they are all vanity alike. There is then for us but one alternative—the gospel of the kingdom in Jesus' name, or infidelity. The latter has no charms for us. Twenty years' study of Moses and the prophets, &c., and a constant advocacy of their testimony, have made faith an essential part of our inner man. The gospel promised to Abraham, and preached by Jesus and his apostles, is the bright particular star of our voyage through life. The longitude of our faith is always 55 degrees east from Ferro, where Abraham and his seed sojourned in hope of an everlasting possession there. We dream of this by day. It is a pleasing and a truthful dream; and will not, we trust, vanish from our heart's tablet until its foreshadowed reality shall bless the sight of all the sons of God. Let Mr. Campbell, then, and all other friends of the present world, use their pleasure in blaspheming the Lord's truth, and in heaping injustice and calumny on his brethren who believe it—their time is short: we hold on to Israel's hope, for "Salvation is of the Jews."

AN ASSERTION VERIFIED

Dear Brother, —The three volumes of Elpis Israel arrived safely. We are all exceedingly pleased with the work. C. says he would not take a hundred dollars for his if he could not replace it. He values it higher than all other books, save the Bible, which it renders so intelligible. Oh, how grateful should we be to you for the precious instruction we have received from you by word and writing? But for your instrumentality we should probably have been groping our way along in profound sectarian darkness, looking and praying for the time when no man could say to his neighbour, “Know the Lord;” when the stone “cut out of the mountains without hands” should “fill the whole earth,” and grind the nations to powder, by moral suasion; and in so doing would convert them all, and render them fit subjects for the Messiah’s kingdom! When, lo! utter destruction would have come upon us at unawares! But, we trust, we have seen the truth more perfectly than this; and pray that we may, if not alive at the glorious appearing of the Son of God, have a part in the first resurrection, over whose children “the Second Death hath no power.”

We have great faith in your exposition of the future development of mundane affairs. Well do we recollect your assertion in 1848, contrary to all expectation, that the French Republic would not stand more than four or five years; and how truly have we seen it verified. This, with other indications, have very forcibly impressed us.

May the good Lord guide us, and preserve us all to the glorious appearing of his immaculate Son! And that we may have a part in the resurrection to life, and enjoy his presence as the Light of the New Jerusalem for ever, is the fervent prayer of yours most affectionately in the “One Hope of the calling.”

JOHN OATMAN, SEN.

BASTROP, Texas, March, 1852.

A WORD OF ENCOURAGEMENT.

My Dear Brother, —There is no post-delivery that gives me so much pleasure as that which puts me in possession of your unrivalled periodical. But it grieves me greatly to perceive how inefficient is the patronage it receives. I feel, however, self-condemned that I have myself done no better than hitherto. I request you, therefore, now to forward me three copies of the past volume, being one for each of my children. There are articles in them whose value is far above gold. I have been delighted with them, and have, by their means, apparently enlightened the minds of others. But there it rests at present. Alas for prejudice! You have, however, brought more to the acknowledgment of the truth, than honest old Noah, who, after preaching righteousness a hundred and twenty years, could number only six adherents besides his wife. May we not inquire with Jesus in respect of the gospel of the kingdom, “When the Son of Man comes shall he find faith on the earth?” I have had many disputations, and silenced many disputers of this world, expecting that some fruit would follow; but none appears as yet. As a Baptist who went to Australia from this place some two or three years since, says, in a recent letter concerning the aborigines, that he despaired of their conversion till the Lord came; so may I say of the natives of Linlithgow, of Scotland, yea, of all Britain. They seem all gospel-proof; and the words of Paul are alike applicable to protestant as to papist—

“Because they received not the love of the truth that they might be saved; for this cause God will send them Strong Delusion that they should believe a lie. That all might be condemned who believe not the truth, but have pleasure in unrighteousness.”

Your letter to Kossuth is admirable, and well-timed; but it will not prevent the noble and patriotic Magyar from pursuing his course, any more than your clear elucidation of the gospel of the kingdom will turn men from their false and superstitious notions. But your unwearied and self-denying endeavours must be a great source of satisfaction to your inward man; and, having sowed the good seed, we must wait in hope. Perhaps some great change may take place soon; and I pray you may be spared to see much fruit from your labours ripening for the kingdom. The doctrine you teach is quite new to this generation, whose rust it will take much friction to polish off, that the light of truth may be reflected, although you and I think it so plain and easy to be understood.

I have had a short outline of the gospel of the kingdom sketched out with a view to its publication as a tract. Life is very uncertain, and I have a great desire to leave behind me some mark or demonstration of my attachment to the truth as taught by the prophets and apostles. Many thanks to your writings for directing me to the word of God, by which my mind has been divested of the human tradition which obscured and oppressed it. The title I propose to give is, “The Gospel, or Glad Tidings of the Kingdom of God, briefly exhibited from the statute book of heaven.” I have commenced it in this way—

“Matthew 4: 21. *Jesus went about all Galilee teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the Kingdom.”

“Luke 8: 1. And it came to pass afterwards, that he went throughout every city and village, preaching and showing the glad tidings of the kingdom of God, and the twelve were with him.”

“Luke 9: 2. *And he sent them out to preach the kingdom of God, and to heal the sick. * * * And they departed and went throughout the towns preaching the gospel, and healing everywhere.*”

Then to preach the gospel is to preach the kingdom of God. Therefore, where the kingdom of God is not preached, the gospel is not preached. I then go back to the prophets, beginning with David, and show what the kingdom of God is as preached by Jesus Christ, and afterwards by his apostles.

In conclusion, be not disheartened at the lukewarmness of the Laodiceans; but if it be possible, go on. God in Christ will be your reward. With kind regards to yourself, and the faithful with you, I remain your ever grateful, and, I hope, humble brother in Christ Jesus.

ENCOURAGING ALSO.

Dr. Thomas—Dear Brother—After so long time I have found opportunity to write to you, but have neither time nor strength to say much, it being the first effort after two months' confinement by sickness. I have procured at 234 Wooster Street, New York, two copies of Elpis Israel. I am much pleased with it. There is, I think, more originality in it than in any other book I have read. Why is it that throughout all "Christendom" the prophecies are so strangely neglected? Is it because there is nothing in them to sanction any of the isms of the Gentiles? Your Herald continues to be a rich monthly treat, of which I would on no account be deprived.

I had intended to make some inquiry respecting the financial prospects of the Herald. It ought not and must not be discontinued. Cannot some plan be adopted for its permanent support? How many donors of fifty dollars each will be required to sustain it? If some such course should be thought judicious by you, you may put me down for one fifty. I am very anxious it should be continued, and your pecuniary responsibility diminished, and in some measure relieved.

Write to me on this matter, and believe me your friend and brother.

CAMPBELL WALDO, M. D.

JEKONSHA, CALHOUN, MICHIGAN, November 24, 1852.

REMARKS.

Our friend has no doubt rightly divided the cause of the general neglect of the prophetic writings, which reduce to utter foolishness the faiths which divide, corrupt, and deceive the world. The prophets cannot be understood when scanned through the smoked glasses of pulpit and collegiate divinity. The stand-point of the observer must be on "the word of the kingdom" understood, or he will comprehend nothing of the law and the testimony as he ought to know it. The popular faiths are not located upon this position, but in the low grounds and swamps of the great city, where the fog is too dense to admit the light which shines to the perfect day. Night reigns, with no moon walking in brightness to reflect the radiance of the soon rising Day Star upon their hearts and minds. Surrounding darkness blinds them to the glorious things spoken of Zion by the Spirit of God. Their faiths treat not of these, therefore their ears are deaf, and their eyes are closed against them. There is no affinity between the hope of Zion's children, and the hope of those who have the mark of the beast, and are intoxicated with the cup in the hand of Madam Mystery. They see no sanction in Zion's hope for the wild, sky-kingdom visions of the carnal mind; which, therefore, not only neglects, but proscribes the study of the sure prophetic word as alike unprofitable and dangerous to one's sanity and faith. But our strength is Zion's hope, which is to them weakness and folly. It is consoling, however, to know that it has ever been so. Belial's strength and wisdom, which is the world's, has prevailed, and will prevail until the Ancient of Days comes, and makes bare his holy arm. Zion's weakness and folly will then become strength and wisdom before the world, and extort its admiration and applause. Her sons can well afford to possess their souls in patience: for

They will have a glorious day
When the King of kings comes,

And puts to silence the vain babbling of foolish men against "the Word which he has magnified above all his name."

It is gratifying to an author when he finds his readers pleased with his lucubrations, especially when he knows that they are of the salt which gives savour to the world. This gratification accumulates upon us, and with the more agreeableness as it is accompanied with the assurance that by our writings men are being disenthralled from the slavery of human tradition, and made free in the bonds of the truth. Look at the instances we are continually recording—opponents converted into earnest believers, who appreciate and desire to sustain the truth. We would avoid the invidiousness of particularising them by name. Our readers are not unmindful of them; and it is with pleasure we are enabled to add our friend and brother, Dr. Waldo, to their number. We gratefully accept his offer in behalf of the truth for which we endure hardship, as good soldiers ought to do. When a believer's heart opens his purse in aid of the kingdom's gospel, we rejoice as we would in the succour of a dear friend from some great extremity. The friend is rescued and we are glad. The kingdom's gospel is the truth, and that truth we love, as our self-sacrifice has clearly shown. Were the advocacy of it to fail for want of "filthy lucre," our heart would be pierced as with a javelin. But surely this can never be. It certainly will not if all who profess to believe the truth, and have the means, will imitate the liberality of brethren Lemmon and Waldo. Our endeavours will continue to be devoted to the truth so long as the means are furnished us by its friends. When these cease ours will cease, but not till then. Who will strengthen our hands by following the example of these liberal brethren, the sincerity and earnestness of whose convictions are proved by the unconstrained offerings of their own will? The Herald's expenses for the current year will admit of no promises. The time for action has arrived; and its last words to its friends are, "You must do, or I must die."

SPIRITISM.

Dear Brother: —The Campbellite Disciple Church at Antioch, where I had the pleasure of hearing you once some twelve years ago, is dead; and whether it will be brought to life again I cannot say. Several of the members left for California; but some have since returned. There was no one to take the lead in meetings, so that there has been no meeting since. One of the leaders turned Swedenborgian; a few of his brethren followed, and convened with him. We have heard him; but not being able to discern the "internal meaning" of what he outwardly expresses, we find no inducement to attend. If you have read Swedenborg's works, you know what teaching we had. He is a full believer in the "spirit-knockings," such as are heard in this quarter of our planet. Some six miles hence they have communications from the “spirit-world,” they say; and great numbers are attracted thither. Some say they get direct communications from departed mothers, fathers, sisters, brothers, &c. I have been told that some of the spirit-rappists have called up, or rather called down, the spirit of a worthy sister of ours, who died four years ago in April 1853. She became convinced of the truth that when the Lord Jesus appears in his kingdom, she would awake to everlasting life, and not before. I believe she understand the gospel when she was immersed, expecting to share in the promises made to Abraham, and the others in his Seed, of whom the world is not worthy. Her parents, who are close communion Baptists, regarded me as having converted her to Campbellism. They were mistaken, however; for she was a long way from that powerless form of godliness.

I hope to see you in these parts ere long. Had I the ability of myself to defray your expenses, the want of means should be no obstacle in the way. We are much pleased with the Herald. It is a welcome visitor here. We shall endeavour to assist you in sustaining it. I am pleased to see that some are beginning to appreciate your labours in the gospel, which through your writings have afforded us much light. If the people in this vicinity would peruse them, they would soon be dispossessed of the spirit-knocking demons, which overshadow their intellects with what may be truly styled “the greatest humbug of the age.” With love I remain yours,
In hopes of Eternal Life,

J. D. BENEDICT.

“THE FATHERS.”

Concerning these gentlemen who are regraded by some as the great lights of Christianity, Mr. Chandler says, “It is infinite, it is endless labour to consult all that the Fathers have written, and when we have consulted them, what one controversy have they rationally decided? How few texts of Scripture have they critically settled the sense and meaning of? How often do they differ from one another, and in how many instances from themselves? Those who read them, greatly differ in their interpretation of them, and men of the most contrary sentiments all claim them for their own. Athanasians and Arians all appeal to the Fathers, and support their principles by quotations from them. And are these the venerable gentlemen, whose writings are to be set up in opposition to the Scriptures? Are creeds of their dictating to be submitted to as the only criterion of orthodoxy? or esteemed as standards to distinguish between truth and error? Away with this folly and superstition! The creeds of the Fathers and Councils are but human creeds that have marks in them of human frailty and ignorance.”—Introd. Hist. Inquis.

M J. Barbeyrac declares himself thus concerning them: “The Fathers, you say, whom you regard as the propagators of the Christian Religion, must necessarily have been men of true piety and knowledge; but it has been maintained and proved to you by a great number of instances, that the Fathers have not only fallen into very gross errors, and been most profoundly ignorant of many things which they ought to have known; but, further, that most of them have more or less suffered themselves to be led by passion; so that their conduct has been found frequently to be such as is neither regular nor justifiable.” Again, “In the first ages of Christianity, and those that followed after, the men most applauded, and who bore the greatest character in the church, were not always those that had the greatest share of good sense; or were the most eminent for learning and virtue.”—Hist. Scien. Moral.

GENERAL COUNCILS.

“I think it will evidently follow from this account that the determination of councils and decrees of synods, as to matters of faith, are of no manner of authority, and carry no obligation upon any Christian whatever. I will mention here one reason, which will be itself sufficient if all others were wanting; viz., that they have no power given them in any part of the gospel revelation to make these decisions in controverted points, and oblige others to subscribe to them; and that therefore the pretence to it is an usurpation of what belongs to the great God, who only hath and can have the right to prescribe to the conscience of men. But to let this pass, what one council can be fixed upon that will appear to be composed of such persons, as upon impartial examination can be allowed to be fit for the work of settling the faith, and determining all controversies relating to it? I mean in which the majority of the members may in charity be supposed to be disinterested, wise, learned, peaceable, and pious men? Will any man undertake to affirm this of the Council of Nice? Can any thing be more evident than that the members of that venerable assembly came, many of them, full of passion and resentment; and others of them were crafty and wicked; and others ignorant and weak? Did their meeting together in a synod immediately cure them of their desire for revenge, make the wicked virtuous, or the ignorant wise? If not, their joint decree as a synod could really be of no more weight than their private opinions, nor perhaps of so much; because it is well known that the great transactions of such an assembly are generally managed and conducted by a few; and that authority, persecution, prospect of interest, and other temporal motives, are commonly made use of to secure a majority. The second general council were plainly the creatures of the Emperor Theodosius, all of his party, and convened to do as he bid them. The third general council were the creatures of Cyril, who was their president, and the inveterate enemy of Nestorius, whom he condemned for heresy, and was himself condemned for rashness in this affair. The fourth met under the awe of the Emperor Marcian, managed their debates with noise and tumult; were formed into a majority by the intrigues of the Legates of Rome, and settled the faith by the opinions of Athanasius, Cyril, and others. I need not mention more; the farther they go the worse they will appear. As their decisions in matters of faith were arbitrary and unwarranted, and as the decisions themselves were generally owing to court practices, intriguing statesmen, the thirst for revenge, the management of a few crafty, interested bishops, to noise and tumult, the prospects and hopes of promotions and translations, and other like causes, the reverence paid them by Christians is truly surprising.”—Introd, Hist. Inquis.

“All the world knows the dreadful cruelties committed in these unhappy centuries: they maintained sieges in their monasteries; they battled in their councils; they treated with the utmost cruelty all whom they but suspected to favour opinions, which too often proved to be such as nobody understood, not even those that defended them with the greatest zeal and obstinacy. “These,” says Barbeyrac, “are the great lights of the church! These are the holy Fathers whom we must take for men of true piety and knowledge!”

“One council,” says another historian, “was summoned to annul what another had done, and all things were managed with that faction, strife, and contention, as if they laboured to quench the spirit of meekness and brotherly love, so often recommended in the gospel. Some were banished, some were imprisoned, and against others they proceeded with more severity, even to the loss of their lives.”—Echard, Rom. Hist.

PRESBYTERS AND BISHOPS.

“A presbyter,” saith Jerome, “is the same as a bishop, and before by the instigation of the Devil, religious parties were formed, and it was said among the people, I am of Paul, I of Apollos, and I of Cephas, the churches were governed by the common council of the presbyters. But afterwards when every one regarded those whom he baptised as his own, not Christ’s, it was decreed through the whole world, that one chosen from the presbyters should be placed over the others, that they might be charged with the whole care of the church, and the occasions of schism removed. Does any think it is merely our opinion, not the representation of the Scriptures that bishop and presbyter are one, the one being the title of age, and the other of office? Let him read the words of Paul to the Philippians: ‘Paul and Timothy, servants of Jesus Christ, to all the saints in Christ Jesus who are at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons, grace to you and peace.’ Philippi is a city of Macedonia, and there surely cannot have been in one city many bishops of the kind now denoted by that title. But as at that time bishops were the same as those who were called presbyters, he denominated them indifferently bishops and presbyters. If this still seem doubtful to any one, let it be confirmed by another proof. It is written in the Acts of the Apostles, that when Paul had reached Miletus, he sent to Ephesus, and called the presbyters of the Church of that city, to whom on their arrival among other things he said, ‘Take heed to yourselves, and to all the flock over which the Holy Spirit placed you bishops, to feed the Church of the Lord which he hath purchased with his own blood.’ Here notice carefully, that those whom he calls presbyters of the single city of Ephesus, he afterwards denominates bishops.”

“These things we have quoted, that we might show that among the ancients presbyters and bishops were the same, but that gradually, in order that the germs of dissension might be extirpated, the whole care was devolved on one. As therefore the presbyters know that it is by the custom of the Church that they are subjected to him who is placed over them, so the bishops should know that it is rather by custom than a veritable divine appointment that they are superior to presbyters, and ought to govern the Church in common.”—Comment. On the Epist. To Titus, ch. 1.

RESURRECTION OF BODY NO PART OF GENTILISM.

The thirteenth article of the creed of the “Beth Elohim” synagogue of Charleston, S. C., is, “We believe that the Soul is immortal, and that we shall be accountable for our actions in the life to come.” Upon this the Editor of “The Occident,” a Jewish periodical, in writing to the Chazan, remarks, “It is certainly not what we have a right to expect from a Jewish divine who professes to teach religion as he has received it. Our creed is: ‘I believe with a perfect faith that there will be a revival of the dead at the time it may be the pleasure of the Creator, whose name be blessed, and whose memorial be exalted for ever unto all eternity.’ The immortality of the soul is an idea which many of the heathens believed in; but the resurrection is a peculiar Jewish doctrine, and to this we must profess ourselves as sons of Israel. Do you believe it? Or think you that they who sleep in the dust of the earth will not arise to everlasting life?” Yea verily; “the Hope and Resurrection of the dead” are the subject matter of the promise made of God to Israel’s fathers. They pertain to Israel—the immortality of an hereditary essence called “soul,” to the worshippers of calves and swine!

“In order to restrain presumptuous dispositions, the holy synod of Trent decrees, that no one relying on his own wisdom, shall presume in matters of faith and customs that pertain to the support of Christian doctrine, to distort the sacred scriptures to his own opinion, interpret them contrary to that sense which the Holy Mother Church has held and holds, whose it is to judge in respect to the true import and exposition of the sacred word, or contrary to the unanimous consent of the fathers, even although interpretations of that kind should never be made public. Let whoever does otherwise be reported by the usual officers and punished according to the laws.”—The spirit exhibited in this decree is not peculiar to the Tridentines, but is common to all protestant sects as well. It is now as rampant among our friends over the left shoulder, the Bethanians, as among any we have knowledge of. Could they have succeeded in restraining our “presumptuous disposition” as they regard it, many now happily emancipated would still be labouring under the delusion that “Sacred History” was the very Ancient Gospel itself. We did not ask the “consent of the fathers,” nor seek to construe the word according to the sense put upon it by the Fostering Mother, at Bethany, therefore we were reported and punished to the best of her ability. But all has failed thus far. We editorially exist, and the Gospel of the Kingdom in our hands cares as little for the decrees and oppositions of said mother, the fathers, and their hapless progeny, as for their Holy Tridentine Grandmother of world-wide celebrity herself.

PHYSICIAN, HEAL THYSELF.

"Our immediate duty, privilege, and honour," saith President Campbell, "is most obvious. We are first to understand the Bible ourselves, and then endeavour to make others understand it." This is true as the needle to the magnetic pole; and if our conscientious friend had attended to his most obvious duty, we are of opinion he would either have come to different conclusions than are contained in his "Sacred History," or the world would have been ignorant of his existence to this day. His duty is still "most obvious"—it is, "physician, heal thyself."

The prevailing belief among Christians in the second century in regard to the state of the dead, is thus set forth by Dr. Giesler: —"Till then (that is, till the "first resurrection,") the souls of the departed were to be kept in the under world, (sheol or hades, the receptacle of dead bodies,) and the opinion that they should be taken up to heaven immediately after death was considered a Gnostic heresy."—*Eccl. “A new speaker of truth is as an angel sent by God to trouble the waters of thought, and after the troubling there is healing for those who first step in. For some few years or generations, the waters retain their efficacy, but then again need a new troubling by some prophet or wise man. When Christ came he permanently troubled the waters of the world’s life, yet ever and anon there have needed to be more troublings.”—Memorials of Theophilus Trinal.

JEWISH OBJECTIONS TO JESUS.

Mr. Benjamin Dias, the Jewish unbeliever in Jesus referred to in a former article, in his sixth letter published in the Occident, says:

“The Old Testament being, without dispute, the only Scripture both of Jews and Christians, from that alone are we to judge of the office and character of the Messiah; and for this purpose it will be proper to extract a few of the many prophecies concerning the Messiah, his Kingdom, and the events to happen in his time, the better to compare them with what is related of Jesus in the New Testament, in which they are said to be fulfilled.

1. “In those days the house of Judah shall walk with the house of Israel, and they shall come together out of the land of the North to the land that I have given for an inheritance unto your fathers”—Jeremiah 3: 18.
2. “Thus saith the Lord God, Behold I will take the children of Israel from among the nations whither they be gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land, and will make them one nation in the land, upon the mountains of Israel; and one King shall be king to them all, and they shall no more be two nations: neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all: neither shall they defile themselves any more with their idols, nor with their detestable things, nor with any of their transgressions; but I will save them out of all their dwelling places wherein they have sinned, and will cleanse them, so shall they be my people, and I will be their God. And David my servant shall be king over them, and they shall have one shepherd: they shall also walk in my judgments, and observe my statutes, and do them. And they shall dwell in the land which I have given unto Jacob my servant, wherein your fathers have dwelt, and they shall dwell therein, even they, and their children, and their children's children, for ever. Moreover, I will make a covenant of peace with them; it shall be an everlasting covenant, and I will place them, and multiply them, and will set my sanctuary in the midst of them for evermore. My tabernacle, also, shall be with them, yea I will be their God, and they shall be my people; and the nations shall know that I, the Lord, do sanctify Israel, when my sanctuary shall be in the midst of them for evermore”—Ezekiel 37: 21-36.

3. “And I will gather the remnant of my flock out of all countries whither I have driven them, and will bring them again to their folds; and they shall be fruitful and increase. And I will set up shepherds over them who shall feed them; and they shall fear no more, nor be dismayed; neither shall they be lacking, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a Righteous Branch, and a king shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In his day Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely, and this is the name whereby he shall be called, Yehowah Tzidkainu—JEHOVAH OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS. Therefore, behold the days come, saith the Lord, that they shall no more say, The Lord liveth who brought up the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt; but the Lord liveth who brought up and who led the seed of the house of Israel out of the North country, and from all countries wherein I had driven them; and they shall dwell in their own land”—Jeremiah 23: 3-8.
4. *“And in that day there shall be a root of Jesse, which shall stand for an ensign (nais ammim, an ensign or leader of the peoples—Editor* Herald) of the people; to it shall the nations seek: and His rest shall be glorious. And it shall come to pass in that day that the Lord (Adonai) shall set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people, which shall be left from Assyria, and from Egypt, and from Pathros, and from Cush, and from Elam, and from Shinar, and from Hamath, and from the islands of the sea. And He shall set up an ensign for the nations, and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth. The envy also of Ephraim shall depart, and the adversaries of Judah shall be cut off; Ephraim shall not envy Judah, and Judah shall not vex Ephraim. And they shall fly (not “fly,” but ahphu, from the Syriac ahphah, they shall flourish—Ed. Her.) upon the shoulders of the Philistines westward; they shall spoil the children of the east entirely; Edom and Moab the putting out of their hand; and the children of Ammon their obedience”—Isaiah 11: 10-14.

5. “Therefore thus saith the Lord God, now will I bring again the captivity of Jacob, and have mercy upon the whole house of Israel, and will be jealous for my holy name; after that they have borne their shame and all their trespasses whereby they have trespassed against me, when they dwelt safely in their land and none made them afraid. When I have brought them again from the peoples, and gathered them out of their enemies’ lands, and I ma sanctified in them in the sight of many nations; then shall they know that I am Jehovah their God, who caused them to be led into captivity among the nations; but I have gathered them unto their own land, and have left none of them any more there, neither will I hide my face any more from them, for I have poured out my spirit upon the house of Israel, saith Adony Yehowah—the Lord Jehovah”—Ezekiel 39: 25-29.
6. “And it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall beat off from the channel of the river (Euphrates) unto the stream of Egypt (the Nile), and ye shall be gathered one by one, O ye children of Israel. And it shall come to pass in that day, that the great trumpet shall be blown, and they shall come who were ready to perish in the land of Assyria, and the outcasts in the land of Egypt, and shall worship the Lord in the holy mount of Jerusalem”—Isaiah 27: 12-13.
7. “Therefore will I save my flock, and they shall no more be a prey; and

I will judge between cattle and cattle. And I will set up one shepherd over them, and he shall feed them, even my servant David (i.e., Beloved—Ed. Herald) he shall feed them, and he shall be shepherd. And I the Lord will be their God (Waani Yehowah ehyeh lahem lailohim, and I Jehovah will be to them for Elohim—Ed. Herald), and my servant David a prince among them; I the Lord have spoken it. And I will make with them a covenant of peace, and will cause the evil beasts to cease out of the land, and they shall dwell safely in the wilderness, and sleep in the woods. And I will make them, and the places round about my hill a blessing; and I will cause the shower to come down in its season; there shall be showers of blessing. And the tree of the field shall yield its fruit, and the earth shall yield her increase, and they shall be safe in their land, and shall know that I am the Lord, when I have broken the bands of their yoke, and delivered them out of the hand of those that served themselves of them. And they shall no more be a prey to the nations, neither shall the beasts of the land devour them; they shall dwell safely, and none shall make them afraid. And I will raise up for them A PLANT OF RENOWN, and they shall no more be consumed with hunger in the land, neither bear the shame of the nations any more”—Ezekiel 34: 22-29.

8. “And there shall be no more a pricking briar unto the house of Israel, nor any grieving thorn of all that are round about them that despised them; and they shall know that I am the Lord God. Thus saith the Lord God: When I shall have gathered the house of Israel from the peoples among whom they are scattered, and shall be sanctified in them in the sight of the nations, there shall they dwell in their land that I have given to my servant Jacob. And they shall dwell safely therein, and shall build houses, and plant vineyards; yea, they shall dwell with confidence, when I have executed judgments upon all those that despise them round about them; and they shall know that I am Adony Yehowah—Lord Jehovah”—Ezekiel 28: 24-26.
9. “As I live, saith Lord Jehovah, surely with a mighty hand, and with an out-stretched arm; and with fury poured out, will I rule over you. And I will bring you out from the peoples, and will gather you out of the countries wherein ye are scattered, with a mighty hand, and with a stretched out arm, and with fury poured out. And I will bring you into the wilderness of the peoples, and there will I plead with you face to face. Like as I pleaded with your fathers in the wilderness of the land of Egypt, so will I plead with you, saith Lord Jehovah”—Ezekiel 20: 33-36.

10. “I will accept you with your sweet savour, when I bring you out from the peoples, and gather you out of the countries wherein you have been scattered, and I will be sanctified in you before the nations”—Ezekiel 20: 41.
11. “Hear the word of Jehovah, O ye nations, and declare it in the isles afar off, and say, He that scattered Israel will gather him, and keep him as a shepherd doth his flock. For Jehovah hath redeemed Jacob, and ransomed him from the hand of him that was stronger than he”—Jeremiah 31: 10-11.
12. “Fear not, for I am with thee; I will bring thy seed from the east, and gather thee from the west; I will say to the north, Give up; and to the south, Keep not back; bring my sons from far, and my daughters from the ends of the earth; even every one that is called by my name; for I have created him for my glory, I have formed him; yea, I have made him”—Isaiah 43: 5-7.

After adducing these testimonies, parts of which we have italicised, and inserted here and there a parenthesis, Mr. Dias proceeds to remark, “It is needless to transcribe more passages declarative of these great events of which the prophetic writings are full. From these, and many other prophecies of a like nature, we may collect the office and character of Messiah. But, before we proceed, it is certainly necessary to explain the meaning of the word Messiah. Messiah, or Mashiah, as pronounced in Hebrew, signifies Anointed, or THE ANOINTED ONE. It is applied to kings, priests, and prophets, as they were anointed to their office. Jews, therefore, by way of eminence and emphasis, called, and continue to call, that person whom God should raise up, and make the instrument for the accomplishment of such prophecies, as particularly describe and foretell the deliverance and glory of the nation, by this name. Now, if Christians will prove that Jesus fulfilled these prophecies, they will convert the Jews, for they require nothing else.”

Upon this the editor of the Occident remarks, “With due deference to the author, we wish to observe that only the mission of Jesus as the Messiah would thereby be proved, but not the character which Christians (Catholics and Protestants he means) assume for him; since the one whom we expect is to be a man acting under the power and guidance of the Lord, but not a part of the divinity. Such a being is contrary to Scripture, and is not the Christ whom we expect.”

In a note appended to Mr. Dias’ letter by Mr. Isaac Leeser, the editor of the Occident remarks, “The above letter is, according to our own view, the most important of the series thus far. It states truly that in arguing with Christians, we need not prove as a preliminary the truth of the books of the Covenant, for these are emphatically as requisite to them as to us. Mr. Dias is, therefore, perfectly correct to step forward at once to the character of the Messiah, as laid down in Scripture. And this, we think, far more important than his preceding discussion concerning the authenticity of the gospels, acts, and epistles; for our religion is true, not because the grounds of Christianity are not proven, but because it is a system, one and entire in itself, and was instituted by God, and sprung from Him long before the followers of the self-styled Messiah of Nazareth was in existence. The prophets speak of a Messiah, or, if you prefer the word, a Christ, who is to accomplish all that has been predicted of Him. Now, precisely such a one and no other can be received as the fulfiller of Scriptural prediction; but if he omit any of these, he is not the one whom we expect: —though he accomplish all the gospels say of him, though by his agency, the blind see, the deaf hear, the sick are made whole, and the dead are called to life. Such acts are not his mission; for this is the redemption of Israel and the world; and unless this have been, or be accomplished, the personage under question cannot be the King of the Jews.”

We shall reserve our comments upon the premises now before us until another issue. In the meantime, the reader will please to make himself familiar with the passages quoted by Mr. Dias from Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel. They have, indeed, never been fulfilled as yet; this admission, however, is no objection to Jesus; it only argues their future accomplishment —but by whom? The Jews cannot answer the question. They think it will not be by Jesus: —we have the full assurance of hope and faith that it will.

EXPECTATION PRECEDED THE ADVENT.

At the time of the coming of Christ there was a general expectation; among our nation, it was universal. Pious Simeon and Hannah, and many other devout persons, waited for the Consolation of Israel. The Pharisees sent priests and Levites to ask John the Baptist whether he was the Christ. The common people exclaimed, "If thou be the Christ, tell us plainly!" Hence they were ready to receive any one who pretended to be the Messiah. And it is worthy of observation, that many false Christs came after Jesus, but none before. The Samaritans, likewise, had the knowledge of a Saviour, and expected his coming, as is evident from the conversation of the woman of Samaria at Jacob's well—John 4.

But it is still more remarkable, the Romans themselves had the same expectations; and not only they, but all the eastern part of the world, which may well include all that was then known. Thus says Suetonius, (Vit. Vesp. 4,) "that an ancient and constant tradition had obtained throughout all the East, that in the fates it was decreed, that, about that time, some who should come from Judea should obtain the dominion, or government, i.e., of the world, which the Romans then possessed." And Cornelius Tacitus (Hist. L. 5, c. 13) speaks almost in the same words: telling of the great prodigies which preceded the destruction of Jerusalem, he says: "that many understood them as the forerunners of that extraordinary person who, the ancient books of the priests did foretell should come about that time from Judea, and obtain the dominion." Virgil, in his famous fourth Eclogue, written about the beginning of the reign of Herod the Great, compliments the consul, Pollio, with this prophecy, by supposing it might refer to his son, Saloninus, then born. But the words are too great to be verified of any mere mortal man; and he speaks of such a golden age, and such a renovation of all things as cannot be fulfilled in the reign of any ordinary king. And Virgil expresses it almost in the words of the Holy Scriptures—Isaiah 65: 17, wherein they tell of the glorious age of Messiah; of a new heavens and earth then to begin, and to be finally completed at the end thereof.

“The last age decreed by fate is come,
And a new frame of all things doth begin;
The Holy Progeny from heaven descends.
Auspicious be his birth, which puts an end
To th’ iron age, and from whence shall rise
A golden state far glorious through the earth.”

Thus the poet depicts in glowing colours, and makes a paraphrase of Isaiah’s prediction. The prophet says: “The wolf and the lamb shall feed together, and the lion shall eat straw as the bullock; and dust shall be the serpent’s meat. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, saith the Lord.” The poet, after this—

“Nor shall the flocks fierce lions fear;
No serpent shall be there, or herb of pois’ nous juice.”

Nay, the very atonement for sins, which Daniel attributed to Messiah—Daniel 9: 24, “to finish the transgression, to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity,” is thus expressed in this eclogue: —

“By thee, what footsteps of our sins remain
Are blotted out, and the whole world set free
From her perpetual bondage and her fear.”

And the very words of Haggai 2: 6 seem to be literally translated by Virgil. Thus saith the prophet of the coming of the Messiah: “Yet once, it is a little while, and I will shake the heavens, and the earth, and the sea, and the dry land; and I will shake all nations, and the desire of all nations shall come.” And thus the poet: —

“Enter on thy honour, now’s the time,
Offspring of God, O thou great gift of Jove!
Behold, the world, heaven, earth, and seas do shake;
Behold, how all rejoice to greet that glorious age.”

And as if Virgil had been learned in the doctrine of Christ, he tells that these glorious times should not begin immediately upon the birth of that wonderful person then expected to come into the world, but that wickedness should still keep its ground in several places.

“Yet some remains shall still be left Of ancient fraud, and war shall still go on.”

Now, how the old pagan poet applied all this, is not the question, whether in part to Augustus Caesar, or partly to the consul Pollio, and partly to his son Saloninus, then newly born; but it shows the expectation there was at that time, of the birth of a very extraordinary person, who should introduce a new and golden age, and both reform and govern the whole world.”—FREY.

AN INTERPRETATION DISPUTED.

Dear Brother: —I have to thank you for your attention to my inquiry concerning the predictions of our Lord recorded in Matthew 24. I had long before concluded that you had wholly forgotten it, and so was agreeably undeceived. Nevertheless, admitting your interpretation to be correct, you have, for me, reencompassed the subject with difficulties which the view of it I presented to you seemed to obviate. Allow me briefly to state these. —If the tribulation ended A. D. 71; if the “luminaries” of verse 29 were “Hebrew,” and were then “eclipsed,” how are we to harmonise the prophecy with the facts in the case? For, after declaring that “the powers of the heavens shall be shaken,” our Lord continues, “and then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven: and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with great power and glory.” That the events predicted in verse 29 and 30 are represented as immediately consecutive, cannot, I think, be denied without forcing the words from their natural and obvious meaning. To suppose that 1800 years were intended to elapse between the shaking of the political heaven referred to and the “then” of verse 30, is to violate the simple unconstrained sense of the passage. Then in regard to the “generation” intended. “Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass till all these things (doubtless those He had enumerated) shall be fulfilled.” According to Luke, our Lord continues: “When these things begin to come to pass then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh,” and illustrating his injunction by the parable of the fig tree, adds, “so likewise ye, when ye see these things come to pass know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand.” Here the fulfilment of “these things” is connected with the advent of the kingdom as an earnest of its nearness. How unmeaning if they were fulfilled in the first century! “Verily,” he goes on to say, “This generation (could it be the one he was addressing?) shall not pass away till all be fulfilled.” Is it not evident that the coming of the kingdom is included in the “all?” And this was still unmanifested when the last of that “generation” lay down to sleep in the dust.

These difficulties attending your theory, dear brother, are to me at present inseparable. In the one I reported to you, they were annihilated by simply supposing the "tribulation" co-extensive with "the times of the Gentiles," and the "generation" that which should witness the "signs" coming immediately after. I see nothing in Luke's testimony to refute such a supposition. These, "he writes," are the days of vengeance, that all things which are written may be fulfilled. This is making the days of vengeance terminate only with the woes of Israel. But you say that verses 16, 20, and 21 of Matthew 24, show that the tribulation must be confined to the "those days indicated." They show certainly that it would be great, excessive then, but they scarcely prove that it must terminate with them. Those days of terror and distress were "shortened for the elect's sake," but we know that Palestine has been prostrate under the sway of Gentile oppression ever since, whilst her children have been wanderers, persecuted and tyrannised over by their Gentile rulers. Israel did not drink to the dregs the cup of God's vengeance, Isaiah 51: 17, in A.D. 71. Jerusalem's "warfare" or "appointed time" was not then "accomplished."—Isaiah 40: 2. Her "tribulation," what has it been but her subjection to Gentile tyrants, and this can only end when her own King shall return to reign in the midst of her. You say the "signs" must not be looked for in the natural heavens. I do not expect them there. But I think they are as characteristic of the time when "the thrones shall be cast down,"—Daniel 7: 9, as of that to which you apply them. When the "Beast" is "slain" and "destroyed" and the "dominion taken" from the "little Horn" the Imperial Sun of Europe will be extinguished, and the misleading light of the Papal Moon quenched in darkness. Then when these are "destroyed in the brightness of his coming," the Son of Man shall be seen "in power and great glory."

I must apologise for the length of these remarks. They have extended farther than I purposed. I shall be obliged if you will consider them at your leisure; and if you can dissipate the difficulties that appear to me to attach to your interpretation of these deeply interesting predictions, I shall be very willing to accept it. Meanwhile believe me, dear brother,

In faith and hope affectionately,

PERSIS.

THE PROPHECY OF MOUNT OLIVET.

“The Tribulation of those days”—“The End—“Your Redemption draweth nigh”—“The Kingdom of God nigh at hand”—“Then,” explained.

The difficulty of our correspondent, “Perside la bien-aime’e” in relation to “the tribulation of those days,” consisting in the destruction of the city, the sanctuary—Daniel 9: 26, and the mighty and holy people—Daniel 8: 24, by the Prince’s people, seems to rest on the import of the word “then,” which is assumed to be immediate consecutiveness. That is, that the appearance of the sign of the Son of Man in heaven is immediately to follow the tribulation and the eclipse of the luminaries, which Persis does not regard as the sun, moon, stars, and powers of the heavens of the Hebrew Zion; nor indeed of the “natural heavens;” but of the heavens of the Roman system of nations existing at the end of “the times of the Gentiles.”

What I have said on page 27 of our last volume (September 1852) in reply to Persis need not be repeated here. The reader can refer to it and study it at his leisure. In the letter before us, Persis cannot see how the eclipsed luminaries can be Hebrew, because the Son of Man’s sign, &c., and the advent of the kingdom, said to be nigh at hand, did not then appear. The interpretation of the prophecy of Mount Olivet, evidently to my mind, perplexes Persis for the same reason that all other interpreters have failed to give a consistent and intelligible exegesis to it—they fail to perceive that it is a prophecy of things pertaining exclusively to Israel’s commonwealth. “O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, behold your house shall be left with you desolate. For I say unto you, ye shall not see me henceforth, till ye shall say, Blessed is He that cometh in the name of Jehovah.” In this the epochs, beginning and ending the prophecy which followed, are indicated—first, the desolation of Jerusalem’s house; and lastly, the pronouncing of Jesus blessed by the Hebrew nation at his appearing. “Ye shall say;” that is, Israel shall say, Blessed be Jesus of Nazareth. “Jesus spake to the multitude and to his disciples,” concerning those who sat in Moses’ seat, or throne. In speaking to them, he denounced the government of the Gentiles in Israel, but the Scribes, Pharisees, and hypocrites, so far as they had to do with public affairs. The twenty-third of Matthew sufficiently establishes this point.

In the next chapter he confirms his discourse to two disciples who came to him “privately,” and sought to know more particularly concerning the things he had been previously treating of before the multitude. “Tell us,” said they, “when shall these things be? And what the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?” The “sayings” which followed were addressed to them for their especial benefit. “Take heed,” said Jesus, “that no man deceive you.” “Ye shall hear of wars and rumours of wars; see that ye be not troubled.” Having spoken of international wars, famines, pestilences, and earthquakes, he told them that these were the beginning of sorrows; and that then, or afterwards, “they,” the Scribes, Pharisees, and hypocrites, should deliver them up to be afflicted and killed. Take the cases of James and Paul by way of illustration. “When, therefore,” continued the Lord, “*ye shall see the abomination of desolation spoken of by the Prophet Daniel, stand in the holy place, then let them which be in Judea flee to the mountains: . . . but pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the Sabbath day; for THEN shall be great tribulation such as was not from the beginning of the world (kosmou a thing constituted; it may therefore be rendered of the State or Commonwealth) to this time, no, nor ever shall be. And except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh, (of the carcass spoken of in verse 28) be saved. Then if any man shall say unto you, Lo, here is Christ, or there; believe it not. Behold I have told you before. Wherefore if they shall say unto you, Behold He (the Son of Man) is in the desert, believe it not. For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west; so shall the suddenness of the coming of the Son of Man be. For wheresoever the carcass is (that is, Judah) there will the eagles (the Prince’s army of Romans) be gathered together.”*

Now, it is clear from all this, that “those days” referred to in verse 22, were days contemporary with the life-time of the persons whom Jesus was addressing, and not of us or of our successors; and that during their currency there was to be a “tribulation,” or “distress in the land,” unequalled in Israel’s history before, or by anything to happen to them after. There is, indeed, “a time of trouble” yet to come, which will transcend anything that has befallen mankind since the Flood; but that is to affect the Gentiles—Daniel 12: 1—by the sword of Israel and the plagues of God. Israel will not then be destroyed as they were in the day of their “great tribulation;” but they will be delivered. It will, doubtless be “the time of Jacob’s trouble; but he will be saved out of it”—Jeremiah 30: 7—a characteristic which distinguishes the two troubles of Israel; for in the last the yoke of oppression is to be broken from off Israel’s neck, “and strangers shall no more serve themselves of him.”

One thing, I suspect, that has misled Persis in regard to the time of the tribulation, is the phrase, “the end of the world,” in the third verse. There is a sense in which the tribulation was to continue to the end of the world, but not in the Gentile sense of the phrase. The Greek is; ti to seemeion tees synteleias tou aionos? That is, “what the sign of the conclusion of the age?” Paul says, “Now once in the end of the world hath Christ appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself”—Hebrews 9: 26. In the same verse he speaks of “the foundation of the world;” but he uses a different word for “world.” He says not apo kataboles aionos, but kosmou. If he had spoken of Christ’s suffering often from the foundation of the age, he would have said ap’ aionos; but he went further back, and supposed him suffering often from the time of the institution of sacrifice, when the Kosmos was arranged, and Adam’s sin was covered, if he had entered the divine presence with the blood of others, as Aaron and his successors did. The disciples did not inquire what was the sign of the end of the Kosmos, but of the end of that Age constituted by the law. The great tribulation was to continue to the end of the Aion—of the Mosaic world, consisting of the Jewish Heavens and Earth, or Commonwealth of Israel.

The apostle Peter writing to his fellow-countrymen says, “THE END of all things is at hand: be ye therefore sober, and watch unto prayer”—1 Peter 4: 7. He was one to whom the sayings of Jesus were addressed. The Lord had given him a sign of “the end.” It was this. “And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world (oikoumenee, the territory inhabited by the Roman system of nations) for a testimony to all the nations, and then shall come THE END.” Paul writing to the Colossians tells us that this sign had been accomplished in his time. “The hope laid up in the heavens, and contained in the word of the truth of the gospel,” says he, “is come in all the world” (kosmos), or as he expresses it elsewhere, “was preached to every creature under the heaven”—Colossians 1: 6, 23. All the apostles knew this; for they had been ordered to “go and preach the gospel to every creature,” and they had done it. Therefore James exhorts his countrymen and brethren in the faith, saying, “Be patient unto the coming of the Lord . . . stablish your hearts; for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh”—James 5: 7-8. They all knew that it could not be far off; because the gospel of the kingdom had been preached to every creature under the Roman heaven, or government.

The “all things” whose “end” was “at hand,” were the things “made” or constituted by the Mosaic law, and which, having “waxed old,” were “ready to vanish away.” They were the things to be removed by shaking the heaven and the earth, that the unshakable things might remain—Hebrews 12: 26-27. They were the elements or rudiments of the world, “the weak and beggarly elements” to which the Galatians, Jews in Christ, desired again to be in bondage. The end of these was at hand; but in order to abolish them, it was necessary to break up the commonwealth of Israel, to accomplish which the “great tribulation” was indispensable.

But James says, “the coming of the Lord draweth nigh.” He did not say “the appearing of the Lord,” but only that the coming of the Son of Man, the sign of which and the end of the age, was the gathering of the Eagles—Deuteronomy 28: 49—to prey upon Israel’s carcass—Deuteronomy 28: 26. Jesus told the apostles that they “should not have gone over the cities of Israel till the Son of Man be come”—Matthew 10: 33; not with power and great glory, but with his Roman Eagles—Matthew 22: 7—to “baptise” their adversaries and his “with fire”—even with the fire of Gehenna, or of Hinnom’s vale. The apostles did not know when the “appearing” would be, its “times and seasons” being hid in God: but of the coming to destroy Jerusalem and her house, they could tell of its near approach.

Having ascertained that the great tribulation, or “distress in the land, and wrath upon Israel,” was concurrent with the lifetime of the disciples who were taught by the Lord himself, we are obliged to fix the eclipse and fall of the political luminaries at that crisis; for it was to be “immediately after the tribulation of those days.” The eclipse and fall were the result of the tribulation which shook “the powers of the heavens,” civil and ecclesiastical. The desolating abomination spoken of by Daniel the prophet, was the agency employed by the Son of Man, the Prince of Israel, in afflicting them and shaking their polity to pieces. Alluding to these calamities, Isaiah apostrophises Jerusalem in words of consolation divinely expressed, saying, “They that despised thee shall bow themselves down at the soles of thy feet; and they shall call thee the City of the Lord, the Zion of the Holy One of Israel. Whereas thou hast been forsaken and hated, so that no man went through thee—I will make thee an eternal excellency, a joy of many generations. Violence shall no more be heard in thy land, wasting or destruction within thy borders; but thou shalt call thy walls Salvation, and thy gates Praise. Thy sun shall no more go down, neither shall thy moon withdraw itself; for the Lord shall be thine everlasting light, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended. Thy people also shall be all righteous; they shall inherit the land forever, the branch of my planting, the work of my hands, that I may be glorified”—Isaiah 9: 14, 33.

But Persis thinks that the eclipse and fall cannot have taken place immediately after the destruction of Jerusalem’s house, because it cannot be truly said that the disciples’ redemption, and the kingdom of God were nigh at hand. With all deference, however, I think it may. The redemption was that of the disciples addressed. Some of them were to be killed, others imprisoned, and all to be persecuted in different ways by the Jews and their rulers. These could not put to death and imprison Gentile believers, because they had no power or authority over them. The Gentile governments persecuted Gentile Christians: and the Jewish rulers those of their own nation. Hence Paul says to the Gentile portion of the church at Thessalonica, “Ye, brethren, became followers of the churches of God which in Judea are in Christ Jesus; for ye also have suffered like things of your own countrymen, as they have of the Jews: who both killed the Lord Jesus and their own prophets, and have persecuted us; and they please not God, and *are contrary to all men, forbidding us to speak to the Gentiles that they might be saved, to fill up their sins always: for the wrath is come upon them to the uttermost—1 Thessalonians 2: 14-16. This was the “wrath to come,” referred to by John the baptiser, which was to break the power of the Jewish persecutor, and so redeem the churches in Judea from his oppression and misrule. When the disciples in these churches saw the fall of Jerusalem approaching (indicated by the things predicted “beginning to come to pass”) they looked up, and exalted their heads, as men do when they see deliverance coming from any great embarrassment or distress.

As to the kingdom of God being nigh at hand when the disciples saw the things predicted, this is my interpretation. The more condensed narrative of Matthew from the twenty-first to the twenty-fifth chapter inclusive, and especially his twenty-fourth, is scattered over Luke’s account from chapter seventeen to the twenty-second inclusive. He begins his reference to the Mount Olivet prophecy in the twentieth verse of the seventeenth chapter, telling us that when the Pharisees demanded of Jesus “when the kingdom of God should come?”—he replied that “the kingdom of God cometh not with observation,” so as to attract every one’s attention. Then in the next verse, Luke records Christ’s words found in Matthew 24: 23. “*If any man shall say unto you Lo, here is the Christ, or there; believe it not.” He does not, however, insert the words “the Christ;” but says simply and negatively, “*Neither shall they say, Lo, here! or lo there.” Lo here, or lo there, what? It might be asked. The answer would be, “Lo here the Christ, or the kingdom of God,” which are different forms of expressing the same thing. But why should people on the land not run hither and thither after the Christ or the kingdom? “Because,” said Jesus, “the kingdom of God, O Pharisees, is among you,” (entos hymoon,) for there is no kingdom in the absence of God’s Christ; Christ and his dominion being inseparable. He is among you without ostentation, and you receive him not. Then turning to his disciples in continuance of the subject, he said to them, “The days will come, when ye shall desire to see one of the days of the Son of man, and ye shall not see it.” You will desire to see him appear; but he will not come “before you have gone over the cities of Israel” in that way. But men knowing this your desire “shall say unto you, ‘See here, or see there,’” he is: “go not after, nor follow them: for as the lightning that lighteneth out of one part under heaven; so shall also the Son of Man be in his day”—in one of his days: in one of them he will come with his eagles with the suddenness of the lightning’s flash; in another, he will appear in the brightness of its glory: so that you will need no “here,” or “there,” to find him.

When the son of man came with his Eagles, “the kingdom of God was nigh at hand;” but when he appears “in power and great glory,” the kingdom of God will be apparent also—its advent will be an accomplished fact. The kingdom nigh, and the kingdom come, do not signify the same thing. The kingdom was nigh in the sense in which James said, the Lord’s coming was nigh; but not in that of his “coming in his kingdom,” mentioned by the thief on the cross; or of “his appearing and kingdom,” referred to by Paul. King and kingdom are often used interchangeably in the scriptures. For instance, Luke says, that “when Jesus was come nigh to Jerusalem riding on the ass’s colt, the whole multitude of the disciples began to rejoice and praise God with a loud voice, saying, “Blessed be the king that cometh in Jehovah’s name;” while Mark in narrating the same event, says that they cried saying, “Blessed be the kingdom of our father David that cometh in the name of Jehovah.” I conclude then, that “the kingdom of God was nigh at hand,” when “the king,” though invisible, was supervising the operations of the siege of his rebellious capital.

As to the word “then,” tote, I do not see that it presents any difficulty in the case; or that it necessitates immediate consecutiveness, or contemporaneousness. We may say with perfect correctness, General Washington was elected President, then General Jackson, then Mr. Polk, and then General Pierce, without its being supposed that they were immediately following one another with no President between. The “thens” would be generally understood as indicative of indefinite succession, and leaving the precise time of their several reigns undetermined. This is the fact in relation to Matthew’s, or rather Christ’s use of the “thens” in chapter 24: 30. The eclipse and fall of the sun, moon and stars, and the shaking of the powers of Judah’s heavens, or polity, were “immediately after the tribulation of those days” of “distress in the land; and then,” or afterwards, “the sign of the Son of Man shall appear in the heaven; and then,” or after that appearance of the sign, “the tribes of the land (hai phylai tees gees) shall mourn in his presence; and they,” the tribes, “shall see the Son of Man coming upon the clouds of the heaven with power and great glory.” This is the order of events in relation to the Jewish nation. Between the overthrow of its polity and the appearing of the sign of the Son of Man, it would be favoured with no visible manifestation of Jehovah, as in the days of old. The interval was to be occupied by “the times of the Gentiles,” during which Jerusalem, the great king’s city, was to be trodden under foot until the time came to recompense them as they had meted out to Israel and the Saints. Between the events of the 29th and 30th verses, 1800 years have nearly elapsed. The interval will soon be filled up, as we believe. We await with Israel “the sign,” whose signification will work commotion in the Jewish mind, that in rejecting Jesus of Nazareth as king of the Jews, they have put from them Jehovah’s Christ. Then looking upon Him whom they have pierced, will Israel mourn and be in bitterness for him as the first-born of God and his nation—Zechariah 12: 10; Revelation 1: 7. The Son of Man then acknowledged as their king, will enter on the work of building again the dwelling-place of David now in ruins, and setting it up, as in the days of old—Amos 9: 11; Acts 15: 16. He will then gather the still dispersed from all the nations; and if any of them have been driven to the utmost parts of the heaven, he will send his angels (or messengers) with a great sound of a trumpet (making loud and general proclamation) and they shall gather his elect (people even all Israel) from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other, and “bring them into the land which their fathers possessed, and they shall possess it,” as the Lord has said by his servant Moses—Compare Matthew 24: 31 with Deuteronomy 30: 1-5.

All the things predicted as pertaining to the days of vengeance were fulfilled in the tribulation of those days. Judah’s troubles since the overthrow of the Hebrew polity, have been no greater than those of the saints at the hand of the Little Horn, which is “the Devil and Satan” to them both. Eighteen hundred years is too extended a period to be styled “days of vengeance.” Eleven hundred thousand Jews perished in the siege of Jerusalem, and ninety thousand were sold for slaves. This was emphatically vengeance which before or since Judah never experienced so terribly, nor ever will again. But here I must conclude, hoping that the difficulties of Persis have been met, and effectually removed.

OUR VISIT TO BRITAIN.

The Editor at Aberdeen—Invited to Dundee by the Campbellites—Visits Dr. Dick—The Kingdom's Gospel announced—War declared against it—A "bishop" deposed—Campbellism shattered into fragments—descends into the streets and erects barricades—Teetotalism and the Gospel—A new church formed—Cupar uneasy—Opinions of Elpis Israel.

The writing of Elpis Israel being accomplished, I set out on my second tour through Britain. It will be unnecessary to enter into the details of this, inasmuch as it was pretty much a repetition of the first. I revisited all the places I had been to before, with the addition of Dundee, and Aberdeen. I came to visit the latter city in consequence of a friend being there, with whom I was intimate, a resident of Northern Illinois. Through him I became acquainted with several members of the Campbellite church of liberal and candid minds, who, though not believing, or rather not clearly understanding what I contend for, desired to hear and judge for themselves whether I said aught else than what the Scriptures revealed. My visit there resulted in some submitting themselves to the "obedience of the faith," and the subscription of several to the forthcoming book.

The reader will not have entirely forgotten the tumultuous Campbellite convention at Glasgow in 1848, and that among the delegates there were certain very zealous opponents to myself. Belonging to this party were representatives from the Campbellite church in Dundee, meeting at Hammerman Hall in that town. They had observed my progress, and the interest created by my lectures in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and elsewhere, and concluded that it was possible I might be heard in Dundee without danger to what they considered "the faith once delivered to the saints." They determined, therefore, to invite me; and, supposing I was still in Edinburgh, though, in fact, in Aberdeen, they sent the following invitation, which was forwarded to me from thence.

John Thomas, M. D., Edinburgh.

13, Nelson Street, Dundee;
26th July, 1849.

Dear Sir. —Being informed that you are to visit Aberdeen, we beg to say that a number of friends here are desirous to see you, and have a conversation with you over a cup of tea. If you could find it convenient to come this way, on your return, please say on receipt of this, and at what time. You will have a friendly reception, and your expenses will be paid.

Yours truly,
James Ainslie,
J. G. Ainslie,
John Watson,
Allan Fordyce.

I received this note a day or so before my departure from Aberdeen. I concluded, therefore, to change my route; and instead of making my way through Aberdeen to Perth, and thence to Paisley, to take the steamer, and landing at Arbroath, proceed by rail to Dundee. This accomplished, I was welcomed to Dundee by two of the friends who met me at the station, and conducted me to 13 Nelson St., the residence of one of the signers, who had been Cicerone to my friend, President Campbell, during his sojourn there. Soon after my arrival tea was introduced, and disposed of, without anything unusual. A walk into the town was then proposed and accepted. It terminated at the coffee-house where the President had resided, and which was to become my domicil also for the time. About nine o'clock the coffee-room was occupied by a considerable company who had convened as the "friends desirous to see and converse with me." Cakes, coffee, and tea were served up by Mr. Lamb, whose guest I was to become. After a sufficient interval, conversation turned from generals to particulars, and I was asked for an outline of the things I generally laid before the public in my lectures. Having given this, the question was mooted among them whether I should be invited to lecture in Dundee. I suggested the propriety of my withdrawal from their company while they should discuss that, supposing that there might be some opposed to it, who would feel more at liberty in their opposition in my absence. It was not thought necessary; but I preferred it should be so, and withdrew. On being recalled I was informed that it was their wish that I should come and lecture in Dundee. But I could not then say, as I had sent an appointment to Liverpool, where I proposed to be after finishing at Paisley. I arranged, however, that I would return to Dundee from Paisley, if I could get released from Liverpool, which I managed to do as the appointments there had not as yet been made. The friends in Liverpool wrote to me at Paisley, and to them at Dundee, by the same mail, of which I obtained information as agreed upon by the following note:

13 Nelson St., Dundee;
10th August, 1849.

Dear Sir—As all arrangements for your lectures on Sabbath and the following days, have been advertised by bills, and in the newspapers, we shall look for you by the evening train tomorrow, by the Perth and Dundee Central Railway. The mail train arrives here about 7 o'clock in the evening.

I am, dear sir, yours affectionately,

James Ainslie.

On the morrow, accordingly, I went and delivered, I think, some seven lectures while I remained. During my stay there I was well cared for, and kindly treated. President Campbell's Cicerone was my guide in visiting around. He accompanied me on a visit to Dr. Dick, the celebrated author of the "Christian Philosopher," and other popular works. The doctor received us politely, being free in conversation, and obliging in showing us his telescopes, through one of which he gave us a view of St. Andrews, from his observatory, some six miles in the distance, on the other side of the Tay. He accompanied us from his house on the way to the station, which afforded a brief opportunity to exchange a few words on the appearing of Christ and the Millennial Reign. He asked my views on these subjects, which I gave him as concisely as possible. "I suppose," said he, "you allow others to differ from you?" "Certainly," I replied, "I have no alternative, were I ever so disposed to be arbitrary; which I am not:" upon which he gave me to understand that he looked for a millennium, and a gospel reign, the result of a universal diffusion of science and philosophy, which would pave the way for a general reception of the gospel! Living four miles from Dundee, he did not attend my lectures there; though I have since learned he expressed regret to a mutual friend in Edinburgh that he had been unable to do so.

Affairs progressed very smoothly in Dundee until my last lecture, which treated of "the gospel of the kingdom." This, though a Scriptural statement of the subject-matter preached as gospel to Abraham, the contemporaries of Moses, and to those also of John the Baptist, Jesus and his Apostles, without any allusion to sects or persons, kindled a flame among the Campbellites which had not ceased to burn in Dundee when I left Britain. One of the Campbellite bishopric “became obedient to the faith.” This turned everything upside down. My “affectionate” guide to Dr. Dick’s, being “a bishop,” if I mistake not, was greatly frustrated; and all his affection evaporated into alienation and opposition to the kingdom’s gospel. “Persecution,” writes one, has now assumed a very formidable appearance against us in Dundee. The first step was the deposition of him you baptised from what they term “the bishop’s office:” and strange to tell, this has been done while as yet he had not opened his mouth upon any subject in the meeting since you were here. James Ainslie and company have become determined to check “the new light” in the bud; but contrary to their expectation the blade has made its appearance, and a stalk of no inconsiderable size has already sprung up. Since I last wrote five have been baptised. Two of these have delivered addresses to the brethren upon the subjects of the “new light” which have thrown the people into a complete consternation. On Sunday week the deposed bishop is advertised to give a trial discourse before the church, on the “new doctrines” before he can be again elevated to the bishopric; which he says he will do in earnest.

At the meeting of their office bearers, held on September 3, the following questions were proposed to him to answer impromptu, upon which the questions and answers were recorded in the church book.

1. Would you have fellowship with a paidobaptist church?

Answer. “No.”

2. Have you not virtually cut us off by rejecting our baptism without precedent in the New Testament, or being authorised by the Apostles?

Answer. “No.”

3. If yours be the only scriptural baptism, why fellowship us who are unscripturally baptised according to your notions of it?

Answer. “I never stated anything connected with your baptism. I say ‘without faith it is impossible to please God.’ If you had faith according to your own showing you were baptised. If you had not faith you deceived me, and ‘to your own master you stand or fall.’”

4. Why are there two baptisms practised in the church?

Answer. “I am not aware of two.”

5. Have you not been twice baptised?

Answer. “No.”

6. Have you not stated that we were introduced into the kingdom?

Answer. “I have not taught the brethren any other thing even yet.”

7. Say six month ago. Did you consider yourself baptised?

Answer. “I now consider myself as having been deceived.”

8. What is faith?

Answer. “Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen.”

After all this questioning they declared themselves as ignorant of his views as ever, and said, “we do not really know what to think of him, or what to do with him.” Upon which he was deposed until they should think over the matter. They concluded that his deposition should be permanent after his discourse, because the things believed “are subversive of the foundation of the Reformation.” It was alleged that the doctrine I had taught “had seriously damaged the cause in Dundee, and cast a stumbling block before the weaker brethren and the world.” Yet I had said no more than what every one may read for himself in the Scriptures of the Prophets and Apostles. A correspondent writing from Dundee says, “If I were to examine into this allegation, and inquire who seemed most to stumble, or be afraid of this stumbling block, I should find that they are not those who think themselves the weaker brethren. And were I to give judgment in the case, it would not be unlike that of the sailor who, on being reminded that his wife was the weaker vessel, smartly replied, ‘Then she should carry less sail.’ The weak should not be stubborn. And yet when we inquire if you taught anything they did not know before? ‘O no,’ says one, ‘we knew it all our days;’ ‘we knew it these twenty years,’ says another; ‘I got nothing from Dr. Thomas,’ says a third; and so on to the end. These are the sayings of those who are offended at, and afraid of the doctrine you teach.”

The same writer continues, “On the evening of the Sundays that have intervened between your visit and the present time, the topic of conversation at our meetings at the Hall, has been ‘the kingdom.’ Old fancies stand firm in the minds of some, but others are abandoning the fabrication of men, although they are not as yet appreciating the truth in full. Some light broke in upon them last Sunday, and a storm of wrath has been raised about my head. I spoke too strongly. They see the gospel is held by me to be somewhat different from their gospel; and they who advocated and defended a fanciful kingdom, seem to have abandoned, or at least temporarily left that position, and come forward with their full strength to the menaced point. None will venture to establish an inquisition on my account; but I should not wonder if an 'act of conformity' were not sought to be passed for speakers, or something else of like potency to prevent 'the same words being again spoken to them.' I wish they may not; but I cannot help consequences. Honeyed words will not do with some."

In December following, it was proposed to prohibit members from speaking the "new doctrines, under pain of being compelled to withdraw from their fellowship." It was, however, moved and seconded, that the question be not entertained. Twenty-two said do not entertain the motion, and twelve said "do." My "affectionate" cicerone, who by inviting me introduced the "new doctrines," voted their suppression, and so lost his vote. But our friend did not rest here. After about six months agitation the majority changed sides. One of the most active speakers was voted out. This proved their numerical superiority, and emboldened our redoubtable friend to a renewed effort for the exclusion of heretics. It was no longer loss of Campbellite fellowship if they spoke out their convictions; but the absolute expulsion of "all who had been baptised in such doctrines." This was Mr. James Ainslie's proposition. The effort was opposed by the persons aimed at, but unsuccessfully. A resolution was carried by the majority that "we separate and appoint arbiters to arrange the secular matters." Arbiters were accordingly appointed, and on the first Thursday evening this convener reported, that by a majority they had decided, that those who disapproved, or had voted against a separation, should in the meantime have the use of the Hall. This was objected to, and a counter resolution was proposed. A couple of hours was consumed in stormy debate, at the expiration of which the meeting broke up without any formal decision being arrived at. But after thunder comes the hail. The Campbellites finding they could not resolve things to suit them, determined to "descend into the streets," as the phrase is, and throw up barricades against the advocates of the kingdom. This was the fashion of that epoch in the old world. Republican barricades were everywhere thrown up by the rebellious against monarchy, and the Dundee Campbellites formed no exception to the rule. They would have none of the kingdom, nor would they tolerate any of its adherents. If they could not vote them out of their territories, they were determined to expel them by force from their citadel. Sometime in March, 1850, about seven months after my visit, the crisis came. The believers in the kingdom's gospel suspecting nothing, went as usual to Hammerman's Hall; but to their great surprise they found it locked against them, although one of their number, the deposed bishop I think, was responsible to the owner for the rent. On examining the outworks they discovered an undefended window, out of which the last of the evacuant garrison had retreated. Through this opening one of the excluded passed into the Hall, where he found the doors barricaded with forms and tables, and the windows made secure. The locking and barring out was twice repeated. On this first occasion, the barricades were overturned, and the battle-field with forms and tables, the trophies of the fight, remained for one day in the hands of the anti-hammer-men; and those who thought to pound their fellows in a fool's mortar, exposed themselves to the contempt that ever attends the rage of imbecility.

This defeat of the enemies of the gospel of the kingdom could not supersede a regular and formal settlement of affairs. The anti-tyrannists, though one in opposition to our "affectionate" friend of Nelson Street and Arthur Lee, his valiant Sancho's barricade theology, were not united on the truth, nor on their views of how their victory should be improved. Many a brave and noble cause has been lost for want of wisdom and singleness of heart. One of their number informed me, that some of them wished to form from the victors, what he terms "a motley association something like David's army at Adullam"—1 Samuel 22: 2. That is to organise a new congregation out of the old materials on the basis of simple opposition to Campbellistic proscriptiveness. This would have created a church of some forty members, of which about half a dozen only would have been "obedient to the faith;" the others being but friends to the proscribed from distaste of proscription, and not from fellowship with them in the faith of the kingdom's gospel. But such an association as this, having a name to live, but really unbegotten of the word of life, was demurred to by brother George Schleselman, late secretary to the Glasgow Campbellite Convention, and others. They thought that now, if at any time, was the crisis for the formation of a society at Dundee, all of whose members should have been baptised upon a confession of faith in “the things of the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ”—Acts 8: 12. They considered that “without faith it is impossible to please God;” and that that faith which is alone pleasing to him is “the substance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things unseen”—Hebrews 11: 1, “which are eternal”—2 Corinthians 4: 18. They applied this principle to churches as well as to individuals, considering that God could be no better pleased with a misbelieving church, than with a misbelieving person. They would not give in, therefore, to the work of founding and building up a new Babel of iron and clay, destined to fall to pieces when the excitement which gave it birth should have passed away. They wanted to guard against the repetition of the late displays of ignorance, arbitrariness, and unbelief, and the only way to fulfil this indication was to begin in the truth and in the love of it, and all other good things would follow of necessity. “It was contended,” in the words of one of them writing to me, “that human traditions and practices should receive no quarters; that human praise and popular plans should be treated as dangerous; and that instead of conformity to the world, we should strive to conform to the doctrine of Christ, and the simplicity of conduct that almost (if not altogether) of necessity follows. You know we disapprove of all clericals of whatever name or degree, and discountenance the assumptions of all hierarchs from Christ’s pretended Vicar on earth, to Baptist pastors; and their mimic ‘presidents.’ We know the public has no true faith, therefore, we do not countenance it in its idea of offering acceptable worship to Israel’s God; but repudiate the confection Christianity of our day, moulded and sweetened as it is to please the depraved taste of a world lying under sin.” No objection could be urged against this but expediency. Its scripturality was admitted, but some did not think it expedient to be too rigid, or rather so rigid; and therefore withheld their cooperation, preferring to invite the others to join them in establishing a more popular and liberal institution. But they declined, and each pursued the course best suited to their own view of things.

On my second and last visit to Dundee, in 1850, I was sorry to find a want of union, confidence, and cooperation among all who had yielded obedience to the gospel of the kingdom. Roots of bitterness existed, connected with total abstinence and what was supposed to be a tendency to episcopal ambition, or leadership. Alas, when will they who would be greatest learn to become the servants of the least of Christ's flock? I judge not in the case before us, because I am not sufficiently informed of its real demerits; but I do most sincerely tender to all the friends of the kingdom's gospel the advice which I aim to practise myself, and that is, have patience till the kingdom comes, and seek no lordship until then. If we are found worthy of that kingdom, we shall share with Christ in his absolute and divine lordship over Israel and the nations. Surely this will be honour and distinction enough for the most ambitious. Till then, let us despise the microscopism of a little powerless and brief authority in the household of faith. A man of knowledge and wisdom, will have more authority and power thrust upon him by his fellows, than he will care to exercise, if his mind be rightly chastened by the truth. Let each esteem other better than himself, and all will be well. Men are sometimes made usurpers by the suspicious insinuations of others, and their intrigues to prevent usurpation. Let us beware of this; and let all things be done with love as unto God and not to men, and then harmony will be undisturbed.

Temperance is a virtue against which there is no law. Jesus Christ, our sovereign lord and king, was temperate in all things, and so are all the members of his royal household. He and they are temperate as a fruit of the Spirit—a virtue resulting from the truth believed. He was not a total abstinent. This is a fact. Neither were Paul nor Timothy; nor can Christ's members be who drink of the new covenant cup. Total abstinence was never made a test of christian fellowship by the apostles, though temperance was; for it is written, "no drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of God." Drunkenness is disorderly conduct; and from every brother that walks disorderly, we are commanded to withdraw ourselves. The saints have no right to impose tests of fellowship upon one another which the spirit of God has not imposed. The world, whose standard of morals is not God's standard, can impose what it pleases upon "its own;" but it has no right to dictate to Christ's household, who are its master's elect; nor should Christ's brethren permit it. They should be careful, too, not to drink into its spirit, nor to cooperate with it in carrying out its crotchets. If every earth-born were a total

abstinent, the world would be as far from the kingdom's gospel as if every man, woman and child were drunken with the fumes of alcohol. The soberest of the world's people have been made drunk with the wine of the great harlot's adultery—Revelation 17: 2. This intoxication continues, and will obfuscate their intellects until the Lord comes to sober them—Isaiah 25: 7. Offer the kingdom's gospel to the most pious of the world's total abstinent, and they will reject it with contempt, and perhaps with rage; or if they profess to believe it, how few of them are sober-minded enough to obey it. Let not the saints misspend their efforts, and waste their energies. If they be zealous for total abstinence, let it be for a total abstinence from all sins. The gospel needs, and commands their whole soul. Let the world attend to the liquor, to tobacco, and to the emancipation of “its own” from political and social duress imposed upon them by sin, whom they serve; be it ours, the “heirs of the kingdom,” and the future enlighteners and regenerators of mankind, cooperators with Christ in the deliverance of the world, to mind our own business, which is to open the blind eyes, to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of the adversary to God, that they may receive remission of sins, and inheritance among them that are sanctified by the faith which is in Jesus—Acts 26: 18. It is well for the world's sinners to bind themselves by oath to one another totally to abstain from all intoxicating drinks; for this is the highest obligation they can attain to. Total abstinence will improve their social condition, and mitigate the ills inseparable from it. It is doubtless attended by many temporal advantages, and highly to be commended in the man whose purpose is infirm. This being freely admitted, I still contend that none have any right to turn Christ's church into a total abstinence society, and to brand with reproach the man in Christ, who, like his Lord chooses to exercise his liberty in the temperate or moderate use of wine. “The Son of man came eating and drinking; and they said, Behold a gluttonous man, and a wine-bibber, and friend of publicans and sinners. But wisdom is justified of all her children.” John the Baptiser totally abstained, and they said, “He hath a devil.” To abstain for the purpose of “doing good” is fallacious. John's total abstinence did not save him from “decrease;” and our Lord's “increase” was not obstructed by the formation and use of wine. Believe and obey the kingdom's gospel, shine as lights in the world, holding forth the word of life; advocate it with whole-souled energy, and leave the world to its crotchets, and the saints will do all the good that is possible in this crooked and conceited generation, and all that God demands.

Our Dundee friends of the one part were zealous for “teetotalism,” as well as for the gospel, and in so far, embarrassed its relations. The others were for keeping these two things distinct, which was not interpreted by that charity which “thinketh no evil.” I pretend not to judge between them. “We considered,” said one, “that our righteousness should not be less, at all events, than that of the scribes and Pharisees of the day; and accordingly, for preventing danger, preventing or stilling the whispers of slander and their influence, it was deemed proper to express our sentiments, especially on the present damnable drinking customs, and the practice of countenancing drinkeries. Other points are not overlooked, but as the apostle directed letters to the churches, warning them of the dangers that surrounded them, so it was deemed that this gigantic evil should be particularly avoided, and testified against, and that on no account should we drink of the Abana and Pharpar of Hell. We saw that night-shade was poisonous; so, instead of cultivating and pruning it, we resolved to hew it down and cast it into the bottomless pit, so far as we were concerned. Popular precedent might be found for a mixed race of tipplers and ‘avoiders of evil,’ but in view of public opinion, and of God, and regarding, too, the necessity of purity in the primary advocates of any doctrine, we concluded without hesitation, that on this, as well as on every other evil, our position and practice should be such as we could always honestly pray, ‘Lead us not into temptation.’ If any person advocated the hope of God’s promises as incomparable incentives to morality, it would be very damaging that any one should be able to say at the conclusion, ‘Oh, he takes a dram!’”

Upon the compound principle, then, of teetotalism and the gospel, a few associated themselves to the exclusion of others, who had obeyed, but refused to pledge themselves to total abstinence. If the sobriety of any of them were doubted, they should have been received upon gospel principles, and dealt with accordingly, when they were proved to have infringed culpably the example and precepts of Christ and his apostles. This would have vindicated their zeal for christian morality far more conspicuously than by barring the door of their association with total abstinence. It is strange that believers cannot be content with what satisfied Christ and his apostles. They were as much troubled with “tipplers,” and probably more so in the wine-growing country of Palestine, than we can possibly be in these climes; yet they were contented to “purify men’s hearts by faith,” and forbore to “tempt God to put a yoke on the neck of the disciples.” But we are more sensitive to “public opinion;” that is, the opinion of a vain, foolish, and evil world, than they; therefore, we must fence ourselves in with barriers to fellowship, such as pious, but misbelieving sinners approve!

When I visited Dundee in 1850, I found a church of about fourteen members, with whom I assembled early in the afternoon. Every thing was conducted decently and in order, and harmony seemed to prevail among them. On inquiring after my “affectionate” friend and his companions in the sky-kingdom fancy, I was told that the scattered fragments of the old body had been regathered under his sceptre, and continued to meet, a cold and lifeless skeleton, on the arena of their defeat, which had been handed over to them in default of union among the proscribed, and upon their agreeing to pay the rent.

Events in Dundee disturbed the peace of “the covenanters” in the “kingdom of Fife,” whose head quarters are in Auchtermuchty. A member of the Campbellite church in Cupar, wrote to a friend, saying, “the doctor’s sentiments on the kingdom have been very freely discussed here by Dowie and others. Dowie occupied an afternoon on the subject a few weeks ago; and as he was at Auchtermuchty that same week, he came home full of the views of Campbell and Dron, and expounded them to his audience in all their aerial splendour. It was a thing of air, something which they can never comprehend, far less expound. He received great commendation from the magnates of the place, and conquered for himself the reputation of the great champion of the Master Builder of Castles in the Air. Thus, he took the liberty of going in direct opposition to the word by saying, that ‘it would be derogatory to the interests of God, for us to suppose or desire that Christ should appear again, and sit on a throne among the nations of this earth.’ I leave you to draw your own conclusions. He spoke of the kingdom of Heaven being with us as much as it ever would be, and of its having been set up on the Day of Pentecost, and told us that Christ would not come until the final winding up of all earthly things; when He will come to judge his people in righteousness. This he said was the faith of the Christian, with a great deal more of like speculation, which tickled the ear, but added nothing to the understanding or the heart.”

Such is as correct a narrative of the introduction of the kingdom’s gospel into Dundee as I am able to give from the testimony of all concerned. A goodly number of Elpis Israels, and pamphlets on the “Wisdom of the Clergy proved to be Folly,” has been put into circulation among the people, which, I doubt not, will some day or other open the eyes of many blind. On reading the book, the opinions expressed of Elpis and its author’s motives and sentiments, were both exceedingly diverse and amusing. Some “admired it.” Others “never saw nor read anything like it before.” Some desired to know “when he is coming back? Is he to set up a kirk?” For said they, “we could sit under him with much pleasure.” Dissentients objected that “the author was a Baptist.” Others that he was “something similar in sentiment to a Mormon.” “The principal thing,” said one, “I don’t like him for is, that he makes every body out wrong, but himself.” “He seems to be clever,” said others, “but then the wisest of man may err.” Speaking of the sky-kingdomers a friend says, “they are more bitter, more devilish, in their opposition to Elpis Israel. Everything that is good is attributed to evil; and what is true is insinuated as being only there for the purpose of deceiving, and getting people to believe what is false.”

My intercourse with Dundee was brought to a close by a soiree at which I had the pleasure of meeting many persons who professed to be interested in the things of the kingdom of God. After tea and coffee were removed, questions and explanations became the order of the evening until a late hour. It was then I bid farewell to Dundee, and not long after to Britain itself. What has been the condition of affairs since that time I have received no information. No news is said to be good news. Therefore, in hope that increase in faith; and improvement in practice, have been characteristic of the times, we draw the curtain upon Dundee, and turn to scenes beyond the British Tiber and camp of Mars.

PAUL'S WISH.

In Romans 9: 3, Paul says, "I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh, who are Israelites." This is one of the most difficult passages in the New Testament, as it now stands in the English version. In the preceding chapter he had asked, "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? Nay," says he, "I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other created thing, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." Should all these things fail to make him accursed, and should the anxiety he felt for the salvation of his persecuting countrymen even hypothetically prevail? This cannot be. His wish to be accursed, or separated from the love of God to be manifested in full through Christ Jesus, must have some other import than this.

Mr. Frey, an Israelite who admits the claims of Jesus to Messiahship, has proposed the following solution of the difficulty: Read the second and third verses, omitting the words, "I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ;" then, afterwards replace them where they belong, and read them as in a parenthesis, with "I did wish" instead of "I could wish." Thus, "*I have a great heaviness, and continued sorrow in my heart * * * for my brethren, my kinsmen according to flesh, who are Israelites:*" then, "I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart (for I did myself wish to be accursed from Christ) for my brethren, my kinsmen according to flesh, who are Israelites." This exhibits the mind of the apostle very clearly. He had great heaviness and sorrow for Israel, because they were while he was dictating his letter, as he was before his conversion. He had doubtless wished himself accursed from Jesus; and was probably an individual of the crowd which cried out "His blood be on us, and on our children!" After Paul was enlightened, and came to measure his position at that crisis of Christ's affliction, he beheld it in all its hideousness, so as to create in him a poignant sympathy for his kinsmen, who still remained under that self imprecated

Euchomeen, the original word, translated “could wish” in the common version, is the imperfect middle, and is rendered by “I was wishing,” “I wished,” or “I did wish.” This accords with what we have said above. He imprecated a curse upon himself—a past action—while he was in an unconverted state—another thing in the past: but when enlightened, neither all Israelites, “nor any other created thing,” could induce him to wish himself accursed again. This part of Paul’s experience well fitted him for sympathy with his unbelieving countrymen. Mr. Frey has well said, “He who has just been rescued from a dangerous fit of sickness, feels more for a sick person, than he who never knew what sickness means. Hence, even the Son of God himself needed to be tempted and tried, that he might be able to succour them that are tempted.”

PREVALENCE OF TRUTH.

“The little horn of the goat cast down the truth to the ground; and it practised and prospered.”—“And the little horn of the fourth beast, having eyes like the eyes of a man, and a mouth speaking great things against the Most High, made war with the Saints, and prevailed against them, until the Ancient of Days came.”—DANIEL.

Yea, verily, “truth is mighty, and will prevail;” but its prevalence awaits the Ancient of Days. Its advocacy is committed to the saints, who are styled “the wise.” The fortunes of the truth, and of those who witness for it, are identical and inseparable. The truth cannot prevail until the saints get the victory over “the powers that be,” by whom falsehood is tricked out in scarlet and fine linen, invested with honour and “respectability,” and sustained in the world for the idolatry of the people. That power among the nations which episcopises them, and speaks very great things, whose look is more audacious than its associate powers, makes war with the saints, and prevails against them until the Ancient of Days comes, when judgment is given to them, and they possess the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, forever—Daniel 7: 20-22, 27. The truth will then be no longer scoffed at, trampled under foot, and despised. Mean men with great names and high sounding titles, will then be stripped of their finery, and be seen shivering in the chilling blast of divine indignation. Spoiled of all their bravery, they shall walk naked, and men shall see their shame—Revelation 16: 15. But before this triumph can be proclaimed, the Lord, who is the strength of his people, must appear.

“Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory, through our Lord, Jesus Christ.” The truth is mighty through his cooperation, as evinced in apostolic times; but in his absence, Satan is too strong both for the saints and the truth committed to their defence. The time has come that men have no ear for the truth—that is, for the gospel of the kingdom. It is “new doctrine” to them, and needs to be reattested as the truth of God. A few will receive it, and but a few, compared with the multitudes that are ever ready to embrace the shallow and flimsy traditions of men. This has ever been the case; but it is pre-eminently so now, as Paul declared it would be when “the fulness of the Gentiles” should have come in. That “fulness,” if it have not reached the brim, needs, it is probable, but few more drops to fill up the appointed measure. The time of “the fulness” is indicated by the disregard of the gentiles to the goodness of God, which alone leads men to repentance unto life. That goodness is exhibited in the Gospel of the Kingdom, which John the baptiser, Jesus, and the apostles both before and after Pentecost, preached as the motive principle of repentance towards God. But this goodness in his gospel is neither understood nor believed by the Gentiles. They have not therefore “continued in his goodness;” but continue in traditions which have made the testimony concerning it of none effect upon their minds. And should Judah be broken off for this offence, and the Gentiles continue unpunished? If God spared not Judah for her unbelief, will he spare the nations? No, saith Paul, he will cut them off from access to the kingdom, and graft Israel in again—Romans 11. The impotency of the Gospel of the Kingdom upon the public mind and the hearts of individuals, is a great sign of the times; and indicates that the hour of God’s judgment is at hand, when He will through his saints execute the judgment written—Psalm 149, and make his truth prevail.

Analecta Epistolaria.

“A HEARING EAR AND A SEEING EYE.”

The Lord hath made them both—SOLOMON.

Dear Brother: —The more I read your “Herald of the Kingdom and Age to Come,” the more interesting I find it; I mean as the numbers advance. I hope you are getting some encouragement in the States. What you advocate is the truth, and must prevail; and to me it is every day more clear and delightful. Be zealous, my dear brother, and God will give you a crown of life, and never-ending felicity. What would I not give to be under your teaching. Thanks, eternal thanks, that you were ever prompted to cross the Atlantic in order to visit superstitious old Britain. Shall we ever see you again this side the resurrection? If not, oh! Happy shall I be to meet you there. How beautiful are the words of the Psalmist, “I shall be satisfied when I awake in thy likeness, O God.” But not only shall we then see David’s son and David’s Lord, but Abraham, “the Friend of God,” Isaac, Jacob, Moses and all the prophets, John and all the apostles. What a company! And what a pity if it were not true! But it is true; therefore let us thank God, and take courage.

I have some earnest disputations with old Mr. ----- . He is immovable both as regards a present kingdom, and an hereditary immortal soul. He clings tenaciously to the popular interpretation of the Rich Man and Lazarus. I asked him the other day how Abraham could converse about Moses and the prophets, when one of the prophets writes, “Doubtless, O Jehovah, thou art our Father, though Abraham be ignorant of us, and Israel (Jacob) knoweth us not.” He replied, “it did not matter; Abraham was in heaven, and the rich man saw him.” His notions about the kingdom are equally unscriptural. He has but one string to his fiddle, and upon that he is always scraping. It is the text in Colossians, “Who hath delivered us out of the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of God’s dear Son.” Although many have shown him with Greek testament in hand, that eis, translated into, is frequently rendered unto, which signification is more agreeable to the nature of Christ's kingdom; for a man cannot be said to be in a house, when only brought to it, or on the way; and thus are the people of God brought into the anticipation of enjoying it at some future period. "God hath chosen the poor of this world, rich in faith, and heirs of that kingdom, which he hath promised to them that love him." We cannot certainly be in that kingdom which is matter of promise while we walk by faith!

I made good use of the pamphlets on the Gorham question, "The Wisdom of the Clergy proved to be folly;" but they have not as yet moved any to unite themselves to Messiah. Some expressed great astonishment at "the New Doctrine," as they called it; others, that they did not understand it; a third party, that they did not approve it: and last, not least, the minister of the parish soon got word, and he lamented that I was now denying the divinity of the scriptures, and existence of the soul.

TRANSLATION INTO THE KINGDOM.

Men who understand not the nature of the kingdom of which the gospel treats, will be ever like the Scotch fiddler referred to by our Linlithgow friend—a discordant monochord! They comprehend not that “the kingdom of God is not in word but in power”—1 Corinthians 4: 20. They vainly imagine that on the supposition of their having obeyed the gospel—of their having believed the words of Peter, and having had the words, “I baptise you into the name, &c.,” pronounced over them—they are “in the kingdom, and are subjects of its reign!” Such an in-being as this is a mere matter of words, with the single act of dipping. Paul’s saying, according to their experience, ought to read, “the kingdom of God is not in power, but in words!” And this is the tree nature of the kingdom in which they say they are, and of which they are “subjects.” Behold them, and what do we see? A few men, of whom the world knows little or nothing, and cares less, hereditary assenters to the worship of Jesus, aggregated into small communities on the Lord’s day, when they ceremoniously eat bread, and prophesy to suit one another for the sake of peace! Study the organization and practices of these communities, and you have before you the kingdom of Christ according to their notions of things. They say they are in the kingdom, and being there, are kings and priests to God, and subjects of the kingdom! Over whom are they kings, and for whom do they mediate in the offering of gifts and sacrifices for sins? Are they kings, and mediators, or middle-men, for the nations, or for one another? The latter, if at all; for the nations yield them no allegiance, and bring them no offerings, and they pretend not, we apprehend, to officiate as such in “heaven.” And what is their hope? A kingdom, or rather “kingdoms beyond the skies!” They are so dissatisfied with the kingdom in which they say they are, and have in possession, that they hope to evacuate it, and to take possession of kingdoms they know not where, but somewhere, they imagine, beyond the skies! This is scraping mid the octaves sky high! But “every scribe instructed unto the kingdom of the heavens” (eis teen basileian toon ouranoon) has no respect for such fabulous speculation as this. He admits of no interpretation of “the Word of the Kingdom,” which reduces it to an absurdity. In a kingdom such as that, attuned to praise on fiddles of a single string, he sees nothing to be desired. He thanks God that his hope is not “the baseless fabric of a vision,” or words, and nothing else; but the real and substantial blessedness of all nations in Abraham and Christ; when, as an adopted son of God’s friend—James 2: 23, and a brother of his own Beloved Son, he shall with them possess Israel’s kingdom, and its dominion over all the earth, with eternal life and glory. Such is “the One Hope”—the Hope of Israel—on account of which Paul was an ambassador in chains.

The sky-kingdomers, supposing that their churches are “the kingdom of grace, imagine that the apostle has reference to translation into them when he speaks of being “translated into the kingdom of God’s dear Son.” It is to be hoped that our glorious Lord is heir of a more desirable kingdom than such “a kingdom of grace”—a kingdom in which his gospel is despised, and denounced as “wicked, destructive, and infamous heresy,” and the names of those who believe and advocate it cast out as evil. But we would remark here, that there is no such phrase in the Bible as “kingdom of grace,” absolutely or relatively to an “everlasting kingdom,” or “kingdom of glory.” This systematising of the kingdom of God is a mere human invention. His “kingdom and glory”—1 Thessalonians 2: 12, will be all of grace or favour, for they will be the manifestation of “his goodness,” which he “hath purposed in himself” (ap’ aionos) “from the age,” being moved thereto by no other consideration than his own pleasure—Revelation 4: 11. For this cause “the word of the kingdom” is styled “the word of his grace”—Acts 14: 3, to which he gave testimony by the “signs” which accompanied it. The “gospel of the kingdom” of God is also synonymised by “the gospel of the grace of God”—Acts 20: 24; so that those who have obeyed it, are said to have “access by faith into it;” as it is written, “Being justified from faith (ek pisteos), we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ: through whom also, we have access by faith into this grace, (eis teen charin tauten) wherein ye stand, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God—Romans 5: 2. Here, then, it will be seen, that the justified in Rome had been “delivered out of the power of darkness, and translated into the grace of God (en hee), in which they stood,” when Paul wrote to them. Standing in the grace of God is being “in God the Father, and in the Lord Jesus Christ,” “rejoicing in hope” of the “kingdom and glory unto (eis) which” they had been “called” through the invitation contained in the gospel of the kingdom. To deliver them out of the power of darkness was “to open their blind eyes,” an operation the sky-kingdomers of this generation have not been the subjects of as yet. So long as men are ignorant of the gospel of the kingdom, they are in darkness, and in the power of it by knowledge sincerely and earnestly believed; for it is by faith in the word of his grace that we have access into the grace of God in which we stand, when so translated or introduced. But the believer of the gospel of the kingdom of God’s grace can only get into that grace through Jesus, “the Son of his love.” Until he can prove by God’s testimony that he is in the grace, he is not delivered out of the power of darkness. Now, Paul says that it is the Father that delivers the true believer through Jesus. How is that deliverance effected in the present state? By the believer of the gospel of the kingdom lovingly admitting the claims of Jesus to its throne, recognising his divine sonship, his blood as the purifying blood of the New Covenant of the kingdom, by which the heirs of that kingdom are cleansed, his resurrection from the dead, and his ascension to the right hand of power—by his believing these things, and being united to the name of Jesus in being “baptised into the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit,” and so receiving repentance and remission of sins—by being the subject of faith and obedience such as this, he is translated into the grace of God by the Father, through the Lord Jesus Christ.

The passage in Colossians contains an antithesis, or opposition of words and things; one being “the power of darkness,” and the other, “the kingdom of God’s dear Son,” in relation to which, the apostle affirms that the Colossians had changed sides. This antithesis is expressed in the words of Jesus to Paul, when he said to him, “I now send thee to the Gentiles to open their eyes, to turn them from darkness into light (eis phoos), and from the power of Satan towards God (epi ton Theon), that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and inheritance among the sanctified by faith which is in me”—Acts 26: 18. In this text, “darkness” and “light” are the opposites; also, “the power of Satan,” as opposed to “God.” God’s light and Satan’s darkness are the antithesis in both places, and Gentiles the subject thereof at two distinct periods of their individual history. God’s light is the gospel of the kingdom of his Son, or the word of his grace; while Satan’s darkness, or the ignorance of the adversary to that light, the pagan superstition, or “spirit then working in the children of disobedience”—Ephesians 2: 1. These were the two sides of the antagonism introduced among the Gentiles by the proclamation of the glad tidings of the kingdom, announcing a New Era, when the world should be ruled in righteousness by a Man whom the God of Israel had produced for the purpose—Acts 17: 31. Now, being in the ignorance, or darkness, of the gospel’s adversary, the Gentiles could at no subsequent period become “light in the Lord,” or be in the light, unless they were “delivered” from their ignorance, and consequently its powers, and “translated into” the light of the gospel of the kingdom. The apostle saith, that the Colossian Gentiles had been the subjects of this deliverance and translation, by which they had “put off the old man with his deeds, and had put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge (or light), after the image of him that created him”—Colossians 3: 9-10—they were therefore in the new man, having put him on.

But, the original word rendered “translated,” does not require into after it to give it its full force and signification. The verb of which it is the first aorist is methisteemi, and signifies “to move from one place to another, remove, transfer.” By metonymy it also signifies, “to cause to pass from one mode of thinking to another, and to cause to change sides.” The Colossians had changed their position, as the result of their mode of thinking, being changed by the knowledge sent them from God through Paul’s preaching. Formerly, they thought as the children of disobedience think; now, their thinking was according to the mind of God; then they were in darkness; now they were in the light; then they worshipped in the temples of dumb idols; now in the assemblies of the saints: they had passed over from the adversary unto the hope of the kingdom of God’s dear Son. Having come, therefore, unto this, the apostle encourages them to hold on to it, assuring them that Christ would present them holy, and unblameable, and unreprouable in God’s sight; “if,” says he, “ye continue in the faith grounded and settled, and be not moved away from the hope of the gospel, which ye have heard, and which was preached to every creature which is under heaven”—Colossians 1: 22.

These things are as plain and obvious as the truth in Jesus. But after all, what is the use of expending the rich tones of celestial harmony upon those whose ears are responsive only to the scrapings of a tyro on a single string? The harmony of truth is sacrificed by such to one signification of an English preposition. Well, it has ever been so. Mule-itiveness and self-esteem—stubbornness and pride—are too strong for the gospel of the kingdom. They blinded Judah, laid Jerusalem and the Temple in ruins, and broke off the nation from its goodly olive; and, ere many years have passed away, they will be the capture and destruction of many “pious,” but crooked and perverse religionists, who have a zeal of God, but not according to truth. What can we do more than leave them to themselves? This may be expedient in the case of Mr.-----.

“ENCOURAGEMENT IN THE STATES.”

“I hope,” saith our friend, “you are getting some encouragement in the states.” We fear we can minister but little to his expectation in this particular. We live in “a cloudy and dark day, when the light and heat of the gospel are almost quenched by the surrounding fog. The gospel of the kingdom is understood as it ought to be by very few; and of this few, it is to be feared, it has captivated more heads than hearts. It is encouraging to perceive that “the kingdom” is a subject much more agitated than before we left the States for Britain; but even those whose minds are speculatively attracted to it, are slow to perceive that it is the pith and marrow, as it were, of that gospel, upon the belief of which Jesus has predicated the salvation of the immersed. Some, however, do see it, and this is “some encouragement;” we shall be still more encouraged if they continue under its genial influences to blossom and bear fruit unto eternal life.

The ground of our individual encouragement is laid off in Christ’s discourse—Matthew 5: 10-12—on the mountain. We are advocating the righteousness of God for Jesus’ sake, and walking in conformity with it, as the great and primary end of our existence, and subordinating all personal and relative considerations to it. We advocate it, as opposed to, and subversive of, all “orthodox” and popular systems of “piety extant;” not giving place for the twinkling of an eye to the possibility of salvation by any other thing than the gospel of the kingdom preached to Abraham, to Judah, and the nations, by the angel of God, by Jesus, and the apostles. For taking up this position and defending it against the adversary in whatever shape he may present himself, whether in the garb of “piety,” as “an angel of light,” “a minister of righteousness,” or as an open-faced antagonist of the non-professing world, we are made a mark by our contemporaries, to be perforated by the shafts of their abuse. They say “all manner of evil of us falsely;” denounce us as uncharitable, mad, wicked, and fit only to be shot or hanged. “They sharpen their tongues like a serpent;” and sometimes “their words are softer than oil, yet are they drawn swords.” Our motives are misconstrued, and only evil educed from whatever good we do. All this is encouraging, and some of that which is laying up in store on our account for the age to come. We breathe in an atmosphere of calumny, reproach, and execrable tittle-tattle; so that sometimes we are tempted to exclaim, in the words of the prophet, "Wherefore came I forth at my birth to see labour and sorrow, that my days should be consumed with reproach?" But we know ourselves as others seem not to do. They can neither duly estimate our character, nor our motives, for neither of them have any approximation to their own. But we look not at the things which are seen, and temporal; for we walk by faith, and not by sight: therefore, though "troubled on every side, yet not distressed; perplexed, but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, yet are we not destroyed." By this we are cheered, and enabled to "rejoice in hope," and in the citation of our correspondent, to "thank God and take courage."

“PREACH THE WORD.”

In writing to Timothy the apostle said, “I charge thee before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, preach THE WORD:” and in another place, he says, “Study, O Timothy, to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing THE WORD OF TRUTH”—2 Timothy 4: 1-2; 2: 15. This was a solemn charge—a charge before the two most exalted, wise, intelligent, holy, glorious and powerful, beings in the boundless universe. An apostolic charge, uttered in the presence of God’s Spirit, imparted to Paul and Timothy, by Jesus Christ, to preach and rightly divide the Word of Truth, so that God might approve him as a good workman. Here, then the thing to be preached and “rightly divided” is THE WORD OF TRUTH. But what is that Word? Will the reader accept the definition offered by one of the prophets of Jehovah? Isaiah says, it is “the law and the testimony,” and that there is no light, or knowledge, in those who speak not according to it—Isaiah 8: 20. The law of Moses is a part of “The Word,” because it is the morphosis, form, or “representation of the truth,” by which believers of the promises made to the fathers of Israel, were instructed as by a schoolmaster into the faith—Romans 2: 20-28; Galatians 3: 24. Paul preached the law when he preached the word; not, indeed, as Theologians preach the word, raining down fire and brimstone upon sinners; but as declaring the things contained in the law representative and affirmative of the sufferings of the Christ and the glory that shall follow his resurrection: thus he said before Agrippa, “I continue unto this day, witnessing both to small and great, saying none other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come.” Men cannot preach “the Word of the Truth of the Gospel” without preaching Moses and the prophets; for “the testimony for Jesus is the spirit of prophecy,” and Moses was a great prophet. Paul declared nothing else. The exposition of the writings of Israel’s prophets as partially and limitedly fulfilled in Jesus, and hereafter wholly to be accomplished in his second advent mission, constituted the apostolic preaching of the word. They were predicants of the law and testimony of God concerning his kingdom and the name of Jesus his anointed. Therefore, saith Paul, in addition to what he said before Agrippa,

“I come to you in Corinth declaring the testimony of God”—1 Corinthians 2: 1. He says, he did not come to them “with excellency of speech or of wisdom”—such wisdom and oratory as the Greeks delighted in, whose wisdom “is foolishness with God,”—he did not blend their foolish wisdom with God’s testimony, as some were beginning to do; * (See next page) “for,” says he, “I determined to take notice of nothing among you, except Jesus Christ, and this a crucified one.” He paid no regard to their wisdom or its dogmas, but introduced an entirely new system of doctrine among them, which it had not entered the heart of their “philosophy and vain deceit” to dream of—a doctrine which taught the setting up of an imperishable kingdom and empire on earth, which is to rule all nations under the administration of the King of the Jews, even Jesus, and of those Jews and Gentiles associated with Him, who shall believe what God has promised concerning it, recognise his right to the throne, believe the things concerning his name, be baptised into him, and thenceforth be faithful unto death. He taught this; and that this indestructible dominion under which all nations shall be blessed, shall not pass from one generation of rulers to another, but shall be held for ever by those promoted to its glory, honour, and power, as its establishment, thereby necessitating their resurrection from among the dead to immortality. Did it ever enter the heart of Socrates, Plato, or any other of the Greeks, to conceive of immortality of body on such principles as these? Nay, it was foolishness to them, and derided as the ignorant speculation of a wandering Jew. It was “new doctrine”—entirely new—more new to them than the gospel of the kingdom and age to come advocated by us by speech and pen, is to this generation to which it is almost unknown, though as old as the heavenly oracles of the Blessed God.

* Clemens Alexandrinus, Origen, and others of “the Fathers” as they are called by the apostasy, attempted to accommodate the truths and facts of revelation to “the wisdom of the world,” or philosophy of the Greeks. This is highly commended by Clemens in the first and sixth books of his Stromata, in which he represents that a knowledge of it is almost indispensable to an understanding of the gospel, and exhibits it as a revelation from God, and a law and rule of justification to the Gentiles, as the scriptures of the prophets were to the Israelites under the Mosaic law.

“We cannot err,” says he, “in saying that all things that are necessary and useful to life come from God, and especially that the philosophy given to the Greeks as a peculiar covenant, is the foundation of that of Christ.”—Stromata lib. vi. P. 648. “The law to the Jews, but philosophy to the Greeks until the advent of Christ, when all were called into the Church by the teaching of faith.” P. 650. “Before the advent of Christ, philosophy was necessary to the Greeks in order to justification, and still subserves the piety of those who found their faith on demonstration; for it led the Gentiles to Christ as the law did the Hebrews, and prepared the way for that which is perfected under Him.”—Stromata lib. 1. P. 282. “Origen, the disciple of Clemens, adopted this theory, and followed it in his speculations, treating the dogmas of the Greek philosophy as a key to the history and doctrines of the scriptures, and employing them, to solve the mysteries of the divine administration. He introduced accordingly into his theology a great number of false, absurd, and impious, conjectures and dogmas, which obscured, adulterated, or set aside the truth, and formed emphatically another gospel; and he was followed by a vast crowd of disciples and imitators for several ages. See Mosheim’s de rubus Christ, anta Constant., sec. Iii. Pp. 604-629. Dupin Biblioth.Nova. tom. 1. pp. 190-224. “Thus within a little more than a century of the death of the last apostle, did the ministers of the church begin to neglect and depreciate the scriptures, and adopt that wisdom by which the world knew not God as a more efficacious instrument of leading them to salvation.” Lord’s Exposit. Apoc. P. 112. It was not a hundred years after John’s death, but contemporary with the apostle’s ministry, that these preachers of another Jesus and another gospel began their work of corrupting the simplicity that is in Christ. They gave the apostles much trouble, being the Judaisers on the one hand, and the men of false science on the other; the former, enjoining circumcision and observance of the law as well as belief of the gospel and baptism, for salvation; the latter, overthrowing the faith by commingling it with the dogmas of the Greeks about immortal souls, Elysium, Tartarus, and a host of similar absurdities, too tedious to mention. It was to correct the errors, coming in like a flood upon the churches from these two sources, that the New Testament Epistles were written. Had men continued faithful and mindful of that “certain word” which was first delivered to them, the four testimonies, Acts, and Apocalypse, with Moses and the prophets, would have been amply sufficient to make wise to salvation; but seeing the errors have taken root, and exist in great force till this day, the epistles are indispensable to our emancipation from their dominion.

“Preach the Word,” then, because it contains the testimony which God has given concerning the kingdom, and all things related to it—preach the law and the testimony, for if men believe not Moses and the prophets’ writings, how can they understandingly believe the words of Jesus; for “all things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning him”—Luke 24: 44. But little comparatively has been fulfilled that is written in those records respecting the Christ. The Jews, blind as they are, see this; and, therefore, it is because the Gentiles in their ignorance claim more for Jesus than is yet accomplished in him, become a cause of the rejection of his Messiahship by Israel. Thus a counsellor who knows not the law is worse than none.

RIGHTLY DIVIDING THE WORD.

But the workman who preaches the word is to divide it rightly. No workman is approved of God who doth not do this. He is to “study,” to divide the word of truth rightly. It requires study, and much study, too, or its right division cannot be discerned. If this be neglected, the preaching or writing will be mere confusion, and the word quoted unintelligible. The hearer or reader must study as well as the speaker or writer, or the subject will be obscure to him, no matter how lucidly presented. There is a right division, and a wrong division of the word; and no division at all. The absence of division is the almost universal characteristic of popular preaching. Textualising under “three heads” is not dividing the word of truth at all, because it is not preaching the word. Neither is itemising dividing the word. By itemising, we mean the reduction of a theory to items; such as when an “evangelist” says, “the gospel consists of three items—facts to be believed; commands to be obeyed, and promises to be enjoyed.” This is true neither in theory nor division. It doth not touch the word; therefore, the workman is not approved.

To rightly divide the word of truth is, first to study it without bias, or subjection to uninspired authority, or antiquity. Attend to what is written, as a child listens to a story. Study history, and ask questions, and be thankful for all the information you can get, even if you have to pay for it. While you are engaged in this pursuit, do not imagine that you are a workman. It is not easy to become a workman in such an age as this. The great names in theology, so much applauded by the world—a world that has been “wondering after the Beast” for more than twelve centuries—were not even apprentices; they were students of the classics and systems of divinity, not students of the word. If they had been, they would never have written such foolishness as passes current with their names. No; it is the result of much time and labour to become adequately proficient for a right division of the word. Men who do not understand the prophets, have no scriptural pretensions to workmanship in the word. They can neither preach it, nor divide it. When a man comes to understand the gospel of the kingdom, believing and obeying it, he has then qualified himself to lay the foundation of faith in others. Let him go on to perfection. Let him dive into the testimony, and let it dwell richly in him, with all wisdom. If he have ability to state intelligibly what he understands, then let him work away, as unto God, and not to man. Let him search out, and apply the testimony to the Covenants of Promise; to the territory; to the subjects; to the inheritors of the kingdom; to its throne and king; to his humiliation and exaltation; to the nations; to the mystery of the Name; to the Gentile fellowship of the mystery; to the identification of his Majesty, and so forth. Here are topics to which the Word of Truth must be distributed, or “rightly divided,” and he who can do this work most efficiently, is the workman that has least reason to be ashamed before God, however much he may be slighted or reproached by men.

Now, where are we to find such preachers and dividers of the word of truth? They are like comets in our heavens for multitude! Let the reader choose a clear dark night, and go forth and count them! Under these circumstances—circumstances in which there is such a famine of scriptural intelligence—what must be done by those who are unable for themselves rightly to divide the word of truth? Let them combine for the support of a paper which appears to them best able to do it. If they know of any periodical better qualified for the work than the Herald of the Kingdom and Age to Come, let them subscribe for it with such a liberality as will compensate its editor for the time, labour, and material expended for their everlasting benefit. Such a teacher in a neighbourhood would not only be of service to individuals, but, seconded by their endeavours, would be a witness for the truth against the apostasy there. It would supply them with knowledge they could not elicit for themselves in a lifetime; and knowledge is to faith, what light is to the eye. “The people perish for lack of knowledge,” says Jehovah; therefore knowledge should be prized as life itself: for “this is life eternal, to know the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom He hath sent”—and they only know God and Jesus, who know the testimony they have given. But more of this anon.

THOUGHTS ON “WHAT IS TRUTH.”

“Seize on Truth wherever found,
On Christian or on Heathen ground.”

Alabama, September 1st, 1851.

Dr. Thomas, Dear Sir: —Permit an humble inquirer after truth to occupy a column of your truthful “Herald,” while endeavouring to search the scriptures to find the truth “as it is in Jesus.”

“Search the scriptures,” said the Son of God, “for in them ye (Jews) think ye have eternal life, and they (the scriptures) do testify of me (i.e. Christ). “I am the way, and the truth, and the life.” And, “Ye will not come unto me, that ye might have life.” “Thy word, Lord, is truth.” And thus saith the Lord Jesus to those who believed on him: “If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed; and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free.” Pilate saith unto Jesus, “What is truth? Art thou a king?” He answered, “My kingdom is not of this world. I came into the world to bear testimony unto the truth; and because I (Jesus) tell you the truth, ye believe me not, because there is no truth in you.” Thus did Christ teach, and much more, to show his disciples what was truth, and how they were to obtain immortality and eternal life. Truth, then, is the great central point—the “sine qua non” to be received, believed in, walked in, and obeyed, to entitle us as dying children of Adam to an inheritance in the kingdom of heaven, a crown of glory, when Christ shall appear to be glorified of all his saints.

The truths of God as revealed in his word, are of all things the most important to mankind; without a knowledge of which, and hearty belief thereof, “it is fearful to live or die.” Truth is verily the brightest gem that could adorn the crown, or sparkle in the attire of immortality. It is as immutable and eternal in its nature as the throne of God, which is forever. With what earnestness, what zeal, yea, what determination, then should we search for the truth, believe and defend it. We should rise up early, sit up late, and eat the bread of carefulness; leave no means untried, no stone unturned, that our hearts may receive the precious boon, and be made to rejoice in the hope of Israel, "the hope of the glory of God."

How much simplicity, what beauty and what power in the truths of the gospel! They are the wisdom of God, and the power of God unto salvation to all who believe; and would be much more intelligible to us, if they had not been learnedly obscured by ingenious and designing men, whose interest has been to throw dust in the eyes of the people, and spread a cloud of darkness and mystery over the "lively oracles."

We hear learned bishops, theologians, priests, and people, discourse about the truths of God, the Gospel of Christ, the doctrines of Grace, of Heaven, of Hell, the destiny of righteous and wicked men, immortality and eternal life, as if everything was according to their preconceived opinion. Men talk about this church and that church; our church and your church; our religion and your religion; as though there were many churches, and more than one religion, "one Lord, one faith, and one baptism." Papacy claims that out of her pale there is no salvation. Episcopacy, "without Bishops no church," and that out of her jurisdiction it is fearful to live or die. Campbellism, following in the wake, says, believe with us on the "Apostate," the head of our church; be regenerated, and saved by baptism. The Baptists, Presbyterians, and Methodists, all have their creeds, which teach a belief in Gods many, Lords, faiths, and baptisms, more than one. Thus, as it were, dividing the body of Christ, the one true church, into a thousand fragments. We cannot imagine how mankind can have such diverse and distorted views of the Church of Christ, or about it, unless it is that they have not "Christ formed in them the hope of glory;" and no conception of "what is truth," or what constitutes the Church of Christ.

Yours, truly,
N. P.

MODE OF MAKING COVENANTS.

Both from sacred and profane history, it appears that the most ancient and common mode of making covenants, was by devoting an animal as a sacrifice; cutting it into pieces, and the covenanters passing through the midst of them, and afterward feasting together. The following passages are particularly worthy attention:

“And Jehovah said to Abram, Take me an heifer of three years old, and a she goat of three years old, and a ram of three years old, and a turtle-dove, and a pigeon. And he took unto him all these, and divided them in the midst, and laid each piece one against another; but the birds he divided not”—Genesis 15: 9-10.

“Gather my saints together unto me; those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice”—Psalm 50: 5.

“I will give the men that have transgressed my covenant, which have not performed the words of the covenant which they had made before me, when they cut the calf in twain, and passed between the parts thereof, the princes of Judah, and the princes of Jerusalem, the eunuchs, and the priests, and all the people of the land, which passed between the parts of the calf; I will even give them into the hand of their enemies, and into the hand of them that seek their life; and their dead bodies shall be for meat unto the fowls of the heaven, and the beasts of the earth”—Jeremiah 34: 18-20.

The covenant between Abimelech and Isaac was accompanied by a feast:

“And they said, We saw certainly that the Lord was with thee; and we said, Let there be now an oath betwixt us, even betwixt us and thee, and let us make a covenant with thee; that thou wilt do us no hurt, as we have not touched thee, and we have done unto thee nothing but good, and have sent thee away in peace. Thou art now the blessed of the Lord. And he made them a feast, and they did eat and drink. And they rose up in the morning, and sware one to another; and Isaac sent them away, and they departed in peace”—Genesis 26: 28-31.

The making of covenants, with such rites and ceremonies, was not without its signification. The cutting the animals asunder, denoted that, in the same manner, the perjured and covenant-breakers should be cut asunder by the vengeance of God. This is evident from the above passage of Jeremiah 34: 18, and from the ancient form of these execrations, recorded in Livy, book 1. “The Roman people do not among the first break these conditions; but if they should, avowedly, and through treachery, break them, do thou, O Jupiter! on that day, thus strike the Roman people, as I do now this hog; and be the stroke the heavier, as thy power is the greater.” Hence the Hebrew expression to make a covenant, as you well know, is very expressive. Boreth Berith, signifies, to cut the purifier, or purifying sacrifice. That the origin of this ceremony is of divine institution, there can be no doubt. And like all other sacrifices, it had for its object, or antitype, the sacrifice of the Messiah, whose blood and body were one day to be violently separated, to confirm the covenant of grace.

A NEW REVELATION.

Our friend, the president and Professor of “Sacred History,” speaking of the translation of Enoch and Elijah, saith, “Their bodies, souls, and spirits, were alike taken up to heaven; but their bodies and souls were changed into a glorious harmony with their spirits. They assumed a new costume, and appeared in anew style, without the evaporation or annihilation of a single element essential to their individual and proper personalities.”—Chr. Age, Jan. 22, ’52. This account of the change they underwent is possibly correct, though we have our doubts. We would, as Kossuth says, “obsequiously” inquire, Is it certain that they “were changed into a glorious harmony with their spirits? Might the change not rather have been “into a glorious harmony with the Spirit;” seeing that Paul saith, “He that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting”—Galatians 6: 8? But, perhaps, in “this age of light and refinement” the idea of the Apostle is to be regarded as antiquated and unsuitable, and as not at all in harmony with “Sacred History” as exhibited in the prepared discourses of our mystic friend. Laying the Apostle on the shelf then, will he as the light of this cloudy day—“the great light of Bethany,” as he is styled—condescend to shine into our darkness, and tell us where in all the Bible we may find the testimony that affirms the transformation of the bodies and souls of Elijah and Enoch “into a glorious harmony with their spirits?” we have not discovered it; still it is possible “‘a that” that it may be there. But, after all, this is an age of wonder calculated to deceive almost the very elect, the idea may be a new revelation to our imaginative friend himself! We cannot, however, but regard it as a very incongruous arrangement of heavenly things that Enoch, Elijah, Moses, and Jesus, with those who came out of their graves after the resurrection, should all be themselves bodily in heaven, with no other company from earth but “disembodied ghosts!”

SPECTRES.

“I have been informed by old and experienced chemists,” says Dr. W. D. Dorris, of Nashville, “that to take the ashes of a plant, insect, or animal, properly prepared, and hermetically sealed, in a glass vessel, filled with distilled water, and exposed to the influence of the sun and moon for two years, it will, about the expiration of that time, show a transparent likeness of the original animal, plant, or insect, in the water above spoken of.”

Whether the above be a real fact, or fiction, I pretend not to say. But the alleged “transparent likeness” is “the spirit” of the animal or insect “in prison;” and sufficiently well explains what I supposititiously affirmed of the antediluvians in their present nonentity. The transparent likeness of an insect besides its ashes is more than exists of “the giants,” the mongrel progeny of the “sons of God” and the “daughters of men,” swept into prison by the Noachic flood. If you speak of them you cannot speak of them as persons; but as of spirits, or of phantasms, transparent likenesses, now in prison. Antediluvian “spirits in prison” are postdiluvian phantasmata, whose originals were the flesh and blood, whose violence filled the earth; and with whom God’s spirit in Noah strove for 120 years. What better name or term can be applied to them than “spirits,” which have neither flesh nor bones? The spirits of the antediluvians, supposed now to exist in prison, and to be preached to by disembodied evangelists, and missionaries, are equivalent to the insect-spirits, &c.; for it is affirmed of men, cattle, beasts, fowl, fish, and reptiles, by Solomon, that “they all have one ruach” or spirit. Whatever is demanded, therefore, for dead men’s ghosts, must be also conceded to the ghost of a flea. If observed at all they are but spectral impressions, or “transparent likenesses,” without intelligence or reality.

POPULAR BELIEF NOT CONVICTION.

“What, at the present day, is implied by a man accepting the position of a “believer,” and being ready to answer the question of a judicial court? Is it that his belief is the result of evidence, study, conviction, and issues in a pure and devout life? Let the public answer according to its experience. The fact is people are all such “believers” as pass muster in a court of law. Experience leads us to suppose that religious profession, to the law court requirement, means only unthinking or interested habitual conformity in ten cases, for one in which it means personal conviction; that, for one in which it implies a devout and beneficial life, it implies the more level, worldly character in a hundred.

“Now, what does the public avowal of unbelief in orthodoxy imply? Independent thought, a preference of truth to self-interest and some courage. If you tell me that a man is a “believer,” you tell me nothing. I would not trust him with half a crown without further knowledge of him. If you tell me that a man has publicly and persistently avowed his disbelief in almost universally received opinions, thereby encountering serious misrepresentation, I suspect him to be an honest, courageous man. And, paradoxical as it may sound, I should call the state of mind of that man, non-christian though he were, more religious than most ordinary “believers.” He is bound, and shows the strongest attachment, to something higher than mere selfish and prudential considerations; which is more than can be said for the common believer. How much longer shall men be bamboozled by names? What are we to look at in rating men according to their religious opinions? The net result which may be stated in a formula, or creed, communicated to the ear, and mumbled, parrot-like, by the mouth; or, are we to look to the qualities of mind and heart involved in their formation and maintenance?”—From an English Journal.

INQUIRY CONCERNING THE TWO-HORNED BEAST.

Dear Brother: —I would like to know if the Two-Horned Beast is to go into perdition before the building of the Assyrian Image, or the setting of it upon its ferro-aluminous, or iron-clay feet. If so, what is meant by “the Beast, and the Kings of the earth, and their armies, gathering together to make war against Christ and his army,” and being taken, &c. —Is the Austro-papal constituent to be destroyed first by the judgment now working; and the Beast to be again organised in another form under Russia? Also are the three brittle Toe-Kingdoms, those of Lombardy, Hungary, and Bavaria?

THE FRENCH EMPIRE A HORN OF THE BEAST.

The Arms of France under Charlemagne.

The Two-Horned Beast is not a dynasty, but a dominion for a long time contemporary with the Ten-Horned Beast; and stands related to the latter as the Little Horn among the Ten on the head of Daniel's Fourth Beast doth to the "Body" of the same. Daniel's Little Horn that had Eyes and a Mouth, is represented apocalyptically by the Two-Horned Beast and the Image of the Sixth Head of the Ten-Horned Beast—the Two-Horned dominion answering to the Little Horn, and the Image to the Eyes and Mouth. These are Two Powers, and both imperial—the one being secular, and the other ecclesiastical.

But, it might be asked, if the Little Horn without the Eyes and Mouth, be one secular imperial dominion, why is it apocalyptically represented by a beast with two horns? Would not a one-horned beast have been the proper symbol, seeing that the Eyes and Mouth are incorporated on the Image sustained by the two-horned power? There is no doubt some force in this inquiry, which deserves consideration. The solution I would offer is therefore the following: —

The symbol of imperality, which ranks above regality, is a dragon in whole or part. This obtains in heraldry sacred and profane. The Two-Horned Beast is consequently an imperial dominion; for its voice was that of a dragon — "he spake as a dragon." The Two-Horned Imperality is terrene, not maritime in its origin. John saw it coming up out of the earth; whereas in regard to the Ten-Horned Beast, he says, "I saw it rise up out of the sea." The terrene and maritime beasts, then, represent two distinct political organizations, which, of course, do not occupy one and the same territory contemporaneously. The Dragon, the symbol of the Imperial Roman Majesty before the beasts of the earth and the sea had existence, having surrendered to the Sea-Beast "his power, and his seat, and an extensive jurisdiction," was then restricted to that part of the Roman territory now included in the Turkish empire. This restriction leaves the western Roman territory as the area of the two beasts—the inland part of it, “the earth,” for the Two-Horned Beast; and its maritime, for that with Ten Horns.

The horns of the terrene beast are like a lamb’s. “He had two horns like a lamb,” says John. Now a lamb in the book of Revelation, is representative of Christ. I need not cite the many texts found there that prove this. The reader cannot be unmindful of them. “Horns like a lamb,” then, are “Christian Powers,” so called. That is, they profess to be such. They are not christian in the sense of being Christ’s; but then, they are neither Mohammedan, nor Pagan, as was the pre-Constantinian government in Rome. They are papistico-christian, that is, papal powers, speaking like the old pago-imperial dragon. Hence, Revelation 13: 11, being interpreted, will read thus—“And I beheld another political organization make its appearance in the interior of the Roman West; and two powers pertained to it styling themselves Christian; and the nature of the dominion was imperial.”

“It had two horns like to a lamb.” The words are not “the two horns.” It had two horns; but there is nothing in the text indicative of their contemporary existence from the rise to the final destruction of the beast-polity. It is simply the fact that two horns pertain to it at certain periods of its history; so that if we were to give the beast an historic title, we might designate it by that horn which was proved the most enduring and permanent.

The power or strength of the beast is found in his horns. What is affirmed, therefore, of him in relation to the Image, Eyes and Mouth, is predicable of the horns. Hence, they compel the inhabitants of “the earth” over which they have jurisdiction, to worship, or do homage to, the Sixth, or Imperial, Head of the Sea-Beast; that is, they set up imperialities, or Emperorships, and compel those they make subject, to swear allegiance to them. They “make fire to descend out of the heaven into the earth in the sight of men.” This is the result of their policy, which astonishes the world. “Fire in the earth” signifies apocalyptically, war in the interior of the Roman West. It is caused by the beast’s horns, whose sphere of operation is its political heaven. Their disagreement results in war, which therefore descends like fire, as it were, from their heaven.

The policy of the Beast is the policy of its horns. Hence, one and both of them when existing, cause the dwellers in their dominion to wander. This they effect “through the miracles it is given it to do in the face of the beast” of the sea—through the Earth-Beast’s victories, which are therefore gained during the life of the Sea-Beast. The result of these miracle-victories is the setting up of an Image to the beast (which has the sword-wound and lived) by its people after which all the westerns wander. Without the Earth-Beast’s Horns, the Image of the Sea-Beast’s Sixth Head is a mere dumb idol—a dumb dog of a prophet that can neither bark nor bite. It was therefore “given to the Earth-beast to impart breath to the Image, that it might speak, and cause to be killed all that would not do homage to the image.” Thus, the political life of the Image depends upon the Horns, or Earth-Beast. Destroy this beast, and the image dies. The Earth-Beast’s people were compelled to set up the Image by the horns or governments; and it is only by these that their obedience can be perpetuated. Let the horns leave the image to the affection and tender mercies of French, Germans, Hungarians, and Italians, “that dwell on the earth,” and it would be annihilated in the twinkling of an eye.

The Earth-Beast causes the Image to be made to or for the Sea-Beast—eikona to therio. The Dragon did not cause the Image to exist, and speak very great things against the Most High, to kill or wear out his saints, and to think to change times and laws. Neither did the Ten-Horns; nor any of the Heads of the Sea-Beast. It was the Imperial Earth-Beast alone that accomplished this. When, however, the Image was created in the likeness of the Sixth Head, the ten Horns come at length to accept it as the Lion-Mouth of their polity; so that in the judgment, they give their power to the terrene beast, and are found in association with him, and his image prophet, warring against the Lamb.

“In the judgment.” By this I mean, that judgment which “shall sit” when “judgment is given to the Saints of the most High;” who, as “his wheels of burning fire,” shall take away the beast’s dominion to consume and destroy it to the end. In that judgment but one beast is apocalyptically apparent. This is the Ten-Horned Sea Beast under an Eighth Head—one Leg in fact of Nebuchadnezzar’s Image. The beast of the earth having occasionally two horns, merges, so to speak, into the Sea-Beast, of which one of its horns becomes the Eighth Head; and then it stands related to the polity as the Little Horn of Daniel’s Fourth Beast to the other Seven Horns; so that it is the Eighth Horn, comprehending in its primary dominion the Three Uprooted Horns. The Little Horn or Eighth Head survives the overthrow of Gog in the Holy Land, who, as an imperial horn of the Earth Beast (not yet, however manifested as such) by his fall terminates the symbol, and leaves only the Ten-Horned Sea-Beast with his Eighth Head to continue the contest with the Lord and his Saints.

“The beast that was, and is not, even he is the Eighth.” A political organization of the Roman West, admitting the contemporary existence of two Emperors, is represented by the Earth-Beast and its two horns. But when by some notable revolution, that contemporaneity is finally (not temporarily as aforetime) but finally terminated, the Earth Beast becomes “the beast that was, and is not;” but then, seeing that a western emperorship still continues in the midst of the Ten-Horn-Kingdoms, it is styled “the beast that was, and is not, and yet is.”

The Seven Heads of the Sea-Beast were thus explained to John. “The seven heads are,” or represent, “seven mountains on which the woman (Rome) sitteth. And there are Seven Kings; five are fallen, and one is, and the other is not yet come; and when he cometh he must continue a short space. And the beast which was, and is not, even he is the Eighth, and is of the Seven, and goeth into perdition.” This shows that the Eighth Head is to be looked for in Rome; for “the Woman is that great city that reigneth over the kings of the earth.” Thus from the foundation of Rome to its final destruction, God has decreed the existence of Eight Heads, or forms of government. All the powers of earth combined cannot establish a ninth. Dynasties or Sovereign families, may change any number of times; but the form of sovereignty they administer in Rome can only vary from one to eight inclusive. When John wrote the apocalypse, he was living under the dominion of the Sixth Head. This was the imperial, the Emperor Domitian being the reigning Prince. The imperial form of government continued to rule in Rome until it was wounded by the sword of the Barbarians. The consequence of this wound was fatal to the empire of the west, which became totally eclipsed in A.D. 476. The dethronement of Augustulus, the last emperor, made way for the Seventh Head, which, says the angel, “must continue a short space.” This form was the Gothic Kingly which continued only 60 years—a short space compared with the previous duration of the imperial, which lasted about 600 years.

The Gothic Kingly Sovereignty was finally suppressed by Belizarius and Narses, the generals of Justinian, emperor of Constantinople, who reigned there as prince of the sixth head of the Dragon. The fall of the Seventh Head of Rome was marked by the forcible evacuation of the city by all its inhabitants; so that for forty days it was deserted of every living thing. From this time until Christmas A.D. 799, about 240 years, Rome had no sovereignty at all; but on the settlement of Italy by imperial decree from Constantinople, it was reduced to the rank of the second city of the Dragon-empire which at this time included Italy within its bounds. During this long period, it was still the residence of the Bishop of Rome, who being without political life could neither wear out the saints, kill, nor change times and laws. There was then no imperial image, nor any rival emperor in the west. There was one in Constantinople, and he was the only one on the Roman territory.

Thus affairs continued until A.D. 799-800. “I saw,” says John, “one of the Sea-Beast’s heads as it were wounded to death.” It was certainly a severe wound, the effect of which was to put the head hors du combat from A.D. 476 to A.D. 800, a period of three hundred and twenty-four years. It was truly “a deadly wound,” and would be considered by the generations of the period as so deadly as to be beyond prospect of recovery. But to the eye of faith divinely enlightened, its recovery was certain, though how it might be effected would not so obviously appear. “His deadly wound was healed,” says the apostle; by which is to be understood, that Rome would become imperially sovereign again. The wound put an end to this form; hence the healing of it required its restoration. It was restored accordingly. A Franco-German dominion arose out of the interior west and spread into Italy, where it has had the ascendancy unto this day. It was founded by the renowned Frenchman Charlemagne, one of the sons of Pepin, the usurper of the throne of France. Like his father before him, he was a great benefactor and patron of the Bishop of Rome, who intrigued with him against the rights of the Constantinopolitan emperor, and procured him to set up for Roman emperor himself. This was not difficult to effect. The emperor on the Bosphorus was weak in Italy, and Charlemagne was ambitious of becoming a successor of the renowned Caesars. The manifestation of the plot was therefore duly planned between the Bishop and the King—the Bishop was to crown and proclaim him emperor of the Romans on Christmas Day, A.D. 799-800; and the new emperor was to do great things for the Bishop and the Church, which he did, much to his regret and annoyance before he died.

The day having arrived Charlemagne proceeded to St. Peter's church where he assisted at mass. In the midst of the ecclesiastical ceremonies, and while he was on his knees before the altar, the Bishop of Rome advanced, and put an imperial crown on his head. As soon as the people perceived it, they cried, "Long life and victory to Charles Augustus, crowned by the hand of God! Long live the great and pious emperor of the Romans." During these acclamations, the bishop conducted him to a magnificent throne, which had been prepared for the purpose; and as soon as he was seated, paid him those honours which his predecessors had been accustomed to pay to the Roman emperors, declaring that instead of the title of Patrician, he should henceforth style him Emperor and Augustus. He then presented him with the imperial mantle; with which being invested, Charlemagne returned amid the acclamations of the populace to his palace. The bishop, continues the historian, had surely no right to proclaim an emperor; but Charles was worthy of the imperial ensigns; and although he cannot properly be ranked among the successors of Augustus, he is justly considered as the founder of the New Empire of the West.

Thus was the deadly wound of Rome's imperiality healed. Though Charlemagne did not reside there, his residence being at Aix-la-Chapelle, he established in Rome an image of his own authority, or that of the Sixth-Head revived. There was now an Eighth Sovereignty with the Bishop of Rome turned into its image or representative. This Eighth "is of the Seven," that is, of the same form as one of them, namely, imperial. The dominion thus uniting in the emperor and the pope is known in history as the Holy Roman or French Empire; and in the days of Charlemagne comprehended all France, all Germany, part of Hungary, part of Spain, the Low Countries, and the Continent of Italy as far as Benevento. This was its original manifestation when it “came up out of the earth.” Since that time it has passed through various phases, but its main features may be traced in the German Empire, until it shone forth as the French Empire again under Napoleon the Great, who used to boast himself of being the successor of Charlemagne. When he fell from his high estate, the House of Hapsburg became in 1815, the sole horn of the dominion, and has continued to monopolise the imperality with the pope, until 1852, when a second horn has shown itself in the French Empire revived under Napoleon III. This man’s model is his uncle, whom he imitates in all details. He is heir of all his uncle’s claims, and therefore of Charlemagne, whose empire stands revealed in the greater part of its original extent under Two Imperial Horns instead of one, and both of them concentrating their influence for future developments upon Italy, the Pope, and Rome.

Since 1815, and until the recent proclamation of the French Empire, the Earth-Beast was known as the Austro-papal dominion; for the time being, however, and until the French Horn is broken, and gives place to the Bourbon Horn of the Ten Horned polity, the Earth-Beast imperial sovereignty may be styled the Franco-Austrian Papality. The elements of this are two emperors and the pope—emperors as yet uncrowned, and both from the necessity of their position, claimants upon Rome as the throne which confers Eighth-headship upon the crowned. Which will he anoint as successor to Charlemagne? Will he crown them both? Will Napoleon, whose soldiers garrison Rome, prevent this? If the pope crown Louis Napoleon emperor, will he of Austria acknowledge his pre-eminence, and consent to be crowned by an inferior hand, or to remain uncrowned at all? These and similar are questions whose solution must result from the working of the “three unclean spirits like frogs.” They can only be determined by the sword, which will cut the knot that cannot be untied.

The Earth-beast imperality has now existed 1052 years, having arisen out of the earth after the beast of the sea. It is a dominion that has nearly always had an emperor with a pope, but with a jurisdiction not always of the same extent. It has not, however, always been two-horned. An emperor and pope are one, as a man's eyes and mouth are one with his face. When two emperors or horn-powers, having relation to Rome and Italy, appear at the same time, their continued peaceable existence, is impossible in the nature of things. One pair of eyes and a mouth to two faces is a deformity that cannot endure. Were there a pope to each horn, and two Romes, things might get along tolerably well; but two of diverse interests coquetting with one and the same harlot, cannot fail of bringing the two adulterers to blows. Two horns are therefore the anomaly, not the law of the dominion, which, when it obtains must result in a struggle between them for the ascendancy. This was illustrated in the case of Napoleon the Great and the Austrian Emperor. Their powers were the two horns of the Earth-Beast. Their contest was bloody until the House of Hapsburg succumbed, and the French Empire ruled over all; or Napoleon and the Pope made a Concordat between themselves.

The Beast of the earth and the Beast of the sea are both destined to “go into perdition.” But before the perdition comes, the combat between the two horns of the Earth-Beast must be decided; so that one of them may be finally planted on the Sixth-Head of the Sea-Beast as its Eleventh, or Three-Horned Eighth Head, as represented in Daniel. Which Earth-Beast horn, then, will become the permanent “Eighth” of the Scarlet-coloured Beast on which the Woman sitteth? Will it be the French or Austrian? I should say the Austrian, seeing that in Revelation 11: 11, France, the plateia or Broadway is there styled “the Tenth Part of the City”—a tenth kingdom of the Sea-Beast. It was originally a Sea-Beast Horn before Charlemagne founded the French Empire. French imperialism is a preternatural or anomalous state of affairs. It is very congenial to French ambition, but not to the foreign relations of France. This country can only maintain harmony with its neighbours as a kingdom, with a dynasty having common interest, and in good fellowship with the other sovereign families of the West. The French imperial horn will doubtless create a great uproar among the nations, and perform great miracles with the sword. Austria may be expelled from Italy, and reduced to great extremity at home; but, backed by Russia and Prussia, the fortune of war will turn in its favour, as in the days of Napoleon the Great, and the French Empire will wane to its irrecoverable and final overthrow. On the fall of the French Empire the Kingdom of France will appear again; and the Charlemagne dominion under one emperor, sovereign of three Horn or Toe-Kingdoms previously plucked up by the roots, and surrounded by seven satellite thrones, all having the papal superstition for their state-creed, and the Pope for their Lion, or Babylonish, mouth or prophet—will, I conceive, be the political constitution of the Roman West, contemporarily with the Russian autocratic sovereignty of the East.

The Earth-Beast imperialism, then, does not “go into perdition” before the manifestation of Nebuchadnezzar’s Image in all the terribleness of the “latter-days” exhibition to that monarch in his dream; though one of the horns now existing does. The iron, latter-day, element of the image, is the Sea-Beast with the then one-horned Earth-Beast for its Eighth Roman imperial Head, with Eyes like a man, and a mouth speaking great things. The Head of Gold is like Nebuchadnezzar, not Roman, but Assyrian, rising into view from beyond the Roman limits, far into which he protrudes his power until he becomes the Chief of the Image-Polity in the Feet-period of the times of the Gentiles. The power of the latter-day Assyrian Head being the cementing principle by which the constituents of the Sea-Beast are held together (for unless the Horn-toe governments, and Eighth Head are sustained by Russo-Assyrian potency, the French Horn-Sovereignty, essentially and necessarily revolutionary and democratic, would prove too strong for their cohesion) is not only the Head of Gold, but the Clay-element of the Feet, combining their parts with fragile union into the Leg and Feet polity of the Image, answering to the Fourth Beast of Daniel. The latter-day Assyrian, “ladeth himself with thick clay,” “because he spoils many nations”—Habakkuk 2: 6, 8. He is therefore the golden head of those nations—the clay with which he combines their sovereignties into a political fabric standing erect upon its feet. Among these nations are those of Macedonia, Syria, Egypt, and Persia; so that he will then be the Head of the Silver, and Brazen parts of the image-polity as well as of the Roman.

The manifestation of such a political organization as this argues a great conflict among the powers. This is inevitable, and necessary for the formation of the premillennial crisis. The French imperial horn of the Earth-

Beast—THE FROG POWER—is created for this very purpose. No matter what Louis Napoleon may profess, its mission is to involve Austria, and Turkey, and Russia, itself, Britain, and all their allies, in war; that, as the result, the polity represented in Revelation 17 and Daniel 2 & 7, may be brought out. When the conflict with the French empire, as a principal in the war is ended, the ten-horn governments “receive power as kings one hour with the Beast;” that is, “God puts in their hearts to fulfil his will, and to agree to, give their kingdom to the Beast”—to that horn of it which survives the war, “until the words of God be fulfilled.” This they will do with unanimity; for, “they have one mind, and shall give their power and strength unto the Beast.”

The symbolical period during which the Ten Horns of the Sea-Beast give their kingdom to its Eighth Head, is styled “one hour.” This is representative of thirty years, upon the principle that a Jewish day of twelve parts, or hours, is sometimes representative of a time or year of years of twelve parts, or months, or hours, of years. A year of 360 days is representative, then, of a time or 360 years, which being divided by 12, yields 30 years, or one hour of a time. It is during the last hour of their existence, that “they make war with the Lamb who overcomes them.” Before, however, the war begins between the belligerents, the Lamb descends from the right hand of God to “the white cloud,” whence he reaps the harvest of the earth—Revelation 14: 14-16—in smiting Nebuchadnezzar’s image with the stone upon the mountains of Israel. This accomplished, he descends to Mount Zion where he appears with the 144,000 “who follow him whithersoever he goeth. These are the redeemed from among men, the firstfruits unto God and to the Lamb”—Revelation 14: 6-7. The righteous dead raised, and the Dragon bound, the next thing is the proclamation to the world of the judgment-hour having arrived, with an invitation to the nations to submit to God—Revelation 14: 6-7. But the invitation will not be regarded. The cry of them who had once been slain, and had for ages lain unavenged under the altar, at length prevails, and the Lamb yields to their earnest solicitation to thrust in his sharp sickle, and gather the clusters of the vine of the earth—Revelation 6: 9-11; 14: 18-20; 16: 6; 19: 15. The clusters of this vine are the ten kingdoms clustered around the Eighth Head, gathered together to make war against the Lamb and his army—Revelation 19: 19. The war is initiated with the fall of Rome, the throne of the Eighth Head, which sinks like a millstone in the sea—Revelation 14: 8; 18: 21. During the continuance of the war, the goat nations subject to the Eighth Head polity, or Sea-Beast carrying the Harlot, are tormented with terrible defeats, and all the horrors of pestilence, and famine, and of fire and sword, “in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb” eis aionas aionon, until, or “unto ages of ages”—Revelation 14: 9-11, 19-20: that is, to the end of the hour of judgment, or thirty years aforesaid, which terminate in the commencement of the thousand years reign. This judgment-hour is the period of Israel’s restoration; and the time in which the Saints “execute the judgment written” against Daniel’s Fourth Beast, and John’s Beast of the Sea. They slay him, and destroy his body with the burning flame; or as John expresses it, “cast him alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone”—Psalm 149: 5-9; Daniel 7: 11, 22, 26; Revelation 19: 20. Thus, by the end of the war perdition will have triumphed over the Eighth Head, the False Prophet, and the Kings of the Earth; the constituents of the Scarlet coloured Beast, upon which the drunken mother of Harlots now sits amid the nations she has intoxicated with her mystery and abominations.

But before the Roman Babylon sinks like Sodom into the subterranean, and before the Ten Horns make war upon the Lamb and his army, they will “hate the Harlot and make her desolate and naked, and eat her flesh, and burn her with fire.” This will occur before the Lamb descends to “the white cloud.” Now the problem to be solved here is, How will the ten horns be brought to make the throne of the Beast desolate, seeing that they agree to give their Kingdom to the Eighth-Head? “The woman which thou sawest is that Great City which reigneth over the Kings of the earth”—the ten horns: What shall cause them to make their own imperial capital desolate? My reply is, because it is in the hand of a common enemy. That enemy, I believe, is the imperial French horn, which is even now in possession of the city. It sent its troops there under pretence of devotion to the Pope, but really to look after French interests in Italy. Those interests, which are imperial interests, need as much looking after now, as when the Frogs first swarmed in Rome. It is these interests, which are not the interests of the Ten Horns and their future Head, that will kindle a flame in Italy, and bring the power of the Horns and Head against Rome for the expulsion of the French, in effecting which she will be burned with fire, but not entirely and finally destroyed; for that destruction is the glory of the Lamb and his 144,000, who judge her rejoicingly—Revelation 18: 6, 8, 20.

The conflict between the two existing horns of the Earth-Beast for the Eighth Headship, brings Rome's pre-adventual calamities upon her. The hatred of the kings against the city continues so long as she remains in the hand of the French horn; which it is probable, will avail itself of the cooperation of the malcontents in all their countries in furtherance of its ambition. This will make them hate Rome with the most cordial hatred as a focus of an influence and power, seeking their overthrow or subjection to its will. A sense of common danger will unite them to Austria, Russia, and one another. Without these two sovereignties, they could not continue the war with the French horn, being weakened by the disaffection of their people. Hence, self-preservation works unanimity; and causes them "with one mind to agree to give their kingdom to the (Austro-Russian) Beast." By this Ferro-Aluminous power they are enabled to stand in spite of Democracy and the French Empire; and even to expel their hated antagonists from Rome, and to suppress for ever French ambition, and the revolutionary spirit in all their dominions. When they have accomplished the work of suppressing the French empire, and the conquest of Rome, their hatred is converted into affection for the Harlot, as is clear from this saying that is written, "And the Kings of the earth (the ten horns) who have committed fornication, and lived deliciously with her, shall bewail her, and lament for her, when they shall see the smoke of her burning, standing afar off for fear of her torment, saying, Alas, alas that great city Babylon, that mighty city! for in one hour is thy judgment come." Their "Eternal City" having gone thundering into the abyss, her destroyers will come upon them, and tread them as ashes under the soles of their feet—Malachi 4: 3; for the day of vengeance is in all their hearts to give them blood to drink because of all the righteous blood they have shed in the service of the detested Harlot in all their several lands.

These ten horns "agree and give their kingdom to the Beast." By this is not meant that their governments cease to be. Their kingdoms continue to exist until broken in pieces and consumed by the Stone-kingdom of the Saints; for they make war upon the Lamb and his army by whom they are destroyed. They do not, then, cease to be kingdoms by becoming republics, or by merging as provinces into the Austrian or Russian empires; but they continue as independent monarchies under an emperorship, as New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and other States, are independent republics under a presidency. These States have given their dominion to the general government; so that they can no longer act constitutionally in relation to foreign affairs in making treaties, war, &c., without it; and should they be unable to maintain order within their own limits, the federal government would enable them to do it, and so become "their power and strength." They cannot wage war with each other. If they were to try the experiment would intervene with the forces of the Union to compel peace between the belligerents. A similar arrangement between the Ten Horns and Eighth Head for mutual safety and preservation, is what I understand by the Kings "agreeing to give their kingdom to the Beast"—an agreement brought about by the perils created by French ambition, and the revolutionary spirit of the Democracy.

Of these ten horn-kingdoms three become the imperality of the Eighth Head—the Columbia-district, as it were, of the Sea-Beast confederacy. The man occupying the imperial throne is the King of three several kingdoms, which gives imperality to his official character. They are "plucked up by the roots," as Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia would be if merged into the District of Columbia, and subjected to its constitution and laws. The Horns plucked up by the roots are subdued by the Eighth Head; and will, I believe, prove to be Lombardo-Venetia, Hungary, and Sardinia. The Protestantism and constitutionalism of the last named mark it as a victim of the Beast. Of this, however, we shall not long continue in suspense.

QUERY CONCERNING THE TWO BIRTHS.

Dear Brother: —I have been questioned about the conversation between Christ and Nicodemus by a Baptist missionary, and was at a loss. I have since thought a great deal on the subject, and have quieted my mind in this way—that in the third chapter and fifth verse of John, Christ in speaking of the two births, had reference to immortality. He spoke of water and spirit, saying, that we must be born of both to be admitted into the kingdom. Now it appears to me, that Christ did not apprehend any misunderstanding about the water birth; but explained the nature of the spiritual birth, that it might be comprehended; and then goes on to speak of “heavenly things,” without further mention of the water, which originated my conclusion.

Now, if I am in error in believing that those who are immersed having the right faith within them are born of water and begotten of the spirit, and if they travel, having Christ in their hearts, without abortion, they will be born of the spirit when he appears to clothe them with immortality, and give them possession of the kingdom—I want you, as I take you to be a faithful student of the word, to explain that discourse, and set me right. I lack teaching; and one would think I would receive instruction from any of those who advocate the doctrine of the fraternity to which I belong; but I asked an aged minister his views, and as soon as I mentioned my belief of the spiritual birth being immortality, or an immortal birth, and that to take place at the appearing of Christ, he rather upbraided me, and took no pains to set me right.

I now think best to inquire of one who knows the nature of the kingdom we are to expect. I am a reader of the Herald. If you will condescend to notice this, and choose to reply in that paper, I shall meet it there, no accident preventing. Your friends here join in love with me, wishing that health, life, and means may be granted you, that your services may continue until a multitude may duly appreciate the knowledge it is your labour and privilege to supply.
I subscribe myself your sister,

CHRIST'S DISCOURSE WITH NICODEMUS.

In John 3: 3, Jesus states a truth in relation to God's kingdom over which he is to preside with the saints, which is unalterable and indispensable, and which the lapse of eighteen centuries has rendered no less imperative than at the moment he enunciated it—Except a man be begotten from above, he is unable to see the Kingdom of God. This is a great truth; and to those who understand the nature of the kingdom, an obvious one. It is a truth of similar construction to this, that except a man be begotten from beneath, he is not able to possess the things of Satan's kingdom. And why? Because he would have no existence at all; but would be as his father Adam, before the Lord of the Elohim formed him from the ground, by the Spirit of the Invisible God. A man must be begotten of sinful flesh, or he cannot see the things of the flesh; and this begettal is the being begotten "from beneath," to which Jesus refers, in saying, "Ye are from beneath; I am from above: ye are of this world; I am not of this world." The Jews sprung, ek toon kato, "out of things below"—that is, of blood, of the impulse of the flesh, and of the will of man; while he originated, ek toon ano, "from things above"—that is, of the Spirit, and the will of God.

Jesus, then, who is "THE HEIR OF ALL THINGS," was "begotten from above," genneethee anoothen. He was thus begotten to the days of his flesh; for he was not the Son of Joseph, but of God. Nevertheless, "the flesh profiteth nothing; it is the Spirit that makes alive." Jesus was crowned with glory and honour, not because he had been begotten from above of God's spirit before he was born of Mary; but because he was obedient unto death, and made perfect through sufferings. Having attained to moral perfection, (not that he was ever immoral for he was "without sin;" but until "the temptation," he was simply innocent, his virtue, or obedience to the Father, not having been tested by his sufferings,) he was made alive by the Spirit, or from above, and so became "the Son of God with power, according to the Spirit of holiness, by resurrection from the dead."

The Lord Jesus was the subject of two spirit-begettals and two births—the former were both of the Spirit; and the latter its consequents. His fleshly birth was of Mary, which we are not now considering. His first spiritual birth was on being “born of water,” and so fulfilling the righteousness of God; which multitudes think was quite necessary for the sinless Jesus, but not for them! After this birth his trials commenced; and his “patient continuance in well doing” prepared him, or rather became the premises upon which was predicated his second birth; that namely, from the dark and gravid womb of the grave where all his brethren lie. Thus he was “born of the Spirit,” and became “the Lord, the Spirit;” or as Paul has it, eis pneuma zoopoioun, “the last Adam was made into a spirit which shall make alive;” for zoopoioun is the second future participle whose sign is going to make alive. Thus, “that which is born of the flesh is flesh,” like all the sons of the first Adam; “and that which is born of the spirit is spirit,” like the second Adam, the Elder Brother and captain of the saints.

“Flesh and blood,” says Paul, “cannot inherit,” or possess, “the kingdom of God.” And why? Because, as he says, “corruption cannot inherit corruption.” The kingdom of God is the incorruptible, undefiled, and unfading inheritance of the saints—the kingdom preparing for the blessed of their Father. It is “that which shall never be destroyed,” and which “shall not be left to other people.” That is, when it is given to the Father’s blessed ones, it shall henceforth be possessed by them, and by them only: “it shall not be left to other people;” but “the saints shall possess it for ever, even for ever and ever.” Now, that which is born of the flesh is flesh and blood, and “dead,” or mortal and corruptible. How true this must be of mankind in general, in view of what Paul says to saints in the present life—“Ye are dead,” apethanete, says he; —a word which signifies to become putrescent, or dry as a withered tree. This was the new law of their being relatively to “earthly things,” on which they were forbidden to set their affections. Their bodies were “dead because of sin;” and their affections were dead to earthly things; so that as far as flesh and blood, and world, were concerned, they were mortal and corruptible, and only so. But they had a hidden life. It was not a physical principle within them. All that was there was the word of life, assuredly believed; in which sense Christ, the word, was there, dwelling in their hearts by faith. By holding on to this word, they held on to eternal life—on to the Lord the spirit, who is to give them life in his day. They were dead; but “Your life,” continued the apostle, “is hid with Christ in God; and when Christ, your life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory.” This being the condition of saints, unresurrected and unchanged, it is clear that they are physically incapacitated for possessing the kingdom of God. However worthy and acceptable before him, they cannot, being mortal, “enter the kingdom of God,” and possess it forever, until born of the spirit, for till then they are not spirit, but flesh only.

The saints must become “spiritual bodies,” or spirits, before they can “see,” so as to possess, the kingdom. Now, as a begetting of blood, or of the flesh, or of the will of man, cannot produce spirit-body, there is no ground for marvel that a second birth should be a necessary preliminary to the inheriting the kingdom of God. Hence, the Lord Jesus said to Nicodemus, “Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born from above.” He then went on to say, “The Spirit breathes where he pleases, and thou hearest his voice, but thou knowest not whence he comes, and whither he leads; in like manner is every one being begotten of the spirit.” Thus are men begotten from above—by the voice of the Spirit breathing forth the truth, when, where, and how, he pleases. In some places, he will not breathe it at all; but on occasion positively forbids its utterance—Acts 16: 7.

But the inability of man to possess, or to enter, the kingdom of God, is twofold; for while corruptible flesh and blood cannot inherit it, neither can the unrighteous. “Be not deceived,” says Paul; “the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God.” The unrighteous are as putrescent of heart as they are of flesh. The saints cannot inherit the kingdom until they cease to be flesh and blood; and sinners cannot inherit it, until they cease to be unrighteous as well: thus, there is but one hindrance to saints, but two obstacles in the way of sinners—for “sinners shall not stand in the congregation of the righteous.” The being begotten from above, therefore, has relation to the begetting, of a sinner to God’s righteousness, that, like Jesus, the great exemplar of the faith, he may fulfil that righteousness in being born of water. “Of his own will the Father of lights begat us by the word of truth, that we might be a kind of first-fruits of his creatures.” In these words, James teaches us that God is the begetter; and “the word of truth,” the means by which he begets the first-fruits who are to attain to eternal life and glory, before the general harvest of the sons of Adam. This word of truth is “the word of the kingdom,” which, as good seed, is sown into honest and good hearts. Referring to this, Peter says, “begotten again of incorruptible seed through the word of the living God, abiding even unto the age, and preached as gospel unto you.” Now, every one that believes this gospel with full assurance of faith, is begotten of the Father of lights; that is, “from above:” and in proof of it, they “purify their souls in the obedience of the truth through the Spirit.” “The words I speak unto you are spirit and are life,” says Jesus; and it is such words that bring honest hearts to “the obedience of the faith,” for which purpose the gospel was ordered to be preached. A man found in the obedience of the truth is one who believes the gospel of the kingdom, and has been baptised, according to the wholesome words of the Lord Jesus. The apostle addresses such an one as washed, sanctified, and justified. Thus, “Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God. Be not deceived: neither fornicators, idolaters, adulterers, effeminate, abusers of themselves with mankind, thieves, covetous, drunkards, revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God. And such were some of you: but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the spirit of our God.” This is equivalent to saying they had been born of water and of spirit; for in the days of the apostles, believers in the kingdom were baptised into the name of the Lord Jesus, and so found in him and in his name; and I find no place in God’s book where this old-fashioned custom has been abolished.

This being begotten from above, then, leads to a twofold birth from below—first, from water; and secondly, from the grave: and the one is as necessary as the other to the entering of the kingdom of God. “He that believes the gospel and is baptised shall be saved.” He that spake these words also said, “Except a man be born out of water (ex hydatos) and spirit he cannot enter into the kingdom of God”—and he that enters not into that kingdom is a lost man. A man not begotten from above, is “alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in him;” he is “dead in trespasses and in sins;” he is not in Christ: he is (even though an immersed man) unwashed, unsanctified, and unjustified. The first thing is to believe the gospel of the kingdom; and then to put on Christ by being introduced into his name. This is the first effectual move towards glory, honour, incorruptibility, and life in the kingdom of God. What remains is, “be faithful unto death, and Christ will give thee a crown of life,” when he unlocks the gates of the unseen, and wakes his sleeping brethren from the dust. Their regeneration then will be complete, but not before. Awake, they once more stand upon the earth; no longer, however, flesh and blood, but flesh, bones, and spirit, as the Lord the spirit, and “equal to the angels,” and therefore deathless, and fit for the kingdom of God.

“Consider Christ Jesus,” says Paul, “the Apostle and High Priest of our confession.” He is the heir of all things terrestrial; and the saints are joint-heirs with him of all God has covenanted to him. He is the way and the truth, as well as the resurrection and the life. Would we know the true way to the kingdom? Consider the narrow way in which Jesus walked, and follow in his footsteps; for he left us an example that we should follow in them. The members of Christ’s house are with him the children of a common father, even God. They have all therefore since the proclamation of “the mystery” to follow him through the water and the grave. I speak not of those who remain at his appearing. These saints, washed and justified, will not pass through the grave; but will become spiritual bodies, or spirits, being begotten to this from above in the twinkling of an eye. All else follow Jesus through the water and the grave; and, after his example, rising from the dead, “are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection:” so that it can be said to them in the prophetic words addressed to the Lord’s Anointed, “Ye are my sons, this day (of your resurrection) have I begotten you.”

The kingdom of God is a spiritual institution. I do not mean by this it is a mere aura, or gaseous afflation, like Plato’s “immortal soul;” but spiritual in the sense of its being incorruptible and indestructible; and founded by the power of God, who is spirit; and governed by a king who is spirit; and everything relating to it divinely appointed. Such an institution as this is pre-eminently spiritual; and because it is so every son of Adam who would inherit it must be spiritualised in heart and substance; or, as the phrase is, “in body, soul, and spirit, the whole person.” The principle laid down by the royal teacher in John 3: 5, may be termed the law of spiritualisation, unsubject to which no man can possibly in the nature of things enter upon the possession of the glory, honour, life, power, and emoluments of “the kingdom of Christ and of God.” This law is to the kingdom what naturalisation is to the kingdoms and republics of the world. The governments of these, “the rulers of the darkness of this age,” will not permit the natives of foreign states to inherit or possess the honours and emoluments of their institutions, unless they first abjure allegiance to all princes and potentates but themselves. They say, “Except ye be naturalised ye can in no wise enter any department of our state.” It would be very remarkable if all the kingdoms of the world had an alien law, and the kingdom of God none. All the sons and daughters of Adam are by nature aliens to the kingdom of heaven; hence they have no more natural right to it, than the Portuguese have to the privileges, immunities, and emoluments, of the throne, hierarchy, and aristocracy, of the British empire. “The flesh profiteth nothing.” Even a natural Israelite, to whose nation the kingdom belongs, has no right to the glory, honour, incorruptibility, life, power and wealth of it; how much less right, or rather none at all, has he who is not even a descendant from Jacob according to the flesh. Even a natural born Israelite must “be born from above,” or he cannot inherit the kingdom when restored again to Israel. The character defined in the scriptures as “the Jew”—“an Israelite indeed in whom is no guile”—is the pattern to which they must conform who would “inherit all things.” Jesus is this Jew in manifestation. He claimed nothing promised to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, because he was born of their daughter Mary; because “the flesh profiteth nothing:” but because he pleased God. Truth, and not sight, begets “the Jew”—faith in the word of the kingdom, the promised kingdom. Hence, it is “the children of the promise who are counted for the seed” that shall inherit all things. The whole Jewish nation will be grafted into its own olive tree when God shall have overcome their unbelief. They will possess their native land no more to be expelled by the horns of the Gentiles, above whom they will be exalted as a nation very high. But it is only those Jews and Gentiles, who, by spiritualisation, answer to “the Jew,” walking in the steps of that faith of Abraham, which he had being yet uncircumcised, who will inherit the kingdom with eternal glory. For, “he is not the Jew in the appearance; but he is the Jew who is such in the inner man.”

The king says that no alien shall inherit his kingdom unless he be spiritualised in mind and body. He has a perfect right to say so, and no alien has any right to complain; for citizenisation is a principle of their legislation. If you would inherit the good things promised to Israel, become citizens of Israel's commonwealth, and of its royal household, styled "the household of God." Now, as there is but one alien law to a state, so there is but one for the adoption of aliens into the kingdom of God. The first step is the declaration of the intention; or confession with the mouth, as the result of believing the things of the kingdom and name with the heart; "for with the heart man believeth unto righteousness; and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation." Next comes obedience to "the Law of Faith," which commands the confessor to "be baptised in the name of the Lord Jesus." He is now in mind, body, and estate, "the purchased possession" of the King of Israel. He is in mind and heart "begotten from above," and in body "washed with pure water." Thus he is intellectually and morally begotten of the spirit-truth; and corporeally washed with water, made "pure" by the special use to which it is appropriated, in connection with the subject's faith in the things of the kingdom and name. Thus being begotten of the word and born of water, he is scripturally responsive to the exhortation of the apostle, who says to all such, "Let us draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience (by the blood of sprinkling in the obedience), and our bodies washed with pure water: let us hold fast the confession of the hope unwaveringly." And now, what waits he for? For the Son of God from heaven, to change the body of his humiliation into a like form with the body of his exaltation and glory, through that spirit-energy by which he is able, and at that time prepared, to subdue all things to himself. This accomplished, and he is corporeally begotten of the spirit, and an actual inheritor of the then established, glorious, and all conquering kingdom of God.

I hope this exposition may extricate "Janetta" from all difficulty on the subject. Let her not be troubled at the upbraidings of the "aged ministers" of the wilderness. Weer they Christ's ministers they would feed the flock, and not upbraid the sheep when they sought pasture for their souls. It is their business to take great pains to set them right; and shepherds of the right stamp find great pleasure in doing so. But everything is burdensome to wolves in sheep's clothing, but fleecing the flock. At this they are great adepts. Of such, beware! Workmen that need not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth, rejoice in the light; and are well pleased to see men and women searching the scriptures in a Berean spirit, that the light may also shine in them without obstruction. We thank our friends for their good wishes, and wish them much success in their endeavours to understand the word.

DIFFICULTIES FOR SOLUTION.

Brother Thomas. —Please give us some light on the following passages of Scripture: —“And when all things shall be subdued unto Him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto Him that put all things under Him, that God may be all and in all”—1 Corinthians 15: 28.

Firstly, the prophets declare that the kingdom is to be without end. Secondly, by giving up power, and being subject to the Father, or to Him who did put all things under Him, here lies the mystery in few words. Also this passage: —“In the midst of the street of it, and on either side of the river, was there the Tree of Life, which bare twelve Fruits, and yielded her fruit every month; and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations”—Revelation 22: 2.

Also the following text in the fifteenth verse of the same chapter: —“For without are dogs, and sorcerers, and whoremongers, and murderers, and idolaters, and whosoever loveth and maketh a lie.”

Now provided the sin-power be destroyed, and we have all the blessings described in the fourth verse of this chapter before, why do we need the Tree of Life, and why are dogs, sorcerers, &c., said to be without? Please do give us your exposition at your convenience, in the Herald of the Kingdom.

THE SON'S POST-MILLENNIAL SUBJECTION TO THE FATHER.

The passage from which the idea expressed in the above caption is derived, is found in 1 Corinthians 15. Paul had affirmed that the resurrection of those “in Christ” would happen at his coming. In the next verse, he says, “Then cometh THE END.” He does not say how long after Christ’s coming it would be to that end. Indeed, he did not know, for “the times and seasons” were reserved by the Father in his own power, until he revealed them to Jesus Christ, “who sent and revealed by his messenger to his servant John.” This apostle, however, makes us acquainted with the truth that the end would be divided from Christ’s coming in power and great glory, by an interval of a thousand years; and that this long period will be occupied by the kingdom of Jehovah and of his Anointed. Though Paul could not tell the duration of this, “the Economy of the Fulness of Times,” as he styles it—Ephesians 1: 10, he records events by which the end of the economy might be known. These are, the conquest of all enemies; the final abolition of death; the delivering up of the kingdom to the Father by the Son; and the Son’s own subjection to God. The passage is remarkable, and deserving of quotation in full.

“As in Adam all (the saints) die, even so in Christ shall (they) all be made alive. But every one in the destined order: Christ an offering of first fruits; next, they that are Christ’s at his appearing: after that the end, when he shall have delivered over the kingdom to the God and Father: when he shall have vanquished every dominion, and every jurisdiction and power. For it is necessary that he reign until he (God) shall have put all the adversaries under his (the Son’s) feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. For He hath subdued all things under his feet. But when he saith, that everything hath been put under, manifest it is, that he, having subdued the all things to him (the Son) is excepted. But when the all things shall be subdued to him (the Son) then the Son himself also shall be subordinated to Him (the Father) who has subjected the all things to him (the Son) in order that God may be the all things for all.”

To see into this matter, it must be understood that before sin entered into the world by Adam, the economy was “very good;” and God was “the all things for all” the living souls he had made. In this state of being there was no adversary, and no death, because there was no sin, and death being absent, there was no viceregal kingdom to make war upon hostile powers, for the purpose of subduing them, and substituting the power of God instead. All was peace and harmony between God and man upon earth.

But when sin entered into the world, and death by sin, a rebellion commenced against God which has never been put down effectually from that day to this. It has ever gathered strength, and is at the present crisis more defiant of his authority than ever. But he has declared that things shall not always continue thus; for he has sworn by his own life, saying, “As truly as I live all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord”—Numbers 14: 21: and therefore the Lord Jesus taught his disciples to express their heart’s desire, saying, “Thy kingdom come; and thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven.” When Jehovah’s will shall be thus absolutely obeyed, “the end” will have arrived. The sin of the world will have been taken away; and every curse have ceased. There will then, consequently, be no more death: and once more a state of being will obtain, in which peace and harmony between God and men will exist, so that on receiving all things elaborated by the Son, he will again pronounce them “very good.”

This very good constitution of things terrestrial, is thus indicated by John:

“And I saw a New Heaven and a New Earth; and there was no more sea. And I heard a great voice out of the heaven, saying, Behold the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, their God. And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain; for the former things are passed away. And he that sat upon the throne said, Behold, I make all things new. He that overcometh shall inherit all things; and I will be his God and he shall be my son—Revelation 21: 1-7.

Here is a state upon earth evidently pertaining to “the end” indicated by Paul, when death, the last enemy, is no more. God’s tabernacle with men upon the earth is not pitched until death is destroyed. The destruction of death implies the previous suppression of sin in the world. Death’s sting is sin, which causes death; but the sting being extracted from human nature, it dies no more. Every dweller upon the earth becomes an immortal son of God, who will be with them as he is now with his only and chief begotten Son, the Lord Jesus Christ. In this postmillennial very good state there will be no sinners; consequently, none separated from God, and requiring a mediator betwixt them. But in the economy of the previous thousand years, sin, sinners, and death, still exist; hence a very different constitution of things must obtain to the succeeding arrangements in which they find no place at all. The epoch between the Millennial Economy and its successor, is marked by the delivering over the Millennial kingdom to God, as it will then in the hands of Christ and his brethren, have accomplished the work assigned to it.

The Kingdom's mission is, "to break in pieces and consume all kingdoms," and to "fill the whole earth" in ruling over all. It will be introduced into the world to put down the great rebellion against God, which is organised under the "dominions, jurisdictions, and powers," or governments of the nations. Of course, with the means to be employed, this is not an instantaneous affair. For its full and effectual accomplishment, God has allotted 1,000 years. The work to be accomplished is stupendous, but not too great for the forces of the kingdom. All these great kingdoms, empires, and republics, are to be conquered, and their millions of armed defenders cut up, and dispersed. Beside the overthrow of these rebel hosts, knowledge, righteousness, and peace, have to follow in the train of victory. The religion and law of the conqueror will be gratefully accepted by the nations as they become freed from the tyrants who oppress and brutalise them. "Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David and upon his kingdom to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth and for ever." On that throne he will reign until "the end;" for "his kingdom shall not be destroyed, and his dominion is unto the end:" for he must reign until God hath put all enemies under his feet.

When the nature and constitution of the kingdom are duly considered, it will be readily perceived that it cannot, in the fitness of things continue longer than the extinction of sin, and the entire abolition of its wages, which is death and corruption. The kingdom of Christ and of God is a priestly institution; for so it is written, "THE BRANCH shall build the Temple of Jehovah; and he shall bear the glory, and shall sit and rule upon his throne; and be a priest upon his throne." The reader, I suppose, need not be informed that this prophecy is of Jehovah's Anointed in his kingdom; and, therefore, of Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews. When “the Lord God shall give him the throne of his father David” that he may sit there and “*reign over the House of Jacob unto the ages”—eis tous aionas—he will be God’s High Priest for the Twelve Tribes of Israel, and the nations of his dominion. This is proved by Isaiah’s testimony, which reveals, that “All nations shall flow unto the Lord’s house, which shall be called a house of prayer for all people,” the offerings of whose flocks and herds “shall come up with acceptance on mine altar” saith Jehovah, “and I will glorify the house of my glory.” Then shall “many people go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to Jehovah’s mountain, to the temple of Jacob’s God; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths; for out of Zion (the city where David dwells), shall go forth the law, and the Word of the Lord from Jerusalem”—Isaiah 2: 2-3; 56: 7; 60: 7. Who will then be the High Priest and Teacher of Jehovah’s ways, in the house of Israel’s God? —the great light to enlighten the Gentiles, and the glory of his people Israel? There can be but one answer, and that is, “The Priest upon the throne”—Zechariah 6: 12-13, who “shall judge among many people, and rebuke strong nations afar off,” even Christ Jesus our Lord; “*who is now the High Priest of our confession, made a High Priest after the order of Melchizedec for the Age”—eis ton aiona; —but even now, “a High Priest over the house of God,” “whose house are we, if we hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end”—Hebrews 3: 1, 6; 5: 6; 10: 21. Thus, what he is now doing in the presence of God for “the Heirs of the Kingdom”—making reconciliation for his household—is but the earnest of what he will do for the subjects of his dominion, when, with his reconciled ones, he shall occupy “the thrones of the house of David.”

Now, “*every High Priest taken from among men is ordained for men in things pertaining to God, that he may offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins”—Hebrews 5: 1. It is clear from the testimony quoted, that sin, sinners, death, and national sacrificial worship, will obtain in the world till “the end” of the thousand years beginning with the appearing of Christ in his glory. “Gifts and sacrifices,” therefore, will all that time be necessary because of sin; and being necessary, there, must be a high priest to offer them for men to God, in the place appointed. Now, the nature of the kingdom being Melchizedec, or royal and priestly, its covenant, or constitution, provides that its king shall unite the two offices in his own person. This applies also to all the joint-inheritors with him in the same kingdom. Hence, they are all styled, "kings and priests to God." The kingdom is, therefore, mediatorial. It stands, when established, sacerdotally between Jehovah and all who are not office-bearers and dignitaries of the kingdom. So long as this monarchy exists with a priestly constitution, "the tabernacle of God" cannot "be with men," neither can "he dwell with them," nor can they be "his people." "With men;" that is, with the entire population of the earth. He is now with Christ Jesus, dwelling in him with his fulness; and during the thousand years, he will be with Christ's brethren, the saints, dwelling in them as in their elder brother; but with the residue of men he will not so dwell, until Christ has accomplished the work of "destroying that having the power of death, that is, the devil," and its works, or, in other words, until he shall have "taken away the sin of the world;" destroyed all its dominions, jurisdictions and powers; and have extinguished death. When this is consummated there will be no obstacle preventing God's abode with men but the Melchizedec kingdom; which must, therefore, of necessity be taken out of the way, as no longer adapted to the state of things upon the earth.

The reader will see this at a glance when he is asked, What will be the use of priests to God for men, when, because of the effectual suppression of transgression, and the extinction of sin in the flesh, there are no gifts and sacrifices to offer, no errors and ignorance to atone for? Christ and the saints' occupation will then be gone. It will then have expired according to the statute of limitation, which says, "Thou art a priest for the age after the order of Melchizedec"—Psalm 110: 4. The word le-olahm, in the Hebrew text, is rendered in Paul's citation of it eis ton aiona in the Greek; which I have translated "for the age," which is not only probably correct, but made certainly so, by the scripture doctrine concerning priesthood.

The Son, then, will "deliver over the kingdom to the God and Father" of men, at the time all become his sons, because of the unsuitableness of its nature and covenant to THE AGES succeeding the Millennial Age. The kingdom will not be destroyed, but only changed in its constitution, so as to adapt it to the improved and altered condition of the world. The kingdom in its Melchizedec or millennial organization, is the heavens planted, and the foundations of earth laid by the Lord, when “he proclaims to Zion, Thou art my people;” and saith, “Thy God reigneth!”—Isaiah 51: 16; 52: 7. John styles this organization in reference to that of the post-millennial ages, the former, or “first heaven and the first earth”—that constitution of Israel predicted in the sixty-fifth of Isaiah. This heaven of the kingdom is destined to be changed, so that when “the End” comes, it will have “passed away” as entirely as if it had been destroyed. This constitution of the kingdom will have perished, though Christ and the Saints remain in undiminished glory and beatitude. Hence, it is written in the hundred and second Psalm, and applied to Jesus in Hebrews 1: 10, “Thou, Lord, at the beginning (kat’ archas, at the beginning of Zion’s earth and heavens) laidst the foundation of the earth; and the heavens are the works of thine hands. They shall perish; but thou shalt stand: yea, all of them shall wax old like a garment; as a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed:” then Jesus creates all things new: “but thou art the same, and thy years shall have no end. The children of thy servants (Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob) shall continue, and their seed (the saints) shall be established before thee.”

Now, when the Lord Jesus has changed the whole system of things terrestrial and mundane, by the Spirit of the Father, a new world will be the result, in which the constitution of society will be royal, but not priestly; Jesus and the Saints being the Jehovah and the Elohim of the new order of things, as others were of the old, as appears from the Mosaic account of the Six Days. Jehovah-Jesus and his Elohim will have consummated the work begun by Jehovah Elohim, the Lord of the Gods, seven thousand years before. But though “great,” Jesus is always “the Son of the Highest,” of whom he says, “My Father is greater than I.” He is Jehovah’s servant to perform an appointed work, and to establish his Father’s authority in all the earth. This done, the Father no longer veils his face in a representative, but appears as sovereign in his own kingdom; in which, however, his glorious son is always pre-eminent, and next, but not upon, the throne. The words of Pharaoh to Joseph will express the idea I wish to convey of the Son’s subordination to the Father in the Ages, that God may be the all things for all. “There is none so discreet and wise as thou. Thou shalt be over my house, and according unto thy word shall all my people be ruled: only in the throne will I be greater than thou.” The kingdom, therefore, though changed, having its priestly elements removed, continues a kingdom still—a sinless kingdom added to the universal dominion of “the Blessed and only Potentate, dwelling in unapproachable light, whom no man hath seen, nor can see: to whom be honour and power, aionion, in all ages, Amen.”

Such is the exposition of Paul’s saying concerning the turning over of the kingdom to the Father, as it appears to me. The kingdom is without end, but not without change. In the thousand years, it is “the kingdom of Christ and of God;” in the after ages, “the all things” are concentrated in God, “for all” the dwellers upon the earth. Mediation exists no more, since all things are reconciled, and endless peace obtains. All which is submitted to our readers in the hope that we may all rejoice together in the kingdom of the Age to Come.

The other queries will be replied to as soon as room can be found for insertion.

Analecta Epistolaria.

PLEASANT WORDS.

“The words of the pure are pleasant words.”

Dear Sir: —For the last three or four years I have taken two copies of the Herald, and must continue to do so, until you are better sustained in your efforts to enlighten a benighted world. Had I the pecuniary resources of some, I would contribute annually a hundred times five dollars, in order to hold up your hands in the prosecution of the truly arduous enterprise your life is devoted to. But at this time, the ability falls far short of the inclination. In christian love,

I remain yours truly,
EZEKIEL S. TALLEY, M.D.

HANOVER, VA., January, 1853.

A DIFFICULTY.

Respected Sir: —Will you say a few words in your very interesting Herald, on the following points: —A friend of mine has been very much annoyed during the past year by not obtaining his papers at all till October. Another has been in the same circumstances nearly. Another and another are similarly situated; so that the consequence has been, that many who would otherwise have subscribed for the next volume, have delayed, not knowing what to do. Now, could you not once for all correct this difficulty by sending your paper to one agent in Britain, who would cheerfully attend to this labour of love? By doing this, or something tantamount to it, you will do a very great service to many of your friends here, who are grieved to see things so badly managed.

I have much pleasure in bearing testimony to the extreme satisfaction your Herald has generally given. That it is always read with the greatest avidity, is saying the least; for it is insensibly, but distinctly, acquiring an influence over the minds of all with whom I have come in contact, who read it.

Your affectionate friend, for the truth's sake,

GAVIN GREENLEES.

GLASGOW, SCOTLAND, November 25, 1853.

THE REMEDY.

The portion of our friend's letter not published, is under consideration. No one can regret the difficulty complained of more than we. The cause of it may be found in part, in the numbers indicated being directed to 35 Miller Street, and, in the absence of our friend there, being refused, because of a surcharge. If those who wished the Herald for 1853, had sent their names and addresses, distinctly and precisely written, with payment in advance, by order on the Dock-Head Post-office, to Richard Robertson, Esq., 89 Grange Road, Bermondsey, Surrey, England, they would get their numbers as regularly as clock-work. This is a better plan than sending a bundle to one person for distribution con amore. Mr. Robertson, who was till lately Secretary to the Custom-House in London, is of necessity an excellent fiscal, having been habituated to the methodical exactness of that establishment besides being a personal friend, and interested in the kingdom of God. If our Glasgow friends, and all others, will attend to these instructions, and the notices they will find occasionally on the cover of the Herald, they will have no reason to complain. There is one other thing must be attended to to keep things straight—and that is, if a subscriber change his residence, he must inform his letter-carrier, and let Mr. Robertson know likewise, being careful to prepay the letter.

We do not send the numbers of a new volume to Britain and the Provinces, until expressly ordered, and paid for in advance. The reason of this is, that we have to prepay to those who did not intend to continue subscribers, by which we should lose both the paper and the postage, which we cannot afford to do.

The letters we receive from the four winds (of which we publish only a specimen from time to time, that each isolated subscriber may know what other friends think of our teaching as well as he) encourage us considerably. The great truths advocated in the Herald must tell upon the consciences of all "honest and good hearts" that are interested to know what they must believe and do for acceptance when they shall appear in the presence of the Great King. We have been subject to much discouragement for many years, but the dawning of a better day appears in our horizon, which, we trust, is the aurora of the truth's vindication and triumph over all its foes. Our friend Greenlees' testimony will not be lost on his well-

SCRIPTURE-INVESTIGATION MEETING.

It has been found necessary to change somewhat the constitution of the Scripture-Investigation meeting. It did not work well. On the first night, men, with crotchets in their heads, attended to deliver themselves of their conceptions, and to dispute. They could not speak to the subject, nor be kept to the point. One who figured in Glasgow while I was there, who, I believe, calls himself the gospel trumpeter, was there, with a tin trumpet suspended from his neck. He spoke, also, of a companion of his. They occupied time, but yielded no light. Others spoke, but when all was said, the first chapter of Genesis, the subject-matter of the evening, was left exegetically untouched. It is, therefore, clear that the general public is too ignorant to work out any profitable investigation for itself. It is necessary for one to teach it, which be the oracles of God. We have, therefore, taken this business into our own hands. The brethren consequently meet for preliminary evening worship, and when that is done, I proceed to the exposition of Moses and the Prophets, in the order suggested by the subjects concurrent in the things pertaining to the foundation of the world; after which, if there be time, persons present are at liberty to put questions, for information, or for the removal of any difficulties not supposed to be met in the exposition. This has been found to work better. The audience increases, and from the attention paid, in coming out to hear in the worst of weather, it is manifest that the interest is augmenting and abiding; and we trust that fruit will appear to eternal life from "the word of the kingdom" sown.

OUR PEN'S USEFULNESS.

Dear Sir: —Through the kindness of my neighbours, I have been favoured with your Herald and Elpis Israel, which have greatly increased my desire to know "the truth as it is in Jesus."

In these parts the truth has to gain its way by inches. But notwithstanding all the opposition springing from tradition and bigotry, your book and paper are doing a work here that will speak for itself when the future King of nations shall appear. I am desirous to see the Herald continued; for it was the first document that opened my eyes to see my true condition; and I am persuaded there are thousands in society who are infidels, because they are too honest to be hypocrites, and too well informed to be sectarians.

Sectarianism, witchcraft, and every other evil influence, surround us here on every side; so that it will be impossible for any poor wanderer ever to gain admission to the kingdom, unless he can be assisted to a thorough knowledge of the word of God, which is the only thing that can gird up the loins of the mind to a successful resistance of temptation.

I enclose you five dollars out of my scanty means, for which send me Elpis Israel, and the Herald for '53. Meanwhile I hope, and shall endeavour to be able to do something more soon for the sake of the gospel cause.

In hope of coming to the knowledge of the truth, I remain yours,
Ogle Co., Illinois. ENOS

Dear Sir: —I feel that I am discharging a pleasing duty in adding my testimony to the many you receive of the value of Elpis Israel and the Herald. They have indeed been a source of much pleasure to me; and what is of very much more importance, they have presented God and the Bible in such a light that I can have perfect confidence in both—a consummation for many a day devoutly wished for; but previous to my acquaintance with your writings, enjoyed but in a very limited degree.

These sentiments are those also of others here, who read my copy of the Herald; the name of one of whom I now send you, and another will probably soon follow.

Many thanks to you, then, dear brother, for your invaluable labours; and may the sovereign whom you serve strengthen you to continue the combat with ignorance, superstition, and bigotry, lay and clerical, and substitute in their place "the light of the glorious gospel," is the sincere desire of yours in the "One Hope of the calling."
DAVID WRIGHT.

Coburg, Canada West, December 1852.

Dear Brother: —Enclosed you will find five dollars. The three dollars over my subscription for the current volume, is a poor man's ungrudging donation towards the support of your highly instructive and valuable periodical. It is willingly given, seeing that your readers are more indebted to you than they are able to pay. Please accept it for knowledge of the truth acquired by aid of your writings. Nevertheless, all the praise be to God through Jesus Christ our Lord, and not to mortal man. This truth has led me to be immersed by brother William Lemmon, of Baltimore. It transferred me from a foundation of sand to one of rock—to the Rock; and led me to embrace the hope that entereth within the veil ere long to be removed. Then shall we see what at present doth not appear.

Yours in hope of Israel's return, and the restoration of the kingdom again to them,

THE GOSPEL GLORIFIED.

Dear Brother: —By the request of bro. Fisher, I enclose you his subscription fee for the current volume of the Herald, with his best christian regards. He desired me to say to you also, that when you may find a leisure moment he would be glad to see your views of 1 Corinthians 3: 15.

Bro. F. is an earnest advocate of "the Gospel of the Kingdom," and is very desirous with myself to form a nucleus around which may be gathered some faithful followers of the Lord. He came to my house in December last, and required immersion at my hands. He seemed to have a clear understanding of the gospel. Cold as was the season, and without a house in which to change our clothes, we repaired to the Rappahannock river, where I immersed him in the presence of some five or six persons who happened to come up at the time. His conscience is now at ease; and though, as he says, he expects that his earthly career will be short, he rejoices in the hope of the reward promised upon the belief and obedience of the gospel, followed by a patient continuance in well-doing. Oh, could the people be persuaded to learn of Jesus—to understand his gospel! But I am grieved, yea, deeply grieved, when I attempt to “reason out of the scriptures” with my connections in the flesh, with whom I should be so much delighted to be associated as the adopted of the Lord, to see them turn away from the plain declarations of the prophets, of Jesus, and of his apostles, refusing to hear the gospel as proclaimed by Heaven’s great apostle, ridiculing our notions, as they call them, and yet talking so loudly and constantly, and apparently so sympathetically, about the blood of Jesus. Is this not equivalent to saying “Lord, Lord,” and yet opposing his word?

I am pleased, yea, delighted, to see from the Herald some signs of encouragement. May they increase in number and magnitude; and may 1853 be a memorable year for the progress of the glorious gospel, that the hearts of the oppressed and depressed children of the Most High may rejoice in the anticipation of soon realising that “glory, honour, and immortality,” which Jesus has promised to the faithful that suffer with him.

Hoping that before very long we may have the pleasure of hearing from you in person, I remain, very sincerely,

Yours in the Blessed Hope,

PETER TRIBLE.

Dunnsville, Essex, Va., February 15, 1853.

POLITICAL RELIGIONISTS—BEING SAVED AS BY FIRE.

We congratulate brethren Fisher and Tribble, and all like them, who have veneration, firmness, and conscientiousness, sufficiently active, to obey the truth of God rather than its void-making traditions, the dogmas and commandments of men. Until comparatively recently they were both members “in good standing” of the Campbellite synagogue called “the Rappahannock”—the one a preacher, and the other a private brother, of the sect. The dissolution of their confraternity is referable to “the gospel of the kingdom;” Mr. Tribble came to perceive, that, as there is but one gospel of God, called the gospel of the kingdom, which kingdom is to be established in the land promised to Abraham; and seeing that both it, and its possession by the resurrected saints “under the whole heaven,” were denied and scoffed at by the Campbellites and their clergy; —that one gospel was neither believed, nor preached among them. Believing it, he therefore began to testify in its behalf. But, as its advocacy was primarily associated with my name, which is no strong tower of orthodoxy, he was absurdly, or rather wickedly, charged with “Thomasism;” although he said none other things than what their own eyes could see written in the scriptures of the prophets and apostles, if they would have opened them to see. But “their heart is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes they have closed,” lest they should be converted, and become unpopular. He was at length silenced by authority, such as it is. This gave him time for personal examination, which resulted in the conviction, that being immersed into baptism, christ-ian-ism, or Campbellism, is not obeying the gospel of the kingdom; because the faith professed by the subjects of those denominational immersions, was either non-comprehensive of that gospel from sheer ignorance of it, or positively opposed to it; and consequently the immersion submitted to was not a faithful obedience to the faith. Being honest in his conviction, and self-condemned, he sought justification by faith of the true gospel in the name of Jesus, to which name he was united by immersion, as a believer in the kingdom’s gospel can alone be.

Bro. Tribble has effected the circulation of some thirty Elpis Israels in Essex County, Virginia. If they have fallen into the hands of some honest and good hearts, they cannot fail of producing a beneficial result to some of its citizens sooner or later. Bro. Fisher is more or less indebted to it for the liberty he now enjoys. When in those parts we heard an anecdote concerning him, and his other Campbellite brethren, singularly characteristic of their intelligence and doings. It runs somehow thus: One Sunday morning in synagogue assembled, Mr. Fisher (who, by-the-by, is a poor man, and therefore without consideration among them) requested some brother would read to the assembly the last chapter of the Acts. Some one rose and read it. Mr. Fisher then requested that some one would be kind enough to show the meaning of what Paul is reported to have said in the thirtieth verse—“For the Hope of Israel I am bound with this chain.” This fell among the leaders like a bomb from Magruder’s battery. Not being present, we cannot be graphical. Politicians, lawyers, and doctors, were particularly apprehensive. “The hope of a christian was quite enough for them, without the hope of Israel!” “Mr. Fisher had better ask Dr. Thomas:” others of them advised that “he should go home, and consult Elpis Israel!” The last suggestion seemed the most feasible; and as no satisfaction could be obtained from “the elders,” et cetera, he went home, and consorted with them no more.

But what more decent or spiritual can be expected from such religionists. If theirs be a fair type of christian doctrine, then, indeed, the hope of a christian has nothing to do with Israel’s Hope. It is clear, that Paul was not in chains for their hope, themselves being judges. No, but he was bound with a chain for the hope of every christian, both Jew and Gentile, who believed the gospel he preached. The political lawyers and doctors who browbeated Mr. Fisher from their synagogue, are too ignorant of the scriptures to know, that when a believer of Paul's gospel, which they reject, becomes obedient to the faith, he, though a Gentile born, becomes a citizen of the Commonwealth of Israel, and an heir of all the good things promised to that favoured nation, which constitute its hope. Israel's hope is the christian's hope, and styled by the apostle "the hope of the gospel, whereof he was made a minister." They believe it not, being the captive perverts of the world, the flesh, and its hurtful lusts. Men who would clamour down one of their poor brethren for asking an explanation of the word of truth, may paint, whitewash, carpet, and transform their synagogue, to suit the eye of wealth and fashion; but they have yet to learn, that it is not the breadth of men's phylacteries, nor the comeliness of the exterior sepulchre, that commends professors and their works to God.

The text referred to in Corinthians reads, "If any man's work be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire." The politicals, who worship the people for what they can make by them, know nothing of salvation so as by fire. This is known experimentally only to those who confess and teach the truth. Of these it will be said after their resurrection, "These are they that came out of great tribulation. They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat." Many of them will have been, in the days of their flesh and blood, previously often told by the apostles, that it was "through much tribulation they must enter the kingdom of God." This tribulation was "a fiery trial" which was to try them, that this, "the trial of their faith, being much more precious than of gold which perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise and honour, and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ."

From this manner of writing it will be seen, that the "fire" connected with salvation is the fire of that tribulation inflicted upon the believer by the adversaries of the faith. The politicals and their satellites have been these adversaries in all ages; and generally professors of religion too. They are very diligent in kindling and fanning the fire, but they take good care that "the heat" shall not harm them, nor "the sun" either. They used to cast believers into prison, — starve, torture, and kill them there; but their claws have been considerably pared down in non-papal countries; and now they can only lock their door against them, brow-beat and silence them by authority, scoff at the truth, and assassinate the good name of its defenders.

But in the text the apostle is speaking of teachers and their works. He had been speaking figuratively of himself and Apollos, two great teachers of the gospel, though really of others who were engaged building on the foundation he had laid, which is that “Jesus is the Christ,” whom God raised up to sit on David’s throne—Acts 2: 30, 32. He compares those built upon this foundation to “gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble.” These materials had all to pass through “a fiery trial” for the proof of their faith. If the persecutions on account of the word were too hot for some of them, those that apostatised were thus proved to be “wood, hay, and stubble,” consumed; but if they bravely withstood the adversary, and overcame him by their faith, they were as gold, silver, and precious stones, purified from dross. Now, if a teacher had built a hundred converts upon Paul’s foundation, and seventy-five of them had denied the faith to save their worthless lives and fortunes, he would “suffer loss.” When the Lord shall appear, and he should render an account of his stewardship, he would only receive reward for the abiding twenty-five; and no consideration at all for the “washed hogs who had returned to their wallowing in the mire.” Still this loss of seventy-five percent would not result in his own perdition. He would himself be saved, provided he was on the foundation, and with the twenty-five had kept the faith, however fiery the times had been. This is being saved so as by fire—entering the kingdom of God through much tribulation.

In conclusion I may add, that if saints are to enter the kingdom of God through much tribulation, it is clear that they are not already in it. The words were spoken to disciples, not to sinners. Sinners may enter the baptismal grave without any persecution; but after that, tribulation of some sort awaits them if they “contend earnestly for the faith,” and respond to the claims the gospel of their salvation has upon their self-denial. None are received into the kingdom who are not first proved. The Lord Jesus himself, though proved and accepted, is not yet in the kingdom. He has gone to receive it, and then to return to set it up; for at present it has no existence save in the promises of the gospel. It is therefore all nonsense to talk about its being set up on the Day of Pentecost. They who affirm that it was, surely do not know what a kingdom is; much less do they comprehend the nature of the kingdom of God.

A VOICE FROM THE WEST.

Beloved Brother: —Your removal to New York city is the best move you have made. The brethren here highly approve of the change. There is no doubt it will be the means of extending your sphere of usefulness. New York is a better point from which to issue your publications, and presents better facilities for the proclamation of the truth, than your former place of abode. I sincerely hope you may be as Paul was, in the cities of Corinth and Ephesus, a bold teacher of the word of God, a cogent reasoner, and a powerful disputant, so that many living in and visiting our metropolis may hear the “word of the Lord,” and thus be persuaded concerning the things of the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ. At the present day, the sower of the good seed of the kingdom requires a large field to operate upon; for the soil has been so long trodden under the feet of the adversary, that there is but little chance for the seed to fall into good ground. Oh! If the seed could but obtain an entrance into a prepared or cultivated soil, how it would grow, and bring forth fruit! But alas! the times of the Gentiles are almost at an end. The long-suffering and forbearance of God are nearly exhausted. The nations have given heed to the seducer and traducer, “whom the Lord shall destroy with the brightness of his coming”—and thus deceiving themselves, they have no love for the truth that they may be saved. Truly what Isaiah, and Jesus, and Paul said of the Jews in their day, is applicable to the Gentiles of this generation—“Go unto this people, and say, Hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand, and seeing ye shall see, and not perceive; for the heart of this people is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes have they closed; lest they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and be converted, and I should heal them”—Acts 28: 26-27. Yet, notwithstanding this great defection, there are a few—a small remnant—who will gladly receive the word into good and honest hearts. For the sake of these few, then, let the truth be disseminated far and wide. Let those who can, proclaim the good news by the living voice; and let those who cannot, but yet have the means, employ the hundred-tongued press. Here is a powerful means the brethren of this age can employ, which did not exist in the earlier ages of Christianity; and a means, too, which ought to be improved. This matter, I fear, is not viewed properly by all our friends. Are not the children of this age wiser in this respect than the children of light? They use the press, and that liberally, too, for the accomplishment of their worldly schemes, and success generally rewards their efforts. They perceive that “knowledge is power,” therefore they spread abroad the light they wish to communicate. And ought not those who are possessed of the “true light” to do likewise? Responsibility and accountability are incurred, and will have to be given in proportion to the value of the talents conferred. We have better facilities now at this day than our forefathers had, for the rapid and extensive diffusion of knowledge, —and thus “knowledge may be increased.” Then let those who have obtained the “key of knowledge” willingly impart to others, that they also may obtain a “knowledge of the true God, and of Jesus, the Christ, his apostle,” in order to eternal life. “Faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the word of God,” yet how few have faith, who both hear and read the Bible! It is because the “key of knowledge” has been lost, and consequently the scriptures of the prophets, which reveal “the substance of the things hoped for,” have become a “sealed book,” which neither the learned nor the unlearned can read so as to understand.

I am glad that the “Herald” is likely to be better sustained by the brethren and others. I hope its day of prosperity has commenced, and that its course will be onward, until it shall in reality announce that the Son of man has come in his kingdom with power and great glory. I think the readers of the “Herald,” and especially those who have been led from “darkness” to “light” through its instrumentality, are bound to sustain it. If gratitude for benefits received will not do it, perhaps the more selfish motive of realising further good by perusing its valuable pages, will cause them to do so. To suffer such a publication to languish and die, would indeed be a reproach to those who ought to be its supporters. No! it cannot be. There are some, though few in number, who love the truth better than dollars and cents; —who are willing to sacrifice present advantage for future good. May their number be greatly increased!

I perceive by a St. Louis paper that the “Rev. Alexander Campbell” has been lecturing in that city, on behalf of the Christian Church in St. Louis. He delivered four lectures on the “Patriarchal, Jewish, Christian, and Protestant Institutions”—admission $1.00 the course; 50 cents single. He has been on a lecturing and collecting tour in Missouri. “He visits Missouri for the purpose of raising funds to endow a professorship in Bethany College, and thus far has met with great success;” thus says the Liberty Tribune. “How has the mighty fallen, and the fine gold become dim!” It would be no hard task to compile a work from the writings of “this able and distinguished divine,” entitled “Campbell against himself.”

Wishing you prosperity in your new location, and that your means of usefulness may be greatly increased, I subscribe myself

Yours, in the “One Hope,”

THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM OBEYED.

Dear Brother Thomas: —Enclosed you will find two dollars being the amount of subscription for the Herald for the current year. Hitherto I have received your periodical through brother George L. Scott of Paris Ca. From him also I received Elpis Israel. Need I inform you that I have perused these works with profound and absorbing interest. They have placed the Oracles of God before my mind in a new and imposing aspect—which has led to a revolution in views, belief, position, sentiment, and feeling. Though born and bred in the old Calvinistic “Kirk of Scotland,” immersed into the mysteries of the “strictest sect” I mean the Scotch Baptists, and thoroughly initiated into the sublimities of Campbellism—I lately came down from my high horse, confessed my ignorance of the “things of the kingdom,” searched with anxiety, whether what you have affirmed be the TRUTH; was convinced; and lately in a dark and stormy night in November, in company with my beloved brother G. L. Scott, both of us having made the “great and good confession” of our belief, confidence, and hope in Israel’s kingdom, and the glorious and ever blessed Messiah, we descended towards the deep flowing stream and there respectively immersed each other, by the authority of the great Teacher, into the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit; and thus having legitimately “put on Christ” we became the adopted seed of good old Abraham, and heirs to the covenants of promise. And here we are resolved, against all opposition (for in one sense we stand alone in Canada) to “show forth the praises of Him who hath called us out of darkness into his marvellous light,” and to expound, so far as our humble abilities enable us, with the assistance of our good friend “Elpis,” the “things of the kingdom and the name of Jesus Christ” to the honest minded and the morally valiant in Canada. Isolately, we have commenced the work and we don’t despair of success.

But I have not yet introduced myself to you as an old, but partial acquaintance. Do you remember on the evening of the soiree in the Waterloo Rooms in Edinburgh, when you were called upon to acknowledge the “good graces” of your friends in the modern Athens, two “chiels taking notes” on your right hand on the platform? Well, I happened to be one of the pair. But I looked upon you then as a Transatlantic curiosity, possessing an indomitable, but benevolent looking, cranium—with its dark, but graceful, barbaric consequence. That was the only occasion I ever saw you; I trust in God it won’t be the last.

For many reasons, I am right glad to learn you have made New York your head quarters. In your new and influential position may our gracious Father strengthen you in body and in mind for the arduous and highly responsible duties you are called upon to perform. The “signs of the times” are corroborating with sternful accuracy the “sure word of prophecy.” An ominous stillness pervades the European masses. But the under currents of anxious thoughts are concentrating with fearful rapidity. At no distant date, I presume they will burst forward with unquenchable action. I suppose however, nothing will be done until the farce of Pio Nono's consecration of the new-fledged French Empire be over. I suppose you have remarked the circumstance, or conditions rather, of the acknowledgments of the new Emperor by the "great powers," that he will reign "Napoleon III by the grace of God and the will of the French people," not as an hereditary sovereign, but after all, simply as the imperial representative and "cat's paw" of the "Frog power"—the professedly repudiated democracy. But I must close. Pardon my scrawl.

Yours in the hope of the Glorious Everlasting Kingdom,

WALTER M. WILSON.

THE SAME GOSPEL PREACHED.

Dear Brother Thomas: —The January Number of the Herald has come to hand, for which accept of my best thanks. Upon reflection I find the two dollars I last enclosed won't be sufficient for postage and altogether. Hence I enclose an additional dollar. Oh that I had plenty of dollars at my disposal, I would "share and share alike" with you, to carry forward the knowledge of the Glorious Kingdom to many poor honest-minded souls, who are groping in the miserable darkness of modern isms. Believe me when I get my debts paid up, and that will be soon, (for I want all claims satisfied before the King comes) I will do—I won't say what I will do. But I argue this way. There can be no such an anomaly as a capitalist and money usurer amongst the expectants of the kingdom. Therefore ye rich believers open your hearts, and strengthen our beloved brother Thomas in a bold and independent proclamation, and exposition, of the "things of the Kingdom."

The great cause goes ahead in Toronto; and the "sure word of prophecy" is beginning to create great sensation amid the old sectarian foggies. But the poor, down-trodden, honest-minded men and women, rejoice in this gospel. I am sanguine of a happy result. I will report progress. Dear Brother, let old Carey's motto be ours, "Do great things, and expect great things." With the Lord and his Truth on our side who's afraid?

Yours in the Glorious Hope,

W. M. WILSON.

Toronto, Canada West, January 23, 1853.

Bro. G. L. Scott of Paris, C. W., writes, “The Gospel of the Kingdom is being preached with success by Bro. Walter Wilson in the “Disciples’ Church” at Toronto under the charge of Mr. Beaty; he writes, “I have been doing work. There are not a few honest-minded people who listen to me. They have got hold of the truth. Elpis Israel is abroad. Seed is sown, and fruit will appear. This is indeed the Gospel—there is no uncertainty, or humbug, about it. Instant submission or opposition.” Trusting that you will be honoured to maintain the warfare until the Bridegroom comes, I remain yours in the Gospel hope—G. L. S. —
This news is encouraging.

A JEW ON THE HOPE OF ISRAEL.

The sons of Israel, who are students of the scripture, understand their prophets better than those pretenders to truth and holiness among the Gentiles, called “Reverend and Learned Divines.” Beyond the acknowledgment that the Messiah was to suffer for sin, and that Jesus is he, they hold very little in common with the prophets and apostles. Of Israel’s hope, which is the “one hope of the calling,” and the only hope of a bible-made christian, they are as ignorant as puling babes. They have not the remotest idea that the hope of the apostles and the hope of their countrymen, were the same; and that they differed only upon this point—Is Jesus the Messiah through whom the nation is to realise its hope; or is some other person yet to come? This was the true issue. The apostles said, “Jesus is HE;” their adversaries said, “Jesus is not he; but we look for another.” This is still the issue between Jews and Gentiles, who are learned in the prophets; those who are not learned in these are incompetent to deliver a judgment entitled to the least consideration in the case: for they have yet to learn “what be the first principles of the Oracles of God.” But, we do not here intend to dissert of our own mind upon Israel’s hope. We only allude to it on the present occasion introductory to the following extract from the pen of Mr. Isaac Leeser, the intelligent editor of the Occident, and formerly reader of the Synagogue in Richmond. He understands what his nation hopes for; and we who study the prophets are able to say whether or not this hope he says they entertain, be scriptural. In writing concerning the Messiah he says:

“It might have been that, had God not promised it, the world would not have needed a special messenger who is to restore the universal peace which was forfeited at the first sinning of man; this assuming it to be the intention of the Most High, might be within the range of possibility by a thousand methods all within the scope of God’s power. But the prophets teach us a doctrine different from this. They tell us that a time will come when something wonderful is to happen to the peculiar people who were established many ages before that time, the conservators of the laws and code promulgated through Moses. The establishment of universal peace, in short, is to be accomplished through a peculiar personage descended from the Israelitish Nation, who is to effect for the same a restoration of the ancient commonwealth first established at the going out of the original fathers of this people from Egypt, by means of peculiar laws and statutes embraced within the code called the Law of Moses, and accompanied by certain rites and ceremonies which anciently constituted the public worship of the Most High in the chief city of the Hebrew State. The God who revealed himself to men and made known his will, also made known through his accredited messengers these his intentions; and consequently they have become a matter concerning which no one can consistently entertain any doubt who truly believes in the biblical records transmitted to us through a long line of ancestors. It will not do to assert, that because the Jewish religion might be true without the coming of the Messiah, we will not believe in his coming; for since the promise has been made, it has become an integral portion of the things concerning which we have been instructed, and as such it has become a matter of credence, as being the intention of the Lord, just as the Sabbath and other commandments have become matters of duty from no other reason, than that they have been ordained as the will of God. How would it do for a believing Israelite to criticise the biblical ordinances, and dispute their obligatory force, simply because he could love God and serve his fellow-man without observing them? We would certainly say, that it is but a poor exhibition of faith to doubt of the positive duties which the Bible enjoins, although they might not have been originally necessary truths; and with as much reason must we say, that to presume even to cast a shadow of doubt upon the Hope of Israel in the ultimate fulfilment of all the good the Lord has promised unto his people through means of the Son of David, simply because this mission is not an event absolutely necessary to the existence of the divine law, is a refusal to be taught by the Lord, the only Source of all wisdom and truth.”

Yes; it is the doctrine of the New Testament as well as of the Old, that the Messiah, and consequently the Lord Jesus, is to restore to the Israelitish Nation their ancient commonwealth, as in the days of old. Thus, “I will not utterly destroy the house of Jacob, saith Jehovah. For, lo, I will command and I will sift the house of Israel among all nations, like as corn is sifted in a sieve, yet shall not the least grain fall upon the earth. All the sinners of my people shall die by the sword, who say, The evil shall not overtake and prevent us. In that day will I raise up the dwelling of David that is fallen, and close up the breaches thereof: and I will raise up his ruins, and I will build it AS IN THE DAYS OF OLD.”—for what purpose? “That they may possess the remnant of Edom, and of all the nations by whom my name has been called upon them, saith the Lord that doeth this”—Amos 9: 8-12. The apostle James in quoting this to show, that the prophets taught that upon the Gentiles would be called the name of the Lord, and thereby arguing that a people would be taken from among them for His name—so applies the quotation as also to show to the minds of all unmystified by the leaven of false teaching that Jesus (Ethyehowa-tzidkainu, THE JEHOVAH OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS) would return to restore the Tabernacle of David, that is, his Kingdom, * and to put Israel in possession of the land of Edom, and the nations, after the work of separating the people from his name was accomplished, that they might then all of them seek the Lord.

*—(Skeeneen, rendered “tabernacle,” is a booth or hut, but sometimes a permanent house and figuratively a family; and when applied to a Royal family, it denotes its reign or Kingdom.”—Spencer.),

This building again of the Tabernacle of David as in the days of old, is the Restoration of all the things spoken by all the prophets since Moses, even the Restoration of the Kingdom again to Israel. This is the work that Messiah has to do. It is a great work and will require almightiness to execute. Just let the reader reflect how utterly confounded and nonplussed would be the policy of all “the powers that be” in the event of a successful attempt to set up a powerful Kingdom in the Holy Land; and established, too, upon principles at variance with the continued existence of a single other government upon the earth. The fact is that the ambition of Messiah is so great, that were our planet as large as Saturn, Jupiter, or the Sun, it would be too confined for the existence of his Kingdom, and an independent state though not larger than the little republic of San Merino. He is Jehovah’s king, and the earth is Jehovah’s, and all upon it; therefore everything must be brought into subjection, that in the end there may exist not so much as one living soul that does not reflect his glory. This work is to be begun, carried on, and consummated by the Messiah promised to Israel. Hear what the spirit saith, by the prophet concerning Jehovah's Servant, who is called by the name of Abraham's grandson, Israel, that is, the Prince of God: "Listen, O Isles, unto Me; and hearken, ye peoples, from far; Jehovah hath called Me from the womb; from the bowels of my mother hath he made mention of my name"—Luke 1: 31-33. "And he hath made my mouth like a sharp sword"—Revelation 1: 16; "in the shadow of his hand hath he hid me; and said unto me, Thou art my Servant, O Israel, in whom I will be glorified. And now, saith Jehovah that formed me from the womb to be his Servant, to bring Jacob again to him, Though Israel be not gathered, yet shall I be glorious in the eyes of Jehovah, and my God shall be my strength." This is true of him at the present time, though Israel is not yet gathered, and therefore they refuse to recognise him. But let them not expect every thing to be done at once. The mission of the glorified Servant of Jehovah, though delayed with respect to them, will be assuredly accomplished. The testimony adds, "And He said, It is a light thing that thou shouldst be my Servant to raise up the Tribes of Jacob, and to restore the desolation of Israel; I will also give thee for a light to the nations, that thou mayest be my salvation (my Joshua or Jesus) unto the ends of the earth"—Isaiah 11; 9: 1-6.

Further on the same prophet shows, that this Servant and Holy One of Jehovah, was to be at one period the despised of man, the abhorred of his nation, and a servant of its rulers; but that such a change of fortune should accrue to Him that he should become the honoured one of Kings and Princes who should arise in his presence and do him homage. To him thus exalted Jehovah saith, "In an acceptable time have I heard Thee, and in a day of Salvation have I helped thee: and gave them for a Covenant of the people, to establish the land, to cause to inherit the desolate heritages; that Thou mayest say to the prisoners, Go forth; to them that are in darkness, Show yourselves."

Now all these things are indisputably affirmed of the Messiah. No man of sound mind would undertake to deny it. Admitted then; but what, we inquire, say ye to these things who profess to believe that Jesus is the Messiah? If Jesus be he, as he certainly is, then, as he has not hitherto, he has yet to perform those things we have just read. If you say that Jesus is not to execute them, then you in effect say that he is not the Messiah, for Messiah is Jehovah's Servant for this especial work. But Jesus is the Messiah, and therefore, He must return and build again the Hebrew Commonwealth as in the days of old—He must raise up the Tribes of Jacob, and restore the desolations of Israel, and be the Joshua of Jehovah to the ends of the earth.

Gentile ignorance of the prophets is a great impediment to the conversion of the Jews. The Gentiles affirm the suffering of Messiah, but deny his mission and work in regard to Israel, their country and the world; while the Jews affirm his mission in its glorious relations to them and the nations, but deny his humiliation and sufferings altogether. They are both right in part, and both wrong in part, without right enough between them to do either of them any good. As to the conversion of the Jews by Gentile missionaries ignorant of the prophets, and consequently of Israel's Hope, which is the only hope revealed in the Bible, why reader the idea is preposterous in the extreme. What! preach to the Jews a Messiah who is to visit earth no more until he comes to burn up the world; O ye holy prophets and apostles, is it not enough to make your ashes quiver in your graves with restless indignation, at the stupidity and perverseness of mankind! But the short of the matter is, that the Gentiles do not believe in Jesus as described in the prophets. Their faith is in a theological fiction—in "another Jesus," "another Spirit," and "another gospel," than the one Lord, Spirit, faith, hope, of Moses, the prophets, and the apostles of Jehovah's Christ—2 Corinthians 11: 4. If ye know not Moses and the prophets, who testified of Jesus, ye can by no means understand the writings of his ambassadors to the world. Therefore seek to understand the prophets as you value an interest in the Age to Come.

STATE OF CHRISTENDOM.

“Look abroad on European Christendom. Contemplate the nations that have so long and so desperately rebelled against the Lord and against his Christ, —disowning his blessed gospel, and doing homage, whether in doting superstition or in the hypocrisy of Atheism, to his arch-enemy, the Anti-christ, the Man of Sin. Is it not the universal observation concerning the occurrences of the last few years and months, that they bear a most judgment-like aspect and character? They have got utterly beyond all the ordinary conditions of political calculation. They baffle and defy the profoundest sagacity of political wisdom, alike to anticipate them beforehand, and to account for them or estimate and measure them when they come. Nor is there any feature in the case that more signally and unequivocally marks their judicial import, than the haste and hurry with which crisis after crisis, and stroke after stroke, breathlessly follow one another. The vicissitudes of a century seem to be crowded now into the compass of a decade, nay, almost of a single year. The marvels of all history, ancient and modern, are enacted again before our eyes, with even enhanced elements of surprise, and all in such brief space as may be counted by weeks, and even by days. Is it not the impression of all thoughtful minds that there is an ominous acceleration of the rate of movement in the revolutionary ongoings of Papal Europe? It is as if the impulse of railway locomotion, and the electric transmission of intelligence from shore to shore, were communicated to the excited minds of men, or exemplified in the angry providence of God. Surely it is a short work that the Lord is making on the earth. At this moment, what a spectacle does this continent present! And what fear of change is perplexing all hearts! Peace the princes boast of, and order re-established and restored. Peace and order! Excellent blessings, truly; —Heaven’s best gifts to weary mortals! But to be blessings, they must be Heaven’s gifts: flowing from the liberty with which Christ makes his people free, founded on just laws and equal rights, and hallowed by the recognition of the true God, and the utter overthrow of every idol; not bought by a sordid compromise with Rome, and upheld by the suppression of all free opinion, and the sanguinary arm of military power. As it is, who doubts that a new crash is near at hand? The unholy alliance of Despotism and Popery cannot be long tolerated, either by earth or by heaven. It is filling up the iniquity of the Papacy, and of the powers and principalities that are giving their influence to the Beast. It is putting the last drop into the cup of bitterness, even now ready to overflow. It is preparing the way for the terrible reaction when the exasperated nations, stung to frenzy by the double oppression of the Pope and Caesar, shall hate the scarlet mother of abominations, and make her desolate and naked, and eat her flesh, and burn her with fire—Revelation 16: 16. Above all, it is calling aloud for God to come swiftly to the reckoning, and to make short work of his final dealings with the Antichristian powers that have so long made the earth to groan and bleed. We may well be looking out for a rapid development of this new and unheard-of combination against the liberties and hopes of mankind. Already the isolated remnants of the free, —in the Swiss mountains, the valleys of Piedmont, and the plains of Sardinia, —are trembling for their very being. The lowering storm of priestly and despotic vengeance may burst on them at any moment. And the patience of God being exhausted suddenly, the fury of his wrath may come ere we think it possible. ‘He will finish the work, and cut it short in righteousness, —a short work will he make upon the earth.’”

“In opposition,” says the editor of the Journal of Prophecy, “to the unhealthy and unscriptural sentimentalism of those who will hear of nothing but peace, who look upon warlike preparations as wholly unchristian, and upon the military profession as unbecoming a saint, * we have the following noble appeal:”—

“At the same time, in the third place, stand prepared and on the watch for these things coming to pass, and ‘when they begin to come to pass, then look up, lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh’—Luke 21: 28. Meanwhile, yield not to imaginary visions, and premature dreams of security and repose, as if the world were grown too old and wise for the barbarism of war, and the sword were now everywhere to be sheathed amid the acclamations and congratulations of universal brotherhood. The horrors of war—the benefits of peace—it is impossible to exaggerate. But let us have a care lest we so deal with that great theme as to enervate and paralyse the hearts and hands of the free, while the military despots that are ready to scourge the earth exult in the spurious sentiment, or false economy, that would disarm the defenders of truth and liberty, left now well-nigh a mere remnant in the Thermopylae of our Western world. What! When all Europe, under the sway of rampant tyranny and intolerant priestcraft, is bristling with the implements and resounding with the smothered din of battle, is it for the forlorn hope, on which the good cause must mainly depend, to become enamoured of repose, and grasp too soon the millennial blessedness of peace? It has been the Lord's will formerly, —and if the Revelation be a true prophecy, it may be the Lord's will again, —to accomplish his great ends of judgment and mercy, through the instrumentality of wars and tumults, and these no child's play. From all unjust and unnecessary recourse to arms— from all unholy violence of speech or action—from all that wrath of man which worketh not the righteousness of God—may the nation and its people be preserved! But for the needful testimony, and the needful conflict, — whether on the field of physical power, or on the ground of faithful witness-bearing, even to persecution and bloody martyrdom, let the champions of independence and the soldiers of the Cross stand prepared. Let them watch in full armour and with unslumbering eye, lest that day of the Lord's short work on the earth should overtake them suddenly as a thief in the night.”—Dr. Candlish's Sermon, "The Lord's short work upon the earth," quoted in the Quarterly Journal of Prophecy.

* Soldiership in the armies of the Gentiles is exceedingly “unbecoming a saint.” The saints are the Lord's, and not Caesar's soldiery; and if they will only have patience, they will have military glory enough in vanquishing Caesar's armies when their great Captain shall appear to set up the kingdom, which shall “grind to powder and bring to an end all these kingdoms” of the world. Let the potsherd of the earth contend with their fellows. Let the saints abide the time, viewing the strife, and rejoicing in the end. —Editor Herald of the Kingdom & Age to Come.

“JEW.”

The Rabbins do not restrict the appellation “Jew” to the natural descendants of Abraham, or Judah, any more than the Apostle to the Gentiles. For it is written in the Talmud, “that whosoever denies idolatry is a Jew.” T. Rab. Megilloth, fol. 13. 1. Hence, in the same place, “Pharaoh’s daughter is called a Jewess, because she denied idolatry, and went down to wash herself from the idols of her father’s house.” And again it is said, that “faith does not depend upon circumcision, but upon the heart: he that believeth not as he should, circumcision does not make him a Jew; and he that believeth as he ought, he indeed is a Jew, though he is not circumcised.”—Sepher Niz. Ad. Gen. Apnd. Maji. Theolog. Jud. p. 252.

KINGDOM AND AGE TO COME.

“And in their days, even of those kings, the God of heaven shall set up A KINGDOM which shall never perish, and A DOMINION that shall not be left to another people. It shall grind to powder and bring to an end all these kingdoms, and itself shall stand for ever.”—DANIEL.

THE GOODNESS OF GOD.

*“Despisest thou the riches of his goodness * * ; not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance?”—Paul.

The phrase “the goodness of God” is found occurrent in various places of the Holy Scriptures. It is not peculiar to the New Testament, but common to it and the Old. It occurs first in the writings of Moses, who, speaking of the effect of his narrative of Jehovah’s severity upon Egypt and deliverance of Israel upon the mind of his father-in-law, says: “And Jethro rejoiced for all the goodness which the Lord had done to Israel, whom he had delivered out of the hand of the Egyptian.” From this the reader will perceive that the Lord’s goodness is comprehensive both of good and evil. It is not unmixed good—good, pure, and absolute—but mixed and relative. If his goodness had been pronounced upon by the Egyptians, they would have characterised it as pure evil; because his goodness plagued them with grievous plagues, and destroyed their army with a terrific overthrow. But this pure and absolute evil upon Egypt was unqualified goodness to Israel; for it delivered them from a sore and cruel bondage, and commenced the fulfilment of the “good thing”—Jeremiah 33: 14—which Jehovah had promised to Abraham, Isaac, and to Jacob, and their seed. God’s goodness, then, is good in act and promise to his people; but only evil to them who afflict them, and blaspheme his name.

God’s goodness to his people, and severity upon his enemies, are the necessary result of his peculiar character. Hence his goodness and character are inseparable; so that to declare “THE NAME” of the Lord is at once to make known his character and goodness, which stand related as effect and cause. Because of this, it is written, “I will make all my goodness pass before thee, and will proclaim the name of the Lord before thee; and I will be gracious to whom I will be gracious, and I will show mercy on whom I will show mercy.” Jehovah, therefore, descended in a cloud, and stood with Moses on Mount Sinai, and proclaimed the attributes which constitute his character, saying, “Jehovah, Jehovah, a God, merciful and gracious, long suffering, and abounding in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, and transgression, and sin, and destroying not utterly the guilty; visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, and upon the children’s children, unto the third and to the fourth generation”—Exodus 33: 19; 34: 6-7.

Such a God is Jehovah in his character, or relations of goodness to those whom he chooses for his people; but at the same time “a consuming fire” to his enemies—Hebrews 12: 29. He is a great and absolute sovereign in all his doings, having mercy upon whom he will, and hardening at his pleasure—Romans 9: 18. He chose Israel for his people, or nation, to whom he granted a constitution, laws, and institutions, burdensome to be borne, but most agreeable to himself, and promotive of his purpose in the manifestation of his goodness concerning them in the latter days—Acts 15: 10. All his promises emanate from the essential goodness of his nature, which is favour, forbearance, abounding in truth, faithfulness, pardoning, and corrective but not utterly destroying. His promises are made to Israel, and to Israel alone; nevertheless he has condescended to invite those of all nations who believe his promises to share in them when the time shall arrive to perform them. To Israel he is gracious; to Israel he is long-suffering; to Israel he is abundant in goodness and truth; for thousands of Israel he keeps mercy in store; he forgives Israel's iniquity, transgression and sin; and he corrects Israel, but he does not utterly destroy him, as his history shows even to this day. He hath not dealt so with any other nation. "Jehovah found Israel in a desert land, and in the waste howling wilderness: he led him about, he instructed him, he kept him as the apple of his eye"—Deuteronomy 32: 10. There is no nation so dear to him as Israel; for "Israel is beloved for the fathers' sake"—Romans 11: 28. So tenderly compassionate is he of his nation that he saith by his prophet, "He that toucheth you, O Israel, toucheth the apple of Jehovah's eye"—Zechariah 2: 8. And all this mercy to Israel is shared by those Gentiles who believe the promises and obey the law of faith; for believing Jews and Gentiles are all the children of God through the faith (diatēes pisteōos) in Christ Jesus. For as many of these believers as have been baptised into Christ have put him on. They are therefore all one in Christ Jesus; and if Christ's then Abraham's seed or Israelites, and heirs according to the promise—Galatians 3: 26, 29. Being thus adopted, the Gentiles who believe the gospel of the kingdom in the name of Jesus, are no more strangers and foreigners, or aliens from Israel's Commonwealth, and strangers from the covenants of promise, but fellow-citizens with the saints of Israel, and of the household of God, which for about seven years after the resurrection of Jesus consisted only of faithful Israelites—Ephesians 2: 12, 19.

It is an attribute of Jehovah's goodness to "keep mercy for thousands." These thousands for whom mercy is kept are "those who love him, and keep his commandments"—Exodus 20: 6—the Israel of God in the higher import of the phrase. The mercy kept for them is the chesed styled the berith olahm chasdai Dahwid, or Age-covenant mercies of David, rendered by Lowth "an everlasting covenant, the gracious promise made to David," which shall never fail—Isaiah 55: 3. These gracious promises, or loving-kindness, or mercy which Jehovah keeps for thousands, are based upon the chesed or mercy to Abraham, to which Mary and Zacharias refer in these words. "He hath holpen his servant Israel, in remembrance of his mercy as he spake to our fathers, to Abraham, and to his seed for ever:" "Jehovah hath raised up a horn of salvation for us (Israel) in the House of his servant David; as he spake by the mouth of his holy Prophets, which have been from the beginning of the age: that we should be saved from our enemies, and from the hand of all that hate us: to perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember his holy covenant; the oath which he swore to our father Abraham, that he would grant us (Israel) that we being delivered out of the hand of our enemies might serve him without fear, in holiness and righteousness before him, all the days of our life”—Luke 1: 54-55; 69-75. The birth of Jesus was a proof that Jehovah remembered the mercy he had promised to Abraham and David. Jesus, the born king of the Jews, was the Horn or Power by which the nation is to be saved from all its enemies; he is therefore styled “a horn of salvation for Israel.” He has not saved them yet. They are still subject to the Horns of the Gentiles, and have no part in their native land. So long as their condition remains as it is, the mercy promised to Abraham and David continues unfulfilled. The resurrection of Jesus, however, is the earnest that it will be accomplished in the appointed time; and that he will certainly deliver them from the tyrants “who destroy the earth.” Hear this, ye infidels, who profess to love the Lord, but believe not what he saith, “Behold, saith he, the days come that I will perform that good thing which I have promised unto the house of Israel and to the house of Judah. In those days, and at that time, will I cause the Branch of Righteousness to grow up unto David; and he shall execute judgment and righteousness in the land. In those days shall Judah be saved, and Jerusalem dwell safely: and this (is his name) which shall be proclaimed to her. The Lord our Righteousness—vezeh asher yiqurah lahh Yehowah Tzidkainu. For thus saith Jehovah; David shall never want a man to sit upon the throne of the House of Israel: neither shall the Priests the Levites want a man before me to offer burnt offerings, and to kindle meat offerings, and to do sacrifice continually”—Jeremiah 33: 14-18; 33: 5-6. This “good thing” is the subject-matter of the mercy promised to Abraham and David, which Jehovah, the fulfiller of promises, keepeth for thousands; and which is as certain to be communicated as that he exists, for “he magnifies his word above all his name”—Psalm 138: 2. That good thing in its details is abundantly spoken of by the mouth of all the Prophets through whom Jehovah hath kept alive the remembrance of it from the foundation of Israel’s Commonwealth. It is Israel’s Hope, and therefore the hope of the true christian; for “salvation is of the Jews.”

Behold, then, the promised goodness of God! An Immortal King shall reign and prosper in the land of Israel, and shall execute judgment and justice there over the Twelve Tribes, and the obedient nations of the world for a thousand years. This is the oath which Jehovah swore to Abraham, saying, "In thee and in thy Seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed,"—a blessedness, in the establishment of which Israel will have been delivered out of the hand of all their enemies, and thenceforth enjoy the privilege of serving Jehovah without fear, in holiness and righteousness before him all the days of their mortal career. The nation of our adoption will then be the chief of all the nations dwelling safely in its own land. Gentiles by birth, but Jews by regeneration, the goodness of God promises us resurrection from among the dead, and exaltation to the highest honours of the State; as it is written, "the saints of the Most High shall possess the Kingdom for ever, even for ever and ever."

Such mercy Jehovah keeps for thousands of Israel and adopted Gentiles who believe the promises he has made to the fathers. But his goodness promises even more than eternal life and honour to the just. It promises them wisdom, and knowledge, and physical strength, the possession of the world and the fulness thereof, glory, equality with the angels, and the high favour of God for ever. He keeps this mercy in store for them that love him, and obey his word. Who that believes these things would hesitate to respond, "Jehovah is good, for his mercy endureth for ever?" Yea, it is even so; for "the mercy of Jehovah is from everlasting to everlasting upon them that fear him, and his righteousness unto children's children; to such as keep his covenant, and to those who remember his commandments to do them." Mark, dear reader, "to such as keep his covenant and obey him." Dost thou know what it is to keep Jehovah's covenant and obey him? Know then that it is to believe the gospel of the kingdom, and to be baptised, or united to the name of Jesus, and thenceforth to continue patiently in well doing. The covenant is the covenant concerning the kingdom of which the gospel treats—the oath of national blessedness through Abraham and his seed, which Jehovah swore to him when he brought him into the territory of the future kingdom. You must believe this same particular gospel or you cannot "keep the covenant," or have any part in the kingdom it proclaims.

Now, beloved reader, “Despisest thou the riches of this goodness of God?” Read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest the good things of his mercy we have brought up herein, and say if they are not of peerless import. Are not endless life and good days, boundless riches, honour, and eternal glory in a kingdom of God’s establishment upon the earth, more to be desired than all the world can give you now? Can you be of sane mind and despise all these riches of goodness? Can you be rational and self-possessed? But if you despise them not, but “believe on God,” that is, be fully persuaded that what he has promised he is able to perform, and will do it, will you not likewise be willing to make any sacrifice to obtain them? If you were till a certain time devoted to the world and the enjoyment of the flesh, but came afterwards to believe in these promises with an honest and good heart, or as men say, “sincerely,” would not your views of things present and future have undergone a radical change? Would you not cease to set your affections on earthly things; would not your affection rather be transferred to the things contained in that “mercy kept for thousands?” Yea, verily. And would you not have been led to this change of views, affection, and will by the goodness of God exhibited in the testimony of his holy prophets? Even so; and you would then be a practical illustration of the Bible sentiment that “it is the goodness of God that leadeth to repentance.”

God’s goodness leads to repentance. It leads believers to place themselves in such a relation to the truth, that “repentance unto life” may be “granted unto them”—Acts 11: 18. The goodness of God is like to choice and goodly wares exhibited in a bazaar for sale. Their goodliness attracts the attention of passengers, and leads them to desire to possess them. The merchant grants their desire on certain conditions. They accept the terms, and receive the right of property in them; and he promises to put them in possession of them at an appointed time. The goodness of God which leads to repentance is exhibited in the gospel of the kingdom, and no where else; for this gospel is the grand theme of the word of God contained in the scriptures, old and new: and because it is displayed in that royal proclamation, therefore, John the Baptist, Jesus, and the apostles before their Lord’s crucifixion, went through the towns and cities, and country parts of Judea, “preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God, saying, Repent; for the Majesty of the heavens is arrived”—Matthew 3: 2; 4: 17, 23; Mark 1: 14-15;

Luke 4: 18, 43; 9: 2, 6. The kingdom and arrival of its king were preached to lead those who believed it to repentance. The goodness of God set forth in the doctrine of the kingdom was preached also after the resurrection, to lead men to repentance, that they might be made meet for its inheritance; but the motive thereto, founded on the personal presence of the king, was not repeated. It could not be; for "the Majesty of the heavens" had departed into a far country—Luke 19: 11-12. The apostles no longer said: "Repent; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand;" but, "Repent; because God hath appointed a day in which he will rule the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained, whereof he hath given assurance to all in that he hath raised him from the dead"—Acts 17: 30-31—in other words, "Repent; because the Majesty of the heavens, who hath departed, will come again to rule the world in righteousness." This is now the glad tidings of the kingdom for repentance unto life.

That "the gospel" and "the goodness of God" are phrases importing the same things, is clear, from the use of them by Paul. He says: "the Jews became enemies to the gospel for the sake of the Gentiles." It was no good will to the Gentiles on their part, that they refused to believe; but their refusal was the result of hardness of heart: therefore, as a punishment, God blinded and hardened them still more, so that, instead of filling his house or kingdom with believers who were "Jews by nature," he determined to make up the complement of the redeemed by believers separated from "sinner of the Gentiles," who should become Jews by adoption, through faith in his goodness. Judah, though still beloved for Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob's sake, fell from gospel favour through want of faith; while faithful Gentiles were grafted into the stock of Israel's olive, and recognised as Israelites in every respect, save the accident of birth. This was just severity towards Judah; but gracious goodness towards Gentiles.

Thus it is apparent that the principle according to which the position of Judah and the Gentiles relative to Jehovah and his mercy was changed, was that of faith. To continue in the faith of the gospel was to continue in the goodness of God. Judah did not continue in that goodness, because the Jews did not continue to believe it. They were therefore "cut off." The offer was to be made to them no more. Judah should indeed be grafted in again to the national olive: that is, reorganised with the rest of the tribes as a nation and commonwealth, or kingdom, in their own land, under the sovereignty of “Jesus of Nazareth, the king of the Jews;” but those of them contemporary with the national blindness should have no share in “the joy” of their king—in those good things offered to individuals in the gospel of the kingdom. This gospel announces that the God of heaven will set up a kingdom and dominion upon earth, under whose righteous administration Israel and the nations will be blessed with all temporal and spiritual blessings for a thousand years; such as, that there shall be war no more; that oppression and injustice shall cease; that the earth shall give her increase; that the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the Lord’s glory; that the poor shall be comforted and protected; that there shall be but one religion, and so forth—these are gospel blessings for the world, when, by conquest, it is brought into subjection to Israel’s king; but the gospel promises the glory, honour, power, majesty, and riches of the kingdom and dominion only to those persons who, before the manifestation of them, while they are yet a matter of faith, and not of sight, believe the promised goodness of it, and continue in it.

To Gentile people, the apostle saith: “If ye continue not in the goodness of God, ye also shall be cut off.” In the same place, he saith: “Thou, O Gentile, standeth by faith.” That is, so long as the Gentiles continue to believe the gospel of the kingdom, there shall be scope for repentance unto life, that they may inherit the kingdom; but when they become faithless of the gospel, as Judah was before them, the door of mercy shall with like destructive violence be closed against them. “Be not high-minded, but fear,” saith Paul; “for if God spared not the natural branches of the olive tree, beware lest he also spare not thee.” In the apostle’s day, there was a disposition in the Gentile mind to high-mindedness, and to boast against Judah, who had stumbled at the stone of stumbling, and rock of offence. They do not seem to have entertained the idea of the re-engraftment of the broken-off branches, but concluded that God had cast Israel away as a people for whom he had no further use or affection. This was not the general idea; but some seem to have held it, or the apostle would not have contradicted the supposition. “God forbid,” says he, “that such a thing should be; he hath not cast away his people, Israel, whom he knew before he received the Gentiles into favour.” But, though the apostles so promptly repudiated the notion, he did not succeed in repressing it. That Israel was finally rejected and cast away, took strong hold of the Gentile professors of Christianity, who in after times thought they were doing God service in persecuting the Jews. Even at the present day, after a lapse of eighteen centuries, the receiving of Israel into favour again is regarded as fabulous by “christian professors.” Being “wise in their own conceits,” they boast themselves against the Jews, and denounce as “carnal Judaisers,” those who, with Paul, affirm that “God hath not cast away his people, Israel, whom he foreknew.” Hear, O ye smatterers in prophetic lore, what Jehovah saith of Israel: “Thus saith the Lord, who giveth the sun for a light by day, and the ordinances of the moon and of the stars for a light by night; who divideth the sea when the waves thereof roar—the Lord of hosts is his name.” “If those ordinances depart from before me,” saith the Lord, “then the seed of Israel also shall cease from being a nation before me forever.” Mark the “if,” which is still further emphasised in the next verse, saying: “If the heaven above can be measured, and the foundations of the earth searched out beneath, I will cast off all the seed of Israel for all that they have done,” saith the Lord—Jeremiah 31: 35-37. This is equivalent to saying, Israel shall never cease from being a nation before me, though they have done grievously in my sight; for the hypotheses upon which their casting away is predicated are absolute impossibilities. It is as impossible for their national existence to cease forever, as it is for feeble-minded man to measure heaven, or to search out the centre of the earth.

We have said, that the non-restoration of Israel was not the general idea entertained by Gentile believers in the apostle’s day. To say that it was, would be to affirm that they did not generally believe the gospel; for there can be no kingdom without the restoration of the Jews. There are those in our day who deny their restoration. This is proof-positive that they do not understand the gospel, which is the glad tidings of the restoration of the kingdom again to Israel, and the blessedness of all nations through their government; for, we repeat it, “salvation is of the Jews.”

The spiritual condition of the Gentiles at the present crisis, in all countries of “Christendom,” is the exact counterpart of Judah’s at the period of the dissolution of their commonwealth. The Jews were without faith, and so are also the Gentiles of today. But thou wilt perhaps say, O reader, how can that be? Are there not thousands upon thousands of holy men engaged in preaching Christ in every land; and are not they sustained by millions of faithful men, who contribute immense sums for the propagation of the Christian faith? We admit there are multitudes of preachers, and millions of sincere professors of religious faiths they call Christian; but where are the preachers and believers of the gospel of the kingdom; and rarer still, where are the believers thereof, who obey it? “Faith,” such as it is, abounds but “THE faith” is known to very few, and preached by still fewer. The Jews believed the gospel of the kingdom, but they refused to obey it in the name of Jesus, as king of Israel. They stumbled at him. They did not believe in him as Jehovah’s Anointed One; and therefore rejected “the mystery of the gospel” in his name. It is so likewise with the Gentiles at this day. They preach a character they call Jesus, whom Paul did not preach. Compare the popular notions of Jesus Christ with the Christ delineated in the old and new scriptures, and you will be astonished, O reader, at the want of congruity between them! The Gentiles stumble at the character called Christ in the Bible, even as the Jews did at Jesus. These repudiated a suffering Messiah; the Gentiles reject a Christ who shall subdue the nations by the sword; replant Israel’s olive in its native soil; restore the kingdom and throne of his father, David; sit upon it for a thousand years, and as sole monarch of the world, rule all nations as Jehovah’s vicegerent upon the earth—the Bible is at variance with them both, for it not only reveals a Christ who should be made perfect through sufferings, but one that should do all these things besides.

We repeat it with profound conviction, that the gospel is not preached, it is not believed, nor is it obeyed by the religionists of our day. The exceptions to this statement are so very few that they do not affect the generality of its application. If, as in the days of Elijah, there be seven thousand in Christendom who believe the truth and have obeyed it, our statement is not at all invalidated thereby. They who believe in a gospel of kingdoms beyond the skies to be possessed with a Jesus who is to return to earth only to destroy it, believe a gospel that has no place in the Bible. How high minded and wise are professors in this day in their own conceit! They plume themselves in their Christianity and spiritual intelligence, saying

“they are rich and increased in goods, and have need of nothing; but know not that they are wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked.” So Egyptian is the darkness which beclouds their minds that they discern not the awful crisis which is advancing upon them with gigantic strides. They are sporting themselves with their own deceiving, while destruction is at the door. Faithless of the gospel, high-minded, and wise in their own conceit! This is itself a great sign of the times. By faith we stand; by unbelief we fall. What then remains? Nothing more, but that the Gentiles be cut off, and the process of their engraftment be terminated. Short will be the work when it is once fairly under weigh. The cutting off accomplished, the gathering in of Israel’s tribes will then proceed, and shall not be intermitted until “all Israel shall be saved.” Hear, in conclusion, what Jehovah saith by the hand of Moses concerning this time of trouble coming upon the world: “The day of the calamity of Israel’s foes is at hand, and the things that shall come upon them make haste. For the Lord shall judge his people, and repent himself for his servants, when he seeth that their power is gone, and there is none shut up or left. See now that I, even I, am he, and there is no god with me. I kill, and I make whole; I wound, and I heal; neither is there any that can deliver out of my hand. For I lift up my hand to heaven, and say I live for ever. If I whet my glittering sword, and my hand take hold of judgment, I will render vengeance to mine enemies, and will reward them that hate me. I will make mine arrows drunk with blood, and my sword shall devour flesh; with the blood of the slain and of the captives, from the beginning of revenges upon the enemy.” When this shall be perfected, then “Rejoice, O ye nations, with his people; for he will avenge the blood of his servants, and will render vengeance to his adversaries, and will be merciful unto his land, and to his people.”

THE PROPHETIC STYLE.

In the prophetic style the figurative and the real are wonderfully intermixed, to the utter confusion of the rules of the technical rhetorician; insomuch that, if I err not, Dr. Blair, the father of our Scottish school of taste, (which, however, has less to do with Scotland than with any land, true indigenous Scottish intellect and deep Scottish feeling having ever rejected it as a miserable and unnatural importation from the cold-hearted and infidel school of France,) could find only one complete and faultless metaphor or figure in the Old Testament which is not mixed with the literal: for nothing do they abhor so much as a mixed metaphor. Poor word-slaves! How unsufferable are ye! What puny minds, bound in fetters of feebleness! Ye should imitate God's word, and not ask God's word to imitate you. If ye had the same free and rich spirit, ye would have the same free and rich language. But, with your miserable canons of taste and criticism, ye have now, these fifty years, been starving the free and deep spirit of the Scottish people with correct and elegant compositions, as ye term them, which have in them no nourishment of truth, and are as little entitled to the name of sermons as my child's toy to the name of that real thing which she fancies it to be. Oh, I abhor and nauseate, as much as any Scottish peasant who wears the blue bonnet, these empty, heartless, feckless, foisonless productions of what is called the moderate school of Scotch preaching, at the head of which stands the Rhetorical Professor referred to above. But, to return from a digression which the bitter memory of many blighted parishes of my native land forced me into. I observe again, that it is the use and wont of the prophetic style to intermingle the figurative and the literal: for this reason—that truth is one, and the creation, in all its parts, an expression of that one truth. The similitudes are therefore not accidental resemblances, but real, though diversified expressions of the same truth. The figures of the Scripture, taken from nature, are the Holy Spirit's expressions of what nature was fashioned and is preserved to body forth, concerning the one purpose of God, which is complete in Christ. For those rhetoricians, who neither know nor believe this, it may be very well to insist that the similitude shall be told out, in order that we may see whether it be a true similitude or not; but for those who understand the deeper secrets of nature, who are nature's true poets and bards, and have in them somewhat of the holiness of the prophet, inasmuch as they are conversant with the realities and not the mere shadow of things, it will ever be the privilege and the inclination to fall in, more or less, with the method of the Prophets: which is, to pass out of one region of creation into another—the elemental, the vegetable, the animal, the intellectual, the spiritual—by means of that clue of Divine discernment with which the spiritual man is gifted, of whom it is said, that “he judgeth all things, but he himself is judged by no one.”

The instances of this secret and sudden transfiguration from the figurative to the real are numerous in this very prophecy; indeed, just as numerous as the number of figures employed, for there is not one instance to the contrary. In Isaiah 8: 6-8, there is a notable example of the mixed metaphor, at which our critics might find great amusement; where the Assyrian is at once a river overflowing, and a bird with wings. In chapter 10: 16-19, he is a forest, a herd of fat cattle, a fruitful field, with soul and body, whose destruction is like the fainting of a standard-bearer. In chapter 11: 1, Messiah is a branch; in verse 2 he is a man full of the spirit: and so forth, in almost every instance of a regularly formed figure. But if we refer to mere similitudes, then they are heaped up one upon another from all regions of nature. This is the manner of the Prophets, and I take it of uninspired men also, according as they are endued with more and more of the spirit of wisdom and understanding. No objection, therefore, is it, to say of the figurative before us that it passeth likewise into the literal; for the wonder would be that it should not. Now, while we maintain the figurative sense, upon the grounds already set out, we see many indications of the figurative also; as, when it is said, verse 6, “And a little child shall lead them.” This must be understood either as conferring a literal and plain sense upon the wolf, the leopard, the kid, the calf, the young lion, and the fatling, or the whole must be taken as an allegorical painting, which we have already rejected. There would be no propriety in making a child to lead the great and mighty men of the earth; but there is a great beauty in a child leading these various beasts in one band of union and peace; it shows, not only the departure of their mutual instincts of destructiveness and fear one toward another, but likewise the return of their common subordination to man; and presents with all creation yielding its neck, not to the wise tamer, or the strong subduer, or the crafty catcher of the creatures, but to the face and image of upright man, stamped upon the weakness, the artlessness, the helplessness of a child.—There seems to me, again, another indication of the plain and literal sense in the words of the 7th verse: “And the lion shall eat straw like the ox.” This could not, without great refinement indeed, suggest itself to one who had only the figurative sense in his mind. That the lion should not devour the ox, is of easy and natural application from the figure to the thing set forth by it; but that the lion should eat straw like the ox, is a refinement which I think will hardly be found in the Prophets. But, taking it literally, it doth declare the law of their being to be changed, which at present is universally, and in all conditions, to feed on flesh; not only that they will not destroy and devour one another, which is the very instinct of many wild animals, and of some appears to be the chief end of their being; but, if flesh be presented to them, they will not use it for food, but reject as much as they now reject straw. The next verse, “And the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice’s den,” can, I think, admit of interpretation only in the literal sense; for as a figure I cannot tell what it means. It means, one may say, that the simplest of mankind may safely entrust himself with men naturally of the most deep and malignant character. But this, methinks, would have been better expressed by taking two animals; and it hath already been sufficiently expressed by bringing the wolf and the lamb to dwell together. It may be said, moreover, that the figure of general pacification, being once begun, the rich and exuberant spirit of prophecy carries it onward, and finishes with this beautiful climax. I answer, that I find no such playful use or unnecessary expense of words among the Prophets; whom, the more I study, the more I admire, as gaining their end by the most simple, short and exact methods. But being understood literally as it is written, it brings out a most beautiful and appropriate meaning—that the enmity between the serpent’s seed and the woman’s seed should then be at an end; that the serpent should no longer, as the deodand for the horrid crime of which he had been the tool, be doomed as the most deadly enemy of his master, man; but, the redemption being completed, between the child of woman and the serpent there should be harmony; his subtlety should not betray the child, his venom should not hurt the child: he should be delivered from the sore badge of his having been a party to the great calamity of the Fall.—Proph. Exp.

OUR VISIT TO BRITAIN.

In Edinburgh again. —A present to the Editor. —Things as they were in Auld Reekie. —A Biographical Sketch of Pastor Erasmus, whom the gospel embarrasses. —Pietistic sentimentality intensely selfish. —Things as they are in Edinburgh in relation to the Kingdom.

On my second visit to Edinburgh, which preceded that of Dundee, a committee previously appointed, engaged the Wesleyan Chapel in Richmond street as the place of meeting. The interest in the lectures continued, and resulted in raising the subscription to Elpis Israel from a dozen copies to a hundred and fifty. An incident illustrative of this will more fully mark it than any thing I can say on the subject. After meeting at South Bridge Hall one afternoon, a gold pencil, and pearl-handled, silver-mounted, gold pen, were presented to me with the following note:

“Beloved brother—Will you please accept of the accompanying pen and pencil from a few of your sisters in Edinburgh, and consider that it is not from a desire to pay you wages for your good services in the cause of Christian enlightenment; but as an expression of our gratitude for the instruction and entertainment we have received from your excellent lectures; and as a token of our respect for your disinterested devotion to such a noble work as the unfolding of divine truth, that we take the liberty of presenting you with these mementos. We shall hope nothing else than that their service may aid you in the duty which you have marked out for yourself: that we shall continue to peruse occasional essays of your pen in the elucidation of prophecy; and enjoy a pleasure almost as great as we have heretofore received from your living voice in your emphatic and concise discourses.

“Pursue that benevolent enterprise, and know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord. Your path is watched over, and your progress observed with intense interest by your affectionate sisters in Edinburgh.

“Farewell; and may the blessing of the Most High always accompany you.”

Edinburgh, August 4, 1849.

The wish expressed in the above has been pretty fully responded to; for the original matter of the first and second volumes of this periodical, elucidating "the word of the kingdom," has been mainly written by the pen so kindly and graciously presented. I only regret to add, that its nib is the worse for wear; and likely soon to fail in its cooperation with the hand that holds it, and the brain that gives it inspiration, in the great and important work of stating, illustrating, proving, and defending the truth. If my friends in the modern Athens do not enjoy the "pleasure" of a continued perusal of my expositions of the prophetic word through this jewel of a pen, it is not because I do not work it diligently to the Lord. What they listened to with so much interest as it was extemporised before them, is now more digestedly exhibited in those monthly pages. Why then does not this periodical circulate more extensively in Edinburgh? Is the interest abated; or is the perfection of knowledge there attained, that nothing can be added to edification, exhortation, or comfort? A few extracts from letters will throw some light upon things as they were and as they are, with the reason of their diversity.

First, then, in regard to the things that were before I left Britain. A highly esteemed friend still of Auld Reekie, writes thus: —"We heard of your presence in Dundee through Dr. Dick, who expressed much regret at not having heard your lectures. We hope you excited as much interest there as elsewhere; and shall be glad to hear through any channel of your "work of faith, and labour of love."

"We remain here in most respects as you left us. The ignorant remain ignorant, the prejudiced remain prejudiced; nay, hug their prejudices more closely as they are assailed by the voice of truth, unwilling to give them up."

"Nothing has surprised me more than the complete ignorance respecting you, your faith, and hope; your doings and sayings, that is manifested by those unfriendly to you. The vaguest reports have been received as solid and substantial truths; and that without the least attempt at investigation! Your maligners have certainly much to answer for: you have, however, overcome a vast amount of prejudice, and will, finally, triumph over all, I have no doubt. Wishing you continued success, and the satisfaction arising from a good conscience, I remain your brother in the gospel hope.”

This was written in August 1849. Not long after the Auchtermuchty Covenanters’ meeting in Oak Hall, made overtures to the South Bridgians for a reunion. The Oak Hallists were Campbellites of the strictest sect of the profession, taking their cue from their American chief, and the exponents of his will in Nottingham and Auchtermuchty. The following extract from a letter written in November following will shed some light on the spirit that moved them.

“We are still going on,” says the writer, “as we did while you were here. The party that had separated from us have made strenuous efforts for a reunion; meetings were held, and questions (supposed to comprehend all that stood in the way) proposed, &c.: but the price demanded was no less than to surrender our judgments and consciences into their keeping, and neither receive a Christian brother, nor accept the right hand of fellowship from other churches, but with their consent. How men, not Papists, Prelatists, or Presbyterians, by profession, could make such demands, is a thing I cannot account for. Such is your left-hand friend Dowie of Cupar. But light and liberty must spread, though they may not produce godliness. Yours very truly, in hope of Christ’s appearing and kingdom.”

Had a reunion been formed, it is probable, that proscription would have become the rule in the South Bridge Hall. Campbell, Wallis, and Dron, would have been the Trinity worshipped there; and of course, in such a temple the kingdom’s gospel and its friends could find no place. I hear a rumour, however, that a reunion has ensued; but of the truth of it I cannot speak. I hear that it is so, and that things are now “very peaceable in South Bridge.” If true, is it that peaceableness that results from purity of faith and hope, and conduct; or is it the peaceableness of compromise ratified over the suppression of those stirring truths, which created so much interest and attention while our living voice was sounding them in their ears? But it may be all rumour. Being in the dark upon the subject, the question must remain unanswered by me. Whatever may obtain there, I trust that the kingdom’s gospel is not forgotten, nor the obedience which it requires.

After the publication of Elpis Israel I made a third visit to Edinburgh, accompanied by my daughter. We were very kindly received and hospitably entertained by Mr. A. M. Bell, of Charlotte Square, Mr. Symonds, and others. This time I addressed the public in the School of Arts Lecture Room, on the things of the kingdom and name of Jesus Christ. Among the audience was a Baptist preacher who had diligently attended all my lectures, and had also read Elpis Israel. After he had heard me through, he called to see me at Mr. Bell's. I listened patiently to his story for about two hours. His parents were Episcopalians, and his bias consequently, when young, was in favour of that sect. Some of the church evangelical leaders wanted to make him an out and out parish clergyman; but on coming over the thirty-nine articles he found that he could not conscientiously swear to them. They proposed, then, to train him for a missionary to the heathen, who required no particular oath of qualification to make him orthodox. But a lady acquainted with his case, suggested the expediency of delay; and generously gave him permission to draw upon her to the amount of 500 dollars, to meet his necessities in books, and board for six months. He concluded at length to enter the Church Missionary College. In process of time he fell sick, which the creed he was studying, and could not digest, considerably increased. His conscience was greatly distressed, and could find no relief till he communicated the burden of it to the Principal of the College, who advised him to leave when his health was restored. This he did, and then began to study medicine with a friend. A little bit of romance turned him from physic to school-teaching in France. He remained there some two years, after which he found himself in England, his wife preparing to keep a ladies' boarding school, and himself the pastor of a congregational church. Difficulty or coolness arose between him and his people; so that by the advice of the Rev. Dr. Styles he went to Boulogne to see what opening there might be there for a pastor among the English, intending to return in two weeks at the latest. Instead of the doctor keeping his friend's counsel, he told it to one of his own deacons. This man, who was afflicted with cacoethes loquendi, thought if he could get the pastor out he might work himself into the vacant pulpit. He, therefore, told an old gossip, who was a member of the church, that pastor Erasmus had gone to Boulogne, and would never return. Away she went to the pastor's trades-people to spread the tale. Alarmed for their bills, these "brethren" posted off to Erasmus' wife, told her what they had heard, and pressed an immediate settlement. They persuaded her to call in an appraiser forthwith, and to divide the spoil with them without delay. Being a woman of no remarkable strength of mind, and knowing nothing of the sinuosities of this naughty world they call "religious," she did the bidding of "the brethren," who would hardly advise her to do the worst, though for their own advantage! The fortnight being ended, and Boulogne offering no inducement to stay, Erasmus returned to England; and on landing, immediately drove off to the home he had left. But, as may be supposed, his amazement was blank and astounding to find the door plate gone, his wife departed, and the house closed against him! Pulpit, wife, and furniture all gone, and he for the time a ruined man. The wife he found at her father's, but all the rest had gone beyond recovery.

The future, whose very light was darkness, was all before him. Congregationalism was his only stock-in-trade, and for that he could find no customer. The home market was overstocked with the wares of more successful competitors. But what Independency would not give down to one of its own children, "the benevolent Mrs. Fry," and another Quaker, a London banker, voluntarily supplied. "If thee will go to Amiens and preach, we will allow thee £70 a-year." This was not to be rejected, so to France Erasmus returned for the third time. How long he remained there I forget; but in process of no very long time he was in London again among the Independents. It was now he ventured to look into the New Testament to see what it said about baptism. "Till now," said he "I always put the question as far from me as possible. I was afraid to read on the subject, apprehensive that I might find myself inconveniently placed. Your remarks I know to be true. The preachers will not investigate, fearing the consequences to which it might lead." He read, examined, rejected infant sprinkling, and was immersed.

He was now a Baptist preacher, and soon after his immersion, united to a spouse of that denomination at £60 per year, from which her guardians deducted £10 per annum rent for the parsonage, or manse. This left but a poor pittance for family support. He tried to augment it by laying hold of physic again, which he had long ago thrown to the dogs in a paroxysm of romance. But the dogs began to growl, and show their teeth at him, because he had not been duly attested by the grand council. He found the experiment too hazardous to persist in; and as he could not make both ends meet without a secular vocation, which was denied him, he determined to remove to Edinburgh, and try his fortune there. Having arrived in this city he hired a hall for preaching. It was pretty well attended, and yielded enough to pay the rent, and support the family with a little extra effort of their own.

Thus were things with him when he attended my lectures at the School of Arts. "Now," said he, "you are in possession of my story in its general outline, but I have not told you my belief. I believe that immortality is the gift of God to the righteous only; and that 'the immortality of the soul' is a mere heathen speculation. I believe that Jesus will return in power and great glory to establish the kingdom and throne of his father David; and sitting upon it in Zion, will rule all nations in righteousness with his saints. I have read Elpis Israel, and believe it sets forth the truth: but here is the extremity to which I am reduced. The support of myself and family depends on my preaching, what is generally approved. Believing what I do, I cannot continue to preach as I have done; and if I preach what I believe, my living is gone! What am I to do?" Preach the gospel of the kingdom, and walk by faith, trusting to God for all the rest. But, as it is the poor to whom it is preached, and who principally embrace it, the living obtained by the gospel from them is neither delicate nor sumptuous; but oftentimes quite scant and self-denying. If the people will not hear you in behalf of the truth, turn to some secular employment and labour in the gospel as you have opportunity. "I cannot," said he, "preach at the Hall any more: but what is to be done doth not evidently appear." Having discussed the question of emigration to America, and presented him with a copy of Elpis Israel, he departed with an expression of good intentions; but whether he carried them out, I have had hitherto no means of arriving at the proof.

The committee which undertook the bringing of the public together to hear me, were two Scotch Baptists, a Morrisonian, and I think, a Campbellite. They were quite zealous until Elpis Israel appeared, when their orthodox feelings experienced great revulsion. The Morrisonian, whose zeal was of a business character, remained firm; while the others became positively incensed. This was between the publication of the book and my last visit. A friend writing previous to this says, "I fell in with one of the committee who agreed with the good (?) folks of Derby, that you were the most dangerous man who had visited them. After half an hour's conversation, I left him in a rather more reasonable frame of mind. Some speak against Elpis Israel who are quite ignorant of its contents; others, because you speak against the clergy, &c. There are not many whose minds are free from priestcraft. I don't know who in Edinburgh are your friends now. Elpis Israel has repelled some; but has, I hope, attracted others better worth. Mr. Campbell can never succeed in any attempt he may make to neutralise the truths it contains. He might deter, or induce many not to read it; for the very influence of his name has already done so." One of the committee subscribed for four copies. He sold two, made a gift of one, and retained the fourth: but when he came to read it, it took all the music out of him, and set him on fire, so that he endeavoured to get them back, that he might commit them all to the flames. Such is pietism—unreasoning, sickly sentimentality, turned to rage, when the peace of its morbid conscientiousness is disturbed.

A correspondent writing from Edinburgh, well expresses himself, in regard to this pietistic mentality which displayed itself in the case to which he alludes. "Our friend at ----," says he, "has again started back, horror-struck at even an inquiry into the matters so interesting to us. How can such ever come to a knowledge of the truth? The so-called 'evangelical system' is based on the corrupt, innate selfishness of the human heart. It desires safety, comfort, peace, &c.; but what is for God's honour does not enter into the speculations of its adherents. Hence, talking to them of the necessity of obedience to a command, as necessary for them, is 'throwing a wet blanket' on the fire of their zeal, and we get half blinded by the smoke for our pains. The truth you have so well and boldly announced, is spreading in this place; but meets, of course, with the most determined opposition in the shape of ridicule, hard names, and other like harmless things."

In another letter from the same city, the writer remarks, "Few men appear able or willing to look steadily at both sides of the truth, which has two aspects—one, which respects God; the other, as respects man. Paul's desire was that God might be glorified; whether by his life or death, mattered not. If he could live and spread the glory of his name, well; if he must die in attestation of his testimony, also well, or better. Where is this absorption of self into the one desire that God might be glorified, to be found? The 'evangelical system,' so called, is essentially human—the glorification of man being its real object, barely concealed, indeed, under an appearance of love and zeal for the cause of God. In its more open manifestations, we see it evinced in the craving after magnificent churches, rich paintings, grand musical services, robed priests, and all the machinery and tricks of the stage: less manifestly, in the untiring efforts made by 'churches' to extend their peculiar doctrines. It is shown unconsciously by 'Sabbath Alliance' men, whether of the society or not; who, while they profess zeal for God's service, simply confess the real secret. 'Their feelings' are shocked by Sabbath desecration, and this same self, this intense selfishness, is very evident in almost all the memoirs of excellent and pious people, in which we see that their thoughts are eternally set on their own hearts, thoughts, frames, and feelings. If 'out of spirits,' then it is 'God hiding his face.' One would imagine that their God played at hide and seek with them! John Bunyan sends one of his heroes (in the body) to heaven and to hell. He finds his mother in heaven, who has no more any interest in the husband and children left on earth. He goes to hell, and converses with wretches burning in fire, ten thousand times fiercer than earthly flames, who are reposing on beds of burning steel, having, also, streams of burning brimstone poured down their throats, which are to continue pouring throughout eternity. He communes with these, and it is transported directly back to his home, where he appears like an angel of light to his wife and children, so great is the joy depicted on his countenance. Poor Bunyan has formed the minds of a vast number of these 'evangelical christians.' They see only one side of truth; or rather, have capacity to apprehend only one side. They want 'peace,' as you say of the world; 'they want a respite from the stings and remorse of conscience;' therefore they have no respect for any commandment which does not manifestly bear upon their frame of mind here; and are unmindful of those things which have respect to the glory and authority of 'the Great King.' This human idol meets me at every turn. It has perverted the ordinances, and rendered the table of the Lord contemptible. How can there be love to God unless the effect of faith be, a simple desire that he may be glorified in us?

“I have not,” he continues, “heard the particulars of the conclusion in Dundee. The church there had long ago cut us off from its fellowship; and we had ceased to have much consideration for it. I am glad to hear that some life has been infused into them—that all have not fallen asleep. We behold there and at Nottingham, that one-sided system of which I speak. Man is for ever trying to attain sovereignty, independent of the principles of Christ—the woman would rule if she could. May they learn better. The gospel certainly has the promise of this life; but he is a fool that stops there. Let him remember that ‘which is to come.’ The words ‘to come’ do not apply to that happy state in which the angels are around the throne of God. Next week is to come; and cannot be here or there now.”

“Do not expect to see the seed you have sown spring up and produce fruit immediately, for it might wither as fast. Slow and sure applies to the growth of truth—to the seeds of real knowledge.”

On September 23, 1850, I received a few last words from Edinburgh, which will conclude what I have to present, illustrative of things as they were in that city till I left Britain. The writer says, “I am happy to say we are all well in this quarter. Inquiry is still rife about “the kingdom;” and I perceive no diminution of interest in bible matters amongst those who have formed the society for investigating its contents.

“Mrs. ----’s former ‘episcopal shepherd’ came looking after her a short time ago, and discussing the merits of the party she had joined. Some observations were made on our non-payment of our pastor; and the very clear distinction that existed between the office of a pastor, and that of an evangelist. ‘He could not see it;’ and said that ‘there was nothing he disliked more than these distinctions; that there was none; and that Paul expressly laid down the rule that the labourer is worthy of his hire;’ and so on. By what fatality is it that they have united the pastoral duty with the evangelist’s maintenance in their own persons, and yet seem to be ignorant of their double-dealing? The greater part seem to be as much victims of the system as the people over whom they rule! Any church with him is a Christian Church, provided they have a standing ministry, that is, a paid clergy; so that our little body is not a Christian Church, though the Papist, &c., are! What strange infatuation!”

Things as they were give no assurance of the character of things as they will be. “Ye did run well;” says Paul to the Galatians, “who did hinder you that ye should not obey the truth?” They received him as an angel of God, and would have plucked out their eyes to serve him; and afterwards treated him as people bewitched would treat a man who sought to disenchant them of an agreeable delusion. This change in their minds towards him was superinduced by the influence of the zealous advocates of “another gospel,” or faith by which the sinner may be justified, than that word of faith which he preached. The same cause has operated in Edinburgh. When I arrived in that city it was not perceived what I was driving at. The times were exciting, and my lectures were mainly illustrative of their prophetic character. They attracted thousands, of whom hundreds, by their subscription to Elpis Israel, afforded me the means, through that work, of re-announcing to this generation Paul’s gospel for the obedience of faith. When it was in the hands of the people, and the printer duly paid, I made the gospel of the kingdom a primary subject of my discourses in my third tour. It may be said, that “being crafty I caught them with guile.” Be it so. You must angle to catch trout. I was fishing men for the kingdom of God, and baited my hook with its gospel things. Some swallowed the bait, but their struggles not being exhausted, they have not yet come quietly to shore. Hence, one of these who believes, but struggles against obedience to his new faith, writes, “what has tended greatly to deaden the interest felt in the Herald’s exposition of the kingdom and age to come in Edinburgh, is, in my opinion, the position you have taken up in respect to the ground of a sinner’s justification; the faith by which a sinner may be justified, &c. You will be aware, of course, that secessions have taken place from some of the churches, owing, I believe, to differences on this point; and in some cases, to the unwillingness of the church to hear the expositions of those who had received your views. I hope it may be to their advantage, but I fear not.” There is disputation, then, in Edinburgh in regard to what men must believe and do to be saved. This is good. And though the Herald was for some considerable time without a subscriber there, I am happy in knowing that as the controversy goes on, its subscribers are increased.

OBJECTIONS TO THE HERALD'S POSITION.

“Did Philip preach ALL the things of the kingdom? The answer must be, No.”—Edinburgh Correspondent.

“I have not shunned to declare unto you ALL the counsel of God.”—Paul to the Ephesians.

Dear Brother Thomas—What has tended greatly to deaden the interest felt in the Herald's expositions of the “Kingdom and Age to Come,” in Edinburgh, is (in my opinion) the position you have taken up in respect of a sinner's justification—the faith by which the sinner may be justified, &c. after much examination and mature reflection, I find myself unable to coincide with those views of the matter which you have expressed in the earlier sections of part second of ‘Elpis Israel.’ Not being qualified to discuss this matter, I will content myself with noting down such brief reasons as occur to me at the present moment, for not adopting your views.

The Lord Jesus, in his preachings, commonly, if not constantly, proposed himself—the man, the individual, as a guide, a protector, a leader, and a Saviour! In short, and irrespective of what he would do in future—as the object of faith! ‘Come unto me all ye who are weary.’ ‘Ye will not come unto me.’ ‘I will draw all men unto me.’ ‘Believe in me.’ Thus he showed that faith was a personal thing. In order to elicit this faith, it was necessary for sinners to know who Jesus was, and what was his character, his authority and power. Now, this was what the apostles did. ‘What we have seen, heard and handled, we declare unto you, that ye may have fellowship with us.’ Philip truly preached the things concerning the ‘kingdom of God;’ but did he preach ALL the things? The answer must be, No! For primitive Christians of some years standing had something more to learn: (so Paul tells the Ephesians, Corinthians, Hebrews, Galatians, &c.) to my apprehension, the things which concern and regulate the conduct of men and women who have been called out of darkness into God's marvellous light—during their probation, &c. —are as much a part of the ‘things of the kingdom,’ as those which concern the future destiny of Israel, of Christ or his saints, or of the political and dominant aspect of that kingdom.

My idea of 'faith' in Jesus Christ is then, such, that my faith cannot be altered in character by any increase in my knowledge of what Jesus will hereafter do. Having chosen him for my 'portion forever,' my choice remains unaltered, although his riches were proved to be even greater than they are. The knowledge of his future glory on earth certainly gives me additional motives for faithfulness. The language of faith is after this manner: 'Though the fields shall yield no meat, and the flock be cut off from the fold, yet will I rejoice in God.' 'Though all men forsake me, though death stare me in the face—yea! though he slay me, yet will I trust in him.'

You will be aware, of course, that secessions have taken place from some of the churches, owing, I believe, to differences on this point, and in some cases, to the unwillingness of the church to hear the 'expositions' of those who had received your views. I hope it may be to their advantage; but I fear not. All who love the Lord Jesus in sincerity, ought to keep together, and bear with each other's inequalities of intellectual power. Christianity is an affair more of the heart than the head. It seeks to engage the affections, and so win souls to Christ. 'This is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil.' 'Ye will not come to me.' Paul says: 'they who had been aliens to God, hating him, were reconciled by the death of Christ.' God seeks men's affections, men who will 'worship him in spirit and in truth.' 'We love him, because he first loved us.' How did God manifest this love? —Was it by his promises? Nay! but by his deeds. 'God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life.' 'He who hath the son, hath this life.' Therefore, in what has been done, lies apparently the 'converting' power, and in what is to be done, the sustaining and strengthening power.

Jesus, 'the son of man,' a wanderer, with not a place to lay his head; and Jesus, the son of man, seated on the throne of his glory, with all nations gathered before him, are one and the same being; even so, to my apprehension, the 'kingdom of God,' in its planting, in its forming, in its probation; and the kingdom of God, when it is manifested in its political dominion and glory, are one and the same kingdom. As the 'things' connected with Jesus in humiliation, differ from the things concerning him when on the throne of his glory, so do the things concerning the kingdom, in its separate aspects, differ. The 'stone' laid in Zion, the tried, sure foundation-stone, and the same stone, when it has become a great mountain and filled the whole earth, are one and the same 'kingdom:' It seems to me only a question of development, like the grain of mustard seed, compared to the future tree. The 'stone' is, and has been long in preparation.

Such are the ideas which I have obtained from the scriptures; you will see, therefore, how it is, that I am not a subscriber to the Herald.

You will be aware of the cessation of the 'Gospel Banner.' It lingered on some months after A. Campbell denounced it. This denunciation was its death-blow. We are now (many of us) without a periodical, as the matter in the 'Harbinger' is not to the taste of all. I would like a periodical that would take up a middle position between you and A. C. For both have 'excellencies,' and, as I conceive, defects also.

I must now conclude, by wishing you health and peace from God our father; and I am, dear brother, in the hope of seeing Jesus as he is, and in being like him, yours very faithfully,

* * * .”

OUR POSITION, SCRIPTURAL AND TENABLE.

That men are sinners, by nature and practice, is pretty generally admitted as an article of faith by all the sects of anti-Christendom. This admission brings the conclusion that they are therefore all under sentence of death; for “the wages of sin is death.” Sin reigning in them they are the slaves of sin, because they obey him. This obedience to sin is in consequence of the strong impulses of the flesh, unsubdued and unrestrained by the truth, understood and assuredly believed. Thus the understanding of sinners is darkened, and blindness pervades their hearts; and the consequence is that they “are alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them.” Sinner, then, is a term indicative of one who is a transgressor of the law of God; who refuses to submit to his commands, is ignorant of his truth, alienated from his life, and therefore under condemnation of death.

But one may be an enlightened sinner. Such a person is one who knows what is right, and still the wrong pursues. He acknowledges that thus and so is the truth, which enjoins such and such obedience; but he abstains from becoming the subject of it. He invents a refuge in which to hide himself from the necessity of a literal conformity to the word, vainly flattering his conscience that if he abstain from immorality, profess friendship to God and his people, assent to a theory of truth in sincerity of mind, God will not be over-particular in the literal construction of his word. Such an one forgets, if indeed he ever knew it, that “God has magnified HIS WORD above all his name.” He will therefore more readily pardon any offence than a slight upon, or want of conformity to, his word. Men think God is such an one as themselves—that he thinks as little of his word as they do of theirs. But no mistake is more fatal than this; “for without faith it is impossible to please God;” and “without holiness no man shall see the Lord;” and there is no holiness attainable except by faith, and through the faith in the obedience which it requires.

But God and men are at variance on that point. Practically, these creatures of his power think he ought to account them wholly upon principles approbated by the thinking of their flesh. Philoprogenitiveness attaches them to their offspring, as it does all other animals to theirs. Hence they will believe in no heavenly state hereafter which makes no provision for them. They think sincerity of mind in the belief of error ought to be accepted as an equivalent for the belief of the truth; judging thus because their feelings are so shocked at the idea of the few that will be saved by the obedience of faith. In all generations have God and his creatures been at issue on this point. He says, believe and do the truth; they say, sincerely, believe and do what you think is true, and though it may not be really so, you shall be saved. Thus, God predicates salvation, justification, holiness, &c., on “the obedience of faith;” while men inculcate sincerity of opinion as the panacea of their souls.

This diversity between God and man is the source of that distinction that obtains in the world between true religion and superstition, saint and sinner. A saint is one who believes and does the truth with the docility and readiness of an obedient child. He is therefore styled a saint; that is, a separated or holy person. He is separated from sinners in the obedience of the truth, which unites him to the name of the Holy, through which he is sanctified. The saints are God’s representatives in this evil world, who having acknowledged God, or rather, being acknowledged by him, are the pillar and support of his truth in his controversy with sinners. God has given them the Scriptures to wield in combat as the two-edged sword of their present warfare against “reasonings and every high thing that exalts itself against the knowledge of God” therein revealed. The odds is, therefore, the saints against all the world, which they overcome by their faith, preparatory to its subjection by the sword of judgment, which they lay hold of as a substitute for the spirit’s sword, when the time comes for them to possess the kingdom under the whole heaven for evermore. Into their hands God has committed his word, in the absence of his Son, commanding that they “contend earnestly for the faith once for all delivered to the saints.” They are to be lovingly intolerant of all principles nullifying the faith; for this faith is for the justification of sinners, and if they be unfaithful to their trust, how shall men attain to the life of God? If the saints make void the word of God by tradition, what scope is there for the transition of sinners from death to life? Can the blind lead the blind and escape the ditch? When sinners undertake to teach sinners the way of salvation, we are reminded of one with a beam in his eye fumbling over his brother's to remove a mote!

But confessedly ignorant though they be of Moses and the prophets, sinners generally are vastly wise in their own conceit. Though knowing little, or perhaps nothing, of the Scriptures, which can alone make wise unto salvation, they turn with contempt from every thing incongruous to the thinking of sinful flesh. Sophistry is the "logic" of the carnal mind, which is always ready with an apology for coming short of the divine law. It is willing to impose upon itself a burdensome ritual, and the necessity of doing some great thing, to recommend itself to the favour of the Most High—it will even be immersed and believe the Gospel; but no, it will run the risk of eternal reprobation before it will adopt the divine order exhibited in the wholesome words of the Lord Jesus, believe the gospel and be baptised.

Romanism is the mystery of iniquity, the sophistry of sin; and Protestantism in all its forms is that same sophistry attenuated to the rarest subtleties. Though antagonist systems, yet are they essentially one and indivisible in antagonism to the principles of the oracles of God. They are opposed to each other on "the ground of a sinner's justification;" but they agree against God in repudiating "the faith by which the sinner may be justified." When Luther appeared, "the ground of a sinner's justification" was the great question of debate between him and his brother catholics. These contended for justification by works, such works as papists approve; while he advocated justification by faith without such works. Paul taught justification by faith, so that there seemed to be an agreement between him and Luther. The agreement, however, was only in appearance; for the subject matter of justifying faith was known only to Paul. Luther was as ignorant of it as the papists, and as they who glory in his leadership and name. He was neither a believer in the gospel of the kingdom, nor had he ever been baptised; his idea of justification was therefore restricted to faith in what our sky-kingdom friend at Bethany styles "Sacred History"—the history of "the man, Jesus, the individual, as a guide, a protector, a leader, and a Saviour." He took no account of his message. Like modern Protestants, he would probably have rejected this, while professing faith in the messenger; not knowing that justification from all past sins is predicated on a love-working faith in both.

Yes, as our correspondent says, “faith is a personal thing;” but he errs in avowing only a part of the truth. Paul shows that it is something more. He says, “it is the substance (or full assurance) of things hoped for, the conviction of things not seen;” and when we inquire what the baptised Samaritans believed before their immersion, Luke replies, “the things of the kingdom of God, and of the name of Jesus the Christ.” Our correspondent says Philip did not preach all the things of the kingdom. What did he omit? Certainly nothing that made the doctrine of the kingdom good news or gospel. If he left out any thing he certainly did not omit the kingdom itself; for the gospel preached in Jesus’ name was the kingdom’s gospel—omit the kingdom, and the gospel is no more.

When I went to Edinburgh I found the city asleep, dreaming over justification by faith in sacred history; and with all its wisdom, no further advanced in divine knowledge than when John Knox fulminated his anathemas against papistry from his domicile in the High Street. If there were any believed in the kingdom and throne of David restored, being the kingdom of God promised to Jesus and the saints, of which the gospel treats, I have yet to learn it. There were doubtless some who believed in the restoration of the Jews, the personal return of Jesus, a millennium, &c.; but no one regarded them as essential. They might be believed or not without periling a justification by faith; for it was not perceived, that to deny the restoration of the twelve tribes, or the personal return of Jesus in power and great glory, was to deny the kingdom of God—it was not seen, that no restoration or return, there could be no kingdom.

It therefore startled many minds in their dreams to show that the gospel was concerning this kingdom, and that justification was predicated on believing that gospel in the name of Jesus as its king. Several who heard me had been immersed in ignorance of the nature, place, attributes and circumstances of that kingdom; and therefore had believed something else for gospel than the kingdom’s gospel. This proved, and their justification was shown to be null and void; for being destitute of the “full assurance of things hoped for,” their immersion was not obedience to the faith which Paul preached. Nevertheless, they seem zealous to establish their own righteousness. They argue that their faith is as good without the kingdom as with it. They “knew what Jesus was, and what was his character, his authority, and power.” But the devils believed this, and trembled; they were not therefore justified. Devils believe it now; and, forming themselves into a “Society for the Propagation of the Faith,” send their missionaries, under the Pope’s patronage, to turn idolaters to their belief. This “personal faith,” held in common with devils, is the hereditary creed of all anti-Christendom; and by all parties deemed faith enough for justification! It is the faith of the immersed and sprinkled, with more or less pious sentimentality mixed up with it, according to the education, training, or phrenological constitution of the pietist.

True, Jesus said, “Come unto me;” “Believe in me;” “This is the work of God, that ye should believe on him whom he hath sent;” and so forth. But this was not spoken to ignorant, misbelieving, or unbelieving Gentiles. It was spoken to Israelites, in whose ears Moses and the Prophets were read every Sabbath day, and whose hope was the promise made of God to their fathers, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob; to which hope their twelve tribes, constantly serving God day and night, hope to attain. This hope was the nation’s hope, and had been planted in the national mind ineradicably by the sure word of the Prophets—it was the hope of national felicity and glory under a son of David reigning forever in Zion and Jerusalem. The hope was the kingdom restored again to Israel, and proclaimed by Jesus, the royal prophet to Israel, as approaching, when he preached “the gospel of the kingdom of God.” In announcing this, however, he also advanced his own personal claims to the throne of that kingdom as that Son of David who was to reign over the House of Jacob forever. Thousands of Israel who believed the gospel of the kingdom, did not believe that its majesty was nigh, nor that Jesus was the king who was to bear it; therefore, said he, “Ye will not come unto me that ye may have life.”

But the Gentiles were in different case. Paul says, that they had “no hope,” and were “atheists”—atheoi—“in the world.” They had no interest or desire for God’s Israelitish kingdom, and knew nothing about the “glory, honour and immortality” to be obtained in obtaining it. Jesus never preached to them at all; nor did the apostle ever address them as he did the Jews, who had hope towards God. The “work of God” for Gentiles is that they believe the gospel of the kingdom, and on him whom he hath sent, and will send to sit on its throne to reign over all nations “with a rod of iron,” in power and great glory. Israelites, uncontaminated by Gentilism, in ancient and modern times, believe in the kingdom, but deny that Jesus is its Lord and Christ; while the most pious of orthodox Gentiles, “evangelicals,” as they style themselves, confess with their mouth that Jesus Christ is Son of God, but at the same time hold in pious contempt “the things of the kingdom” we have expressed. And this is not all. They are not only infidels in regard to the kingdom of God, as set forth in the scriptures of his prophets, but they despise, reject and ridicule things concerning his name. Jesus offers believers in the gospel of the kingdom “repentance, remission of sins, and eternal life” in his name; and commands them to be baptised into the name of the Holy, that by baptismal union to that name, they may receive those necessary prerequisites to the possession of the kingdom. But do the pious infidels of the Gentiles respect this offer and command? Quite the contrary. They have a righteousness of their own, which they compass sea and land to establish in the earth; and therefore, like the Jews of ancient days, they do not submit themselves to “the righteousness of God.” Their ground of justification is not God’s. Their faculties, phrenologically styled “conscientiousness,” “veneration,” “marvellousness,” “hope,” and “self-esteem,” are “full,” perhaps “large,” compared with the organs they possess in common with the inferior creatures. A spurious theology, the thinking of the flesh on things not spiritually discerned, is sown in their hearts as tares by the pulpit orators they have heaped up to themselves after their own lusting. Having taken root there, it morbidly excites the faculties we have named, and a sickly sentimentality, they call “piety,” is the result. Feeling marvellously sentimental, the afflation pervades their self-esteem, and they assume that they are of those elected from the foundation of the world to eternal happiness in sky kingdomia. Had they been born among pagans they would have ranked as brethren of the “pious Aeneas;” but being born into a system, which acknowledges that a man styled Jesus Christ appeared in Judea in the days of Augustus and Tiberius; that he was the Son of God, crucified, rose again, and ascended to heaven; and that he was in some sense the Saviour of the world—they assent to these things; and this assent, sanctified by their pious feelings, becomes for them a righteousness unto life. Having wrought one another up to this complacency, they have “obtained a hope,” and their “consciousness” is lulled into the tranquillity of fleshly repose. These are the Scribes and Pharisees of modern times, who appear unto men to be righteous. They are like sepulchres of polished alabaster, very fair to look upon; but, O reader, if you esteem their praise, peer not into their hearts with the lamp of truth. Call not their righteousness in question. Speak not to them of obedience. Be silent as death on baptism. Breathe no doubt upon the divinity and immortality of their souls. Let no suggestion escape you that it is possible the meek may inherit the earth, rather than the skies. Hint not the spuriousness of a faith that respects not Moses and the Prophets, and that transmutes the kingdom they predict into a receptacle of ghosts beyond the skies. If you value their traditions, “Shake with them in dog-days,

And in December sweat;”

but have no mind of your own to question their conceits; for if you do, the wet blanket of your presumption would so affect their zeal that the smoke of their indignation would well nigh choke you in its cloud.

But, what is the real worth of a pious assent to a few historical facts concerning Jesus, when people substitute their own foolishness for the one hope of the calling to God’s kingdom and glory? Is such a faith justifying? Nay; rather it is reprobate, and hath this seal, “Ye have made it void by your tradition.” When Elpis Israel came into the hands of these pietists in Edinburgh, it filled them with rage, like Naaman the Syrian, and stirred within them a fiery zeal. The truth it set forth antagonised their cherished righteousness; and caused one of them, a dealer in musical instruments there, to decree its consignment to the burning flames! What pleasure the conflagration would afford him! How much more musical would have been its author’s groans to such a spirit, than the roar of its flame in the funnel of his stove! This fiery zealot was a Baptist of some particular order. Now, if it be granted that Elpis Israel interprets the Scripture correctly, of what worth is this man’s piety and belief of the facts concerning Jesus? Was he justified by such a faith? —a faith that confesses the person, and commits the truth he preached to the flames! I cannot admit, that the immersion of such a believer, however pious, was obedience to the faith which Paul preached.

But there were other immersed people in Edinburgh as unacquainted with the Hope of Israel, before I called attention to it, as my fiery friend. They were pious, and their faith simply historical, which the Bethanian philosophy teaches is the best kind of faith! They differed from him, however, in this: that when they heard and read, they examined in a Berean spirit, and acknowledged that the things presented were the truth. But even these were not all agreed. Some admitted that the kingdom we set forth with its attributes, or things thereunto belonging, were the gospel hope—the one hope of the calling; others, that the things were true, but no part of the gospel, which they regarded as the death, burial and resurrection of Jesus for remission of sins to those who believed this. Practically, however, both classes agree in that they both assume that they were justified by faith before or in their immersion, (they are not agreed in the prepositions,) although that faith did not embrace “the hypostasis or full assurance of things hoped for.” I say they assume their justification, inferring, as I do, that being honest men, they would not put off reimmersion, if they did not think they were justified by their lame faith about the time they were immersed. Those who admit that “the things of the kingdom of God and of the name of Jesus the Christ,” are the subject matter of the gospel; and that when they were immersed they knew not the kingdom, and but little of the name as they ought; and believing that it is a love-working faith in the gospel that justifies the sinner—they are certainly at fault, and very inconsistent, in delaying union to the name of the Holy Ones by a second immersion. It is the kind of faith a man has that characterises his immersion. If he have such a faith as Paul defines, then one immersion is enough, and ought never to be repeated on any pretence; but if he have a lame faith, or “a vain faith,” rather, an immersion, no matter how oft repeated, is not “the obedience of faith,” as preached and ministered by Paul. “According to your faith be it unto you.” This is a rule given by Jesus. If therefore our faith be a belief of truth made void by human tradition, it is vain, and we get no good thing as the result; if we believe what is not promised, and cannot, will not exist, we shall get nothing, no matter how pious we may feel, or on what good terms we may be with our own selves; but if our faith embrace the unadulterated truth —“the things hoped for and unseen,” which God hath promised; justification unto life will then “be unto” the immersed who have been subjected to an immersion subsequently to their acquisition of such a faith.

They are, indeed, consistent in rejecting reimmersion who, admitting the truth of “the things,” yet say, it is of no consequence whether you believe them or not. They have compressed their faith into a nutshell, although in the scriptures the truth is found pervading the whole Bible. With them this has no significance; for being minute philosophers, their anxiety is to discover how little knowledge is absolutely necessary for getting into heaven with the skin of their teeth! But in this they are not wise. The character of a man’s faith is altered by the quantity and quality of his knowledge. If a man be acquainted only with what is past, his knowledge is small in quantity and not of the right quality for justification by faith. His faith is of an historical character—mere sacred history—and devoid of doctrine. Such a faith is not justifying. If another be acquainted with the past, understand the mystery or doctrine of its incidents, and be familiar with what God has promised concerning his kingdom and the age to come, the quantity and quality of his knowledge is altered, and the character of his faith is relatively changed. It is justifying. The eyes of his understanding are opened, and like Abraham, he can see afar off. We may choose Christ, but he may not choose us. Our election turns not upon our choice, but upon his. We may choose him upon our own principles, while he rejects us upon his. He chooses us through a belief of the truth, the unadulterated truth; men choose him by believing what suits them, and rejecting the rest. Such may choose Jesus as their “portion forever,” but they will assuredly have no portion in his joy.

It is a mistake to say that “Christianity is an affair more of the heart than of the head.” Paul was sent to the Gentiles “to open their blind eyes, to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God.” This was an affair of the head, without which the heart could not be touched. God has ordered his servants to be sealed in the forehead, which is the seat of intellect. They who are not sealed there do not belong to him. A pious heart, without due intelligence, is an unrenewed heart, and always ready to apologise for disobedience and ignorance, which Paul says, “alienates from the life of God.” The heart of ignorance, however pious in feeling, is never right with God; because it is not “turned from darkness to light,” and consequently not to him in whom is no darkness at all. When the forehead is sealed, the heart responds, and the man’s faith works by love to the fulfilling of the truth.

From the foregoing letter of my highly esteemed friend, it appears that if the Herald is to be popular in Edinburgh, it must assume more compromising ground in regard to a sinner’s justification. Suppose it did, would that alter the fact? If the Herald accommodated the truth to the taste of its editor’s personal friends, would that convert their belief of sacred history into justifying faith? It might make them more comfortable when they happened to read it; it would disturb their conscience less; but it would not alter the immutable fiat of heaven. No, when the Herald’s subscription list is reduced to such a few that its existence can only be perpetuated by heralding forth a system in accordance with “the thinking of the flesh,” its editor will lay down his pen, and write no more. Better far break granite on the roadside for a crust of bread, than to garble God’s truth to please one’s friends, or propitiate the foe. The Herald takes its stand on “the wholesome words of the Lord Jesus;” in their letter, spirit and order, that “he who believes the gospel and is baptised, shall be saved; and he that BELIEVES NOT shall be condemned”—Mark 16: 15-16. When the Samaritans and others believed that gospel, Luke says, “they believed the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus the Christ.” Believing these things, he adds, “they were baptised, both men and women.” Hence, the words of Jesus, historically defined by Luke, read thus: “He that believes the things of the kingdom of God and of my name as the Christ, and is baptised, shall be saved; and he that believes them not, shall be condemned.” (He believes them not, whose faith at his immersion is defined by the Bethanian philosophy or popular creed.) This is my position; who is general enough to turn it? The order is, first, understand the word of the kingdom and name; then, believe it; next, obey it in baptism. Who can improve this arrangement? Nay, who has any right to alter it? Or who, but one whose heart is not subdued by the truth, dare dispute against it? People of this class would have it thus: first, believe on Jesus; next, be immersed; afterwards, understand, perhaps, the word of the kingdom. Seek, say they, in effect, righteousness, or remission of sins, first; and then the kingdom of God. But Jesus himself reverses this dictum, and exhorts us to “seek first the kingdom of God;” because no man can be the subject of “his righteousness,” or justification, who has not found the kingdom: the righteousness being for those who believe what he has promised concerning it. This is the Herald’s “defect,” the head and front of its offending. It is too adherent to the letter, and therefore spirit, of the Bible, to suit the vain philosophy of a sceptical and Laodicean generation. But this we consider as an excellency, which will be duly appreciated by all who prefer honesty of purpose and the simplicity of truth, to the double-minded latitudinarianism of the age. We go for our friends; but also for the truth before them all.

ASSOCIATION FOR PROMOTING JEWISH SETTLEMENTS IN PALESTINE.

ADDRESS TO THE PUBLIC, BY JEWS.

No country in the universe can prefer claims to the consideration of mankind equal to those of Palestine. It is a land revered alike by Jew and Gentile; its memory is indissolubly associated with what is to them dearest and most sacred; at its name a holy thrill vibrates through the human heart; its very sound strikes a chord which sympathetically re-echoes through the innermost recesses of the soul.

But while Palestine has such high significance in the eyes of the Christian, with how much greater interest must it be regarded by the Jew? If the force of events have thrown him from that country, towards it he gravitates as to his natural centre. If torn from his native soil and planted elsewhere, towards it he yet inclines as to the sun which gives him radiance and vitality. Thrice every day he devoutly turns his face to the Holy Land, whilst offering up the most sacred of his prayers; and the service commemorating his deliverance from Egypt he concludes with the fervent wish: “the next celebration at Jerusalem.” No wonder, therefore, that numbers of Jews cling with tenacity to a country the memory of which, from the cradle to the grave, is thoroughly interwoven with their holiest feelings and yearnings; that, taking pleasure in her stones, and favouring the dust thereof, they bid defiance to all kinds of misery, hardship, and degradation, and do not consider that price too high for the purchase of the consolation of drawing therein their last breath, if not privileged to inhale in it their first; and of at last yielding themselves up to the beloved ground, if this could not be given to them.

But whilst in his faithful attachment to holy reminiscences, —whilst in his unshakable faith in the promise of God, the Jew heroically resigns his native country with its powerful associations, security, and comforts, and perhaps even affluence, is it just that we, followers of the law, —believers in the prophets, whose light, proceeding from Palestine, illumined our darkness, —is it just that we should look on with indifference at the struggle of the Jews in Palestine, for earning a scanty subsistence; that, at the utmost, we dole them out a miserable pittance, barely enabling them to linger out an existence useless to the rest of the world, and burdensome to themselves? True, there was a time when the intolerant policy of Turkey, joined to unwillingness on the part of the Jewish population to become instrumental in their own support, rendered any other assistance unavailable, save that in the shape of alms. But now that some more enlightened views have removed all legal obstacles to endeavours for self-support on the part of the Jewish population, —nay, when there is reason to hope that the Porte would lend its hearty cooperation to any scheme for that purpose; when that very population earnestly appeals to the world for the means of emancipating itself from the state of degradation entailed by pauperism, —is it just that we should withhold from it a helping hand? Join, therefore, O fellow citizens, join this Association formed for the purpose of lending that helping hand to the Jews in Palestine.

To our brethren in faith we should say: Whatever your views, you cannot but respect the convictions of those who, anxious to fulfil the law of God in all its particulars, feel that this is practicable in the land only to which that law had a primary reference. We should further say: you have no hypothetical case before you, you have to deal with a stern reality. There is a Jewish population extant in Palestine, which for generations has been supported by European charity, and which still looks to the West for assistance. This support was moreover at all times considered as a pious and most meritorious work, habitually and cheerfully bestowed, to which they have almost acquired a right by prescription. Can you allow a system to continue, as degrading and pernicious to the recipient, as unworthy of and useless to the donor; when the alternative offers itself of converting pauperism into productiveness, privation into affluence, and misery into enjoyment? Can you allow it to be said, that they who associate themselves with every philanthropic movement, who assist in relieving every species of misery, among whatever nation and in whatever clime, should be deaf to appeals in behalf of those nearest to them, —should be insensible to misery of their own flesh and blood?

To our Christian brethren we should say: Your ancestors in ages of darkness were instruments in the accomplishment of the denunciations of our prophets against us: be you in these enlightened days as zealous to obtain the blessings promised to the benefactors of Israel. Remember, it was said, “I shall bless them that bless thee, and curse them that curse thee.” Cooperate with us, assist us, in ameliorating the state of our brethren in the Holy Land.

Palestine might be still, as of old, “a land flowing with milk and honey; a land of wheat, and barley, and vines, and fig trees, and pomegranates; a land of oil olive and honey.” Nor is it less capable of producing silk, cotton, indigo, sugar, coffee, and tobacco. In short, all elements for prosperous agricultural settlements are extant. It is not less the cultivators that call for the land, than the land for the cultivators. All that is necessary for the accomplishment of this object, is capital and security to property. The former, Europe and America in the first instance can supply; the latter must be the result, at first, of protection, and ultimately of a judicious internal government.

The cities of Safed and Tiberias, harbouring a numerous Jewish population, are situated in a district in every respect adapted to an agricultural settlement, it may be seen on reference to the subjoined sketch. It is therefore proposed: —

First, To solicit from the Porte a grant of a portion of land between these cities, now totally waste and useless, under conditions mutually advantageous to the government and the landholders.

Secondly, To allow the settlement its internal government. This is a condition which it is not expected would meet with any obstacle, since such is the actual policy of the Porte towards its Rajah subjects, whose respective nationalities and internal institutions it acknowledges.

Thirdly, To take such measures in the infancy of the settlement as would secure the lives and properties of the settlers, the necessary scope for development, and eventually self-protection.

These objects the Association will endeavour to accomplish by some such methods as the following: —

Address to the Sultan, for permission that Jews might occupy and cultivate, or otherwise turn to use, certain tracts of land, and for authority to form settlements, with privileges of internal government.

Addresses to the Queen, and Foreign Governments, for favourable interference with the Porte.

Petitions to the Legislature with the same view.

Subscriptions for supplying Jews in Palestine with cattle, sheep, horses, agricultural implements, boats for the navigation of the lake of Tiberias and nets for fishing, seeds, cuttings of useful trees and shrubs, and building materials.

Plans and means for improving the ports on the coast, and the roads in the interior, so as to give commerce and trade opportunities for development and increase.

In order that such an association should proceed with harmony, energy, prosperity, and effect, it would, of course, be most essential that its great objects should be worked out with honourable singleness of aim and effort on the part of all its members.

Friends to this great cause, and to such a mode of proceeding, are requested to send their names and addresses (post paid) to any of the gentlemen whose names are subjoined, or to the office of the Jewish Chronicle, 24, Houndsditch; and to proceed to obtain, in the districts in which they respectively reside, lists of patrons and supporters, and to form auxiliary associations in correspondence with the Parent Institution.

“THE KING OF KINGS.”

The following is a leading article, under the above caption, taken from a British weekly journal of a recent date, named The Leader. It speaks, no doubt, truthfully in regard to the present condition of Europe, the platform of the dominions symbolised by the Ten-horned and Two-horned Beasts of the Apocalypse. “As to the greatest powers now triumphing,” says the writer, “who of us can pronounce the future?” Who of them, indeed! Not one. No mere politician can do more than guess. All he can do is to tell us what has been, and what exists; but as to “what shall be hereafter,” he has no data from which to reason out the truth. The problem is too difficult for the thinking of the flesh, unaided by light of revelation. Hence The Leader, who does not seem to suspect that it could find its solution there, gives it up, and in effect confesses, that the wisdom of the world can divine no plausible conjecture of the future of “the powers that be.” But let us hear what he has to say:

“If there is any one thing certain in the future of Europe, it is Revolution. As to the greatest powers now triumphing, who of us can pronounce their future? What insurance office would grant a policy on the life of the Emperor of Russia? What stock-broker of average intelligence and prudence, would give an English price for stock depending on the permanency of the House of Hapsburg? Who would even lay a bet on the position, or even the lodging-place of Louis Napoleon next year? None but a person who would go to a betting office. But that there will be some sweeping change; that these things which are maintained with so much effort, and which rest upon the flesh and bones of great peoples, who are incessantly betraying the torture they endure, must be displaced; that the region of despotism, in short, is only the region of a postponed revolution, such is the one thing certain.

“The outbreak in Milan was not a riot: it was only the irrepressible voice of the Revolution which has lived in Italy for so many years, which the Austrians know to exist among them, but whose whole extent they cannot compass. Like a great phantom, at times they see it in parts, but they cannot discover it. The revolution, indeed, is the only established power in Italy; for it is no construction of ours, but a plain historical fact, that in Absolutist Italy, not one of the Governments has been able to re-establish itself since 1848. They are only defending their possessions by an immense military force; in Rome, by the aid of foreign allies, whose troops remain in position. We have the Pope's formal declaration to the Austrian minister, so long ago as 1849, —and he would not alter a letter now, —that if the foreign troops were to abandon his capital, he would be at the mercy of the fury of his own people. And we have the vain proclamations of Radetzky and his subordinates, heaping threat upon threat, as a means of frightening the revolution that they cannot extirpate. They cannot command the actions of the Italian people: the Secret Government of Italy can so far command it, that even after a popular movement has been prepared, it can be kept back, with the one exception of the rash men in Milan.

“There is the same uncertainty in other countries. Neither Turkey nor Russia, nor Austria, can dictate to the little province of Montenegro. Turkey sends an army against it, and dares not let that army conquer. Austria can only forbid Turkey, and dares not seize it herself. Russia offers to take it for Turkey, or for the Montenegrins themselves, but dares not grasp it on her own account. In Hungary, the people are all on the quivive, looking out for movements in Italy, and eager for news that Louis Napoleon has ceased to exist. And in Paris, as we learn by our own correspondent, they are already discussing the next revolution, which is said to be close at hand.

“We do not know whether the immense armies of the despots have not somewhat broken from command. They are becoming too big to be fed according to their appetites; wherefore they are growing dissatisfied; for your strong man with a hearty appetite likes to be full, and if he is not full, he is angry. There is many an officer in the armies of Austria and France, who thinks that he has been passed over; and, in retaliation, he is inclined to Passover. Independently of the possibility that Hungarians could not be calculated upon to coerce Italy as of old, and vice versa, there are ambitions in the heart of those armies, that may turn them against their own Governments. These are things not to be calculated beforehand; but unquestionably the people do not everywhere regard the armies as their inveterate enemies. They remember the Garde Francaise, who would not fire upon their countrymen. The latest rebellions of France, of Italy, in short, of Europe, have sickened the people with the 'rose water' style of action; and we might hazard a supposition, that in the next popular effort, the aim will be, not so much to fall indiscriminately upon adverse forces—not so much for the populace to waste its own blood upon a Garde Francaise that may be arrayed against it, but not move against it, —as to call the ringleaders to account. That is the plan which the Absolutists have followed themselves, as well as the indiscriminate mode of attack; for they use both modes. So eager have they been for ringleaders, that they have picked out the mildest type for the harshest punishments—a Poerio, a Simoncelli, a Blum, or a Tazzoli. But the next time that the people have power in their hands, they will remember the perjurers who forget the clemency that they abjectly receive, such as the Bourbons, the Bonapartes, and the Hapsburghers. It is not for us to presume the actions of the people when next they rise in power; but that they will rise once again, and at a year not very far removed, we are certain. Under the protection of immense armies, the Absolutist Kings enjoy the present day; but they are by their own actions doomed, and they will have their hour. Their victims do but await the rising of the power which shall be greater than the oppressors. The only potentate in certain possession of the future is Revolution; that is the King of Kings.”

Thus, the future of Europe is all hypothesis! Yet The Leader thinks that revolution is a certainty, if in that future certainty hath any place. The student of the prophets knows that the future of Europe is more certain than its present; for there is much reported concerning this of a doubtful character; but of the invisible future there is certainty, and no mistake. Revolution is as certain as that the sun shines on a cloudless day. Nothing can stave it off. “The absolutist kings are by their own actions doomed, and they will have their hour.” The Leader is quite prophetic. They are doomed, and their “hour” is fast approaching: and Revolution is the King of Kings by whom they shall be judged.

But revolution made by whom? Who are the great actors in it that shall bring them to account? I answer, not the people. The “Sovereign People” is not the King “to execute upon them the judgment written.” No effort devised against them by King People can finally prosper. Reaction will repress all their endeavours, and only rivet their chains the faster.

Democratic turbulence will only temporarily embarrass the kings; but at the same time force them into a position already marked out for them of God, and necessary to the full manifestation of his purpose. This is the usefulness of popular outbreaks—they are the excitants of a new course of policy, which the governments would never have adopted but for the force of circumstances they did not create, and could not control. Thus the present of Europe is all referable to the events of the 24th February, 1848. It attitudinised the powers towards one another, as we now behold them. That crisis was the ring-staple from which the chain of subsequent manifestations is suspended. It has brought out the French empire; another similar outbreak might convert that dominion into a dissolving view; and mould Europe and Turkey into the ferro-aluminous feet of Nebuchadnezzar’s image; but the emancipation of the nations from the kings, who, as Satan’s cabinet, rule them with an iron rod, it could never effect. The people! Sin incarnate. A revolution made by this is The Leader’s “king of kings!” The people is sin; and the oppressors are sin. Sin, armed to the teeth, destroying sinners, is the present of Europe and Asia. But earth is not to be always cursed by such a present. The invisible future—the “Hades” of the word—is pregnant with a revolution to be made by “the man at Jehovah’s right hand, whom he hath made strong for himself.” He being King of kings immortal, will make a triumphant revolution, in which his companions in arms and glory shall “bind sin’s kings with chains, and its nobles with fetters of iron.” “He doth judge and make war in righteousness,” and “overcome them” gloriously. This is the revolution to which they must succumb; this is the convulsion that will deliver Europe from its corruptors and destroyers, and bless all its nations in Abraham and his seed. O that the time were come!

THE RIVER OF EGYPT.

The promise made to Abraham at Mamre, was in the following terms: “Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates.” The question turns on the meaning of the words, “the river of Egypt.”

If that river be the same as Sihor, referred to by the prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah, which appears to me almost certain, we are necessarily left to the conclusion that it was a perennial stream passing through a rich agricultural country, and probably navigable.

Isaiah speaks of the “seed of Sihor,” and the “harvest of the river,” as forming an important part of the revenue of Tyre; and Jeremiah places Sihor, precisely in the same position in reference to Egypt, as the Euphrates in reference to Assyria: treating them both apparently as border streams.

There are three suppositions respecting this river. The first is, that it is the same with the rivulet which runs into the sea near Dair, a few miles to the south of Gaza; the second, that it is the “Torrens Egypti,” or torrent of Egypt, which passes about a mile to the north-east of El Arish, and separates the desert from incipient vegetation; the third, that it was the Pelusiatic branch of the Nile. The language of Isaiah certainly seems too magnificent for so small a stream as that of Gaza, though that stream traverses an agricultural region. It is clearly inapplicable to the El Arish torrent; while the descriptions of both the prophets correspond most accurately with the Pelusiatic branch of the Nile.

In confirmation of this being the intended boundary of Palestine, there is reason to believe that from the earliest times, down to the subversion of the native Egyptian dynasties, Pelusium was the frontier town of Egypt. A few centuries later, it appears that Ptolemy I., carried the Egyptian frontier across the desert, and built Rhinocolura in the vicinity of El Arish. Very soon, however, we find the frontier again receding to its own locality, with the addition only of Mons Cassius, a little to the eastward, which was occupied by a garrison of Egyptian Jews. And thus the matter seems to have rested in Roman times.

Again, we find from Josephus, that so far back as the time of Nebuchadnezzar, the frontier of Syria, that is of Palestine, was held to extend across the desert to Pelusium. Though, as Pliny fixes the Arabian or Idumean frontier at Ostracina in his time, it may be presumed that Palestine had then receded to Rhinocolura. Now, whatever title belonged to Palestine in the age of Abraham, was certainly transferred to that Patriarch; and as history leads to the probability that the Pelusiac branch of the Nile was the boundary between Palestine and Egypt in his day, this certainly aids the conclusion in favour of that river.

Again, so far as the promise itself can be gathered from the actual extension of the Hebrew Territory, Solomon's conquest of the territory of the Idumeans and Amalekites, tends further to show that the Nile was the boundary line.

On the other hand, the Gaza stream is so nearly parallel with Beersheba, that, taken in connexion with the common scripture expression, from "Dan to Beersheba," we might almost be tempted, except for the flowing language of Isaiah, to fix the Sihor here; though an important objection would still remain, in the fact that a considerable tract of fertile country lies to the south of that rivulet.

It would appear, however, that in different ages the intervening desert was regarded by both parties as disputed and border ground: each nation claiming or abandoning it in turn. And whether the title of Abraham extended to the Nile, which seems to me most probable, or fell somewhere short of it, Palestine must always have been partially held to begin where the desert ended, and consequently in the neighbourhood of El Arish.

The "Torrents of Egypt," we may further conclude, came to be considered the boundary of Palestine in Roman times, when the several provinces of the empire were adjusted, and the district beyond that torrent was definitively assigned to the Idumean or Arabian tribes. —Beldam's Recollections of Italy and the East, vol. 1. pp. 342-345.

A GLANCE AT THE PAST.

I find the following in the “Apostolic Advocate” for October, 1834: “Mr. Isaac Leaser, reader to the Philadelphia Jewish Synagogue, says in his book, ‘The Jews and the Mosaic Law,’ pp. 35-6, ‘The sacred light of revelation was first lit up in the wilderness of Arabia, and from thence it has commenced spreading all over the globe. In every country some, at least, of the scattered seed of Abraham are to be found; their beautiful code of laws has been partially adopted in many places, and millions of human beings are drinking the waters of revelation, though they derive it from different and polluted channels. Upon the solid rock of our law have the Notzry (Nazarene) and Mohammed built their systems, and though in part erroneous, yet do these systems already acknowledge the true God, his revelation, and his supreme rule. May we not hope that the time will assuredly arrive when not alone the Nazarenes and Mohammedans but all the other families of the earth also will hasten to the Banner raised on the mountains, range themselves behind the ranks of the true believers (Israel) and exclaim ‘The Eternal is the God!’ The Eternal is the God? O happy time! O blessed hour! when our eyes shall behold the Restoration of Zion, the Rebuilding of Jerusalem, and the Temple on Moriah, and the reassembling of the Tribes of Israel!”

Affixed to this extract I find also the following remarks: “All these items of Jewish hope do we, the despised Nazarenes of the apostolic order, earnestly and ardently long for. But, O Jews, remember that the Banner will be lifted up, Zion restored, Jerusalem rebuilt, and the Temple reared (see Ezekiel) by the power of Jesus, the Nazarene, our master, whom your fathers crucified, and upon you shall hereafter look and mourn.”

We penned these remarks about eighteen years ago in that memorable number of the Advocate with the publication of which our editorial troubles began. The Apostolic Advocate, long since out of print, was the first periodical we ever published in connection with things ecclesiastical and scriptural, and this was the sixth number of the first volume. We had then been in some sort connected with Campbellism about two years, during which observation and experience convinced us that it needed regeneration in doctrine, spirit and practice. We commenced this unhopeful work by an article on “Anabaptism,” in number six; which calling in question the validity of immersion predicated on ignorance of the ancient gospel, stirred up the atrabiliousness of those Campbellites, who had been immersed on what they admitted was not the truth; that is, on the premises of Baptistism. In the next number, we began to advocate the second appearing of Jesus in power and great glory; not, however, upon the unscriptural and untenable principles, which some years after obtained currency under the name of Millerism; but connected with the restoration of the twelve tribes of Israel, and the rebuilding of Jerusalem and the Temple, as above expressed. In about a year after, December 1835, I added to these topics that of immortality, denying the popular dreams, and maintaining that it was the gift of God to those only who believed and OBEYED the gospel, and not conferred till the resurrection and appearing of Christ to ascend the throne of his father, David. This was seventeen years ago; and though stated so long since, is a position still in advance of any writer upon the subject of whom I have heard as yet. We have heard of some advocating the doctrine of “no immortality out of Christ;” but they fall short of a practical application of this great truth, in not being able to lead their readers “into Christ,” for want of a scriptural understanding of “the word of the kingdom,” and the obedience it requires. There is no immortality for a son of Adam since the day of Pentecost, without obedience to the gospel of the kingdom; and a walk worthy of that kingdom and glory to which the gospel thereof invites them. This is my position on the immortality question; and one to which I have been happily led by the oppositions and controversies embattled against me by the advocates of “the immortality of the soul,” and the sky-kingdom gospel of the day.

By a review of the past, I perceive I have been steadily advancing towards the ground I now occupy. My writings which remain prove this. Until some seven years ago, I was advocating the gospel of the kingdom, without discovering that the things pleaded for were its constituents. I advocated them as truths, but by no means as truths the belief of which was essential to a justifying faith. I had been immersed upon the Bethanian historical faith, without concerning myself or being directed to the contemplation of “the exceeding great and precious promises, given through the knowledge of God, and of Jesus the Lord.” When Moses and the prophets with the apostles had opened my blind eyes, I came to discern the barren and unfruitful character of the belief of mere sacred history in relation to justification of life. The past, therefore, I counted as mere dross, and became obedient to the faith, which is “the full assurance of things hoped for, (or promised) the conviction of things unseen.” Thanks be to God for cornering me up to this decision. May the truth drive many to the occupation of the same ground. Christ dwells by faith in the hearts of those who are sealed on their foreheads; and becomes to them their life, henceforth briefly hid for a short space in God. Them has the Father sealed, who, like Jesus, are intelligently and faithfully washed bodily in water, and “so put on the holy garment,” even “the righteousness of God.” They are then, in Christ and heirs of immortality, but not before.

Let our respected contemporaries look into this matter, and examine the position above stated. They have been hammering long enough at “no immortality out of Christ.” Their readers, doubtless, all admit it. It is time now to show them how immortality may be obtained in him.

OAK-GROVE SUPERSTITION.

In mythology, the Oak is sacred to Jupiter, or Baal. The Druids worshipped in groves of oak, and ever held them sacred. To them they were holy temples, in which were their altars and sacrifices. “The shadow of the oaks was good—an agreeable retreat from the sun’s heat in a weary land. The idolaters assembled under them, after the fashion of a camp-meeting, to “get religion,” or conscience-salvos, through the priests of Baal Jupiter, or Jove—various names for the lord of all the gods. Very discreditable practices were indulged in by the devout; too gross, indeed, to be named in print. Besides these orgies, they stormed heaven with vain repetitions and loud cries, which they termed prayers—shouting on the top of their voices for Baal to hear them, as if he were asleep, or were absent from home on a hunting expedition. A scene of the kind alluded to, is well described in the Book of Kings.

The Israelites, contaminated by the abominations of the surrounding nations, introduced this oak-grove superstition among themselves. Having forsaken the Jerusalem-Temple worship of Jehovah for the calves of Bethel, they prepared groves of oaks, poplars, and elms, upon the tops of the hills and mountains, and then offered sacrifice and burned incense to the idol-gods of the nations. Thus, God, by the hand of Hosea, writes an accusation against the ten tribes, saying, “They have gone a whoring from their God. They sacrifice upon the tops of the mountains, and burn incense upon the hills, under oaks, and poplars, and elms, because the shadow is good. Their daughters and spouses are separated with whores, and they sacrifice with harlots; therefore the people that doth not understand, shall fall.”

The cruelty, as well as the licentiousness of the Druidical Oak-Grove superstition appears from the inquiry put to Judah through Isaiah: —“Are ye not children of transgression, a seed of falsehood: inflaming yourselves with idols under every green tree, slaying the children in the valleys under the cliffs of the rocks? Upon a lofty and high mountain hast thou set thy bed: even thither wentest thou up to offer sacrifice.” With their hands dyed in the blood of these murders, they passed from the valleys of slaughter to the temple of Jehovah, presuming he would accept an allegiance divided between him and Baal, and all the abominations of his idolatry. “They have committed adultery,” saith Jehovah, “and blood is in their hands, and with their idols have they committed adultery; and have also caused their sons, whom they bare unto me, to pass for them through the fire to devour them. They have defiled my sanctuary in the same day, and have profaned my Sabbaths. For when they had slain their children to their idols, then they came the same day into my sanctuary to profane it”—Ezekiel 23: 37. The most celebrated of these valleys of slaughter was the Vale of Hinnom, southeast of Jerusalem, styled Gehenna in the New Testament, where it is translated “hell.” There, all these abominations were practised in the worst days of Jerusalem’s apostasy, in all their enormity. All classes of the people flocked thither to witness the horrors of the place, as the vile rabble among the Gentiles hasten in crowds to enjoy the spectacle of an execution, and to crack their ribald jests upon the scene—a scene of corporeal death, with benefit of clergy for the immortal soul! !

The earliest account of Oak-Grove superstition is that of scripture. There can be no doubt it was the same as that described by Julius Caesar as obtaining among the aborigines of the British Isles, and termed Druidical. It was probably introduced there by the Phoenicians, or Philistines, neighbours to Israel in Palestine, and traders in the ships of Tarshish to Britannia for lead, iron, and tin; an island they are supposed to have named so from Baratanac, “the Land of Tin.” There is a society in Richmond to which several Israelites belong, styling itself that of “The Ancient Order of Druids.” One of the Jews was appointed to invite me to deliver the annual oration. Had I accepted the appointment, I must have shown them the origin of Druidism in Oak-Grove superstition, and its discreditable nature to Israelites who professed to be zealous of the law, and the unity of their nation’s God. But as becoming a Druid myself would have been necessary to my appearance as an orator before them, my popularity with the society was preserved from that ruin which certainly awaits the reputation of those who convict men of wrong in the establishing of the truth.

But the time is fast approaching when Israelites, instead of enrolling themselves in Druidical societies, will be ashamed of all things connected with the rebellion of their fathers against Jehovah. Druidism will fall into contempt when the Mighty One of Israel shall “redeem Zion with judgment, and her returned captives with righteousness. They shall be ashamed of the oaks which ye have desired, and ye shall be confounded for the gardens that ye have chosen. For ye shall be as an oak whose leaf fadeth, and as a garden that hath no water.” Yea, may the time soon arrive when Druidism and all its cognate absurdities and follies, may be abandoned by the Gentiles; and instead thereof, may they rally to Jehovah’s ensign, and in the words of his servant Moses, “Rejoice with his people, when he shall be merciful to Israel, and his land”—Deuteronomy 32: 43.

“SOUL IN HELL.”

“David being a prophet, in the name of the Messiah, said: ‘*Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell,’ or much rather, ‘*Thou wilt not leave my body in the grave;’ “nor,” or much rather, “for thou wilt not suffer thine Holy One to see corruption”—Psalm 16: 10. An express promise we have to this purpose in the fifty-third of Isaiah, that he should be taken from prison and from judgment, and should prolong his days. By this, Messiah was to receive a public testimony of his filiation, of his commission, of the earnest perfection and acceptance of his work, and the first fruits of the reward of the travail of his soul.”—

JOHN THOMAS, Editor. NEW YORK, MAY, 1853—
Volume 3—No. 5

THE BREAKING OF THE RUSSO-ASSYRIAN CLAY THE REDEMPTION OF ZION AND HER SONS.

New translations of Isaiah 18, by Lowth, the Bishop of Rochester, and Boothroyd—Their translations, and that of the Common Version rejected—A new translation by the Editor—Annotations establishing its correctness—Britain addressed, and her Steam Marine alluded to by Isaiah—The Lord Jesus in Zion sends forth a proclamation to the nations during a suspension of judgment, and subsequently to the fall of the Russian Gog—Israel, when their work is done, brought back in Britain’s ships, and in all sorts of land conveyance, as a present to the King of the Jews in Zion.

Speaking of the prophecy contained in the eighteenth chapter, Dr. Robert Lowth, Bishop of London, at the close of the eighteenth century, who undertook “to give an exact and faithful representation of the words, and of the sense of the prophet,” remarks concerning it, “this is one of the most obscure prophecies in the whole book of Isaiah. The subject of it,” he continues, “the end and design of it, the people to whom it is addressed, the history to which it belongs, the person who sends the messengers, and the nations to whom the messengers are sent; are all obscure and doubtful.” Thus writes the Bishop; and we may add, in vindication of the prophet, “obscure and doubtful,” verily to him.

As Mr. Lowth was, perhaps, the most, or one of the most, profound scholars of his day, the reader will no doubt be gratified in presenting to him what the doctor considers an exact and faithful representation of the most obscure and doubtful portion of the sure prophetic word. In his work he performs the part of a critical translator, and frequently of an interpreter; by which he reveals how little competent he was, notwithstanding his great attainment in the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin tongues, to give “a close literal version” representative of the true sense of the prophecy. Yet he was profoundly skilled in “hermeneutics,” at least as much so as any “bible unionists” of our time, who are making so broad their phylacteries in new translationism, and the laws of exegesis! * We will, then, look at his translation first, and afterwards hear what he has to say of the subject of the chapter.

* “It is acknowledged by all Protestants,” writes the incarnation of the Bethanian divinity, “that in the bible alone we have the whole revelation of God to man, which his present condition requires, both with respect to the world that now is, and also to that which is to come. Its hermeneutics, or laws of interpretation, are now settled by such tribunals of literature and science as have the sanction of the educated world. No special tribunals are claimed—no new lawgivers are needed, to settle a single canon, or law of translation or interpretation. As other writings of the same age, language, and people, are interpreted, so the sacred writings of the Jewish age, and of the Christian age, are to be interpreted and understood. These are the decisions of all the literary tribunals of the age. We ask no more, and will concede no other canons to any one who seeks to unsettle Christian communities by private opinions or special pleadings for favoured hypothesis, or long-cherished idealities.” Millennium Harbinger Ser. iv. Vol. iii. No.1. —Thus decrees our magniloquent friend in the pride of his intellect and highmindedness. He is of course well-skilled in all the settled canons of translation and interpretation sanctioned by the Protestant educated world. So were Dr. Lowth, Dr. Boothroyd, the Bishop of Rochester, and their Protestant peers. But what has their skill resulted in? Just in leaving the true sense of the prophets and apostles in as much obscurity as before they began to work upon them with their hermeneutics. What feeblest ray of light has the President of Bethany College, shed upon a single obscurity of Moses and the prophets? Nay, what obscurity has he not deepened by his hermeneutics? Pshaw! What are “canons” worth that reduce the prophetic writings to a level with “an old Jewish almanac?” We pause for a reply.

LOWTH’S TRANSLATION.

Ho! To the land of the winged cymbal,
Which borders on the rivers of Cush;
Which sendeth ambassadors on the sea,
And in vessels of papyrus on the face of the waters.
Go, ye swift messengers,
To a nation stretched out in length, and smoothed;
To a people terrible from the first, and hitherto;
A nation meted out by line, and trodden down;
Whose land the rivers have nourished.
Yea, all ye that inhabit the world, and that dwell on the earth,
When the standard is lifted up on the mountains, behold!
And when the trumpet is sounded, hear!
For thus hath Jehovah said unto me:
I will sit still, and regard my fixed habitation;
Like the clear heat after rain,
Like the dewy cloud in the day of harvest.
Surely before the vintage, when the bud is perfect,
When the blossom is become a swelling grape;
He shall cut off the shoots with pruning-hooks,
And the branches he shall take away, he shall cut down.
They shall be left together to the rapacious bird of the mountains;
And to the wild beasts of the earth:
And the rapacious bird shall summer upon it;
And every wild beast of the earth shall winter upon it.
At that time shall a gift be brought to Jehovah, the God of Hosts,
From a people stretched out in length, and smoothed;
A nation meted out by line, and trodden down;

And from a people terrible from the first, and hitherto;
Whose land the rivers have nourished;
To the place of the name of Jehovah, God of Hosts, to Mount Zion.

Such is his close adhesion to the letter of the text, which as it stands in his translation is as “obscure and doubtful” as could be wished by any hermeneutist, desirous of showing his skill in resolving doubts by the settled canons of his craft. Dr. Lowth saw that his “close literal version” had not rendered the prophecy so plain as that he who runs may read: he has, therefore, favoured us with some notes upon the phrases of his version to help us in their interpretation. We quote the following:

1. THE WINGED CYMBAL—tziltzal kenahpahyira. “I adopt this as the most probable rendering. It is Bochart’s. The Egyptian sistrum is expressed by a periphrasis; the Hebrews had no name for it in their language, not having in use the instrument itself. The cymbal they had; an instrument in its use and sound, not much unlike to the sistrum; and to distinguish from it the sistrum, they called it the cymbal with wings. The cymbal was a round hollow piece of metal, which being struck against another, gave a ringing sound: the sistrum was a round instrument, consisting of a broad rim of metal, through which, from side to side, ran several loose laminae, or small rods of metal, which being shaken, gave a like sound. These projecting on each side had somewhat the appearance of wings; or might be very properly expressed by the same word which the Hebrews used for wings, or for the extremity, or the part of anything projecting. The sistrum is given in a medal of Adrian as the proper attribute of Egypt.”

“If, therefore,” continues he, “the words are rightly interpreted the winged cymbal, meaning the sistrum, Egypt must be the country to which the prophecy is addressed: and upon this hypothesis the version and explanation must proceed. I further suppose, that the prophecy was delivered before Sennacherib’s return from his Egyptian expedition, which took up three years; and that it was designed to give to the Jews, and, perhaps, likewise to the Egyptians, an intimation of God’ counsels in regard to the destruction of their great and powerful enemy.”

From these “hypotheses” and supposings, the reader will see that the prophecy is regarded by Dr. Lowth as long ago accomplished, and that consequently it retains no prophetic interest for us—that being fulfilled, it is just a remarkable memorandum of the past, on the old almanac of the Jewish nation. But to this I demur in toto, having satisfied myself that the key to the passage is not contained in the hypothesis out of which Dr. Lowth has extracted such a tinkling sound. We shall see in the sequel, that it is all in the future, and one of the most interesting and important prophecies in the book of God, Egypt being nowhere existent in the premises. But assuming that it is the country addressed, Dr. Lowth indicates the eastern branches of the Nile, the boundary of Egypt towards Arabia, or the parts of the upper Nile, towards the African Ethiopia, as the rivers of Cush. He says, it is not easy to determine which.

2. VESSELS OF PAPYRUS—viklai-gome. “This circumstance,” says he, “agrees perfectly well with Egypt. It is well known that the Egyptians commonly used on the Nile a light sort of ships, or boats, made of the reed papyrus. “Ex ipso quidem papyro navigia texunt”—Plin. Xiii. 11.

“Conseritur bibula Memphitis cymba papyro.”—Luc. Iv. 136.

This is very learned; but though they might construct skiffs of porous papyrus reeds, it is a very remote inference that the land of the winged cymbal sent its ambassadors over the sea in such fragile barks, and that Egypt was that land, because the papyrus grew there.

3. Go, ye swift messengers. —“To this nation before mentioned, who, by the Nile, and by their numerous canals, have the means of spreading the report, in the most expeditious manner, through the whole country. By the swift messengers are meant the usual conveyers of news whatsoever, travellers, merchants, and the like, the instruments and agents of common fame: these are ordered to publish the declaration made by the prophet throughout Egypt, and to all the world; and to excite their attention to the promised visible interposition of God.”

4. Stretched out in length. —“The fruitful part of Egypt, exclusive of the deserts on each side, is one long vale, through the middle of which runs the Nile, bounded on each side to the east and west by a chain of mountains, 750 miles in length; in breadth, from one to two or three day’s journey; even at the widest part of the Delta, from Pelusium to Alexandria, not above 250 miles broad.”

5. Smoothed. —“Either relating to the practice of the Egyptian priests, who made their bodies smooth by shaving off their hair; or rather to the country’s being made smooth, perfectly plain and level, by the overflowing of the Nile.”

6. Trodden down. —“Supposed to allude to a peculiar method of tillage in use among the Egyptians.”

7. The rivers have nourished. —A learned friend suggested to Dr. Lowth, “nourished;” which, as it perfectly well suited his Nile theory, he adopted in preference to “spoiled,” remarking that “nothing can be more discordant than the idea of spoiling and plundering; for to the inundation of the Nile Egypt owed everything—the fertility of the soil, and the very soil itself. Besides, the overflowing of the Nile came on by gentle degrees, covering without laying waste the country.” What he says in this note he terms “hazarding a conjectural interpretation.” Conjectural, indeed, and truly ridiculous. The land of the winged cymbal is to send to another people whose land rivers have affected; but Dr. Lowth’s interpretation makes Egypt send swift messengers to itself. O, hermeneutics, is it thus thy canons explain the prophets!

8. A gift. —“The Egyptians were in alliance with the kingdom of Judah, and were fellow-sufferers with the Jews under the invasion of their common enemy, Sennacherib; and so were very nearly interested in the great and miraculous deliverance of that kingdom, by the destruction of the Assyrian army. Upon which wonderful event, it is said (2 Chronicles 32: 23), that 'many brought gifts unto Jehovah to Jerusalem, and presents to Hezekiah, king of Judah, so that he was magnified of all nations from thenceforth.' It is not to be doubted, that among these the Egyptians distinguished themselves in their acknowledgments on this occasion."

On reading the above, few, I apprehend, will think much of Dr. Lowth as an interpreter of Isaiah. When we consider his pretensions, we are certainly justified in expecting better things. He styled himself (and his pretension to this was admitted by his contemporaries) "an ambassador of Jesus Christ," a "successor of the apostles," and "the right reverend father in God, Robert, Lord Bishop of London," who, if he laid his hands upon the head of a candidate for "Holy Orders," became the medium through which the Holy Spirit was transmitted into the aspirant's soul, to qualify him for a priest in the house of God! Now, I say, from such a man we had a right to expect something better than learned nonsense, as the alleged true sense of a prophet. If an apostle were to give us such a specimen of hermeneutics with a grave face, it would be enough to set aside all his claims to infallibility in teaching. No one has any right to claim part in an apostolic succession, who cannot hermeneuticise better than Dr. Lowth, and those who approve his exegesis. I am certain that Jehovah never would "send" such scholars to interpret his holy prophets. The foolishness of their interpretations is fatal to all their claims.

But here comes before us another of the Episcopal Bench, not so highly salaried, or proximate to the archbishopric of Canterbury as Dr. Lowth, but not behind him in scholarship, and in spiritual assumption in "the church." The bishop of Rochester, who flourished some fifty years ago, did not approve of his learned brother's translation, and therefore favoured his contemporaries with one of his own. Thus we have bishop against bishop, professedly working by the hermeneutics settled by the tribunals of literature and science, but bringing out of the original text a different version and interpretation! A talented writer of the period, speaking of the translations, says, "Dr. Lowth has, I think, very much mistaken the general meaning of this prophecy. But it is to the present Bishop of Rochester, that the lovers of biblical studies are indebted for the best translation and interpretation of this interesting chapter which is extant in our language, or perhaps in any other.” His translation was published in his Critical Disquisitions, addressed to Edward King, Esq., and reproduced from thence in a tract of the time, from which I now transfer it to these pages.

The bishop sets out with observing, “First, the prophecy indeed predicts some woeful judgment; but the principal matter of the prophecy is not judgment, but mercy; a gracious promise of the final restoration of the Israelites. Secondly, the prophecy has no respect to Egypt, or any of the contiguous countries. What has been applied to Egypt, is a description of some people or another, destined to be the principal instruments in the hand of Providence in the great work of the resettlement of the Jews in the Holy Land—a description of that people, by characters by which they will be evidently known when the time arrives. Thirdly, the time for the completion of the prophecy was very remote when it was delivered, and is yet future; being indeed the season of the Second Advent of the Lord.” All this is undoubtedly true; and being so admitted, reduces Dr. Lowth’s interpretation to childishness and folly. The following, then, is the

BISHOP OF ROCHESTER’S TRANSLATION.

1. Ho! Land spreading wide the shadow of (thy) wings, which are beyond the rivers of Cush.
2. Accustomed to send messengers by sea, even in bulrush-vessels upon the surface of the waters! Go, swift messengers, unto a nation dragged away and plucked; unto a people wonderful from their beginning hitherto; a nation expecting, expecting, trampled under foot, whose land rivers have spoiled.
3. All the inhabitants of the world, and dwellers upon earth, shall see the lifting up, as it were, of a banner upon the mountains, and shall hear the sounding, as it were, of a trumpet.
4. For thus saith Jehovah unto me: I will sit still (but I will keep my eye upon my prepared habitation). As the parching heat just before lightning, as the dewy cloud in the heat of harvest.
5. For after the harvest, when the bud is coming to perfection, and the blossom is become a juicy berry, he will cut off the useless shoots with pruning-hooks, and the bill shall take away the luxuriant branches.

6. They shall be left together to the bird of prey of the mountains, and to the beasts of the earth. And upon it shall the bird of prey summer, and all the beasts of the earth upon it shall winter.

7. At that season a present shall be led to Jehovah of hosts, a people dragged away and plucked; even of a people wonderful from the beginning hitherto; a nation, expecting, expecting, and trampled under foot, whose land rivers have spoiled, unto the place of Jehovah of hosts, Mount Zion.

This translation is a decided improvement on Dr. Lowth's. "Land spreading wide the shadow of wings, which are beyond the rivers of Cush," is to be preferred to the rendering, "land of the winged cymbal, which borders on the rivers of Cush." Sending "messengers by sea in bulrush-vessels" is, however, no improvement on sending "ambassadors on the sea in vessels of papyrus." Heaven help the messengers and ambassadors in such frail barks as these! The bishops, I apprehend, would have declined missions from their government, with all their honours and emoluments, if it provided them with no more substantial, safe, and swifter contrivances for transportation over the sea.

But the bishop of Rochester rejects the idea of the vessels being literally formed of bulrushes. "Sending by sea in bulrush-vessels," says he, "is a figurative expression, descriptive of skill in navigation, and of the safety and expedition, with which the inhabitants of the land called to, are supposed to perform distant voyages." By what hermeneutic canon a bulrush-vessel is figurative of skill, safety, and expedition in navigation is not so clear to us as to the bishop. He does not, however, appear very sure about this import of the figure; but he says, "navigable vessels are certainly meant; and if it could be proved, that Egypt is the country spoken to, these vessels of bulrushes might be understood literally of the light skiffs, made of that material, and used by the Egyptians upon the Nile. But if the country spoken to be distant from Egypt, 'vessels of bulrush' is only used as an apt image, on account of their levity, for quick sailing vessels of any material. The country, therefore, to which the prophet calls, is characterised as one which, in the days of the completion of the prophecy, shall be a great maritime and commercial power, forming remote alliances, making distant voyages to all parts of the world, with expedition and security, and in the habit of affording protection to their friends and allies. Where this country is to be found is not otherwise said, than that it will be remote from Judea, and with respect to that country beyond the Cushaeon streams.”

Dr. Boothroyd’s is the latest translation of this remarkable portion of the word I have seen. He renders the first two verses by “Ho! To the land shadowing with wings, which borders on the rivers of Cush which sendeth ambassadors on the sea, and in floats of papyrus on the face of the waters. Go, O ye swift messengers, to a nation extended and fierce; to a people terrible from the first and hitherto; a nation that useth the line, and treadeth down, whose land the rivers have spoiled.” Though this translation is rather better than Lowth’s, he throws no light upon the subject of the prophecy. This is less excusable in him than in Lowth and Rochester, because, living in more recent times he has failed to avail himself of notable facts which are shining upon the prophecy, whose shadows only were preceding them in their day. The following remarks will prove to the reader that hermeneutics are as treacherous in Dr. Boothroyd’s case as in Dr. Lowth’s. “What land is meant,” he observes, “and why it is said to be shadowing with wings, has been much disputed. The chief part consider that the prophet intended to represent Egypt. The Jews fled under the wing of this country for protection. The prophet having predicted the destruction of these enemies, sends the news first to Egypt, and then exhorts the swift messengers of Egypt to send it to Nubia.”

Here then we have Dr. Lowth, the Bishop of Rochester, Dr. Boothroyd, and the numerous scholars appointed by King James I to make our authorised version, who have all tried their hands upon this portion of the prophetic word, but have signally failed in presenting the English reader with a translation capable of being understood. Want of classical competency was not the cause of their failure, for of Roman, Greek, and Oriental literature, they had enough, and to spare. They were great hermeneutical philologists, but they were not “wise;” they erred not understanding the scriptures, which can alone make learned and unlearned men, truly wise in “the things of the Spirit of God.” Dr. Johnson gives about seventy meanings to our word

“make.” A scholar may remember them all, and yet not have wisdom to select aright the meaning suitable to the word in a certain place. “To make” is to do, perform, practise, as well as to create. Suppose the sentence is, “God makes evil.” A foreigner examines his lexicon under the word “make,” and finds the above to be among the meanings, he understands the idiom and peculiarities of the language but imperfectly, so that being uncertain which is the most appropriate, he guesses that “do, perform, or practise will bring out the idea of the sentence, and he renders it, “God does, performs, or practises, evil,” which he supposes comprehends sin. Such a translation as this would evince want of wisdom in the use of words, which no hermeneutics or laws of interpretation could supply. Now the learned translators of the Scriptures have been hitherto very much in this fix. They get hold of a Hebrew word having a plurality of senses, several different meanings, and the question arises among them, which is the right one for the place? This can only be determined by a correct understanding of the context. This is a law, or settled canon, of interpretation, which, however, is of no use to the translator who is ignorant of that context. He may know the canon or rule, but can make no use of it because of his doctrinal ignorance. A man may be profoundly skilled in hermeneutics, and yet profoundly incompetent to translate and interpret the Scriptures correctly. He is like one who can name his tools, but knows not how to use them. The learned men above-mentioned, together with our contemporaries, who are swelling so immensely about conferring upon us Anglo-Saxons a correct version of the Bible, are too ignorant of the doctrine of the prophets and apostles to accomplish the work. They are doctrinally incompetent, being without intelligence in “the word of the kingdom.” The Bishop of Rochester’s exegesis is the best, because he perceived that Christ Jesus is to reappear in Mount Zion in person, and that the twelve tribes of Israel are at that time to be restored in the midst of judgment: but as for sky kingdomers giving us an improvement of King James’s version, we should as soon expect one from old Socrates, or His Roman Holiness of the Papal throne.

This eighteenth chapter of Isaiah is part of a prophecy relating to that crisis in Israel’s history where “the judgment sits and the books are opened.” The beginning of the passage is Isaiah 17: 12, three verses, which should be included in the eighteenth chapter. It belongs to the time when “the nations are angry, and God's wrath is come," and "the men upon the face of the land shake at his presence"—Daniel 7: 10; Revelation 11: 18; Ezekiel 38: 20, —a time of tumult and uproar among the nations rushing against each other to battle; and "Jerusalem becomes a burdensome stone for all people that burden themselves with it,"—"a cup of trembling to all the people round about in the siege against Judah and Jerusalem"—Zechariah 12: 2-3, —"a day of grief and desperate sorrow"—terror's evening time—the darkest hour of Jacob's trouble that ere will be again. The rush of the roaring hosts of the nations is to Jerusalem under the King of the North, who at the time is lord of Syria and Damascus, holding all that country against his enemies. This is the last of the horns of the Gentiles that scatters Israel, and lays their country waste. It is the power styled "the Assyrian," who by the voice of Jehovah shall be beaten down, and be no more, ere the dawn of the millennial day. The Lord of hosts shall rebuke him, and chase his roaring multitude like mountain chaff before the tempest, and stubble swept before its whirl. This is the portion of Gogue, and the destiny of all his host: and thus perishes "a blossom" while a sour grape is ripening on the vine.

This victory accomplished, a signal, or banner, is exalted on the mountains of Israel, and a trumpet proclamation sounded to the world. The root of Jesse then stands for an ensign to the people on Zion's hill, to whom the outcasts of Israel shall be assembled, and the dispersed of Judah gathered. Of him shall "the Assyrian" and his princes be afraid, in his descent as birds flying to fight for Mount Zion and the hill thereof—Isaiah 11: 10, 12; 31: 4-5, 8-9. Having descended and taken possession of his dwelling-place, anciently known as "the city where David dwelt," breathing time is granted to the world while the trumpet proclamation is sounding abroad among them. They hear and tremble. Jehovah-Jesus—he who bears the name of Jehovah—is in his dwelling-place "secure," and waiting the effect of the trumpet. He awaits the time of action "as dry heat impending lightning, as a dewy cloud in the heat of harvest" soon to pass away.

During the stillness of this awful pause, not a gleam of sunshine for a moment penetrates the impending gloom; not a breath stirs; not a leaf wags; not a blade of grass is shaken; no rippling wave curls upon the sleeping surface of the waters; the black ponderous cloud, covering the whole sky, seems to hang fixed and motionless as an arch of stone. Nature seems benumbed in all her operations. Such is the condition of the torpid atmosphere before the bursting forth of a raging tempest, employed by the spirit to illustrate the trumpet interval before the terrible and sudden irruption of Jehovah's fury against the nations; which, instead of fearing God and giving glory to him—Revelation 14: 6-7, assemble themselves together, to give battle against his king—Revelation 19: 19; 17: 14.

Christ's proclamation from Zion, though general, is also especially addressed to a government, which Dr. Lowth styles, "the land of the winged-cymbal;" but the common version more correctly, "the land shadowing with wings." This is a power of widely extended colonial dominion, remarkable for its steam marine. "Go, swiftly, ye fleet messengers! — Convey them in your steamers, O land!" This makes them "fleet messengers." These messengers are of that "third part" of Judah not cut off by the King of the North when he invades the land of Israel. Concerning these Jehovah says, "I will send those that escape of them unto the nations, to Tarshish, Pul, and Lud, that draw the bow, to Tubal and Javan, to the coasts afar off, that have not heard my fame, neither have seen my glory among the Gentiles." Tarshish, the colonial power, accepts the invitation, and places its steamers at the disposal of Christ's ambassadors; as it is written, "the coasts shall wait upon me, and ships of Tarshish among the first, to bring thy sons, O Zion, from far, their silver and their gold with them, unto the Name of Jehovah thy God, even to the Holy One of Israel"—Isaiah 60: 9. In the words of the eighteenth chapter they are "brought as a present to Jehovah of armies, to the dwelling-place of the Name of Jehovah of armies, Mount Zion."

With respect to the papal governments of Europe, the trumpet proclamation is despised by them, and they prepare for war. These are the powers termed by John, "the Beast and the False Prophet, and the kings of the earth with their armies." Jesus styles them in Matthew 25, "the Goats," and "the Devil and his angels." The lightning of his wrath, shoots forth, and the thunder of his fury roars from Zion against them. The steamers of Tarshish being at the disposal of Israel's king, they cannot invade his kingdoms; so that as Abraham is supposed to say in the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus, “between Israel and them is a great gulf fixed; so that they who would pass from Palestine to Papal-dom cannot; neither can the goats and the exiled among them from the presence of the lord, pass to Palestine that would come from thence.” No. They are hemmed in within their own borders. There war, and pestilence, and famine, rage in all their horrors. The saints execute upon them the judgment written under the direction of their king, and in the presence of his messengers. Their country becomes “a Lake of Fire burning with brimstone,” which results in the destruction of the papal governments and system for ever.

This being the doctrine of the prophets and the apostles, and reflected from the seventeenth and eighteenth of Isaiah, it is clear that sky-kingdom speculators who believe nothing of the kind, must of necessity be confounded when they encounter such passages as that before us. No skill in hermeneutics is of any avail to an immortal-soul sky-kingdom-gospeller; and he that understands “the word of the kingdom” may discern the truth though scholastically ignorant of interpretation-laws, as a man may reason correctly though unacquainted with the logician’s rules. The learned foolishness published by proficients in hermeneutics is enough to fill all ingenuous minds with contempt at the tools by which they have elaborated their prosy disquisitions. Read Moses Stuart on Daniel if you desire to behold the light of darkness made as darkness itself! Yet this man was “great,” “a father in Israel,” a college professor, and a transformer of youths into guides of the blind! When we contemplate the universal failure of such people in their attempt to explain prophecy, we are led to enquire if the prophets were given to take the worldly-wise in their own craftiness, and to knock out their brains? For truly they might as well have none as use to them to so little purpose. The generality discourage the study of the prophets as dementing. It may be to those who are dyed in the wool of orthodoxy; and this may account for such translations as Lowth, Boothroyd, and Stuart’s, with many others of minor note.

Hopeless then of light from that quarter, I have essayed to help myself on the principle that God aids them who help themselves. Far inferior to them as a Hebraist, I freely admit; but this shall not discourage me from invading their province, and trying to perfect that wherein they have failed. David slew

Goliath with a sling-stone in the name of Israel's God. This was an earnest of victory to Israel's host, which beholding the stripling's easy conquest of the giant, dismissed their faint-heartedness, and contended earnestly against the foe. Encouraged by this example, I take a pebble from the brook, even this "most obscure of prophecies," and, by an easy demonstration of its import, level the hermeneutists with the dust. May my readers animated by my almost dangerless passage at arms with the Goliaths, learn to feel valiant for the truth, and to contend earnestly for it with a true heart, and full assurance of faith. Let the weak say, "I am strong; I have no fear of the face of clay."

THE EDITOR'S TRANSLATION OF ISAIAH.

From Chapter 17: 12 to 18: 7.

Hark! A multitude of many peoples making an uproar as the noise of seas. Hark! A tumult among peoples, roaring as a tumult of mighty waters; they rage against peoples like a roar of many waters: but HE shall rebuke him, and he shall flee afar off; and He shall chase him as the chaff of the mountains before the wind, and as stubble before the whirlwind. Behold also at evening time sudden destruction; and before dawn he is not. This is the portion of our spoilers, and a lot for them who scatter us.

Ho! Land of widely o'ershadowing wings extending from beyond to rivers of Cush; which sendeth by sea whirling things even upon vessels of fleetness on the surface of waters! Go swiftly, ye fleet messengers, to a nation carried away and oppressed; to a people terrible from this and onward; a nation prostrate and trodden down, whose lands rivers have spoiled.

All the inhabitants of the world, and dwellers of the earth, at the lifting up of an ensign on the mountains, shall tremble, and at the sounding of a trumpet, shall hear. For thus said Jehovah to me, I will be still (yet in my dwelling place I will be without fear) as dry heat impending lightning, as a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest. For before harvest as the perfecting of fruit when sour grapes are ripening, there shall be a blossom: and He will cut (it) off as vine-shoots by pruning hooks, and luxuriant twigs are lopped away. They shall be left together for the carrion-bird of the mountains, and the wild beast of the land; and the bird of prey shall destroy upon it, and every wild beast of the land shall ravin upon it.

At that time a present shall be diligently brought to Jehovah of armies, a people carried away and oppressed even of a people terrible from this (time) and onward; a nation prostrate and trodden down, whose land rivers have spoiled; to the dwelling-place of the NAME of Jehovah of armies, Mount Zion.

ANNOTATIONS.

Hark! —Hui, pronounced Masoretically ho, is the interjection with which Isaiah, 17: 12 and 18: 1, begin. It signifies Ho! Hark! Woe! Alas! a word of threatening, of grief, and of exhortation. In the common version it is rendered “woe” in both these texts; but Lowth, Rochester and Boothroyd, adopt “ho” in the same. The prophet’s exclamation evidently arises from a different cause in each case. In the first, he is like one who catches the sound of some distant uproar, and that he may discern more perfectly what is to do, exclaims with a listening ear, Hark! What is that? Having ascertained the nature of the tumult, he turns to the standers by, and says, “It is the multitude of many peoples making an uproar as the noise of seas.” There is great sublimity in this. The prophet in Jerusalem upwards of 2500 years ago, being “in the spirit,” hears the loud-sounding uproar of nations, rushing from far distant realms to battle in Israel’s land, in the eventide of Gentile times. “Hark!” says he, “do you hear that roar of mighty waters?” It is the last conflict of the nations ere the dawn of Israel’s glory. I hear them approach the Holy City. Onward, and nearer still they come! The roar is terrible. The flood no barrier heeds: our land is deluged, and the city falls before it. But O, the majesty and power of Israel’s King! I see him robed in glory and might, and hurling sudden destruction upon the foe! He pursues the enemy, and overtakes them. They cry, but there’s none to save them, even to Jehovah, but he answers them not. How terrible the chace! He beats them small as the dust before the wind, and tramples them in the fury of his power! Thus doth he tread the winepress alone, and bring down the strength of the destroyer to the earth. Compare Psalm 18: 37-42, with Isaiah 63: 3-6, and the text before us.

The victory being thus gained by the Name of Jehovah who comes from far (chapter 30: 27,) he takes up his abode in the City of David on Mount Zion. The din of battle, and the tumult of peoples, is all hushed into the stillness of a sultry atmosphere impending a threatening storm. There is no uproar now to cause the prophet to exclaim “Hark!” The time of proclamation has arrived, especially to a power whose services are in requisition at the crisis. I do not therefore render hui in the second place by “hark,” but by “Ho!” as calling to the land. —I have repeated “hark” after

“But He shall rebuke him”—ugar bo, pronounced ve-gah-ar bo. The common version reads, “but God shall rebuke them”: Dr. Lowth, “but he shall rebuke them”; while Boothroyd agrees with the common version. “God” is not in the Hebrew text. The Holy One of Israel, who bears the name of Jehovah, is doubtless the rebuker, as appears from the Psalm already quoted; and the additional testimony of Micah in chapter 4: 3, and chapter 5: 2, 5-6: —“He shall rebuke strong nations afar off.” “Out of Bethlehem Ephratah shall he come forth unto me to be Ruler in Israel. And he shall stand and feed in the strength of Jehovah, in the majesty of the name of the Lord his God: and they (Israel) shall abide: for now shall He be great unto the ends of the earth. And this (Ruler) shall be the peace when the Assyrian shall come into our land.” This ruler for Israel is admitted by all professors, except Jews, to be Jesus of Nazareth, who was born at Bethlehem: but while this is conceded, what is here affirmed of him is rejected. We, however, believe it; and maintain that though Jesus has never encountered the Assyrian in battle, he is yet to do it. Jesus Christ, who is soon to stand in Mount Zion in the majesty of the name of Jehovah, is the rebuker of the uproarious nations, who follow the Assyrian’s standard. He is to be the peace when the Assyrian invades the land of Israel. The testimony of Micah shows that it is the Assyrian which is the power to be rebuked in Judea at the second appearing of the Lord Jesus—the Assyrian styled “the King of the north” by Daniel; “Gog” by Ezekiel; and “the Autocrat of all the Russias” by the moderns.

The translators referred to, not understanding the teaching of the prophets concerning the Assyrian of the latter days, could not discern the propriety of bo in the text, as no single individual had been mentioned, or alluded to, in the context. Instead, therefore, of rendering the words gahar bo, rebuke him, they nullified the prophet’s significant allusion to Israel’s enemy of the latter days, and converted bo into “them.” In my rendering, I have restored the idea they suppressed. Jesus, the stone the builders refused, shall rebuke the Russo-Assyrian Head of the Serpent, and he shall flee afar off: Jesus shall chase him as stubble, and destroy him suddenly.

*“At evening time * * * and before the dawn.”* This interval between the evening and dawn is styled in Daniel, “the time of the end.” We are now in the evening time of the day of salvation—the “today” of the times of the Gentiles. About half an hour of the period remains ere the Assyrian obtains Jerusalem and is suddenly destroyed. The evening time before the dawn is the “time of trouble” foretold by Daniel, when Jehovah shall come with his holy ones. “But,” saith Zechariah, “light shall not be, the splendid ones draw themselves in. But it shall be one day, this is known to Jehovah, not day nor night, but it shall be at evening time there shall be light.” This is a remarkable passage. Yiquahroth yiquiphahon, the splendid ones draw themselves in. Though they that be wise are to shine as the sun, as the brightness of the firmament, and as the stars, in the kingdom, we learn from this text in Zechariah, that when they appear with Jesus “before the dawn,” before the kingdom is set up, that they restrain their splendour, as it may be supposed Christ did during his forty days sojourning with his disciples after his resurrection and before his ascension. This leads to the conclusion that while Christ and the saints are carrying on the war of Armageddon against “the Beast, the False Prophet, and the kings of the earth and their armies,” during the evening time, they will appear like other men. They will draw themselves in, restraining the manifestation of their brightness until they have fully executed the judgment given them to do.

At evening time brightness shall shine forth. That is, at the close of it. When the light shines, the dawn has passed, and the darkness chased away. The day of glory shines upon the world, and the earth becomes full of the knowledge of it. The interval between the rebuke of the Assyrian by Christ Jesus, and the shining forth of His day, will be, I take it, about forty years. This will be the most extraordinary period of the world’s history. The reappearance of Christ, the resurrection of the saints, the dashing in pieces of the goat-governments as a potter’s vessel, the restoration of Israel, the manifestation of Paradise in the Holy Land, and the regeneration of the nations, are the events characteristic of the period. Who would not pray, “Thy kingdom come?”

“Before the dawn he is not,” beterem boquer ainennu. Boothroyd has it, “they are no more;” Dr. Lowth, “he is no more;” but the common version correctly, “he is not.” In answer to the question, “Who is not?” we have, “he whom the Ruler of Israel rebukes, and chases like chaff before the wind.” The fate of this Assyrian awaits all the powers that oppress Israel.

“Land of widely o’ershadowing wings,” eretz tziltzal kenahpahyim. These are the words rendered by Dr. Lowth “land of the winged cymbal.” He says tziltzal is never used to signify shadow. This may be granted, without admitting that it has no relation to shadow at all. The Robinson-Gesenius Lexicon translates the phrase “land of the whizzing of wings; that is, land of the clangor of armies; full of armies (wings) clanging their arms, viz., Ethiopia!!” This is unadulterated nonsense. Parkhurst is more rational. He derives it from the root tzahlal, to be overshadowed. By inserting the letter tzade between the lameds, thus, tzahl-tz-al, the verb is intensified, and made to signify “to overshadow exceedingly, or very much.” As a noun, tzltzl is applied to the locust, from their sometimes flying in such swarms as to obscure the sun, or darken the air. Though Gesenius does not perceive the meaning of tzltzl in our text, he rejects Dr. Lowth’s “cymbal” for whizzing or whistling.” It is true that cymbals, and whizzing, are found in connection with this family of words, as mtzlthim, pronounced metzailthaim; and tzltzlim, pronounced tzeltzelim, because of some resemblance between the sound of tziltzahl, when spoken sibilantly and broadly, and the cling clahng, or clangor of the cymbal plates when struck together, and waved with a tremulous motion through the air. But there is nothing in the primitive idea of the root of the word connected with sound. The verb tzahlal comes from tzl, pronounced tzail, which signifies shade, shadow; and concretely, these as affording shelter, or protection, by supreme power, the figure being preserved: as betzail kenahphekah, “under the shadow of thy wings” hide me; that is, under the protection of Jehovah’s power. Tzail is intensified by the doubling of its lamed: as tzll, as if it were written tzaill. But to distinguish the latter from the former, the Masorites have pointed it so as to sound tzahlal, instead of tzaill, which could only be distinguished from tzail by the eye. The genealogy of our tziltzal is obvious. Its grandfather is tzl, a shadow; and its father, tzll, overshadow; while the grandson is tzltzl, to overshadow exceedingly, or very much; that is, widely o’ershadowing, as I have rendered it in the text.

Eretz and tziltzal, are both in regimen, and should therefore be literally rendered, land of the widely o’ershadowing of wings. This seems to bring out more forcibly the wings as the overshadowing agents. The proclamation is to a land of wings, not folded up as a bird at rest; but spread out, or extended widely, and therefore capable of affording protection to peoples inhabiting countries far distant from the throne of its power. “A land of wings” is a figurative expression, like that of “wings of the God of Israel.” Isaiah, predicting the invasion of the Holy Land by the king of Assyria, says, “The stretching out of his wings shall fill the breadth of thy land, O Immanuel!” That is, his dominion shall overshadow it from the Mediterranean to the Euphrates. This is a beautiful allusion to the eagle-winged lions of Nineveh, the capital of the Assyrian power. A winged lion is used in Daniel as the symbol of Assyria under its Ninevite dynasty. When the sovereignty was transferred from Nineveh to Babylon, the prophet represents the wings as being plucked. Nineveh lost its wings, and could, therefore, overshadow no more. It was once a City of Wings, and Assyria a land of wings; so that if the prophet had any message to proclaim to it from afar, he might have exclaimed, “Ho, land of the overshadowing wings!” A city or land of wings, then, is a city or land having dominion; and if the wings are wide-spreading, which is indicated by a widely extended shadow, the dominion is extensive, perhaps very extensive, if an intensive word be used to express the idea of shadowing. But all lands have not wings, because all lands have not dominion. Canada and the West Indies, Hungary and Lombardy, have no wings. The wings of the mighty overshadow them all. They have no dominion over their own lands, even; hence none dwell under their shadow. Austria, on the other hand, is a land of overshadowing of wings. So are Russia, Turkey, France and Britain. Belgium is a lion without wings. Its dominion is restricted to its home-land—a land which overshadows none but its own people. But we need add no more under this head; for by this time, the reader will certainly perceive what is meant by the figurative expression, “land of widely o’ershadowing wings.”

“Extending from beyond to”—ashr maivr le, pronounced asher maiver le. ASHER is the relative pronoun who, which, that, singular and plural, masculine and feminine; and agrees with its antecedent kenahpahyim, wings. Hence, literally, wings that from beyond to, that is “wings extending from beyond to,” as I have given it in the text.

Maivr comes from the root ahvar; without the points ovr, pronounced over; from which originates our English word over. Hence, as a verb, “over with you,” that is, pass over or beyond, which is the import of the root ahvar. With the prefix m, from, it becomes a preposition, as m-ovr, Masoretically maiaiver, and signifies from over or from beyond; and followed by le meaning to.

“Extending from beyond to,” is a geographical phrase. To understand it aright, we must remember that it was not penned by one in London, Constantinople, or New York; but by the prophet in Jerusalem. “From beyond” is used in Scripture in reference to east and west from Jerusalem; or in reference to the Euphrates alone, if the writer were sojourning on the east of that river. The phrase aiver hyyardain, “beyond Jordan,” signifies the country east of that river: be-aiver hyyom, literally, in beyond the sea, that is, “in the country beyond the Mediterranean,” or west from Judea. In the text before us, it is not “from beyond to the Sihor.” If it were, we might look for the wing dominion as extending from, perhaps, the Atlantic coast of Africa to the Nile. “From beyond” leaves the how far beyond undefined. It may be one degree beyond the “to,” or forty. The how far beyond is not important to the understanding of the prophecy.

“Rivers of Cush,” nhri kush, pronounced naharai koosh. Cush is the name of a grandson of Noah in the line of Ham, and the brother of Mitzraim, Phut, and Canaan. These all began their migrations from Ararat. Cush and his brethren journeyed southward, towards, towards the Persian Gulf, Indian Ocean, and countries of the Nile. Japheth’s descendants spread themselves over the north and west; while Shem’s branched off towards the east. Cush’s brother Mitzraim settled Egypt; and Canaan, another, a cursed race, the land afterwards possessed by the Israelites, descended from Shem. The sons of Cush descended the Tigris and Euphrates, and from thence, spread around the waters of the Persian Gulf, to Muscat, and thence to Aden, the regions of his sons Sheba and Dedan. They diffused themselves along the southeastern coast of the Red Sea; while some of them crossed it, and extended their settlements to the region of the Upper Nile.

“Cush begat Nimrod.” Nimrod founded the first kingdom that existed after the flood. It commenced with four cities in the land of Shinar, the principal of which was Babel, afterwards styled Babylon. “Out of that land went forth Asshur, and builded Nineveh” on the Tigris or Hiddekel: “the same,” says Moses, “is a great city.” The land of Shinar thus became the land of Cush; whose original stock ruled the countries afterwards styled Mesopotamia and Babylonia. Cushan-rishathaim was the Cushite sovereign who first subjected Israel after the death of Joshua. “The tents of Cushan” thus extended from beyond Nineveh to Midian on the Red Sea; but Cush proper, as pertaining to the kingdom of Nimrod, is the country between Persia, Arabia, and the Holy Land.

The rivers of Cush are those enumerated by Moses in Genesis 2: 11—the Pishon winding through the whole land of Havilah, a son of Cush; the Gihon through Cush’s land more specially; the Hiddekel or Tigris, which flows before Assyria; and the Euphrates. The Tigris and Euphrates are Cush’s rivers, as is clearly seen by his people founding a kingdom on their course, with its capital near the junction of the two.

To return then to the text. The dominion-wings extend from beyond to the Tigris and Euphrates, at the time that the proclamation is made to the land to which the wings belong. As I have said, how far from beyond the Euphrates and Tigris the dominion-wings stretch—whether from the Indus, the Ganges, Irrawaddy, or Canton rivers—is not indicated in this prophecy. If we suppose it begins at Hindostan, east of the rivers of Cush, it will certainly extend “to” the Tigris and Euphrates; for the words are l-nhri Cush, le-naharai coosh, “to rivers of Cush.” Dr. Lowth makes the land “border on the rivers of Cush.” Rochester renders it, “wings which are beyond the rivers of Cush.” Boothroyd copies Lowth; while the king’s version is, “land beyond the rivers of Ethiopia.” Hence, none of them, it will be seen, have paid any regard to the prepositions m, from, and l, to, which are essential to the sense.

“Which sendeth by sea,” hshlch byym, pronounced hassholaiach byyom. The wing of the land, or its dominion, being so wide-spreading from tip to tip, it is obliged to communicate with its possessions under their shadow, “by sea.” This character in the text shows that the overshadowing land is a maritime power. It is neither Austria, Russia, nor Turkey; because they do not correspond with their possessions by sea; neither is it France, or the United States; because their wings do not stretch beyond to the Tigris and Euphrates. It can be no other than the British power, whose wings stretch from Burma to the land of Sheba, and west of the Indus; and will advance to Cushistan from the Persian Gulf, as soon as it perceives it necessary for the protection and promotion of its commercial interests. The movements of the Russo-Assyrian autocrat in regard to Turkey, will cause Britain to extend the shadow of her wings to the rivers of Cush. These waters are the borders beyond which her wings will spread no further westward. Britain on the Euphrates, and the Assyrian as a cloud to cover Israel’s land, will bring face to face, in the heart of Asia, the friend and foe of God’s oppressed, dispersed, and captive nation. Policy and interest will identify Britain with the Jews, while many of its people will sympathise with them on religious principles. But the Jews are enemies to Jesus; and the British government, while they profess to venerate him, pay no respect to his teaching or commands. Their pride must therefore be humbled before either of them can be employed as allies in the work of the evening time. Hence, “two-third parts” of Judah in the land are cut off by the Assyrian, leaving the other third for the purposes of the Deliverer: while the powerful fleet of the overshadowing power, cooperating in the war against the Russo-Assyrian, is broken and dispersed. The testimony in support of this is found in the forty-eighth psalm, which contains a prophecy parallel with this of Isaiah. “As we have heard so have we now seen concerning the city of Jehovah of hosts, concerning the city of our Elohim—the Elohim will establish it throughout the age.” It refers, then, to the time when Zion exists as “the city of the great King,” with the “Elohim manifested in its palaces for protection.” But before this manifestation “the kings were assembled (against her;) they rushed along together; but when they saw, they were in great consternation; they were confounded; they fled in terror. Trembling seized upon them there, a pang as of travail.” After predicting this headlong flight of the Assyrian’s kings, he goes on to say, “by an east wind thou wilt break in pieces the ships of Tarshish”—of that Tarshish which, having partaken of the general dismay, shall be among the first to place its ships at the victor's disposal, to bring Zion's sons from far to their fatherland. Thus will Britain, and the Jews already in Judea, be prepared for cooperation in the work of the evening time.

BRITAIN'S STEAM MARINE FORETOLD BY ISAIAH.

“Which sendeth by sea whirling things even upon vessels of fleetness on the surface of waters.” Tzirim uvkli-gma ol-pni-mim, pronounced tzirim uviklai gome al-penai-mayim. —This is the original which I have rendered “whirling things even upon vessels of fleetness on the surface of waters.” Could any thing be more descriptive of steamers as they appear to a spectator when gliding over the water? He sees a vessel moving with rapidity, and observes something on its sides whirling with remarkable velocity. After beholding such a vessel for the first time in motion from a position exterior to it, its fleetness and whirling things would be the two characteristics by which he would describe it to others. I do not doubt that the prophet understood that in the evening time there would be a great maritime power sending swift vessels by sea to its possessions in India, propelled by whirling things instead of by sails. It is a fact, that such a power exists, and navigates the waters of the Red Sea with fleet vessels without sails; which before his day bore on their surface the sluggish craft of Solomon and his Tyrian ally in their voyages to the Indian Tarshish. This fact is foretold in the prophet’s description of the shadowing land. It is remarkable, exceedingly so; and therefore to attract attention more certainly to it, I have placed this annotation under a distinct and conspicuous title. Let it be read in connection with what has gone before, and with what is yet to come.

These whirling things on vessels of fleetness, Dr. Lowth styles “ambassadors on the sea in vessels of papyrus!” The bishop of Rochester calls them, “messengers by sea in bulrush-vessels!” Boothroyd has it, “ambassadors on the sea in floats of papyrus!” And the king’s version, “ambassadors by sea in vessels of bulrushes!” Strange they did not suspect the propriety of “ambassadors” as the translation of tzirim. Perhaps they did; for instead of saying Go, ye swift ambassadors, they have it, “Go ye swift messengers.” They saw that two entirely different words were used in the Hebrew; but not knowing wherein the difference lay, they selected two distinct orthographies, with but little real difference of signification between them. Ambassadors and messengers are persons sent. The shadowing land’s ambassadors are supposed by the learned to be the messengers ordered to go swiftly.

The word tzirim is a noun masculine plural from tzir, “to go in a circle, to revolve.” It has probably some affinity to the obsolete root tznr, pronounced tzahnar, to whirr, or whizz, especially expressive of the rushing sound of water falling from a wheel in rapid motion. Revolvers, or whirling things, tzirim, is the Spirit’s word for what we term paddle-wheels, which are things going in a circle. Tzir is indeed properly rendered ambassador or messenger in Jeremiah 49: 14, and Obadiah 1; but still the radical idea is retained of one going in a circle, or making a circuit of the nations. The tzirim of our text, however, cannot be things going in a circle in an ambassadorial circuit; for they are tzirim-viklai-gome “on vessels of fleetness,” performing their circuits on their sides. The translators referred to, did not perceive the application of tzirim to the paddle-wheels of vessels; for, with the exception of Dr. Boothroyd, there were no such things in the range of their observation or knowledge.

“Fleetness,” gome. —This is rendered by the hermeneutists, “papyrus,” “bulrush,” and bulrushes.” Moses was exposed on the margin of Sihor in tavath gome, an ark, or water-tight basket, of bulrush, or papyrus reed. The word is indeed applied to the bulrush, or papyrus reed; but then it is a question, why it is so applied? If we can ascertain this, we may find that it has a more appropriate signification for Isaiah 18: 2.

The word gimai is both a noun and a verb. The Masorites, whose points are convenient, but without authority, distinguish the noun from the verb by their punctuation, which expresses their opinion of what the word ought to be in certain places. They call the verb gahmah, and the noun gome; but on the Hebrew text they are written both the same. It is the infinitive of Piayl in construction, in the text before us, placed there to give prominence to the idea contained in the finite verb. Its punctuation should therefore be gimai and not gome. It stands as a verbal substantive in the construct case.

The word signifies “to absorb, to drink up, to swallow.” Now, the Egyptian papyrus nilotica, and the bulrush, especially the former, are of a very porous nature, absorbing or drinking up moisture copiously. Hence the papyrus is styled bibulous, bibula papyrus by Lucan, and gma by the Hebrew. The Egyptians made from it garments, shoes, baskets, vessels of various kinds, skiffs, &c. —articles of the water-drinking reed.

The word in the Piayl conjugation is used poetically of the horse swallowing, as it were, the ground, in his eagerness and fleetness; as in Job 39: 24, igm artz, Masoretically, yegamme-ahretz, “he swalloweth diligently of the ground,” as much as to say, he runs away with it, so great is his fleetness. When a traveller by rail looks at the ground in advance of the train, as it rushes along, he sees the idea represented by the phrase, “swallowing diligently of the ground.” By the same metaphor, and with equal propriety, a ship may be said to drink up of the water diligently, as for a horse or train to swallow diligently of the ground. They are both poetical expressions for a fleet horse, a rapid train, and a fast ship. Hence, as the papyrus literally absorbs copiously of moisture, so poetically or figuratively, a fast vessel drinks rapidly of the water, and a fleet horse diligently of the ground; therefore, the papyrus, the ship, and the horse, are all subjects of one common idea, and that is expressed by the word gma. The phrase kli-gma, pronounced kelai-gome, is then literally translatable, vessels of to drink up diligently; but this very literal rendering is itself metaphorical: diligent drinking up is quick, or rapid drinking; ships rapidly drinking up of the surface of waters, are vessels rapidly diminishing distance: they are fleet vessels, or “vessels of fleetness,” kelai-gome, but of no matter-like affinity to the bulrushes of the Nile.

The Bishop of Rochester had some idea that there was something figurative connected with his “bulrush-vessels,” expressive of the fleetness of the shadowing lands’ marine; but as he had never seen a steamship, the fleetness of his bulrush vessels was confined to their fast sailing. “If the country spoken to,” says he, “be distant from Egypt, vessels of bulrush are only used as an apt image, on account of their levity, for quick sailing vessels of any material. The country, therefore, to which the prophet calls, is characterised as one which, in the days of the completion of this prophecy, shall be a great maritime and commercial power, forming remote alliances, making distant voyages to all parts of the world, with expedition and security, and in the habit of affording protection to their friends and allies.” Thus much the bishop saw even from erroneous premises. He rightly conjectured from the prophet’s reference to the sea and surface of waters, that he was addressing a maritime, and not a continental, power; and as it is to bring a people to Mount Zion as a present to the Name-bearer of Jehovah enthroned there, which no maritime power hath ever done yet, he concluded that the call was to a pre-eminent naval power of the latter days. Providence hath established Britain’s strength to this end. She is exalted among the nations for the work of the time of the end. God hath given her power, skill, gold, and a multitude of large and powerful ships, to be used against the Assyrian, and in the service of Israel and their protectors—Jesus and the Saints. What Hiram was to Solomon, Britain will be to Him who is greater than he. The steam-marine of the latter-day Tyrians trading to Tarshish is the navy prepared of Jehovah for his King. The twelve tribes are his land forces; the ships of Tarshish his marine.

“Swiftly.” The verb leku is used intensively, as, “to go swiftly, to rush;” and comports well with the sort of vessels commonly sent “express” by the overshadowing land.

“Fleet messengers”—mlakim klim, pronounced malakim kallim. The word malahk signifies “one sent” from lahak, he sent; therefore, a messenger; and in Greek, an angelos, a word transferred into English with the loss of the last syllable. The word is in the plural in the text. “Fleet,” kallim, from kahlal, to be swift. The rapidity of the vessels is affirmed of the messengers sent by them. They are to go express, or without unnecessary delay, as the crisis demands energy, promptness, and dispatch.

“To a nation carried away and oppressed,” el goi memusshahk umorat. Boothroyd renders this, “to a nation extended and fierce.” Dr. Lowth has it, “to a nation stretched out in length and smoothed.” The Bishop of Rochester renders it, “unto a nation dragged away and plucked.” James’s translators do better than any of these in the sentence, “to a nation scattered and peeled;” but then they were not satisfied with it, but tried to amend it on the margin by “outspread and polished.” In Robinson’s Gesenius the lexicographer renders goi mmschk umorat, “a people drawn out, or extended, i.

e., tall of stature and naked!” They all agree that a drawing out is the radical idea of memusshahk; but what sort of a drawing out it is, they are not agreed. As we have seen, Dr. Lowth explains it of the stretching out of Egypt along the Nile. He assumed that Egypt was “the land of the winged-cymbal,” exhorted to send the messengers; and by making Egypt also the “nation stretched out”—he makes Egypt send the messengers to itself! Lowth, Boothroyd, Rochester, and the King’s, drawing out or extension, is horizontal; but Gesenius’ is a perpendicular extension, a drawing up instead of a drawing out!

The word is used in several places intensively for taking away, removing, by violence, destroying. “Dragged away” is the sense of the word in the text, as given by Rochester. I have rendered it, carried away, as more in keeping with the scripture expression relative to the same nation, “carried away captive” into “their enemies’ lands.”

A smoothed, plucked, or peeled, nation, to say the least of it, is not euphonious. Dr. Lowth styles his stretched-out nation, “smoothed” in the sense of being clean shaven or made smooth by mud-sediment! But whether smoothed by mud or lather he cannot tell! If the nation were alluded to under the figure of a bird, “plucked,” would very well express the idea of its being stripped of all its glory and left naked. Without hair, beard, or feathers, the nation would doubtless have become as “polished” as shaving and plucking could make it! The King’s translators do not tell us in what other sense it was “polished,” but leave us to our own inferences. I do not see in what sense a nation skinned or peeled can be “polished.” It would certainly not improve its manners. But we must turn from these awkward words, so expressive of the uncertainty of the hermeneutists, and find one more in harmony with the text.

Morat is participle of Pual from mrt, pronounced mahrat, to polish, to sharpen, and to make smooth. It is used in the sense of making the head smooth, or bald, by tearing out the hair in chastisement; or to cause a peeling of the shoulder by bearing heavy burdens. The oppressing of the shoulder results in the peeling off of the skin. Hence a peeled shoulder, and a smoothed and polished head, becomes an oppressed shoulder, and a plucked head. A nation peeled and smoothed, plucked and polished, or moratised, is a torn and oppressed people. The effect of an action is put for the cause of it, so that the figurative sense of morat is really the most literal in regard to the text in hand. I have therefore rendered it by “oppressed,” which accords exactly with the condition of the nation to which the messengers are sent.

Gesenius renders the text, “a people terrible and farther off than he.” In this he renders “wahhahleah,” and farther off, or beyond, as of space; and min-hu, by “than he.” But in this he entirely mistakes the whole matter. The construction is well illustrated by the phrase—mhiom hhua uhlah, pronounced, maihyom hahu wahhahleah, “from that day forward.” The radical idea of hahleah is “to a distance, thither-away,” and may be applied to either time or space. But from what point of time doth the to or thither, the onward, commence? The answer is min-hu—“min” being the preposition from; and “hu,” the demonstrative this. “Hu” points out a definite person or thing already mentioned, or well-known from the context. We may then inquire “from this” what? From the evening-tide destruction of Israel’s Assyrian spoiler by their King; when under his banner “Judah fights at Jerusalem,” and “their governors become like a hearth of fire among the wood, and like a torch of fire in a sheaf; and they shall devour all the people round about on the right hand and on the left—Zechariah 12: 5-6; 14: 14. From this onward, shall Israel be a terror to all their foes; and a protection to all who come under the shadow of His wings, who gives them exaltation over all the nations of the world.

“A nation prostrate and trodden down,” goi kav-kahv umvusahh. The renderings of these words are also various. “A nation meted out and trodden down;” “a nation that meteth out and treadeth down;” “a nation of line, line, and treading under foot;” “a nation meted out by line, and trodden down;” “a nation expecting, expecting, trampled under feet;” “a nation that useth the line, and treadeth down;” and “a nation most mighty.” Surely here are diversities enough to make darkness visible! What a nation this is made to be! Dr. Robinson of New York, the editor of Gesenius, and Professor of Biblical Literature, endorses the idea of its superlative mightiness, while others of equal authority pronounce it to be the weakest of all nations, as meted out and trampled under foot! Who can but laugh, and hold such hermeneutics in derision?

Kav is a noun, and signifies a measuring line. The repetition of the word thus, kav kahv, is intensive, and imports a continued stretching of the measuring line over any thing. “Jehovah hath purposed to destroy the wall of the daughter of Zion: he hath stretched out a line, he hath not withdrawn his hand from destroying.” Thus, to stretch out a line upon a wall indicates its overthrow, that the measuring line may be extended over the levelled site. If the line be employed with reference to a nation, it imports the levelling of that nation, that it may be trampled under foot. A nation intensely lined is one long prostrate, the idea of prostration being necessary to a being trodden under foot. Jerusalem, said the king of Israel, shall be trodden under foot of the nations until their times be fulfilled. She was first levelled; she was then kav-kahved, or lined intensely; and so long as that line is stretched out, she remains prostrate and trodden down. The fortunes of Israel and their city are the same. Facts in relation to both establish the translation I have given.

“Whose land rivers have spoiled.” Rivers overflowing their banks represent invading armies. Speaking of the ten tribes in hostility against Jerusalem and the house of David, Isaiah saith, “Forasmuch as this people

refuseth the waters of Shiloah that go softly, and rejoice in Retzin and Remaliah's son; now therefore, behold, Jehovah bringeth up upon them the waters of the river (Euphrates) strong and many, even the King of Assyria and all his glory; and he shall come up over all his channels, and go over all his banks: and he shall pass through Judah; he shall overflow and go over, he shall reach even to the neck," Jerusalem alone of all the land being the head out of the water. Israel's land has been laid waste by such rivers as these. Daniel predicted a similar inundation which was to overflow the land subsequently to the destruction of the city and temple of Jerusalem that was to happen after the cutting off of the Messiah the prince, and at the Roman invasion: "the end thereof shall be with a flood," which he explains of the inundation of war; for he says, "and until the end of the war desolations are decreed." He also styles the future invasion of the Holy Land by the Russo-Assyrian king of the north an overflowing. There is nothing nourishing in the overflowing of such rivers; but Dr. Lowth's "learned friend" suggested "nourish" as the meaning of bahzeu, which, as it suited his theory of the land being Egypt or Ethiopia which are fertilised by the Nile, he readily adopted, rendering the sentence "whose land the rivers have nourished." Gesenius translates the words asher bahzeu nehahrim aretzu, by "whose land rivers rend, i.e., break up into parts, or divide up. The allusion is to Ethiopia." This is an error; there is no such allusion in the case. The land is Israel's, not Ethiopia; rent, spoiled, or laid waste by the horns of the Gentiles, whose armies have swept over it like floods of mighty streams.

"I will be still (yet in my dwelling-place I will be without fear)." In the common version it reads "I will take my rest, and I will consider in my dwelling-place," or marginally, "regard my set dwelling." The text places the considering person in the dwelling, and at rest there; the margin, makes him exterior to it, and looking at it. A very important difference this, when we come to understand the locality of the dwelling-place. "I will sit still and regard my own abode; I will be to it as the clear heat after rain." This is Dr. Boothroyd's rendering of the words, ashkuth vabith bmkuni kkhm tzk oliaur, pronounced eshkahtah veavbitah vimkoni kekhom tzach alai-or. "I will be to it" are his own words to make what he supposes is the sense. All the translations I have seen make the considerant sitting, not in, but off at a distance, from the dwelling-place; consequently, "the dry heat impending lightning” is made a state of things preceding Jehovah’s entrance into his dwelling-place, instead of, as it really is, a state of the political atmosphere immediately following his entrance, and, for a short time, continuous with his residence there. The atmospheric condition portends a storm about to burst upon “the blossom” and “vine of the earth,” not upon the Lord’s dwelling-place, as Dr. Boothroyd represents.

“I will be still as dry heat impending lightning, as a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest.” This is the quiescence of Jehovah’s Name-bearer, after beating down the Assyrian at eventide, by which he obtains forcible possession of Jerusalem. It is absolute quietude, or cessation from all hostilities, an armistice, as it were, obtaining from the descent to the Mount of Olives, and the commencement of the war between the King of Israel and the papal powers of the Roman West. The words “yet in my dwelling place I will be without fear,” are parenthetical and descriptive of the great King’s perfect security and fearlessness, in the midst of fierce and warlike nations, among whom he has introduced himself “as a thief,” with the intention of spoiling their governments of all their glory, honour, dominion, and wealth. As if he had said, “though I forbear immediately to follow up the victory I have gained in delivering Jerusalem from the Russo-Assyrian Gog, the enemy will be too confounded to rally his forces and lay siege to the city, for its recovery out of my hand. I shall be in it, and hold it without any ground of fear from a threatened renewal of the siege.”

The “dwelling-place” of the fourth verse, is declared in the seventh verse to be “MOUNT ZION, the dwelling-place of the Name of Jehovah of armies.” This mount on which “the city where David dwelt” formerly stood, was selected by Jehovah himself, as the place of residence for his Name in all the Age to Come, termed “for ever.” The few testimonies following will prove this. “The city of David, which is Zion.” Zion, then is not in Sky-Kingdomia, but in Palestine. “Jehovah loveth the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob.” “When the Lord shall build up Zion, he shall appear in his glory.” All people pretending to sanity admit that the Lord has not yet appeared in his glory since this prophecy was written. It is manifest, therefore, that Zion is in an unbuilded condition, that is, in ruins: and seeing that there are no ruins in Sky-Kingdomia, it follows again that the Zion in which the Lord delights, is not there. “The Lord hath chosen Zion; he hath desired it for his habitation. This is my rest for ever; HERE will I dwell; for I have desired it. There will I make the horn (power) of David to bud.”

“Zion shall be redeemed (from the power of the enemy) with judgment:”
“and the redeemed shall come to Zion”—come, not go, to Zion. “Our heart is faint, and our eyes dim, because of the mountain of Zion which is desolate.” “The Lord shall yet comfort Zion.” “I set my King on Zion my holy hill,” “the place of my throne, and the place of the soles of my feet, where I will dwell in the midst of the children of Israel forever.” “Then the moon shall be confounded and the sun ashamed, when Jehovah of armies shall reign in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously.” In view of these testimonies, how forcible and appropriate the exhortation to Israel, “O house of Jacob, come ye, and let us walk in the light of the Lord!”

Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews, at Zion, “still as dry heat impending lightning, as a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest,” is represented in the Apocalypse as “one like the Son of Man sitting upon a white cloud, having on his head a golden crown, and in his hand a sharp sickle”—Revelation 14: 14—or pruning hook. In this cloud scene he has but one crown. It pertains therefore to a time anterior to that in which, in chapter nineteen, he is seen “with many crowns upon his head.” The one crown is David’s, which he wears by inheritance; the “many,” are those he wins from the Beast and kings of the earth whom he overcomes in battle, when he “gathers the clusters of the vine of the earth,” and casts its grapes, fully ripe, “into the great wine-press of the wrath of God.” Jesus, the Redeemer, comes to Zion; at that crisis, “reaps the earth,” in the overthrow of Gog: then, as a dew-cloud, he rests in Zion, awaiting the full ripening of the vine clusters in the Roman West. This “perfecting of the fruit” is accomplished when the acceptance, or rejection, of the trumpet-proclamation to the land of o’ershadowing of wings, and to other lands, has divided them into adverse and friendly nations. As hostile, they are “the Goats;” as friendly, they are “the Sheep” of the Imperial Fold. This division effected, and the Royal Reaper, no longer still as dry heat and a cloud of dew, thrusts in his pruning-hook again, and having reaped the grape-clusters, treads them in the wine-press without the city, that is, beyond the limits of the land.

“Before harvest there shall be a blossom,” liphnai kahtzir yihyeh nitzzah. This blossom is Gog, who aims at establishing a permanent dominion over the east and west. He obtains preadventual possession of Jerusalem, but is unable to retain it in subjection. His ambition blossoms forth with great promise, but he proves eventually unable to bring his schemes of conquest and dominion to perfection. Though laden with thick clay, his blossom will not become even a sour grape; for scarcely doth he appear as a flower in Jehovah’s vineyard, but he is cut off and blown away like chaff before the wind. The ten-horn or toe-kingdoms are not so. They continue to flourish on the earth’s vine, first as blossoms, then as sour grapes, and lastly, as grapes fully ripe, and fit for the wine-press without the city. They are trodden at vintage-time; but the pre-eminent blossom is cut off “before harvest” “as vine-shoots by pruning-hooks, and luxuriant twigs are lopped away.”

“At that time.”—At evening time, and subsequently to the King of Israel’s victory over Gog, and over “the Beast, False Prophet, and Kings of the earth, and their armies.” The nations in arms being subdued under Israel—Psalm 47: 3, their hosts will no longer need to be detained in foreign parts. The time will have therefore come to give them rest from war; and to transport their victorious armies into their native land, that they may be disbanded there, and “settled after their old estates”—Ezekiel 36: 11. The steamships of the land of overshadowing of wings will be in great request for this service, which will be willingly and joyfully rendered. Hence, Israel’s eventide return to their fatherland, by this agency, is termed the diligent conveyance of “a present to Jehovah of armies.” Those of the scattered nation that are inaccessible to ships, will be brought home by the usual means of transportation by land. This present brought by sea and land to Mount Zion is termed by the prophet “an offering unto Jehovah out of all nations.” His words are, “They shall bring all your brethren, an offering unto Jehovah out of all nations upon horses, and chariots, and litter vehicles, and upon mules, and dromedaries, to my holy mountain Jerusalem, as the children of Israel bring the offering in a clean vessel to the house of Jehovah”—Isaiah 66: 20.

This “present” is not brought before the return of Jesus, the bearer of Jehovah’s name, from the right hand of power. It cannot be brought until he becomes “Jehovah of armies,” and is enthroned in Zion; for it is brought by strong nations as an offering to him dwelling in Zion. Were all Israel now sent back to Palestine by existing powers, their restoration would be no offered present to the Jehovah-name, because Zion is not yet the actual abode of Jehovah-Jesus. The “present” will be freely offered, because the offerers will have come to the recognition of the true nature of things. Jesus, whose prophetic name is “JEHOVAH our righteousness”—Jeremiah 23: 6, will have convinced them of his power, and right to the world’s allegiance, by his skill and prowess in arms. The south will no longer keep back, nor the north refuse to give up; for the Dragon, and the Beast, the False Prophet, and the Kings, with all the armies that now give effect to their wickedness, will have been destroyed; and all obstacles to the full return of Israel from the four winds of heaven, completely removed. “They shall bring my sons from far, saith God, and my daughters from the ends of the earth; every one that is called by my name: for I have created Israel for my glory”—Isaiah 43: 1, 6-7.

But before the free-will offering of this present of Israel to their King by the nations no longer hostile, and before Zion is delivered of the man-child, Palestine will be occupied by a Jewish population, respectable for numbers, industry, and wealth. This is evident from the following testimony: “In the latter years, O Gog, thou shalt come into the land brought back from the sword and gathered out of many people, against the mountains of Israel, which were (asher-hahyu) for desolation continually: but is brought forth out of the nations, and they dwell safely all of them.” “Thou shalt come up against my people of Israel as a cloud to cover the land; it shall be in the latter days, and I will bring thee against my land, that the nations may know me, when I shall be glorified in thee, O Gog, before their eyes.” This proves a partial return before Gog’s invasion. The following text shows their prosperity in their land before he disturbs their peace. Jehovah addressing himself to Gog says, “Thou shalt think an evil thought; and shall say, I will go up to the land of unwalled villages; I will go to them that are at rest, that dwell safely all of them dwelling without walls, and having neither bars nor gates, to take a spoil and to take a prey; to turn thine hand upon the desolate *places now inhabited, and upon the people gathered out of the nations, who have gotten cattle and goods, that dwell in the midst of the land.” He accordingly invades Palestine with a mighty army; and that this invasion precedes the appearing of Jesus in Zion is clear from the consideration, that the invasion of God’s unoffending people is made the occasion of that appearing: as it is written, “And it shall be at the same time when Gog shall come against the land of Israel, saith the Lord God, that my fury shall come up in my face * * * and there shall be a great shaking in the land of Israel * * * and all the men that are upon the face of the land, shall shake at my presence, and the mountains shall be hurled over, and the towers shall fall * * * and I will call for a sword against him throughout all my mountains; and I will plead against him with pestilence and with blood; and I will rain upon him, and upon his bands, and upon the many peoples that are with him, an overflowing rain, and great hailstones, fire, and brimstone. Thus will I magnify myself and sanctify myself; and I will be known in the eyes of many nations, and they shall know that I Jehovah—Ezekiel 38—am Jesus, bearing the name. And I will turn thee back, and leave but the sixth part of thee. Thou shalt fall on the mountains of Israel, and upon the open field: and I will give thee to the ravenous birds of every sort, and to the beasts of the field to be devoured”—“a great sacrifice upon the mountains of Israel, that they may eat flesh and drink blood.” Thus falls the blossom from the vine. Sudden destruction at evening-tide descends in storm and tempest, and sweeps him as mountain-chaff or stubble before the blast. Thus Zion is redeemed with judgment. Prostrate under the heel of the Autocrat; and none of all her children to draw a sword for her deliverance; her voice is stifled by the throat-grip of the destroyer. She hath no strength to give birth to a deliverer; and nought seems to impend but the final extinction of all her hopes! But what doth the prophet hear at this crisis of her fate? “A voice of noise from the city, a voice from the temple, a voice of Jehovah that rendereth recompense to his enemies!” “Jehovah roaring out of Zion, and uttering his voice from Jerusalem. And the heavens and the earth shall shake; but he will be the hope of his people, and the strength of the children of Israel. So shall ye know that I Jehovah your God am dwelling in Zion, my holy mountain: then shall Jerusalem be holy; and there shall no strangers pass through her any more”—Joel 3: 16. Thus, “before Zion travailed she brought forth; before her pain came, she produced a male,” even a man of*

Much more might be added upon the things brought out in this article, but we must forbear for the present. If the reader will make himself acquainted with what has been exhibited, it will help considerably to the understanding of a class of prophecies pertaining to the epoch of the Kingdom's establishment whose import does not appear as yet to those even who are supposed to be considerably advanced in prophetic lore. New-translationists and hermeneutists will of course be grateful to us for the labour we have bestowed upon their particular branches; so that we may reasonably expect that when they favour the public with their forthcoming "improved version" our translation of this remarkable and interesting prophecy will figure upon the pages of their edition! Be this as it may, I have satisfaction of knowing that I have given an intelligible and scriptural exposition of a prophecy which has confessedly completely foiled the wisest, best, and learnedest of their scribes. This may be considered "ostentatiousness" by those who have too little assurance of faith to speak with certainty upon anything. Never mind. Paul gloried in his weakness; and so do we. If one so weak as our stupid self can make "the most difficult passage of Isaiah" so intelligible and plain, how blind must they be, who with all their classical, theological, hermeneutic, erudition, and "logic," can give no better sense to this portion of the word than the translators so often named in this! So true is it, that "God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise." This is his wisdom; and "wisdom is justified of all her children," when the wisdom of the world's wise ones shall be shown to all nations to have been nothing more than "vanity and vexation of spirit."

THE MOSLEM EMPIRE.

The Euphrates is the name of the river indicated as the eastern boundary of the land promised to Abraham and his seed, i.e., to the Christ and all, individually and nationally, constitutionally "one in him." It is termed by eminence "The River," being the most conspicuous, politically, of all the Bible rivers, not excepting the Jordan. It was the eastern boundary of the Roman Empire, and for a considerable period before the fate of its Greek Dynasty, the dividing line between it and the Turks. During this time the Catholics, subject to Constantinople and Rome, were in an excessively corrupt state, "worshipping demons, and idols of gold and silver, and brass, and stone, and of wood: which can neither see, nor hear, nor walk." This is the language of Scripture as descriptive of the Catholic adoration of saints and images west of the Euphrates. The Turks despised it, and rightly designated the Greeks and Italians as "idolaters." The Turks were ferocious, but more rational in their creed, adopting the one article of the unity of God, and the divine mission of Mahomet. There can be no doubt that both they and their predecessors, the Saracens, were the sword of God upon the idolaters of the eastern Roman empire. The Saracens "tormented" its citizens; while the Turks extinguished their independence and abolished their sovereignty, or, in Scripture style, "slew the third part of men." Beyond the limits of this third part they were never able permanently to establish their dominion. They made inroads upon their Popish neighbours, even to the gates of Vienna, and inflicted upon them terrible vengeance; but, saith the Scripture, "They repented not of their murders, nor of their sorceries, nor of their fornication, nor of their thefts." The Papists still continued to murder the saints, slaying, with indiscriminate massacre, men and women, and their unoffending offspring. The incantations, adultery, and thievery of the priests were unmitigated. The judgment of God made no salutary impression upon them, so that what they were at the fall of Constantinople they continue at this day. "They repented not of their works."

The Turks were a much more honest, dignified, and spiritual people than the Catholics, Greek or Latin; for it is more, far more, spiritual to believe in only one God, than to adore thousands of dead men and women, and to receive with implicit faith the absurd fables of the Romish priesthood. The Turks were ignorant and barbarous; but the Catholics were ignorant and excessively vicious: hence God appointed the barbarous to chastise the criminal. The Turks were, therefore, his messengers, or “angels”—apocalyptically; whom he sent against the Greco-Roman empire to extinguish it in a third of its extent. There were “four” sultanies of them, whose people for an appointed time were limited to the east bank of the Euphrates. This is expressed by the words, “the four angels confined by the great river Euphrates”—Revelation 9: 14. It was the western confine of the Moslem empire, whose capital was at Baghdad, where Togrul Beg was inaugurated its secular chief Dzoulcad 10th, A. H., 448, corresponding to January 18, 1057. The forces of the empire, which were chiefly cavalry, continued within their bounds till April 29, 1063, when Alp Arslan, “the Valiant Lion,” with a great army crossed the Euphrates, and invaded the Roman empire. This was the commencement of the sounding of the sixth trumpet, or that of the Second Woe; and is signalled in the prophecy by the command, “Loose the Four Angels which are confined by the great river Euphrates.”

Prophetic arithmetic is corrected by time and its peculiar events. The loosing of the Turks against the object of their vengeance, has generally been fixed at the taking of Constantinople, May 29, 1453: and their preparation consequently as expiring with the recovery of that city out of their hands, “an hour, a day, a month, and a year” afterwards. Upon this hypothesis, Constantinople ought to have fallen on June 29, 1844. But it did not: therefore the preparation cannot have referred to the interval between May 29, 1453 and June 29, 1844; consequently the loosing must have belonged to a former epoch. It is remarkable, however, that Moslem religious despotism was enthroned in Constantinople May 29, 1453, and in 391 years and 30 days after, or June 29, 1844, religious liberty was restored there, at the instance of England, France, and Russia. This was a shadow of coming events; but not the loosing of the text.

On reference to the original, I perceive that the loosing, and not the preparation, was for 391 years and 30 days. The words are—elutheesan hoi tessares angeloï hoi eetoïmasmenoi eis teen hooran, &c. —that is, “the four prepared angels were loosed for an hour,” &c. The preparation of the “angels” preceded their loosing; and consisted in the organization of the Moslem empire under Togrul Beg. Six years afterwards the loosing was decreed by a successor, Alp Arslan, the renowned. The binding of the Turks or Moslems being the restriction of their empire to the Euphrates; the loosing of them for a period consisted in their advancing their dominion westward until the time indicated should expire, when they would be confined, bound, or restricted, to a new western frontier. They may, therefore, be said to be bound at this time by the Danube and the Save, beyond which their dominion does not extend; but not by the Euphrates, because it stretches beyond.

The period of their advance into the Roman empire was “for an hour, a day, a month, and a time.” At the end of this the extinction of the third part of that dominion would be effected. This implied the capture of Constantinople, because until that was accomplished the third part was not slain; for that city is the throne of the third part. I see no reason to question the accuracy of the conclusion arrived at respecting the above symbol being equal to 391 years and 30 days. An eniautos is that which returns upon itself; enos is a year. I have rendered the former eniautos, by “a time,” or revolution. A month of this revolution of time would be a twelfth part; a day, a three hundred and sixtieth part; and an hour, the twelfth part of this. Now, the career of the Moslems shows that the revolution, or “time,” could not have been less than 360 years, because their empire continued to advance. This being the greatest whole number, the month, day, and hour, are fractions of it; so that the statement will stand thus:

A Time,	360 years.
A Month, or twelfth of a Time,	30 years.
A Day, or a three hundred and sixtieth of a Time,	1 year.
An Hour, or a twelfth of a day	0 30 days.
	391 years 30 days.

History confirms the accuracy of this computation. Alp Arslan, as I have said, invaded the Catholic empire A.D.1063. He and his successors continued their encroachments during 391 years and 30 days, which includes the capture of Constantinople, by Mahmoud II. With the fall of the Greek empire the progress of the Moslems was stayed and their loosing accomplished they were a river overflowing its banks, and sweeping everything before it, until it attained its highest level. What name, then, could more fitly designate this Moslem inundation than "Euphrates," the former boundary of their empire, and arising in the territory they now possess? None. Their power and dominion are therefore styled "the great river Euphrates," whose subsidence within its banks is the result of the outpouring of the sixth vial.

The second woe-trumpet period ended with the ascription of "glory to the God of heaven," by the French nation, which abolished the Catholic superstition, November 10, 1793; proclaimed justice and integrity the order of the day, March 22, 1794; acknowledged the existence of the Supreme Being, May 7; and celebrated a festival to his honour and glory, June 8th, of the same year: so that the conquest of the Eastern empire by the monotheist Moslems, and their wars upon "The Holy Roman Empire" of the West, together with the terrible, but righteous, severity of the Robespierrians upon the king, nobles, and priests of France, the murderers of God's saints by thousands, were judgments upon the paganised Catholics, of the Beast and Dragon territories, that extorted glory to the God of heaven in the very temples of the guardian demons themselves. The churches, dedicated to dead men's ghosts, were converted into Mosques, and a rational recognition of the one God; for the Moslems and Republicans of France were, in fact, brethren in respect of the unity of God, and a hatred of the Catholic idolatry of Rome.

The Holy Roman or Papal Empire was then between two destroyers, or swords of God; the Moslems on the southeast, and the French Republicans on the north and west. Belgium, Catholic Germany, Italy, and the Spanish peninsula, "repented not of their deeds." Vengeance, therefore, having been duly executed on the incorrigible in France, the lower orders, or mob, in fact, being raised to power, became the messengers or apocalyptic "angels" of the first, third, fourth, and fifth vials, to slay multitudes of the blasphemous of the Beast's kingdom. Napoleon, a man of the people, a mere upstart, or parvenu, without any sovereign or aristocratic alliances, became the military chief of the republicans—a tyrant, indeed, but necessarily so, considering the work of death it was his mission to execute. He gave the slayers of God’s saints and prophets “blood to drink;” he scorched them with fire; and filled their kingdom with darkness. Still “they blasphemed the name of God which had power over the plagues; and repented not to give him glory.” This was the moral condition in which the cessation of war left the Beast territory in 1815. France had returned to its old idolatry, whose Catholicism seemed to be more firmly established than ever, the sword of Russia being thrown into the scale on the side of the devils and the idols—Revelation 9: 20.

But “judgment” is to be “given to the Saints;” who shall not only “punish the goats,” but make all nations repent of their deeds, and give glory to the God of heaven. To bring about this crisis, which involves the annihilation of Greek and Italian Catholic idolatry, it is necessary to “dry up the water of the great river Euphrates”—that is, to abolish the Moslem empire. So long as this continues to occupy the throne and territory of the Dragon, the Gentiles cannot assemble themselves, and come up to the Valley of Jehoshaphat, to encounter Jehovah’s Mighty Ones, that these may plead with them there for His people; and his heritage Israel, whom they have scattered among the nations, and parted His land—Joel 3: 11-12, 2. So long as the Moslem rules in Constantinople, and his rights of conquest over Palestine are respected by powers stronger than he, “the hour of judgment” cannot be struck. It is the end, therefore, of the sixth vial, to open the way for the nations of the sea and land Beast dominions, to go up to Jerusalem, to encounter—they know not what—a terrible overthrow by the King of Israel entering upon the possession of his Holy City.

But there must be something in connection with that city to allure them on against her. This something is at this very time in its formative state. The absurd superstition of the Greeks and Latins in respect to the Holy Places at Jerusalem, is the embryo being developed by France and Russia into the giant Nebuchadnezzar saw in his dream. France championises the Latin idolatry of the West; and Russia, the Greek idolatry of the East. In this question, France appears to supplant Austria, the confidential and intimate ally of Rome. But Austria is too near a neighbour, and too dependent upon Russia, to antagonise Russia on “the Eastern question.” Providence has, therefore, raised up a horn in Paris, whose policy shall accomplish that which the neutralising influence of Russia prevents Austria from undertaking in favour of its own idolatry. Austria can leave the championship of Papal interests in Jerusalem to Napoleon III without jealousy, being promised important acquisitions of Moslem territory, and being pretty sure that when the time comes, the combined forces of Russia, Austria, and the kingdoms of the West, will be able and willing to destroy the French empire, and to reduce France to the state of a Bourbon monarchy.

The policy of France—the Frog-Power—has created the embarrassment about the Holy Places in Jerusalem. It has obtained a decree for the Latin idolatry, which gives great offence to Nicholas of Russia, the Head of the Greek superstition; and has caused him to send a very threatening and imposing embassy to Constantinople, in behalf of the interests of his Church. The poor Sultan is thus placed in the utmost perplexity. If he yield to the imperiousness of Russia, he will offend France; and if he remain firm to the Latin interests, he will offend Russia, and Austria, its ally, between whom all rivalry is abandoned. But as these two powers are known to covet possession of Turkey itself, this may determine the Sultan to throw himself upon the protection of France and England, and so bring on war, unless it can be staved off for the present by these powers abandoning Turkey to its fate, and agreeing with Russia and Austria to divide the spoil; England taking Egypt, Syria and Palestine; France, Morocco; Russia, Moldavia, Wallachia, Bulgaria, Thrace, Constantinople, and Asia Minor; and Austria, Bosnia, Servia, Albania, and Macedonia. This arrangement would open the way for a more active settlement of Palestine by Jews under British protection, with some provisional arrangement respecting the Holy Places; for whatever is done can only be provisional. The Eastern Question cannot be settled by the powers of the world. None can solve it but “the Man at Jehovah’s right hand, whom he hath made strong for himself.” It will, therefore, always be a cause of embarrassment, and, at length, of ruin, to the powers that burden themselves with it. But, it is hardly probable that this provisional arrangement can be effected without war. The Moslem will scarcely surrender his throne and territory without a struggle; and in that event, France and England will certainly not be inactive spectators of the drying up of the dominion of the Ottoman over the territories I have named.

The mission of the sixth angel to the accomplishment of these events is thus expressed: “And he poured out his vial upon the great river Euphrates: and the water thereof was dried up, to the end that the way of the kings of the risings of the sun might be prepared.” The agency in the preparation of this way, now manifestly at work, is then described in the next verse in the following words: “And I saw three unclean spirits, resembling frogs, issuing from the mouth of the Dragon, and from the mouth of the Beast, and from the mouth of the False Prophet: for they are the spirits of demons, manifesting signs, which go forth to the kings of the earth, and of the whole habitable to assemble them to the war of that great day of God the almighty.” It is easily discerned by those who observe the course of events, that the present situation of affairs is referable to French policy at Constantinople. It has involved the Moslem government in a dilemma from which it does not know how to deliver itself. The Moslem policy is therefore the creation of the French power, and hence resembling, or bearing the impression of, the frog-spirit. As I have often said before, the mission of the Frog-power is to create an imbroglio, which shall necessitate the unsheathing of the sword by way of preparation for the end. That end is declared in the reason assigned for the drying up of the Euphratean dominion—that the way of the kings of the risings of the sun may be prepared; that is, that the crisis may be formed in which Christ and his saints shall appear as unexpectedly as a thief in the night: for in the next verse he says, “Behold I come as a thief;” that is, to take part with my associate kings in the war of that great day of God the almighty. The signs being manifested by the Frog-generated policy of Austria, Turkey, and the Pope, in its bearing upon Russia, England, Prussia, &c., are the signs of the times manifesting for the benefit of those who understand and believe the word of the kingdom. “The wise shall understand, but none of the wicked shall.” Let the faithful then “watch;” for when the war against the Moslem breaks forth to the complete evaporation of his dominion, it comes as a storm from the north, sounding in the expectant’s ear, “Behold, I come as a thief! Blessed is he that watches, and keeps his garments.” Russia’s mission is to subvert the Ottoman dominion; and to lead the Catholic idolaters of the East and West, who repent not of their deeds, against Jerusalem; that they may there receive an overthrow from “the kings of the east,” which shall inaugurate that judgment which shall sit when the books shall be opened, and the time comes for the saints to possess themselves of the kingdom under the whole heaven. For “the king of the north shall come against him (the Moslem) like a whirlwind, with chariots, and with horsemen, and with many ships; and he shall enter into the countries, and shall overflow, and pass over. He shall enter also into the glorious land (Palestine), and many countries shall be overthrown; and the land of Egypt shall not escape”—Daniel 11: 40-42. Such is the crisis the Frogs are creating for the world; and such is the beginning of the solution of the vexed question of the East.

This, then being our views of things, we are not surprised at the announcement contained in an article which has recently appeared in an English weekly journal. We have been long anxiously desiring the partition of Turkey, as a sure indication of the appearance of the Lord in Zion soon. It is evidently approaching, as the following leading article from the aforesaid paper goes to show.

PROPOSED PARTITION OF TURKEY.

“It is now admitted as a settled fact, that Turkey is to fall, sooner or later; and the question, how will the territory be disposed of, becomes a subject of anxiety for the statesmen of most countries. Our own statesmen do not appear at all provided for the contingency, though it is not unforeseen. Lord John Russell speaks of the event as calculated to occasion ‘a war in Europe,’ through the pretensions which a certain potentate will put forth, and which would be incompatible with the interests of the other states, or with ‘the balance of power’ in Europe. It is understood that this apprehension points at Russia. The Journal des Débats speaks of the same event as certain, and draws attention to a very curious memoir recently published in the Augsburg Gazette, although written so long ago as February, 1850, three years back. Whatever may be the authorship of the paper, it evidently speaks Austrian sentiments, and, as our French contemporary remarks, it casts no untimely light on the recent movements of Francis Joseph in Turkey.

“The memoir represents that the circumstances have changed with Turkey since 1815, and even since 1840-1, when it was the joint resolution of Europe that Turkey should be maintained. The victory of Austrian and Russian arms in Hungary has altered the relations of races, and has established the predominancy of the Slaves. The revolutionists in 1848 contemplated a federation, under German and Magyar influences, which should open the path of commerce to the Black Sea; but the same end can now be better attained by a readjustment which shall elevate the Slaves of Turkey to their true position. The population of Turkey comprises 11,500,000 Christians (with a very slight admixture of Jews), and 2,900,000 Mussulmans. The status quo is no longer maintainable. Of the Christian territory Austria and Russia are the ‘heirs;’ and while Servia and Macedonia may go to Austria, with Salonica, the rest may fall to Russia, with Constantinople and the Dardanelles. Such are the views put forth in the Austrian Memoir; and a magnificent scheme of railways and colonisation is sketched out, which shall render this region a mine of wealth for Austria and Russia, and for commerce in general. The coincidence of this Memoir with the actual proceedings of Turkey, its publication in the Augsburg Gazette, and the suggestion that Austria and Russia, ceasing their rivalry, should divide that which each can prevent the other from taking to itself entirely, impart to this Note a special interest at the present day.

“The Journal des Débats remarks the air of ‘discouragement’ which characterised Lord John Russell’s speech last week in reply to Lord Dudley Stuart’s question. In 1840 England took arms to reduce Mohammed Ali, in order to sustain the Porte, and was all fire to defend ‘the integrity of the Ottoman Empire;’ even in 1850, when the Sultan was menaced by Austria and Russia, an English fleet advanced into the Dardanelles to defend him, violating a treaty for the purpose; but now, says our Parisian contemporary, that article of faith has become no more than a question of time, and Lord John Russell guarantees the duration of peace only for a little while.

“Thus in Vienna, in Paris, and in London, the extinction of the Ottoman Empire is set down as an event to be anticipated at no distant date; but as the Parisian writer says, the ‘annexation’ of Constantinople is an European question, and all precedents since 1815—Greece, Belgium, the Danish succession, &c. —dictate the rule, that such new dispositions must be effected by the joint consent of all Europe.

“In form this last averment is correct; in spirit and true force it presents but half the truth. It is true, as the Note represents, that 20,000 men stationed at the Bosphorus could better sustain the power of Russia in Southern Europe than 100,000 on the mouth of the Danube; it is not less true that the same effective guard could close the Dardanelles against European trade, cut off England and her 3,000,000 L. of commerce from Trebisonde, and destroy the commerce that a million of pushing Greeks are carrying on as our middlemen—taking our goods and supplying us with grain. Austria, who must play second to Russia, may find it compatible with her judgment to give the South-eastern gate of Europe to Russia, who already possesses the North-eastern; but how would Western Europe consent? Already Russia is intriguing to ‘annex’ Sweden and Norway, and to reduce Denmark to the position of a vassal, thus gaining the North-western gate; her next step would be to aim at the Pillars of Hercules, and to strive for possession of the fourth gate. But even short of that she would not long hence, have it in her power to give or to withhold from Western Europe, the trade of the Baltic and of the Euxine, making the ports of Northern Germany await her pleasure, and holding the keys of the great granaries of Europe, from Dantzic to Odessa.

“All these ulterior consequences are involved, and not remotely in the proposal of the Memoir to recognise Austria and Russia as the ‘heirs’ of Turkey; and it is for Englishmen to say whether they will passively witness a progressive assault, not only upon the liberties, but upon the commerce of the West. We do not perceive in Lord John Russell’s language that air of ‘discouragement’ which the French writer imagines—rather the reverse. We suppose that the leader of the House of Commons spoke under a perhaps overweening sense of the unpopularity which has clung amid our trading classes to the bare idea of ‘a war in Europe;’ but even the utterance of the words is an advance in the direction of boldness; and now that trade itself is manifestly at stake, the timidity of the trading spirit may be overcome; for the timidest of creatures will be bold in defence of that which it loves.

“The one doubtful point to us in Lord John Russell’s suggestive fragment of an explanation, is the apparent reliance on ‘France,’ meaning Napoleon the Third. Most assuredly, in the event of an European war, that personage would take the side that appeared most likely to win; and as England is so hesitating in the approach to war, at the commencement he might be most attracted by boastful offers of alliance from Austria and Russia.

“If England possess a man equal to her fame and to the juncture, she will find a bold position the easiest and the safest. There are other parties to be consulted besides the two great Emperors, who profess to be the ‘heirs’ of the monarch they are going to destroy. If England perseveres as she has done, in sticking to red tape and treaties, while negotiating with powers that uphold red tape and treaties for their own ends, and use arms and force to break these treaties when they please, she will merely give up Turkey to the ‘heirs’ who seek to consummate their inheritance à la Macbeth. But if she desires to keep open the South-eastern gate of Europe, there is still a way, though there is no time to be lost. Russia and Austria have been busy in cajoling the Servians and Montenegrins, the Bosniacs and Wallacs; and England seems to have retreated from communication with those peoples; while France is attitudinising at Constantinople, or turning her attention, for her own ends, towards the southern shores of the Euzine. But the Slaves of Turkey still have a will of their own; and if a powerful voice asked them, 'Will you be free and independent?' we believe that they would rise up, in valley and mountain, and would be a federal nation, as bold to assert their independence as the Circassians. The Federation of the Danube has all but existed: if it did, the question of the Dardanelles would be solved, and the path of English commerce would be free to Northern Asia and to India."—

The Leader.

FOUNDATION OF THE WORLD'S RELIGION.

The editor of the Richmond Times discourses to his readers, concerning a certain English historian in the following terms: —

“It is generally believed that the celebrated David Hume, not only disbelieved the truth of Christian Revelation, but likewise the existence of the soul after death, or of any living and intelligent principle independent of the body. There are many portions of his writings which justify this opinion; but yet the following beautiful extract from the conclusion of one of his Essays, would lead us to believe that, however blind he might have been to the divine claims of the bible, he was not without the elevating belief in the immortality of the soul, without which all religion would disappear from the earth:

Art copies only the outside of nature, despairing to reach that grandeur and magnificence which are so astonishing in the masterly works of her original. Can we then be so blind as not to discover an intelligence and a design in the exquisite and most stupendous contrivance of the universe? Can we then be so stupid as not to feel the warmest raptures of worship and adoration upon the contemplation of that intelligent Being, so infinitely good and wise? The most perfect happiness surely must arise from the contemplation of the most perfect object. But what more perfect than beauty and virtue? And where is beauty to be found equal to that of the universe, or virtue which can be compared to the veneration and justice of Deity? If aught can diminish the pleasures of this contemplation, it must be either the narrowness of our faculties, which conceals from us the greatest part of those beauties and perfections, or the shortness of our lives, which allows not time sufficient to instruct us in them. But it is our comfort that if we employ worthily the faculties here assigned us, they will be enlarged in another state of existence, so as to render us more suitable worshippers of our Maker; and that the task, which can never be finished in time, will be the business of an eternity.”

As far as we are concerned it is a matter of no importance whether David Hume believed the Immortality of the Soul, or not: he did not believe the gospel, and therefore cannot be saved. We notice the above only because of the editor's observation that "He was not without the elevating belief in the immortality of the soul, without which all religion would disappear from the earth." If he had said all superstition instead of "all religion" we could have heartily assented to the proposition; for the "religion" of the world begins and ends in that absurd and ridiculous dogma of pagan philosophy. As to its being an elevating belief we by no means discern the proof of it in the conduct and conversation of those who profess it. Pagans, Mohammedans, Papists and Protestants all believe it; but it fails to elevate them above "the wisdom from beneath—which is earthly, sensual, and devilish," as the apostle saith.

WHY ISRAELITES WERE FORBIDDEN TO SHAVE.

“From the singular account Herodotus gives of the worship and costume of the Arabians of Jenysus, it seems they must have been an isolated remnant of the Emim. * They worshipped Dionysus (Osiris) under the name of Orotal, and Urania (Astarte) under the name of Alilat; and “cut away their hair all round, shaving it off the temples;” assigning as a reason for this practice, that their god was so shaved.

* “The Emim—‘the terrible people!’ Such is the name by which the descendants of Lot designated the powerful, hospitable, and brave, but Efeared nation, in whose land their father had taken up his abode. But they called themselves “the children of Sheth,” or, according to the Hebrew form that designates their land, Shittim; and from the perfect correspondence of this form with the Shetta of Egyptian monuments proved to be identical with the tribe of Rephaim, known in Scripture as the Bible.”

Now it is a peculiarity of national costume, which I have found without an exception, characteristic of all those monumental people whom I have been able to trace to the Rephaim by means of their cities and names—that they all shave some part of the head, or beard, or both; and though each tribe does this after a fashion of its own, yet, in one particular, they all agree; they all shave the temples and side of the beard. Their Aramean and Horite-Edomite dependants, and their Amorite neighbours, on the contrary, always appear with their beard entire, and their hair long and carefully trimmed.

We further learn from the Egyptian sculptures, that the particular practice of “cutting away the hair all round, and shaving it off the temples,” was characteristic of the SHET-TA. Among the chiefs represented as hastening in magnificently accoutred war-chariots, to aid the city ATESH against Ramses II, some are conspicuous by a coiffure corresponding with remarkable exactitude to the above description. None of their hair is left but a round patch on the top of the skull; and that is tied up into a tuft, like the scalp-lock of an American Indian, or twisted into a long plaited braid, like a Chinese pigtail. If this be the way the god Orotal used to shave for a pattern, we cannot commend his taste; but the pious reverence of the Amalekites for the divine origin of this hideous fashion probably led them to think it very becoming.

The head attire of the SHET-TA of ATESH in the battle-scene of Set-Menephtah, at Harnak, and that of the captive chief in the symbolical group of that king devoting his enemies to destruction, presents a striking contrast to the one described above; and there, the intention of imitating the coiffure of their god is manifest, by comparing it with the effigies of Astarte on some of their sacred utensils. They wore a long thick braid of hair, on each side of the face, behind the ear; and the back hair is long, hanging down like that of a woman; it may perhaps be, to follow up this strange religious manifestation, that they shaved their beards, or clipped it exceedingly short. While other branches of the Rapha nation proclaimed their allegiance to the tutelary god of their land, by the crest of their helmets, the SHET-TA carried out the same idea by their mode of tonsure, as they wore no helmets.

If we now bear in mind that it was in the land of this people that the children of Israel spent thirty-eight years of probation, in the great and terrible wilderness of Paran and Seir, in constant communication with the Edomite and Midianite tribes domesticated among them, we shall then apprehend the full significance of the prohibition given in Leviticus 19: 27, in terms precisely equivalent to those by which Herodotus describes the practice of their descendants, the Jenysite Arabians. "Ye shall not round off the corners of your heads, neither shall ye destroy the corners of your beards." Since this practice, as explained by Herodotus, and confirmed by the religious badges and emblems depicted on the Egyptian sculptures, was a distinctive outward token of this idolatrous people's worship and nationality, its adoption, by an Israelite, would of course be regarded as equivalent to an open declaration of religious and national apostasy."—Journal of Sacred Literature, pp. 65-66.

PAMPHLETS RECEIVED.

POPERY AS IT WAS IN THE MIDDLE AGES; AND AS IT IS IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. By John Thomas, Senr., Dubuque, Iowa. —This is a pamphlet of 44 pages, published by my father as his protest against the “Mystery of Iniquity” in the Valley of the Mississippi. Popery assumes an impudent bearing in Dubuque, where the craven-hearted Protestants are perfectly crest-fallen in its accursed presence. Nearly, if not quite all, of their “helps” are Papists; so that the evil eyes of the priests, through them, spy out all their domestic affairs, and familiarise their children with the idolatry of the Queen of Heaven. It is to be hoped that this pamphlet will arouse some of them from their slumbers, and cause them to free themselves from the espionage of the confessional which is evil, and tends only to evil, and that continually. The author, who has passed his three-score years and ten, has written well, and produced a pamphlet that will doubtless add much to the information of those among whom the viper is warming to life.

THE COMING STRUGGLE AMONG THE NATIONS OF THE EARTH: or the Political Events of the next fifteen years described in accordance with prophecies in Ezekiel, Daniel, and the Apocalypse: showing also, the important position Britain will occupy during and at the end of the awful conflict. ANONYMOUS. 32 pages. —This is published in London. Fifty-five thousand have been sold. On the fifth page the author says, “Dr. Thomas, of America, was the first to find the key, and they who have read his book, (Elpis Israel,) will at once be able to understand the following description of the period given. For the sake, however, of those who have not seen Dr. Thomas’s work—and we believe this applies to the majority of general readers—it will be necessary to give a rapid and connected sketch of the prophecy on which the whole hangs, and point out the errors into which former interpreters have fallen.” The substance of the pamphlet may be found spread out on the pages of the third part of Elpis Israel.

THE NEW JERUSALEM EXPLAINED.

“I will write upon him that overcomes the name of New Jerusalem, the city of my God.”— Jesus.

Referring to Revelation 22: 2, 15, a correspondent inquires, “Now, provided the Sin-power be destroyed, and we have all the blessings described in the fourth verse of the chapter before, why do we need the Tree of Life; and why are dogs, sorcerers, &c., said to be without?”

The direct answer to this is, that we have no need; and that dogs, and sorcerers, do not then exist without. This answer, however, is on the hypothesis that “the Sin-power is destroyed,” and that “the blessings” indicated in Revelation 21: 4, are possessed by all the dwellers upon earth, when “the throne of God and of the Lamb” exists in the Age to Come.

But this hypothesis cannot be sustained. The Sin-power is not destroyed until a thousand years after the appearing of the Son of Man in power. It is bruised and chained at his appearing, but not destroyed; as is evident from the prediction that, “when the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison, and shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, the Gog and the Magog, to gather them together for war; the number being as the sand of the sea.”

“The blessings” referred to are postmillennial. It is true, however, that the saints who possess the kingdom will enjoy those blessings during the thousand years. But then Revelation 21: 4, is not the passage that predicts their consolation. The prophecy relating to them reads thus—“I beheld,” says John, “and lo, a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kingdoms, and people, and tongues, stood before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands: and they cried with a loud voice saying, ‘The salvation (be ascribed) to him who sits upon the throne of our God, even to the Lamb!’ These are they that came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. Therefore are they before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in his temple; and he that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them. They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat. For the Lamb who is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes”—Revelation 7: 9-17. This multitude, whose representative number is 144,000, and their representative measure 12,000 furlongs square about, 12,000 furlongs high, and walled in by an altitude of 144 cubits, are the gold, and silver, and precious stones, tried in the fire, of whom Paul speaks in part in 1 Corinthians 3: 12, as “built upon the foundation of apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner”—Ephesians 2: 20—“a living stone, chosen of God, and precious” to them that believe—1 Peter 2: 4, 7. These are the Lord’s in that day when he makes up his jewels—Malachi 3: 17—the sapphires, agates, carbuncles, and pleasant stones—the children of Jerusalem in her exaltation—Isaiah 54: 11-13, who is the mother of them all—Galatians 4: 26.

These sons and daughters of faith and tribulation are those, who, in the days of their probation, love Jerusalem, and believe the “glorious things God has spoken” concerning her. Believing these promises, they become “the children of the promise who are counted for the seed,” who are to inherit the Gentiles. They therefore stand related to the metropolis, or mother city of their kingdom, as mother and offspring—all of whose children shall be taught of God, and great shall be their peace.

This great multitude has a twofold existence—first, as flesh and blood suffering tribulation; and secondly, as palm trees flourishing in possession of the kingdom of God. In the former state their fortunes, or rather misfortunes, are concurrent with those of Jerusalem as “a woman forsaken and grieved in spirit.” Hence they are described in the Book of Symbols as “the Holy City trodden under foot of the Gentiles forty-two months”—Revelation 11: 2. But, when Jerusalem becomes “free,” and she who now “drinks the dregs of the cup of trembling, and wrings them out,” shall awake and put on her strength, and be endued with her beautiful garments, and the uncircumcised and the unclean come into her no more—Isaiah 51: 17-23; 52: 1—then will the great multitude John beheld awake also, and put on their strength, and beauty, and rejoice in the prosperity of the Holy City, for her glory will be also theirs. Jerusalem is then exalted, and become “the joy of the whole earth.” Well may the poet say on view of this, “If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning. If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth; if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy”—Psalm 137: 5.

“Jerusalem a rejoicing and her people a joy,” compared with anything pertaining to her on former days, is a new Jerusalem—he ano Hierousalem, “the higher, or more exalted, Jerusalem;” and by virtue of her being the theatre of divine manifestations, and “the throne of the Lord,” she is styled, “the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem,” to which even now all believers come by faith, and rejoice in hope of her glory, of which they are joint-heirs with her “Great King.” This being their relation to her, every one that inherits the glorious things spoken of her, is inscribed with her name; as saith the Lord Jesus in these words, “Upon him that overcomes I will write the name of the city of my God, the New Jerusalem, which descends out of the heaven from my God.” Each of this great multitude, then, is named after the Free Woman subsequently to his resurrection; for it is not till then that their acceptance as those who have by their faith overcome the world’s enticements, is declared. Now Paul teaches that this multitude of resurrected and glorified saints will be caught up to meet the Lord in the air—1 Thessalonians 4: 17; 2 Thessalonians 1: 8. John saw them there in vision, and represents them as those who had gained a victory, standing on a sea of crystal, mingled with fire, and rejoicing—Revelation 15: 2. But these citizens of the New Jerusalem do not always remain “in the air;” for in another vision John saw them as “the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of the heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband.” But before he saw this, an angel said to him, “Come hither, I will show thee the Bride, the Lamb’s wife.” So “he showed me,” says John, “that great city, the holy Jerusalem, descending out of the heaven from God.” It is clear from this, that the New Jerusalem John saw was not a city of architecture, but a polity made up of glorified saints. The phrase “the Bride, the Lamb’s wife,” applied to the descending city, proves this. In the nineteenth chapter and eighth verse, she is represented as being “arrayed in fine linen, clean and white;” which white raiment is said to be representative of “the righteousness of the saints;” which is equivalent to saying that the Bride is the aggregate of the saints. They are collectively the Lamb’s wife, according to the teaching of Paul, who says that they are “members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones;” which was Eve’s relation to the first man.

This city, or body corporate, of Jehovah’s glorified sons and daughters, is representatively exhibited and described in Revelation 21: 11, to 22: 5. It is set forth as a city having a great and high wall of Jasper, in which are twelve gates of as many pearls, with wall-foundations of choice stones, each one of the twelve being decorated with all manner of precious stones. These rare and brilliant insets, which highly adorn the State, are worked into pure crystal-like gold, by which the city-multitude of its street, or Broadway—hee plateia tees poleoos, is represented. In the midst of this polity is the throne of God and of the lamb, from which issues a life-inspiring stream that flows along the plateia, refreshing and invigorating all the members of the State. There also stands “the Tree of Life in the midst of the Paradise of God,” nourished by the river which streams amid its roots; “bearing twelve fruits, through one month yielding its separate fruit, and its leaves for the healing of the nations.”

THE NEW JERUSALEM WALL.

Such is the municipality of the Kingdom represented by most expressive symbols, which I shall now briefly explain. First, then, of the “great and high wall of Jasper.” The wall is representative of a federal person; and the material, of that person’s preciousness. That “wall” is used of person in Scripture is evident from these texts—“What shall we do for our sister in the day when she shall be spoken for? If she be a wall, we will build upon her a palace of silver. I am a wall, and my breasts like towers: then was I in his eyes as one that found favour.” This is a Bride that has found favour; and she is styled a wall. The Lord said to Jeremiah, “I will make thee unto this people a fenced brazen wall, and they shall fight against thee, but they shall not prevail.” Speaking of Jerusalem delivered from her desolators, Jehovah says, “I will be unto her a wall of fire round about, and will be the glory in the midst of her.” “Sing and rejoice, O daughter of Zion; for lo, I come, and I will dwell in the midst of thee, saith the Lord.” The Bride, then, is a wall, and the Lord is a wall to her likewise; for being a wall of fire to the city standing on Mount Zion, he is also a wall to that glorious city’s corporation. The Lord as the wall of the Kingdom’s municipality encloses all its members, who, having been “baptised into the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit,” are “in God the Father and in the Lord Jesus”—walled or enclosed in him, which is the idea represented by the symbol.

The enclosure of the New Jerusalem community—the wall; and their “light”—the glory of God—are both represented by transparent jasper stone. “I will be the glory in the midst of her, saith the Lord;” that is, “I will be a stone most precious, even like a jasper stone, clear as crystal unto her.” And this interpretation of the jasper-light of the commonwealth, is sustained by the words of the angel, who says, “And the city had no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine in it; for the glory of God lightens it, and the Lamb is the light thereof.” This is taught without symbol in the prophets. “The man whose name is the Branch,” says Zechariah, “shall bear the glory, and sit and rule upon his throne.”—“Then,” says Isaiah, “the moon shall be confounded, and the sun ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign on Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously.” These “ancients” are “the City or State, that hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God,” and whose Prince is Christ the Lord, its everlasting light and glory.

The relationship of the Lamb and the Bride in regard to the City Wall, will exemplify the idea of “no temple being there.” The wall of a house or temple is the building itself; for no wall, no building. Believers in Christ in the present evil world are styled in scripture, “the house of God,” and “the temple of God.” “Know ye not,” says Paul to the Corinthians in Christ, “that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?” “Ye are God’s building;” but without the Lamb, that is, not being built into him, they were neither house, temple, nor builded wall.

Individually, they were separate and distinct elements, like unconnected stones accumulated for building purposes. While thus, they were neither wall nor temple. But when cut and polished, and built in by the Spirit, through Paul as “a wise masterbuilder;” that is, “constituted the righteousness of God in Christ Jesus,” who became to them “wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption,” they became “One Body,” having him for their head; and therefore, one wall, one temple, and one building with, and inseparable from, him. This being so, such a society needs no temple, being its own temple. This is not to say, that there is no temple in Jerusalem at the time. John’s instructor is not speaking of things unsymbolical pertaining to men in mortal flesh; but to Saints immortalised. Ezekiel treats of the unfigurative, which become symbols in the construction of the Apocalypse. The temple he treats of is the house of prayer for Israel and the nations; but the temple constituted of the Lamb and his Bride, is for them who are “pillars in it, and shall no more go out.”

THE PEARL-GATES.

The Twelve Gates of pearls in the wall represent the relationship subsisting between the New Jerusalem Municipality and the Twelve Tribes of Israel. The names inscribed on the gates show that they are representatives of the tribes; and that, consequently, the members of the New Jerusalem community became such by adoption into the Commonwealth of Israel, on an angel-principle, and so “entered in through the gates into the city.” The twelve angels stationed at the gates represent twelve messengers, by whose message, believed and obeyed, the gold and precious stones of the polity came to “enter in through the gates.” The names of these angels or messengers are inscribed upon the twelve foundations of the wall, being “the names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb.” These are the angels of the pearly gates of this glorious city, sent by the jasper-light of it to turn men from darkness to light, and to invite them to God’s kingdom of glory. This they did by preaching the gospel of the kingdom for “the obedience of faith;” by which obedience a people were separated from “all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues;” and adopted as citizens of the Commonwealth of Israel, in the hope of that remarkable and favoured nation. They thus became a part of Israel, and therefore styled by Paul “the Israel of God;” which, in its glorified state, with Israel’s God and King in the midst of them, was displayed in vision descending from the air to Mount Zion, before the mind of the apostle John.

The organization of the Israel of God has relation, therefore, to the foundation of the Hebrew Commonwealth in the twelve sons of Israel, and their own engraftment into Israel’s Olive, through the ministration of the twelve apostles, who issued from the tribes. Hence, in other parts of the apocalypse, they are represented by twenty-four elders wearing crowns of gold, who, with the four living creatures full of eyes, explain their own representation in the songs ascribed to them. When exhibited as a city, the twenty-four are divided into twelves, whose names are inscribed on the gates and foundations of the wall; and the eyes of the living creatures become the garnishing precious stones of each apostle-foundation. They are “the servants of God sealed in their foreheads”—the “144,000 of all the tribes of the children of Israel,” become “Israelites indeed” by that which is sealed upon them: for in relation to the glorified inheritors of Israel’s kingdom, “the flesh profiteth nothing.”

THE FOUNDATION-STONES.

Each foundation-stone of the city wall is a great precious stone, “a living stone”—and represents an apostle. Each polished gem would be beautiful alone; but how much more beautiful when decorated by all manner of precious stones beside! The meaning of this symbol is expressed in Paul’s words to those whom he had “sealed on their foreheads,” and brought into fellow-citizenship with the Saints of Israel. “What is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming? Ye are our glory and joy.” They were not “wood, hay, and stubble,” but gold, and silver, and precious stones. There is no use for destructible materials, such as wood, hay, and stubble, in God’s municipality; it is only those who stand the fire can be admitted there. Such were many of the apostles’ converts to the faith. They will rejoice together in the presence of the Lord; and those who have been brought to the obedience of the faith by an apostle, will be to him the garnishment of precious stones in the holy city.

The elements of the wall and the precious stones, are built upon the foundation stones. The idea incorporated into this symbol is found in the words—“Ye are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner; in whom all the building fitly framed together groweth into a holy temple in the Lord; in whom ye also are builded together for a habitation of God through the Spirit;” which in the New Jerusalem association, issues from his throne, and flows through every member of it, as “a pure river of water of life, clear as crystal.”

THE MAGNITUDE OF THE CITY.

The idea of “a great multitude which no man can number” constituting the New Jerusalem society, is represented by the symbolical magnitude of the city. Twelve is the radical number, and multiplies by twelve. Twelve thousand were representatively sealed, and identified as a tribe of the Israel of God. Twelve times twelve thousand give the 144,000 on Mount Zion with the Lamb. Each 12,000 occupies a definite space, which is 4000 furlongs square; and for all the thousands representatively stated as 12,000 furlongs square for the whole city, 48,000 furlongs the four square; giving 144,000 furlongs for its sectional contents. The symbolical height of the city is equal to its length and breadth. The height of the wall is twelve times twelve cubits; sufficiently high to indicate the impossibility of “any thing entering into it to defile it,” or that is “not written in the Lamb’s book of life.” Here is multitude innumerable symbolically represented, by 1500 miles length and breadth, and altitude besides; showing, doubtless, that this glorious polity is the medium of connection between the nations of the earth and heaven.

NEW JERUSALEM THE MILLENNIAL GOVERNMENT OF THE WORLD.

Such a community as this can need no lamp, or sunlight, to enlighten it; for “there shall be no night there.” Every individual of it will “shine as the brightness of the firmament; and those of it who have turned many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever.” Being righteous, they shine as the sun; for “the Lord God giveth them light; and they shall reign for ever and ever.”

This saying proves that the New Jerusalem is a community of kings —“they shall reign for ever and ever”—eis tous aionas ton aionon, to the ages of the ages. Over whom shall they reign, and where? “He that overcometh and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations; and he shall rule them with a rod of iron:”—“He shall sit with me on my throne, even as I overcome and sit with my Father in his throne.” In view of these promises the heirs of the kingdom sing in their new song, “Thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation; and hast made us unto our God kings and priests; and we shall reign on the earth.” And when the time comes for this to be fulfilled, John sees “thrones,” and he says, “They sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them—and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years.” “And the nations of them that are saved (survive the judgment of the saints) shall walk in the light of it (the New Jerusalem government), and the kings of the earth (the victorious saints) bring their glory and honour into it. And the gates of it shall not be shut at all by day: for there shall be no night there. And they shall bring the glory and the honour of the nations into it.”

“And judgment was given unto them;” that is, says Daniel, “to the saints.” This is their honour. “Let the high praises of God be in their mouth, and a two-edged sword in their hand; to execute vengeance upon the nations, and punishments upon the people: to bind their kings with chains, and their nobles with fetters of iron: to execute upon them the judgment written: this honour have all his saints”—Psalm 149. But the sword only prepares the way for the world’s regeneration. It hews down embattled hindrances to the improvement of mankind; but it adds nothing to the spirituality and intelligence of them that escape. The mission of Christ and his brethren, the saints, is to regenerate the world, as well as to “break in pieces the oppressor;”—to heal the nations of all their maladies of soul, spirit, and estate.

The agency by which this great work is to be accomplished is the Spirit of God operating through Christ, the Apostles, and the rest of the Saints—the New Jerusalem association of God’s kings and priests. This idea is represented by the pure river of living water, the Tree of Life, the twelve fruits, through one month yielding its separate fruit; and the Leaves of the Tree for the healing of the nations. That “a pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, issuing from the throne of God and the Lamb,” is the symbol of the Holy Spirit may be perceived from these words: —“I will pour water upon him that is thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground: I will pour my Spirit upon thy seed, and my blessing upon thine offspring: and they shall spring up as among the grass, as willows by the water courses.” “*If thou knewest the gift of God, thou wouldest have asked of him, and he would have given thee living water.” “He that believeth on me, as the Scripture hath said, out of him shall flow rivers of living water. This spake he of the Spirit, which they that believed on him should receive.”

THE TREE OF THE KINGDOM.

What the Tree of Life represents may be learned from the following texts. “Wisdom is a tree of life to them that lay hold upon her.” “*Blessed is the man that trusteth in the Lord, and whose hope the Lord is. For he shall be as a tree planted by the waters, which spreadeth out her roots by the river, and shall not see when heat cometh, but her leaf shall be green; and shall not be careful in the year of drought, neither shall cease from yielding fruit.” “What is the vine tree more than any tree?” This text from Ezekiel shows that in the scripture style, the vine is regarded as a tree. “I am the true vine, and my Father is the husbandman. Every branch in me that beareth not fruit, he taketh away; and every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit. I am the Vine,” continued Jesus to his apostles, “ye are the Branches. He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit: for severed from me ye can do nothing.”

“In the Word was life; and the life was the light of men.” That Word was made flesh, and named Jesus, who proclaimed himself the resurrection and the life. Hence, as the true vine, he is the Tree of Life, watered by the Spirit, which he received without measure. He is “a tree of life to them who lay hold upon him;” for he is “the power and wisdom of God unto them which are called.” In the book of symbols, Christ on the throne of his kingdom, and encompassed by the 144,000, is represented as “the Tree of Life in the midst of the Paradise of God.” “I am,” said Jesus, “the bread of life which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world. If any man eat of this bread he shall live—eis ton aiona, in the age.” Hence, one of the inducements set before the faithful to overcome, is, in the words of Jesus, “I will give him to eat of the Tree of Life, which is in the midst of the Paradise of God;” and “Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the Tree of Life, and may enter in through the gates into the city.”

To eat of this tree is to become one of the leaves of it; and to partake, consequently, of that nourishment which rises from the root through the stem and branches thereof. This life-sustaining and invigorating principle, is that “pure water of life” which issues forth from the throne, and maintains the tree in everlasting freshness and beauty. It is the Tree of the Kingdom to which Jesus referred when he said, “The kingdom of heaven is like to a grain of mustard seed, which a man took, and sowed in his field; which indeed is the least of all seeds: but when it is grown it is the greatest among herbs, and becometh a tree, so that the birds of the air come and lodge in the branches thereof.” The birds of the air are the chiefs of the nations, which saved-nations seek its fruit from one new moon to another ministered to them by its healing leaves.

THE HEALING-LEAVES.

The Leaves of the Tree for the healing of the nations. That is, the water of life is health-imparting to the saved-nations through the Leaves of the Tree of Life. The apostles being the branches of the true vine-tree, those who are ingrafted into that vine by the obedience of faith through their testimony, are the leaves, or breathing organs, of the tree. The Spirit that issues from the throne of God and the Lamb will breathe upon the conquered nations through the Saints, who then “possess the kingdom, and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven.” He breathed upon the 3000 Pentecostians through the Apostles; and the result was, their acceptance of Jesus as King of the Jews, raised up from the dead to sit on David’s throne; and obedience to the kingdom’s gospel in his name. “He breathes where he pleases.” He breathed in Jerusalem of old; he will breathe thence anew; not upon a few thousand Jews only, and through twelve men of Israel; but through “a great multitude which no man can number,” upon all the millennial nations of the earth; so that as a consequence, “the knowledge of the glory of Jehovah shall fill the earth, as the waters cover the sea.” Then “shall the Gentiles come unto Him from the ends of the earth, and shall say, ‘Surely our fathers have inherited lies, vanity, and things wherein there is no profit.’”

That “a leaf,” or leaves, when used metaphorically in Scripture signifies a person, will appear from the following texts. Job, in his reasoning with God concerning his hapless condition, says, “Wherefore holdest thou me for thine enemy? Wilt thou break a leaf driven to and fro?” That is, “I am a leaf, as it were, driven to and fro, wilt thou break me?” as it were, that is, metaphorically. Isaiah addressing the transgressors in Israel, who practised idolatrous rites in gardens and under oak trees there, says to them collectively, “*Ye shall be ashamed of the oaks ye have desired, and ye shall be confounded for the gardens ye have chosen. For ye shall be as an oak whose leaf fadeth, and as a garden that hath no water.” In this, apostate Israel in church and state is likened to a withered oak, and a parched-up garden, the very opposite similitude to that in the apocalypse, where the government of their nation is likened to a tree of life; that is, to one whose leaf shall not fade; and to a well-watered garden, “the Paradise of God.” The dried leaves of Israel’s withered oak have done nothing for the nations, which are unhealed to this day; and will so remain for ever, unless their olive tree do “blossom and bud, and fill the face of the world with fruit.” But, let the reader mark the figure, how that trees are used in Scripture sometimes as representative of polities, good or bad according to the nature and condition of the trees.

There is a notable instance of this in Daniel. Nebuchadnezzar in a dream that he had, describes a tree he saw, saying, “I saw, and behold, a tree in the midst of the earth, and the altitude thereof was great. The tree grew, and was strong, and the height thereof reached unto the heaven, and the sight thereof to the end of all the earth: the leaves thereof were fair, and the fruit thereof much, and on it meat for all; the beasts of the field had shadow under it, and the fowls of the heaven dwelt in the boughs thereof, and all flesh was fed of it.” This tree was representative of “the kingdom of men,” on whose Chaldean throne Nebuchadnezzar reigned as king. Hence, Daniel said, in showing the significancy of the tree, “It is thou (or thy kingdom), O king, that art grown and become strong: for thy greatness is grown, and reacheth unto heaven, and thy dominion to the end of the earth.” The stump of the tree when felled, banded with brass and iron, was the kingdom of Babylon during the seven years of its king’s dethronement, made sure to him on the recovery of his reason. The fair leaves of this tree which were shaken off, were the nobles and dignitaries of the kingdom detached from all connexion with Nebuchadnezzar during the days of his calamity.

The passage already quoted from Jeremiah shows that a person is likened to a tree as well as a kingdom; and that his excellency is manifested in the condition of its leaf, and fruit-bearing quality. When a tree represents a body corporate, its foliage is generally expressed by the plural “leaves,” but when only one person is meant, the singular is used, as “leaf.” Thus, it is written in David, speaking of the man who is blessed, “He shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season; his leaf also shall not fade: and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper.” This is predicable of the blessed men when he is a leaf among the leaves of the tree of life—whatsoever he doeth then shall prosper. By synecdoche, a leaf for a tree represents a man; as an eye in the apocalyptic living creatures symbolises an individual; the rule being, a part for the whole for the decorum of the symbol. A multitude of eyes, and a multitude of leaves, are a multitude of people, constituting a community, incorporated into a divine polity in that represented by the tree-stock, and the cherubic creatures—fire, light, and spirit, the symbols of the God-head in manifestation through body, styled “God manifest in the flesh.”

I trust that the reader will now be able to answer the question scripturally and rationally, “What is represented by the apocalyptic city of gold and precious stones? And what by the throne, the river, and the tree of life?” They are all things representative of Christ and his breastplate-Saints * in their governmental relations to the millennial nations. There is one point, however, I have only hinted at in my exposition, which I will briefly notice here. The common version reads, “*the tree of life which bare twelve manner of fruits, and yielded her fruit every month.” The words in bold type were inserted by the translators to make out what they conceived to be the sense. Their rendering, however, is not satisfactory. The words are, a tree of life, producing twelve fruits, through one month yielding its separate fruit. In this rendering no supplemental words are introduced. But what is the meaning of it? I believe that it is symbolical of something already declared by the prophets; for the whole book of the apocalypse is a symbolical representation of “the mystery of God as he hath declared to his servants the prophets.” In these writings he has promised blessedness and saving health to all nations; and we read of them saying in their convalescence, “Come and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways.” Who will teach them? He who is the tree of life in the Paradise, or Garden of God. He will then produce, or reveal knowledge, pertaining to “his ways,” which knowledge is contained in “the Law” and in “the Word,” which are to go forth from Zion and Jerusalem. The law and the word of God will issue from his throne through his king, through stated times, or “from one new moon to another.” The “twelve fruits of the tree of life,” are the knowledge of good tending to life, being made known in all the year. Fruit is anything produced. It is not produced to all the world at once; that is, in a single month: but at every new moon of the year’s twelve shall strangers present themselves in Jerusalem for instruction, “and from one Sabbath to another.” The tree produces the knowledge, the leaves yield it to the nations, according to the administrative institutions of the new constitution and order of things; which I understand to be represented in the text before us.

It will hardly be necessary, I think, after this exposition, to say much about the “dogs and sorcerers without”—the Gentiles and teachers which they have heaped up to themselves after their own lusts. It must be obvious to every one that there can be none such within: but that the words are strictly true in the very nature of things, that “there can in no wise enter into it anything that defileth; but only those written in the book of the Lamb’s life.” The Lamb’s life-community is the world’s unchangeable government for a thousand years. Flesh and blood cannot be a constituent of that government. It is “without;” and until that government is triumphantly established, it is in open rebellion, cursing, and wailing, and gnashing its teeth. But of this hereafter at a more convenient opportunity.

* Aaron under his foursquare breastplate of judgment, the Urim and Thummim, the ephod, gold, blue, purple, scarlet, and fine twined linen in the most holy place, was a type of the New Jerusalem; that is, of Christ and his Saints in glory. Compare Aaron’s foursquare with the foursquare of the Apocalypse, Exodus 28. Concerning Christ as the precious seven-eyed stone “like a jasper and sardius to look upon,” Jehovah says, “I will engrave the graving thereof,” which graving is represented in the workmanship and names engraved on the gates and foundations of the city.

LETTER TO ALESSANDRO GAVAZZI.

Modern Protestantism an interest, not a principle—Adverse Politicals advocate it, and flatter its enemies, for the sake of their votes—Lying the order of the day—The oldest Church of Christ in Rome, Jewish and not Italian—“Catholic” a name of faction—No “Catholics” in Peter’s day—The Church of Christ in Rome not the “Church of Rome”—The Catholic faction Paganised into the Catholic Church of Rome under Constantine—This Emperor Pagan, Pontiff, and Catholic Hierophant—Christianity defined—not intended for a political constitution—The Nations and their Governments the enemies of God—Popery cannot be annihilated till Christ comes—Signor Gavazzi and the mark of the Beast—The good news of the Gospel indicated—The Israelitish kingdom and empire of the future—Christ and his brethren to subdue the nations and enlighten the world.

Dear Sir—Though neither papist, protestant, nor “Roman Catholic of Peter’s time,” I have not been altogether an unconcerned observer of your endeavours in this great Babel of the West. I sympathise with the efforts of all, of whatever race or nation, who seek to emancipate the human mind from the bondage and tyranny of sin, superstition, and unbelief. For this reason I sympathise with you, and wish you God speed, and great success.

In reading a brief report of your speeches, I perceived that some things had fallen from your lips which evinced that you were considerably in advance of the current Protestantism of this cloudy and dark day. This discovery afforded me real gratification. The Protestantism of this country is but a fashionable Demas, competing with popery for the votes of the Democracy, which at heart they both cordially despise. Soul-saving is the pretext; the loaves and fishes of the state, daily sumptuousness, and power, the real end of the enlargement of their phylacteries before the people. The Protestantism of Luther, Calvin and Wesley, has doctrinally accomplished all it is capable of against Romanism in its papal manifestation. “The Reformers” all erred in supposing that popery could be reformed; and in admitting that the Roman Catholic church was ever a true church. You admit this in part. In so far then we are agreed. No independent mind enlightened by Moses and the prophets, Christ and the apostles, thinks of paying any regard to an Episcopalian, Presbyterian, or Methodist protest against popery; for if the papal church be the “Mother of harlots” as they say, they are unquestionably “the daughters”—the “women” of Revelation 14: 4. As you truly remark, therefore, “to protest against popery is very little:” hence the position you have assumed is great and impregnable, to protest against all sects, and to “preach Christianity as it was in the early church.” This is what few can do. I have heard of no man in this city competent to the task. There are many pretenders; but “a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth,” is yet a desideratum for this corrupt, blind, and demoralised community. The gospel preached by the apostles is unknown, and supplanted by “philosophy and vain deceit” for the entertainment of the “itching ears” which have heaped up to themselves pulpit orators after their own lusts. Antique spiritual bazaars, luxuriously embellished, whose pews are auctioned off to the highest bidder, are the places of resort they call “churches”—places of spiritual merchandise, where papist and protestant priests make long prayers, and wrest the scriptures to please the taste of the sinners who hire them to cure their souls. This is the “religion” of the world here—a religion of fashion, lust, and intense selfishness, which leaves the people to “perish for lack of knowledge.” It circulates the Bible indeed; but at the same time pronounces Moses and the prophets unintelligible, and represses with bitterness all truth not represented in their miserable sectarian creeds, and confessions of faith. From such a system, gospel-liberty and enlightenment are not to be expected. Fostered by such Protestantism as this, popery is a deadly viper warming into virulence destructive of every good. Italy and Hungary have nothing to hope for from its sympathies, unless indeed, gold and diamonds may be extracted from their soil in more than Californian or Australian superfluity. In that event, Protestantism would evince all due alacrity in filibustering against Austria for the annexation of those countries to the land of liberty and the model Republic of the world.

Your case, Signor Caro, would have been a dead failure, if in the opening of your brief you had proclaimed yourself the champion of Protestantism. If you had assumed this position you would have been vulnerable at all sides, and could only have defended yourself, as protestants do, by proving that of two blacks popery is the blacker most intensely. So long as you advocate that Christianity found in the Bible without regard to popery and Protestantism, Archbishop Hughes, the representative of the Beast's Image in this city will take special care how he troubles himself with so inconvenient an antagonist. If I mistake not the man, he has assailed Protestantism in newspaper controversy with a Presbyterian champion named Breckenridge, whom he gained a decided advantage over on the question of baby-rhantism, or sprinkling. This you know, Signor, is not taught in the Bible, but is a dogma of the Apostasy established by papal authority. Hughes maintained this, and urged truly that the protestant "baptism" was a popish institution; and that if popery were proved to be a lie, baby-sprinkling was a part of that lie; and as protestant creeds made it essential to salvation, as proved by John 3: 5, no protestant could enter the kingdom of God; in which conclusion more truth than fiction is contained. Hughes has the soul of a Jesuit, and consequently all the serpent-cunning of that creature, but with none of the harmlessness of the dove, where he can bite without being bitten. He fears you doubtless as you now stand. Beware, however, of the protestant Jesuitism of the political press. If dagger "John" of New York, Cardinal expectant, make any move against you, it will probably be by setting his underlings to work upon the fears of the editors, who, instead of being the enlightened leaders of the people in the way of truth and righteousness, are the mere breath of political factions, whose "principles" are summarily expressed in the proverb "to the victor belong the spoils." The popish vote in this city is very great, and can be controlled here as in other parts of Papal-dom, by a corrupt and vicious priesthood. In view of this influence the party editors are cap in hand to the priests especially, whose motto is that also of the clergy of all sects, "disturb not that which is quiet." Hence they are very sensitive on the subject of religious controversy. They readily endorse that maxim of a rotten cause so ardently cherished by all who live by it, that "controversy is dangerous to religion." The political editors know how repugnant it is to the priests or clergy of the Old Mother and her Daughters to have their creeds and confessions unceremoniously scrutinised and tested by scripture; they therefore repress all such investigation with the understanding that they will direct their pious influence in the true channel of political orthodoxy. Do you think that a Whig editor's sympathy for human liberty and detestation of Austrian and papal cruelty is so hearty and disinterested that he would do and say in New York what he would in London? By no means. He might be very eloquent upon the platform at Exeter Hall in behalf of liberty and the Bible; and even threaten the tyrant with America's frowns and indignant sympathy with the oppressed; but come you, Signor Gavazzi, to this Babel of the West, and deliver the same sentiments, and speak for God as well as for man, and denounce that Roman Mountebank, the ninth of his official name—expose the demoniac hypocrisy and impiety of him, his system and his priests—show up the imposture naked before the public, and demonstrate "the mystery of iniquity" they incarnate—and that same hypocritical politician will denounce you for a sower of discord among brethren: for if he were to stand by his transatlantic eloquence, he would offend the priests, and they might alienate the votes of papists from Whiggery to its rivals. I speak this not alone of Whig editors, but of Democratic and other faction writers, also—ex uno disce omnes.

This is the philosophy of that denunciation you recently experienced from these same editorial partisans for stripping off the veil from the hideous idol to which they burn incense for the votes of its besotted worshippers, but whose idolatry they neither love nor venerate. You say truly that "popery is essentially against all freedom, and therefore against all republics." I endeavoured to convince the citizens of Louisville, Ky., of this truth while incognito editor of a daily paper in that city in 1843, at the time of the popish excitement in Philadelphia. The paper was denounced by Whigs and Democrats, and the Jesuits for a piratical craft. The Whig Presidential electioneering procession halted opposite the office, and yelled forth groans and hisses against the Louisville Tribune, a paper advocating the election of their candidate, Henry Clay; and some proposed the demolishing of the press and types, because this same paper, in showing the essential and historical hostility of popery to liberty, and the well-being of society, it was apprehended would alienate some Romish votes from their political idol. About the same time the elections for the State Legislature were coming on. The Louisville Tribune created quite a panic in this direction also. One of the candidates visited the office under great excitement, demanding what they were all doing there, and exclaiming that he had lost two hundred votes by the articles on popery in the Tribune. He was given to understand that they were "publishing the truth as nearly as could be ascertained." "Yes," said he, "but the truth must not be told." He was, however, informed, that so long as the Tribune was published there, there was no help for it; it must and would be told. He asked permission to publish a card. It was granted. It was a laudation of the Romish priesthood, telling what fine fellows they were, and how intimate he had been with several of them for years, &c.; but apprehending he might be taken for a papist, and so lose more protestant votes than he would gain, recover, or retain by flattering the priests, he abruptly concluded his "card" by saying, "I am a protestant." This anecdote, now first reduced to writing, may illustrate to you the relations of politics in this country to its multifarious and multitudinous sectarianism. Mormonism, a mushroom imposture of the baldest character, is flattered and fawned upon by editors who despise it, for the sake of its votes. This was notorious in the election of Governor Ford, of Illinois, under whose administration they were afterwards expelled from Nauvoo by force of arms. God's unadulterated truth, then, need expect no quarters from protestant political editors and partisans; therefore, Signor, give none. Tell the truth as fully, and as fast as you learn it, and put them all to shame. Annihilate popery if you can. There is no harm in trying; though you are certain not to succeed: for in the providence of God both popery and Protestantism have a mission to perform. Their natural antagonism in the old world is bringing on a crisis which will be the ruin of them both. But their destruction is neither in your power nor mine, nor in that of all the disaffected throughout antichrist's dominion. If you have the ear of the Italians, show them what the truth is as preached by the Apostles, and leave the death and damnation of the apostasy unto God.

You are reported to have said, that you are "not a protestant in any sectarian sense, and wish to be called rather by the name of Roman Catholic." But why by this? "Because," say you, "the Roman Catholic church is the most ancient church in Europe, and you wish to be considered a Roman Catholic of Peter's time, before the church had become vitiated and corrupt." But, Signor Gavazzi, why not be satisfied with a scripture designation? Where in all the Bible you advocate, do you find any mention of Roman Catholics, or a Roman Catholic Church? We find there a letter from Paul to all that be in Rome, beloved of God, called saints, "whose faith was celebrated among the faithful throughout the whole empire of that city." Now for several years after the ascension of Jesus, even until Peter visited the house of Cornelius in Caesarea the only Christians in Rome were converted Israelites, and not Italians. The gospel of the kingdom was introduced to Rome by neither Peter nor Paul, but by “Roman strangers, being Jews and proselytes”—Acts 2: 10—who heard the Apostles and obeyed the things they taught on Pentecost. When these, on their return from the celebration of Pentecost, carried the doctrine of Christ to Rome, that city was Pagan, and so continued, in fact and name, until Constantine revolutionised it. The Christian Jews in Rome were collectively the church of Christ in Rome; but so far from being “Catholic”—universal, or general, they were a small minority, compared with the population of unbelieving Jews and pagan citizens of Rome. The saints never were catholic, and for years were not even Roman, or Italian, but Jews. These Christian Jews were the “One Body” in Rome, not of Rome, nor the Roman Body; but the one Body of the “One Lord,” having the “One Faith,” and washed with the “One Baptism,” and animated by the “One Spirit,” and called with the “One Hope,” by the commandment of the “One God and Father.” I repeat it—this was not the Roman Catholic Church. This church does not appear in history until many years after, and was an apostasy—“a falling away” from the One Body of the Lord.

When the mystery of the Fellow-heirship of the Gentiles with Christ was revealed, they were admitted to the fellow-heirship of believing Jews in Rome and elsewhere; and became partakers of God’s promise in Christ by the gospel believed and obeyed. See Ephesians 3: 6, and Romans 16: 25-26; Acts 10. The church in Rome, then, assumed a mixed character. It was composed of Jews and Gentiles, who thus became brethren and “one in Christ Jesus.” In process of time, “blindness in part happened to Israel,” and the church ceased to be recruited from among the Jews. The church in Rome, then, came to consist only of believing Gentiles who had been immersed into Christ, and so united to his name, and therefore called Christian. The blindness of Israel was infectious. It extended itself to the Gentiles, who were becoming “wise in their own conceit;” and however sound in doctrinal theory, they did not continue in “the love of the truth that they might be saved: and for this cause God sent upon them a strong delusion, that they should believe a lie: that all might be condemned who believed NOT THE truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness.” The Gentile professors went on from bad to worse, until their bloody quarrels excited the reprobation of the idolaters.

In 251, a schism occurred in the church at Rome by means of Novatian, one of its elders. Many drew off with him, and formed a community entirely distinct from that which fellowshipped the bishop. Their adversaries confess they were sound in the faith, though excessively rigid and severe. The seceders (and you call yourself a “Seceder,” Signor) were called “Cathari,” or pure, because they contended for virtue, innocency, and purity in the lives of all who belonged to the christian church; the contrary of which obtained in the generality to a lamentable degree. It was now that the distinction arose which has continued to this day. The majority who courted popular applause, and sided with the chief bishop, or elder of the church, were called Catholic, and those who seceded, no matter on what account, were styled Heretic.

In consequence of this division, instead of there being a church of Rome, there were TWO RIVAL CHURCHES IN ROME. This was in A.D. 251, nearly two hundred and twenty years after the introduction of the gospel to that city by the Jews, who had heard Peter on Pentecost. There was no Catholic Church heard of until this date. The chief overseer, who afterwards grew into a full-blown Pope by favour of Justinian, Phocas, and Charlemagne, was the Head of the Catholic Party. Now you reject that head, how then can you claim to be a Catholic? If you contend for fellowship with the most ancient church in Europe, you must renounce the Roman Catholic, and identify yourself with the older body existing there before any Gentiles or Italians were admitted to its fellowship. This was the church in Rome in Peter’s time; a church that knew nothing of Popes, Cardinals, Archbishops, Monks, Friars, Nuns, or priests’ harlots, or any other hypocrisy and abominations. The Saints in Rome were all God’s clergy or lot; his sons and daughters, without distinction of clergy and laity, “kings and priests” elected for the kingdom soon to be established on the ruins of the kingdoms, empires, and republics of the world.

It is unnecessary for me to trace minutely the history of the Novatian Church and the Catholic Church in Rome. In their beginning they were neither of them “the Church of Rome,” because the Italians of that city were catholically, or generally, pagans, the christians indeed and in name being only the exception to the rule. If you were settled in New York as pastor of a congregation of two or three hundred Italians, would you be justified in calling your little flock “the church of New York,” by which it would be understood that all its citizens belonged to your church, or that you claimed jurisdiction over them as the pastor or “Archbishop,” or Pope of New York? Would not all your contemporaries here hold your pretensions in perfect and well-merited contempt? It would have been so with the Novatian and Catholic Churches in Rome had they either of them in their beginning assumed the title of the Church of Rome. There was no Church of Rome claiming ecclesiastical jurisdiction over its citizens in A.D. 251. If the title “Church of Rome” be admissible at all, it is only in a pagan sense of the term. The Emperor being ex officio “supreme pontiff,” was the head of that church which, at that time, was the true church in the estimation of all Italians, save the comparatively few, identified with the proscribed faith.

But the Church of Rome did not always continue strictly pagan. Its constitution was modified by the revolution which changed the form of the Roman Government in A.D. 312. Till this date all its pontiffs, from Julius Caesar to Maxentius, were priests of Jupiter and his companion gods, to whom they sacrificed hogs, fit emblems of the worshippers. The God of Israel, and his King, the crucified Nazarene, found no favour in their eyes; but were the objects of persecution and hatred in the persons of the saints. But in the beginning of the fourth century an Emperor appeared, whose admiration for Apollo and Christ, the Gods and the Martyrs, was pretty nearly balanced, but leaning rather more towards Christ and the Martyrs than towards the others. This man, styled Constantine the Great, was reputed a christian by the Catholic party for fourteen years, although he was not immersed until three days before his death. As a proof of his double-mindedness, I would remind you that he enjoined the solemn observance of the Lord’s Day, which he called the day of the sun, Die Solis, after his favourite god; and in the same year, A.D. 321, directed the regular consultation of Auruspices; and during all this time he was permitted to enjoy most of the privileges of the Catholic Church, praying with the members, preaching on theology, celebrating with “sacred rites” the vigil of Easter, and publicly announced himself not only a partaker, but, in some measure, a priest and hierophant of the “christian mysteries.”

Thus, the Roman World now saw for the first time a “Pontifex Maximus” who officiated for Israel’s God, and the sun, &c.! Subsequently to his imperfect proselytism to Catholicity, he caused his son Crispus, of whom he was jealous, to be put to death. Here, then, we have a semi-pagan and a murderer placed by a successful revolution at the head of the pagan church of Rome. He was the type of his body the church, as Christ is of his. The revolutionised church of Rome was a den of thieves and murderers, robbers, and slayers of heretics, as before the revolution it was of all who professed Christianity of any kind.

Now, Signor Gavazzi, which of the two schisms in Rome expanded into the church of Rome, the Novatian or the Catholic? You will, doubtless, answer—the Catholic. You are right. The Novatians separated from the Catholics before they assumed that name, because of their having abandoned “the love of the truth,” and the practice of it. So that catholic is but another term for apostasy. It has always been associated with sin in all its manifestations of superstition, bigotry, hypocrisy, cruelty and crime. The best men having seceded from the church in Rome, the vicious majority that remained had free scope for the next sixty years to mature their ambitious projects; which was, by the strengthening of the catholic influence, through the proselyting of multitudes, and the favour of infidel politicians, with whom paganism and catholicity, as popery and Protestantism are now, were but tools that knaves do work with, to make such a revolution as would give the Catholic Clergy the loaves and fishes of the State, then monopolised by their rivals and persecutors, the priests of Jupiter and his court. From A.D. 270, to the end of the century, “ecclesiastical discipline,” says the historian, “which had been too strict, was now relaxed exceedingly: bishops and people were in a state of malice; endless quarrels were fomented among contending parties; and ambition and covetousness, had, in general, gained the ascendancy in the Christian Church. Notwithstanding this decline both of zeal and principle; notwithstanding this scarcity of evangelical graces and fruits, still Christian worship was constantly attended, and the number of nominal converts was increasing; but the faith of Christ itself appeared now an ordinary business.” Eusebius the historian, himself a catholic of that period, says, “We heaped sin upon sin, judging, like careless Epicureans, that God cared not for our sins, nor would ever visit us on account of them. And our pretended shepherds, laying aside the rule of godliness, practised among themselves contention and division.” A perfect type of things existing now.

Such was the Catholic church in Rome, and indeed the Catholic faction or schism throughout Italy and Gaul, when the ambitious Constantine conceived the project of becoming sole emperor of the Roman world. Himself a fugitive in Britain from imperial designs upon his life, he naturally entertained a fellow feeling for others similarly circumstanced. He became therefore a banner for the disaffected unfurled for a revolution the most remarkable in the history of the empire. His armies were crowded with Catholics, whose champion he had become, and it soon became manifest, that the real struggle was between that corrupt party and the partisans of the pagan church for ascendancy in the State. The catholic woman and her man-child triumphed; and being therefore enthroned, they seized upon the temples of the gods, and ejected their priests. They superseded the gods by the ghosts of the martyrs, to which they dedicated the temples, and appointed the catholic clergy to officiate at their altars in the character of priests. Thus, instead of Christianising paganism, Catholicism was paganised, and expanded into the church of Rome; which in the fulness of its development, and loaded with the fruit peculiar to it, stands before the nations as “the Mother of Harlots, and of all the abominations of the earth.”

From what has been said, then, it has been made to appear clearly, that you are mistaken in the supposition, that the Roman Catholic church is the most ancient church in Europe; and that there were any Roman Catholics in Peter’s time. Such a church, and such Catholics, were altogether unheard of and unknown. Their church is a schism, and themselves Schismatics. I trust, therefore, you will renounce “Roman Catholic” as a name, as well as papist. Bible names for Bible things; no human nomenclature can better designate the things of the Spirit than the Spirit’s own words and phrases.

New Testament Christianity was not promulgated as a civil and ecclesiastical constitution for peoples and nations. It appears to me, from the reports of your speeches, that you think it was. Hence, you talk about “Italians being Roman Catholics because they are Italians,” by which you intimate that they are Christians of the early church, because they are Italians. But, as I have shown, Christianity is not a specialty of Italians, though Roman Catholicism is. This is the mother schism, and peculiar to Rome. Lutheranism is German popery Lutheranised; Presbyterianism, Scotch popery Calvinised, and so forth. These modifications of Romanism are all political systems, and constitutionally suited to English, German, and Scotch peoples, as civil and ecclesiastical constitutions. But it is not so with Christianity, which is utterly at variance with them all in doctrine, aim, and practice. CHRISTIANITY is “the Gospel of the kingdom” for the obedience of faith, with the “all things” enjoined upon the baptised by the apostles. This is the best definition I can give in Bible terms to a word which does not occur in the Scriptures. The Gospel of the kingdom is an invitation to Jews and Gentiles to become heirs of God’s kingdom and glory, on condition of believing “the things of the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ,” and being immersed into the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit— Acts 8: 12. They are invited to separate themselves from the institutions of the nations, which are of no spiritual account in the affair of salvation. In believing and obeying the truth, this separation is effected; and though the believers live under the schismatic constitutions of the Gentiles, as Jewish Christians in Palestine lived under the Mosaic constitution, they have no use for them as spiritual institutions. You may see from Acts 15: 7-19, that God sent the Gospel invitation to the Gentiles “to take out of them A PEOPLE for his name.” If there be a hundred bushels of grain, and I “take out of them” ten quarts, that is surely very different to taking the whole bulk. God sent the Gospel to Rome, not to take all Italians for his people; but to take out from among them some who by obedience should become his people. The Italians are constitutionally the Pope’s people, as the Turks are Mohammed’s, and the Greeks are the Russian Autocrat’s. If Italians would become people of God, they must separate themselves from every form of Roman Catholicism by believing the gospel of the kingdom and obeying it. Let me press this point upon you, Signor. “If judgment begin at the house of God,” says Peter, “what shall the end be of them who obey not the gospel?” Hear what Paul says in answer to this question. “The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with the angels of his power in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ.” A man may protest against popery, or he may annihilate it; he may by his eloquence create a sympathy for the down-trodden of all nations, and kill his ten thousands of the Philistines in battling for liberty and the rights of man—but what of all that? Is he therefore justified from all his past sins, and has he thereby acquired a right to the kingdom and eternal life? By no means. These are only to be obtained by believing the gospel and obeying it, and thenceforth living a sober, righteous, and godly life in this present evil world.

I would enquire, how can one of Peter's church, or rather Christ's in Peter's time, scripturally become the advocate either of peoples or of their oppressors? The peoples of the world are sinners by nature and practice, living in their sins, and therefore enemies of God. These sinful peoples constitute the world; and the Scripture saith, "the friendship of the world is enmity with God. Whosoever, therefore, will be a friend of the world is the enemy of God." Again, "If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him." "Whosoever is born of God overcometh the world; and this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith." And again, "If I yet pleased men (the world), I should not be the servant of Christ." This separation from sinners is a great principle of Christianity, and quite incompatible with the christian's advocacy of the people's cause against their oppressors. A christian can only lawfully plead the cause of God and the Gospel, against which both oppressors and the oppressed are united in the strictest fellowship and alliance. They may hate one another cordially, but they do not therefore love God the more; for, saith he, "if ye love me, do what I command you;" for "love is the fulfilling of the law."

I am glad to see, Signor Gavazzi, that though mistaken on some important points, you are in advance of protestants generally upon others. You believe in the personal appearing of Jesus Christ to establish in Palestine a kingdom of universal dominion and justice; also in the restoration of the scattered tribe of Israel to their fatherland; and that the time is fast coming when all denominations will disappear. These points believed, and added to your desire to "preach Christianity as it was in the early church," "to preach the religion of Christ among the American people," with your recent quotation of the condition of salvation, that "he who believes the gospel and is baptised shall be saved"—give me great hopes of you, that you are capable of receiving the way of the Lord more perfectly; and may be turned from the bootless effort of annihilating popery, and pleading the hopeless cause of sinners with sinners against their oppressors, to the more exalted mission of beseeching your hearers to be reconciled to God upon the stipulations presented in the Gospel of the kingdom.

But to qualify one's self for this mission, we must understand and obey the truth ourselves. Pardon me when I say that I am apprehensive that you are deficient in this particular. If by a "Roman Catholic," I am to understand one, who has no other "baptism" than what babies in Italy receive at the hands of Italian priests, I am certain that you have not obeyed the truth. Christians of Peter's time were justified by their own faith; not by the credulity of ignorant godfathers and godmothers. Hear what Paul says, "Ye are all the children of God by faith which is in Christ Jesus." Suppose we ask Paul, "What evidence is there that we are his children by faith?" Now, just attend to what he says in the next verse in answer to the question. — "Because," says he, "as many of you (believers) as have been baptised (immersed) into Christ have put on Christ." Thus, you perceive, that being intelligently immersed into Christ is the evidence of our being God's children by faith, and if his children, then heirs of the promises made to Abraham and his seed.

On the supposition that you are a Roman Catholic, and therefore a schismatic from the church in Peter's time, allow me to say, that your Italian "baptism" and "ordination," are nothing more than "the Beast's mark" and license to sell in what you truly call "the pope's shop." For as the scripture foretold, that pontifical power "causes all, both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark in their right hand or on their foreheads; and that no man might buy and sell save he that had the mark, or the name of the beast, or the number of his name." Now, Signor, you were once a popish priest, and sold spiritual merchandise in the bazaars of guardian saints to them who were privileged to buy. Confession, baby-rhantism, burials, marriages, masses, and so forth, were some of those wares you exchanged with purchasers for gold, and silver, and tithes, and divers other contributions. Could you have sold those things to the Italians, if you had not been signed with the mark, character, or sign of the cross on your forehead, and not been cruciated with the same mark in your right hand at your ordination as a seller of wares in the Pope's shop? And could an Italian have purchased of you a burial in "holy ground," if the deceased had not been signed with the sign of the cross in baby-rhantism? The affirmative to these questions being granted, I would just refer you to the sentence pronounced upon all such as do not take proper steps for the obliteration of so ignominious a mark as that of the "accursed tree." Here it is. *"If any man worship the beast and his image, and receive a mark in his forehead, or in his hand, the same shall drink of the wine of God's wrath, which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation; and he shall be tormented in fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb. * * * And they have no rest day nor night, who worship the beast and his image, and whosoever receiveth the mark of his name."* Here is the secret of Italy's woes made patent to every reader. The Italians have sold themselves in past ages to imperial popery, and they are now reaping the bitter fruits. But the cup of suffering is not full yet. The mark of the Beast is upon them all, and what the malignity of Austria, Naples, and the pope has left unfinished, the just vengeance of the Lamb upon them for the murder of his saints and their hatred of the Bible, will be fully accomplished. But after judgment, then comes the blessing of Abraham upon all nations.

Will you, Signor, continue to wear the livery of the beast's image, and his mark, and to labour to excite sympathy for them whom God hath doomed? America can do nothing for Italy. The only hope for Italians is to leave Italy to France, Austria, and the Pope; and in believing the gospel and obeying it, to wash out the beast's mark in the blood of the lamb. Being desirous to assist them in this work, I have addressed myself to you, in hope of putting you right, that being rectified yourself, you may be able to promote the good work in relation to them in England and the United States. To make this more practicable, I have sent you herewith a copy of Elpis Israel, published by me in London and New York; with the first and second volumes of the Herald of the Kingdom and Age to Come, a periodical I issue every month in this city. What you will find in Elpis Israel, and the Herald, will, I doubt not, give you a view of what the Bible teaches in relation to salvation by the gospel of the kingdom, and to the future of Italy, Hungary, Turkey, France, Austria, Russia, Britain and the Jews, that will not be thrown away upon a man of your independence of thought, word and deed. You will find also some copies of a letter addressed to Louis Kossuth when in this city, and which has been republished in some of the English papers, and is about being issued in Edinburgh in pamphlet form.

In view of all that has been said, it is certainly an important question, “What is the gospel?” It is the good news that God purposes to send Jesus Christ to Palestine to re-establish the kingdom and throne of David there, and in accomplishing this to restore the twelve tribes of Israel; break in pieces the Gentile governments; cut up and disperse all their armies; annex the dominion of the whole world to the kingdom of Israel; enlighten the nations, and establish the authority of God on the final ruin of Greek and Latin popery, Mohammedanism, paganism, and Protestantism of every name and denomination. So that then shall come to pass the prophecy of Jeremiah saying, “In the day of affliction the Gentiles shall come unto thee, O Lord, from the ends of the earth, and shall say, Surely our fathers have inherited lies, vanities, and things wherein there is no profit.” And “at that time they shall call Jerusalem the throne of the Lord; and all the nations shall be gathered unto it, to the name of the Lord unto Jerusalem; neither shall they walk any more after the imagination of their evil heart. In those days the house of Judah shall walk with the house of Israel, and they shall come together out of the land of the north to the land that I have given for an inheritance unto your fathers.” When these promises become accomplished facts, AN ISRAELITISH KINGDOM AND EMPIRE will exist upon the earth, transcending in the greatness of its power, the extent of its dominion, the splendour of its majesty, and the justice and beneficence of its rule, any sovereignty existent since nations occupied the earth. This is that dominion of which the gospel of the kingdom treats.

But, it might be asked, What good news is that to us who may die before it is established? It is good news in this respect—that Christ and the Apostles say to us, that if we will believe the things testified in Moses and the prophets concerning it; recognise the claims of Jesus to the throne of the kingdom as son of David and of God, admit the doctrine of his death and resurrection as a propitiation for the sins of believers, and be immersed into the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit—if we will believe and do these things, and lead a holy and righteous life in hope of the kingdom and its eternal attributes, although we may die before the kingdom and dominion are established, Christ will raise us from the dead, associate us with himself in the work before him, and give us a share in all he shall possess. Hence an Apostle says, “God hath chosen the poor in this world, rich in faith, to be the heirs of that kingdom which he has promised to them that love him;” and when the kingdom is ready, Jesus will say to his saints, “Come, ye blessed of my Father, possess the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world.”

In conclusion, Signor, I would suggest that you are too belligerent for a christian of Peter’s time. You glory in having borne arms against the Austrians, and are here preaching a crusade against him, and execration against French interference. Christ says, “love your enemies,” though I admit not his; “bless and curse not.” A spirit of cursing and hatred is not a right spirit. In the absence of Jesus, we are to do good to those who despitefully use us; and are forbidden to avenge ourselves. “Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord.” The time is not come till he returns, for the saints to draw the sword. Till then, the weapons of their warfare are not bayonets and artillery; but reason and testimony. These are mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds. “Though we walk in the flesh,” says Paul, “we do not war after the flesh; casting down reasonings, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ.” When he comes the saints will have fighting to their heart’s content; as it is written, “the little Horn (imperial popery) made war upon the saints, and prevailed against them until the Ancient of Days came, and judgment was given to the saints of the Most High, and the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom.” Referring to this time, David says, “Let the saints be joyful in glory: let them sing aloud upon their beds. Let the high praises of God be in their mouth, and a two-edged sword in their hands, to execute vengeance upon the nations, punishments upon the people; to bind their kings with chains, and their nobles with fetters of iron; to execute upon them the judgment written: this honour have all his saints.” Thus, you will perceive, that the honour of liberating mankind from the tyrants that now heel them in the dust, is reserved of God to a superior order of beings to those who are now the champions of liberty and the rights of men—it is an honour reserved for those who have acquired the mastery over themselves in “bringing every thought into captivity to the obedience of Christ.” That you and I may share in this honour, is the earnest desire of, dear Sir,

Yours faithfully, —JOHN THOMAS.

OUR VISIT TO BRITAIN.

Baby-sprinkling in Aberdeen at two and sixpence a head—The gospel of the kingdom gets a footing among the Campbellites—Visit to Plymouth—The pamphlet exposing the folly of the clergy excites the pious horror of one fishing for a call—Apostasy for a mess of pottage—Elpis Israels gambled for, and condemned to be burnt—Its author a serpent of the latter days—Liverpool visited.

As already stated, I journeyed to Dundee from Aberdeen. The “gospel of the kingdom,” preached in this city of the north, was not without effect. The audiences were large, but not to be named after those of Glasgow. The attention of the people was strict, and, I suppose, the impression somewhat more than superficial. I come to this conclusion from the following words in a letter from that city—“Friend H—had two Sundays hard labour after you left to undo what you had done in his tabernacle. He was making a sore handling of matters, as I am informed. Poor gentleman, he could scarcely crow in his own Zion, though there were none to oppose him.”

The gentleman referred to in this extract was formerly in the British army; but at the termination of the contest with Napoleon, was discharged with many others on its reduction to a peace establishment. In consequence of this, he changed the weapons of his warfare, and unfurled his flag in Aberdeen. Finding an unoccupied conventicle, he rented it on his own responsibility for “public worship.” It is styled, I think, “the Christian Chapel,” and is capable of holding several hundred people. The odour of sanctity in Aberdeen is not supposed to be intensified by any fragrance exhaling from his institution. The clergy there do readily detect most unsavoury perfumes when their orthodoxy occasionally snuffs the wind of his divinity. At least so it is said. Having ordained himself to the totality of the chapel offices, he can have no part with them in their apostolic successorship. The holiest hands laid upon his head were his own, so that whatever spirit was imparted to him by that formality emanated from himself; and being equally pious as they, or their ordainers, is as much the spirit of God as any that they can boast of. It is thought, however, that the alienation between him and the clergy is more to be attributed to his underselling them in the soul-market, than to his lack of due presbyterial ordination. They will not sprinkle babies for regeneration unless the parents are what they call “believers;” but this, I am told, is no obstacle in the way of Mr. H—. He grants the babe a dispensation for rhanism without faith, and performs the ceremony for unbelievers’ babes at two shillings and sixpence sterling a head. Now there are many infidel husbands and wives in Aberdeen, who still have a superstitious reverence for this “church ordinance.” They want their children to appear like other children, who are considered more respectable than those who have not been sprinkled with the church water at the hands of “the minister.” Now, Mr. H—, it is presumable, having as little respect for baby-sprinkling as an apostle, who says in regard to God’s creatures, that “without faith it is impossible to please him,” considered it a public grievance, that babies should suffer in their respectabilities for the short-comings of their parents, which they could in no wise prevent. He saw clearly, that believers’ babies had no more faith than infidels’ babies. To his mind there was no room for question or dispute upon this point. He very acutely perceived, therefore, that all babies were babies, and had an instinctive desire for no other milk than their mother’s. For “the unadulterated milk of the word,” he was intuitively and logically sure they had no more longing than for the Pope’s tiara, of which they had never heard. Hence, he perceived that the clerical requisition for parental faith did not evade the apostolically stated impossibility; for, however pleased with the parents, it is obvious God could not be with the babies, who were perfectly indifferent to the milk of his word. He placed all babies, therefore, in the same category; and practically rejected the clerical sprinkling, as having no superior efficacy to his own. If the parents’ faith in the Assembly’s Catechism was a good substitute for the babies’ ignorance thereof, his faith was as good a proxy for the parents’ lack who became his customers. Mr. H—was, therefore, the catechism become flesh. He believed it with faith enough for all infidel Aberdonians; and could consequently sponsorise all the babes in Aberdeen in the event of all church-goers honestly avowing their babylike indifference to “the milk of the word.” Was it not a public benefaction, the preservation of the respectability of multitudes of the rising generation at the low price of half a crown a head? It is said to have been so considered by many. The clergy thundered, but Mr. H

—pocketed the lightning. His speculation succeeded. His bazaar was well frequented, and riches increased. Compared with his competitors in trade, his wares are as genuine, and his drafts upon heaven's bank as likely to be honoured, as the Archbishop of Canterbury's or the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland's. As may be supposed, he is liberal withal. He will not close the doors of "the Christian Chapel," against heterodoxy, if a penny can be safely turned by the opening of them. This is not the case everywhere. Orthodoxy loves money and is very prudent—wise as the serpent in all its doings. It will not let you into its houses for money, lest the heresy taught should alienate its customers, and so diminish its power and receipts. But Mr. H—, having been a soldier, was brave, and had no such fear. Pay him for present accommodation, and he would run the risk. On this principle my friends obtained the use of his chapel. It was convenient, "the minister" polite and friendly, and the risk not over hazardous, considering the faithlessness of the times, and the constitution of the audiences addressed.

The reverend gentleman having succeeded, I suppose, in undoing the little mischief I had done among his flock, all things relapsed into their former sheolite condition. This was not the case, however, with "the Campbellite church," as it is called there. A correspondent, writing from Aberdeen, says, "the dust has been raised among us since you left. The teaching of 'the things of the kingdom of God' gave offence to some of the friends, and to one of our elders who is Campbellised, and spiritualised with a double distillation. He could stand it no longer, and therefore gave in his resignation. He could sustain his theory by neither scripture nor reason. He went privately to all the members he thought favourable to his notions, and got about half the congregation to side with him. We told them they could please themselves. If they thought fit they could go; but for ourselves, we were resolved to teach what we believed to be the truth, and were willing that they should exercise the same right: but we would not be restricted by the elder in question. By advice of some of his party he gave in; but he next made a proposition that no brother should speak longer than a quarter of an hour at a time. This, however, did not take. He lost his proposition, and in the meantime we are settled down; and I have hope that the most of his friends will in the course of time come to see the truth. He did them great evil, I fear; nevertheless, I think there are some of them beginning to see things in their true light. But, let the result be what it may, we are determined to be faithful. They are the intelligent and talented of the congregation that contend for “the gospel of the kingdom.” Of this there can be no doubt; for it is only such that have the sagacity to discriminate between things human and divine.

On the night before I bid adieu to Aberdeen, I met about a hundred persons, I think, at a soirée, to which I was invited. This was a farewell tea-drinking, at which “all and singular” were at liberty to ask any questions concerning the things I had introduced to their notice, and the contents of the Bible generally. The time was occupied in this way till past eleven. The minister of the chapel we had occupied was among the guests. He would have asked some questions, but it was then too late, and he had not wished to prevent others from questioning by occupying the time. He thought they were all under great obligation to me for subjecting myself to a public cross-questioning upon so many topics, and for so long a time. He confessed that he should not like to go through the same ordeal. After a few more remarks in this strain, he concluded, and the soirée was closed.

Through friends in Nottingham, I became acquainted with a preacher residing in Plymouth, whom I will name Wood. He was formerly a zealous Millerite, or Anti-Jewish Restorationist. This crotchet, I think, he never got rid of; at least, so long as I knew him. In other respects, he receded from the Millerism of which Mr. Himes of Boston, is the incarnation, and became what I am unable to define. He was the pastor of a church in Plymouth, consisting of about seventy members, from whom he drew his support, which was restricted and precarious. They generally believed in the speedy personal appearance of Christ Jesus, which was the one idea defining their belief; but as to any other particular articles of faith distinguishing them from other professors, I am not aware that they possessed them.

By this Mr. Wood I was induced to visit Plymouth. What his motive was for urging me to it, I know not. I supposed it to be referable to a desire for the diffusion of as much knowledge as possible of the scripture testimony concerning the times, and the crisis connected with the personal advent of Jesus. He was friendly, promoted the sale of Elpis Israel, and quite zealous in getting the people to hear me. The Mechanics' Institutes at Plymouth and Devonport were hired for lectures, which I delivered at intervals during the eighteen days of my sojourn. At the latter place, the audiences were quite large—several hundreds; but at Plymouth not so many. The hearers seemed deeply interested; but, save the sale of forty-six copies of Elpis Israel and a very animated soirée before I left the town, I have no means of knowing what faith the gospel of the kingdom commands in the hearts of those that heard it.

On my way to London it was that the conversation occurred, which set me to writing the pamphlet afterwards published as “The Wisdom of the Clergy proved to be Folly.” About twenty-five of them were sold in Plymouth by Mr. Wood, whose mind had undergone a remarkable change, apparently, at least, since the soirée, at which Mr. Wood made a speech which left the impression upon my mind that he was not far from the kingdom of God. But by a letter I received from him, expressing his opinion of the pamphlet, I clearly perceived that his mind had been alienated to something else. A thousand copies of that brochure have been sold, with the exception of a few copies in Britain, and more are demanded, but cannot be supplied there without a reprint. Speaking of it, Mr. Wood says, “For myself, while I know assuredly to my great grief, that many things therein stated are but too true, I am constrained, with painful reluctance, to differ from you upon various matters; —with reluctance, because I would that we all had the truth and the mind of God, and could see alike, —with pain, because I cannot but feel really horrified at some of your conclusions.”

Mr. Wood's pious horror originated from my strict construction of “the wholesome words of the Lord Jesus,” who before his crucifixion, said, “This gospel of the kingdom must be preached to all nations;” and added, after his resurrection, “He that believes and is baptised shall be saved, and he that believes not shall be condemned.” Like the serpent in the garden, he would have it that this was not true without exception. He maintained that multitudes “who believe not” shall not surely be excluded from eternal life, or “be condemned,”—they “shall not surely die.” The idea that they should, was too repugnant to his fleshly feelings, or something else, to be entertained for a moment. He wanted a doctrine more in harmony with “the thinking of the flesh,” forgetting that God’s system of truth is an embodiment of principles the very reverse of what the natural feelings of sinful flesh respond to. “My thoughts,” saith he, “are not as your thoughts, nor your ways as my ways.”

The other point of horrification related to “the ministerial ordinances of the Lord’s house.” The pamphlet “irreverently” demonstrates “with ungodly levelling,” as he thinks, that the existing orders of priests, clergy, and ministers, popish, national, and dissenting, as distinguished from “the laity,” are the servants of anti-christ, and not of God. That their united establishments are Babylon, and Rome the mother of them all. He called these “sacred things of the Lord’s house,” and thought that what Paul says in Ephesians 4 about “apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and teachers,” was a plain and complete refutation of my assertions and reasonings; as if what Paul writes of these appertained to the ecclesiastics of Catholicism, Protestantism and dissent, who presumptuously assume those titles! I did not then know that posthumous Irvingism operating upon his necessities ill supplied by his flock, had turned his head. Such I afterwards learned to be the fact. Had I known it when I received his letter I should have felt no surprise. I could have accounted for his new-born zeal in babyism, and ministerial ordinances! What a trying thing is poverty. What will not some men do for a crust of bread! This surely is the reason why God has chosen the poor to be the heirs of his kingdom—the natural tendency of poverty to test principles. Jesus and his apostles were pre-eminently poor and needy men; but they braved all necessity, and adhered to the gospel of the kingdom. But all cannot do this, and Mr. Wood was among the number. After my return to this country I received a letter from Plymouth which drew aside the veil and exposed to view the ugly features of the case. The writer says, “Feeling a deep interest in the truth you so ably advocated in this place, I embrace the present opportunity of sending you some information in relation to its fortunes here. I grieve, however, to say that it is very discouraging in its especial relation to the person (Mr. Wood) who many of us thought would be its greatest advocate. The cause in this place is all but gone. Soon after the issue of your pamphlet, he went to Nottingham, Leeds, and adjacent places. On his return, I discovered that the sentiments he had entertained respecting some of the truths contained in your works were changed, though he had privately held the very same. About six months since he stood up in his place, and declared that his views were entirely altered respecting baptism, and that sprinkling was as much a baptism as immersion. In after lectures he said that infants were proper subjects for baptism; that there ought to be at the present, and that there is a fourfold ministry in the Church of Christ, namely, apostles, prophets, evangelists, and pastors. A few months since he denied any man's claim to apostleship, though he now affirms that apostles ought ever to have been in the church. He is now for every Christian paying the tenth of his earnings into the treasury, and maintains that there ought to be a regular succession of priesthood as in the Jewish system, of which Christ should be the chief. The result of his lecturing is, that most of his congregation have left him, myself and a very few others remaining to give him a full and impartial hearing. After the defection of so many, he declared that he had been preaching errors, although while uttering them he said he was taught by the Spirit. He now intends to join the people at the Central Hall, and invited us to go with him, and hear for ourselves, which a few did. We found the performance conducted much after the Roman Catholic fashion, the prayers read being the English liturgy. On inquiring their views, we were introduced to Mr. Walker the "evangelist," who commenced a course of private lectures to us, refusing to admit married females and all young persons without their husbands' and parents' consent. These private lectures were similar to Mr. Wood's, but with some additions. They profess to be the church of the living God, and refuse all sectarian names as an abomination. They are in fact Irvingites. They decry Luther's reformation exceedingly as being man's work, and not God's. They denounce the Bible as a cursed idol, because Dissent says it can read for itself; and in the next breath pronounce it a most Holy Book. They forbid men to interpret for themselves, and command them to receive the church's dictum; and consider that the tolerance of fox-hunting parsons in the established church is no sufficient ground of separation from it. On the second Sunday after our chapel was closed, Mr. Wood and three others were admitted by the "angel-evangelist" to the Irvingite fellowship, in laying his hand on their heads, and reading a prayer. The Sunday after the children were sprinkled, and what they call "the Lord's Supper" administered to them. This they are to receive three times a year, because the Jewish males went up to Jerusalem thrice annually to eat the Passover!! They contend that the sacrament has superseded the Passover, and baptism circumcision, and that therefore children are fit subjects to partake of both the ordinances. Yet they refused to admit us who were members of Mr. Wood's to partake until we were admitted members with them; and meanwhile desired us to go to our parish church and take sacrament there. They desired us, however, to pay the tenth of our earnings into their treasury before we became members. But our intention is not to embrace error if we know it.

“All their ministers, they say, are directly called of God. Mr. Wood is trying to get in as a minister, constantly writing manuscripts as specimens of grace. The apostle, who brings his prophet with him, is expected here soon, when it is augured that he will prophesy that Mr. Wood is called of God to the ministry in his house. Since his change of views, Mr. Wood has declared that Elpis Israel is blasphemy; and the angel evangelist has desired the members to burn or destroy their copies. But some of us here prize that work next to the Bible. We do not intend to yield our obedience to any thing unsupported by the word of God. Elpis Israel has been the means of enlightening many minds in this place; though on some topics we still wish for more light. We are now cast upon the world as sheep without a shepherd. But God has promised to be a guide to all that confide in his name. This is consolation.”

In a postscript the writer says, “a copy of Elpis Israel belonging to a Central Hallist was raffled for at three pence a head; and the evangelist has declared in his public and private lectures that you are a serpent, quoting the testimony touching the Israelites being stung by serpents; so, he says, are you, a serpent of the latter days!”

Really, the malediction of such a fellowship of foolishness and imbecility is quite a compliment to Elpis Israel and its author. But poor, unfortunate, Mr. Wood! I was evidently not the serpent that charmed him. The eyes that allured him to folly glared from a ministry fed and clothed by the tenths extracted from those it had deceived. His zeal against a strict construction of Christ's word, is easily explained. To have adhered to it rigidly would have excluded him from the tithe-sustained ministry. He could not afford this; therefore he dipped for a sop, and betrayed the truth into the hands of the enemy.

A notice of my visit to Liverpool brings me to the conclusion of the narrative of my journeyings in the service of the Gospel of the Kingdom. I visited that important city after being at Dundee. The effort to bring out the people, however, was but feeble there. Their energy had been overtaxed by their expenditure in support of President Campbell's demonstration, so that they had only infirmity for "the glorious gospel of the blessed God," which he contemns. They did what they felt like. A few handbills invited the people to their usual place of meeting. The attendance was very limited. Yet twenty-three copies of Elpis Israel were sold; and after my discourses were finished, Mr. Campbell's friends, who had also become mine, regretted that a greater effort had not been made. They were kind and hospitable, and, I think, thoroughly dispossessed of the unclean spirits which go forth from the mouths of Bethany, Nottingham, and Auchtermuchty town. My visit to Holland, Prussia, Germany, Belgium, and France, will finish these notices of my runnings to and fro in the old world, whose present constitution being effete, is soon to pass away with a great noise, and in the fervent heat of the indignation and wrath of God. But enough, O reader, for the present; hereafter we may meet again.

MATERIALISM OR IMMATERIALISM?

BY G. H. LEWIS.

Comte remarks—and the remark is immensely significant—that the discovery of gravitation, the first great acquisition of positive Physics, was contemporaneous with the discovery of the circulation of the blood—the first fact which rendered positive Biology possible; and yet what immense inequality in the progress of the two sciences since that day, when the starting point of both was reached! Nor is this inequality solely and directly owing to the greater complexity of Biology; but also to the philosophic method which presided over the evolution of Physics, compared with the vague metaphysical method which has not yet ceased in Biology—a consequence, let me add, of that very complexity. No one inquires into the nature of gravitation, or into its cause; to detect its law is deemed sufficient; but physiologists are incessantly inquiring into the nature and cause of contractility and sensibility, unable as they are to conceive these phenomena as two ultimate facts—properties of two special tissues. The only distinction to be drawn between these vital properties and the general physical properties is, that they are more special; but this speciality does not make them more explicable, for it is always in exact harmony with the corresponding specialty of the structure: it is only muscular tissue that presents the phenomenon of contractility (or, more rigorously stated, it is only fibrine); it is only nervous tissue that presents the phenomenon of sensibility. All those physical and chemical hypotheses that have been invented to explain contractility and sensibility have been as unphilosophic as the ancient efforts to explain gravitation and chemical affinity. For, as Comte truly says, after all they only represent vaguely the mechanical transmission of impressions produced on the nervous extremities, but do not in any degree explain perception, which thus remains evidently untouched, although it is really the most essential element of sensation.

A certain vague sense of the vanity of these attempts to explain the phenomena of sensation has caused an indignant reaction on the part of the metaphysicians, and by enlisting the prejudices of the majority against what is styled Materialism, has very seriously obstructed the tranquil path of inquiry. Every one feels an intense conviction that sensation and thought are not electricity, are not mere vibrations, are not “secreted by the brain as bile is secreted by the liver.” He knows that sensation is unlike all other things. He needs no revelation of science to tell him that it is different from electricity; and intimately persuaded of its specialty, he lends a willing ear to any harmoniously-worded explanation offered by the metaphysician as to its being as “immaterial principle,” an “o’er informing spirit,” a mysterious something which, whatever it may be, is assuredly not “blind unconscious matter.”

I confess that I have always had great scorn for what is called “Materialism”—equal, indeed, to that I felt for “Immaterialism;” and I have often called the quarrel a frivolous and vexatious dispute about words. But it was more than that. Though men squabbled about words, there were fundamental ideas working under them antagonistically; and, on the whole, I think the metaphysicians had more reason on their side than we on the other gave them credit for. Absurd as their “immaterial principle superadded to the brain” must be pronounced, it had this merit, that it kept the distinctive specialty of the phenomena of sensation in view, and preserved it from the unscientific, coarse hypotheses of some materialists.

That “blind unconscious matter could not think, was held as a notorious argument, in spite of the assumption implied in the epithets (for the aphorism amounted to this, —blind matter cannot see, unconscious matter cannot be conscious.) To any one who looks steadily at the question, however it may be shown that, as a matter of fact, the nervous tissue, and that only being sensitive, the biological proposition simply is, that “sensitive matter can be sensitive.” To claim for this tissue any superadded entity named Thought, is to desert the plain path of observation for capricious conjecture.

Why not call strength an immaterial principle superadded to muscular tissue, if you are to call thought one? The muscular action, and the nervous action are two special phenomena belonging to special tissues. Science can tell you no more. If your mind is dissatisfied therewith, and demands more recondite explanation, invent one to please yourself, and then invent one for heat, for attraction, for every phenomenon you conceive; the field is open; imagination has wide-sweeping wings; but do not palm off on us your imagination as science!

What the metaphysician says in respect of the essential speciality of the phenomena of thought and sensation—their complete distinction from other physical phenomena—is therefore to be admitted as true. He builds on this basis an absurd superstructure; but the basis we cannot destroy. On the other hand, what the physiologist says respecting the identity of thought and nervous action is equally indestructible. That is his basis. Combine the two schools into one, and you have the positive philosopher, who says, “Sensibility is an ultimate fact, not explicable, not to be assigned to a knowable cause, but to be recognised as the property of a special tissue—the nervous.”

As far as the religious application of this scientific conception is concerned, Locke long ago pointed out how it was as easy to conceive God endowing matter with thought as spirit with thought. All that the metaphysicians claim is the speciality of the phenomena of thought—their difference from the phenomena of inorganic matter—and this the positive biologist claims also. —The Leader.

THE PLEASANT LAND.

“A land which the Lord thy God careth for: the eyes of the Lord thy God are always upon it, from the beginning of the year even unto the ending of the year.”—Deuteronomy 11: 12.

These words form part of an appeal which the God of Israel made to his people, wherein He calls for their allegiance and affection, on the ground of his great and gracious intentions. The Lord recounts what he had done in bringing them out of Egypt, in destroying Pharaoh and his hosts, and in judging the rebels who had risen up among them. “Your eyes (says Moses) have seen all the great things which the Lord did.”—Obedience is required of them as a condition of their peaceable and protracted possession of the promised inheritance. That heritage—“the land which God had espied for them”—is next described with much minuteness and beauty. It is contrasted with Egypt, and shown to be a more beautiful and fertile land than that far-famed country; and God engages that if they will love and serve him, the land shall continue to be a “delightful land.” But the testimony most worthy of notice is, that Canaan is a land especially cared for by God, and that his eyes are continually upon it. We are bound to believe this testimony, and should not let any thoughts or views unbecoming God’s greatness, and independence of places and localities, interfere with a full and ample reception of this declaration. The fact that the Most High, who filleth all space with his presence, cares more for this one little spot on our small world, is in agreement with many other parts of God’s Word; and it is his clearly revealed purpose, that in abolishing the times of the Gentiles, He will make the fact abundantly manifest.

How frequently did God speak with Abraham about this land—Genesis 12: 7; 13: 4-11; 15: 18-21, &c. &c. —and He did the same with Isaac and Jacob, and afterwards to Moses. Those who think that belief in the future glories of Canaan is puerile and wrong, have little sympathy with the Psalmist (105: 6-11), where the covenant with Abraham, the oath to Isaac, and its confirmation to Jacob, and “to Israel for an everlasting covenant,” are all shown to centre in this: “Unto thee will I give the land of Canaan; the lot of your inheritance.” This “covenant and word is said to be commanded to a thousand generations,” which has never yet been fulfilled.

Who that considers the past history, the present condition, and the future destiny of Canaan, but must see reason for all that God hath said about it? In that land he has displayed Himself, exhibited his character, and revealed his grace. It hath been the home of his tabernacle and temple, with its splendid rites and mystic glories. Its hills have resounded with the lyre of his prophets, and from its lovely valleys the prayers of his faithful ones have gone up from age to age. Thus he made it a beacon of light in a dark world, sustaining there a witness (though, alas! sometimes feeble), for his own unity and holiness, in opposition to the many and filthy deities of the heathen. In the fulness of time it became the chosen theatre for redemption work; over its surface and on its waters walked the feet of “Immanuel, God with us.” The Son of God, the Son of man, breathed its balmy air, plucked its clustering fruit, and gazed with pleasure on its lovely landscapes. But of one of its trees a cross was made, and he was hung upon it. From one of its mines iron was brought and fashioned into nails to pierce his blessed hands and feet. In one of its caves his breathless body was laid for a while, and after he left those gloomy shades, he still lingered forty days amidst the valleys, rocks and hills “of the land which God careth for.” Well may we wonder at all this; but we shall not stagger at the same, when we remember that he first took dust of our earth into indissoluble union with his divine nature. In our nature he ascended to heaven, still casting loving looks on the land of his birth and pilgrimage, and pronouncing, as he gave his last commission, the name of Jerusalem in tones of richest tenderness, ascended to glory, to make “the land that He cared for” the fountain of light, —living waters flowed from it, and made glad and beautiful many a barren Gentile wilderness. Thus his dying prayer was answered, and his parting command fulfilled. Jerusalem became vocal with his name, and many Jerusalem sinners were forgiven. But ere he died, his tears had been mingled with the dust of Judah; and wherefore felt he such bitter sorrow? He saw that the glory would depart—that the temple would fall—the people be scattered, and Jerusalem be trodden down. All was accomplished. He put not forth his almighty hand to hinder it, for he intended to make this long-favoured, guilty land, a monument of divine wrath, on which justice should write in broad, legible, characters, God’s hatred of sin, especially the sin of unbelief. There it stands, like a burnt mountain, still smoking with the heat of God's anger. It reads the whole world a grand moral lesson, and bids the possessors of privileges "not to be high-minded, but fear."

But its destinies are more glorious than its past history is wonderful. God will "heal the land." "He will be merciful to his land and to his people." (Deuteronomy 27: 43.) He whose purpose is steadfast as the ordinances of heaven, says: "Thou shalt no more be termed Forsaken; neither shall thy land any more be termed Desolate; but thou shalt be called Hephzibah, and thy land Beulah; for the Lord delighteth in thee, and thy land shall be married." (Isaiah 62: 5.) Then, when "God's sanctuary shall be in the midst of them for evermore" (Ezekiel 37: 28), shall God's great idea be wrought out, "Jerusalem shall be called the throne of the Lord, to which the nations shall be gathered." (Jeremiah 3: 17.) The land shall become "Immanuel's land;" it shall be filled with holiness, and the divine complacency shall ever rest upon it. "His eyes and his heart shall be there perpetually."

For thus regarding the land of Canaan, we indulge in no superstitious feelings; such respect for God's inheritance is far removed from mere sentimentality. Such thoughts are sober and spiritual, and those who indulge in them are brought into sympathy with God. To "despise this pleasant land," as regards that bright destiny which all the prophets unite in foretelling, argues, in this respect at least, a lack of sympathy with God in his thoughts and purposes.

But where does God's eye and his heart abide now? Who are his covenant people, in whom he takes pleasure? "Behold the eye of the Lord is upon them that fear him, upon them that hope in his mercy!" "To this man will I look, who is of a poor and contrite spirit." Such are related to him. He is "the Lord their God." They choose him, confide in him, and feel complacency in character, and that because he hath loved them with an everlasting love, and with loving kindness hath drawn them. As the God of their salvation, he will supply their need, succour them in sorrow, and save them with an everlasting salvation. Because He was their Lord God of Israel, He provided Canaan for their home, brought them into it, preserved it for their use, for in it they had safety, supply, and satisfaction. He took pleasure in seeing them happy, because He got glory to his name by their prosperity. And thus he deals with his chosen people now. He provides spiritual blessings; enables them to claim and enjoy them; guards both them and their inheritance; and all “to the praise and glory of his grace, wherein he hath made them accepted in the Beloved;” “that in the ages to come he might show the exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness toward us by Christ Jesus.” Oh, ye spiritual Israel of God! look up and catch the beamings of your heavenly Father’s eye. “Cast all your care on him, for he careth for you.” Ever abide where God’s eye of delight ever rests, even in his beloved Son. Let that Church, as dear to him, be much cared for by you, and forget not to care for Israel and her down-trodden land; and then, when Israel shall “feed on Bashan and Gilead as in days of old,” and the earth be filled with the knowledge of the Lord, you shall dwell in that heavenly city, composed of living stones gathered out of all nations; and which shall evermore possess the presence of God and the Lamb, to be its light and its glory. —Quarterly Journal of Prophecy, p. 191.

A PARABLE.

A gentleman of the country, upon the occasion of some signal service this man had done him, gave him a curious silver cup. David (for that was the man's name) was exceedingly fond of the present, and preserved it with the greatest care. But one day, by accident, his cup fell into a vessel of aqua fortis: he, taking it to be no other than common water, thought his cup safe enough, and therefore neglected it till he had dispatched an affair of importance, about which his master had employed him, imagining it would be then time enough to take out his cup. At length a fellow-servant entered the same room, when the cup was near dissolved; and looking into the aqua fortis, asked David, who had thrown anything into that vessel? David said that his cup accidentally fell into that water. Upon this, his fellow-servant informed him that his cup was almost dissolved in it. When David heard this, and was satisfied of the truth of it with his own eyes, he heartily grieved for the loss of his cup; and at the same time, he was astonished to see the liquor as clear as if nothing had been dissolved in it or mixed with it. As, after a while, he saw the small remains of it vanish, and could not now perceive the least particle of the silver, he utterly despaired of ever seeing his cup more. Upon this, he bitterly bewailed his loss with many tears, and refused to be comforted. His fellow-servant, pitying him in this condition of sorrow, told him that his master could restore him the very same cup again. David disregarded this as utterly impossible. "What do you talk of?" says he to his fellow-servant. "Do you not know that the cup is entirely dissolved, and that not the least bit of the silver is to be seen? Are not all the little invisible parts of the cup mingled with aqua fortis, and become parts of the same mass? How, then, can my master, or any man alive, produce the silver anew, and restore my cup? It can never be; I give it over for lost: I am sure I shall never see it again." His fellow-servant still insisted that their master could restore the same cup, and David as earnestly insisted that it was absolutely impossible. While they were debating this point, their master came in, and asked them what they were disputing about? When they had informed him, he said to David, "What you so positively pronounced to be impossible, you shall see me do with very little trouble. "Fetch me," said he to the other servant, "some salt water, and pour it into the vessel of aqua fortis. Now look,” says he, “the silver will presently fall to the bottom of the vessel in a white powder.” When David saw this, he began to have good hopes of seeing his cup restored. Next, his master ordered a servant to drain off the liquor, and to take up the powdered silver and melt it. Thus it was reduced into one solid piece; and then, by the silversmith’s hammer, formed into a cup of the same shape as before. Thus David’s cup was restored, with a very small loss of its weight and value.

It is no uncommon thing for men, like David in this parable, to imagine that to be impossible, which yet persons of greater skill and wisdom than themselves can easily perform. David was as positive that his master could not restore his cup, as unbelievers are, that it is incredible God should raise the dead; and he had as much appearance of reason on his side as they. If a human body, dead, crumbles into dust, and mingles with the earth, or with the water of the sea, so as to be discernible no more, so the silver cup was dissolved into parts invisible, and mingled with the mass of aqua fortis. Is it not then easy to be conceived, that as a man has wisdom and power enough to bring these parts of the silver to be visible again, and to reduce them to a cup as before, so God, the maker of heaven and earth, must have wisdom and power enough to bring the parts of a dissolved human body together, and to form them into a human body again? What though David could not restore his own cup? Was that a reason that no man could do it? And when his master had promised to restore it, what though David could not possibly conjecture by what method his master would do it? This was no proof that his master was at a loss for a method. So, though men cannot raise the dead, yet God, who is infinitely wiser and stronger, can. And though we cannot find out the method by which He will do this, yet we are sure that He who at first took the dust of the ground, and formed it into the body of man, can, with the same ease, take the dust into which my body shall be resolved, and form it into a human body again.

Nay, even if a body be burnt, and consumed by fire, the parts of that body are no more really lost than the invisible particles of the dissolved cup. As David, then, was wrong in thinking that it was impossible for his master to restore his cup, it must be at least equally wrong for us to think it impossible that God should raise the dead. —Hallett cited in Dr. Brown’s

THE TURKISH QUESTION.

To be meddled with at all, is for Turkey almost the same with being overturned. She has no position capable of being maintained except by sufferance. An exile from the heart of her own people, Turkey maintains a precarious rule alien provinces; and there is not one of those provinces in Europe which does not hold by a stronger inclination to some other allegiance. You may begin the survey where you like. The Pansclavonian intrigues of Russia in Grahova, behind the Bocca di Cattaro, have raised expectations and orthodox sympathies; and Grahova desires to unite with the Montenegrines: objects and influences which sway that small but important district much more than the Turkish allegiance. In Bosnia, a Mussulman nobility rules a Sclavonian peasantry from mediaeval castles, and a chronic rebellion smoulders. Along the military frontier, where such active hostilities were going on in 1836, the Sclavonians have fraternised with the guards of Austria; and upon the whole it may be settled that the angle of Turkey stretching into the Austrian empire inclines to annexation, if the Sclavonian subjects of that Austrian border should not rather annex themselves to their brethren. Sclavonianism generally prevails along the great basin of the Danube; and the Danubian Provinces retain strong sympathies with the Bucharest scheme of 1848. Mismanagement has impaired the influences which Austria might have both in the East and West of this region. Stratimirovich, the Serbian chief, who, under the impulse of border nationality and military order, fought so stoutly for Austria against Hungary, has been rewarded with a paltry Lieutenant-Colonelcy. The same kind of slight has rewarded Yanku, the popular chief of the Transylvanian Wallachians; who was invited to Vienna, was patted on the shoulder by the Emperor, received promises, and found, after his return home, that the reward of his people was an increase of taxation!

Turkey itself is but a corner of the empire that bears its name; and when we come to the very capital, we find still the most startling disproportion. Of the 700,000 inhabitants, 300,000 probably are not Turks. The coasts round the Black Sea, the Sea of Marmora, and the Greek sea, are thickly strewed with Greeks, the holders of the commerce, the wealth, and the energy of the country. With finances utterly confused, compelled to seek a loan and then to disavow it at the dictate of this or that banker, of the French or the Russian Ambassador; burdened with factories of cloth, silk, or iron, and with model-farms destitute of farmers, enterprises that are no more than expensive toys; governed by an Emperor who means well, tries to introduce European improvements, but thinks chiefly of pleasure, and is cheated on every side, —Turkey presents the anomaly of a very small minority, without political convictions, governing much more numerous populations, with nationalities, convictions, and objects of their own.

The practical stamina of Turkey must be sought on the Asiatic side of the Black Sea, around Broussa, the destined abode of Abdel-Kader, just released by the politic Emperor Napoleon III from his captivity in Christian France. But here, where we find the stamina of Turkey, we find also in full play those qualities of the Mussulman character which absolutely prevent it from acting in European politics, —the rivalry of small military chiefs, the totally individualised selfishness of the Mussulman, the ignorance of external relations. The followers of Othman invaded Europe as armed hordes by mere force of military impetus; but unless it were to a victory, not destined for repetition, they can hardly issue from their own quarters: they have not the generalship, nor the geography, nor the commissariat, nor anything that is needed for external warfare.

Turkey, indeed, has her organised army at Constantinople; she can assemble 50,000 men or more within sight of the city—and they look brilliant under review, with their bright apparel and dashing manoeuvres: but it is very questionable whether there are amongst them any men of superior generalship; or whether they could resist the strong force which Russia keeps ready on the further shore of the Danube mouth, to be marched upon Turkey at the shortest notice. The Pruth is practicable at any part, the Danube is a Russian river, and the Balkan itself has proved to be no obstacle in the road to Constantinople.

Within the limits of the Turkish empire all is confusion; and though it is easy to foresee that any jar to the existing regime would set the whole loose in the most intricate commotion, it is impossible to see through that storm to the settlement beyond, unless we assume as unquestioned issue the overwhelming mastery of Russia. But if we look beyond that comparatively narrow region, we shall see other influences, not altogether to be despised. To begin with Greece: there is a strong Russian party, rather supporting the present regime, for the present; but there is also the party of Young Greece, dreaming of the restored Hellenic empire, classically republican, and not without sympathies in the provinces still nominally Turkish. With a Southern fleet shut up in the Black Sea, Russia aspires to be a naval power, but is only a naval impotency. The Czar has long endeavoured to obtain from Austria the cession of the Bocca di Cattaro, which would give a great port for his fleet outside the Dardanelles: but, instead of making a cession so suicidal, Austria has developed that peculiar company of “Lloyd’s,” which has its agents extending through Asia even to Tibet, and in the Adriatic a fleet of more than fifty steamers, —not, indeed, war-steamers, but able to transport troops, and having strong ports along the Eastern shore as places of refuge and defence. Since the last European conflict, Austria has developed a strong power in the Adriatic.

The Eastern half of the Mediterranean is divided from the Western by the strait of which Malta is the key; but France is already encroaching on the Southern shore; she possesses Algiers, threatens Tunis and Tripoli, and hankers after Egypt. Were France advancing with hostile intentions against Turkey, she must ask the assent of the power that possesses Malta, or force the passage. But even if that passage could be denied to her, the independence of Turkey would scarcely be the better secured. If Turkey were to venture upon any war, Russia would seize Constantinople as an act of grand reprisal. If France or any other power were the aggressor, Russia would possess Constantinople, to “protect” it; and once in, there would be the utmost difficulty in dislodging her. Persuasion would scarcely prevail. An English fleet might force the Dardanelles, and the great city lies at the disposal of any commander ambitious of a feu d’artifice on a grand scale: but, however magnificent the conflagration, the Russians would not be dislodged, and Constantinople would not be twice burned down. Once in command of the portal between the Black Sea and the Mediterranean, Russia would not abstain from dictating in a much more peremptory voice, on such subjects as the Egyptian transit. Could England, single-handed, defend her interests in that quarter? The question may become a practical one.

Vast as the Ultra-Oriental power of Russia, it is still not so unquestioned as it might at first appear; and although polite diplomacy may hold itself precluded from alluding to the other influences latent in that region, practical speculators know that they exist, and that in times of necessity they would not be ignored. Austria looks very big from the Bocca di Cattaro or from the plains of Lombardy; but we all know that slights are felt, not only by neglected Slavonian allies like Stratimirovich, not only by jealous Bohemians, but even within our own army, where there is a growing sense that the supreme administration is stupid in its treatment of dependent nationalities and meritorious services. Russia has not yet subdued the Caucasus; she might be brought to an unexpected pause if new opportunities and combinations were to array against her the insurrectionary resources of that heterogeneous region called “Turkey,” which she has traversed with her intrigues, has inflamed with her incentives, but has not reduced to discipline. —The Spectator.

A MISERY TO BE LAMENTED.

Pastor Robinson in his farewell charge to his congregation at Leyden, before they set sail from Holland, in the Mayflower for New England, says to them—“I charge you before God and his holy angels, that you follow me no further than you have seen me to follow the Lord Jesus Christ. The Lord has more truth yet to break forth out of his holy word. For my part, I cannot sufficiently bewail the condition of the reformed churches, which are come to a period in religion, and will go at present no further than the instruments of their first reformation. The Lutherans cannot be drawn to go beyond what Luther saw; and the Calvinists, you see, stick fast where they were left by that great man of God, who yet saw not all things. This is a misery much to be lamented; for though they were burning and shining lights in their times, yet they penetrated not into the whole counsel of God; but were they now living, they would be as willing to embrace further light as that which first they received. I beseech you to remember, that you be ready to receive whatever truth shall be made known unto you from the written word of God.”

If all who rejoice in Puritanism would give heed to this candid exhortation of their father, it would do more to advance them Zionward from that full stop to which they have long arrived like the “reform churches” of the pastor’s day, than any Blue laws, Sabbath-consecrations, or State-thanksgivings, &c., they can invent for the promotion of popular sanctity. We would especially commend pastor Robinson’s charge to our friends, the adherents of the Bethanian gospel of sacred history, who like the Lutherans and Calvinists, “are come to a period in religion,” as if there were no promises for faith and fulfilment in the word of God! —

THE SABBATH.

The following report is an outline of one of a series of lectures being delivered at Convention Hall, 179 Wooster Street, by the editor of this paper. The lectures which have been already extemporised have treated of “The Beginning;” of the “Elohim;” of “the Earth in its pre-Adamic state;” “the Spirit of God;” the antecedence of spirit to matter; the “Heavens and the Earth;” the creation-days not geological periods; the non-original creation of the sun, moon, and stars on the Fourth Day; the creation of Man in the “image and likeness” of the Elohim; Man’s original dominion; the Four States revealed in the Bible; &c. &c.

The lecture now presented to the reader, is upon that theologico-political “vexed question,” the Sabbath. The lecturer considers that if the doctrine of the Sabbath as it is exhibited in the Holy Scriptures were understood, there would be an end to all Sabbatarian disputes, that Sabbath-desecration denunciations would be withheld, and much valuable time within and without the halls of legislation would be saved, both in America and Britain. He states that in its origin the Sabbath was not a religious institution. It was Paradisaic, but not religious. He hoped the audience would not misunderstand him in this. He thought they would not when they understood the sense in which he used the word “religious.” Religion is a Latin noun converted into an English one by the addition of the letter “n.” Religio may be derived from the verb “ligo,” to close up by binding, as vulnera veste ligare; and the particle re, implying that the thing bound up had once been united, but being divided needed to be made one again. This might not be the pagan import of the noun, but it was unquestionably the scriptural. The paradisaic was a state of union between God and man, which union sin, “the transgression of law,” divided. Hence, religion is that remedy or system of things, divinely appointed for closing up the breach, and restoring paradisaic harmony upon the earth. As the Sabbath, therefore, was instituted before “sin entered into the world by one man,” it is evident that it was no part of the sin-remedy, and consequently not a religious institution.

Shavbath, called “Sabbath” in our tongue, signifies cessation, resting, or time of rest, from the verb shahvath, he ceased; hence the phrase, eth-yom hasshavbath, the resting or sabbath day. Moses says that this day was “the seventh day,” and that it terminated the period during which the Elohim by the Spirit of the Invisible were occupied in fitting up the earth as a dwelling-place for the animal races. The work being ended on Friday night, shahvath, he ceased, the Spirit ceased or refrained from creating and making on Saturday. Hence the reason given for blessing and sanctifying the seventh day—“And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it; because that in it he had rested from all his work which God created and made.” He did not rest in the sense of being tired; for “the everlasting God, Jehovah, the Creator of the ends of the earth, fainteth not, neither is weary:” but he simply assumed inactivity, or ceased his demiurgic operations. What the words of blessing were we cannot tell, because they are not recorded. We may, however, infer that they were words of promise to man for whom the sabbath was made; and judging from subsequent revelation, we may conclude that the words of sanctification and blessing predicted a state of things upon the earth in the enjoyment of which all Adam’s posterity approved of God should “be as the gods,” holy, happy, and in perfect harmony with himself.

To sanctify is to make holy. This is the prerogative of Deity. Holiness is not an essential quality of time, space, or matter, so that if either of these is made holy, it must be by virtue of its being constituted such. Man, originally “upright,” has lost his integrity, and is defiled. He is therefore essentially the opposite of holiness; and cannot therefore confer upon things an attribute of which he is himself destitute. To make things holy is to separate them from a common to a special use according to divine appointment. Men cannot therefore of their own notions make ground, buildings, persons, times, seasons, and days, holy. They may agree among themselves to call cemeteries, churches, and days, holy; and can inflict penalties for the “desecration” of such things; but the violation of their laws with respect to these, lowers no man in the estimation of God. Adam did not sanctify the seventh day. If he had made the attempt he would have failed, not knowing in what an acceptable sanctification would consist; and this is precisely the difficulty in which his posterity are involved—they have a vague idea the day should be kept holy, but they know not how to do it, much less do they know how to make it so. God made it holy by his absolute authority. He made it holy for man’s benefit; for the Lord of the sabbath has so declared, saying, “The sabbath was made for man, and not man for the sabbath.”

The lecturer proceeds to remark, that beyond an allusion to the division of time into periods of seven days in the account of Noah’s sending forth the dove from the ark, nothing more is said about the seventh day than what is contained in Genesis 2: 2-3, until a miracle was wrought to prevent its desecration, in giving a double quantity of manna on Friday and none on Saturday; and until its observance was enacted by a law accepted by the Twelve Tribes of Israel. The church and state of this renowned people was one and indivisible, and grafted upon the stock, whose roots were “the Foundation of the World.” They were therefore told to “remember the resting-day, to keep it holy.” In what way it was to be kept holy is defined in the sabbath-law. It consisted in not doing any work on the seventh day. There was no other way of keeping it holy. The Son of Man, who is Lord of the sabbath, taught that it was “lawful to do good on the sabbath day;” but then for an Israelite to kindle a fire, or pick up sticks, or buy and sell, or speak his own words, or do any kind of work, or for any other member of his household, stranger, or any thing that was his, to work and pursue the ordinary avocations of the previous six days, was doing evil and not good, for the simple reason that God had forbidden it. To observe the seventh day law in letter and spirit was to keep it holy; but to violate it in one particular was to be as much guilty unto death as if no regard were paid to the day at all; for the transgressor came under the sentence, which extended to the violation of the Mosaic law, in whole or part, namely, “Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things written in the book of the law to do them.” Besides this total abstinence from work, “two lambs of the first year, without spot, and two tenth deals of flour for a meat offering, mingled with oil, and a drink offering of strong wine to be poured unto the Lord,” were to be offered as the burnt-offering of every sabbath, beside the continual burnt-offering, and its drink offering. These sabbath-offerings, like all others, were only acceptable from the Altar and from the Holy Place of the tabernacle and temple. It is clear, therefore, from the requirements of the law, that not only do the pious among the Gentiles not keep the sabbath, but neither can they, nor the Israelites, however zealous for its observance.

But saith the lecturer, the observance of the seventh day was only enjoined upon those who were “under law” to God; not upon those who were “without law;” that is, non-Israelitish nations. The sabbath was “a sign” between the God of Israel and that people; and signified good things to come upon them, and through them upon the rest of mankind, when “the times of the Gentiles” should be fulfilled. This appears from the words of Jehovah to Israel by Moses his faithful servant in all his house. “Verily,” saith he, “my sabbaths shall ye keep; for it is a sign between me and you throughout your generations: that ye may know that I am the Lord that doth sanctify you. Ye shall keep the Sabbath therefore; for it is holy unto you: every one that defileth it shall surely be put to death: for whosoever doeth any work therein, that soul shall be cut off from among his people. Six days may work be done; but in the seventh is the Sabbath of rest, holy to the Lord: whosoever doeth work on the Sabbath-day, he shall surely be put to death. Wherefore the children of Israel shall keep the Sabbath to observe the Sabbath throughout their generations, for a perpetual covenant. It is a sign between me and the children of Israel for ever: for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, and on the seventh day he rested, and was refreshed."

That the observance of the seventh day was given exclusively to the house of Israel appears from the reason assigned for imposing it upon them. "Remember," saith Moses, "that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and that Jehovah, thy God, brought thee out thence with a mighty hand, and by a stretched out arm: therefore, the Lord thy God commanded thee to keep the Sabbath day." When they were slaves in Egypt they served a hard bondage to Pharaoh, having no rest to their souls; but after being "baptised into Moses in the cloud and in the sea," the nation rested from its work, and in anticipation of its rest under Joshua, kept the Sign-Sabbath in the wilderness. The Egyptian servitude, the national baptism into Moses, the wilderness-cessation from the works of slavery, and the Joshua-rest in Palestine, were, however, examples only, first, of things spiritual in relation to baptised believers of the gospel of the kingdom; anticipative, secondly, of things national on a grander scale, when, the world having passed through its MILLENNARY WORKING DAYS of six thousand years from its foundation, the Twelve Tribes and the Nations of the Earth, ceasing from their own works in which they serve their own lusts, and the tyrants who oppress them in mind, body, and estate, shall, by a mighty hand, and out-stretched arm, be constitutionally inducted into Abraham and his Seed, the Christ, and keep the DIVINE SABBATISM, the rest that remains for Israel in their own land under their glorious and immortal rulers; and for the nations under their own vines and fig-trees, in all the Day of Christ, the Millenary Sabbath Day of a thousand years, in which God and men will cease from their works, and be refreshed.

The present dispersion of Israel is the penalty for not keeping holy the seventh day in its true significance. For if they had turned away their foot from the Sabbath, from doing their pleasure on God's holy day, and called the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honourable; and had honoured him, not doing their own ways, nor finding their own pleasure, nor speaking their own words: "then," saith Jehovah, "shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord: and I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth, and feed thee, O Israel, with the heritage of Jacob thy father: for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." Thus testifies Isaiah; and the testimony of Jeremiah is like it, only with a threatening of the consequences to the nation if it did not keep the day. "It shall come to pass if ye diligently hearken unto me, saith the Lord, to bring in no burden through the gates of Jerusalem on the Sabbath day, but hallow the Sabbath day, to do no work therein; then shall there enter into the gates of this city kings and princes sitting upon the throne of David, riding in chariots and on horses, they, and their princes, the men of Judah, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem; and this city shall remain for ever. And they shall come from the cities of Judah, and from the places about Jerusalem, and from the land of Benjamin, and from the plain, and from the mountains, and from the south, bringing burnt offerings, and sacrifices, and meat offerings, and incense, and bringing sacrifices of praise. But if ye will not hearken unto me to hallow the Sabbath day, and not to bear a burden, even entering in at the gates of Jerusalem on the Sabbath day; then will I kindle a fire in the gates thereof, and it shall devour the palaces of Jerusalem, and it shall not be quenched." That fire has been twice kindled unquenchably, once by Nebuchadnezzar, and once by Titus: and on both occasions, because they regarded not the Sabbath of the Lord in the way that pleased him. At the Assyrian overthrow of their commonwealth they defiled the Sign-Sabbath; and at the Roman, they refused to hallow it in its spiritual signification, by ceasing from their own works in no longer serving sin in the lusts thereof, and delighting in the Lord whom Jehovah had sent them as an ambassador of peace and glory to the nation—the Angel of the great Sabbatic Covenant.

"The law," which is a phrase expressive of the Mosaic institutions in the aggregate, being "the representation of the knowledge and the truth," and "the pattern of things in the heavens," the sabbath, which, being incorporated into it, is a part thereof, is also "a shadow of things to come." The sign-sabbath is a "rudiment" or "element of the world;" and therefore classed among "the weak and beggarly elements" to which the Galatian Christians wished again to be in bondage. In writing to the Colossians the apostle says, "Let no man judge you in respect of a holy day, or of the sabbath: which are a shadow of things to come; but the body (casting the shadow) is of Christ." Jesus rested on the seventh day in the silence of the tomb from all his work pertaining to his offering for sin; and on

“the eighth day,” commonly called Sunday, or the first of the week, arose as the Light of the new creation, as a strong man to run a race. The mystery of the Sabbath was thus laid substantially in him. The sabbath, or “rest remaining to the people of God,” was proclaimed in his name to the Jew first, and afterwards to the Greek. All believers, who desired to enter into that rest, were commanded to “cease from their own works, as God did from his;” in other words, to sabbatise from sin, by being “buried with him by baptism into death” to sin; “that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so they also should walk in newness of life.” This, saith the lecturer, is the only way Jew or Gentile can keep the sabbath, so long as the commonwealth of Israel, and the dwelling place of David, are in ruins, and trodden under foot of the worst of the heathen, as at this day.

But the seventh day was only one of the sabbaths of the law. To mention no others, the eighth day was also a sabbath. The first and eighth days of the feast of ingathering, were sabbaths. This feast was representative of the future ingathering of the Twelve Tribes into their own land; and of the gathering of the Saints, the palm-bearers, with them unto Messiah their king, when both classes shall rejoice before the Lord. They will then celebrate the eighth day as the sabbath day of the Age to Come instead of the seventh, as it is written in Ezekiel, saying, “Seven days shall they purge the altar, and purify it, and the priests shall consecrate themselves. And when these days are expired, it shall be, that upon the eighth day (Sunday) and so forward, the priests shall make your burnt offerings upon the altar, and your peace offerings, O Israel; and I will accept you, saith the Lord God.” This testimony relates to the order of things in the kingdom of Israel under Messiah the Prince during the Millennium. Israel and the nations will then keep the Eighth-day, instead of the Seventh-day, Sabbath, as under Moses. The gospel is glad tidings concerning that kingdom and age; and those who believe it, and have obeyed it, being therefore the heirs of its kingdom and glory, sabbatise by ceasing from sin, and rejoicing in their present eighth-day probation in hope of entering God’s millennial rest by a resurrection to the life of the age to die no more.

There are two crotchets among the people respecting the sabbath which deserve a passing notice in conclusion of the subject. The one is that the seventh day, or Saturday, should be kept holy according to the Mosaic law; and the other is that Sunday should be observed as the Jewish sabbath. The adherents of the former, are Israelites, and Gentile Sabbatarians; while those of the latter, are the pious who maintain that the seventh day observance was changed for the keeping holy of the eighth according to the sabbath law. Both these classes are great sticklers for keeping holy their sabbath days after Moses’ prescription; yet, it is manifest from what has gone before, that they have no scriptural claims to the approbation of the Lord for so doing. If Sabbatarians would keep the seventh day holy, they must keep it according to the law thereof. They have no right to dispense with what suits them not, and to retain the rest. Neither God nor Moses have given them this license. In lighting fires, making up beds, cooking, using their horses, &c., and preaching sermons, which is “speaking their own words,” certainly not the Lord’s, they break the sabbath and defile it, as much as any anti-sabbatarian, who performs double work on Saturday that he may lose as little as possible by resting from his labour on the following day. Such keeping of the Sabbath in the light of Moses’ law, is truly wonderful, and only paralleled by the others who impose on God the pretension of keeping his sabbath by abolishing the celebration of the seventh day, and observing Sunday after their own taste and convenience. When God says, “Keep holy the seventh day, O Israel, by resting from every kind of work, and offering the sacrifices of the law;” he does not mean, “Keep holy the first or eighth day, O Gentiles, by resting according to your views of profit or convenience.” Yet, practically, such is the construction put upon his words by those, who would bind heavy burdens upon men’s shoulders, grievous to be borne, but would be the last to help them to endure. A rest of one day in seven is an excellent provision for labouring, and business men; and if they could be persuaded to use it aright, it would be inestimable. They cannot, however, keep Sunday to the Lord as his day, while they remain disobedient to the “one faith.” They must believe and obey the gospel, and then “continue steadfastly in the apostles’ doctrine, fellowship, breaking of bread, and in prayers.” When such assemble on the First Day for the worship of the Father in spirit and in truth; and to honour the Son even as they honour him, showing forth his death, and memorialising his resurrection, in hope of his appearing in his kingdom and glory, ceasing from their own works, and doing the works of God; they observe the Lord’s day in the only way acceptable to Him who seeketh only such to worship him as are intelligent in the truth.

Having brought the subject to this point, the following recapitulation is presented, which concludes this exposition of the Bible doctrine of the Sabbath. I have shown,

That the seventh day is the measure of the duration of each of the previous six days of the creation-work;

That God sanctified, or separated it, from the other days of the week as a sign foreshadowing good things to come, in a millennial Sabbatic day; which should be a sabbatismal refreshing for mankind when the work of replenishing the earth, and subduing it, should be sufficiently accomplished;

That the hallowed seventh day was incorporated with the institutions of Moses; and its observance imposed upon the Twelve Tribes of Israel, with the penalty of death to all individual violators of its holiness, and the overthrow of their commonwealth for its national desecration;

That the hallowed resting day, called Saturday by the Gentiles, was enjoined by the Mosaic law as a sign between Jehovah and the descendants of Jacob or Israel—a sign of the divine rest they shall enjoy from all their national afflictions, under their own kings and princes of the house of David—adopted into that royal house by an obedient faith in the gracious promises covenanted to him: and destined to ride upon the high places of the earth in the everlasting age;

That God commanded Israel to keep the sabbath day, because that in bringing them out of Egypt he had caused them to rest from all the works imposed upon them by Pharaoh's taskmasters;

That non-Israelitish nations were never commanded to keep the seventh day holy;

That Sunday, or the first day of the week, was never imposed upon the nations by divine authority to be kept holy according to the law of Saturday or the seventh day;

That the seventh day is kept holy neither by Israelites, nor Sabbatarians; because they do not observe it according to the requirements of its law; which, under existing circumstances, can be kept by none;

That Sunday will be the sabbath, or resting day, for Israel and the nations, when they shall all be constituted the kingdom and empire of Jehovah's king in the Age to Come. And lastly,

That the only persons who keep holy the sabbath day in its spiritual signification, are those who, having become obedient to the gospel of the kingdom promulgated in the name of Jesus as its king, "cease from their own works, as God rested from his."

THE MOVEMENTS OF RUSSIA.

The following is the copy of a letter addressed by the editor to Lord Palmerston, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, at the epoch of the Autocrat's intervention in aid of the Emperor of Austria against the Hungarians, and with the ulterior view of putting down rebellion throughout Europe. Thinking it might be interesting to the readers of the Herald at this crisis of renewed manifestation of autocratic ambition, it is now inserted in our columns. They will see that our prevision takes precedence of historical development, proving thereby the possibility of a correct interpretation of the prophets before the events they predict have come to pass. On June 10th, 1853, I delivered a discourse at Rochester, N. Y., on the Mission of Russia, in which I showed the identity of the Moscovite Power with the Gogue of Ezekiel and Daniel's King of the North, in chapter 11: 40; and that we might expect news of a warlike character from Constantinople every mail indicative of the movement of Russia against Turkey, as a result of the policy of the Frog-Power in Moslem affairs. In three days after tidings were published in New York that the Russian ambassador had left Constantinople, and that the Autocrat and Sultan were preparing for war. News has not yet arrived of its declaration; but this will come eventually: for, as I have often remarked in view of the divine testimony, peace cannot be maintained. The Moslem will lose the Dragon's throne, and yield it to the Czar. This will be a great sign of the times. Thenceforth events will develop rapidly. The Sultan's will not be the only imperial dynasty that will fall. The mission of the Frog-Power being accomplished, Napoleonism will give place to the Fleur de Lis; and the Bourbon dynasty will shine forth the reflector of the imperial majesty of the Czar. Events will head onwards towards the East. Palestine will be invaded, Egypt annexed, and Jerusalem captured, by "the proud man, who keepeth not at home, but enlargeth his desire as the grave and as death, and cannot be satisfied, but gathereth unto him all nations, and heapeth unto him all people—lading himself with thick clay." Possessed of the Holy Shrines, the mission of Russia is complete. This is the great sign to the believer that the Lord may hourly appear—this is the crowning event of the worldquake in 1848. "Watch" then, and be thankful that you are favoured, O Reader, with the monthly visits of a Herald, which points out to you with the precision of this periodical, the steps by which the great consummation of the faith is so surely and rapidly approaching. The King of Israel will not come upon you as a thief if you have wisdom enough to heed the things urged upon you in these pages. There is but little time left you to prepare for His manifestation. Woe be to you if he appear before you put on the wedding garment. There is no time for delay. Therefore trim your lamp with the oil of truth, that you may shine in the day of darkness and distress.

Lord Palmerston is said to hate Russia and Austria. It may be so; it is well known they have no affection for him, or his country. This enmity will increase and make Britain what she ought to be—the preadventual antagonist of the Assyrian, and the promoter of all good works, in the interest of the Jews and the Holy Land. The letter subjoined was a proffered hint in this direction. Whether it was discerned by his lordship, or perceived as a wink to the blind, I am not prepared to say. The letter is before the reader, who can draw conclusions for himself.

June 17th, 1853 EDITOR.

LETTER TO LORD PALMERSTON.

Your lordship, as "Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs," is doubtless well aware of the movements of Russia. The advance of such a Barbarian Host cannot be viewed with indifference by the Minister of a power having such a commercial stake in Europe and India, as Great Britain. To a statesman, reasoning from the premises of the past and present only, the future must be dark, or at most problematical. Can your lordship divine what will be the end of the Autocrat's beginning to put down rebellion in Europe? You may "guess," and conjecture, and "calculate," but without a revelation you cannot define the consummation of his ambition. Conjecture as to future results is the basis of the Foreign Policies of all nations. If the French President had prevised the inconvenient results of General Oudinot's expedition, he would probably not have sent him to Italy, and, if your lordship had seen the end of the Sicilian affair from the beginning, it is almost certain you would not have troubled yourself about the matter, unless to keep in check the impulses, or eccentricities of Gallic Diplomacy. Good, however, has resulted from your lordship's Sicilian and Italian policy, notwithstanding the thunderings of The Times. You have amused the Gauls and Propagandists, now exciting hopes and then creating fears, by which a diversion has been created in favour of the gallant Hunns, and time gained for the Austrians to make temporary headway, that they might be enabled to take part in the crisis that has overtaken Rome. A very important thing, by-the-bye; for by delaying the catastrophe at Rome, the collision between France and Austria is rendered more certain; and a power has at length been introduced into Italy, which will bring times of trouble upon the Austrians there as it did in former years.

Certainty, then, as a foundation for Foreign Policy, is "devoutly to be wished," I apprehend, by all Foreign Secretaries. Now, there has arisen no question of an importance to England (and Europe too) equal to that now arising out of the movements of the Autocrat. Your lordship ought to know what is the great crisis of the age looming in the future; and I am certain if you did you would open your eyes and become "wide awake." Is your lordship aware of what "the mission of our Sacred Russia" is? I suspect that the Autocrat himself does not at present dream of the magnitude of the work marked out for him by the finger of God: so that, if you were to confer with his ambassador, he would doubtless give you "the most solemn assurance" of the "pacific intentions" of his master. But, if your lordship be wise, you will put no faith in Nicolas or his representative. The former will just do what opportunity may hereafter invite him to do. Therefore believe no assurances he may give you.

Now, from the style of this letter, your lordship will conclude, that the writer at least does not believe that his premises are conjectural. Indeed he does not, or he would not trouble you with it. When Cyrus, King of Persia, saw what was written about him and his mission in Isaiah, he published a decree, saying, "the Lord God of Heaven hath given me all the kingdoms of the earth; and he hath charged me to build him a Temple in Jerusalem, which is in Judah;"—Isaiah 44: 28; 2 Chronicles 36: 23. This pagan prince, you perceive, acknowledged that what was written in the Prophet was a mandate of the Lord God to him, and he acted accordingly. He had faith in what was recorded there. He formed his policy according to its dictates; acted like a wise prince, and became the Protector of the Jewish Nation. A hint to the wise is enough.

I trust that your Lordship, with all the advantages of the 19th century at command, is not less enlightened, or less sagacious, than Cyrus or Nebuchadnezzar. The same writings they recognised in their Foreign Policy, reveal to your lordship, and to all men of mind, what the mission of Russia is, in regard to Europe and the Holy Land; so that by taking heed thereto, you will be in no danger of being victimised by the cunning of its diplomacy. The Prophets Ezekiel and Daniel (the latter, Grand Vizier to five of the greatest monarchs of antiquity,) have recorded the destiny of Russia in relation to Europe and the East; and also the part which Britain is destined to play as its antagonist in the approaching contest for the dominion of the Old World. Does your lordship care to know what they declare shall "surely come to pass" in relation to these powers? If so, then inquire where it can be shown what has been revealed through them upon the subject. "The wise shall understand." Seek the interpretation they can give, and your search will not be in vain.

With due respect for your lordship,

I subscribe myself,

JOHN THOMAS.

LAYARD'S LAST DISCOVERIES.

(Discoveries in the Ruins of Nineveh and Babylon. Being the result of a second Expedition undertaken for the Trustees of the British Museum. By Austen H. Layard, M.P. London: Murray, 1853.

Layard's Monuments of Nineveh, Second Series. London: Murray, 1853.)

The veil is gradually falling from one of the sublimest pictures that have been vouchsafed to the inquiring mind of man since he first addressed himself to the investigation of truth in the spirit of daring and heroic importunity. Upon the earth and above it, proofs of the wisdom and power of Omnipotent God, have long been accumulating upon us with a force and swiftness that might well challenge the respect of the sceptic and put to shame the audacious folly of the atheist. It has been left for our own time to deliver up from the very bowels of the earth evidence equally overwhelming and conclusive of the value and truth of those writings in which the doings of God's chosen people from the earliest times find their only record. It is difficult to speak or write without emotion of the significant and extraordinary discoveries that have been made upon the site of ancient Nineveh. We have read as children of the devastating wars of Sennacherib, and been subjected to the awe arising from the perusal of events occurring at a period of time which it fatigued even the imagination to reach. We have listened, as children still, to the prophetic denunciations of Ezekiel, and trembled as we reflected upon the dismal fate of the gorgeous city he had doomed—once a city, a barren desert now. We have grown older and acquired at school some knowledge of those classic times in which, first Greece, then Italy, stamped the impress of civilisation upon the world, —times so remote as to be themselves buried in antiquity, yet not so near to the still far-off Assyrian epoch as to be conscious of the least remains of its once-surpassing glory. As children, as youths, as men we have thought of Nineveh and Babylon as of the world before the flood, —with interest, —with belief, —with amazement, and with dread; but, knowing nothing of their history beyond the intimations afforded in the Bible, how could we entertain the hope that their hidden story, kept back from the conquerors of the world 2,000 years ago, should be revealed silently, but absolutely, and in all its fulness now? Yet, so it is! What the Geeks knew not we clearly apprehend. Three thousand years have passed over the Assyrian mounds—three thousand years of storm, of passion, of darkness, and of light, and at length the grave gives up its dead. Athens has breathed her beauty upon the world, and expired. Rome has lived to prove the triumph of its institutions and the hollowness of its strength. Yea, the Son of Man has appeared among the nations to teach a heaven-born creed, which, happily for human progress, is taking root in every quarter of the globe. Dynasties have risen and been extinguished. Great countries have dwindled into molehills, and specks of earth have grown into the mightiest empires; and, at the end of all, the crusted earth, beneath which Nineveh has for so many ages been inhumed, cracks, bursts asunder, and reveals, not a miracle, but a petrified verity—the monumental history of its greatness, the imperishable witness of its once incomparable renown, the marble commentary of an inspired text. It is all there! The other day we had but a glimpse of the treasure, —today we discern more; and every hour is adding to the richness and the marvel of the unexpected sight.

The connected history of these Assyrian discoveries is scarcely less interesting than the revelation itself. But for the concurrence of many fortunate incidents, the mounds of Assyria would still have held exclusive possession of their booty; and, but for the combination of a second series of such accidents, the precious acquisitions, even won, would have been worthless for want of an interpreter skilful enough to decipher their meaning. Let the reader accompany us for a moment as we endeavour hastily to trace the current of events which has made us heirs to one of the noblest legacies ever bequeathed to man. Knowledge of the subject, though general, is somewhat indistinct. Men have heard that palaces have been dug up at Nineveh, and they have seen sculptured giants in the halls of the British Museum. But it is time to know more. That we may be prepared for discoveries greater than any that have yet been brought to light—and such disclosures most assuredly await us—it is well for us to have an exact conception of the wealth of which we already stand possessed.

France shares with England in the glory of these acquisitions. The two nations are coheirs in this startling bequest from hoary antiquity. France, never slow to recognise the claims of her citizens upon her gratitude and affection, will know how to apportion the credit that attaches to any of her sons for services rendered on the Assyrian plains. England acknowledges one renowned name in connection with her portion of the gains, and is proud, as well she may be, of her chivalrous Layard. It is easy to see that from no ordinary traveller could such results have been obtained as those which Austen Layard has collected together for our wonder and instruction. Passionate enthusiasm in discovery and research; intense labour and perseverance; a cheerful, patient mind; a strong frame; great knowledge of men, of books, and of Eastern countries and habits; perfect self-command; a resolute will; a modest and conciliating demeanour; the faculty of ruling others as well as of controlling himself, —all these conditions were essential to the success achieved by the young Englishman, and all were possessed in a degree that cannot fail to win our admiration and regard. Mr. Layard was but 22 years of age, when in 1839, after having wandered through Asia Minor and Syria, “scarcely leaving untrod one spot hallowed by tradition, or unvisited one ruin consecrated by history,” he experienced the irresistible desire to penetrate to those regions beyond the Euphrates which for all time to come must be identified with his name. In his first published work he informed us how his wanderings in Asia Minor had been conducted. One adventurous spirit only was his travelling companion. The pair rode unattended; their arms were their sole protection; a valise behind their saddles was their wardrobe; they mixed freely among the people, acquired their language and their habits, and partook gratefully of their hospitality. “No experienced dragoman,” he wrote at the time, “measured our distances and appointed our stations. We were honoured with no conversations by Pashas, nor did we seek any civilities from governors. We neither drew tears nor curses from villagers by seizing their horses or searching their houses for provisions. Their welcome was sincere; their scanty fare was placed before us, we ate, and came, and went in peace.” This early training had an incalculable effect upon the subsequent operations. The influence exercised by Layard over his miscellaneous workmen and among his Arab sheikhs is not that of a powerful stranger, but rather of a beneficent chief, ruling by affection and justice in the midst of his own people. It is without the smallest feeling of surprise that we learn, for instance, how that none but Mussulmans are admitted within the holy precincts of a certain tomb at Nebbi Yunus, though this privileged Englishman has “more than once visited the shrine, with the sanction of his good friend Mullah Sultan, a guardian of the Mosque.” How could it be otherwise, when tribes at deadly war with each other agree to suspend their feuds at his bidding, and afflicted races, persecuted by the Turk and by each other, implored his mediation in the spirit of brotherhood and with confidence unbounded? In tracing the history, therefore, of the Assyrian discoveries, let us never be unmindful of what we owe to the especial character of the discoverer—a guileless man, as he appears from his books, frank in his utterance—with no envy or unworthy jealousies at his heart—plain-spoken and conscientious—learned and laborious—venerating the traditions of the past, yet, by his activity and intelligence, becoming a living embodiment of the advancing spirit of the present.

In the month of April, 1840, Layard first caught sight of the ruins of Nineveh, near the city of Mosul—rude heaps, without form, deposited in a scene as desolate as the remains themselves. He tells us that the huge mounds of Assyria then made a deeper impression upon him, and gave rise to more serious thoughts and more earnest reflection, than the temples of Balbec and the theatres of Ionia. His curiosity was excited, and from that time he formed the design “of thoroughly examining, whenever it might be in his power, these singular remains.” In the summer of 1842, Mr. Layard was in Mosul again. Since his former visit, M. Botta had been appointed French Consul at that place, and had found means to prosecute the work which Layard himself was eager to begin. Opposite to Mosul was the great mound of Konyunjik, and here the enterprising Frenchman had first commenced excavations. But his success on this spot was small. He had obtained but a very few fragments of brick and alabaster, when his attention was called to Khorsabad, a village some five hours distant from Mosul, where he was informed sculptured stones had from time to time been thrown up by natives digging for foundations for new houses. M. Botta quitted Konyunjik upon the intimation, and formed a trench in the mound at Khorsabad. His reward, so to speak, was instantaneous. To his astonishment he found that he had entered a chamber, connected with others, which was “surrounded by slabs of gypsum covered with sculptured representations of battles, sieges, and similar events.” The style of the sculptures was new, and no clue was present to guide him to the history of the men who had placed them there. Moreover, the slabs were accompanied by inscriptions which it was impossible to decipher, for the character was no longer in use among men, and seemed to defy all scholarship. It is true that this character, being cuneiform or arrow-headed, must necessarily have belonged to an age preceding that of Alexander; but, beyond this knowledge, the fortunate discoverer had no power to travel. It was clear at the very first glance that the monuments were the work of a very ancient and a very civilised people. It was not until a later period that it became equally certain that "M. Botta had discovered an Assyrian edifice, the first probably which had been exposed to the view of man since the fall of the Assyrian Empire." The mighty city of Nineveh could not be far off.

M. Botta communicated his discovery at once to the French Academy of Fine Arts, and the French government, with an enlightened munificence which it knows how to exercise at all times—whether it be the Government of a Republic or an Empire—sent to the Consul sufficient means to proceed with his excavations to the fullest possible extent. M. Botta lost no time. The work went forward, and by the beginning of 1845 the monument of Khorsabad had been to a large extent uncovered. The Consul, laden with fine specimens of Assyrian sculpture, many of them containing the most valuable, though as yet undeciphered inscriptions, returned to his country, a notability of his time.

Mr. Layard was at Constantinople during the progress of this singular labour. Drawings of the monuments came into his hands, and he publicly announced his conviction that the ruined palace brought to light by M. Botta owed its origin to the old Assyrian kings, and belonged to an age preceding the Persian conquest of Assyria. His anxiety to be upon the spot was now intense; for, although M. Botta had lighted upon an Assyrian palace, he was satisfied that Nineveh itself had yet to be discovered; and that the mounds of Nimroud below Mosul, as well as the ruins of Konyunjik, over against it, had treasures to give up, exceeding in interest and value even the important memorials rescued from Khorsabad. Sir Stratford Canning came to the help of the eager Englishman. He liberally advanced Mr. Layard from his own resources, sufficient money to carry on excavations for a limited period, and enabled him, in fact, to do all that he has since accomplished. Thus fortified, Mr. Layard quitted Constantinople in the middle of October, 1845, without acquainting any one with the object of his journey. He "crossed the mountains of Pontus and the great steppes of the Usun Yilak as fast as post-horses could carry him, descended the high lands into the valley of the Tigris, galloped over the vast plains of Assyria, and reached Mosul in 12 days."

On the 8th of November, Mr. Layard descended the Tigris, and in five hours reached Nimroud. He proceeded with his excavations in one of the mounds without delay; and, at the close of a day's work, found himself in possession of a chamber, the sides of which were marked by 10 large slabs, all in good preservation, and all containing cuneiform inscriptions, similar to those on M. Botta's bas reliefs. A quantity of charcoal and other evidences satisfied the explorer that the building into which he had penetrated had been destroyed by fire. At the end of three days more inscriptions were uncovered, but no sculptures; later, some bas relief sculptures were dug out; then came to light several gigantic figures, a human figure nine feet high, a pair of winged lions without heads, and more arrow-headed writings. Digging went on, and there seemed no end to the treasures. Before the end of March, two works of Assyrian art were unearthed, which threw all former discoveries into the shade—a pair of winged human-headed lions in perfect preservation, and most elaborately carved; "the most minute lines in the details of the wings and in the ornaments had been retained with their original freshness;" and the remains of colour might still be detected in the eyes. For hours, Mr. Layard tells us, he used to contemplate and muse over these mysterious emblems, the works of instructed races who had flourished 3,000 years ago.

"What more noble forms," he exclaims, "could have ushered the people into the temple of their gods? What more sublime images could have been borrowed from nature by men, who sought, unaided by the light of revealed religion, to borrow their conception of the wisdom, power, and ubiquity of a Supreme Being? They could find no better type of intellect and knowledge than the head of the man; of strength than the body of the lion; of rapidity of motion than the wing of the bird. These winged, human-headed lions were not idle creations, the offspring of mere fancy; their meaning was written upon them."

The entrance formed by the human-headed lions led into a chamber, round which were sculptured winged figures. Other chambers were dug out, and by degrees Mr. Layard was enabled, not only to collect the long-hidden sculptures of the Assyrian Kings, but also to trace out the form and character of the mighty structure of which they had formed so conspicuous and beautiful a part. He was master of the north-west palace of Nimroud.

The heat of the weather and the state of Mr. Layard's health compelled him to suspend for a time his operations at Nimroud. He quitted the neighbourhood for the hot season, and proceeded on a visit to the Tiyari Mountains, inhabited by the Nestorian Christians. Before he set out, however, he took care to transmit to England the first results of his labours, and to satisfy himself, to a certain extent, of the relative antiquity of the ruins of Konyunjik. Opening trenches in the great mound of this village he discovered sculptures and inscriptions that convinced him that the most ancient palace of Assyria was the one he had excavated at Nimroud, that Konyunjik and Khorsabad belonged to a more recent epoch, and that in all probability the two latter were contemporary structures.

Upon his return to Mosul in September, Mr. Layard received letters from England informing him that the Government had granted to the British Museum funds for the continuation of the researches commenced at Nimroud, and that he might proceed with his excavations. The grant was miserably small and insufficient, and significantly contrasted with the liberal sum placed by the French authorities at the disposal of M. Botta; but Mr. Layard cheerfully accepted his commission, and determined to go forward. In October he was again at Nimroud. His success was greater than he could have expected from the scantiness of his means. Some admirably executed bas reliefs representing the wars of the King of Assyria were found, and in the centre of the mound was discovered a black marble obelisk about six feet six inches high, having on each side five small bas reliefs, and above, below, and between the sculptures a carved inscription 210 lines in length. The monument was well preserved, the figures were well defined, and the cuneiform inscriptions perfect. In the south-west corner of the mound discoveries scarcely less important were made at the same time. The southern entrance to the palace was formed by a pair of winged lions, and between them were a pair of crouching sphinxes. The sphinxes, when entire, were five feet in length, but it would appear that the fire which had consumed the building had raged severely in this direction, for the whole entrance was buried in charcoal, and the sphinxes were almost reduced to lime. One had been nearly destroyed; but the other, though cracked in a thousand pieces, was still standing when uncovered. Mr. Layard had scarcely time to make a drawing of the riven monument before it fell into useless fragments at his feet. On Christmas day 23 cases more, all filled with Nineveh monuments, and one of them containing the obelisk, floated down the Tigris on their way to the British Museum.

After Christmas Mr. Layard resumed his labours. By the end of April, 1847, he had opened twenty-eight rooms in the north-west palace of Nimroud, which had not been destroyed by fire, and had exhumed a variety of bas reliefs, figures, and ornaments, all affording remarkable evidence of the period to which they belonged. One specimen, consisting of two slabs, forming an entrance to a small chamber, contained the name of the King who built the Khorsabad Palace, and proved the greater antiquity of the building at Nimroud. So long as his money held out the indefatigable explorer went on; but, for want of means, Mr. Layard was at length compelled to desist from further digging at Nimroud. "There were too many tangible objects in view," he writes in his first publication, "to warrant an outlay in excavations promising no immediate results; and a great part of the mound of Nimroud was left to be explored when the ruins of Assyria should be further examined." We shall see hereafter, when Mr. Layard returns to his labours at Nimroud, how much he had still left himself to accomplish in these parts.

From Nimroud Mr. Layard proceeded to the mounds of Kalah Shergat, a village on the Tigris, a few miles below Nimroud, and by some travellers supposed to be the Ur of the Chaldees. Here a sitting figure in black basalt was uncovered, of the size of life, but much mutilated; on three sides of the block on which the figure sat were cuneiform inscriptions. The writing was in part defaced, but enough remained to enable him to fix the comparative epoch of the ruins. The same reason that induced Mr. Layard to suspend operations at Nimroud would seem to have influenced him at Kalah Shergat, and he accordingly returned to Mosul after having spent only two days on the spot. Having reached the city he despatched to England, under somewhat exciting circumstances, the largest and most important monuments he had yet secured. Such sculptures as he was unable to forward he restored to their former graves until more favourable circumstances should enable him to add sensibly to the interesting collection.

A small sum of money, however, still remaining in his hands, Mr. Layard resolved, before returning home, to make some inroad into the mound of Konyunjik, into which, it will be remembered, M. Botta had originally dug without waiting long enough to reap the fruit of his attempt. According to Mr. Layard's theory, Nimroud, Konyunjik, and Khorsabad at one time formed part of the same great city, although each of the palace temples was probably the centre of a separate quarter. In his first work he distinctly states that the city was originally founded on the spot now occupied by the ruins of Nimroud—that the north-west palace was first built, and that successive monarchs added the centre palace and other edifices which rose by its side. As the population increased, and conquered nations were brought to settle round the Assyrian capital, the dimensions of the city increased also. A king, founding a new dynasty, chose a new site for the erection of a palace. The city, gradually spreading at length embraced all these buildings.

“Thus Nimroud represents the original site of Nineveh. At a much later period, subsequent monarchs erected their temple palaces at Khorsabad and Konyunjik. Their descendants returned to Nimroud. The city had now attained the dimensions assigned to it by the Greek geographers and by the sacred writings. The numerous royal residences, surrounded by gardens and parks, and enclosed by fortified walls, each being a distinct quarter known by a different name, formed together the great city of Nineveh.”

A month's work at Konyunjik was not thrown away. By the end of that time nine chambers were explored (of the same character as those at Khorsabad and Nimroud), the largest of which was 130 feet long and 30 feet wide, and many bas-reliefs were uncovered. “The ruins,” writes the explorer, “were evidently those of a palace of great magnificence. The sculptures portrayed the battles, conquests, and triumphs of the Assyrian King, whom one of the inscriptions pointed out to be the son of the builder of Khorsabad.” By the month of June the sum furnished by the liberality of the British Government was expended, and Mr. Layard brought, for the present, his worthy labours to a close. He covered up the ruins, and the Assyrian palaces were once more hidden from the eye. It was time to return to England, and to urge upon the authorities the necessity of further exploration. The sculptures, attesting to the value of what had already been accomplished, were already on their homeward road. The inscriptions which promised to reveal the history and civilisation of one of the most ancient and illustrious nations of the earth, had been carefully copied. A year before not one Assyrian monument had been known beyond those which had been so fortunately discovered by M. Botta at Khorsabad. The time of disinterment had been most opportune. Had the palaces been exposed to view some years previously, Mr. Layard contends that no European could have preserved them from complete destruction. Had they been discovered a little later, he adds, there would have been insurmountable objections to their removal. How can we sufficiently rejoice at having secured in our city the most convincing and lasting evidence of the magnificence and power which made Nineveh the wonder of the ancient world!

On the 24th of June 1847, Mr. Layard quitted Mosul for England. Having reached his own country, he prepared, but did not as yet publish, the memorable work from which we have, in order to bring the whole subject clearly before the reader's eye, hastily collected the few preceding facts. “After a few month's residence in England during the year 1848, to recruit,” as he tells us, “a constitution worn by long exposure to the extremes of an Eastern climate,” he received orders to proceed to his post at Her Majesty's Embassy in Turkey. It was after his departure for the East that his admirable book was given to the world. It was welcomed as it deserved to be, and noticed in these columns at the time. Among its other effects was a request from the British Museum to Mr. Layard, to undertake the superintendence of a second expedition into Assyria. That gentleman responded cheerfully to the summons. On the 28th of August, 1849, he left the Bosphorus by an English steamer bound for Trebizonde. On the 28th of April, 1851, he again bade farewell to Nineveh. What he had accomplished in the meanwhile is contained in the charming and most instructive volumes, the titles of which we have given. We shall proceed to dwell with more minuteness upon their contents than we have thought it necessary to extend to the earlier production. During the first expedition Mr. Layard, so to speak, laboured in the dark, as a student busy with the mere alphabet of his science, or as a clerk patiently and humbly transcribing rare documents which he was not as yet privileged to decipher. He has derived knowledge and experience from his pursuit, and every fresh discovery has given him new confidence and additional strength. He is now a man where he was formerly a child—a free master, where he was once the laborious apprentice. The other day he had enough to do to collect and arrange his scanty materials; at this hour he generalises upon the accumulated results of his work, and proudly points to the connected and marvellous history he has built up from the broken but splendid fragments conveyed by his industry and zeal from the mounds of Assyria to the Museum of our own London city.

Before we trace, however, the latest discoveries of this intelligent man, it is due to another name, as well as to Mr. Layard and our readers, to advert briefly to other discoveries no less extraordinary and interesting than those with which we are immediately concerned, and of which, indeed, they form a most important feature. We have spoken of inscriptions found on the bas-reliefs. These inscriptions, written in characters no longer in use among men, and utterly unintelligible to the common eye, are freely rendered in Mr. Layard's volumes, and are made to interpret events and to indicate facts of the most momentous kind. But for such rendering, all the excavations must have been to no purpose, and the sculptured monuments would have been worthless as the dust from which they have been torn. By what splendid accidents, then, has it happened that illumination has been thrown into heaps, and that art, interred for 3,000 years, becomes, when brought to light, in an instant as familiar to us all as though it were but the dainty work of yesterday? How comes it that these arrow-headed, or, as they are more generally styled, cuneiform characters, which bear no analogy whatever to modern writing of any kind, and which have been lost to the world since the Macedonian conquest, are read by our countrymen with a facility that commands astonishment and a correctness that admits of no dispute? The history is very plain, but certainly as remarkable as it is simple. Fifty years ago the key that has finally opened the treasure-house was picked up, unawares, by Professor Grotefend, of Gottingen. In the year 1802 this scholar took it into his head to decipher some inscriptions which were, and still are, to be found on the walls of Persepolis, in Persia. These inscriptions, written in three different languages, are all in the cuneiform (or wedge-like) character, and were addressed, as it now appears, to the three distinct races acknowledging in the time of Darius the Persian sway—viz., to the Persians proper, to the Scythians, and to the Assyrians. It is worthy of remark, that although the cuneiform character is extinct, the practice of addressing these races in the language peculiar to each still prevails on the spot. The modern Governor of Bagdad, when he issues his edicts, must, like the great Persian King, note down his behests in three distinct forms of language, or the Persian, the Turk, and the Arab who submit to his rule will find it difficult to possess themselves of his wishes. When Grotefend first saw the three kinds of inscription he concluded the first to be Persian, and proceeded to his task with this conviction. He had not studied the writing long before he discerned that all the words of all the inscriptions were separated from each other by a wedge, placed diagonally at the beginning or end of each word. With this slight knowledge for his guide, he went on a little further. He next observed that in the Persian inscription one word occurred three or four times over, with a slight terminal difference. This word he concluded to be a title. Further investigation and comparison of words induced him to guess that the inscription recorded a genealogy. The assumption was a happy one. But to whom did the titles belong? With no clue whatever to help him, how should he decide? By an examination of all the authorities, ancient and modern, he satisfied himself at least of the dynasty that had founded Persepolis, and then he tried all the names of the dynasty in succession, in the hope that some would fit. He was not disappointed. The names were Hystaspes, Darius, and Xerxes. Although the actual pronunciation of these names had to be discovered, yet by the aid of the Zend (the language of the ancient Persians) and of the Greek the true method of spelling was so nearly arrived at that no doubt of the accuracy of the guess could reasonably be entertained. The achievement had been worth the pains, for twelve characters of the Persian cuneiform inscription were now well secured. Twenty-eight characters remained to be deciphered before the inscriptions could be mastered. Grotefend here rested.

The next step was taken by M. Bournouf, a scholar intimately acquainted with the Zend language. In 1836 he added considerably to the Persian cuneiform alphabet by reading 24 names on one of the inscriptions at Persepolis; but a more rapid stride was made subsequently by Professor Lassen, of Bonn, who, between the years 1836 and 1844, to use the words of Mr. Ferguson, the learned and ingenious restorer of the palaces of Nineveh and Persepolis, "all but completed the task of alphabetical discovery."

While progress was thus making in Europe, Colonel Rawlinson, stationed at Kermanshah, in Persia, and ignorant of what had already been done in the west, was arriving at similar results by a process of his own. He too had begun to read the Persian cuneiform character on two inscriptions at Hamadan, the ancient Ecbatana. This was in 1835. In 1837 he had been able to decipher the most extensive Persian cuneiform inscription in the world. On the high road from Babylonia to the East stands the celebrated rock of Behistun. It is almost perpendicular, and rises abruptly to the height of 1,700 feet. A portion of the rock, about 300 feet from the plain, and still very perfect, is sculptured, and contains inscriptions in the three languages already spoken of. The sculpture represents King Darius and the vanquished chiefs before him—the inscriptions detail the victories obtained over the latter by the Persian monarch. This monument, at least 2,350 years old, deciphered for the first time by Major Rawlinson, gave to that distinguished Orientalist more than 80 proper names to deal with. It enabled him to form an alphabet. Between the Major and Professor Lassen no communication whatever had taken place, yet when their alphabets were compared they were found to differ only in one single character. The proof of the value of their discoveries was perfect.

Thus far the Persian cuneiform character! To decipher it was to take the first essential step towards reading the cuneiform inscriptions on the walls at Nineveh. But for the Persepolis walls, the Behistun rock, and Colonel Rawlinson, it would have been a physical impossibility to decipher one line of the Assyrian remains. In the Persian text only 40 distinct characters had to be arrived at; and when once they were ascertained the light afforded by the Zend, the Greek, and other aids rendered translation not only possible but certain to the patient and laborious student. The Assyrian alphabet, on the other hand, has no fewer than 150 letters; many of the characters are ideographs or hieroglyphics representing a thing by a non-phonetic sign, and no collateral aids whatever exist to help the student to their interpretation. The reader will at once apprehend, however, that the moment the Persian cuneiform character on the Behistun rock was overcome, it must have been a comparatively easy task for the conqueror to break the mystery of the Assyrian cuneiform inscription, which, following the Persian writing on the rock, only repeated the same short history. Darius, who carved the monument in order to impress his victories upon his Assyrian subjects, was compelled to place before their eye the cuneiform character which they alone could comprehend. The Assyrian characters on the rock are the same as those on the bas-reliefs in the Assyrian palaces. Rawlinson, who first read the Persian inscriptions at Behistun, and then by their aid made out the adjacent Assyrian inscriptions, has handed over to Layard the first fruits of his fortunate and splendid discovery, and enabled him for himself to ascertain and fix the value of the treasures he has so unexpectedly rescued from annihilation. As yet, as may readily be imagined, the knowledge of the Assyrian writing is not perfect; but the discovery has already survived its infancy. Another year or two of scholastic investigation, another practical visit to the ancient mounds, and the decipherment will be complete! Fortunate Englishmen! Enviably day-labourers in the noblest vocation that can engage the immortal faculties of man! What glory shall surpass that of the enterprising, painstaking, and heroic men who shall have restored to us, after the lapse of thousands of years, the history and the actual stony presence of the world-renowned Nineveh, and enabled us to read with our own eyes, as if it were our mother tongue, the language suspended on the lips of men for ages, though written to record events in which the prophets of Almighty God took a living interest! —London Times.

THE FATE OF TURKEY.

It is impossible to exaggerate the importance of the events now taking place at Constantinople. The attention of every politician in Europe is fixed upon them. Above all, the English public ought clearly to understand the relation in which this country stands with Turkey, the nature of the mighty interests at stake, the magnitude of the question which may arrive at its solution tomorrow, or may impend during months, or even years.

A great and ancient empire, a member of the European states system, is rapidly passing away. Of this even the most indifferent speculators are at last convinced. No one pretends to doubt that the Ottoman power is falling. Influences are acting against it which its tottering frame and decrepit spirit cannot, by any possibility, withstand. Two of the principal governments of Europe are employing all the art and force at their disposal to undermine it. A third has lately sought to prevent the success of those intrigues by more unscrupulous intrigues of its own. A fourth—we mean Great Britain—though apparently resolved to maintain Turkey against external attack, seems utterly at a loss respecting the manner in which the inevitable result of her internal decay is to be provided for.

Meanwhile, it is certain that the catastrophe, whether we provide for it or not, is approaching. The Porte has not for a long period been independent. It has been under the protection of a British ambassador. Its integrity is virtually gone. Up to this moment, however, by advising and assisting, by patching and repairing, the mouldering fabric has been preserved erect, and our influence in Eastern Europe has enjoyed a just preponderance, because there was a state, nominally independent, on the shores of the Bosphorus. That security is now failing us. To foreign intrigue and aggression are added domestic corruptions, impoverishment, and disorganisation, so great that every statesman and journalist of any importance confesses the further existence of the Ottoman Empire, as it stands, to be utterly out of the question. We now have, in addition to the general information which previously existed on the subject, an important pamphlet, written “by One who has Resided in the Levant,” in which the writer exposes the true condition of the Turkish dominions. He shows that many false ideas have been propagated on this subject, and many such, we know, are circulated by the paid agents of the Porte. However, the author of Hints on the Solution of the Eastern Question removes any doubts which might have lingered in our minds. And what is his picture of the empire whose territories are soon to be disposed of? Its fleet is a mere show; its army is an ill-paid, undisciplined, and spiritless rabble; its finances are exhausted, and rendered more miserable through the attempt to replenish them by fraud; the pride of the nation is gone; the incapacity and peculation of officials are only equalled by the poverty and discontent of the people; a conflict of foreign factions has usurped the place of the legitimate government in the capital; open and irrepressible revolt is spreading in the provinces, and, instead of a single favourable sign appearing, every day brings the eruption of a new malady, and the exposure of new weakness.

Statesmen and merchants in Great Britain are alarmed. They exclaim that one more effort must be made to preserve the integrity of the Turkish empire, in order that Russian arms or politics may not sweep our influence, our commerce, and our interests as an empire out of Eastern Europe as well as the Mediterranean. We tell them they will lose their labour. The resuscitation of a dead power is hopeless. The Ottoman state is palsied, paralysed, fed upon already by insurrection and the territorial avarice of its neighbours. Therefore our diplomacy can avail nothing in this direction; we cannot prevent the fall of the Turkish empire. Fall it will, whether we assist or oppose. There remains, then, the question—how shall the inheritance bequeathed by this defunct government be disposed of? The distribution of it among Russia, Austria, France, and Great Britain is proposed. To that we have more than one answer. It would be morally iniquitous. It would disarrange the whole balance of Europe. It could not well be effected; and, even if it were, would infallibly lead to future wars. Chiefly, however, we insist that it would be a flagitious crime, against which the sense of this age would revolt. No one who supports the idea ought ever again to say one word condemning the partition of Poland and the annexation of Cracow. Besides, difficulties almost insuperable present themselves at the very first contemplation of the idea, even if we omit the argument that it would be the worst policy for a free country like ours to add millions of population and the area of many ancient kingdoms to increase the mass of humanity already suffering under the despotism of Austria, Russia, and France.

There remains, then, but one alternative, which is proposed by “One who has Resided in the Levant,” and has been accepted by our leading journalists. This is the erection of a Christian state upon the ruins of the Ottoman monarchy. The Greeks, as the most numerous, the best civilised, the most intelligent, and the least prejudiced people in Eastern Europe, would, of course, form the basis of the new arrangement; and an independent powerful Greek government might be set up in place of an effete and crumbling despotism, which threatens every hour to fall, and overwhelm in its descent the tranquillity of the world. The Greeks have already the focus of a state. They are the rightful possessors of the country which it is now proposed to restore to them, and they were only deprived of those countries by an invasion like that of a banditti. The establishment of a free Greek power in the present dominions of the Porte, appears, therefore, the only facile and safe solution of this formidable question.

Commercially, nothing could be more advantageous to Great Britain than such an arrangement as this. Politically, it would be of utmost benefit, because a real barrier would thus be erected against the tide of Russian power, and the gates of the east would be once more secure. As it is, our influence throughout Western Asia and Eastern Europe, and even our position in India, stand ready to be shaken by the first collision of national interests in the Dardanelles. The development of our trade is slow, and the amount of our manufactures consumed comparatively small. We are pledged to uphold a state which cannot continue to exist, and which, in the religion, manners, interest, and opinions of its ruling nationality, is completely dis severed from our own. If we seek to ensure perpetuity to a system like this, plainly the result will be that we shall disgrace ourselves, without benefiting our protégé. Treaties are valuable because they are the depositions of the agreements of nations under a common public law, but there is a law paramount to treaties, and the moment we attempt to oppose our conventions to the course of nature, our diplomacy becomes worse than contemptible. —Sunday Times.

“The erection of a Christian state upon the ruins of the Ottoman monarchy,” and that state “an independent, powerful Greek government,” opposed to Russian aggression, is an “alternative” beyond the compass of possibility. The progress of the northern king is not to be stayed by such a device as this. He is by faith already Greek; and when he comes against Stamboul, he will establish a state upon the ruins of the Moslem empire, that will be as independent, powerful, and Greek, as “our leading journalists” can wish; but not anti-Russian, as they would fondly hope. A Greco-Roman dominion sceptred by the “Prince of Ros, Mosc, and Tobl,”—Russia, Moscovy, and Tobolski—is the “Christian state” soon to be founded “upon the ruins of the Ottoman monarchy.” The Bible declares this, and the opposition of France and England will only expedite the catastrophe. It is truly cheering to see the end approaching. A few years will place Nebuchadnezzar’s Image upon its feet among the mountains of Israel, with the Greek element embodied in its “belly and thighs of brass.” Then “will I raise up thy sons, O Zion, against thy sons, O Greece, and make thee, O Zion, as the sword of a mighty man, saith Jehovah. And the Lord shall be seen over them, and Ephraim shall go forth as the lightning; and the Lord God shall blow the trumpet, and shall go forth with whirlwinds of the south.” Coming events cast their shadows before. The “alternative” of “our leading journalists” is one of these shadowy forms. The Greek state will come up; but they must accept it as presented to the world by one who is destined to move the heart of Britain as British hearts were never moved before.

THE EASTERN QUESTION.

TURKEY AND THE BALANCE OF POWER.

(To the Editor of the Leader.)

Sir, —The question of Turkey is of more than European importance. From the first moment when those distant specks upon the horizon denoted the gathering clouds that have hung over the capital of the East, the public expectation of the Continent and of Great Britain has been directed with incessant anxiety to the Bosphorus, seeking some tangible ground of hope and some indication of encouragement. And now, the “Dead March in Saul” is already being played over the Turkish empire! When Lord Chatham exclaimed, that he could hold no discussion “with that man who did not see the interest of England in the preservation of the Ottoman Empire;” his lordship did not foresee the crisis which would call that sentence from oblivion and attach to it its due weight and importance. Yet in connection with the balance of power that sentence is of little consequence; it derives its practical application from other and more reasonable sources. Greece gave the first fatal blow to Mussulman supremacy, (In 1821, when the Sixth Vial began to pour out upon Turkey. —Editor Herald), founded upon the unconditional accord of Western support. Ibrahim Pasha followed the bitter stroke with more effective hostilities; but as a question between Mussulman and Mussulman, not involving religious tenets nor ages of glorious memory, the fleets of Europe propped up the decrepitude of Turkey, and condemned to inaction the nervous arm that would have regenerated the enfeebled East. And this, sir, was to preserve the so-called balance of power! Well—the balance of power so marvellously preserved; this balance of power for which Europe risked a general war; this same said balance of power is now proclaimed dead; the unfortunate victim of a felo de se, without example and without parallel.

Possibly Turkey contained within itself the elements of decay. Founded upon fanaticism and the sword, and upon doctrines irreconcilable with civilisation, its only virility lay in war, its only safety in bigotry. The struggle was for life and death, and Turkey is weakened—nearly destroyed. Yet the members of the Greek Church—all fanatics, multitudes plunderers—are strong, powerful, and tending to a great nationality! The struggle here was, or must be, one of life and death also. But the ruler of Turkey, enlightened before his time and his people, prematurely chose reform; its consequences face us now.

Mahmoud—that melancholy image which rises before us with the blood of the empire oozing from every pore, was a reforming sultan. The successor to the power that thundered under the walls of Vienna and filled Christian (Not “Christian,” but papal kingdoms, styled in Scripture, “the Kingdoms of this World.” —Editor Herald) kingdoms with terror and dismay, desired to inoculate Europeanism upon the tree of Turkish life and failed; for with the blood of the Janissaries rolled through the gutters of Constantinople the last remaining hope and strength of the Ottomans. “Lord Palmerston is not the Minister of Russia or of Austria, he is the Minister of England.” Mahmoud should have lived and died the Sultan of Turkey; he forgot his mission, he misunderstood his time, and failed. Broad national characteristics are the life-blood of nationalities. Faithful to his Empire, had Mahmoud raised on high the standard of a fanaticism that had already conquered half the world, allah il allah might again have rung in the ears of the startled Viennese. Reformatory Ministries for Turkey! And the first great Liberal Minister convicted of peculations that would have overwhelmed the concoctor of the “state lotteries” with astonishment and with dismay!

Toleration for Turkey! Christian virtues and charities conferred by heathenism, and by a Government whose vitality was drawn from heathen springs. No wonder, sir, the springs refused to run. No wonder effete bashaws and weak sultans. No wonder the Turkish empire shrank, dried, (This is the language of the Apocalypse, though the writer knows it not. John says: “The sixth angel poured out his vial upon the Euphrates, and the water thereof was dried up.” The Ottoman is a dried up dominion. —Editor Herald), shrivelled up to the merest skin and bone, and existed but by the outward pressure and support necessary to keep its trembling joints within their sockets. And those poor creaking joints and this rickety skeleton are the remnants of Soliman! Yes, broad, national characteristics are the life-blood of nationalities. Modern sentimentality seeks national strength, and comprehensive, almost universal, principles. Impossible realisation. For each land has its church, its religion, and prejudices. Assimilate all these and men have no individual country worth struggling for; it is the same life in the latitude of Constantinople, of St. Petersburg, of Vienna, Berlin, Paris, and London. If we desire no nationality, let us call upon Lamartine, install him at the Invalides or Pimlico, and assist in administering the Christianised government and the Ibergallitanian republic! Turkey has fallen, then, and from the inoculation of Europeanism. The virile infidel, who braved the hammer of Martel, who stood before the greatest armies of the world, has succumbed to doctrinal discourses, and to the theories of civilisation. Is this a victory or a defeat?

In presence of that gigantic Colossus, whose brutal heels have crushed growing nationalities, and whose giant steps have spanned 2500 miles into Europe, whose fleets ride triumphantly the Black Sea, and whose battlements frown terror upon Constantinople: —in presence of this Czar Nicholas, the most wily politician of the present age, who shall affirm that Turkey weakened, is Christianity and freedom strengthened, or civilisation reinforced? “History is continually repeating itself.” This strange jingle of Lavalette, Menschikoff, Rose de la Cour, Stratford de Redcliffe, is but a substitution for Zarik, Roderick, Amblessa, Eudes, Abderame, and Martel. The juggle of words, the jargon of mere phrases, momentarily usurps empire over the sword; and oh! Strange and significant moral, it is again the pretext of religious fanaticism; but this time the fanaticism of Christianity, which makes Constantinople the scene of its impious struggles, and which conducts its obscene wrestlings on the steps of the holy sepulchre. Constantinople, the metropolis of Mahometanism, the heart of the prophet’s faith, with its ventricles surcharged and stifled with the breath of Christian doctrinists! The temples of this religion of the sword, resounding with the clamour of diplomatists, the murmured prayers of these Mussulman devotees, broken in upon by the wordy brawlings of Christian controversy; strange spectacle! over which the crescent casts a pale ray, the last enfeebled beam of the glorious radiancy of the Ottoman empire. Yes, when Turkey surrendered the initiative of fanaticism, when she became the object—the battle-ground—of religious diplomacy, forgetting her promulgative mission, she proclaimed her own rapid abasement and her speedy fall.

And thus, sir, we see reform and toleration struggling with prejudices and blind fanaticism. The infatuated ruler of diversified races, seated in the palace of the dominant faithful, destroying the keenness of the edge of that flaming sword which placed him there. Surrounded by Bosnians and Wallachs, by Servians and Montenegrins, by all the hot-blooded belief of the children of the Greek Church, with half-revolted provinces, active and persevering enemies on his frontiers, exhausted treasuries, corrupt innovating ministers, the humbled descendant of the conquering Prophet perseveres in reform and toleration, and signs, in abject dismay, the shameful treaty dictated by the Russian power, under the walls of the second city of the Turkish Empire! Having broken the well-tempered Damascus blade of the true believer, having affirmed the worthless character of the dogmas on which the glory of the crescent was erected, the Sultan sees before him rebellious provinces and revolted dependencies, which even threaten to overturn the trembling throne itself. And the descendants of the prophet, armed no more in the panoply of their belief, forget to draw their impatient swords to avenge the divinity of their faith. The humiliated Sultan stretches his arms towards the West, invoking the aid of Christianity! And it is the sword of Christianity which raises the despised crescent, only that, despaired of even by its own followers, it may tremble rapidly to its proximate fall.

Sententious dogmatists, great statesmen, utterers of brilliant aphorisms, contemplate history inscribing your frailties upon the ever-enduring tablets of her marble records. “The balance of power,” that unfortunate sentence, which has cost England her hundreds of millions, and made bankrupts of great and powerful states, has hurled the world far back, centuries in arrear of her destined advancement. The infallibility of that principle has been screeched forth, when it has been the most infringed. Turkey, Poland, Italy, Russia, Spain, speak to its absurdity and to its impracticability. And now the people, pleased like children with a new toy, still unconvinced, ignorant of the strength and of the sources of weakness within nations, —unconscious of the pressure applied from without, dreaming of an equilibrium and self-abnegation, which are impossible, continue to hold up the battered doll of non-intervention, as the image which we must henceforth fall down before and reverently worship!

But, sir, this worship of principles has already cost us much: it threatens to cost us still more; and the object of my next letter will mainly be to indicate the unexpected and melancholy results that non-intervention has always hitherto produced, and to foreshadow, by this indication, what, if applied to our future policy, and especially to Turkey, will be its pernicious and fatal consequences.

THE PROPHECY OF THE VIRGIN'S SON.

Such is the passage of prophecy, in the heart of which the prophecy of the Son of the Virgin is contained. We have seen every jot and every tittle of it fulfilled. It is a literal prophecy literally accomplished in all its parts. Ephraim is broken from being a people; from the set time, three score and five years after the utterance of the prophecy, Ephraim hath ceased to be a people. Rezin and Remaliah's son were cut off before the lad Shearjasub could discern between good and evil. The house of David hath been in distress and humiliation, the people of Judah and Benjamin under captivity and oppression, the Holy Land under wasteness and desecration, and continue so until this day. In the midst of such disastrous tidings, such violence of woe, is the birth of Immanuel, the Virgin's Son, introduced as a sign, token, and surety. That the evils of woe poured upon David's house, and David's throne, and David's people, and David's land, should not utterly overwhelm them, should not abide forever, but have an accomplishment and an end. That time, place, and persons should be left for the accomplishment of those better promises, that double recompense of blessings and eternal glory which is yet to rest upon all these humbled and oppressed things, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord, when all confederacies and associations of all countries against the land of Immanuel, shall be broken in pieces, and shall come to nought for (because of) Immanuel—Isaiah 8: 10; when the government shall be upon the shoulders of the Child that is born unto them, when he shall sit upon the throne of David and upon his kingdom to order it, and to establish it with justice and with judgment from henceforth, even for ever, —Isaiah 9: 6-7. Therefore, O Jew, who believest in the Son of Mary, be comforted and reassured, for the sign hath been given. But if thou believest not, then walk on in darkness; for thou seest not the sign of the preservation of David's house. And thou, O Christian, who believest in the sign, believe in the thing whereof it is the sign; and no more doubt that David's house shall be re-established in Jerusalem, in the Holy Land, and that Immanuel, God with us (then indeed with us, no longer away from us,) shall sit on David's throne, than thou doubttest the other parts of this veritable prophecy.

From this prophecy thus literally interpreted, I make this inference, that it is a grievous error to say, as men do now say, that prophecy is only to be understood when it is accomplished; to say that it is idle, or worse than idle, to attempt to understand it till then; for surely Ahaz well knew what this burden betokened to him, to his confederated enemies, and to Ephraim; or if he did not, it was a blindness of the understanding brought on by a perversity of the will, in which also consisteth, as I deem, much of our present ignorance of prophecy. Like Ahaz, we will not have a sign; like Ahaz, we weary both God and man; like Ahaz, we regard not the prophetic word; and like Ahaz, the church will come to destruction for this very offence. And if the sign itself, that the Virgin Mary should conceive, which is the nucleus of the prophecy, should have been hidden from the understandings of men before the coming of Christ, whereof we cannot now with accuracy judge, this also was for want of faith, not for want of simplicity or sincerity in the language; for want of that faith which Abraham had when he believed God, that he and Sarah should have a son in their old age: and this want of faith proceedeth from doubting concerning the power of God to change the laws and ordinances of nature; and this doubt leads men to degrade and explain away the prophecy until it become commensurate with the ordinary methods of cause and effect. But if the Jews had believed the word exactly as it is written, it would have proved to them a sure and almost infallible sign whereby to know Immanuel, and knowing him to believe in him, and to believe in the restoration of their estate by the Man who should be born of the Virgin. In like manner, if we could bring ourselves to believe in the coming of Christ, and in all those things which he is to accomplish exactly as they are written, we would see a fulfilment of them in the time of the Lord, and even in this present time, we would see all things concurring with that progression of signs, which is to draw on the fulfilment. But if we will not believe, we cannot be established, but shall surely perish in our unbelief.

My second observation is with respect to the great error of those who say that God never intended that we should know the times and the seasons of the fulfilment of the prophecy; whereas he gives both a period of years and a date in the life-time of a child then before the king, within which the events of the prophecy should be accomplished. But the true cause of all these falsehoods is, that men have such slight and unreal notions of God's being and providence, their faith in God is so much weaker than their faith in time, place, and circumstance, that they cannot believe in any word of God which comes into competition with their belief in the ordinary course of events. When the course of events has made the prophecy to become history, they can credit the prophecy because it coincides with the history; but until such coincidence, they have no faith in it at all. Now, I would rather, for my part, have a firm faith in God, as foreseeing, and overruling, and predicting all, though my interpretations thereof should, in most instances, be wrong, than have no faith in God as overruling all, though I should never be detected in a false expectation. What I am about to say may seem extreme to many, but I believe it, and therefore will say it; and it is a solemn word with which this first interpretation may be well concluded. That those who have attempted to interpret prophecy, or love to hear it interpreted, are the only persons who have had actual faith in prophecy. And now, may the Lord bless this endeavour to open his prophetic word, and commend it to the hearts of all his people! —Proph. Exp.

THE ENEMIES OF DAVID'S HOUSE.

Egypt was the first to bring dishonour upon the house of David, and oppression upon the land of Israel by the hand of Pharaoh Nechoh, who slew king Josiah, at Megiddo, —2 Kings 23: 29—and put his son in bonds at Riblah, and put the land to tribute of a hundred talents of silver, and a talent of gold, and dethroned Jehoahaz, and set up Jehoiakim in his stead, and made the land tributary. Then came Nebuchadnezzar, the king of Babylon, the fruit of the Assyrian, and laid him under tribute three more years; after which (24: 2) the Lord gathered bands of the Chaldees, and bands of the Syrians, and bands of the Moabites, and bands of the children of Ammon, and “sent them against Judah to destroy it, according to the word of the Lord, which he spake by his servants the prophets.” The next king was Jehoiakim, against whom the Lord brought Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, who took him, and his princes, and all his family, captive into Babylon, dishonoured and spoiled the temple, and otherwise vexed Jerusalem and the whole land. And, instead of the king, he set up Zedekiah, who, contrary to his treaty and oath of allegiance to the king of Babylon, made overtures unto, and entered into treaty with, the king of Egypt, and rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar his liege lord. Whereupon Nebuchadnezzar came up with force and great wrath against Jerusalem, and broke it up entirely, and demolished it, and slew the king's son, and put out the king's eyes, and carried him captive to Babylon, from which time until this the house of David have been captives, or tributaries, or exiles, the throne of David and his tabernacle fallen down, and woe to the uttermost, wreaked upon him, and upon his people, and upon his father's house; first by the power of Egypt, and then by the power of Assyria, and then by the power of Persia, and then by the power of Greece, and then by the power of Rome, and then by the power of the Saracens, or Ishmaelites, and then by the power of the Turks, who, proceeding from the Euphrates, — Revelation 9 — and possessing both Nineveh and Babylon, do represent the Assyrian power again; and lastly, by the power of the Russians, who is the Assyrian of “the end,” and shall invade the land, and take the Holy city.

GOG AND MAGOG.

THE AUTOCRAT OF ALL THE RUSSIAS THE GOG OF MAGOG FORETOLD BY EZEKIEL.

Translated from the French.

The following is extracted from a discourse by Rabbi Carrillon of the Reformed Synagogue of Spanishtown, Jamaica. My attention having been recently called to it, I present it to the reader at the earliest opportunity, being persuaded he will be gratified by its perusal. It originally appeared in the "Hebrew Archives," and is strikingly corroborative of the interpretation published in Elpis Israel of the title prefixed to Ezekiel's prophecy of the invasion of Palestine by the Assyrian of the latter days. The following is the extract:

"There is but little ground for debate; but that the prophecy of Ezekiel, relating to Israel's last enemy, points conclusively to Russia. Unless a radical change—from which may God preserve us—takes place in the mind and in the political constitutions of Europe, we need not fear that any other nation than Russia will oppress the Hebrews. On the contrary, indeed, the Hebrews are continually making new advances in the esteem and friendship of all other people, Christian and Mahomedan. Gog is pictured to us as a man filled with the ambition of subduing the whole world; and we do not know, in the existing state of affairs, any nation of Asia or Africa which conceives a project so bold. America is out of the question, and the power is equally balanced among the other nations of Europe, the majority of them friends of peace. They hold in horror every species of warfare and of conquests; even those who are not actuated by religion, public opinion, and the arts and sciences. Russia is the single empire which has the disposition, and can command the means of undertaking a like campaign; and it is worthy of remark, that a prophecy is in vogue in Russia, its origin I know not, predicting that at a certain future period the Russians will become Lords of the Universe. True or false, this prophecy has a tendency to fortify them with courage, and of itself already bears witness into what extremities they are inclined to plunge in this gigantic struggle. In addition to these, there are several other reasons which induce us to believe that Russia is the empire predicted by Ezekiel, and the chief reason is drawn from the description of the country itself. In the tenth of Genesis we find the children of Japheth to have been Gomer, Magog and Madai—Javan, Tubal, Mesech and Tiras; and the sons of Gomer, Ashkenas, and Riphoth and Togarmah—from them the Japhetical nations are descended, that is to say, the Chinese, Tartars, Greeks and Persians; the Germans of the North, Muscovites and other Sclavonian races; and these are the very people whom Ezekiel names as forming the sources, or as being the tributaries from whence Gog is to issue. In chapter 39th the Prophet says, 'Turn thy face towards Gog, of the country of Magog, the prince of Rosh, Meshech and Tubal.' The general name of the country in Scripture is Magog, and the name of its prince is Gog; but the country itself is divided into three principalities, Rosh, Meshech and Tubal. The Prophet afterwards tells us that the prince described will be accompanied with a powerful army, composed of divers nations, of the same names as those which are mentioned in Genesis, as being descendants of Japheth and Gomer; and the most of these nations the subjects, or allies, of the prince of Rosh, Meshech and Tubal are represented as coming from Northern countries. We remark that the name of Rosh is not to be met with anywhere among the sons of Japheth. We know, however, that the first Czar of Great Muscovie was called Rosh, and that it was from him the empire derived the name it now bears. We know also, that in former times Russia was divided into three independent States—Russia Proper, or, according to some authors, Muscovie in Europe—Muscovy Proper, or Russia Eastern and Southern—and Tobolsk, or Northern Russia. The three states were finally united under the common name of Russia, and they held in subjection several nations of the Tartar and Sclavonian origin. Persia itself may be considered as a dependency of Russia, or the Emperor of these three States united, of Rushy, Muscovy and Tobolsky, this being the true pronunciation, and of tributary and independent countries, is called in Scripture Gog, and his empire Magog. It is very probable this name has been given to the state because the population descends in a great measure from Magog, and Gog seems to be an abbreviation of the name Magog, and is applicable to the chiefs of this empire. The names of the three states that compose this empire are mentioned in Scripture word for word—‘Son of man, turn thy face towards Gog, of the country Magog, the prince of Rosh, Meshech and Tubal;’ Rosh is Russia—Meshech Muscovy—and Tubal Tobolsky. Another combining circumstance is, that no other country is made up of so many other different nations. The Prophet further tells us that these divers nations, which will march under the colours of Russia, will be armed after the fashion of the ancients, with shields, bows and arrows, and with javelins and lances, for, as we are aware, notwithstanding her wide extent, Russia cannot raise an army exceeding 5 or 600,000 men in number who are drilled according to the tactics of modern warfare, while the great mass of her troops still use arms of various kinds of darts, which were only in use among the ancients. Under still another aspect, the prophecy may be applied to Russia. It is, moreover, foretold, that of a sudden such revolts will burst forth from the numberless army of Gog that, using the expression of the Prophet, every man’s hand will be raised against his brother. This portion of the prophecy is eminently applicable to Russia; for it is almost certain that Russia, engaged in a universal war, on the first reverse, will witness Poland and the portions she holds under the yoke, turning their arrows against her. It is thus almost established by evidence, that Russia is the country of Magog, and that Nicholas, or one of his successors, is the Gog announced by the prophet, and that there is reason to believe that the latter days are not far off; let us, therefore, be on the watch and in continual prayer, that we may not be overwhelmed by a torrent of events, as a thief taken in the night!”

“THE WORD OF THE OATH.”

I insert the following exegesis of the hundred and tenth Psalm in this number from “The Asmonean,” a Jewish paper published in this City every week. The reader will scarcely need to be told that I do not approve the interpretation. I have no room for comment in this number. I must, therefore, defer it till a future opportunity. I insert it now only as a text upon which to discourse hereafter. In the meantime, he can see how the non-Christian Israelitish mind reads this interesting and important document, which contains what a Christian Israelite (well instructed in the law of Moses, the Psalms and the Prophets, and in Jewish tradition too from the lips of Gamaliel) styles “The Word of the Oath,” upon which is based the High Priesthood of Jesus to the exclusion of Aaron’s, over the Twelve Tribes of Israelite and the nations, when, as “the man whose name is THE BRANCH, he sits and rules upon his throne as a priest upon his throne,” in the Age to Come. With these words I leave the article in the hands of the reader till we meet again. —EDITOR.

PSALM 110.

“Looking into the authorised English version we are informed that David was the author of Psalm 110, and that he spoke about first, the kingdom; fourth, the priesthood; fifth, the conquest; and seventh, the passion of Christ—no word of which is mentioned in the original. The translators are not ashamed to make such a gross and wilful mistake as to render (verse 1) ‘to my Lord’ with a capital L, as if this term signified God, while every grammarian must know that Adonee signifies ‘my lord’ or ‘my master,’ meaning a man, and not God, when meaning God, it must be Adoni. The style, of the whole chapter has not the slightest similarity to the Davidian style, and the Hebrew in the title of the chapter can be translated “to David” better than “of David.” The whole chapter has the tone of an address, hence the ancient commentators, Rashi excepted, agree that this chapter was addressed to David by some other poet. They only differ as to the occasion that gave rise to the chapter, and, therefore, we are at liberty also to give our humble opinion on the subject. When David fled from Jerusalem from fear of Absalom, his son, he had a narrow escape, through the faithfulness of his friends in Jerusalem, so that he reached the other side of Jordan, where he collected an army. When his army was to have met the enemy, he also wished to leave his head quarters at Mahanaim, and go with the army. But the people insisted that he should not do so, and he was obliged to tarry at Mahanaim in a painful state of anxiety; this was most likely the occasion on which one of David’s poetical friends addressed to him the 110th Psalm, which reads as follows:

TO DAVID A SONG.

“Jehovah says to my Lord (the king,) sit thou at my right hand (of the poet,) until I shall have made thine enemies thy footstool (until his army has defeated the enemy.)”

“Jehovah will send from Zion the sceptre of thy majesty, (he will be restored to the royal dignity) rule thou in the midst of thine enemies, (who revolted against him.)”

The Poet next proceeds to give his reasons for his bold hopes.

“Thy people today bring voluntary gifts to thy army, holy attired in the dawn of morning; thine is the dew of thy youth.”

The Poet refers to the large presents of provisions brought to David by Barzillai, Shubi, and Machir, demonstrating their loyal attachment to the person of the king; and to the numerous youthful warriors who flocked to the standard of the fugitive king.

“The Lord has sworn and he will not repent, thou art minister forever; (the administrator of the laws of God,) upon my word thou art Zedek’s king,” (Zedek and Jerusalem are identical)

The Poet refers to his election by the whole nation to the royal dignity, and to his faithful administration of the laws of God.

“The Lord is at thy right hand, who has crushed kings in the day of his anger.

“He will judge among nations full of carcasses, (comparing the numbers of his enemies to dead men,) he crushed the head of the land of Rabbah.

The Poet directs the attention of the king to former perils, and especially to the war with Moab and Ammon, the capitals of both countries were called Rabbah, where he was attacked by Syrians and Idumeans, being then in a perilous state—still God helped him, and crushed the heads of his enemies; he will also now help him. The idea of the wars with Ammon and Moab presents to the mind of the poet another powerful hope for the king, it is Joab, the king’s hero nephew, who was the principal hero in those wars, and referring to him, he continues:

“He shall drink of the brook in the way (driving the enemy to the Jordan,) therefore he shall lift up the head,” (of the state, the king.)

The authorised version, in order to suit the chapter to the peculiar notions noticed before, contains the following grammatical mistakes, which a school boy might notice. In verse three Nedaboth is rendered: “The people shall be willing;” here it must be remarked that Amcha is masculine gender, singular number, and Nedaboth is feminine gender, plural number, consequently they cannot be joined together. Nedaboth nowhere else is rendered “shall be willing,” it means everywhere voluntary gifts. Verse 4, they had the peculiar notion to render al dibrathi, which literally signifies upon my word “after the order,” for which none can account; and although an Esnachta equal to a semicolon, separates the former part of the sentence from Al dibrathi, they made one sentence of the whole, to bring out the sense which they wanted. We have considered all that, and rendered it accordingly. Verse fifth, they make again one sentence, although divided by an Esnachta, and machats, which stands in the past tense, they render in the fifth and sixth verses, “he shall strike,” al rab erets of verse sixth, which is in the singular number, signifying “Land of Rabbah” they render “over many countries.” If thus the rules of grammar and the signification of terms are disregarded, then anything might be found in the bible.

It is indeed more than ridiculous to read at the head of the forty-fifth Psalm, 1st, “The majesty and grace of Christ’s kingdom. 10th, “the duty of the church, and the benefits thereof,” while the translators themselves call it a Song of love. It is almost self-evident that this song of love was addressed to king Solomon when he married the daughter of Pharaoh; with reference to the immense wealth of Solomon flatteringly of the splendour of his court, of preference before his brothers, his triumphs over rivals to the throne and their assistants, among whom was the heroic Joab; the reader, once having this idea, will find the whole Psalm a beautiful specimen of poetry, in which, as in all the other Psalms, no such thing as a prophecy is contained; but the authors of the authorised English version needed materials to build up a new house, and they tried every way to accomplish that object.

ANTIQUITY OF THE PENTATEUCH.

From the Asmonean New York, June 14, 1853.

Editor of the Asmonean: Sir, —Many unavailing endeavours to invalidate the Pentateuch have been made in former ages, as in the present; but until I noticed in your last weekly that it is alleged the Pentateuch was not in existence previous to, and during the Hebrew monarchy, I was not aware how a sensible writer could arrive at that conclusion.

It is well known that the ancient Hebrews viewed that sacred document as the modern Americans view the Declaration of Independence, and that all subsequent laws (say the Mishna,) were predicated upon from that document.

We know also that the Holy Land was vouchsafed to them only so long as they obeyed the Law given to them at Sinai, which owing to ignorance and internal discord, &c., was totally discarded, when they were scattered among the heathen and the cities became desolate and the lands wasted, as Moses predicted in chapter 26th. Leviticus, (before they had put a foot in the Promised Land) as it is even to this day.

We ought to recollect the state and condition the nation was in at that time, and that they were surrounded by fierce nations that bore them an hereditary hatred, and they were too grossly idolatrous to arrive at a sound conclusion.

That the Pentateuch was appealed to very often, therefore, there cannot be a reasonable doubt, but to put it beyond the shadow of a doubt, we will suppose a case in point. Suppose a political infidel or sceptic, should in after ages doubt the History of the Independence, the document of its declaration. How would its advocate prove the fact of its occurrence? Would he not prove by writers of good authority that cited the facts? Exactly so. I refer the reader to Psalms 78: 3-4,6, where are such evident allusions made to prominent facts recorded in Genesis and Exodus, that cannot be misunderstood by the most unlearned Bible reader or obstinate sceptic; that the Pentateuch was in existence previous to the writer of the Psalms (which was previous to the monarchy,) I quote as follows: —“Which we have heard and known, and our fathers have told us.” “We will not hide from their children, showing the generations to come,” &c. “That the generations to come might know, even the children which should be born, and should arise and declare them to their children;” verses 3, 4, 6. That the Psalmist made the Law his study, we have assurances in verses 15, 16, 92, 148, of Psalm 119.

In fact, so strong is the internal evidence of the Divine Inspiration of the Pentateuch, so many predictions pervade it which cannot have emanated from the wisest men, which history proves to have happened, that with Solomon we may say, “There hath not failed one word of all which He promised by the hand of Moses his servant.” —1 Kings 8: 56.

From the fact so repeatedly foretold in the Five Books of Moses that we were to be scattered all over the earth, literally, to the west and to the east, to the north and to the south, as we are now and have been many days (ages) without “a king and without a Prince, and without a sacrifice and without an Image, and without an Ephod, and without Teraphim” —Hosea 3: 4.

Yet not destroyed or amalgamated with the nations among whom Providence has cast our lot, this appears to me to betoken a design we are made the unwilling instruments to carry out—a design so Godlike so truly gracious to all his creatures, so stupendous, that “ye will not believe though it be told you,” as it is written in Habakkuk 1: 5, viz.

the accomplishment or fulfilment of his oath to Abraham, to which Micah 7: 20 alludes. Awaiting with confidence the fulfilment of the Promise by Hosea, to wit, verse 5, chapter 3.

I am Respectfully Yours,

D. DAVIES.

"ESSAY ON THE DEVIL."

PSALM 110

“ESSAY ON THE DEVIL.”

A little pamphlet of twenty-three pages, has been handed me by a friend with a request to read it, and to express my opinion of its merits. It appears to have been published in London, but without a date, and is intitled, “Essay on the Devil; proving a belief in the existence of such a being, contrary to Scripture, reason and philosophy.” The author’s name does not appear. This, however, is of no consequence, the matter of its pages, not the man, being the object of interest to the inquirer after truth.

The writer rejects the existence of a spiritual and invisible being called “the Devil,” by the Gentiles of “Christendom,” as contrary to scripture and reason. “It is,” says he, “a heathen doctrine:” and as the conclusion of the whole matter remarks, “If we believe in the existence of a God, we cannot rationaly believe in the existence of a Devil, for it would be wholly destructive of every true principle of reason, natural philosophy, and religion.”

In saying this, he does not deny that something is spoken of in Scripture answering to the words, devil and satan; he only rejects the Gentile interpretation of these words, and denies that that interpretation christened orthodox by “divines,” is a correct representation of the mind of God revealed through prophets and apostles. He inclines to the belief, that the words Serpent, Satan, and Devil, are personifications of corrupt human nature. Thus, in Nismath Chasim, it is said, “for Messias will purify the uncleanness of the Serpent,” by which is signified, that Messias shall destroy the Serpent. And in the Arodath Hakkodash, it is said, “that this Serpent (that is, the devil) is the evil part.” And it has been justly observed, that when it is said in Genesis 3: 15, “I will put enmity between thee and the Woman,” it must be wholly allegorical, the Serpent being the Satan or Devil, the emblem of the carnal, sensual, mind of man, which is at enmity against God. And as this carnal, sensual, mind beguiled Eve, so did Paul fear that by it the minds of the Corinthians would be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ.

There is truth in this. The Serpent’s mind was a purely carnal mind. When it thought, its thinking was performed from the necessity of things as the blood circulated, and its lungs breathed. It saw and heard, and spoke according to the impression made upon its sensorium by the excitation of its auditory and ophthalmic nerves from without. This is the way men think who are too wise to be taught of God by his word. The Serpent taught Eve to think in this way; that is, without regard to the guidance of the divine precept inculcated in the Eden law. Her descendants have followed her ill example to the present time; so that the Serpent mode of thinking has been transferred to the mother of all living and her posterity. He lied, as every other animal would lie, if speech were given it to express its thoughts upon what would be right or wrong before God: he lied, as every man lies, however pious and sincere he may be, who, ignorant of God’s word, expresses his thoughts of what is pleasing to Him. Hence, the Serpent is a fit emblem of all who lie, or express a judgment contrary to God’s truth. He was a liar in this sense. He reasoned from certain appearances to a conclusion directly at variance with what God had spoken. Thus, “He caused not to stand—ouch hesteken—in the truth, because there is no truth in him.” When he may have spoken—hotan lalee 2. a subj.—the lie, he speaks of his own thoughts. In the serpent there is no truth, nor ever was, the creature not having capacity for its reception; neither is there truth in a man ignorant of the word. A man untaught of God is a serpent in human form, that hisses at any bible sentiment not in harmony with the thinking of his brain-flesh. Hence, the original Serpent is very properly regarded as his progenitor; and all such are styled by the Lord Jesus, “serpents” and a generation of vipers; because like their grandfather, “they judge of the flesh.” “From a father of the devil are ye,” said he to this class of Jews. That is a remarkable expression, hymeis ek patros tou diabolou este. Griesbach considers that tou, should precede patros; so that it would read “from the father of the devil,” or as some would prefer it, “of the father the devil,” by apposition, as this would make the devil the original father, instead of the son of the original serpent. But ek patros does very well. The Serpents of Israel were from a progenitor, which was sin’s father; and because the father of sin, or of the devil, was a serpent, they being sinners, were serpents likewise.

The mind of the Serpent transferred to man, the serpent henceforth occupied the place only of an emblem, or symbol, representative of all Sin's doings, that is, the Devil's, in man; and through him. I repeat, what I conceive I have elsewhere proved, that Diabolos translated devil, is SIN in the flesh, which causes those who yield to it, to cross the line forbidden to be passed by the Divine law. It is for this reason called diabolos; and is clearly shown by Moses to be the Serpent's son, begotten in the heart of the Mother of all living, who, as reproducers of their kind, give birth only to sinners, and therefore grandsons of the Serpent, and children of Sin. This is the parentage of all mankind, be they the children of infidels or believers. "If ye," said Jesus to the apostles, "being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, by how much more shall your Father who is in the heavens, give good things to them that ask him?" If he styled those evil who have God for their father, how much more so are they who are not of God, but of sinful flesh only. The apostles were evil in the sense expressed by Paul, in Romans 7: 17-18, saying, "Sin dwelleth in me; for I know that in me (that is, in my flesh) dwelleth no good thing;" and in the thirteenth verse, this sin he personifies by the phrase kath' hyperboleen amartolos, a hyperbolic, or pre-eminent sinner.

Mankind then have descended not from a righteous but a guilty pair. Had the first parents never sinned, the generations of mankind would have been born holy or clean, that is, without sin in the flesh; and there would have been no distinction in the world of "saint" and "sinner." But the reverse is the fact. The first parents were defiled by transgression, and so became unclean; hence, Job, speaking of "man that is born of woman," inquires, "who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean?" and then answers the question, saying emphatically, "Not one. Man dieth and wasteth away: yea, he giveth up the ghost and where is he? He lieth down and riseth not: till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake nor be raised out of their sleep." The uncleanness of all born of woman causes them to die and waste away; and this uncleanness is sin in the flesh. "By one man sin entered into the world, in which man all sinned;" for at that time the germ of the future race was in his loins. Hence the constitutional genealogy of mankind is, the serpent by his subtlety begat sin in the human nature, and sin in the flesh, or the will of man, begat Cain and all his brethren; so that all mankind by natural generation, "are—ek toon katoou—of things below," pertaining to the world, "servants of sin," children of the devil. Hence, they were "made sinners" by a constitution founded on the disobedience of the first man. They were made or constituted sinners from the physical necessity of the case; and this elemental quality of man's nature, the devil within him, causes all the evil manifestations emanating from individuals and organizations of individuals, popularly styled societies, associations, governments, &c., such as the "all things created, the things in the heavens, and things upon the earth, things seen and unseen, whether thrones, or lordships, or principalities, or powers;" and which, as a whole, constitute the—aion tou kosmou toutou—the Age of this World—a system of things over which Sin presides, as "the prince of the power of the air," styled by Paul "the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience." This system of things in the old Assyrian, Medo-Persian, Macedonian, and Roman oikoumene, or habitable, is represented by symbols, such as Nebuchadnezzar's Image, Daniel's Four Beasts, and John's Beasts, Image, Drunken Harlot, and Dragon—emblems of sin in its civil and ecclesiastical manifestations, antagonistic to God's nation of the Twelve Tribes of Israel; his Two Witnesses, and the Holy City, or community of the saints, "who keep the commandments of God and have the testimony of Jesus Christ." These symbols represent the power of the enemy of God and his people. This power, in its undivided form, or rather in combination, is emblematised in Genesis 3: 15 by the serpent, whose "head," or chief is the imperial prince of the serpent organization of sin, contemporary with "the great prince," or Woman's Seed, who stands up for Israel when the time comes to bruise Gog and bind the Dragon.

If these things are rightly discerned there will be no difficulty in understanding the Bible teaching concerning the devil and satan. The pamphlet before me only catches a glimpse of them, and therefore, although there is much approvable, the writer's exposition of divers texts, though much more scriptural and rational than the current theological, are not satisfactory to me. He first examines the testimony of Moses and the prophets on the subject of "the devil." He tells us that in those writings the phrase "the Devil is not anywhere mentioned in the singular;" therefore he says, "it necessarily follows that such a being is there unknown as peculiarly an individual being—a dignified personage, a devil by eminence." He then tells us that the only places where the name occurs in the plural are four. Devil is found nowhere in the singular and only four times in the plural. This is susceptible of demonstration. The four texts are Leviticus 17: 7; 2 Chronicles 11: 15; and Deuteronomy 32: 17; Psalm 106: 37. In the former two the Hebrew word is seirim; and in the latter two it is shaidim, whom Moses styles elohim lo yedahum, "gods they knew not." Here then are two different words, each of which has a separate idea, which needs to be distinguished. In Leviticus it reads, "they shall no more offer their sacrifices unto seirim, after whom they have gone a whoring." In the common version it is devils. This statute shows that when Israel was in Egypt the tribes worshipped seirim, whose idolatry was connected with prostitution. The singular, sahir signifies shaggy, hairy. They worshipped hairy ones, or goats. In Genesis 37: 31, it is sahir izzim, and rendered in the common version "a kid of the goats."

The sahir was the god Pan of the Gentiles, "the idolatrous emblem of nature's prolific powers, and the Devil of idolatrous antichristianity; a large he-goat, with his cloven foot, horns, and tail. It was to this imaginary being, representing the imaginary powers of nature, that the Canaanites were in the habit of sacrificing the kid, and seething it in its mother's milk, and then sprinkling the sown fields to induce fertility. Every one acquainted with the beastly acts that attended the priapian worship of Pans will not be surprised at the severe penalty annexed to the idolatrous rite."

The other word is shaidim. "They sacrificed," says Moses, "to shaidim, not God, gods they knew not, new ones not feared by their fathers." In this text shaidim is also rendered devils in the common version. David says, "They sacrificed their sons and their daughters unto shaidim, unto the idols of Canaan." The Egyptian idols were called seirim, and those of Canaan shaidim, as would appear from these texts. Gesenius says this word is only used in the plural. The root of this is the obsolete shahdahh, to pour forth. The writer of the pamphlet remarks that, "in the sense of pouring forth it is used for a cup-bearer, one who pours forth the wine, and very frequently for the field which pours forth the bounties of the God of nature for the support of life; it is also frequently used as a title of Deity, the Pourer Forth, the All-Bountiful, and also for the breast (shod or shad) which pours forth its milk. Hence, the shaidim, the pourers forth, the great agents of nature, the heavens, which cause the earth to send forth springs and shed her increase of milk, and corn, and fruits for human nourishment. The Egyptian Isis was one of these shaidim, which was clustered over with breasts, because all things are sustained by nature. Such was also the Diana of Ephesus, on which was inscribed, "All various Nature, Mother of all things." It is said of the Mexicans that, before the arrival of the Spaniards, at the first appearance of green corn children were offered up; also when the corn was a foot above the ground, and again when it was two feet high. In like manner Moses foretells that the Israelites would turn idolaters, and would sacrifice to "all various nature," whom our translators call devils; and the Psalmist declares that to this idol goddess they actually did sacrifice their sons and daughters.

But enough for the present. Another time we will look more into these matters.

PREFACE.

The above is the title of the pamphlet already referred to in our strictures upon the London Quarterly Journal of Prophecy. There are several vulnerable positions assumed by the compiler of its pages, which it is remarkable the reviewers have not seized upon in demonstration of the supposed unscriptural conclusions it contains. But critical orthodox ignorance has been the compiler's safety. "Theology" has blinded the eyes of "the ministry" so that they cannot see afar off. "Divines," therefore, being in the dark, and the people being led by them, it is "like priests, like people;" all are in the fog, and the errors of The Coming Struggle have escaped detection.

In the following pages this renowned pamphlet is not reproduced as it came from the Edinburgh press. I have expurgated it of what I consider its untenable assumptions, and in so doing have converted it into a brochure properly my own. The original pamphlet undertook to present my views of the next fifteen years. But no one can present the views of another with sufficient precision to satisfy the original thinker. "The Coming Struggle" does not satisfy me. I have therefore revised and corrected it, as well as I could without rewriting the whole. I have made three hundred and twelve corrections on the thirty-two pages, which have materially altered the sense of the compilation in many places. I should not, however, have presumed to do this, but for the peculiar relation I sustain to the original.

I am not able to say who the artist is that has undertaken to work up my published ideas of things into "The Coming Struggle." Some have styled him the learned Dr. Cumming; others, "the eloquent Mr. Wylie;" others, "a journeyman printer in Edinburgh;" others again, "a disciple of Dr. Thomas," &c. Be he whom he may, he must be greatly astonished at the success of his doings. Seventy-three thousand sterling six-pences must have afforded him a wonderful profit on the copy of Elpis Israel, out of which he fabricated his pages. I should have no particular objection to inheriting a dividend; but hitherto the case has strictly fulfilled the saying, that "One sows and another reaps." But perhaps good has been accomplished notwithstanding the errors. In this, therefore, I rejoice; but hope that no more of the original may be sold after this revise shall appear in Britain.

COMING STRUGGLE AMONG THE NATIONS OF THE EARTH
REVISED AND CORRECTED
BY JOHN THOMAS, M.D.

AUTHOR OF ELPIS ISRAEL, FROM WHICH WORK IT WAS ORIGINALLY FABRICATED

Never was there a time, in the past history of the world, when such a terrible and universal excitement prevailed regarding political affairs, as at this moment exists in the social mind. Wherever we turn, or into whatever society we enter, the same restless anxiety is apparent, the same question passes from circle to circle and from friend to friend, but no reply comes forth to cheer or satisfy the alarmed interrogators. "What is about to happen?" is murmured in all the assemblies of men; and whether the sound floats along the noble halls of the great, vibrates among the rafters of the straw-roofed cottage, or wanders through mazes of tobacco smoke in a village ale-house, echo only answers, What! Conjectures, indeed, are made and opinions delivered, but as these rest solely on the shifting sand of political appearances, and assume the various aspects with which faction and party-spirit invest them, they are uttered only to be rejected; the same question is again asked by the same individual on the morrow, and with like success.

That such an excitement should prevail at the present time is not at all wonderful. The position in which the powers of Europe and Asia are placed, render it evident to every thinking mind—and in this age of boasted intelligence all should be thinkers—that we are on the very eve of a crisis, and a crisis unparalleled in the annals of the past. It is not at one part merely, or in one or two nations, that we discern the signs of an approaching storm; but from one end of Europe to the other, the ominous cloud has gathered, and when it bursts, as soon it must, the deluge will be not only overwhelming, but universal. Such a prospect as this is entirely new. The shadows which preceded the advent even of the most devastating hurricanes that swept over the world in the ages that are gone, were not so gloomy or portentous as those which now hover above our whole horizon; and as the image must resemble the reality, that reality must be awful indeed. We are in the midst of that oppressive calm which reigns when the elements are fully charged with all the ingredients of a storm, and, like the mariner, we long for its inevitable outbreak, in order that we may escape from our suspense, and learn at once how we are likely to cope with it.

But while the painful anxiety everywhere visible is, in the circumstances, extremely natural, it is not at all necessary that the equally manifest uncertainty and ignorance regarding the extent and duration of the coming struggle should remain; and were the prophetic declarations of the Bible properly understood, the inhabitants of Britain would comprehend all that is about to take place. In that Book—a book which some despise, many neglect, and nearly all misunderstand—is to be found a series of visions and prophecies, under which is symbolised the political history of the world, from the Babylonian Empire down to the Millennium, that happy era to which the human family have long looked forward with delight. Unfortunately, however, as we have said, these prophecies have been, and are, sadly misunderstood. The authorised interpreters of God's revelations have hitherto failed in finding a key to unlock their mysteries; but of this we do not complain, as we are told that the vision was to be sealed until the time of the end. What we regret, however, is that in the face of this declaration our divines should have attempted an explanation of these mysteries, before God's time for their solution was come. They have done this, and the result is, that by their erroneous interpretations, a mass of obscurity, contradiction, absurdity, and error, has been heaped upon them, which serves completely to mystify both its authors and the world. Had Fleming and others contented themselves with tracing those parts of the prophecy which were fulfilled in their day, and left those sublime consummations mentioned in the Apocalypse to be disclosed at "the time of the end," the present generation would not now be under the necessity of throwing off a host of commentaries and opinions, which from early childhood they have considered unerring. This, however, must be done. The position of the world clearly intimates that the end has come, and events now furnish an explanation of the hitherto dark visions of Daniel and John, and by a careful examination of these and other prophets, the political history of the next thirteen years is spread out before us, nay, we are enabled to pass beyond that period, and trace almost accurately the regular course of events down to the beginning of the thousand years. DR. THOMAS OF AMERICA (Editor of "The Herald of the Kingdom and Age to Come," published at Mott Haven, Westchester, New York.) WAS THE FIRST TO FIND THE KEY, and they who have read his book will at once be able to understand the following description of the period mentioned. For the sake, however, of those who have not seen Dr. Thomas's work—(This work is styled "Elpis Israel," and should be in the hands of every one desirous of understanding the glad tidings of the Kingdom of God, which is indispensable to all who would attain to it.)—and we believe this applies to the majority of general readers—it will be necessary to give a rapid and connected sketch of the prophecy on which the whole hangs, and point out the errors into which former interpreters have fallen.

The first intimation we have of the prophecy is in the second chapter of Daniel, where we are told that one morning during the palmy days of the Babylonian empire, Nebuchadnezzar, its head, awoke from a troubled sleep, in which he had a strange and unaccountable dream. Being fully awake, he endeavoured to call to mind the particulars of the vision which had passed across his sleeping spirit, but the "thing had gone from him," and do what he could he was unable to recall it. Nevertheless his "spirit was troubled to know the dream," and this he demanded of his magicians, who, being of course unable to comply, Daniel, a young Hebrew captive, volunteered to make it known and interpret it. Having "desired the mercies of the God of Heaven concerning the secret," Daniel had it revealed to him in a vision, and with a joyful countenance went with it to the king. He informed the monarch that in his sleep he had seen a great image standing before him. The head was of gold, the breast and arms of silver, the belly and thighs of brass, the legs of iron, and the feet partly iron and partly clay. After the king had gazed on this giant of metal for some time, he beheld a stone poised in the air, unsupported by hands, slowly descending to the earth. Falling at length with a heavy crash upon the feet of the image, it "brake them to pieces," and the whole superstructure was hurled to the ground, where the wind carried it entirely away. The stone which smote it, however, grew into a great mountain, and filled the earth.

The interpretation given by Daniel to the king, was to the effect that the golden head, silver arms, brazen thighs, and iron legs, denoted a succession of four dynasties in the Babylonian Empire. The iron kingdom, which was the last, was at first to be divided into two parts, and latterly into ten, temporarily cemented to the feet by clay, and these were finally to be destroyed by the establishment of a kingdom of God upon the earth, a kingdom which should never be destroyed. This was a dim, yet true outline of the future history of the great empire which was at that time aptly termed the whole earth; but it was only a rough sketch, and the purpose God had in view in disclosing it required that a more detailed representation should be given; accordingly, after the death of Nebuchadnezzar, Daniel was favoured with a more extended view. In this second vision, the four dynasties were symbolised by four beasts, and an outline of the history of each given. The fourth power, which in the first vision was described as iron, and divided into ten parts, is in the second shadowed forth by a beast with ten horns. The causes of the destruction of these ten powers by the God of heaven is in this vision also accounted for, and the time of their duration determined. They were to be destroyed on account of their civil and spiritual despotism, —crimes which can never in the moral government of Jehovah pass unpunished. After the ten horns had been for some time established, a little horn came up among them, in which were the “eyes of a man and a mouth speaking great things.” After making room for itself by plucking up three of the large horns, this little horn waxed insolent and domineering, and continued so “till the beast was slain, and his body given to the burning flame.” Daniel was extremely anxious to find out the meaning of this, and having asked “one of them that stood by,” he was informed that the ten horns were ten kings that should arise out of the fourth dominion; that another should rise after them, diverse from all the others, that he would “subdue three of the first kings, speak great words against the Most High, wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change the times and laws;” but after continuing thus for “a time and times, and the dividing of time,” his dominion would be taken away, and he would be utterly destroyed.

In future visions a still more detailed representation of certain portions of this first vision was given to Daniel, and many of the prophecies of Ezekiel contain important developments of the same history; but God’s determined measure of revelation was not yet full. Indeed, the chief part remained behind, and consisted of an ample view of the operations of the fourth beast and his ten horns, especially of that little horn which subsequently sprung up and became so prominent. Many hundreds years after Daniel’s time, when the gold, silver, and brass of Nebuchadnezzar’s image had given place to the iron power, there lived an aged man on one of the desert islands that dot the bosom of the Aegean Sea. To this place he had been banished for adhering to, and promulgating, the gospel of the kingdom in the name of Jesus Christ, emanating from the land of Judea, but now almost entirely unknown to the professors of Christianity. In this lonely spot, and to this persecuted follower of the despised Nazarene, God gave his concluding Revelation to man, and wound up the whole by shadowing forth the history of the beast, and the horn, under the emblems of seals, trumpets, and vials. The iron power of Nebuchadnezzar’s Image, or fourth beast of Daniel, is here represented by a Dragon with seven crowned heads and ten crownless horns; and the system of governments of the Roman West is at first called a beast, with seven uncrowned heads and ten crowned horns—the one being thus exactly the reverse of the other—and afterwards Daniel’s Little Horn power of the west is represented as a two-horned beast covering the area of three of the horns. The same distinguishing features are apparent here as in Daniel’s vision. The beast waxes great; the dragon gives him his power, and his seat, and great authority; he makes war against the saints for a time, and times, and half a time, till the judgment sits, and his dominion is taken away, and he is cast with the Little Horn into a fiery lake, and the dragon into imprisonment for a thousand years.

Such, then, is a brief outline of this important prophecy—a prophecy which has occupied the attention, and engaged the interest of Bible readers, for many generations. The language in which it is couched has hitherto rendered it impossible for interpreters to agree concerning its fulfilment; and indeed, in past times, the occurrence of the events it foretells was the only guide to its course. Fleming is thought to have verged upon a correct interpretation of a part that was as yet unfulfilled; but it was only a faint glimpse he obtained of the truth; the elements that were to be engaged in the final conflict had not, at the time he wrote, assumed the position, by which the time of the end could be recognised, and this, together with his adherence to the stereotyped but false theories of commentators, led him far astray. All, however, are agreed as to the general meaning of the prophecy. * The gold, silver, brass, and iron powers of the image, and the four beasts of the vision, are the Babylonian, Persian, Grecian, and Roman Empires. The seven heads and ten horns are the various forms of government and kingdoms of this latter power. The first beast of John is the civil and ecclesiastical system of Roman-Europe; and the second, or two-horned beast, is the Austro-Papacy grafted upon it. Thus far the history of the past might have enabled our divines to expound and agree could their theologies have permitted them to interpret the prophecy by the things that are. With regard to the time of the end, and the nature of the events which must take place previous to it, there exists an almost endless diversity of opinion, the greatest union lying in a universal misapprehension of both, particularly of the latter.

* No interpreter has succeeded in correctly expounding Nebuchadnezzar's Image. They have overlooked the fact that it is composed of five elements instead of "four." The fifth is "the clay," or Russo-Assyrian, styled by Ezekiel "Gogue of Magogue's land, the Prince of Rosh, Mosc, and Tobl." The interpretation of the clay element has been brought out for the first time in the Herald of the Kingdom. —Editor of the Herald.

The great cause of misapprehension, besides that to which we formerly alluded, —viz., a premature interpretation, —is owing to the fondness of theologians for the allegorising method of Origen. Following this early father, they assert that the events to take place at the time of the end, are less physical than moral, and will consist of a series of spiritual changes which will usher in the universal triumph of the Church, and the regeneration of the world. They do not understand, or rather they refuse to believe, that the Jews will be restored to their own land, and that the kingdom of Israel will once more be established, though not precisely after its ancient model or with its former inferior splendour. With a very restricted partiality, they have construed all those glorious promises of a political restoration which have lighted up with hope the heart of the wandering Jew, into nothing more and nothing else than a spiritual conversion, and they claim for the Church all the glory of the latter-day. This, we apprehend, is a fatal mistake. The restoration of the Jews to Palestine forms the very keystone to the whole political structure of the world, and is the principal object to be accomplished by the awful events of the coming years. It is the grand consummation of which the Hebrew prophets spake and Jewish bards sung; it is emphatically "the hope of Israel," and the Word of Judah's God is pledged to its accomplishment.

Having done away with a literal restoration, our interpreters have necessarily erred in deciding regarding the many minor parts of the prophecy. Hence the locality of the final conflict has been a matter of much dispute. The general notion is, that Italy will be the scene of the great battle of Armageddon, and one individual has actually measured a large valley in that country to see if it answers the inspired description. Another class, in the extremity of their fondness for spiritualism, say that at the moral destruction of Popery, wherever Protestantism encounters and overcomes Romanism, there will Armageddon be. In the sequel of this pamphlet, we shall show how erroneous are both of these conjectures.

Another great error, and one which has led to a host of misconceptions, is the belief that Britain is one of the ten horns, and that consequently she will be involved in the destruction that overtakes the toes of the great metallic image. This is a complete mistake. Though once a part of the Roman dominion, she is not within the boundary of the image territory, and none of the countries beyond that territory will be overthrown with Papacy, except those who have continued to worship the beast, such as Austria and others. And this is just an evidence of the evil effects of a premature interpretation of the prophecy. At the period when many of our commentators wrote, it was actually necessary to include Britain in the toe kingdoms, in order to make up the number required. Up to the year 1820, there were only eight independent powers within the Roman Empire, but in that year the Greeks rebelled against the Sultan, and after several years' war, succeeded in establishing a new kingdom, which became the ninth horn. Still another was wanted to complete the prophetic symbol, and it did not come up till 1830, when the revolution of Paris divided the kingdom of the Netherlands into two, and Belgium became a separate power, to defeat the calculations of divines, and pluck Britain from the anomalous position in which they had placed her. We say anomalous, for how is it possible to reconcile the past history of Anglo-Saxon progression—of which she has been the mover and sustainer—with sudden and complete destruction? The very thought is a libel on the eternal law of development and the wisdom of the moral government; but it is false, and we will by-and-by show how different is the destiny of this country, and what the part that has been assigned her in the last act of the mighty drama. The powers which really answer to the toes of Nebuchadnezzar's image are Bavaria, Lombardy, Hungary, Greece, Sardinia, Naples, Portugal, Spain, France and Belgium; and if we understand the prophecy aright, these kingdoms will be brought to the verge of their final subversion at the end of the next thirteen years.

The next great error of our interpreters, and the last to which we will particularly advert, is in regard to the "time, and times, and half a time,” or the duration of the beast. They do not understand that it means a period of 1260 solar * years, and they have failed to find the true commencement of the era. The general theory dates it from the year 606, when Phocas proclaimed the universal supremacy of the Bishop of Rome. This fixes the secondary termination of the 1260 years in 1866. But the “time, and times, and half a time” began by its primal epoch earlier than this. The year 606 is the period of the ecclesiastical constitution of the beast, or the time when the dragon gave to its Lion-mouth his authority. Its civil constitution dates 75 years earlier, or from 531, when the Justinian code was completed and published. These two epochs were the real beginnings of the 1260 years.

* In the days of Moses, the servant of Jehovah, on founding the Commonwealth of Israel, and in arranging its time, the Hebrew years were solar, of twelve months, each month having thirty days, excepting the twelfth, which had thirty-five days. By the enumeration of the days of the deluge, it is evident that the Hebrew year consisted of 365 days. A time of years, however, is limited to 360 solar years, being reduced from 365 to 360 by the explanatory phrase, “forty and two months.”—Editor of Herald.

The victorious reign of the beast ought, then, to terminate about the years 1791 and 1866, or two years earlier or later. The resurrection of the two witnesses (or civil and ecclesiastical class-antagonists to the Powers), which were slain by Louis the Fourteenth, took place in 1789, or at the period of the first French revolution, and this was the first time any successful opposition was made to the Papal power after 1685. Then wrath began to pour out, and the civil dominion of the Pope was taken away, to be “consumed and destroyed unto the end.” And as 75 years elapsed between the imperial concession of a new code, and the acknowledgment of the Roman Bishop as the universal Father of the western dominion, or beast, so 75 years must elapse as the transition period, ending in the arrival of “the Hour of Judgment.” This period is represented by the seven vials, the mission of which is to pour chastisement on the beast and his followers, till at the end of the combined sixth and seventh the whole will meet with a wonderful and signal destruction. It is a mistake to suppose that the 1260 years limits the existence of the beast—it merely limits his unwaning power. The full term of his civil and ecclesiastical pre-judicial existence as a Roman power, is 1335 years, * and this terminates in 1866, or about thirteen years from this period. But what a number of awful events must take place within that short time; what revolutions, and strife, and bloodshed must be witnessed on the Continent, and in many parts of Asia! No wonder that the political sky is black and lowering, charged as it is with the elements of a storm, which, for tremendous force and severity, has never been equalled. The people of the present age have come to the very border of a thrilling epoch, and they know it not. The newspaper press laughs at the cry of war which has risen on every hand. It points to the progress of railways and electric telegraphs, and asks if these are signs of war. Railways and telegraphs, steam-engines and copper-wire, can these overturn the purpose of God or falsify His word? A few hours of strife will suffice to tear up every vestige of these so-called pledges of peace, and their component parts may yet form efficient instruments to carry on the conflict. In these days of scepticism and intellectual supremacy, it may be a hard matter to get such Bible truths borne home to the hearts of men; but in a very short time they will be compelled to acknowledge the reality and genuineness of that revelation they now despise or neglect. Amid the terror and confusion of the approaching hurricane, when men’s hearts are failing them for fear, they will be glad to turn to its long-forsaken pages, to learn the nature and extent of the fearful calamity. If the people of Britain and America are wise, they will make themselves acquainted with this beforehand, and thus enjoy that tranquillity which the knowledge will impart. It is, even on other grounds than personal comfort and mental peace, extremely necessary that they should do so. Though for the present they will, by caution and prudence, keep free from the struggle, they have a high and holy mission to fulfil, and are, as yet, ignorant of it. To them has been committed the task of conducting the moral progression of the world, and preparing it for the coming millennium. While other nations are murdering and devouring each other, and gnawing their tongues, and blaspheming under the iron rod of Jehovah, the Anglo-Saxon race will be opening up the pathway for the entrance into this sin-cursed and strife-torn world of the reign of peace and love. Blessed, indeed, are they that wait, and come to the thousand, three hundred and five and thirty days.

But it is now time that we enter on the principal part of our present work, to which the foregoing forms a necessary introduction. And before speaking of what is about to occur, let us see the exact portion of the prophecy that has been fulfilled. By going back along the history of the past, we could clearly trace the course of the prophecy, from its first beginning to the present time, but this is unnecessary. It will suffice if we make the reader understand where we are at present. We are, then, under the sixth and seventh vials. The gold, silver, and brass of Nebuchadnezzar's image, in their imperial ascendancy, have passed away; three of Daniel's beasts have, in this sense, departed; and John's seals have been opened, his trumpets have been sounded, and five of his vials have been exhausted. By turning to the 12th verse of the 16th chapter of Revelation, the reader will find a description of the sixth vial. It was to be poured out on the Euphrates—or the Turkish Empire, —and began in 1820, when the Greeks rebelled against the Sultan and established a new kingdom. From that time Turkey has been subjected to incessant trouble with neighbouring powers, distraction and strife from civil rebellions, and ravaging pestilences from the hand of God. Six years after the successful revolt of the Greeks, the Janissaries attempted to withstand the will of the Sultan, but their fanaticism was repressed, and by the despot's command thousands of them were butchered. The next year she lost 110 ships in the battle of Navarino, and in the following season had to sustain a double conflict in a Russian war and an Albanian insurrection. Then followed the long war of France against Turco-Algeria, which resulted in the separation of that province from the Moslem empire and its annexation to that kingdom. In 1839 Egypt and Syria were taken by Mehemet Ali, and this led to sanguinary and bloody strife in that direction. Besides these reverses at the hand of man, the country was scourged with cholera and plague for eleven years; and thus wasted and weakened, she is in daily fear of being totally overthrown by a foreign power. But why, it may be asked, is such a vial of wrath poured upon the Turkish Empire? Ah, God had a long and heavy account to settle with this nation! What iniquity and injustice did it not perpetrate against the Jews, God's own peculiar people; and though permitted to succeed in its cruelty for the express purpose of punishing the Jewish nation for their transgressions against the Most High, yet such is God's jealousy with regard to this race which he has chosen, that even the instruments with which he chastises them are made the objects of his retributive vengeance. It was so with the Babylonian nation who carried them into captivity, and it is so with the Ottoman Empire, which has now the seat of the dragon, which in former days dispersed them among the Gentiles. For this and other causes, enumerated in the 11th chapter of Daniel, the Lord has a controversy with Turkey, which will never cease till its power is destroyed unto the end.

The seventh vial began in 1830, when the whole political atmosphere, as if charged with democratic electricity, gave forth flashes, and appeared to be on the eve of an explosion. These two vials are therefore both going on at this time, and will end together, at the beginning of the thousand years. It is at this critical period that the vision is to be unsealed. In other words, the Roman powers are to be placed in a certain position, and to be actuated by a certain agency, which, we are told, is to indicate the time of the end, and warn the inhabitants of the earth to prepare for the coming of the kingdom. This important information is given in the following words: —“And I saw three unclean spirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet. They are spirits of demons working miracles, which go forth unto the kings of the earth and the whole habitable, to gather them to the war of that great day of God Almighty.” The demons that represent the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet powers, are the Sultan, the Emperor of Austria, and the Pope; and the frogs, or frog-power, is France—frogs being the original heraldic symbol of that nation. When, therefore, we perceive the French government causing “unclean spirits,” or evil policy, to emanate from these three incarnations of power, then are we to recognise the immediate approach of the end; for this, says the prophecy, will cause the kings of the earth to be gathered together to “the war of that great day of God Almighty.” This period has now come. We are living in it. France has at this moment the Pope, the Emperor, and the Sultan, in a very critical position. By occupying Rome and forcing its protection on the Pope, it has obtained the power, to some extent, of dictating the policy of his Holiness, —now, alas for him, robbed of his imperial dignity, and reduced to the position of a “false prophet”—and is, by its policy, causing him to contribute to the involvement of other governments in war. By this move it has also placed itself in inevitable antagonism to Austria, and brought forth an unclean spirit from thence, which in a little time will create an open war between the powers, involving many other kingdoms in the strife, and ultimately producing consequences of a fatal nature to the whole ten kingdoms. France is also causing an unclean spirit to proceed from the Sultan, by its diplomacy connected with the Holy Places and demonstration of support in case of a Russian invasion, and thus involving him in a war with that mighty power, when he would otherwise quietly yield to it. Thus we see in full operation that agency which was to indicate the time of the end, and produce the terrible events which must precede and accomplish that period. Let us now, by the light of the prophecy, try to discover the nature of these, and thus be able to read the political history of the next thirteen years, and learn something of the events which will take place from that time till the millennium.

THE COMING STRUGGLE AMONG THE NATIONS OF THE EARTH;

From what we stated at the outset, our readers will perceive that we have no sympathy with that system of wholesale spiritualising, which our commentators have pursued in treating of the future part of this Bible history. That large portion of it which has been illustrated in the past, gives us no warrant to believe—far less to assert—that its future predictions are but emblems of the changes and occurrences that will pass over the Church, and that the wars spoken of are moral, not literal. Hitherto it has been most accurately illustrated by real wars and political events, and until we have a better authority to go upon than Origen and his followers, we prefer to construe the language of the Bible in a literal manner, and, doing so, we believe that the following will be the principal coming events: —

1. The seizure of Constantinople, and overthrow of Turkey by the Emperor of Russia.

In following Daniel's version of the prophecy, which is more detailed than John's, we find, that the unfulfilled part begins at the first colon of the 40th verse of the 11th chapter. That verse opens with the declaration, that "the King of the South," or Mehemet Ali, would "push" at the Sultan. This was accomplished in 1839, when that monarch wrested Egypt and Syria from him, and endeavoured to seize Constantinople itself, and probably would have done so, had not the other powers prevented him, or rather, had not God determined that he should only push, not overthrow. The next part of the verse is, however, fraught with dire calamity to the Moslem Dynasty of the dragon. "The king of the north," or Russia, it is stated, "shall come against him like a whirlwind, with chariots and horsemen, and with many ships, and he shall enter into the countries, and shall overthrow and pass over." Here, we read at once the doom of Turkey; notwithstanding the assurance of assistance from France and England, the Ottoman empire will soon be no more. It is very probable that these allies will be deceived by the professions of peace, which the autocrat is holding out, and when they are off their guard, he will suddenly invade and conquer the kingdom. Evidence of this consummation is already apparent. Notwithstanding the presence of the Russian fleet in the Black Sea, Britain has been so far deceived as to recall the only man— (Sir Stratford Canning. Since the First Edition of this work was published, he has been again appointed Ambassador to Turkey.)— who could have pursued efficient measures, in the event of an invasion. The country is thus left open to the inroad of the northern Emperor, and ere long the news will doubtless come that he is at the gates of the Sultan's capital. We have no date by which to determine the exact time of its occurrence, but considering the number and character of the events to succeed it, and the short space allowed for their performance, it must of necessity be almost immediately.

2. War between France and Austria—Overthrow of the former, and subsequent destruction of the Papacy.

Leaving for a time the sixth vial to run its course on the Turkish Empire, we must follow the seventh in its operations on the horns. After the angel had poured it into the air, where it caused a world of dire commotions, the apostle was carried away into the wilderness to see the judgments these would cause to fall on the beast and his image—in other words, on Roman Europe. For, let it be observed, that the papal powers as well as Turkey are doomed to hard experiences before the ten toes of the image are finally smitten with the Stone.

As the Dragon had yielded to the Western Beast its secular and ecclesiastical power, so Austria, a secular imperial element of that beast, has supported this twofold authority more than any of the other powers, and therefore shall suffer a more signal punishment. Indeed, we find this dominion, which is in the prophecy styled the two-horned beast, identified with, and assimilated to, the Papacy in all its more damnatory features. The history of its rise and progress is given in the last eight verses of the 13th chapter of Revelation, as well as in the seventh of Daniel, where its fate is particularly described: “They (the saints) shall take away his dominion, to consume and destroy it unto the end.” In that dark history of cruelties and crimes perpetrated by the horns against the saints, or friends of truth and liberty, Austria occupies an unenviably prominent distinction. The blood of the two witnesses lies heavily on that country, and has long cried for vengeance from on high. Nor has it cried in vain. When these witnesses were raised, and their power exerted itself through Napoleon, the iron hand of a stern retribution was laid upon Austria, and this horn’s dominion over the imperial west was for a time taken away. The conflict was temporarily suspended by the removal of the ambitious Corsican; but though vengeance has been delayed it cannot be much longer averted. The Austrian horn’s Roman dominion was at that time only temporarily taken away, but hereafter it must be “consumed and destroyed unto the end.” And the earnest of this will doubtless be initiated by the same power that punished him before. France, though herself one of the doomed toe kingdoms, will be the scourge of this horn, and preparation is being speedily consummated for the accomplishment of the work. Already are the two powers adversely situated, and their position will not fail to ultimate in war. The result of this will be presently disastrous to the “bloody house of Austria;” but premillennially and temporarily its occultation in the shadow of the Czar. Jesus appears as a thief, and the saints are raised from the dead. The power of Russia is broken, and the obscurity ends. Then comes the fall of Babylon. The Austrian and its contemporary horns, the supporters of the False Prophet, now become confederate against the Destroyer of the Czarocracy. But Babylon must of necessity fall. The time when the ten horns “shall hate Rome, and make her desolate and naked, and shall eat her flesh and burn her with fire,” obtains in the preadventual contest between France and the Northern Powers. The account of her overthrow is contained in the eighteenth of Revelations, and is one of the most fearful and awe-inspiring nature. It is not for us to describe in detail the events which will produce and accompany her death. These are but partially indicated in the prophecy; we are only told that the people of God will be the agents, and that the powers of Europe will be filled with fear, and wonder when they behold her desolation.

3. The occultation of the Horns or Continental Powers by the Emperor of Russia.

By the time the above occurrences have taken place, the thirteen years will have expired, and the Hour of Judgment come. The whole ten horns will be greatly weakened by the war, and in this condition will manifest “one mind, and give their power and strength to the Beast.” This power is Russo-Austrian, which is temporarily consolidated by the overthrow of many countries into the image of Nebuchadnezzar standing on its feet of iron and clay. It is necessary that the original Roman territory become subject to one majesty, bicrurally displayed, in order that the image of Nebuchadnezzar may be manifested in its latter day apparition to that king, and though we have not an exact description of their occultation by Russia, further than being informed that he would overflow and pass over, we find that Ezekiel, who gives a most minute and graphic account of the great battle introductory of the war of Armageddon, styles him “Gog, of the land of Magog, Prince of Rosh, Mosc and Tobl,” and enumerates Persia, Ethiopia, Libya, and the bands of Gomer, in those that follow him. Now, it can be satisfactorily proved that Magog and Gomer mean Germany and France. These countries he must therefore conquer; and having conquered them the whole of continental Europe is within his grasp. The metallic image will thus be joined in all its parts, the territory comprehended in the Babylonian, Grecian, Roman, and latter day Assyrian Empires, will be ruled by one majesty, and that autocratic, or a majesty ruling by its own will. Events will now hurry forward to the mighty catastrophe. The heart of the emperor will be lifted up by success, and in his pride and arrogance he will endeavour to make the world his slave. But at last the Stone rejected by the builders descends heavily on his feet; the Roman iron, and the Russian or Assyrian clay separate; the brass, the silver, and the gold are broken to pieces, and “become as the chaff of the summer threshing floors,” and the whole is scattered by the winds of heaven.

But what, it will be eagerly asked, is Britain about all this time? Surely she must have an important part to play in this direful game of war. Yes, but after an exceptionable type, so far as we have yet gone, Britain is exempted from catastrophe, though her proximity to the scene of the unequalled struggle will keep her in a state of alarm, and her rulers anxious and watchful. But yet, though beyond the eddies of the whirling vortex of the Continent, she must not, can not, will not be idle. She has a mission to fulfil, and she must feel straitened till it is accomplished—a mission of the strongest necessity, and she cannot evade it—a mission of the noblest nature, and she will not shun it. To her—to the whole Anglo-Saxon race, of which she is the head and representative—is the task assigned of carrying forward the religious, moral, and social preadventual progress of the world, and in this she may be well assisted by her children in the west and south. America may be united with her in the work, and Australia must grow in strength for the same purpose; and thus supported on each side by a strong and stalwart son, the brave old empire will be energised to the task. Talk of America and Britain going to war! the thing is incredible; nature forbids it, and the Bible forbids it, too. When they do fight it will be on one side, and against a common foe; but they have a far different battle to fight in these coming years, than the sword or cannon can accomplish. The great moral contest of spiritual freedom and social morality must be sustained, and the cause must unite them and us in a hearty bond of brotherhood. A people must be presented to the Lord, that his domain may be populated when the time to establish the kingdom shall come; and Britain with her sons is called on to cherish and protect them. But to be more definite; the next event, though not in chronological order, will be—

4. Britain extends her Eastern possessions westward, prevents the immediate occupation of Judea by Russia, and initiates its colonisation by the Jews.

The many and severe wars which our country has had to sustain, in order to preserve her Eastern territories, have by many been considered as too dear payment for their possession. We do not here, however, enter on this question, but beg to inform such, that a far higher purpose than commercial interest or extended empire is to be served by the presence of the British power in the East. So far, indeed, as she herself is concerned, this may have been the real aim; and now that she is in possession, the commercial advantages which accrue from them will be a sufficient incitement to their retention. To preserve the East India market, and keep a path open to it, Britain will strive much and do much; but while her rulers may think they are merely serving the nation, they are really accomplishing one of the grand designs of God, and evolving events, while they cause her to take measures for the preservation of this distant part of her empire, will really and only produce occurrences which will facilitate the great design of Jehovah. Both God and Britain had a special design in the annexation of the Indian territory to the lion power, but these designs were as different in nature and object as the finite is from the infinite. While Britain thought only of wealth and conquest, God thought of his ancient people, and of his covenant, and placed the British Lion in the East to prepare a way for his ransomed, and to become their protection in the infancy of their restoration. Such is God's design, and he has enlisted the energy of the Anglo-Saxons in its accomplishment, by making it their interest to bring it to pass. The value of these lands to the nation is the inducement he has given it to retain them at all risks; and one means of their retention, which will bye-and-bye become very obvious, will be to do that which will tend to introduce the accomplishment of Jehovah's long promised purpose—the restoration of the Jews. The idea has long been held, by those few who do believe in a restoration, that it must be preceded by a conversion. This is erroneous. The Jews, to some extent, will return to their own land as faithless in Jesus as the Christ as when they left it. They will be converted—of this we are assured; but it will be subsequent to their partial re-establishment in Palestine, and by a divine agency little suspected by "Christendom." In the many passages of Scripture which speak of this people acknowledging the Messiah, we can never identify the agency to be employed in bringing about the change as merely human. The Lord invariably speaks of it as his own work, and to be done, as only Divinity can do it—in one day. The veil is to be taken away, the blindness is to be removed, and this after Judah is in part returned to the hill of Zion: "Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, O my people, I will open your graves, and bring you into the land of Israel. THEN ye shall know that I am the Lord"—Ezekiel 37: 12.

It is needless, therefore, to look for the conversion of Israel as an indication of the coming of the latter days. It is the preadventual partial colonisation of Judea that becomes an evidence of this; and we can imagine with what surprise the conversion-theorists will witness the approaching colonisation of the land of Israel by its former inhabitants. But how, it is asked, will they be colonised there, and how does Britain become the principal agent in the work? In this very simple manner: When Britain sees the Emperor of Russia in possession of Turkey, and overthrowing the hosts of continental Europe, she will become alarmed for her Indian possessions, and seek to strengthen her position in the Mediterranean Sea to prevent the autocrat dominating there.

Having succeeded in dethroning the Sultan, and annexing much of the Turkish dominions to his sway, he will naturally endeavour to take possession of Palestine, as that country forms part of the Ottoman Empire. This, however, Britain will not consent to. To let him occupy this territory would be a virtual relinquishment of the Eastern market, because the road to it by the Red Sea would be shut up. What course Britain will actually adopt to prevent this we cannot learn from prophecy, but that she will for a while prevent it we are sure. Not only will her own interests demand it, but the word of Jehovah is concerned in the matter, and demands it too. These political and commercial interests are but the means employed by God to cause this great nation to perform his long expressed determination, to preserve the Holy Land for the elected, eldest born of his children. Were the Russian Emperor to succeed in taking possession of it, he would carry the land tenure of the north along with him, and thus the soil of the land of Canaan would become part and parcel of another nation, its peculiar character as an inalienable possession would be gone, and being "common," it would no longer be called sacred or "holy." But this final alienation of the land cannot be. Jehovah hath said, "the land shall not be sold forever, for the land is mine." It is therefore impossible that it can ever be finally occupied by a power that would at once incorporate it with other territories. An attempt, since the expiry of the 1290 years, has already been made to do this, but, as was to be expected, it signally failed. Shortly after Mehemet Ali established himself as "king of the south," he attacked and conquered Syria, and, as we before stated, "pushed at" the Sultan's throne. The powers of Europe, however, interfered to prevent him from gaining his point, and in negotiating terms of peace between the two countries, ordered Mehemet to restore Palestine to Turkey. This the king of the south refused to do, and claimed the land as his forever by right of conquest. He was, however, at length compelled to yield to the demand, and the land of Israel was given back to those whose creed will not allow them to claim the soil. They have indeed "divided the land for gain," but those pashas who occupy it hold it by no tenure, and may be, and indeed often are, deprived of their possession, without having the right to complain. According to the Mahommedan creed, the land is God's, and though it may be occupied, cannot be owned by any mortal; and certainly, whatever doctrine of the Koran is false, this is true. The Jews cannot even sell any part of it from one to another, far less can the uncircumcised Gentiles get it for a prey.

The only way that seems likely for Britain to preserve her Eastern market open in this emergency, will be to favour the formation of a Jewish colony in Palestine; and thus, it will appear, that the Euphrates is driving up in order "that the way of the kings of the East might be prepared." The drying up of the river, which is in part the destruction of Turkey, will render it necessary for the British power, which then extends to the Euphrates, to promote the return of the Jews to their own land, by extending its protection over it, and holding out every inducement for the sons of Abraham to repair to it. Be this, however, as it may, it is Britain that favours the return of the sons of Judah, as we learn from the eighteenth chapter of Isaiah, where the prophet is furnished with a command to "the land shadowing with wings, that sendeth ambassadors by the sea," enjoining it to render service in the presentation to the Lord of "a nation scattered and peeled, a nation terrible from their beginning hitherto, a nation rooted out and trodden down, whose lands the rivers have spoiled." What a powerful and graphic description is this of the present and past state of the Jews! How their former greatness and present degradation and desolation is associated and contrasted! But how, it may be asked, do we identify the "land widely overshadowing with wings?" We are told that it is from beyond to the rivers of Cush. Now, going east from Judea, across the Euphrates and Tigris, we reach to the "beyond," that is, to Hindostan, the most important of our Indian possessions, and therefore governed by a power that "sendeth its ambassadors by the sea," in other words, by an island state, which shows that the reference is to Britain, and to her alone. The allusion will, however, become more apparent in a short time, when our empire is greatly extended in that quarter, and when the lion-flag waves o'er many an island and country, proving as much its protector as its ruler. There can then be no doubt as to the fact that this country will open up a way for the despised and persecuted race of Abraham, to stand once more in their father-land, and raise anew the songs of David upon the holy hill of Zion, and it is probable that the event will be brought about in some such manner as we have indicated. But, first of all, this country must seize a great amount of territory adjacent to the Holy Land. In the present state of affairs, there would neither be peace nor safety for the Jews in their own country. The Sultan has "divided it for gain," and his pashas lay it waste, and hold it waste at their pleasure. It will, therefore, be necessary to occupy Egypt, Ethiopia, and Seba, besides other places, in order to make these a wall of defence for the Jewish colony, and hence the language of Jehovah to his restored people—"I gave Egypt for thy ransom, Ethiopia and Seba for thee." By possessing these she will also lay her hands upon Edom, Moab, Ammon, and other places on the Red Sea, till at length shadowing "to the rivers of Cush," and on every side the new colony, under the wings of this great maritime power, will grow and prosper, like a cedar on their own mountain of Lebanon.

But by this time the autocrat of Russia has got the nations of continental Europe beneath his feet, and, like Alexander in ancient, and Napoleon in later times, he thirsts for universal conquest. For the history of his career from this point, onward to its close, we turn again to the regular course of the prophecy. If the reader will, before going any further, take up his Bible, and read carefully the last five verses of the eleventh of Daniel, and from the beginning of the thirty-eighth chapter of Ezekiel to the twenty-third verse of the thirty-ninth chapter, he will clearly understand the following which is but a paraphrase of it.

Turning his eyes eastward, on the wealth and prosperity of the countries under British protection, the triumphant conqueror of Europe will conceive the idea of spoiling them, and appropriating their goods and cattle. Scarcely is this idea formed than its execution is begun, and sudden and terrific as a whirlwind from the north he enters "the glorious land." So overwhelming is the invading force, that the British armies retire before it towards the south-east, and Egypt, Ethiopia, and Libya fall into his hands. But tidings out of the East and North shall trouble him. "Sheba and Dedan, and the merchants of Tarshish, with all the young lions thereof, shall say unto him, Art thou come to take a spoil? hast thou gathered thy company to take a prey?" How emphatically does this language identify Britain as the belligerent opponent of Gog the king of the north, and corroborate our former statements regarding the extension of her empire in the East? We would particularly point the reader's attention to the "merchants of Tarshish, with all the young lions thereof;" what an appropriate designation is this of the Honourable East India Company, in its peculiar relation to the British Government! This constitution of things, as is well known, is both civil and military, commercial and imperial. The former is represented by the merchants, the latter by the young lions, or the officials of the imperially-controlled Company, which receives its authority from the Lion of Britain, and may therefore be fitly termed thus, even as the representatives of the Persian and Macedonian sovereignties were called young rams and young goats. Indeed, the applicability of the title is admitted by the Company itself, whose arms are a shield, the quarterings of which are filled with young lions rampant.

The Anglo-Indian government, alarmed at the inroads of the autocrat, and the loss of Egypt, will adopt vigorous measures for opposing him. Hence, "tidings out of the east and out of the north shall trouble him." The news that the Anglo-Saxons have resolved to oppose his despotic progress will annoy and infuriate him. It is possible he may think of a time when another man, ambitious like himself, endeavoured to possess the empire of the world, and went forth conquering till he was met by this same power, and overthrown; and no wonder that such a thought should fill him with trouble. But quickly rage takes the place of fear; he looks proudly on the heaving army that follows at his back, and is enraged at the presumption which dares to thwart a will and power like his, "therefore he goes forth with great fury to destroy and utterly to make away many." Proceeding onward, he seizes the unwallied villages and gateless cities, till at length his huge and multifarious army pitch their tents before Jerusalem. He lays siege to the Holy City, which soon surrenders to his power, and enables him to "plant the tabernacle of his palace between the seas in the glorious holy mountain."

He has now reached the farthest limit of his conquering mission. The decree peals forth from the eternal throne, "Hitherto shalt thou come, but no farther;" and could he but look a little forward, as he paces with proud and haughty step along the brow of Zion, he might see that large and spacious valley, which stretches itself out before him, filled with a mangled mass of dead and dying, swimming in blood, and ready to be devoured by the myriads of birds of prey which hover over the scene. But no such vision crosses his spirit, and he passes on to his tented palace to slumber in pride.

Meanwhile Britain has been making strenuous efforts to stop the progress of this gigantic Napoleon; and every soldier that can be spared is sent away in the direction of the rising sun. But what can the British army do against such a host as the Russian autocrat has around him? Brave as the officers and men may be, what success or what renown can be gained in such an unequal conflict? In the critical emergency the parent island may send a cry across the Atlantic, "Come over and help us." Swiftly is the sound borne over the waves, and soon an answering echo is wafted back from the shores of Columbia. The cause is common, and the struggle must be common too. "We are coming, brother John, we are coming," is the noble reply; and almost, ere it is delivered, a fleet of gallant vessels is crossing the Pacific, with the stars and stripes gleaming on every mast. Another force is on its way from the far south, and soon the flower and strength of the Anglo-Saxon race meet on the sacred soil of Palestine. (This is possible; there is, however, no testimony in the bible to give us assurance of faith that it will be so. It is probable, but not certain. —Editor of the Herald.) The intelligence of their approach reaches the sacrilegious usurper, and he leads forth his army towards the mountains that rise in glory round about Jerusalem. The Jews within the city now arm themselves, and join the army that has come from the east and west, the north and the south, for their protection, and thus these two mighty masses meet face to face, and prepare for the greatest battle that ever was fought on this struggling earth. On the one side the motley millions of Russia, and the nations of Continental Europe are drawn up on the slopes of the hills and the sides of the valleys toward the north; while on the other are ranged the thousands of Britain and her offspring, from whose firm and regular ranks gleam forth the dark eyes of many of the sons of Abraham, determined to preserve their newly-recovered city, or perish, like their ancestors of a former age, in its ruins.

All is ready. That awful pause which ensues before the work of death begins, is broken by the clash of arms; and while yet the contending hosts, are plunging incessant fire upon battalions of bleeding and quivering flesh, a strange sound—“The voice of the Archangel and the trump of God”—outroars the din of battle. —Joel 3: 16; Isaiah 29: 5-8; 30: 30-31. The time for the visible manifestation of God’s vengeance has arrived, his fury has come up in his face, and he calls for a sword against Gog throughout all his mountains. ‘Tis this roaring voice of Jehovah that breaks forth with terror and confounds the assembled armies. The scene that follows baffles description. Amid earthquakes and showers of fire the bewildered and maddened multitude of the autocrat rush, sword in hand, against each other, while the Israelites and their Anglo-Saxon allies become unwittingly Jehovah’s sword upon the enemy. The stone cut without hands falls on the Image feet, and breaks them to pieces; after which the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver, and the gold, become like the chaff of the summer threshing-floor, and the wind shall carry them away. The various descriptions which we have of this battle all intimate that Jehovah of armies is the mighty foe that shall contend with the autocrat in Armageddon. John terms it “the battle of that great day of God Almighty,” and a principal instrument of their defeat will be mutual slaughter. The carnage will be dreadful. Out of all the myriads that came like a cloud upon the land of Israel, only a scattered and shattered remnant will return; the great mass will be left to rot upon the land, and fill the valley of Hamongog with graves.

We pause at this point of the prophecy, considering it unnecessary at the present time to enter into a minute examination of the nature or duration of the millennial period. We have already followed the subject beyond the limits indicated by our title page, and it would swell this pamphlet far beyond its intended size, to enter into a discussion of these points. A great obscurity rests on the events that immediately follow the battle of Armageddon, so that although we might come pretty near the reality, our remarks would be essentially conjectural. (The compiler of this pamphlet is mistaken in the supposition that the events succeeding the overthrow of the Autocrat are obscure and conjectural. They are as well defined as those already outlined. He did well, however, to pause at this point. Better to say nothing than to give utterance to what cannot be proved. —Editor of the Herald.) It is probable that Assyria, Persia and Britain will be the only three powers that will exist in the old world, besides the kingdom which the Most High will establish in Jerusalem; for it is stated by Daniel that “the rest of the beasts” lived for a “season and a time,” after the destruction of the dragon. It is very natural to suppose that Britain will continue to hold a high place among the nations, though what that position will be, or how long she will retain it, the compiler of this pamphlet cannot say. (Assyria, Persia, Britain, and all other States will become the Lord’s and his Saints’ by conquest or surrender. None of them will be left in the hands of Gentile rulers. The nations will continue variously organised, indeed, yet all subject to the Great King, and those of his immortal brethren whom he may appoint over them. —Editor of the Herald.) The Anglo-Saxon race must, from the very nature of their constitution, be a notable people; but it is evident that the Hebrews will have the chief place during that glorious era. Which these stirring changes are to usher in. They will certainly become greater than any of the nations, and that in virtue of the covenant of Jehovah with their fathers.

For the preparation of a race for such a mission as that committed to the Anglo-Saxons, it was necessary that they should burst those chains of civil and ecclesiastical despotism, which priestcraft had forged for, and fastened around the human soul; and with considerable effect have Britain and America performed this duty! Must we remind the reader of Bruce and Wallace and the Covenanters, in Scotland; of Cromwell and Milton, Hampden, and the Puritans, in England, or of Washington and the war of independence, in America? Those fierce and fiery furnaces through which this renowned people struggled in years gone by, were intended to purify and qualify them for the work of the latter days; and the result is, that at this moment they are free, and ready to assume their Heaven-appointed mission. Hence the difference between their fate and the fate of those ancient nations whom they imitated, or the modern nations who imitated them. How often have the generous and noble-hearted gazed with indignant wonder at the gallant yet abortive efforts of patriots to save their country from bondage and oppression, and as star after star of liberty was blotted out by the blood-red sun of despotism, turned a reproachful eye to heaven, as if to ask why truth and justice was denied its own! And never will this dark enigma be explained, till the light of this prophecy, of which we have all along been speaking, shine upon it; but no sooner does its mist-dispelling influence pass across the gloom, than, as sun-light from on high, the answer comes, which amply satisfies the grieved doubting heart, and vindicates the justice of the Eternal. It is only while tracing the windings and developments of Daniel's vision and John's Revelation, that we learn the secret of Poland's downfall and Hungary's degradation. Those nations stand upon the image territory, and are involved in its destruction, therefore all efforts to save them must be in vain. As powers they are doomed to fall, and though their wrongs shall one day be righted, for the present their noble-hearted patriots must resign themselves and their cause to the will of Heaven.

And here, too, in the light of this truth-diffusing prophecy, do we understand the past and learn the future of Ireland. The state of this country has long made it a puzzle to the world, and many have been the attempts, both within and without, to discover the cause and the cure of its evils. The prevalent feeling is, that its union with Britain constitutes the Alpha and Omega of its misery, and for many years it has sought to have the union repealed. Its patriots have even endeavoured to identify their cause with that struggle which America successfully maintained with the mother country, and the idea has taken root in many hearts, both in Scotland and England, which cry shame against the injustice. Now, nothing can be more erroneous than this idea. The Irish struggle can never be identified with the western colonial emancipation, neither can it, on account of the absence of the religious element, be compared to the Scotch or English wars of independence. But without going into the vexed question of the justice or injustice of forcibly perpetuating the union, we would ask the question, What would be the consequences to Ireland herself were she to become an independent nation? These, in a political and social point of view, stand clearly forth to the eyes of many of those who steadily oppose the repeal agitation; but it is only when observed through the medium of this Scripture prophecy that we can discern their full extent or awful magnitude. Passing by those moral and political evils which appear on the surface, what, we ask, would be the fate of the country, thirteen years hence? 'Tis true, Ireland is not on the image territory, and, though not probable, it is still possible, that she might escape being conquered by one of the toes; nevertheless, she will be legitimately within the dark region of the curse. She is among those who worship the image of the beast. She has received its mark in her forehead, and if standing alone, and in these circumstances, when the hour of judgment comes, how shall she escape? We hesitate not to assert that Ireland's union with Britain is the only thing that stands between her and utter ruin, and that while Poland and Hungary failed in their effort for freedom, because they were doomed to be rooted up by the Little Horn, Ireland has failed to regain her independence, because she is destined to a better fate with Britain. We cannot here specify the means to be employed for her regeneration. This the future will show, but regenerated by Israel's King she will be, and by milder measures than those visited on the continentals, owing to that very union which she would so rashly sever.

In the preceding pages, we have seen that Britain's island will be kept comparatively free from the war and strife that will soon rage of the continent, —how the late past harmonises with this decision! While nearly the whole of Europe has been convulsed, our sea-girt isle has remained in peace, and kept so far aloof from the oppressors and oppressed, that many generous but mistaken minds have charged her with coldness and pusillanimity. She has indeed given shelter to both when exiled from their own lands, but she has hitherto been kept from entangling herself with the commotions of the times, and while strife and feud have raged around peace has been in all her borders. This course she will continue steadily to pursue; though, as we before stated, the doings on the continent will keep her in continual alarm and watchfulness. This feeling of uneasiness and anxiety will, however, be greatly dispelled by a knowledge of the truth; and the author of this pamphlet hopes that, for this very purpose, it will be widely circulated. What a sublime position does that individual occupy, who can stand at a distance and gaze upon such a thrilling spectacle as Europe will soon present, with calmness and assurance, "seeing the end from the beginning.” Can anything indeed be more sublime than this? It is like one of the ancient prophets of Israel, gazing from some far-off mountain side on the fulfilment of one of his own prophecies. As he gazes on the scene—perhaps a city staggering into the bosom of an earthquake, or the progress of a battle between Israel and her enemies—is it possible to imagine the calmly glowing feelings of his soul, as, privileged beyond all mortals, he contemplates what had already been pictured to his mind, and can tell the next dwelling-place that shall go crashing down, or the next enemy that shall “lick the dust?” Still greater, if possible, is the position occupied by one who can pass the boundary of the everlasting present, and boldly map the events of the future. God-like he sits on the edge of the thick darkness, and resolves the mystic shapes that flit and gambol there into regularity and order. The dense mist which has hitherto overhung this end of the “bridge” rolls slowly upward, and the things it concealed loom forth, dimly it may be, but still visible enough in their outlines and lineaments to enable him to recognise them when the wheels of time bear him slowly past them. The very idea of superiority of position like this is enrapturing. To think that it is only a select few that are thus highly privileged, —that those whom the events so nearly concern are ignorant of them, —to witness the terror and astonishment with which they are met by those they come to destroy, and, above all, to know that he and his kindred are beyond the reach of their sweeping embrace, is to occupy a position never before reached by any, save the inspired of the Lord. Such a position may Britons and Americans occupy, if they can but speedily arrive at the knowledge of it. In a very short time the conflict will begin. The “powers that be” cannot long remain in their present relative positions, and the moment approaches when the dreadful moral volcano must burst. Already is the sound of the storm heard among the tree-tops. The Russian army is gathering on the frontiers; France has fallen back to that form of government, whose only tradition is war and conquest; the new Emperor is fast increasing his naval power; Turkey is trembling, and all Italy is in a smothered flame. The sooner then that a knowledge of the political future is obtained, the better; and while Anglo-Saxons congratulate themselves on their present advantage, and the prospect of a less severe judgment than that of other nations, let them learn their destiny, and prepare to meet it with humility and godly fear.

THE GOSPEL SCHISMATIC—BAPTISM NOT SIN- REMITTING APART FROM THE ONE FAITH— TESTIMONY AND REASON INDISPENSABLE TO SCRIPTURE DEMONSTRATION.

By the attention of a friend in England, I have become the recipient of "The British Millennial Harbinger," for May, 1853. It has been forwarded to me, I presume, from the marks it contains, that I may see what it publishes concerning myself, who seem still to be a thorn in the flesh of its editor, and of the Star of his destiny, the "Professor of Sacred History" in Bethany College, Virginia, the newest "gate of heaven," devised and erected by ambition and ignorance, or unbelief of the truth.

In looking over this May number, I perceive that the things I brought before the British public when in England, and now periodically finding their way thither in the Herald, give the editor no little trouble and vexation; and, I may add, some of his correspondents too. One, who signs himself "G.M.," writes: "My mind is often saddened when I reflect upon the treatment which this truth (the coming of the Lord) has met with from its professed supporters; but not this only, for even baptism for remission of sins has shared the same fate. First come those who add to the Scriptures the Book of Mormon; and next Dr. Thomas, who makes the Millennial Reign the Gospel of our Salvation, scattering division and schism wherever he goes." He then proceeds to say: "Now these parties (Dr. Thomas and the Mormons) profess both truths. What I want to see is this truth (the coming of the Lord), and all other truths, delivered from such teachers, and stated simply as they occur in the Word of God, asking none to believe what I affirm, except there be at the same time a Scriptural demonstration of the position assumed."

Having nothing but utter contempt for Mormonism, I have nothing to say for that in the premises before us, but shall confine my remarks to what "G.M." affirms of myself. Those who are my regular readers and hearers, and whose minds are not biased by prejudice, will only smile at "G.M.'s" foolishness. They will know first, that "he errs not knowing the Scriptures," that is, Moses and the Prophets; secondly, that he does not tell the whole truth in saying, that "I make the Millennial Reign the gospel of our salvation;" thirdly, that he makes a false accusation in saying, that I make schisms wherever I go; fourthly, that he errs in saying that I profess "baptism for remission of sins," understanding by this that he means to say that I profess that doctrine as it is defined by Campbellites and Mormons; and fifthly, that he talks nonsense in supposing a Scriptural demonstration of a position assumed by a simple statement.

If "G.M." understood Moses and the Prophets, he would understand the New Testament, and know from all these writings that what he, but not the Bible, styles the "Millennial Reign," is neither more nor less than the blessing of all nations in Abraham and his seed, the Christ; which Paul, and, after him, Dr. Thomas, as his humble imitator, terms "the Gospel." Paul's words are these, "God preached the Gospel to Abraham, saying: In thee shall all nations be blessed." This blessedness has not yet come upon a single nation, much less upon all nations; and for any one to say that it has, argues his profound ignorance of what the Scriptures define that blessedness to be.

But I do not say that the blessing of all nations in Abraham is "the Gospel of our salvation," if by "our" is to be understood "the Saints." It is the gospel of the nations salvation. The glad tidings or Gospel of the Saints' salvation is, that when the nations shall be blessed in Abraham and his seed, they, as constituents of that seed, being Christ's, shall possess with Him the blest nations with power and eternal glory, which is the same idea as possessing the kingdom and dominion under the whole heaven for ever. He who says, "This will not be," is an Infidel, and denies the Gospel, though he may believe in the personalia of Jesus. The Saint's reign with Christ upon earth over all nations, when established, will be a reign of righteousness and peace, uninterrupted by war's alarms for a thousand years, the longest peace the world will ever have experienced since man was created. Now, the good news to individual Gentiles and Jews is, that God invites all who believe in the Gospel he preached to Abraham, to become kings of the nations, with honour, glory and life eternal, on certain conditions. It is only believers in the Gospel preached to Abraham, to whom the conditions are accessible; because “the righteousness of God” can only be counted to those who believe the Gospel. “Seek first the kingdom of God.” This is the order laid down by Jesus. If a man have found it, that is, have come to “understand the word of the kingdom,” and say, “What must I do to inherit it? The answer is, You must become the subject of “God’s righteousness;” in other words, you must be constituted righteous in the way that He hath devised for the justifying of the ungodly. Now, “Jesus is the way.” You are required, therefore, to believe in him, as well as in the Gospel preached to Abraham. Because the Jews did not, their belief in that Gospel was of no benefit to them, nor has it been to this day. To believe in him is to believe that he is the man ordained of God to occupy the throne of his kingdom, when “the kingdom shall come to the Daughter of Jerusalem,” which is Zion, the city where David dwelt. To believe this is to believe that he is “the Christ,” or Anointed One, called “Jehovah’s King,” by David, spoken of everywhere in Moses and the Prophets. To believe savingly in him is to believe these things, and that His blood shed was the blood of the covenant made with Abraham, called the New Covenant, shed for the remission of the sins of many; that is, of those who believe the promises of that covenant; that he was buried, and rose again according to the prophets, for the justification of believers. He that believes these “things concerning the kingdom of God, and the Name of Jesus the Anointed,” with a love-working faith, believes the word of the kingdom in its gospel and mystery, “with his heart unto righteousness.”

Whosoever partakes in the reign of Christ will be a saved man; yet the abstract doctrine that Christ will reign on earth a thousand years, or the belief of it, is not, nor has it ever been defined by me to be, “the gospel of our salvation;” the “one faith,” however, which must be believed for justification, comprehends it as an indispensable element of the Gospel. The Gospel is a plurality. It is tidings; not an item of news: but “things” called “good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people,” and one of the good things is, that Christ shall reign on the throne of his father David over Israel and the nations for a thousand years. If it be possible, let “G.M.” comprehend this, and henceforth forbear to write until he is well instructed in the things whereof he affirms.

I remark, in the next place, that he accuses me falsely in saying that I “scatter division and schism wherever I appear.” When Paul visited the synagogues “he reasoned with them out of Moses and the Prophets, expounding and proving by citations the things concerning the Christ.” The result was division wherever he went. Was Paul, or the truth he set forth, the efficient cause of the schisms? “G.M.” would hardly deny that it was the truth that divided them, and not Paul. This is the fact. Yet Paul was denounced by the “G.M.’s” of his day as a scatterer of divisions or schisms, a turner of the world upside down, a pestilent fellow, and so forth. Well, I take Paul for my example in preaching the Gospel. I sometimes enter into Campbellite and other synagogues where Moses and the Prophets are classed with old almanacs: and proceed to reason with the people out of them, opening and alleging, that Christ’s mission is as yet only fulfilled in a very small degree; that He is to restore the kingdom again to Israel, and to rule over it on David’s throne; that he is then to bring the gospel-blessedness announced to Abraham upon all nations to the ends of the earth; and that Jesus, whom Paul preached, is He, who must, therefore, come again in power and great glory to accomplish the work. These great truths and the testimonies of the apostles and prophets pertaining to them, are followed by debates and oppositions. But I am no more to be blamed for these than Paul. When God’s testimony is presented to the blind who say they see, trouble in their camp is inevitable; for the thinking of the flesh is enmity against God and his word. The word of life is light, even as God is light. When, therefore, it shines into the darkness, a struggle ensues between the two elements. If the light prevail the darkness is extinguished, and there is peace; but if the darkness maintain its position, as is generally the case, the light is excluded with all through whom it shines and death remains. Thus, a division or schism (“G.M.” does not seem to know that they are the same) is effected. The Schismatics are the fleshly-thinking opponents of the testimony of God, and not he or they who show what that testimony is, and endeavour to prove that it means precisely what it says. This was all I did in Britain. It is true schisma, or divisions, followed; but I am no more worthy of condemnation for these than Paul, whose doings were invariably followed by the same results. I obey the apostolic injunction, “Contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints.” Where this faith is unknown it is opposed when presented. Shall the earnest contention for that faith cease because of opposition? Shall ignorance of Moses and the prophets put to silence the advocates of their testimony? No; though that ignorance become incarnate, and rejoice in the high-sounding titles with which vain men and proud ecclesiastics delight to honour one another before the multitude. They may gnash their carious teeth, and rave against schism to their heart's content, but God's testimony must be declared. No church enlightened by the truth was ever disrupted or divided by an earnest advocacy of the gospel preached to Abraham, the Millennial reign, the things of the kingdom, or of life and incorruptibility, only through the gospel. A really Christian church rejoiceth in the truth, believing and hoping all things it contains. Not so mere ecclesiastical associations. These are averse to all things not dogmatised in the confessions of their humanly authorised opinions. Mere Diana-worshippers, the craft-creed is glorified to the rejection of the Word of God. I have no regrets, though convicted of being the remote cause of dividing such bodies as these, and no others have I ever set by the ears. All the alleged opprobrium of this I accept with pleasure; and cheerfully anticipate all the consequences to be visited upon the perpetrators of such offences against the kingdom of sin.

Furthermore, G.M. errs in supposing that I "profess baptism for remission of sins," in his, Campbellite sense, or in any other sectarian sense of the phrase. Campbellite baptism for remission of sins is not the baptism prescribed by the Apostle Peter for that result. The Campbellite sin-remitting baptism is the dipping of a believer of "facts" for pardon; for President Campbell of Bethany, in the number before us, says, "faith is the belief of facts." His words are: "It is a great point gained to know and to appreciate that faith is the belief of facts!" When, therefore, Paul says, "We are justified by faith, and have peace with God," according to Bethanian divinity it means, "We are justified by the belief of facts, and have peace with God." This is "historical faith," and "historical faith," he has told us of old, "is the best sort of faith a man can have!" His facts are, Jesus Christ, the Son of God, was delivered unto death for blasphemy, was buried, and rose again from the dead, to sit on David's throne in sky-kingdomia, some Utopia "beyond the skies!" He that affirms his belief in these facts, and is sorry for his sins, is considered as a fit subject for dipping. In dipping him, the usual formulary is pronounced over him, and he is told that all his past sins are remitted. This is styled by Bethanians and Mormons, "baptism for remission of sins." Let not the reader, however, suppose that the Bethanian theology denies remission to the undipped. It teaches that there are Christians among the sects that reject dipping as the divinely appointed mode of using water. These may be styled "the unwashed," who can never be classed with the "washed hogs who return to their wallowing in the mire," referred to by Peter. Hogs unwashed cannot "return" to the unwashed state, though "washed hogs" may. Well, Bethanianism recognises unwashed Christians, while it professes, at the same time, to take the New Testament as the only rule of faith and practice! This is a remarkable incongruity, seeing that all "disciples" styled Christians in that book, were "washed in the name of the Lord"—1 Corinthians 6: 11. But if men be Christians without washing, why exhort them to be baptised so earnestly as Bethanians do? Thus, says their supervisor, the unwashed believers of the facts have the remission of their sins in believing, but not knowing it they are subject to doubts and fears. Dipping is to give them certainty, that, knowing they were pardoned, they may enjoy the pardon—an enjoyment arising from knowledge. Hence, the Bethanian version is, "be baptised that you may know that your sins were remitted when you repentingly believed the facts, and knowing may enjoy the remission of sins."

But I maintain that the Scriptures teach no such baptism for remission of sins as this. It is an unscriptural dipping, because the faith is an unscriptural faith. The faith which justifies is the love-working belief of the exceeding great and precious PROMISES yet unfulfilled, and of the FACTS and their DOCTRINE concerning Jesus as the Christ; in other words, justifying faith Abrahamically embraces the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ. The promises, facts, and doctrine, are essential to that faith "without which it is impossible to please God." These understood and appreciated, will lead men to repentance, because they exhibit comprehensively "the goodness of God," and "knowest thou not," saith Paul, "that it is the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance?" The reason why immersed people produce no better fruits than the undipped, and many of them not so good, is because their "faith" is a mere belief of history—of a narrative of facts—leaving them altogether in the dark respecting the heart-touching and mind-renewing promises of the gospel. Ignorant of these, they fail of becoming "partakers of the divine nature"—2 Peter 1: 4. Bethanian, and other species of "orthodoxy divinity," ignore the promises of God, or double-distil them into the absurd follies of spiritualism. Their repentance is not the mind that was in Abraham—an unstaggering mind, strong in faith, giving glory to God; being fully persuaded that what he had promised, (and the things promised he knew and understood) he is able to perform—Romans 4: 18-23. Their repentance is sorrow because their sin has found them out. Their minds are in torment because of the apprehended tortures of the damned, which may seize upon their "souls" if they do not appease the fury of God! "Fear hath torment," and their "repentance" is the offspring of their terror. This is a repentance that needeth to be repented of; for it is a repentance that worketh death. It is "sin working death in them." Repentance of this sort pervading the inner man is evidential of that heart being untouched by "the goodness of God," for faith in this goodness produces no such result. Its legitimate fruit is "faith working by love and purifying the heart;" and, a belief of facts combined with hell-terrors never since the world began, nor while flesh is flesh will it ever yield that perfect love which casteth out fear, which is essential to a scriptural purification of the soul.

A love-working faith in the gospel of the Kingdom is essentially necessary to qualify a man for immersion into the name, of the Holy Ones. When an intelligent heart-purified believer of the Gospel of the Kingdom is immersed into this name, his faith and disposition are counted to him for repentance and righteousness, or remission of sins, in the act of immersion, which act, according to the formula prescribed by the Lord Jesus, unites him to the Holy Name. Thus "by grace are ye saved through faith;" so that where the "one faith" is deficient salvation is not: for where the one faith is not in the mind and heart of the subject, there is no faith to be counted for the remission of sins.

This what I understand the Scriptures to teach concerning "baptism for the remission of sins." It is very different, essentially different, from the Bethanian, Mormon, and Baptist, baptisms. They are unscriptural, because the subjects of them do not believe the Gospel of the Kingdom, which is foolishness to them, or unknown to them, or rejected with contempt as heresy, or reduced to a nullity by some crotchety hypothesis or vain conceit. Baptism saves by the resurrection of Jesus; but whom? "Us," says Peter. The "us" is defined by himself as an example. He was one of those sent out to preach the Gospel of the Kingdom in all the habitable for a testimony unto all the nations thereof—Matthew 24: 14. He understood, believed, and obeyed what he preached like a candid and honest man. He was one of the saved by baptism through the resurrection of Jesus. And the rest of his contemporaries whom he associated with himself in the plural "us," had believed the Gospel of the Kingdom and been saved from their past sins by baptism also. This was the divine order, and has only been inverted by the ignorance and perverseness of mankind. Faith in the Kingdom's Gospel first, and then baptism, is the order prescribed by the Lord Jesus in the commission; but wayward humanity says, "No; immersion upon any pious grounds first, and faith in the Gospel of the Kingdom afterwards, though not absolutely necessary at all."

Fifthly and lastly, "G.M.," talks nonsense in supposing a scriptural demonstration of an assumed position possible by a simple quotation of Scripture. For example, he "affirms" truly enough, that Jesus will execute the office of High Priest for Israel. An objector says, I deny it, and demand the proof—a scriptural demonstration of your assumption being a truth." G.M., replies, "I will give it in these words of Jesus, "I am King of the Jews;" and of Zechariah, "He shall sit a priest upon his throne." "Now as Christ's Kingdom"—"Stop!" exclaims the objector, "I don't want your reasoning. You have placed your scripture texts by the side of your affirmation, and that is all you have any right to do. You say that you "ask none to believe what you affirm, except there be at the same time a scriptural demonstration of the position assumed" by you. You have affirmed your proposition, and produced what you call "a scriptural demonstration" which to my mind is no demonstration at all. The words of Jesus prove that he said he was King of the Jews; but your quotation from Zechariah may refer to some one else, and therefore does not prove to me, who am a non-Nazarene Israelite, that it is Jesus who shall sit upon the throne of Israel as a priest."

It is obvious from this supposed case, that unless a man is permitted to reason on testimony adduced nothing can be demonstrated to the human mind, which is essentially "enmity against God, and not subject to his law." G.M., nor any one else, can demonstrate affirmations without reasoning. God said to Israel, "Come let us reason together." Paul reasoned with his contemporaries from the writings; that is, he showed that those writings testified what he said was God's truth. This showing was done by what is called "reasoning." G.M., must also reason, or be silent. G. M.,'s article in The British Millennial Harbinger is his reasoning, and proves him to be "a heretic," if the editor be "orthodox;" and I feel satisfied he could not have obtained admission into its columns for what he has therein written, if he had not set out by speaking evil of Dr. Thomas. Have I not a right to show by reasoning what God's testimony declares as well as G.M., or any one else? G.M., says that he asks none to believe what he affirms except it be scripturally demonstrated. I ask no more; but at the same time, claim equal right with all others to endeavour to show what the Scriptures teach; and if I prove that they teach a system of truth subversive, root and branch, of Bethanian and all other theologies, the convicted have no right to rail at me or to seek to silence me in any other way than by the force of argument. My weapons are the divine testimony and reason. If these be too sharp for them, let them stand aloof, and cease to pule about my creating divisions wherever I go. He that fights the good fight of faith with the sword of the spirit, which is the word of God, cannot fail of dividing the enemy, and cutting them up into mince meat: for “the word of God is living, and powerful, and sharper than any twp-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discernner of the thoughts and intents of the heart.” When reason wields this “mighty weapon” against “*imagination*s” and all “high things that exalt themselves against the knowledge of God,” it makes the wise in their own conceit angry and desperate. Instead of receiving what is proved they become violent and disruptive. They praise the weapon resting in its scabbard; but let reason bring its razor-edge in contact with their self-deceivings, and they curse the hand that wields it, and rave against the cut and thrust as the reasoner’s dogmatism and opinions. Then in the words of G.M., they “want to see all truths delivered from such teachers, and stated simply as they occur in the word of God.” They do not want the truths of that word brought home to their consciences. Men do not like that light which condemns their “piety” as evil. “State simply” that “he that believes and is baptised shall be saved; and he that believes not shall be condemned;” but whatever you do, don’t be too particular in defining the thing to be believed, lest in so doing thou shouldest bring us into condemnation also. This is the head and front of my offending. While in Britain I proved to the conviction of many, that “the wholesome words of the Lord Jesus” are scripturally interpreted by the paraphrase, “He that lovingly believes the Gospel of the Kingdom, and is immersed into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, shall have repentance and the remission of sins granted to him in my name; and he that believes not the glad tidings of the kingdom shall be condemned.” G.M. has probably been dipped on a mere belief of facts, knowing nothing of the promises; and being tenacious of his own righteousness, he does not like reasonings that reduce it to mere “filthy rags.” Not being able to overthrow them, he falls upon the reasoner as a schismatic, and prays God to deliver the truth out of his hands, that peace-loving pietists may continue undisturbed. But the days of peace are gone; and G.M. must trim his lamp or perish in the war.

THE SAINTS' REIGN ON EARTH NO FIGMENT OF THE IMAGINATION.

“That a period will arrive when mortals and immortals will visibly mingle and cooperate in carrying forward the plans of the Divine Being, is a theory to sustain which we cannot find the least evidence in the Word of God. The supposition seems to us a figment of the imagination.”—JAMES WALLIS, Editor of the British Millennial Harbinger.

This editor must have been groping about in outer darkness with the word of God in his hand, but hid from his eyes, not to have found “the least evidence” upon what he ignorantly styles “a figment of the imagination.” Unhappy man, to be afflicted with such inveterate blindness! Surely there is one here to be turned from darkness to light, and therefore from the power of Satan unto God. Being always ready to open the eyes of the blind, if possible, or at least to try, I will then just present him with a little evidence in the case. It is one of “the plans of the Divine Being” to bless the nations with good government after he has subdued them. This government is to be administered by Jesus and his brethren, who are to conquer them. If this can be shown, even Mr. Wallis will hardly object to style it, cooperation in carrying forward the plans of the Divine Being. Well, the Lord Jesus says, “That which ye have hold fast till I come. And he that overcometh, and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations; and he shall rule them with a rod of iron: as the vessels of a potter, they shall be broken to shivers.” This testimony teaches that Jesus will come again; for these words were uttered after he had gone away to the far country, where he now is. He is an immortal king; and therefore when he returns he will be an immortal in the midst of a mortal race, or of nations, whose political organizations he will shatter to pieces. To him that overcomes he promises life in paradise, exemption from the second death, and to sit with him upon his throne, as well as to rule over the nations. It is evident, therefore, from these promises, that the overcomers are, like himself, immortal kings. It is also evident that the nations are political communities of mortal men, or they would not be ruled with a rod of iron. The scripture saith that where He is, they that overcome the world by their faith shall be also. It is shown he is to be “head of the nations upon earth;” therefore they that overcome will be here also; consequently the population of our planet will then be partly mortal and partly immortal, the former being subject to the latter, as the kings and priests of God administering for him the government of the world, then blessed in Abraham and his Seed. This is the commingling of mortals and immortals—the nations walking in the light of the New Jerusalem—taught in the word of God; cooperating to do the will of God upon the earth as it is in heaven. But so blind is Mr. Wallis that he can find not the least evidence of such a thing in the Bible! What a man for the editor of a paper professedly advocating primitive Christianity, and the ancient apostolic gospel! Surely Nottingham, “the Jerusalem of Britain,” has no reason to rejoice in his light!

Has Mr. Wallis ever read the “new song” the redeemed of Adam’s race sing in view of their possessing the kingdom upon earth? Does he find no evidence at all of their earthly residence and reign over nations of mortal men in the words, “Thou, O Lamb of God, hast redeemed us to God by thy blood, and hast made us for him kings and priests; and we shall reign on earth?” What need of priests reigning on earth if there are no mortals under their reign? “Priests are ordained for men in things pertaining to God, that they may offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins.” The saints reigning as priests with Jesus, the High Priest, shows that under their reign there are sin and death; if there were not, there would be no priesthood. The priesthood of the saints is only millennial. At the end of that dispensation it will be abolished; for then death, the last enemy, will be destroyed; a fact which presupposes the taking away of the sin of the world, because death is the wages or punishment of sin, and being no more sin, there will be of necessity no more death. The priestly element of the kingdom will therefore be removed, gifts and sacrifices for sin being no more needed. The mixed state will then have terminated. Mortals and immortals will cease to be the division of earth’s inhabitants. All will be immortal, and “God all things in all”—when the kingdom is delivered up to him. But Mr. Wallis is in outer darkness concerning the priesthood of Jesus and the saints. His theory sends them all to sky kingdoms, and detains them there forever! Will he tell us what gifts and sacrifices for sins their spirits offer there; and for whose sins they present them? For on earth in the days of their flesh they officiate for none. Remember the saints are priests in their immortal state. This cannot be got over; for when they sing that new song they speak of themselves as redeemed persons—“thou hast redeemed us.” They must, therefore, be resurrected persons; for none but such are redeemed in the past tense. Being resurrected, they then finish their song by saying, “We shall reign upon the earth;” and when they thus reign, they officiate as offerers of gifts and sacrifices to God for the sins of those peoples over whom they rule.

But this is not all. We have yet another contribution of testimony for the opening of the blind eyes of Mr. James Wallis, Britain’s Harbinger of the Millennium! “Blessed and holy he,” saith the Lord’s angel, “that hath part in the first resurrection; on such the second death hath no power; but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and they shall reign with him a thousand years;” that is, in the same region where the binding of Satan is effected, and where he is loosed again. When Christ’s priestly household springs forth from the dust, they will be prepared for action. “They are the first fruits unto God and to the Lamb,” whom they follow “whithersoever he goeth.” He goes, then, to war against “the kings of the earth and their armies;” and against the dominion symbolised by “the Beast and the False Prophet;” and the redeemed go with Him as His heavenly body guards. At this crisis, “the judgment is set;” and “the saints of the Most High” prepare to “take the kingdom.” “Judgment is given to them,” that they may “take away the dominion” of the Little Horn, “to consume and to destroy it to the end.” In this work they will be gloriously successful; for they are wheels burning with fire, and going forth from the Ancient of Days as a fiery stream. “They shall tread down the wicked; for they shall be ashes under the soles of their feet;” and in doing this, “the Beast and the False Prophet” will be burned alive; and the remnant cut up by the sword of Israel’s Commander; for “the Lamb shall overcome the kings.” But in all this Mr. Wallis finds not the least evidence of immortals mingling in the affairs of mortals, or of cooperation in carrying out the plans of the Divine Being! It is to be hoped that God has not blinded him in judgment for wilfully contending against the truth in times by-gone. Not the least evidence! Surely none are so blind as those who will not see. This, I fear, is Mr. Wallis’ unhappy case.

“Fortunate Englishmen! Enviably day labourers in the noblest vocation that can engage the immortal faculties of man! What glory shall surpass that of the enterprising, painstaking, and heroic men, who shall have restored to us, after the lapse of thousands of years, the history and actual stony presence of the world renowned Nineveh, and enabled us to read with our own eyes, as if it were our mother tongue, the language suspended on the lips of men for ages, though written to record events in which the prophets of Almighty God took a living interest!” Such is the enthusiastic expression of the admiration of the writer in The London Times at the discovery of the ideas represented in the hitherto for ages unreadable arrow-headed characters of the pre-Macedonian Assyrian tongue! The discovery was indeed a remarkable result of industry, patience, and ingenuity; and a feat which few men are capable of. But the idea of this deciphering of forgotten characters being “the noblest vocation that can engage the immortal faculties of man,” are great words expressive of a very small affair. “Immortal faculties” are at present possessed by no man; and will hereafter be only by those of Adam’s race who shall be accounted worthy of the Age to Come, and of equality with the angels. According to the writer before us, their “noblest vocation” will be the restoring to their contemporaries the knowledge of the foolishness uttered in the long forgotten languages originally spoken, or “suspended on the lips of men,” when, in building old Babel’s tower, they asked for brick and they gave them bituminous cement. Accustomed as is the student of prophecy to contemplate the great things hereafter to be manifested through Christ and his Saints, how very insignificant do the “noble vocations” which excite the admiration of the world’s scribes appear to him! Though Mr. Layard has well performed the work of unearthing the idolatrous remains of Assyria; and Major Rawlinson that of reading the inscriptions upon the slabs and obelisks, they would both have performed a nobler and more commendable enterprise, if they had taught their admirers how to read aright those more interesting and wonderful records in the Bible, which relate to the future manifestation of the Assyrian empire in more than the extent of its dominion under the dynasties of Sennacherib and Nebuchadnezzar. The people of this age are mere children, notwithstanding all the discoveries of which they boast. Their minds are spell bound by trifles; the truly great they can neither grasp nor comprehend. How noble will that vocation be—grandly magnificent—the discharge of that divine mission in which the nations shall be brought to confess the ignorance of their leaders and their own foolishness; and from one end of earth to the other to reflect as from a mirror the wisdom and knowledge of God, implanted in their hearts by Christ and his brethren, the conquerors and regenerators of the world. Here is a labour, this is a work indeed.

LIGHT ON THE EASTERN QUESTION.

To be a first-rate power, to have been so blessed and favoured by Providence as to become one, and have risen to that height by the industry, courage, hardihood, and resolution of the English race—to be all this, and yet shirk its manifest duties, is impossible. For who will say that that position has not entailed upon us duties, duties to ourselves and our present interests, to our race and past name, to Europe, and to the world? To be a first-rate nation, and yet profess indifference to the balance and distribution of power, or indifference to the fate of such nations as are emerging from barbarism and struggling for independence, this, we repeat, is as impossible for a proud and a just nation, as it is impolitic for a provident and foreseeing one. Such a view of our duties as a first rate power is not the less just, because a sense of such duties may have been so strained on former occasions as to fling the country into a war of principles. The great struggle between France and England occupied a quarter of a century, and exhausted both the countries that were foremost in civilisation. It was this that created opportunities for countries the youngest and best advanced of the European race to step forth before their time, and assume an ascendance which now menaces even to thrust back civilisation itself. Our mistake was to have quarrelled for mere opinion with a country that stood beside us in the foremost rank, and which, so closely our equal, maintained an almost interminable struggle. The duty now imposed, and the interests appealing to England and to France together for protection, involve no mere preferences of opinion. Considerations of democracy or despotism have nothing to do with them. It is the great material question whether one power shall be allowed to become so preponderant on the confines of Europe and Asia, as virtually, if it succeeds, to dominate the two continents. It is a question not merely of government or its principles, but of self-conservation, of national existence. Whatever forbearance we may suppose to mark the politics of Russia, or whatever fabulous magnanimity we may impute to its Emperor, we can judge by his present tone and demands, while the Pruth yet bounds his empire, what would be his requirements and his policy were his eagles hoisted upon Saint Sophia. The Czar now, from his stronghold at the extremity of the Black Sea, ordains the closing of the Dardanelles against us—an order, forsooth, which our marvellously prudent statesmen think it advisable already to obey. Enthroned the Czar at Constantinople, and could he do less than close the straits of Gibraltar? The stretch of authority would really not be greater than in proportion to his advanced empire and improved position. The position of Constantinople, we well know, confers on him who grasps it the first maritime position in the world, an inexpugnable position, behind which navies to any extent could be prepared and manned. Had Napoleon, crushed as his naval strength was, possessed such a resource as Constantinople, he could have renewed with us ten times over the struggle for maritime superiority. Suppose Russia in that position, and Greeks and Slavonians would then have no choice but to adopt the Russian uniform. The wild races on either side of the Straits demand but a great military power which will give them pay and a fair chance of success. Mahomedanism, humbled in the person of the Prophet's descendant and in the fall of his empire, would enlist its remaining energies in the service of the Russian Sultan. And we should soon find England, its colonial possessions, and world-wide trade, not only menaced and interrupted throughout Asia and Africa, but its naval power disputed on the Mediterranean. But the result of such augmented might on the part of Russia, of the swelling of her armed masses from hundreds of thousands, to tens of hundreds of thousands, would be even more fatal to the continent of Europe than to the maritime powers. As it is, the Slavonians and Germans groan under her impending weight, which forbids to every remnant of the races either national or representative institutions; and jeopardised as we already find the latter in France, we could scarcely hope other than to see them utterly extinguished on the continent of Europe, if Russian influence should be able now to strengthen and extend itself. It is indeed needless to dilate on such a theme, or to depict the too manifest consequence of a Russian occupation of Constantinople. That war would be obviated by allowing the Russians unresisted to establish themselves on the Bosphorus is an argument too absurd for even a Peace Society. Such an event would not only necessitate war in order to extricate ourselves, our trade, shipping, the sea, India, and Europe, from a yoke more universal than Napoleon ever dreamed of imposing, but would involve a quarter of a century's war of the civilised and industrious West against the despotic and military East in order to get back a full emancipation. We do not believe that Russia will risk a war with us. We are convinced that at present what we see of boldness and decision on the part of Russia, of hesitation and doubt on the part of the maritime powers, has been owing altogether to the Russian Emperor's thorough acquaintance with our weak points; too natural in a constitutional government like ours, and which oftener enables enemies to take advantage of our weakness, than friends to put confidence in our strength. Russia, in fact, knows the carte du pays, and has marched across the Pruth, solely because of the conviction that Lord Aberdeen would not resent it. In this, however, the Czar may find himself mistaken. Great forbearance may not preclude resolute action at last. —The News of the World.

THINGS IN EDINBURGH.

Dear Bro. Thomas, —I cannot help wishing for your “Second Visit to Britain,” and the second British edition of Elpis Israel. You were welcomed by many during your first stay, and I am sure that a second visit would be hailed as a new era in the history of “the Latter Days.” The truth is gaining ground here gradually, as an illustration of which I may mention that a congregation is now in course of being formed on the principles historically set forth in the Acts of the Apostles in such language as—“They that gladly received his word were baptised”—interpreting the word by Peter’s speech in the light of the commission, and the teaching of Jesus and the first preachers—as “the word of the kingdom,”—Matthew 13: 19; as “the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ,” which Philip gospelised, or announced as glad tidings, —Acts 8: 12, (see Greek.) we are made up mainly from three sources. First, wandering believers of the kingdom’s gospel who have been trying for sometime to get embodied. Second, some who have left the meeting in South Bridge Hall. Third, the majority of a meeting in High Street for some years conducted on what are called free communion principles, and who have for a considerable time believed and preached the gospel of the kingdom, and have been baptised. The number in all may be nearly thirty.

I remain in the One Hope Yours,

THINGS IN PLYMOUTH.

Respected friend, —No. 6 of the Herald came to hand last week, and the long expected account of your visit to Plymouth contained in it. Knowing the deep interest you feel in the Kingdom, I shall endeavour to give you some information how matters stand in this place. You are perfectly correct in the definition of the Faith held by the church in Plymouth, of which Mr. Micklewood was the pastor. The crotchet of the non-restoration of Israel, Mr. M. has not yet got rid of. His motive for bringing you to this place was twofold; first, a hope that by your lectures he might increase his congregation, which would be very likely to increase his income; and secondly, a desire to hear your exposition of the Scriptures of Truth. But alas, the seed sown was to him, I fear, like unto that sown in stony ground. He still continues at the Central Hall as a member. He is at present engaged in the stationery business with another person; and has declined the offer of going as a pastor, because his present business would be more advantageous. And now, dear Friend, as to the “One Hope” in this place. Through Elpis Israel some of us here saw that we were not united to Christ; for our baptism was but a mere ablution, being ignorant of the things concerning the Kingdom at the time of our immersion. Mr. D. came to this place about two years since, and baptised four of us into the name of the Holy Ones; since which time we have baptised sixteen more; so that we now number twenty, who meet together twice on every Lord’s Day in a large room at Stonehouse to commemorate the dying love of our Blessed Master, and endeavour to edify each other by reading the scriptures, singing praises, and by prayer. Thus, respected friend, your “labour of love” was not entirely lost by your journey to Plymouth. There are several more who would join with us but the necessity of believing the truth before baptism is the rock of offence to them.

I look anxiously every month for the Herald; I have endeavoured to aid it all I can in this place but without success, —Elpis Israel and the Herald give great satisfaction here to those who hear them read.

Remaining your's faithfully in Israel's Hope I subscribe myself,

J.W. MOORE.

BISHOPS' BILLS TO CLERGYMEN.

We take the following from "The News of the World," a weekly published in London. If our readers have discovered anything like what it reveals in Bishop Paul's dealings with the Reverend Messrs. Timothy and Titus, we can only say that we have not; and that we shall be much obliged to them for light upon the subject. Our opinion, or rather conviction, is, that an ecclesiastical system that sanctifies such extortion and mammonism, is an adulteress, and of that family of Harlots whose mother is "Babylon the Great." How grossly dark must be the generation that with the Bible in hand can pronounce the Church of England a section of the Church of Christ!

Sir, —Your observation on the "Reform of the Ecclesiastical Courts" and all things connected with them, might well be extended to the notices of the grievances to which clergymen are at present subject from the secretaries of their respected bishops. I allude to the exorbitant fees, &c. paid to them for institution and induction into preferment, as well as for ordination. Now, perhaps, you have never seen a bishop's bill to a clergyman, so I will give you a true copy of one or two, which I have now by me: —"Correspondence about stamp to presentation and agents charges about letters of orders, £2 2s; stamp for presentation, £20; the bishop's fiat, £2 2s; institution fees, £5; bishop's mandate, £2 2s; sequestration fees, £1 15s; certificates and mace, 13s 6d; stamp, £2 2s; license for public preacher, stamp, £44; archdeacon's mandate, £2 2s—total, £42 2s 6d."

"Drawing and engrossing presentation to parchment, £1 1s; writing to patron, 3s 8d; ditto to London, 3s 6d; drawing and engrossing commission and declaration of conformity under seal to qualify you thereto, drawing and engrossing letters of institution, the like mandate of induction, paid for stamps and attending registrar to fill papers, and paid his fees on filling same, secretary's fees, and postage, £9 9s 6d; Mr. Burder's charge for getting presentation stamp, £11 10s 2d—total, £22 7s 10." These fees differ in all dioceses. I met a clergyman the other day, who had just been presented to two small livings which always go together, but the bishop's secretary takes very good care that he shall have double fees to pay; the net annual value of the one living is £130, the fees to presentation in this case were £80. The second living was worth £50 a-year, and the fees he paid for this poor little living swallowed up his first year's income from it. Now let me show you how the poor curate is charged for ordination, and if you ever read the 135th canon, you will find that where £. s. d. are mentioned in explicit terms, if they do not produce a "tidy sum," the bishop's secretary at once throws canons overboard. The canon is thus headed: —"A certain rate of fees due to all ecclesiastical officers." "Provided furthermore that no fee or money shall be received, either by the archbishop or any bishop, or suffragan, either directly or indirectly for admitting of any into sacred orders, nor that any other person or persons under the said archbishop, bishop, or suffragan shall for parchment, writing, wax, sealing, or any other respect thereunto appertaining, take above ten shillings under such pains as are already by law subscribed." This one would think is about as plain and clear as it can be. Now I paid for orders as under: —Deacon's orders with license,

£4 7s 6d; priests, ditto, £3 3s—total, £7 10s 6d; and on a change in my curacy the other day I was charged £1 18s 6d. The Times friend, Mr. S.G. O., with his comfortable living of £500 a-year, who finds time to run up and down the country spying out for abuses among his clerical brethren, and not confining himself to his own country, but must needs visit the Sister Isle to see how she fares on this respect, might be of some little use if he would drop the Times newspaper a note addressed from his own home, on such abuses as these I have mentioned to you. —

I am, sir, yours obediently,

Birmingham, CLERICUS.

PARENTAL DISCIPLINE.

When parental discipline destroys filial love, it is bad. Veneration is a mixture of fear and love, and is created in every well-organised child by strict discipline and kindness on the part of the parent. But a parent who is always beating, always frowning, scolding, and commanding, and never coaxing and caressing a child, can only be reared, and, ultimately, disliked. Children can never be beaten into goodness, any more than nations can be persecuted into orthodoxy. They generally love their mothers best, because they are most indulgent; but at last they find that indulgence is weakness, and then they learn to disobey the old lady, as they call her. They fear the father, because he is stern and severe; and at last they dislike him, and avoid his society, for his want of sympathy. Were the weakness of both parents combined in one, they would make a virtue. The joint and cordial cooperation of the two sexes makes the best discipline for children; but we are sorry to say, that there is very little of that cooperation to be found. The mother is generally a shield from the father, and her opposition always increases his severity, whilst his severity increases her indulgence. Children cannot be well reared unless parents are well married.

LIFE ONLY THROUGH CHRIST.

“Life only through Christ” is a great truth very conspicuously exhibited in the Scriptures. But what benefit to the mortal inhabitants of earth is the preaching of it unless the preacher demonstrates beyond all question from those Scriptures, how men may obtain life through Him; in other words, “what they must do to be saved.” He that affirms the abstract proposition of “life only through Christ,” but is ignorant of, or opposed to, “the Gospel of the Kingdom,” and therefore does not, and cannot, bring men to “the obedience of faith” expressed in the being immersed into Christ, is a mere beater of the air, gymnasticising for his own behoof, and the glorification of a crotchet.

“We should bring our religious conceptions into definite alliance with the real world, and with nature, and break up a little of those vague and powerless notions which place our religious expectations at a dim remoteness from whatever is substantial and affective. Let us rather persuade ourselves that the future and unseen world, with all its momentous transactions, is as simply natural and true as is this world of land and water, trees and houses, with which we now have to do.”—Physical Theory of Another Life, C. 17.

Rev. H. Harbaugh in his “Heaven,” Philad. edit. 1851, p.61, says, “There seems something undesirable, if not repugnant to our hopes, in the idea that at death we are to be launched forth into a world with no other material substratum but ether, or something still more subtle or refined. It grates on the feelings of one familiar with Scripture representations of heaven, and sounds wild and unnatural to a deeply pious christian consciousness.”

There is no meeting an age of inquiry except in the spirit of profound candour. Men dare not write or talk now as Sir William Berkeley of Virginia, wrote to Charles I. "I thank God, said he, "there are no free schools or printing, and I hope we shall not have then these hundred years. For learning has brought heresy and disobedience, and sects, into the world, and printing has divulged them, and libels against the government."—Edinburgh Review.

* * *

"It is said that even Irenaeus declared the idea that the souls of the Saints pass immediately at death to Christ into Heaven, to be heresy."—Harbaugh.

Is not this testimony a refutation of the objection so often urged against the doctrine of future life only by resurrection, that it is a new opinion?

Homer, though an idolater was certainly "orthodox" as the following passage from the Odyssey proves:

"The rest at last, where souls unbodied dwell,

In ever flow'ring meads of asphodel;

The empty forms of men inhabit there,

Impassive semblance, images of air!"

Alas for a "Theology" which courts such "blind guides" for support and sympathy!

SYRIA, AND ITS NEAR PROSPECTS.

By Col. George Gawler, K.H., F.R.G.S.

*Late Governor and Resident Commissioner of the Province of South Australia. **

The portion of the surface of the globe to which our attention is to be directed in this address, is known to Europeans in general by the name of SYRIA.

Phoenicia, of which the principal sea-port and capital was the renowned city of Tyre, Zor, or Soor, was the great commercial, manufacturing, ship-building, colonising and science-spreading nation of antiquity. Her “merchants were princes, and her traffickers the honourable of the earth”—Isaiah 23: 8. Her emigrants formed settlements in the then uttermost west. Of these, evidences remain in the traditions of Ireland and the Irish language itself, in Punic relics found in the south of England, and in the enumeration of “tin” by sacred (Ezekiel 27: 12) and profane historians as articles procured from the western Tarshish, “the metal islands,” the “End of the earth.”

* This pamphlet was forwarded to me by a kind friend in England at my request. Finding that it sets forth the truth, I republish it for the benefit of my readers. It contains the substance of an address delivered by Colonel Gawler in “the Young Men’s Christian Association Lecture Room, Derby.” I do not recollect any point of difference between the Colonel and myself. He does not appear to be far from the Kingdom of God; he may be near it: though of that I cannot speak positively from his address. There are many who believe the gospel of the Kingdom without understanding the Mystery of the name, though they believe the facts concerning Jesus. They are like Apollos, who need to be taught the way of the Lord more perfectly. They will admit the truth concerning the kingdom, confess that Jesus is the King who is to sit on David’s throne in Syria, acknowledge that his blood is the blood of the Abrahamic covenant, that by his death he gave it force, &c.; yet will they fall back upon theological foolishness, and call the saving of an immortal soul from hell at death, and its translation to a sky kingdom through the merits of Jesus, The Gospel! I know not if the Colonel be one of these. I hope not. There are many such, however, who have not yet learned discrimination. If the Colonel write on all other Bible topics as on Syria, he may be regarded as a scribe instructed for the Kingdom of God. I have added some notes which I hope will be found useful to the student of the word. The Colonel's address, I believe, has never been republished in this country before. —Editor of the Herald.

 The celebrated Abraham Aben Ezra, writing his "Epistle on the Sabbath," in England, in the year 1158 (4919), dates it from "a town of the towns of the island, which is called (Keiseh ha Aretz), the End of the earth."

There are, moreover, strong reasons for believing, that in the then far east, the Phoenicians traded with the islands of the Indian Archipelago, and that sailing from the Red Sea to the South, they performed the marvellous exploit of circumnavigating the whole of the vast continent of Africa, returning to Tyre by the straits of Gibraltar.

Phoenicia was evidently to the ancient world, what Great Britain has become to the world as it now is. The Queen of the Ocean, the great mart of nations, and the principal maritime carrier for the human race. The resemblance runs most momentarily close, in the fact that Tyre was the great preparatory instrument in the establishment of that temple at Jerusalem, in which Deity, usually invisible, appeared in visible glory. Hiram, the faithful friend of David and of Solomon, hewed down the cedars of Lebanon, transported them in floats to Joppa, and sent, besides, carpenters, quarrymen, stone-masons, and artificers for the work—1 Kings 5. His hardy sailors, also, showed the Jews the way to Ophir, for gold, silver, and ivory—1 Kings 9: 26-28; 10: 22, to increase the glory of the temple, and the wealth of Israel.

It is a satisfactory recollection, that in sacred writ, few forerunning types are complete likenesses of their subsequent anti-types. So far as we have gone, may the resemblance between ancient Phoenicia and modern England be perfect; but may England never sink into the pollution and degradation of that tyranny (the word "tyrant" is derived from "Tyre"), pride, luxury, contempt of God's laws and idolatry, that have turned the once gorgeous, "crowning city," into a bare rock upon which fishermen spread their nets—an eternal mockery for men and angels!

It is natural that the name of the splendid centre of that ancient marvellous mercantile prosperity, should have been extended among foreigners to a large surrounding district. From the eastern name of Zor or Soor was derived the appellation of Sooria or Syria, which in process of time has been stretched to include the whole of the extreme eastern boundary of the Mediterranean Sea, from the bay of Scanderoon to el Arish on "the river of Egypt."

Eastern tradition, however, true to its primitive antiquity, overlooks the comparatively modern splendour of Tyre, and gives to the country a more venerable title. The whole Arab race see in it, with especial reference to Damascus, the territory which Shem, the favoured son of Noah, selected for his own personal residence, and with simple pertinacity in their ancient Creed still call it "esh Shamy"—Shem's country.

I would now beg you to fix your eyes on this large general map of the ancient world, and to observe the remarkable central situation that Syria occupies in it. With Europe, Asia and Africa around her, the extraordinary inland channels of the Mediterranean, the Black Sea, the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf, diverging from Syria as a general focus, give her ready maritime communication with all the sea-coasts of the world. Her northern, eastern, and south-western borders, also, run in proximity with those vast districts of Asia Minor, Armenia, Mesopotamia, Media, Persia, Assyria, Babylon and Egypt, which bore the earliest and heaviest populations of primeval society.

In no visible circumstance on the surface of the globe, can right-minded persons discern more clearly the forerunning design of the invisible Creator. Syria, with especial reference to Jerusalem, was created—was created—to be the centre from which divine truth should radiate to the whole human race. Do you wish to see a visible footprint of the invisible God, —behold it there.

Though in some sort anticipating the subject, I would also at this point call your attention to another very remarkable forerunning arrangement of the Creator in creation itself. Great Britain, manifestly destined to perform in these modern times a work similar to that which her maritime mother Tyre accomplished in the days of David and Solomon, was also most signally prepared in creation for her high commission. Though lying in near proximity to the civilised nations of the old hemisphere, yet her girdle of waters has become in the hour of need, a wall of preserving fire against the frightful evils with which they have been too often, and that too recently, desolated. Those waters have also given to her sons the maritime experience through which she has become the mistress of the seas, and those facilities of communication, by which, in resemblance of ancient Tyre, her colonies and dependencies have been spread to the very ends of the earth.

Remarkable as are these creative arrangements, they are surpassed by the further fact, that under her surface were laid in profusion altogether unequalled elsewhere, the very materials which are above all others essential to modern maritime superiority, and commercial and manufacturing pre-eminence. Her inexhaustible beds of coal, combined with ironstone, are gifts from God. Do you desire to see another footprint of the invisible Creator, —it is certainly exhibited here!

These extraordinary advantages were not bestowed (as Sidney Smith would remark), for the mere purpose of “building up the walls of flesh of her comfortable” denizens, but for the more exalted object of furnishing her as the honoured instrument of preparing the way for God’s beneficence to the whole world through the Jewish people.

In the Lecture to which you invited me soon after my return from Syria, I described the general geography and present condition of that country. I will now after a necessary brief sketch of its past history proceed to its future prospects. These shall first be considered in themselves, without reference to time; and evidence shall then be produced that the stupendous events included in them, are so near at hand as to have already commenced their operation.

All present will bear me witness in their hearts that the subject is as difficult as it is momentous. I therefore beg from you forbearing consideration, with the confidence that I hold unchanged the principle which some of you will remember was declared to be the regulator of my former Lecture, that the highest duty and advantage of man is in all things to discern, to grasp and to impart REALITIES, and, moreover, that I do not hazard a single opinion which, in a chequered life, has not been tested by very long and very close observation. There are some here present who know, that when I first entered this town about thirty-four years ago, my mind was directed to this very subject. God in his mercy had brought me a short time previously, when with the Duke of Wellington’s army in France, from the wretchedness of French infidelity and scepticism, to a permanent practical conviction that the invisible God is the God of revelation. Nothing confirmed me more fully in this confidence, than the standing miracles of the state of Syria and the Jewish people; and nothing, even then, gave me a brighter hope, than the sure and certain knowledge that in God’s good time both would be delivered, as well as the whole human race after them, from miserable degradation. I have therefore at least well considered the points at issue.

In pursuing them it is of intense importance to discern and grasp the REALITY, that the eternal invisible Being with whom we have to deal, is as infinite in minuteness, as He is in magnitude. Perfection requires Him to be a minute God as well as a great God. “Where are you going?” said a vexed sceptic on a Sabbath morning, to a poor man whom he met every week walking in a direction opposite to his own. “I am going to worship God.” “To worship God—what do you know about an invisible and inaudible God?” “I know that he is a great God and a little God. A great God, for He fills the universe with his majesty; a little God, for He dwells in my heart!” Dr. Chalmers beautifully expresses the same reality in the words, “Magnitude cannot overwhelm Him, variety cannot perplex Him, minuteness cannot escape Him!”

To apply these realities to our subject. God who in his greatness controls with the same laws which regulate the movements of our own planetary system, the worlds that Lord Rosse’s monster telescope has defined; worlds so distant that their light, travelling at the rate of twelve millions of miles in a minute, may take ten thousand years to reach our eyes, in his minuteness has selected this ball of earth to be the scene of one of the most marvellous of His moral works—the raising of a fallen race from guilt to glory. Having chosen for this object our globe from among the myriads of creation, He selected (as has before been observed) the land to which our attention is this night directed, Syria, from among all the countries of this earth to be the great centre and focus of His beneficence.

Do the minds of any of you revolt from this idea of the pre-determined arrangement and control of God—go to one of our great dockyards, and see the prearranged lines by which the floating leviathans of the deep are precisely formed, and the machinery by which stubborn beams and planks are twisted exactly for their determined places. Shall the God of heaven be less in design and in the power of control, than one of Britain's master shipwrights?

PAST HISTORY OF SYRIA.

Syria having been formed at creation as the especial centre of the ancient world, became possibly a portion of the first glorious demesne of the parents of the human race. We are disposed to limit the dimensions of Paradise to something like those of an English park, while the reality may well have been, that, embracing whole countries, it extended from the Mediterranean to perhaps the Caspian Sea; the river Euphrates, especially named as belonging to it—Genesis 2: 14, thus flowing through its centre. Arab tradition, for whatever it is worth, makes Adam to be formed from the red earth of the plain of Damascus, and refers to Syria other events in the history of the antediluvian age.

Descending to the period subsequent to the flood of Noah, the same tradition ascribes (as has been already observed) Damascus for the residence of Shem, the greatly honoured servant of God, (“Blessed be the Lord God of Shem”—Genesis 9: 26.), and the favourite son of Noah; and before his death and during the comparative youthfulness of Abraham, there appeared in another portion of Syria, Melchisedec, the king of Salem, the priest of the most high God—Genesis 14: 18. The peculiar divine selection of the country being thus early maintained, possibly by the residence in it of Shem, and certainly by the reign of Melchisedec and the advent of Abraham.

That extraordinary land which we see before us, was then stamped with a seal which every man who truly grasps realities, must believe the principalities and powers of earth and darkness cannot disannul. The most ancient, the most solemn, and the most wonderful conveyance of land on record, is to be found in the fifteenth chapter of Genesis. The gift is Syria, “the land from the river of Egypt to the great river, the river Euphrates.” The donor was the eternal God, the legatees were the seed of Abraham, the marvellous and mysterious witnessing signs and seals were “a smoking furnace and a burning lamp that passed between the pieces” of the victims, which, according to the custom of those days, Abraham had divided.

Who can show such a title-deed to any estate in the wide world? Abraham cannot for the field and cave of Machpelah. His covenant for that property with “Ephron the Hittite”—Genesis 23, so celebrated among English jurists as an ancient example of land conveyance, was nothing like so solemn as that for Syria from God himself; and yet the covenant with Ephron remains unbroken. Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, Jacob and Leah, have remained undisturbed through thirty-six centuries in their most honoured possession. Veneration has even fenced it round with a high wall of massive stone, of which intense jealousy even now keeps the narrow portal. WILL THE COVENANT ARRANGEMENT OF A MAN BE MORE LASTING THAN THAT OF THE MOST HIGH GOD?

After a preparatory period of humiliation and suffering in Egypt and in the desert, the children of Abraham were planted as a nation in Syria. God “remembered his holy promise, and Abraham his servant, and brought forth his people with joy and his chosen with gladness”—Psalm 105: 42-43. The immutability of His purpose was vindicated to the uttermost by suspensions of those majestic laws of gravitation and centrifugal force, which ordinarily reign omnipotent from this our solar system to the most distant sun in the nebula of Orion. The waters of the Red Sea and of the Jordan stood in heaps. (“What ailed thee, O sea, that thou fleddest, and thou Jordan that thou wast driven back?”), and the sun stood still on Gibeon, and the moon in the valley of Ajalon. The ruler of a deeply learned and most powerful nation, who ventured to array the unchangeableness of his puny purpose against the “I change not” of the Eternal, lives forever as a monument of consummate folly—another laughing-stock for men and angels. — Oh, that among rulers, the line of the infatuated Pharaohs had ceased forever with the ancient kings of Egypt!

The massive and gorgeous temple of the living God, was at length built upon the very hill on which Abraham had, by the highest act of devotedness, grasped the REALITY of God’s existence, character, power and faithfulness; the visible glory of that God “filled the house”—2 Chronicles 7: 1-3, and, upon the throne of David and Melchisedec, Solomon reigned supreme from the torrent of Egypt to the banks of the Euphrates.

For nearly eighteen centuries, that temple and the glory, the high priest and the sacrifice, have ceased—“For the children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice Afterwards shall the children of Israel return”—Hosea 3: 4-5; —and the Hebrew nation has been “scattered and peeled”—Isaiah 18—in and throughout every country in “the wide, wide world.” What of that? Has not the condition of Syria and of the Jewish nation throughout this (humanly speaking) immense interval, borne a witness to the faithfulness of God’s covenant deed to Abraham and his descendants, more mighty, miraculous and marvellous than if the Jews had remained in Palestine? Despite the fiercest and most energetic efforts of men, and, no doubt, of more than men, the land through eighteen centuries has been kept for the nation, and the nation for the land!

Since the ejection of the Jews from Syria, the Franks have settled as a nation in France, the Anglo-Saxons in England, the Goths in Spain, and others elsewhere; but no nation has been able to establish itself as a nation, in Syria. Up to this day, there has been there no nation, no national union, and no national spirit. The motley impoverished tribes which have occupied it, have held it as mere tenants at will, temporary land-holders, wasting, and manifestly waiting for them whose permanent right it is. The land “devouring up men”—Ezekiel 36: 13, in desolation has enjoyed her Sabbaths, —“I will scatter you among the heathen And your land shall be desolate and your cities waste. Then shall the land enjoy her Sabbaths And yet for all that I will not cast them away But I will for their sakes remember the covenant of their ancestors”—Leviticus 26: 33-45—waiting for them, in truth, whose right it is, by that “WORD OF OUR GOD WHICH ENDURES FOREVER.” Every eye that has seen Syria, its moral divisions, its wastes, its ruins and its depopulation, has received mournful but joyful testimony to the fact.

THE FUTURE PROSPECTS OF SYRIA.

Having thus sketched briefly the prominent points in the past history of Syria, and brought the subject to the days in which we ourselves live, I now proceed to a close, though of necessity very brief, consideration of the marvellous events which must mark its future destinies, and involve the fortunes of the whole human race. I still have no desire but to spread before you strict and sober REALITIES.

My own conviction that the Jewish nation will be restored as a nation to its ancient land, is, as you may have judged from preceding observations, as positive as the conviction of my personal existence, or rather as my conviction of the existence of Him who “rules in the kingdoms of men and gives them to whomsoever he will”—Daniel 4: 25. In addition to that solemn conveyance to Abraham, which if it stood alone would be a sufficient guarantee, there are in the word of Revelation repeated references to it, such as the following.

“He hath remembered His covenant forever, the word he commanded to A THOUSAND GENERATIONS, which He made with Abraham and His oath unto Isaac Saying, Unto thee will I give the land of Canaan, the lot of your inheritance.”—Psalm 105: 8-11.

“Ye shall inherit it one as well as another: concerning the which I lifted up my hand” (the ancient token of solemn asseveration and oath) “to give it unto your fathers: and this land shall fall unto you as an inheritance”—Ezekiel 47: 14—in reference to a division which certainly has never yet taken place.

It is accompanied again with such stupendous declarations as the following, which if an upright man were to make to his fellows no one would presume to disbelieve.

“Thus SAITH THE LORD, which giveth the sun for a light by day, and the ordinances of the moon and of the stars for a light by night, which divideth the sea when the waves thereof roar: the Lord of hosts is his name: If those ordinances depart from before me, SAITH THE LORD, the seed of Israel also shall cease from being a nation before me for ever. Thus SAITH THE LORD; IF heaven above can be measured,” (have you yet travelled to Lord Rosse’s most distant telescopic stars, and planted there his telescope to fathom the abyss beyond them?) “IF heaven above can be measured and the foundations of the earth searches out beneath” (have you yet succeeded in mining down to the centre of gravity?), “I will also cast off all the seed of Israel for all that they have done, SAITH THE LORD.”

The promise, as in almost every other instance, binds up the land with the nation, for without any interval there follows, “Behold the days come, SAITH THE LORD, that the city shall be built to the Lord, from the tower of Hananeel unto the gate of the corner . . . it shall not be plucked up, nor thrown down, any more forever.”—Jeremiah 31: 35-40.

Again, (if one may be permitted to say so), the deepest sympathies of the soul of the Most High are involved in this great consummation, for the land, be it always remembered, as well as for the people. In the same chapter as the preceding unspeakably powerful asseveration, are found in the following outpourings of divine pity.

“Yea, I have loved thee with an everlasting love: therefore with loving-kindness have I drawn thee. Again I will build thee and thou shalt be built, O virgin of Israel: thou shalt again be adorned with thy tabrets, and shalt go forth in the dances of them that make merry. Thou shalt yet plant vines upon the mountains of Samaria,” at this moment as bare as the south downs of England; “the planters shall plant and shall eat them as common things.”

“Hear the word of the Lord, O ye nations, and declare it in the Isles afar off,”

ARE THE BRITISH ISLANDS MORE THAN ADAMANT DEAF, THAT THEY CANNOT HEAR EVEN THE VOICE OF THEIR GOD?

“He that SCATTERED Israel WILL GATHER HIM, and keep him as a shepherd does his flock.”

“Is Ephraim, my dear son, a pleasant child? for since I spake against him, I do earnestly remember him still: therefore my bowels are troubled for him: I will surely have mercy upon him, saith the Lord. Set thee up waymarks, make thee high heaps. Set thine heart towards the highway, the way thou wentest: turn again, O virgin of Israel, TURN AGAIN TO THESE THY CITIES.”

Every one who has really examined upon this subject the revelation of our invisible Creator, must know that distinct and absolute passages like these, might be brought forward in number sufficient to occupy your attention for the greater part of the night; I will therefore leave this point of the certainty of Israel's future restoration to Syria to plead its own cause, as “THE WORD OF OUR GOD” which “SHALL STAND FOREVER.”—Isaiah 40: 8 Let those who dare neglect or reject such passages, but let us, if we would, dare not to do either. Knowing the Bible to be God's word, may we take God AT HIS WORD and actively comply with it.

The restoration will embrace not only the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin, which were dispersed by Titus and are to be found generally among civilised nations, but also the other ten tribes, which were carried away captive to Media, about seven centuries before the Christian era.

“Behold, I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen, whither they be gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land: and I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel, and one king shall be king to them all and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all—Ezekiel 37: 21-22.

“And he shall set up an ensign for the nations, and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel,” the ten tribes, “and gather from the dispersed of Judah,” the two tribes, “from the four corners of the earth”—Isaiah 11: 12.

If any should ask where are those ten tribes now? It may be replied, that modern travellers have furnished evidence they should first of all be sought for where they were lost, in the district of ancient Media; and that from that point looking to the north, north-east, and east, abundant traces of them will be found from Daghestan on the western side of the Caspian Sea, along the southern shores of that great inland water, into Bokhara, Afghanistan, the north of India and China. —(“These from the land of Sinim,”—Isaiah 49: 12, pronounced Seenim or Sheanim. La Chine (French) pronounced la Sheen. In Tartarian, Tcheen.) Portions of them may have wandered elsewhere, but in the countries above named they certainly exist in considerable numbers.

2. The restoration is to be accomplished, in a very great degree, through the assisting instrumentality of other nations, and in an especial manner of some of the “Islands,” of the “Daughter of Tyre,” “Tarshish,” the great maritime nation of the day, of the nation which shall “overshadow with wings,” and to which shall be applicable the peculiar title of “Ketseh ha Aretz,” “the End of the earth.”

I beg your close attention to the foregoing summary; the welfare of your sovereign, of your country, of yourselves, and of your children, may be inseparably bound up with it. The worst blight that can fall upon nations or families, JEWS OR GENTILES, flows from the sentence from above, “Because when I called, ye did not answer; when I spake, ye did not hear; . . . Therefore, thus saith the Lord God, . . . Behold, my servants shall sing for joy of heart, but ye shall cry for sorrow of heart, and shall howl for vexation of spirit”—Isaiah 65: 12-15. The whole passage, referring as it does especially to our own days, is most worthy of close attention.

“Listen, O Isles, unto me, and hearken ye people from far”—Isaiah 49: 1.

“Keep silence before me, O Islands; and let the people renew their strength”—Isaiah 41: 1.

There is need enough with Great Britain at this moment for obedience to this last injunction, and it is a happy augury that the passage soon proceeds to declare,

“THE ISLES saw and feared; the ends of the earth were afraid, drew near and came.”

“SURELY, THE ISLES shall wait for me, and the ships of TARSHISH”—Isaiah 60: 9-13, tin-producing Tarshish—Ezekiel 27: 12, “FIRST to bring thy sons from far, their silver and their gold with them, unto the name of the Lord thy God . . . to beautify the place of my sanctuary: and I will make the place of my feet glorious . . . And they shall call thee the city of the Lord, the Zion of the Holy One of Israel.”

“THE DAUGHTER OF TYRE shall be there with a gift.”—Psalm 45.

(Daughter of Tyre is doubtless applicable to Britain, the Bath-Tzor of this Psalm; which prophesies of “the latter days” when “the Mighty God” girds his sword upon his thigh in glory and majesty to overthrow the people, and to establish his throne. Names of countries and towns are feminine in Hebrew. Bath-Tzor is feminine. Bath, translated “daughter,” signifies also female descendant. Britain is the commercial descendant of Tyre, and therefore styled Bath-Tzor—descendant, in the sense of the trade and commerce of the east and west once possessed by Tyre being now in the hands of Britannia. Tyre’s commerce has descended to Britain, therefore is she Tyre’s daughter of the latter days. No other Gentile power will inherit the world’s commerce after her: for “the abundance (or commerce) of the sea shall be turned unto Zion, and the wealth of the nations shall come unto her.” Jerusalem is the next heir of Tyre’s Daughter, and not the United States. The trade and commerce of the nations will travel no further west; but pass from Britain to Syria, whence it originally departed. This is the end scripturally revealed of that commercial rivalry now subsisting between Britain and the United States. The people, though not the governments, of these two countries will find increased prosperity in the transfer of the commercial throne from London to Jerusalem, the city of ancient Tyre’s wise, glorious, and powerful ally. —Editor of the Herald of the Kingdom.)

“Ho! To THE LAND OVERSHADOWING WITH WINGS” or “extremities,” (that is, it seems to me in sober application, “overshadowing a large portion of the earth with her dependencies”) * “that sendeth ambassadors to a nation scattered and peeled All ye inhabitants of the world and dwellers of the earth, see ye . . . and hear ye”—Isaiah 18: 1.

* The Colonel’s idea is doubtless correct. It is a “land” upon whose dominions the sun never sets—a “land widely o’ershadowing with wings from beyond to the rivers of Cush,” as rendered and interpreted in my translation of Isaiah 18. —Editor of the Herald.

And lastly, “Behold, the Lord hath proclaimed unto ‘Ketseh ha Aretz,’ to ‘THE END OF THE EARTH,’ say ye to the daughter of Zion, Behold thy salvation cometh”—Isaiah 62: 11. This command is usually understood to be addressed to all mankind, from one end of the earth to the other end of it. If this were the true meaning it would of course include the British Isles, and still make the duty enjoined imperative upon them. As, however, it is expressly asserted as a general truth, that at the commencement of the restoration of the Jewish nation, “darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people”—Isaiah 9: 2, it is not likely that the nations of the earth, in general, should appreciate such a command, or be the objects of it. Nations in “gross darkness” could not say “to the daughter of Zion, Thy salvation cometh.” This solemn command, therefore, I take to be not general but particular. Not to mankind from one end of the earth to the other end of it, but to that particular nation, which was the western extremity of the great political world, (America  does not interfere with general politics,) and which was emphatically known of old by the very name used by the prophet, “Ketseh ha Aretz,” “the End of the earth,”—“the end,” sing., not “the ends,” plur. I am the more confirmed in this application from the circumstance that “Tarshish,” of which “tin” producing England certainly formed a part, is declared to be the “first” to engage in Jewish restoration—“the ships of Tarshish first;” and the more still, as certainly, of late years, Great Britain has been particularly chosen to be the great sanctuary of the word of divine revelation, and the great means of circulating the sacred volume throughout the earth.

 America is a “New World,” forming no part of the prophetic earth, which belongs exclusively to the “Old.” The world known to the ancients is the theatre on which is to be displayed the grand and marvellous events of the latter days, which are to ultimate in bringing Europe, Asia, America, &c., into absolute subjection to the King of Israel. The general declaration that “he shall be King over the whole earth,” by implication foretells the conversion of these United States of North America into regal provinces of his Empire; the consequent abolition of Republicanism, which is merely a provisional and temporary element of the Gentile economy. —Editor of the Herald.

Under all these considerations, whether as included in mankind from one end of the earth to the other end of it, or as especially included in Great Britain, “Ketseh ha Aretz,” “the End of the earth,” I, seeing the extraordinary indications of the days in which we live, bow before the divine command, and with the loudest utterance that I can give, I would say to the daughter of Zion, “BEHOLD, THY SALVATION COMETH!” “PREPARE YE THE WAY!” And in the same spirit of responsibility, as a man and as an Englishman, I would invite every prudent heart and voice in this United Kingdom, to join with practical energy in the appeal.

For its literal accomplishment, it is not necessary that we should endeavour to define to the Jewish people, whether that “salvation” is the Saviour they expect, or the Saviour we Christians expect. Both parties look for a mighty Saviour from the God of Israel, and the scriptural and natural signs of our times (as will be presently shown), loudly testify to the nearness of his approach. Let us, therefore, in union, in obedience to the divine command, which clearly implies union in effect, “PREPARE THE WAY” for the manifestation of the goodness of our great Creator, whatever it may be. Let it not be recorded against any of us, “When I called, ye did not answer!”

England will not long remain single-handed in assistance to this great work; for it is expressly declared.

“The Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising”—Isaiah 60: 3.

“Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I will lift up my hand to the Gentiles, and set my standard to the people, and they shall bring thy sons in their arms, and thy daughters shall be carried upon their shoulders; and kings shall be thy nursing fathers, and their queens thy nursing mothers”—Isaiah 49: 22-23.

3. The restoration, however, will not be effected without great opposition. When, in this world, was ever any great and good work accomplished without strong opposition?

“Now also many nations are gathered against thee that say, Let her be defiled; and let our eye look upon Zion. But they know not the thoughts of the Lord, neither understand they his counsel; for he shall gather them as the sheaves into the floor. Arise and thresh, O daughter of Zion: for I will make thine horn iron, and I will make thy hoofs brass: and thou shalt beat in pieces many people”—Micah 4: 11.

(The daughter of Zion will not “Arise and thresh” until Messiah appear; for it is written, “Judah shall be as the mighty who tread down in the mire of the streets; and they shall fight because the Lord is with them.” They will, doubtless, contend in battle with Gog, or the Autocrat of Russia, when he invades Syria, but instead of threshing they will be thrashed, notwithstanding Britain’s aid. The Deliverer, however, will be at hand to come with great power to cast the enemy out of their land. —Editor of the Herald.)

I will not enlarge on this painful particular, although the sacred volume contains extensive evidence in regard to it. The trial will be great, but the triumph greater.

A singular feature in its commencement will be, the general dullness of perception of the Jewish people, and the determined opposition of a portion even of them; though divine mercy will supply remedies for the first, and give to the second a signal rebuke and overthrow.

“I will give to Jerusalem one that bringeth good tidings. For I beheld, and there was no man; even among them, and there was no counsellor that, when I asked of them, could answer a word”—Isaiah 41: 27-28.

“Hearken unto me ye stout hearted that are far from righteousness: I bring near my righteousness, it shall not be far off, and my salvation shall not tarry: and I will place salvation in Zion, for Israel my glory”—Isaiah 46: 12-13.

Those who have been brought, as I have been brought, to the full confidence that the words of the Most High God are never uttered with lightness, will bend in reverence before the power of language with which the last declaration is enforced.

“I am God, and there is none else; I am God and there is none like me, declaring the end from the beginning and from ancient times the things that are not yet done, saying, My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure yea (aph), I have spoken it, yea (aph), I will bring it to pass; I have purposed, yea (aph), I will do it”—Isaiah 46: 9-11.

4. All difficulties will be finally overcome and removed by the especial, visible and audible interference of the Great God himself.

“Behold, in those days and in that time, when I shall bring again the captivity of Judah and Jerusalem. The sun and the moon shall be darkened, and the stars shall withdraw their shining. The Lord also shall roar out of Zion, and utter His voice from Jerusalem: and the heavens and the earth shall shake: but the Lord will be the hope of His people, and the strength of the children of Israel. So shall ye know that I am the lord your God, dwelling in Zion my holy mountain: THEN SHALL JERUSALEM BE HOLY, AND THEN SHALL NO STRANGERS PASS THROUGH HER ANY MORE”—Joel 3: 1, 15-17.

5. I now request your most particular attention to the effects of Jewish national restoration upon the whole human race and upon the condition of our globe. They are truly worthy of your consideration, for you will perceive that they are the very effects which statesmen, philosophers, philanthropists, and religious persons have been labouring for centuries to produce in whole or in part, but without success.

All have been sensible that the human race, as a body, is degraded, disorganised, afflicted and unhappy: all have striven to lessen or remove these evils, and yet, after labours indescribable, the success of all and every class has been extremely limited. The mass of human degradation and misery remains unchanged.

This picture represents strict and sober realities. Why are they realities? Is it not because these persons, eager though they have been for great and glorious ends, yet have they not grasped the further reality of the rigid jealousy of the God they have to deal with, for his own appointed means—the placing of the Nation He has chosen, in the land he has chosen to be the focus and centre of his goodness and glory?

The effects of Jewish restoration must be—for the Most High God has said it must be.

Their own extraordinary purification.

“Thy people also shall be all righteous”—Isaiah 60: 21.

“For I will take you from among the heathen, and gather you out of all countries, and will bring you into your own land. Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean: from all your filthiness and from all your idols will I cleanse you. A new heart also will I give you and a new spirit will I put within you . . . and ye shall dwell in the land that I gave to your fathers; and ye shall be my people and I will be your God”—

Ezekiel 36: 24-28.

(Mayim tehorim, pure waters, or waters of pureness, that is, of heart. The word rendered sprinkle in Isaiah 52: 15, is nahzah, and in the future yazzeah, not zahrah, and in the future zahrakti, as in Ezekiel—khain yazzeah goyim ravbim ahlav is rendered by Gesenius so shall he cause many nations to rejoice in himself, the verb nahzah signifying to leap, to exult, to spring: leaping is the natural action expression of joyousness; hence when spoken of nations, nahzah, signifies to rejoice; but when spoken of liquids, to leap forth, spirt, or spatter. In Isaiah it is used of many nations, not of liquids; it therefore in that place means to leap for joy, to exult. The Seventy have translated the Hebrew by, so many nations shall be filled with admiration because of him. But not so their kings! They will not exult: for it is so written in the next sentence, yikpetzu melahkhim, the kings shall contract; i.e. as one gathers himself up in death. They shall be dumb, they shall die, they shall not rejoice when the world exults in the king whom Jehovah gives. This is the sense of this passage, which was not, however, perceived by the baby sprinkling translators of the common version. —Editor of the Herald.)

O you who are ice-hearted and infatuated among Christians and Jews, bend your eyes to read the last paragraph flowing from the mouth of Him that formed you, and who even now searches you out; and say if human language can express more powerfully the glory and happiness of the land and of the people, and, through their union, of the whole race of man! What words from God would you have, if the preceding are not sufficient to move you? I know of none that voice can utter or pen can write: fit preludes are they to the marvellous reality that comes next for consideration.

The great invisible author of the immeasurable wonders amid which we live, breaks from the thick darkness in which He has been pleased to shroud himself for ages past; “destroys the face of the covering cast over all people, and the vail that is now spread over all nations”—Isaiah 25: 27, and with wonders in the material world worthy of his approach and presence, again reveals His own visible glory to mankind.

“The light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun, and the light of the sun shall be seven-fold, as the light of seven days, in the day that the Lord bindeth up the breach of his people, and healeth the stroke of their wound”—

Isaiah 30: 26.

“When the Lord shall build up Zion, He shall appear in his glory”—

Psalm 102: 16.

“Thine eyes shall see the King in His beauty look upon Zion the city of our solemnities: thine eyes shall see Jerusalem a quiet habitation there the glorious Lord shall be unto us a place of broad rivers and streams”—Isaiah 33: 17, 20-21.

“Then the moon shall be confounded, and the sun ashamed, when the Lord of Hosts shall reign in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously”—Isaiah 24: 23.

“The sun shall be no more thy light by day: neither for brightness shall the moon give light to thee: but the Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light and thy God thy glory”—Isaiah 60: 19.

“My tabernacle also shall be with them: yea, I will be their God and they shall be my people. And the nations shall know that I the Lord do sanctify Israel, when my sanctuary shall be in the midst of them for evermore”—

Ezekiel 37: 28.

These unutterable blessings will not be confined to the Jewish nation. The whole human race, which was made “in the image of God”—(“So God created man in his own image, IN THE IMAGE OF GOD CREATED HE HIM!”), and this globe which He “created, not in vain, but to be inhabited”—Isaiah 45: 18—in peace and in love, will also rejoice in them with joy inconceivable.

“He hath remembered his mercy and truth towards the house of Israel: and all the ends of the earth have seen the salvation of our God”—Psalm 98: 3.

“For the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord as the waters cover the sea”—Habakkuk 2: 14.

“Rejoice ye with Jerusalem and be glad with her ALL YE THAT LOVE HER: rejoice for joy with her all ye that mourn for her: that ye may suck and be satisfied with the breasts of her consolations; that ye may milk out and be delighted with the abundance of her glory. For, thus saith the Lord, Behold I will extend peace to her like a river, and the glory of the Gentiles like a flowing stream: then shall ye suck, ye shall be borne upon her sides, and be dandled upon her knees. As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you; and ye shall be comforted in Jerusalem”—Isaiah 66: 10-13.

“In that day the Lord shall be King over ALL the earth: IN THAT DAY SHALL THERE BE ONE LORD, HIS NAME ONE”—Zechariah 14: 9.

What a most effectual and indispensable element for human happiness is here! Religious doubts and difficulties which fill men's hearts with anxieties, and theological enmities which have blotted the whole volume of the history of our species with frauds, contentions, and blood, will universally cease, and the Most High God be worshipped in his true essence, name and character. To take the lawful preparatory measures for such a great end as this; should not Jews and Gentiles, setting aside in abeyance the differences which make union in effort impossible, heartily and honourably labour in concert, as the word of their God commands them? If they labour not together, the required preparatory work cannot be done.

"I will also make thy officers peace, and thine exactors righteousness"—

Isaiah 60: 17.

"O let the nations be glad and sing for joy, for thou shalt judge the people righteously, and govern the nations upon earth"—Psalm 67: 4.

Here is a motive for all political reformers. They cannot have spotless supreme government, or completely peaceful and just subordinate management, until Syria and Israel be united. Then, they will soon realise the brightest vision of political perfection.

"And it shall come to pass in the last days, that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills; and all nations shall flow unto it. . . . and He shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many people; and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning hooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more"—Isaiah 2: 2-4 and Micah 4: 1-3.

Here is an inducement and a warning for the most ardent promoters of "Peace Societies." So long as the nation of Israel remains dispersed, and the land of Syria depopulated and desolate, Peace Societies are engaged in the labours of "Sisyphus." They may tug and sweat to roll back the mountain avalanche of war as they will; their labour will be in vain; it must return upon them with tenfold impetus, until "Jerusalem be the throne of the Lord," and He shall say to it, "Stand thou still." They cannot make straight what He has made crooked, * but through the means alone which He has appointed to straighten it; and let them remember, that for such means He is most jealous; crossing sometimes in anger every other even though the end in view be good and desirable.

* The Colonel speaks truly. The Peace society is an empty bubble, the idiotic bantling of maudlin avarice and infidelity. Jesus says, he came to send a sword upon the earth; yet in spite of this, they dream of substituting peace for the benefit of merchant princes and millionaires! "There is no peace for the wicked, saith God," who would never be able to avenge the blood of his saints shed upon the earth, if the Peace Society's crotchet were to become a fact. War is inevitable, and cannot be staved off by the cupidity of merchants and traders who are heaping up their rusty gold for the spoiler. The day of Christ is at hand, when his poor shall be covered and filled with good things, and the peacemongering rich sent empty away. —Editor of the Herald.

This portion of our subject may be well and appropriately concluded, with the most energetic invitation and command of the God of Heaven to universal nature to rejoice.

"Sing, O ye heavens; for the Lord hath done it: shout, ye lower parts of the earth: break forth into singing, ye mountains, O, forest, and every tree

therein: FOR THE LORD HATH REDEEMED JACOB AND GLORIFIED HIMSELF IN ISRAEL—Isaiah 44: 23.

From the News of the World.

THE REBELLION IN CHINA;

OR,

A CONSTANTINIAN CONFLICT IN THE LAND OF SINIM BETWEEN PROTESTANTISM IN ARMS, AND CELESTIAL IDOLATRY.

Some time since we were enabled to inform our readers that there were strong grounds for believing that the great and singular movement which, during the last eighteen months, has been rapidly making head in China, and which threatens, or, perhaps we should say promises, before many months shall elapse, to effect a complete revolution in that immense empire, had its origin in a religious motive, and that the foundation upon which it was based was the rock of Christianity. We are happy now to state that this deeply interesting information has been indisputably confirmed by the tidings which have reached us from that quarter of the world within the last week.

It will be remembered that when the English mail left the Chinese waters early in the month of April last, it was reported that an engagement had recently taken place between the insurgents and the imperial forces before the walls of Nankin, and that it was doubtful, from the confused and imperfect intelligence which was spread upon the subject, on which side the victory had fallen. On the one hand it was loudly proclaimed that the insurgents had sustained a severe defeat—on the other it was as confidently asserted that they had obtained a decided victory, and that great city of Nankin, as well as the neighbouring important town of Ching-kiang-foo, were in their possession.

To resolve the doubt, and, if possible, to collect some more authentic information than had yet been received as to the nature and object of the insurrectionary movement, Sir George Bonham, her Majesty's chief representative in the Chinese seas, determined to make an expedition to the seat of the rebellion, and to place himself in communication with some of its leaders. Accordingly, just before the April mail left China, he set out in her Majesty's ship Hermes with the intention of making his way up the river, and of proceeding as far as the walls of Nankin itself. By the mail which arrived from China only a few days ago, we receive the gratifying intelligence that Sir George returned to Shang-hae on the 5th of May, having completely succeeded in accomplishing the objects of the expedition. He had ascertained that the insurgents were in actual possession of Nankin, which had been reduced to ruins, but which they were, nevertheless, strongly defending—that they were also in possession of Ching-kiang-foo—and that they were only awaiting the arrival of reinforcements from the south, before they proceeded on their way to Peking. More than this, he had succeeded in bringing himself into communication with several of the insurgent chiefs, from whom he had gathered a mass of information respecting the character and object of the insurrection, in the deep and vital interest of which every European reader must warmly sympathise. Of all the mighty and mysterious movements at this moment impending or actually in progress, upon the face of the earth, it would appear that this movement of the Chinese is the most striking and the most pregnant with hopeful and salutary consequences for the time to come.

It is now ascertained beyond the possibility of doubt that the insurgents are Protestants and anti-idolaters of the strictest order. They acknowledge but One God, the Heavenly Father, the All-wise, All-powerful, and Omnipresent Creator of the world; with him, Jesus Christ, as the Saviour of mankind; and also the Holy Spirit, as the last of the Three Persons of the Trinity. Their chief on earth is a person known as "Tae-ping-wang, the Prince of Peace," to whom a kind of divine origin and mission is ascribed. He, however, from claiming adoration, he forbids in an edict the application to himself of the terms "Supreme," "Holy," and others, hitherto constantly assumed by the Emperors of China, but which he declines receiving on the ground that they are due to God alone. Furthermore, it appears that the insurgents have adopted a moral code which they call the "Heavenly Rules," and which, upon examination, Sir George Bonham ascertained to be no other than the "Ten Commandments." The observance of these, we are told, is strictly enforced by the leaders of the movement, chiefly Kwang-tung and Kwang-se, men who are not merely formal professors of a religious system, but practical and spiritual Protestants, deeply influenced by the belief that God is always with them. With proud humility, and with the glistening eyes of gratitude, they point back to the fact, that, at the beginning of their enterprise, some forty years ago, they numbered but 100 or 200 followers, and that, except for the direct help of their Heavenly Father, they never could have done what they have done. "They," said one, speaking of the Imperialists, "spread all kind of lies about us. They say we employ magical arts. The only kind of magic we have used is prayer to God."

From men thus actuated and controlled, ultimate success cannot be long withheld. Their objects are to overthrow and to expel the hated dynasty of the Mantchoo Tartars—to restore the throne to the descendants of the ancient Chinese dynasty of Ming—to purge the land of the gross and foul idolatry which has so long debased and disgraced it, and henceforward to place the Empire within the fold of pure and uncorrupted Christianity.

It must be confessed that these—or, at any rate, the last two—are noble aims; and, now that we are thoroughly acquainted with them, it becomes even more manifest than it was before that no foreign interposition of any kind whatever should be made, either by ourselves or by any other State, to thwart or impede the progress of a movement which promises to be productive of results so beneficial and so vast.

The insurgents are represented as being full of hope; but at the same time manfully prepared to endure the consequences of a reverse. "If it be the will of God," they say, "that our Prince of Peace shall be the Sovereign of China, he will be the Sovereign of China; if not, we will die here."

Contrasted with this, the perturbation and alarm exhibited by the Emperor are almost pitiable. "I am filled with apprehension," says he, "and I humbly entreat august Heaven to pardon my offences and save my poor people." He then issues a proclamation summoning the great offices and all the people of the Empire to a solemn sacrifice to the gods; and at the same time repeats his exhortations to his army to be stouter of heart and more valorous, and not to persist in what he calls the "detestable" practice of "running away" the moment they are brought face to face with the enemy.

Now that the nature of the movement in China is thoroughly ascertained and distinctly understood, its future progress will necessarily be watched with the deepest interest by the whole Protestant world.

TARSHISH.

THE IDEAS OF THE HEBREW SACRED HISTORIANS IN RESPECT TO THE WESTERN LOCALITY COMPREHENDED UNDER THIS TITLE.

There was, unquestionably, with these writers, an Eastern locality to which the name Tarshish was, in some manner, applicable. It was reached by water from the ports of the Red Sea; the time occupied by the whole voyage was three years; and the imports from it into Syria were, “gold and silver, ivory, apes, and peacocks”—1 Kings 10: 22; 22: 48; 2 Chronicles 9: 21; 20: 36-37.

The family of Tarshish (a grandson of Japheth) might have thrown off a colony to the eastward; or this eastern Tarshish might have obtained its Shemitic name, from some fancied resemblance between it and the main settlements of the Tarshish race in the west of Europe, in something of the same manner that, in our days, there are East Indies and West Indies.

The Western Tarshish, however, was certainly the original stock and territory. Javan, the son of Japheth, had four sons, “Elishah and Tarshish, Kittim and Dodanim. By these were the isles of the Gentiles” (the coasts of Europe, and in part, perhaps, of Africa, from Syria westward), “divided in their lands: every one after his tongue, after their families, in their nations”—Genesis 10: 4-5.

They did not proceed to occupy the then wilderness earth, in mixed parties; but separated themselves from the beginning, into great family nations. Accordingly, also, to the prevailing custom of those days, the region each family selected was named after one of its early progenitors.—(As, Assyria from Asshur, Canaan from Canaan, Cush (Ethiopia) from Cush, &c.)

To appreciate the true character of their colonising movements, it is of very great importance to cast off the nursery prejudice, that in arts, sciences, and civilisation, the early descendants of Noah had to begin the world again. The truth is, probably, to an amount which we rarely conceive or admit, on the opposite side. Noah and his sons, must have possessed the experience and refinement of the antediluvian age. —(The sculptures and other relics of ancient Nineveh also give strong support to this assumption.) The constructors of the ark could not have been inferior shipwrights, or the architects of Babel contemptible builders.

The grandsons of the high-principled Japheth, were likely to carry with them in their practical colonisation, the highest attainments of the age. Gesenius, one of the best recent authorities on ancient geography, indicates the order of their settlements to be; —(Gesenius’s Hebrew Lexicon by Bagster, in loci.) —Dodanim, at the western end of Asia Minor; Elishah, in Peloponnesus; Chittim, in Northern Greece, and, perhaps Italy; and Tarshish in Spain.

Adopting this arrangement as correct, the probability (in a question, be it remembered, which in our days is suspended altogether on probabilities,) becomes preponderating; that, under the very general ideas which the sacred historians embraced of very distant countries, the term Tarshish (when applied to the western locality of that name), comprehended indistinctly, in their minds, the whole region of the uttermost south-west and neighbouring west of Europe.

It is, again, within the bounds of very reasonable probability, that the race of Tarshish, for a time, actually occupied that region with settlers. According to Dr. Cowles Prichard, the Iberians (Euskaldunes, or modern Basques,) were the aborigines of Gaul and Spain. —(“In the west, as aborigines of western Europe, we have the Euskaldunes, or ancient Iberians, they are supposed to have inhabited Spain, Gaul, and Italy.”—Researches into the Physical History of Mankind, vol. iii. page 17.) He, certainly, resists strongly the supposition that they ever formed settlements in the British Islands; but it is only on the ground, that no evidence remains of such settlements. Against this conclusion, we may with fairness range on the opposite side; that no evidence remains that they did not form such settlements, or that any other human beings, whatever, were then in possession of the domains we Britons now occupy.

The Celtae, Dr. Prichard admits, came from the east after the Iberians; extirpated the latter out of all their possessions, except the impregnable western Pyrenees and mountains of Biscay; and passed over to Great Britain and Ireland. In which last mentioned countries, the historians, Tacitus the Roman, Lhuyd the Welchman, and Niebuhr the German, conceive they might have found as aborigines, the Iberians.

Be this as it may, it is reasonable to consider, that, regarding the Iberians as the descendants of Tarshish, the sacred historians should not have run very precise boundary lines as to what portions of the extreme west and south-west of Europe were occupied by actual settlers, and what portions were still in wilderness; but that in their generalising and most obscure notions of distant lands, they comprehended the whole region, and its adjacent islands, under the name of the immediate progenitor of the first occupants.

The evidence of strong probability which is thus derived from the name of the natural father of the aboriginal race, is, in the most forcible manner, corroborated by the circumstances and proceedings of the commercial parents of the same region, the Phoenicians.

It is connected with this most ancient and enterprising nation of merchants and mariners, that the western Tarshish is mentioned in sacred writ. So early as about 580 years before the Christian era, Ezekiel, describing the commerce of Tyre, says of it, “Tarshish was thy merchant by reason of the multitude of all riches; with silver, iron, TIN, and lead, they traded in thy fairs”—Ezekiel 27.

At that period, (580 years before the Christian era,) the distant region called Tarshish, was, evidently, from the prophet’s description, a long established, and extensively occupied, portion of the globe. In our days we have seen Australia, at the very antipodes, springing up into importance in little more than half a century, and its adjacent islands and coasts well searched out. How great and extensive then, in all reasonable probability, must have been, after centuries of occupation, the results produced in the region of Tarshish, by sailors as enterprising, and merchants as eager, as are even those of modern England!

In the ages when brazen armour, swords, spears, and other instruments, were counted of the highest value, and when brass (as has been proved by modern analysis) was invariably “an alloy of tin and copper,” the tin of Cornwall must have been a stimulus at least as exciting, as now is the gold of Australia.

It is true, that “tin mines were opened by the Phoenicians on the northern coast of Spain beyond Lusitania.” (Strabo, 119.)—Historical researches, by A.H.L. Heeren. Translated, Oxford, 1833, vol. ii. Page 66. — But, also, “it is fully proved, that the British and Cassiteridean isles were the seat of the tin trade.”—Page 68.

The same is supported, most fully, by Sharon Turner in the introduction to his “History of the Anglo-Saxons,” with the assertion, also, that “the most learned at home and abroad” unite in this opinion. Moore, in his “History of Ireland,”—(For all such quotations see History of Ireland, by Thomas Moore, vol. 1. chapter 1.)—is as decisive and more copious to the same effect; adding to it, on very ancient testimony, that “the husbandmen or planters of Carthage, as well as her common people, went to those isles.”

From old authorities and existing relics, quoted and adduced by Moore and other recent writers, it further appears, that Ireland was revered by the Phoenicians as “the Sacred Island,” the mysterious far-west of the whole world, and devoted by them to the worship of the sun, under the name of the great deity of Phoenicia, “Baal Samhim.”

Thus the two passions for which the Punic race was eminently notorious, enthusiastic idolatry in religion, and rapacious idolatry in commerce, united to make the British Islands a greater point of attraction to them, than probably was any other portion of the earth.

Heeren observes, among the oriental nations who had heard nothing more from the mysterious Phoenicians than the name of this distant country, Tarshish; “it was considered in a general manner as the furthestmost place towards the west, without any one being able to give more accurate information concerning it; but in the commercial geography of the Phoenicians, was evidently understood, the whole of Southern Spain which had been subject to their authority. It was consequently a very indefinite term, much the same as that of the West Indies among the moderns.”

The limitation of the name among even the commercial Phoenicians, may well be doubted; but, most manifestly from all the preceding testimony and considerations, we have sound reason for holding the conviction, that among the Hebrews and the Eastern people in general, it included the whole region beyond the straits of Gibraltar, from which the “ships of Tarshish” came, and from which the “silver, iron, tin, and lead” were procured.

In this sense, we discern the beautiful consistency of sacred prophecy in describing the British Isles as “the daughter of Tyre,” and as the nation which shall be the FIRST to supply the “ships of Tarshish,” to convey the returning Israelites to “the name of the Lord their God.”

That judgments are foretold against the modern “ships of Tarshish”—Psalm 48: 7; Isaiah 2: 16, forms no objection to the interpretation. “Whom the Lord loveth, he chasteneth.” He calls England, by His word and providence, to the repetition of the most glorious work of Tyre, —the uniting with the Jews to “prepare the way” for the manifestation of His Majesty upon earth, —while, by His “loving correction,” He may purpose to deliver us from the vices of Tyre, unbelief, luxury, pride and commercial rapacity, and from her consequent total and fearful destruction. —Gawler’s Syria.

INDUSTRIAL PLANTATION, NEAR JERUSALEM, FOR JEWS IN NEED OF EMPLOYMENT.

Among the means of promoting the independence of the Jewish people, and thereby advancing the best interests of Jerusalem, one of the most likely to be efficient appears to be the establishment of Industrial Institutions.

The Jews are an industrious and enterprising people, willing to relieve themselves, whenever the opportunity is given, from the state of pauperism in which, unfortunately, the greatest number of those in Jerusalem exist and starve. The tailors, bakers, blacksmiths, shoemakers, watchmakers, glaziers, &c., &c., are almost without exception Israelites; but the amount of employment afforded is inadequate to the wants of so many thousands.

The Hebrew population of Jerusalem is variously estimated from seven to ten thousand, and, with the exception of a very few families, all are extremely poor. The Fund contributed to by pious brethren in every part of the world, is administered by the Rabbis; and when the various other claims upon it are satisfied, but a very small proportion is left for the poor and needy. The Ashkenaz (or German and Polish) community is generally considered the wealthiest, and yet a common allowance to a poor man from its fund is ten paras, or about two and a half farthings, per diem; and even this starving pittance is liable to be withdrawn, if the Rabbis should take offence at any thing their pensioners may do.

Surely this is slavery and bondage of the worst description, —bondage for the merest necessities of life, in the Holy City of their former kings and princes, where gold was like stones, and silver was nothing accounted of.

There are at present two Industrial Establishments in Jerusalem. One, the House of Industry for men, has been opened by the Society for Promoting Christianity amongst the Jews, for persons inquiring into, or believing, the truth of Christianity, and the number of those admissible bears as yet but a small proportion to those willing to earn their daily bread by the labour of their hands.

The second, under the care of Miss Cooper, established by her independently of any Society, is for Jewish women and children, and is open to all who are willing to come. This Institution has answered so well that an assistant has been found necessary, and another English lady has joined Miss Cooper in the beginning of this year, (1852.) The number rose to forty-five and forty-six, and it was impossible for one pair of hands to prepare the work fast enough for them; and many were refused admittance on this very account. There is now an immense class wholly unprovided for, viz., such men as would work by the day, and at night return to their families, whether calling themselves inquirers into Christianity or not, who would be grateful for an honest and independent means of livelihood. Agriculture is a branch of useful employment which offers many such great advantages, besides the happiness of clothing once more the barren hills, and cultivating again the waste places around Jerusalem.

Some have supposed that the Hebrew people are at present unfitted for field or garden work, or at least unwilling to labour at it. Such as think this cannot have witnessed Hebrew labourers, aye, and Hebrew Rabbis, at work in Mr. Meshullam's farm at Urtass, or Solomon's Gardens, near Bethlehem, and the English Consul's plantation, near Jerusalem; and cannot be aware of the fact that not a week passes without fresh applications for employment being made by poor Jews, or of the melancholy truth that Israelites literally die for want of meat in Jerusalem. Others may suppose that the neighbourhood of Jerusalem is insecure, and that people would be afraid to work. These again cannot have seen the summer encampments of the European residents, where, without guards, single families, including ladies and children, pass the hot season without the slightest annoyance by night or day. Others there are who believe Palestine to be an accursed land, incapable of producing any crops but stones and salt and sulphur. Let them come and see two crops a year produced by the poorest land we have. Let them behold quince trees groaning under the burden of 400 quinces, each one larger than the largest apples of England: vines, with a hundred bunches of grapes, each bunch three feet long, each grape three and a quarter inches in circumference: a citron tree, bearing 510 lbs. weight of fruit: half-grown broad beans from Urtass, the pod thirteen inches long, and six clustering stems from each plant: Indian corn, eleven feet high, on ground from which, four weeks before, a similar crop had been taken: water-melons, twenty, thirty and forty pounds weight.

The unbelief and apathy and indolence of man, —these are the curses on Palestine; but the land itself is being healed before our eyes. Few persons are aware that the cultivation of land around Jerusalem has received much attention within the last three years, from an Archimandrite of the Greek Convent. The large plantations around the convent of St. George, opposite the Jaffa gate of Jerusalem, at Mar Elias, half-way towards Bethlehem, and at the Convent of the Cross, &c., are the work of the Greeks, who have moreover purchased immense tracts in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem and elsewhere, which have not yet been planted. The value of land is very much enhanced in consequence. During the month of February, 1852, the Greeks planted 23,000 young mulberry trees, close to the Jaffa gate of Jerusalem, those formerly planted having answered well. Olives are planted at intervals, and small crops with vines between. They have blown away the surface rocks with gunpowder, and exposed the rich clay beneath. The loose stones are gathered into terrace walls. The ancient rock-hewn cisterns existing in every field are repaired, and supply the trees with water during the first year, after which the rains are sufficient for them. The supply of rain has steadily increased during the last seven years. In 1848 the lower Kedron flowed, on account of the well En-rogel rising to a height not known for eight or nine years before. Every year since, En-rogel has overflowed, and a fine stream poured down the Kedron, between the months of January and March.

This year we had delightful latter rain at the end of April and beginning of May, a thing unknown for years before. The new plantations have already yielded a considerable quantity of silk, which will increase every year. The olive tree is at present one of the most valuable products of this country, but would be infinitely more so did the inhabitants understand the art of crushing the berries and refining the oil. An Italian gentleman has declared that a handsome fortune might be derived from the residue, considered by the Arabs as worthless when they have passed the berries under their primitive and clumsy crushing mill. Two years ago olive oil of this country had never been imported into England. In the beginning of last year, twenty ships, of one hundred tons each, were loaded at Jaffa with this article alone; and merchants of London and Glasgow are endeavouring this year to open a trade in oil with Jerusalem, which will ensure handsome profits. Olive trees of ten and twelve years old bear transplanting well, and begin to yield in three years.

There is a piece of land near Jerusalem already secured (though the purchase money is not all paid), on which it is intended to establish an industrial plantation, for any Jews willing to work thereon. English residents, competent to judge, approve the Institution, and consider that there is every reason to expect success. A few hundred pounds are required for repairing the ancient cisterns, planting the trees, &c.; and for the first two or three years funds will be necessary for paying the labourers, &c. It is calculated that for about £300 the planting and clearing may be accomplished. The extent of the plot is about seven or eight acres. An oil and soap manufactory should be added. (The kali plant is a product of the country.) As soon as the first arrangements are completed, the writer will put it into the hands of trustees, who shall carry out the object.

POSTSCRIPT BY FRIENDS IN ENGLAND.

The above statement has been printed as sent from Jerusalem. Additional information has since been received. On Monday, July 5th, a second petition was addressed to the British Consul by sixty-three Spanish Jews, earnestly imploring agricultural labour, to preserve themselves and children from starvation. Seven of them named Cohen, five Levi, two Kimchi.

The consul says: —

“One of the bearers of the paper, with tears, asserted that his family had been three days without food, and the Rabbis had given them leave to get such work where they could. I gave them a note of recommendation to Meshullam, as they told me he had promised to employ six. The rest I sent yesterday to my Talibiyeh ground. . . . Fifty-one were employed, and today there are thirty-four. It is a truly animating spectacle, but the pecuniary burden on me is immense.”

Another account states that seventy-five were at work.

The undersigned friends in England, struck with this wonderful intelligence, that the Jews are beginning to cultivate their own Holy Land; convinced that they must learn to labour before they can again become a great nation, and desirous to assist the good work, have formed themselves into a Committee to superintend the transmission of contributions, in order to secure a judicious application of the Funds raised for this purpose.

They particularly request that all Donations may be addressed to Captain Henry L. Layard, 16, Lincoln’s Inn Fields, with a special notification that they are intended for The Promotion of Jewish Agricultural Labour in the Holy Land; and, without pledging themselves altogether to the details of the above plan, undertake the application of contributions to the great object of employing Jews in the cultivation of land.

BIBLE EXAMINER PROTEST—“BOLD ASSUMPTION.”

At a Convention held at Rochester, N.Y. in June, the Advent Harbinger reports Dr. John Thomas as having said:

“A man may believe the truth with all his heart for twenty years, and yet not be justified—Baptism is essential to this—this is the law of justification; we are immersed into the name of Jesus Christ.”

“We have italicised that part of the remarks which we denominate a bold assumption. The Bible teaches, in no equivocal terms, that the ‘law of justification’ is faith. ‘That he (God) might be just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus. Where is boasting then? It is excluded. By what law? Of works? Nay: but by the law of faith.’—Romans 3: 26-27. ‘Seeing it is one God, which shall justify the circumcision by faith, and uncircumcision through faith,’—verse 30. ‘Therefore being justified by faith, we have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ,’—Romans 5: 1. But it is needless to multiply texts of Scripture on this point; nothing is taught more distinctly than that ‘the law of justification’ is ‘faith.’ To affirm that ‘baptism is the law of justification,’ and that ‘a man may believe the truth with all his heart for twenty years,’ or one year, or one hour, ‘and yet not be justified, we regard as unscriptural and a daring assumption. The question is not whether he can continue justified unless he is afterwards baptised; that may be true; and it is equally true that he cannot continue justified if he knowingly disobeys God in any of his commands: but that ‘baptism is essential,’ (i.e., that without it is impossible) to ‘be justified,’ is neither scriptural nor rational; and such an assumption we regard as the very highest development of sectarianism. We express our opinion of the sentiment distinctly, that none need be in doubt as to our position on that question. If men wish to establish a bitter and persecuting sect, the sentiment we have animadverted upon is the very best they can start with. We are determined to have no strife with those who hold and promulgate such sentiments; we have borne our testimony against it, and thus discharged what we believed was a duty.”—Bible Examiner for July, 1853.

Upon the above, the Editor of the Harbinger (from whose paper we quote, not being favoured with an exchange) very properly remarks: —

If we do not misjudge, Bro. Storrs has misapprehended the real sentiment conveyed in the short extract which he has made from the brief report of Dr. Thomas’ discourse as given in our paper of June 18. If so, we presume it will be his pleasure to be corrected when shown his mistake. By looking at that report, it will be seen that it reads —“Baptism is essential to THIS—THIS is the law of justification;” instead of—“baptism is the law of justification”—as Bro. Storrs has worded and quoted it! Here is a mistake in giving the words of the Report, if not its real sentiment.

Bro. Storrs understands the second relative pronoun, “this” to refer to baptism, thereby making “baptism the law of justification;” whereas we think the true construction of the paragraph makes baptism only a part of that law. It does not read that baptism is this justification, nor this law of justification, but that baptism is “ESSENTIAL” to this justification, or law of justification. There is a marked difference between baptism being the law of justification, and being essential to that law.

The first part of the paragraph more than intimates that something besides baptism constitutes the law of justification, for it reads, “A man may believe the truth with all his heart for twenty years, and yet not be justified.” Why not? “Because faith without works is dead.” Faith in the abstract, or mere heart belief, does not constitute the law of justification: the elements of that law are faith and works; baptism is one of those works, therefore baptism is “essential” to, or helps to perfect the law of justification.

This we understand to be the sentiment expressed in the paragraph, which we believe to be in harmony with Dr. Thomas’s faith. He does not believe, according to his teaching while recently in this city, that a man without a true gospel faith would be any more justified should he be baptised every day for twenty years, than he would to live that length of time in the neglect of baptism, and “believe” all that time. He most strenuously holds that true Bible faith, Bible baptism and Bible works are all “essential” to the law of final justification. To show that these are his sentiments as reported in the Harbinger for June 18, and that Bro. Storrs is mistaken, we will give the entire report of Dr. Thomas’ discourse, in which Bro. Storrs finds the (to him) very exceptionable sentiment. Speaking of that discourse, the reporter says:

“He read the scriptural definition of faith from Hebrews 10: 38-39; 11: 1, and remarked on the ‘full assurance of faith.’ We have no miracles to give assurance of faith; but we have what is greater—the prophecies. By an habitual study of them, we acquire the full assurance of faith. This faith grasps the future—‘the things hoped for.’ Hence, faith is not simply ‘the belief of facts;’ historical facts is not sufficient. Promises are to be believed, and commands obeyed; yet faith does also embrace a belief of the facts of the gospel—the death, resurrection, and ascension of Christ, &c.

“Faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God; which, put together, is, faith comes by hearing the Word of God—all the prophets said should come to pass. If we speak not according to this Word—law and testimony—we have no light. ‘Preaching the Word,’ was preaching ‘Moses and the Prophets,’ and embraced two great topics, Acts 8: 4-12, viz., The kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ. Not Jesus first, then the kingdom; but ‘the kingdom first, then God’s righteousness.’ He that believes and is baptised—believes what? What the Samaritans did concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ. Matthew 24: 14—This gospel of the kingdom must be preached in all the world for a testimony to the nations. Compare chapter 4—the kingdom of the heavens. Acts 10: 34-38—God sent a word to the Israelites by Jesus, and the household of Cornelius perfectly understood it: it contemplates the restoration of the kingdom to Israel—all nations are to be blessed through Abraham. To preach the kingdom of God, is to preach the gospel, and vice versa. If either is omitted, the other is. No kingdom, no gospel; no gospel, no kingdom. Parable of the Nobleman illustrates the time of the kingdom. When he comes, energised by the Holy Spirit of his Father, we shall see whether these men will have this man to reign over them. This same gospel was preached of Christ through David and the prophets. God has established the throne of his kingdom in the house of David. David had no desire but the salvation that Christ would bring—we should desire no other. The promises are for the believers only. Caesar would not have been concerned, if Christ’s kingdom was to be ‘beyond the bounds of time and space.’ There are certain conditions to submit to—the law of faith must be conformed to. The world needs two things which it cannot provide itself with, a righteous civil and ecclesiastical code of laws, and righteous rulers to administer them.

“God is preparing from among the nations a body of righteous administrators to administer such a code, when they shall be raised from the dead all prepared.

“Continuing in well-doing implies beginning to do well. A man may believe the truth with all his heart for twenty years, and yet not be justified—baptism is essential to this—this is the law of justification: we are immersed into the name of Jesus Christ.”

Taking this report as a whole, as every man’s discourses should be taken, it surely teaches that something more than baptism constitutes “the law of justification.” Faith most clearly and forcibly is made a very essential part of that law by Dr. Thomas.

“DO IT.”

A correspondent, in calling my attention to friend Storrs' article, says: “ ‘Reprove, rebuke, correct, exhort, &c.’ In the present number of the Bible Examiner I notice a piece captioned ‘Bold Assumption,’ the origin of which is accredited to some pertinent remarks made by you at the Rochester Convention. Now, sir, I, and not myself alone, would heartily rejoice to see brother Storrs so lovingly disciplined, and brought to a bearing on this point, as would produce a stereotyped impression on him, and as far as possible help to a dissipation of that lax and animal sentiment and feeling which disposes of the word—‘the wholesome words of the Lord Jesus Christ,’ by a test so futile, irreligious, and sensual in character. When will people learn that man’s animal feelings are to be subordinate in all respects to the word? How difficult to obey, indeed impossible, so long as a disposition is indulged in meddling, modifying, altering, and with a restless spirit parrying off, lowering down, variously graduating, and tempering a seeming severity to please their testy and unsanctified humours. Surely such things need the double-edged sword of truth to be not only brandished against them, but with a masterly and unsparing hand to be made to enter into their supporters, dividing asunder their souls and spirits, joints and marrow, and laying bare the hidden things of their deceived hearts—Hebrews 4: 12. Brother Thomas, do it!”

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR ON MR. STORR’S TESTIMONY.

Friend Storrs is right—“The Bible teaches in no equivocal terms, that ‘the law of justification’ is faith.” I affirm nothing else; and am glad to see that in these words “faith” stands in the sentence for “the law of faith;” for the phrase “the law of justification is faith,” can have no other import than, “the law of justification is the law of faith.” This is evidently Mr. Storrs’ sense of his words; for he quotes Paul to show that justification is by “the law of faith,” and not by “the law of works.”

But what is a law? While Mr. Storrs defines the law of justification to be the law of faith, he has not favoured us with the sense in which he uses the word “law.” We are left to guess this. Man’s self-glorification, is not excluded by the law of works, though it is by the law of faith. This idea he reproduces from Paul as excluding all idea of justification being consequent on baptism; because baptism with him belongs to the category of “works.” He has not been immersed himself; yet he regards himself as “justified by faith.” We may take his practice therefore as a definition of his sense of the phrase “law of faith” and also of “law,” in default of a verbal explanation. Defined by his practice, then “law,” in the New Testament acceptance of the word, is conviction that what is written is true. Hence law, belief, and faith, are words expressive of the same thing. The “law of faith” is convertible upon this hypothesis into the phrases “the faith of faith,” “the belief of faith,” “the law of law,” &c.; which may all be very intelligible and significative to Mr. Storrs, but to myself who am unusually dull, and perhaps stupid just now, they are mere tautologies without meaning. The faith of justification is faith; or the law of justification is law! I cannot understand this. A law which interdicts, produces, or requires no definite or specified bodily action, is a curiosity. An involuntary assent of the mind a law! There must be something wrong in Mr. Storrs’ theology to admit this; for what is nonsensical cannot be according to truth.

“Law” in Hebrew, Greek, and English, is a rule or standard of acting. It was applied to the Mosaic Code, which was the ecclesiastical, civil, and social rule according to which the Twelve Tribes of Israel and the strangers among them were to regulate their actions as tenant-at-will occupants of the Holy Land. The obedience rendered to this law was called “works,” of which immersion into the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit was never one. The law of works was the Mosaic Law, and is that to which the apostle refers in Romans, and which Mr. Storrs does not perceive, or he would not number baptism among works of law. If a man were justified by keeping the burdensome ritual of Moses (which none but Jesus ever did, and even he was cursed by that law because of hanging on a tree,) he would have something to boast of; but in being baptised, which baptism belongs to the law of faith, there is no scope for self-glorification, or boasting; for a man does not baptise himself, but is passive, being baptised of another, which to the subject is no “work” at all—no more than the burial of a corpse is the work of the deceased. “We are buried with Christ by baptism into death” to sin, “that we should walk in newness of life.”

Law, then, implies regulated action, or obedience. Law of faith defines the subjects of the law or rule, that is, believers. This law exacts obedience only from believers; none others however willing can obey it; for it is only believers who can render obedience of faith. An unbeliever may perform the act prescribed by a law of faith, but he has not therefore yielded obedience in the sense of the law; because his performance has not resulted from faith in the things propounded for his belief.

“The law of faith,” is a phrase which denotes some particular rule, conformity to which is styled, “obedience of faith.” “The law of works” exacted obedience from all Israelites whether they had faith in the things covenanted to Abraham or not; “the law of faith” is “THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM,” which by the commandment of the everlasting God was made known to all nations “for the obedience of faith”—2 Thessalonians 1: 8-9. That is, the gospel of the Kingdom was made known to the nations that it might be obeyed; hence says Peter, “what shall be the end of them that obey not the gospel of God?”—who believing the gospel become not the subjects of the obedience of faith? They shall be punished, says Paul, with everlasting destruction issuing forth from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power—Daniel 7: 10; Romans 16: 26.

The law of faith, then, and the gospel of the kingdom, are synonymous; and the obedience of faith and the obedience of the gospel, also signify the same thing. I do not mean to say that “gospel” and “law” signify the same thing; but that the gospel comprehending the law of faith, is by synecdoche put for the law. Gospel is glad tidings; and it is a part of that good news that those who believe the things covenanted to Abraham and David by rendering obedience to a certain law, may become joint-heirs with Jesus of what God has promised to these ancients. If the gospel contained no law, believers could render no obedience; but as there is a law connected with it, obedience is of necessity demanded, and indispensable.

If it be enquired, “What is the gospel-law?”—I reply, read Acts 10: 48, where it is written, “And Peter commanded them to be baptised in the name of the Lord.” His command expressed to the Gentiles—yea, even to Gentiles not behind Mr. Storrs in piety—“what they ought to do”—what it is necessary that thou do, verse 6. There is no avoiding this necessity with impunity. If obedience to this command were not imperative, the Angel would not have said to Cornelius “it is necessary.” It was made necessary by the Divine will, to which friend Storrs has not yet learned submission as a little child. “Repentance unto life,” and remission of sins, are “granted” to believers of the gospel of the kingdom “through the name” of Jesus as the Anointed One; to which name there is no access but through obedience to Peter’s command. I say Peter’s command, which in this matter is identical with that of Jesus Christ’s and the Father’s: for it was not Peter, but the Spirit of the Father in him which spoke—Matthew 10: 20, 40. The Keys of the kingdom of the heavens were committed to him, with the assurance that what he should do in relation to it should be ratified in the heavens—Matthew 16: 19. These testimonies secure for Peter’s command the authority of his Lord, and exhibit it as the law of the gospel to be obeyed.

I repeat that “a man may believe the truth with all his heart,” not “for twenty years” only, but all his life, “and yet not be justified,” if he submit not to Peter’s command. It is hardly supposable that a man would believe with all his heart “the truth,” and not obey it; for where a sincere believer lives in disobedience, it is no “bold assumption” to say that, granting his sincerity, his knowledge of that truth is not enough to save him. An enlightened man whose faith works by love and purifies his heart, needs no exhortation to obey Peter’s command. All he desires is to know what that command is, and to do it heartily, readily, and gladly. What I have said that is deemed by friend Storrs so bold an assumption, is this—that no believer is justified in disobedience. So long as he refuses to do what Peter commanded the benevolent and devout Cornelius and his house to do, so long he is in disobedience, in a state of rebellion, an unpardoned insurgent against Israel's King. Friend Storrs may think this severe. But what have I to do with that? I have to do with truth, testimony and fact, and not with the severity of their pressure on the rebellious. If he would take off the edge of the word with respect to himself, let him do as Cornelius did, and he will be astonished how mild the severity will become; how "bold" indeed, but unassuming is the truth in the hands of babes.

But if Mr. Storrs is determined to justify himself in disobedience, let him point out a single case of such a justification subsequently to the ascension of Jesus. Let him answer this, Was Paul in his sins, or purified from his sins, before he was baptised? I repeat, friend Storrs has not been baptised, yet he says he is a Christian, a justified man, a saint. Judging then from his position with which, I suppose, he is satisfied, he can only answer the question by saying, "my own position indicates my reply"—Paul was not in his sins though unbaptised! This reply then is irrational, which friend Storrs will not admit. According to his position it is most reasonable; to maintain which, is to charge Ananias with speaking nonsense. He said, "Brother Saul arise, and be baptised and wash away thy sins, calling upon the name of the Lord." Had Mr. Storrs been in Saul's place, he would have exclaimed (supposing he had no more light than at this present) "Bro. Ananias, what bold assumption! Do I not believe with all my heart, and have I not been praying to Jesus for three days past? How sayest thou then, 'be baptised and wash away thy sins'; am I not already 'justified by faith' and at peace with God? Ananias, my friend, what is thine ambition? Desirest thou to establish a bitter and persecuting sect, that thou comest to me, a believer in Jesus, with an exhortation to wash away my sins in baptism? I am a hearty and firm believer of three days old, and to affirm or insinuate that a man may believe the truth with all his heart one year, or one hour, and yet not be justified, or have sins to wash away, is an unscriptural and daring assumption. I have determined to have no strife with thee, Ananias, but have just borne my testimony against your sentiment, and so discharged what I believe to be my duty."

Poor brother Ananias, how blank he would have looked had "the chief of sinners" replied to his exhortation in the words of our friend Storrs' article and position! But Saul had become like a little child, and meekly arose, and obeyed the truth. He was well skilled in all the questions and customs of the Jews, and when convinced that Jesus was the Christ and that he was alive forever more, he acknowledged him as the Son of David and of God covenanted to Israel for their redemption out of the hand of all their enemies. His dogmatism was exploded and his exceeding madness totally subdued, so that at last he was dispossessed and clothed in his right mind. It takes "the unadulterated milk of the word" to develop these results. When friend Storrs shall come to feed upon this congenial, unirritating, and growth-promoting diet, he will no doubt become more like Paul. The Gentiles have very proud hearts, and are puffed up by theologies whose dogmas are nowhere found in scripture. Methodism is a form of Gentilism but little promotive of a Saul-like or godlike disposition. When friend Storrs purges himself from this by a childlike study of the word, how sorry he will be for having written such vain words as are now before the reader. He will then see our "bold and daring assumption" in another and more favourable light; at present we must bear with his Gentile manner of discharging his duty and bearing his testimony. I wish him deliverance from bondage, and trust that ere long he may be found in his right mind like Paul, and zealously preaching the faith which now he would willingly and effectually destroy.

The Editor of the Harbinger has truly said that Mr. Storrs has misrepresented my saying in the short extract of his brief report of my discourse at Rochester. I neither said, nor intended to say that "baptism is the law of justification." I never uttered such nonsense. Baptism is not a law, but an action commanded to be submitted to by believers of the gospel of the kingdom, and by none else. It is the act by which the obedience of faith is rendered. Baptism is essential to justification by the law of faith; for without baptism a believer cannot obey the gospel, because the immersion of a true believer is the obedience of the gospel. Till that action is intelligently submitted to a believer is to that same instant in his sins, or unjustified, which is the same thing. Justification by faith is through the name of Jesus; and immersion into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, is the act of union to that name. It is the only formality, rite, or ceremony, by which a believer of the gospel of the kingdom can be married to the name of the Lord Jesus. If such a believer refuse to be thus united to his name, in so doing he refuses repentance, remission of sins, and eternal life through that name, for these blessings come to the justified by faith only through his name. A believer is no more united to Christ's name without true baptism than a woman is united to the name of a man without the legal marriage ceremony. This simple rite gives her a share in all that pertains to her husband's name, be they riches, or honour, or both; so after a like manner does baptism into the name of the Lord give the true believer all spiritual blessings communicable through his name, and a title to share with him in his glory.

If it be asked, then, "At what instant is a believer of the gospel of the kingdom justified by faith in the kingdom and name?"—the answer is in the words of Peter, "Having purified your souls in the obeying of the truth through the Spirit," which is synonymous with in the being baptised, in the being united to the name, &c. When a believer goes into the water, he becomes passive in the hands of the administrator, who pronounces the formula divinely prescribed, and having ended them, he buries him in the watery grave, from which he raises him to walk in newness of life. In being buried in the water, his renewedness of heart is granted to him for repentance, and his belief of the promise made to the fathers, and in Jesus as Lord and Christ, is counted to him for righteousness or remission of sins; for he is then introduced into the name of Christ, through which name repentance and remission of sins are conveyed to him. An unimmersed believer is not united to the name; he is therefore not in it, but exterior to it; and can no more have the things contained in the name, than a man can have access to things in a house when he is in the street without its door.

Baptism, then, is essential to justification. This is both scriptural and rational, friend Storrs to the contrary notwithstanding. "Baptism saves us," says Peter, "by the resurrection of Jesus Christ," as Noah and his family were saved by water by the resurrection of the earth. This testimony sufficiently establishes the scripturality of baptism being essential to salvation from all past sins, which being remitted in Jesus' name, the believer is transferred from under a sentence of death to a sentence of life; for "the wages of sin is death," but sin being forgiven and obeyed no more, the penalty is abolished, and the sins and iniquities remembered no more.

The essentiality of baptism, or the obedience of faith to justification of life, is also rational as well as scriptural. What more reasonable than that as condemnation to death was incurred by the disobedience of unbelief, so deliverance from that condemnation or justification of life, should be consequent upon the opposite, which is the obedience of faith? The simplicity of the action is no argument against its essentiality. No action can be more simple than the stretching forth of the hand, and plucking fruit from a tree. It is more simple or easily performed than baptism. It was a little thing in itself to pluck; but that plucking was expressive of unbelief of God's word; and behold in the world's history, the awful consequences that have ensued. It is indeed no great thing in itself to be dipped; but then that dipping is expressive of faith in what God has promised. The wonderful results of this simple act of faith will be fully manifested in the Age to Come. All God's institutions are simple, but potent and effectual; and essential to the end proposed. Friend Storrs would probably march up to the cannon's mouth for justification, if ordered of God. This would be a great thing to boast of. But God has laid no such burden upon him, but on the supposition that he believes the truth, he says to him, "Wash, and be clean." If the washing of Peter's feet, who had been baptised of John, was essential to his having part with Jesus, how much more scriptural, rational, and necessary, that the unwashed, and therefore unclean, Mr. Storrs, should be bathed from head to heel, that he may have part and lot with the Lord. Let friend Storrs ponder on this. If Jesus would make no exception in Peter's case, Mr. Storrs has no right to presume.

I have heard that Mr. Storrs has expressed his willingness to be immersed to please his friends, but that he considers it unnecessary. This is certainly a very accommodating disposition! But Mr. Storrs should remember that "what is not of faith is sin." He has no right to trifle with God's institutions to maintain his popularity with those who believe in the essentiality of baptism. He ought on no account to presume to be immersed in the name of the Holy Ones, unless he heartily believes in the gospel of the kingdom of God. Believers are "justified by faith" in being baptised, and not by immersion without faith; for "he that believes not (the gospel of the kingdom) shall be condemned."

Baptism once scripturally received, ought on no account to be repeated. Let Mr. Storrs see well to his faith of what sort it is. The article before us proves that at present he is not fit for immersion either in faith or disposition. I hope it will not be long before he is; for certainly the Lord is at hand to come quickly; and if he find him in his nakedness, Mr. S. well knows what the consequence will be. This is the law of justification which he cannot evade —“Repent and believe the gospel,” “be baptised in the name of Jesus Christ into remission of sins,” and thenceforth continue patiently in well doing to the end, and a crown of life shall be yours. I am glad to see that Mr. Storrs is ill at ease in the disobedience of unbelief. In what I said I had no special reference to him. But it seems the cap fits, he feels his position impugned; hence his recent sally to bear his testimony against what I honestly and heartily believe to be unvanquishable truth. Well, I am contented calmly to await the Lord’s decision when he comes. If Mr. Storrs be accepted in his sins, I have no right to complain though I find no such doctrine in the scriptures of truth. If Mr. S. be Christ’s, he has a right to do what he likes with his own; so there I leave it for the present.

HOW THE CHILDREN OF GOD ARE KNOWN.

Friend Storrs believes in justification by faith, and that he himself is justified, and therefore a child of God. If justified, we would respectfully inquire, at what instant his justification occurred; and how he ascertained the fact? Besides this, we would like to be informed by what faith he was justified? Was it by the Methodistic faith? Or by the Millerite faith when he denied the restoration of Israel, and preached all or most of the vagaries of that sincere, but mistaken theorist? Or by the faith he embraced when he renounced Millerism? Here are three different faiths—the Methodistic, the Millerite, and his present, all condemnatory of each other! If he were justified by the Methodistic he should have remained a Methodist; if by the Millerite, a Millerite he should have continued; for that system that can impart justification, or make a man a child of God, must be God’s own. We should like to be informed upon divine testimony concerning these questions relating to Mr. Storrs’ justification, that we may be justified upon the true principle. God has but “one faith” for justification, but Mr. Storrs has had at least three incompatible, antagonistic, and mutually destructive faiths. Which of these is the “one faith?” In the absence of light we lightly esteem them all. Perhaps we may err in this, though at present we are sure we do not. Will Mr. Storrs enlighten our darkness, or what he considers our darkness? In the meanwhile we will show him a more excellent way of proving divine sonship than that of rummaging over the old gentile crotchets of the past to discover some happy frame or feeling of the brain upon which he may vaticinate a hope of acceptance in the day of the Lord Jesus.

As Mr. Storrs professes to recognise Paul’s authority, we will hear what he has to say on the subject. To the Galatians the apostle observes, “Ye are all sons of God IN Christ Jesus, through THE faith.” Thus far Mr. Storrs might say “amen!” Now suppose Mr. Storrs had stood at Paul’s elbow when he wrote these words, he might have inquired, saying, “But Paul, how do they know that they are God’s sons through the faith; and at what instant did they become sons? The apostle having overcome the surprise created by such a question proceeding from one who professes to be a son of God, and a guide of the blind, would reply, “Why, Mr. Storrs, they are the sons of God by the faith, because as many of them as have been baptised (or immersed) into Christ, have put on Christ; and though before Jews and Gentiles, bond and free, male and female, yet now having been baptised into Christ, they are all one IN Christ Jesus;” and therefore “sons of God in him.” Have you been baptised into Christ, Mr. Storrs?” Paul had been so baptised by Ananias, but Mr. Storrs by no one. Paul and his brethren of Galatia knew they were sons by faith because they had been baptised into Christ. And this is the only way it can be known; because since the faith came, all God’s sons have emerged from or been born of water into Christ. Unborn believers are in embryo, and may prove abortions not having vitality enough to come to the birth. We hope this will not prove to be Mr. Storrs’ case; but that he may become Christ’s as Paul did, and in the only way possible. If thus he do, “then is he Abraham’s seed,” being in THE Seed constitutionally and scripturally; and if a seed of Abraham, then “an heir according to the promise,” covenanted with God; and not else. We hope sincerely that Mr. Storrs will soon be able to give like evidence with Paul of his being a son of God by faith; for we should rejoice in being able conscientiously to recognise him as a christian and fellow labourer for the kingdom of God. He will then be able to advocate the Immortality in Christ on Bible and gospel principles; which at present we regret to be under the necessity of testifying that he is not. —EDITOR.

LANGUAGE EITHER LITERAL OR FIGURATIVE.

“Language neither ever has, nor can have, any other meaning than that which is either literal or figurative. —LORD.

We have already defined the literal meaning of language to be that which mankind by general consent have agreed shall be the true and only meaning of certain words and sentences, as representatives of sounds and ideas; and the figurative meaning of language to be that meaning which it acquires by being borrowed from objects, &c., to which men have agreed it shall belong, and used to describe objects, &c., to which it does not conventionally belong. Words are used to represent the thoughts of the mind. These words, alone or connected together in a certain order, so as to express a single idea or ideas, in their relation to one another, compose language. These words, alone or connected, cannot have any but that meaning which mankind have agreed to attach to them, or that meaning which they have when borrowed from one object, &c., to describe another object, &c.

But, closely analysing the words as used in the latter case, we shall find that even then they do not undergo any change in their meaning. They retain that meaning which men have agreed shall be their only and true meaning under all circumstances. When it is said, in consequence of Jehovah’s blessing upon the earth, “The little hills rejoice on every side,” we know that the little hills did not rejoice. They did nothing at all. Still the word “rejoice” does not lose its meaning. The only change that really takes place is an imaginary one in the object itself. The hills are, by an act of the imagination, converted into an intelligent being, and then described in language appropriate to that being. When our Saviour says, “Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden,” he does not mean those who toil for a mere earthly livelihood, but sinful beings, distressed on account of their deplorable condition and danger. Still, the words “weary” and “heavy laden” do not lose their own meaning. By an act of the imagination the sinner is viewed as a labourer, and then language used to describe him which is truly appropriate to describe a labourer. Thus, should all the language that is called figurative be examined, the figure will be found to consist, not in a change in the meaning of the words, but in the view taken of the object described. So that language has but one meaning, and that a literal one, or that which mankind have agreed shall belong to it. This axiom is universally applied to all mere literary productions, in all languages, in all ages of the world. Just so far as mankind depart from it, they unsettle the laws of language, and render doubtful the meaning of any word or sentence.

When, however, men come to the investigation of the meaning of the Word of God, they no longer regard universal usage. By some strange hallucination they proceed as though Bible language were something different from human; and having no key to its meaning, they launch out upon the sea of obscurity in the bark of the imagination, with no better helmsman than a fickle caprice.

They are not satisfied with the meaning which the language gives them when interpreted according to universal usage. They contend that language may have in the Word of God a meaning different from either that called “literal” or “figurative.” E.g.: “And say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen whither they be gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land; and I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel, and one king shall be a king to them all.” This passage has no figure in it, and therefore is not figurative. The language is truly appropriate to the objects and events. The objects are not conceived by the imagination to be something that they are not, nor is language borrowed from any other object to describe them. It is a straightforward account of the restoration of the two nations, Judah and the ten tribes of Israel, to the land of Canaan, and their reunion under one king. But this meaning must be discarded as not being a true expression of Jehovah’s will. He has nothing to do with man’s temporal affairs; He only looks on the heart in its corruption, and speaks only of its purification and holiness; and whatever language He may use, it must be made to describe this spiritual state of things. God, by His Spirit and His holy ministry, will call Judah and Israel to repentance among the heathen wherever they are found. He will bring them into the Christian Church, unite them in the bonds of fellowship, and Christ shall rule in their hearts. This meaning of the passage is called spiritual. But we shall perceive by a little examination that the process of spiritualising is no less than making the language figurative. The event of the conversion and union with the Church of the house of Israel, is viewed by the imagination as a return from among the heathen, their national union and reinstatement in their own land, and language is used appropriately descriptive of it. Thus the axiom holds true even in this use of language, that the meaning must be either literal or figurative.

The cause of complaint for the use of language in this manner lies not in the violation of the axiom, but of the rules of figurative language.

The rules of figurative language are: 1st. That there is a similarity between the two objects, events, &c., in question.

“But there is no similarity between the two events, —the migration of a people from one point of the compass to another, and the regeneration of the soul by the Holy Spirit.”

2nd. That the language belonging to an object or event well known, be used to describe an object or event not so well known.

But in this case, the event of the restoration of the two nations to their own land, their reunion, and their subjection to one king being denied, it is merely imaginary, and totally unknown to the reader; hence the language belonging to an event which never had realisation, and consequently unknown is borrowed, for the sake of illustration and perspicacity, to describe another event equally unknown. This is contrary to all principles of language. It plunges the reader into utmost obscurity. It darkens the words of Jehovah. It is a false and absurd use of language. The passage in question is literal, and only literal. There is no rational method to make it mean anything different from what it plainly conveys. Should the spiritualiser insist upon the lawfulness of his method of interpretation, and deny that he violates the principles of language, then the literal meaning of this passage must be true in order to the truth of the spiritual view.

The prophet is desirous of illustrating and making perfectly intelligible an obscure event, —the conversion of the Israelites of both nations to Christianity. He looks around for an event which bears some similarity to it, and which is well known to those addressed. His mind rests upon the event of the gathering of Judah and Israel from among the heathen whither they be gone, the bringing them into their own land, making them one nation, and placing one king over them; and he takes the language which is used to describe this event, to describe the other event. Hence the latter event must be a reality and well known, in order to make the other possible and palpable. Now where has this spiritualising process brought us? The spiritualist insists upon the conversion of the Jews as here taught. He must also admit their restoration to their own land. For, however many of the Jews may have returned to Canaan from Babylon, it is certain none of the ten tribes of Israel have been brought back, that the two nations have never been united nor ruled by one king, as one nation; hence the spiritualist is driven into a faith which he will be very loath to espouse, viz: that the conversion of the two nations to Christianity will not take place until they are restored to their own land, for this event must precede the other, in order to become its illustration and explanation.

(The restoration of the Ten Tribes of Israel is consequent upon their acknowledgment of Jesus as their king. God brings them to this confession, and grafts them into their own olive again as the result. —Editor Herald.)

Now it is a fact, that all those passages which literally predict the restoration of the Jews and ten tribes to their own land, are turned in this manner to a spiritual account by hundreds of readers and commentators of the Scriptures. This is done with a view to escape the fact of a literal restoration; but behold how the spiritualist fortifies the fact! Nothing could be more triumphant.

We have now to see how a figurative passage becomes spiritualised.

“The whole head is sick, and the whole heart is faint: from the sole of the foot even to the head there is no soundness therein. It is wound, and bruise, and putrefying sore. It has not been pressed, neither has it been softened with ointment.”

This passage is composed entirely of figurative language.

The prophet would describe the condition of the Jewish people, after their afflictions and desolations in war with the surrounding nations, which the providence of God had brought against them for their sins, and who, notwithstanding their national wretchedness, would not turn from their idolatry to the service of Jehovah. There is suggested to his mind the condition of an individual that has been scourged and beaten for his civil crimes, and in a lacerated state thrown into a dungeon, where no physician has access to him, and where are no means to palliate his wounds nor alleviate his distress. The former event is described in the language of the latter.

By this use of language, the condition of the Jewish people is presented in a clear and vivid light.

The whole passage is spiritualised by building a figure upon a figure. Instead of tracing a similarity between the thing to be illustrated and something which is better known, a similarity is traced between an illustration and a phenomenon which is not at all mentioned by the writer. This phenomenon is the depravity and wickedness of the Jewish people, not their physical misery in consequence of that moral state.

A similarity is discovered between the condition of an individual severely punished for his crimes, and an individual totally corrupt in his moral character, and the language of the former is borrowed to describe the latter. It is, therefore, figurative in this application of it. It is a wrong use of language, however, when judged by the principles of figurative language.

The object of all figurative language being to explain and ornament something already known, here the assumption is, that the figure is given for us to ascertain what the thing in question is, and what is said of it, and the thing discovered is wholly an imaginary creation. Had anything else been imagined, it would have answered equally as well.

It is a wrong use of language when judged by the context. Jehovah is said to have brought this condition upon the Jewish people on account of their perverseness. “Why should you be stricken any more? ye will revolt more and more.” Now if the condition intended to be described by the figure be a moral one, the case would stand thus: “Why should ye be depraved any more? ye will become more and more depraved.” And the inference is that, on account of their total depravity, they were cursed with total depravity, which is nonsense.

Such is the result of spiritualising figurative language. Hence language neither has nor can have any other meaning than that which is either literal or figurative.

But there is such a thing as a spiritual meaning of language after all. It is that meaning simply which literal or figurative language gives us when determined by its own laws. The whole Bible is a spiritual book. It treats throughout of our relations to God and our fellow-men, and the obligations consequent upon them. They point to a holy and happy state of existence hereafter, as a reward of fulfilling, and to a miserable state of existence, as a punishment for violating, our obligations in those relations.

The whole end of the Divine revelation is summed up in a most comprehensive manner by the apostle Paul. Repeating our Saviour's words, he says, referring to sinful beings: "To open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and inheritance among them that are sanctified by faith that is in me." This end is a spiritual one. Everything that Jehovah purposes or performs is spiritual. It is for his own glory and the happiness of his creatures.

Whether he purpose the gathering of Judah and Israel from among the heathen, their reinstatement in their own land, the reign of Christ over them, or their regeneration and sanctification; whether he purpose the manifestation of God in the flesh, and his humiliation to an ignominious death for human redemption, or his coming the second time, not as a sin-offering, but as a triumphant Saviour to put an end to the mad career of Satan, and be admired by all who love his appearing, —it is all for the glory of God, and the good of his creatures. It is a spiritual end. But this spiritual meaning is always obtained by simply interpreting literal and figurative language by its own laws. Hence there is no conceivable necessity for spiritualising language in order to a spiritual meaning. This axiom is sound and infallible. —American Protestant Jewish Chronicle.

JUDICIAL BLINDNESS OF THE POWERS.

In the last week of April 1853, Lord Clarendon, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, stated in reply to a question from Lord Clanricarde, that the British and other governments felt themselves bound not only by the interests of sound policy, but by the principles of international law, to uphold the Turkish empire, which had therefore nothing to fear from external aggression. He concluded his speech by saying also that he could assure their lordships that as regarded Turkey, there was no danger of the peace of Europe being disturbed, nor any prospect of the unanimity which prevailed between England and the other great powers of Europe, as to the necessity of maintaining the integrity and independence of the Ottoman empire, being disturbed.

Subsequent events within three months have fully proved how little confidence is to be placed in governmental "assurances." So far from Turkey having nothing to fear from external aggression, two of her provinces are in the actual possession of the Emperor of Russia, who has seized upon them with a perfect "overflow" of troops, horse, foot and artillery! Of all the other great powers, France is the only one that stands up with Britain and proves itself decidedly anti-Russian. Prussia and Austria dare not defy the Autocrat; and Germany, however reluctant, is chained to the chariot wheels. There is vast danger of the peace of Europe being disturbed; in fact, war is inevitable, or Turkey will fall under the power of Russia without a blow. War may delay its overthrow, but cannot prevent it; for fall it must by either peace or war. Its salvation is impossible.

Another evidence of the judicial blindness of the British government is found in the words of its foreign secretary, who says, "The Emperor of Russia had practised no disguise whatever as to his intentions. Her Majesty's government felt precisely the same confidence which his noble friend professed to entertain in the honour and integrity of the Emperor of Russia, and when that Sovereign gave his word as to what he was going to do, he believed that the people of this country, as well as their government, would place full reliance on it."

MOSES AND THE PROPHET LIKE UNTO HIM.

Moses was the great-great grandson of Jacob in the line of Levi, Kohath and Amram. He was born in Egypt in the year of the world 2383, which, according to our computation published in Elpis Israel, was 727 years after the Flood, and 350 years after the confirmation of the promise of Canaan to Abraham and his Seed for an everlasting possession. He was named Moses by Pharaoh's daughter, importing that he was saved out of the water. We do not propose here to compile a history of this, the greatest man of his time, and of the sixteen centuries and a half which succeeded the passage of the Red Sea. It cannot be better related than it is in the admirable writings current in his name. Our object is to call attention to him as a representative man— a man representing or typifying another man, even "the Man Christ Jesus"

The history of Moses is representative from his flight into the country of Midian, Arabia Petrea south of Mount Sinai, to his decease when the Lord hid him from his nation. There was a likeness, indeed, between Moses and Jesus in their infancy; for while the life of Moses was jeopardized by the decree of Pharaoh, Jesus was also endangered by the mandate of Herod against Rachel's children of two years old and under. But Jehovah preserved them; and thus were they cast upon Him from their birth, and kept in safety, or "made to hope" upon their mothers' breasts—Matthew 2: 13-18; Psalm 22: 9-10. There was a resemblance also in the high qualifications and faithful self denial of these two personages in their manhood. "Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in words, and deeds." This was previous to his attaining the age of forty years. To this time, though the adopted grandson of Pharaoh, and heir apparent of the Egyptian throne, and surrounded by the licentious notables of its court, where the God of Abraham was unknown, Moses was a man of faith—a learned, mighty and faithful man, who might have worn the crown of the greatest monarchy of the age, with all its treasures; but he renounced them all, and became a fugitive, and companion of oppressed bondmen, that he might share in the kingdom to be established under Abraham's Seed in the adjoining country of the Canaanites—Hebrews 11: 24-26.

Jesus, too, was the most learned and the wisest man of that or any other age before or since. He was wise and learned by divine intuition—John 7: 15-17; and in the language of Cleopas, "was a prophet mighty in deed and word before God and all the people"—Luke 24: 19. His political self-denial was as conspicuous as that of Moses. Thrice he refused dominion and a crown at the hand of any power inferior to God—Luke 4: 5-8; John 6: 15. "All these tetrarchal kingdoms of the land", said their possessor, "will I give to thee, if thou wilt do homage for them to me"; but on such terms he rejected them. He knew that all upon Israel's land was His, and the world in its widest sense beside. A then present possession would have saved him much suffering, and have exalted him at once to honour and glory. But he knew that to receive even his own at the hand of the enemy would be to forswear the supremacy of Jehovah, and to become Satan's king instead of God's. "Thou shalt do homage to the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve." These were the words of Moses to which he had respect as the words of Jehovah. He knew that to receive the kingdom, glory and dominion of the world from any other power than God would be to descend from the high position of the predestined representative of the Divine Majesty upon the earth for ever, to the degradation of a mere equality with Caesar and the world-rulers of the age. Yea, like Moses, "he had respect unto the recompense of the reward"; and "for the joy that was set before him" he refused to let the people make him king, "choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season." The "kingdom is not from hence"—John 18: 36. It can only be received with eternal honour and glory from thence; that is, from God, not from Satan nor the people. Moses and Jesus understood this well; therefore Moses forsook Egypt, and Jesus forsook Palestine, that they might receive the royalty from God at the appointed time.

Thus far the resemblance between Moses and Jesus is complete. Cradled in peril, saved of God, and hopeful of the same promise, they were men of renown in word and deed, whose faith was "made perfect" by their works after the example of their father Abraham—James 2: 22, leaving behind them illustrious exemplifications of the truth that the enjoyment of the pleasures of sin for a season is incompatible and fatal to an inheritance of the kingdom of God.

But here the present similitude between them is suspended. Moses and Jesus were indeed the rejected of the nation, as is already implied in the allusion to their departure from their people, the one into Midian, where he met with God in the bush; and the other to a far country, where he is still in the presence of Him whose glory illumined the rocky Arabia: but as yet, unlike the case of Moses, Jehovah has not sent Jesus from "holy ground", shining with unapproachable light, to be a ruler and a deliverer, to bring the tribes of Israel out of the land of the enemy, even those tribes which said unto him, "Who made thee a ruler and a judge? Away with such a fellow; we will not have him to reign over us!" But Moses, whom they refused, they afterwards received as their commander, legislator, and king. They placed themselves under him as Jehovah's representative, through whom the nation should obtain political independence and organization, and by whom it should be put into possession of a country, even of that country from which their fathers came before they migrated into Egypt, and which was promised to Abraham and his Seed for an everlasting possession.

This was an acceptance of Moses which finds no counterpart in the annals of Israel and the history of Jesus. They have refused him as they refused Moses, but a like acceptance of him is yet to come.

From the accession of Moses to the leadership of the Twelve Tribes of Israel, his history is that of the nation also. He is no longer to be contemplated as an individual isolated from his people; but as a prophet—Deuteronomy 34: 10, a mediator—Exodus 24: 2; Deuteronomy 5: 5; Galatians 3: 19, a lawgiver, a man of war—Exodus 14: 25-27; Numbers 21: 34, and a king—Deuteronomy 33: 5. These were his relations to Israel from his second appearing in their midst to the end of his career. He was a mediator- prophet, a lawgiving- prophet, a warrior- prophet, and a royal- prophet. He was not simply a man through whom God spoke to the tribes of Israel as he spoke to them through Ezekiel—a man whose functions were restricted to the utterance of the divine purpose; but a man who was not only to speak but to execute the will of Jehovah, whose servant he was.

Now the reader will see by consulting the references that Moses was precisely the kind of prophet we have indicated. During his administration of the national affairs, Jehovah spoke by him alone. At the commencement of his career, before he was accepted by the nation, he was sent to the people as a prophet-preacher, announcing that the time had arrived to redeem Israel from the power of them that hated them, and to establish the kingdom of God in the promised land—that glorious kingdom of which they were to be the priestly and holy nation—Exodus 19: 5-6. This proclamation of "the Everlasting Gospel" they believed for a while; and in consequence placed themselves at the disposal of Moses, that they might obtain its promises at his hand. "The gospel", says Paul, "was preached unto them"—Hebrews 4: 2; that is, by Moses: but it did not profit that generation, because their faith failed them. They had faith enough to escape from Egypt, but they had not faith enough to enable them to enter the promised country, and to possess it Mosaically; much less faith had they to obtain a right to it everlastingly, under the covenant which provides for the priesthood and royalty of Christ.

But, as is well known, the character of Gospel-preacher was merged into that of the prophet-judge of Egypt, and the warrior-prophet of Israel; for Moses, having preached salvation to the tribes, executed judgment upon their oppressors, and by the hand of Jehovah his strength gave the nation baptism into himself in the cloud and in the sea, as its sovereign under God.

Henceforth, Moses was every thing to the Twelve Tribes. Having once heard Jehovah's voice thundering forth the Decalogue from Sinai's cloud-capped, burning, and trembling mountain, He granted the petition of their terror-stricken hearts that henceforth He would speak to them only through His servant Moses, lest they should die. Jehovah spoke to Moses in their hearing thus that they might believe him for ever—Exodus 19: 9; for if they should believe Moses, they would not fail to believe in him of whom he was afterwards to write. As Moses was to Aaron, so he was to all Israel, "in the place of God". He gave them the bread of heaven to eat, and water out of the flinty rock to drink, and clad them with raiment that waxed not old upon them. What a prophet-king was this! Truly the father of his people, who sustained them in life and food and raiment, and taught them wisdom from above. What nation ever had such a king as Moses? and what were David and Solomon to Israel after him? As the servant of Jehovah, he gave the nation an existence, ushering it into being, amid storm and fury, and the ruin of a mighty host, from the depths of the sea; he sustained it from the stores of heaven for forty years; beat down their enemies, and trampled them as the mire of the streets; gave them a holy, just and good, but inexorable law; and brought them to the verge of Canaan's land, a well trained and disciplined nation, fit and prepared to take possession of it under the conduct of a successor worthy of himself. He was Jehovah's servant, "faithful in all his house, for a testimony," or representation, "of those things which were to be spoken after." He was the greatest character the world has known, with one exception. The world's great ones are not to be named in the same breath. Moses! What meekness, disinterestedness, faithfulness, self-denial, wisdom, knowledge, power, honour, glory, and exaltation, doth that name represent! A man that was dead and is alive again—Matthew 17: 3, and lives forevermore; yet though living still in hope, "not having received the promise," but waiting for it, that all who believe may be glorified together in the kingdom of God restored again to Israel.

Dost thou not, O thoughtful reader of the living oracles, recognize in the foregoing sketch the Moses of the Pentateuch? Yea, verily, it is a true portrait of the original in outline, left unfinished in detail, that thou mayest fill in the lights and shadows of the picture at thy convenience. Study Moses, and see if he was not the kind of prophet herein described. Do you think you would have a true conception of his prophetic character, if you knew no more of Moses than as a preacher of the gospel to Israel before he visited the court of Pharaoh? No, indeed. You must know the whole written history of the man to be able to say, "I know the prophet Moses;" for Moses was a prophet to the end of his career. You cannot separate his prophetic office from his mediatorship, or his legislative, or regal functions. His code is a great symbolic as well as verbal representation of the truth—a speaking prophecy to the eyes and ears of his nation, and to all others who comprehend it. You must contemplate him in the entirety of his mission; you must view him as a whole, and then, and not till then, will you be able to say if Ezekiel or any other prophet be "a prophet like unto him".

Moses, the prophet thus fully manifested in Israel, was a representative man. This is evident from the following passage in his writings. Addressing the Twelve Tribes he says, "Jehovah thy God shall raise up unto thee a Prophet from the midst of thee of thy brethren, LIKE UNTO ME; and unto him ye shall hearken; according to all that thou desirest of Jehovah thy God in Horeb in the day of the assembly, saying, Let me not hear again the voice of Jehovah my God, neither let me see this great fire any more, that I die not. And Jehovah said unto me, they have well spoken what they have spoken. I will raise them up a Prophet of their brethren, like unto thee, and will put my words into his mouth; and he shall speak unto them all that I shall command him. And it shall come to pass that whosoever will not hearken unto my words which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him"—Deuteronomy 18: 15-19. This passage attests the truth of what we have said. It plainly and explicitly declares that the prophet Moses was typical of a future prophet who was to appear in Israel. In other words, that this future prophet was to be like Moses. Now, beloved reader, suppose you and I had been living at the time Jehovah spoke these words by His servant Moses, with whose extraordinary history, which was national, we were quite familiar, what should we have expected would be the mission of the prophet to come? I say, "the mission;" for it is the mission that supplies the characteristics of the prophet by which his resemblance to Moses can be determined. Should we not expect the Moses-like prophet to preach the everlasting gospel to the Tribes of Israel; to overthrow their oppressors; to baptise the nation into himself as their deliverer by its passage through the sea; to stand between them and Jehovah to speak to them all that He should command him; to give them a law; to build a temple in their midst; to organize the nation; and to fit and prepare it for entrance into the land of Israel under the covenant of an everlasting possession, which is the nation's hope? Should we not expect a prophet whose mission should be to accomplish something like this? Should we not expect him to perform these things in the midst of the Twelve Tribes after the manner of Moses? Certainly we should.

This Moses-like prophet was expected for sixteen centuries and a half. During all that long period, though many prophets appeared in Israel, not one of them was accepted as the one like unto Moses. None of them claimed to be like him, not even Elijah. Yet why should he not, if a great miracle-working prophet were the sum of the similitude to Moses? At length Jesus came, "a prophet mighty in deed and word before God and all the people;" and some of them said, "We have found him of whom Moses in the Law, and the Prophets, did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph;" while others said, "This is of a truth that prophet that should come into the world;" and as the result of their conviction meditated the taking of him by force and making him a king—John 6: 14-15. This shows what sort of a Moses-like prophet the people expected, to wit, a prophet-king; hence Nathaniel, when he saw the man announced by Philip as the prophet foretold by Moses, recognized him as Son of God, and Israel's king.

Zacharias, the father of John, thus defines the mission of the prophet-king; "Jehovah hath raised up an horn of salvation for us in the house of his servant David, as he spake by the mouth of his holy prophets, which have been from the beginning of the age; that we should be saved from our enemies, and from the hand of all that hate us; to perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember his holy covenant—the oath which he sware to our father Abraham, that he would grant unto us, that being delivered out of the hand of our enemies we might serve him without fear, in holiness and righteousness before him, all the days of our life". These are the ideas imparted to Zacharias by the Holy Spirit with which he was filled. They define the work to be accomplished by the Moses-like prophet, who is styled "a Horn of Salvation for Israel." This is just the sort of prophet Moses was. He was a Horn or power through whom Jehovah saved the tribes from Egypt. Moses was raised up in the house of Levi, but the Horn or power like unto Moses was raised up in the house of David. His mission was as stated. It was Mosaic: first, to deliver Israel from their oppressors; and secondly, to perform the good thing promised to their fathers in the holy covenant, and confirmed by an oath to Abraham. The work, which Moses performed, was but the earnest of that to be executed by the Moses-like prophet. Moses delivered Israel, but the deliverance was not the everlasting salvation of the nation. They fell under the power of their adversaries again, and their condition has become worse than Egyptian. In the days of Jesus, ten-twelfths of the nation were outcasts among the nations beyond Parthia; and the other two, though still occupants of the land, were oppressed by the Roman Power. The Holy Spirit in Zacharias taught them to expect that the child about to be born would complete the work that Moses had begun in saving the Twelve Tribes with an everlasting deliverance, so that they "might serve Jehovah without fear in holiness and righteousness before him all the days of their life".

The mercy promised to Israel's fathers is the execution of judgment and righteousness in the land of Israel by the Branch of righteousness which was to grow up to David—Jeremiah 33: 14-15. In perfecting this work, the Holy Covenant confirmed by an oath to Abraham would find its manifestation in the kingdom of God restored again to Israel. The tabernacle of David which is fallen down, and whose ruins are trampled under foot, will then have been built as in the days of old—Acts 15: 10; Amos 9: 11. This work accomplished, and the Restorer will stand in the midst of Israel as the Moses-like prophet in full manifestation. His resemblance to Moses must be based on the historical representation of that distinguished man as the prophet-sovereign of the Twelve Tribes. No account is taken of Moses in the history during his forty years' absence from Israel further than that he was a keeper of sheep in an obscure country. Figuratively speaking, this is the employment of his antitype. He is superintending the affairs of his "little flock" in this nether wilderness—making reconciliation for his household—until the time shall arrive to leave "holy ground," where the glory of the God of Israel shines upon him. But in this there is no similitude between him and Moses as a prophet in Israel. The Moses-like prophet must be present in Israel's midst, surrounded by the Twelve Tribes, and discharging the duties which it is the function of a High Priest, or mediator, lawgiver, king, and commander to perform. Of the mission of Moses' antitype we shall speak more at large elsewhere; suffice it to say here, that Zacharias testifies that it is to save Israel from their enemies and all that hate them; and to convert what Jehovah promised to Abraham into an accomplished fact. The Holy Spirit testifies, I say, that the babe of Bethlehem was the Horn provided in David's house to perform this work, which is as political, national and warlike a mission as that of Moses. When this goodly child attained to manhood, did he save Israel from all, or even any of those that hated them? Did he not on the contrary strengthen those very enemies, and send them against them to slay them, to burn up their city, and scatter them abroad? O, but we hear some word-corrupting mystic of world-wide celebrity "piously" observing, that their real enemies that hated them were their sins and the devil, not sinners; and that when the Jews "confessed the Lord," and "obtained a hope," or "got religion," or were "baptised for the redemption of sins", they were "the saved"; and consequently "saved from their enemies and all that hated them" in the spiritual sense of the words! We pray for patience when we hear such stupid nonsense. The spiritual sense of the words is the obvious sense, which is in strict accordance with the grammatical or literal. "The Lord added to the church daily," not the saved, but "tous sozomenous," the present participle passive, "the being saved"—Acts 2: 47—persons, the subjects of a salvation which begins with the remission of their past sins, and is perfected when, having been raised from the dead, they inherit for ever "the kingdom restored again to Israel" at their national reconciliation with Jehovah, and deliverance from their enemies, and the power of all that hate them. Hence Paul says, "we are saved by the hope"—Roman 8: 24, if we be not moved away from it—Colossians 1: 22-23, but keep in memory what he preached—1 Corinthians 15: 1-2.

But granting that salvation is complete at baptism, in some sense, the baptised of Israel were certainly not saved from all that hated them, which is the salvation under Jesus the words of Zacharias call for. The opposite is true; for those that hated them prevailed against the saved, delivering them over to torture and death, as they have prevailed against them to this day, and will prevail against them till the Ancient of Days come, and the saints possess the kingdom, and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom for ever under the whole heaven—Daniel 7: 18, 21-22, 27, not above it. Seeing, then, that Israel is not saved, but continue "a people scattered and peeled—a nation meted out and trodden under foot, whose land invading armies have spoiled;" that there is no king in Israel executing judgment and righteousness in their land; and that the holy covenant sworn to Abraham has only been dedicated with the precious blood of his Seed, and beyond this no more performed than in the days of Moses; the conclusion is inevitable, that the Lord Jesus has not yet accomplished his mission, and that he has not yet appeared as a prophet like unto Moses.

Now because this conclusion is true, and cannot be refuted, the Jews of our time refuse to confess Jesus as their ruler and judge; "whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting"—Micah 5: 1-2. Gentile theologians rightly affirm that He is the prophet of whom Moses wrote; but they do not affirm the truth in maintaining that in his appearing He resembled or was "like unto" him. So long as they occupy this ground the conversion of Jews by them to any respectable extent is impossible. "The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of the prophecy"—the testimony of the prophecy is the spirit which testifies of Jesus—Revelation 19: 10; John 15: 26; 16: 13-14; 6: 63; 1 John 2:27. This spirit-testimony defines the mission of Christ which the apostolic history plainly demonstrates was performed by Jesus to a very limited extent; and they who affirm it was fully accomplished, aver what they cannot prove; and convict themselves of profound ignorance of the spirit-word, and exclude themselves also from that worthy company styled "the brethren of John having the testimony of Jesus." Instead of giving "death-blows to Jewish infidelity," they are stumbling-blocks in the way of Jewish acceptance of Jesus as the prophet like unto Moses, whom Jehovah promised to raise up in the midst of Israel. "Admitting," say the Jews, "that all affirmed of Jesus in the New Testament narratives be true, proving him to be a true man and no impostor, still he is manifestly from that account not the Messiah promised in Moses and the prophets, if, as Gentile philosophers teach, he is to appear no more upon earth, and to do no more for the Twelve Tribes of Israel, as such, than feeding a few thousands at two meals, and healing the diseases of a few sick Jews, as reported of him." This is an impregnable position, well fortified by the testimony of God. The New Testament history proves Jesus to have been Son of God, a great prophet, mighty in deed, Son of David raised from the dead and translated from the earth; but, deny that he is to appear in Palestine again and to reign there in the midst of the Twelve Tribes of Israel on David's throne, wearing the crowns of all earth's kingdoms—deny this, and prove that he is to remain for ever where he is, and you deny that Jesus is the Christ, the prophet like unto Moses, concerning whom Jehovah hath testified in His word since the foundation of the world was laid.

On the other hand, that our Jewish friends may not boast themselves against Jesus, however justly they can exult over his pretended friends, which we admit they have ample grounds to do, we remark that if any prophet should appear among them, and re-establish them in Palestine, and make them a great nation, rebuilding the temple and restoring the law, and reigning over them in Jerusalem, yet he would not be the person of whom Moses in the law and the prophets did write, if he had not previously been the subject of all the New Testament narratives concerning Jesus. He might be Moses, or Elijah; but the Messiah of whom Moses wrote, impossible. Such a king could not maintain them in everlasting possession of their land; he could not give them rain from heaven and fertility of soil; he could not blot out their transgressions as a thick cloud; neither could he bestow upon any of them eternal life, &c.; in brief, he could not perform the oath sworn to Abraham by God that "they might serve him without fear, in holiness and righteousness before Him, all the days of their life"—as a nation to die no more by the hand of hating Gentile tyrants; and as individuals under their own vines and fig-trees, none daring to make them afraid. Jesus, the great power of God, alone can accomplish this. It is the great work for which he has been prepared—a preparedness to which he has attained through suffering into obedience and perfection. Moses suffered affliction before he was exalted to the throne of Israel. He was an abscondant homicide keeping sheep in the desert—a fugitive from his people before he exchanged his crook for the sceptre of Jeshurun's king. This is Jehovah's rule—probation before exaltation. Israel's Messiah cannot be exempt from this law—a principle working out its results to this day in the experience of all who with him are "the heirs of God".

Gentile philosophy denies the reappearance of Jesus in Palestine to build again or restore the kingdom and throne of Israel. Against all this philosophy we proclaim implacable and unending war. It is the philosophy of rhantised and baptised infidelity, miscalled "religion." It blasphemes God, destroys the Messiahship of Jesus, nullifies the gospel, falsifies the prophets, stultifies the apostles, and makes men infidels; all of which we are prepared to prove at a moment's notice. The cause of this universal corruption with all its fruits is ignorance of the sure prophetic word. Talk of philological theologians being great and wise who are ignorant of the prophets! Great and wise men, and yet ignorant of the foundation of the faith they pretend to preach! Ridiculous. Persevere a little longer, ye wise, in the deeds of your fathers; a few more brief years and your wisdom will become foolishness, and he that is coming will come and take you captive in your own craftiness. It will be ours to harass you as we best can as the “enemies of all righteousness, who cease not to pervert the right ways of the Lord.”

REPENTANCE WITHOUT SACRIFICE INSUFFICIENT FOR REMISSION OF SINS.

“Without shedding of blood is no remission.” —PAUL.

Some modern writers, as well as founders of religious denominations, have boldly asserted that “sacrifices were never required to procure the pardon of sin, and that repentance alone is always sufficient.” This opinion has been well refuted by the “Rev” J. Oxlee, an accomplished Hebrew scholar, in his fourth letter to S. M., a Jewish correspondent in the Jewish Repository, vol. 2, page 462. The following are his remarks in regard to the unscriptural assertion alluded to:

“Sir, —The next erroneous statement on which I beg to animadvert, in your objections to the Messiahship of Jesus, is to the following effect: ‘For,’ say you, ‘according to our (the modern Jewish) faith, a strict and due observance of the Decalogue and precepts, as ordained by the Almighty in the law he gave to his chosen people, the Jews, is the only intermediate medium, or mediator, that they require to insure their salvation in the future state; and they offer in proof thereof how great a sinner king David was, and yet sincere repentance was the only mediating medium that procured him the Almighty's forgiveness; for, as Jews, they would deem it to imply mutability in the Supreme, were they to entertain any belief that sincere contrition and repentance does now require a mediator to render it acceptable to the Almighty. Such are the opinions of the Jews on this head, and such are mine.'—S. M's Letter, Jewish Rep., Vol. 2, pp. 148, 285.

“Though the doctrine here inculcated,” says Mr. Oxlee, “is somewhat confusedly expressed, the meaning I take to be that, with the Jews, a perfect conformity to the law of Moses will ensure his salvation in the next world; and that, for every violation of the Divine precepts, whereby eternal life should seem to have been forfeited, no other atonement or expiation either now is, or ever was required by the Almighty, than sincere repentance; for the proof of which an allusion is made to the pardon which king David obtained in the affair of Bathsheba. There is not, perhaps, a question of more vital importance to mankind, nor one which requires a higher degree of learning and candor, in order to a right and successful discussion of it, than the manner in which, most agreeably to the will of God, expiation is to be made for sin and transgression. That the Jews of the present age uniformly inculcate, that for every species of sin and transgression, sincere repentance and contrition are a full and satisfactory atonement, I readily grant; but that this notion is repugnant to the analogy of the faith, to the patriarchal and Mosaical institutions, to the express testimonies of Scriptures, to the positions of the Talmud, as well as the assertions of several of the most celebrated writers of the Jewish church, I will endeavour to establish on the most unexceptionable evidence.

“Before I proceed, however, to the general question, I shall invalidate the only apparent proof which you have been able to allege, of contrition and repentance being clearly accepted by God, without the intervention of sacrifice, as an atonement for sin. The pardon to which reference is made in the case of king David, though you have not expressly declared it, is, doubtless, in the matter of Bathsheba, as that is the only instance in which he deviates so far from inculpability of conduct.

“The circumstance is thus recorded in our English version: ‘And David said unto Nathan, I have sinned against the Lord. And Nathan said unto David, the Lord also hath put away thy sin: thou shalt not die.’—2 Samuel 12: 13. That part of the pasuk which relates to the pardon is thus expounded by R. Isaac Abarbinel: ‘But with respect to the answer of Nathan, who says, “The Lord also hath put away thy sin: thou shalt not die,”—I think, that, as David had said: “I have sinned against the Lord”—meaning that the sin had reference to Jehovah himself, and that in his hands were atonement and forgiveness—so Nathan rejoined, true it is that every thing is in the hand of the Lord; and because mercy and forgiveness are in his hand, he hath put away thy sin, so that thou shalt not die. And this he said, because that, when David heard the parable from the mouth of the prophet, he exclaimed, as the Lord liveth, this man is guilty of death; but the Lord, in decreeing concerning thee, hath put away thy sin, so that thou shalt not die; for he hath not decreed against thyself that thou shouldst die, but only against thy sons and thy wives; and this he hath done, because all things are from him, and through him; and because he hath a tenderness for thee before the decree. The words, therefore, of the text, “The Lord also hath put away thy sin,” are not to be expounded as consequent on the confession, but as antecedent to this, and as taking place at the time of the decree, when death was not awarded him, because the lord had a tender regard for him. Indeed, it is evident that the confession and repentance of David did not remove those punishments which had been awarded against him; though, by virtue of his repentance, his iniquities were expiated, and he was rescued from the hands of Absalom, and returned to his kingdom.’—Com. In Loc.

“Now, if any deference is to be paid to the authority of Abarbanel, the pardon which David obtained by the mouth of the prophet was not in consideration of his sorrow and repentance, but of that exuberant kindness which he had shown him from God; for, though the same author hath subjoined, that, by virtue of this repentance, his iniquities were forgiven him, it can only be meant that the blood of atonement was thereby rendered efficacious to the purgation of his guilt; as he lived under the Mosaic economy, and availed himself of that great day of atonement, of which the Jew, ever since the destruction of the temple, has been wholly deprived.

“There is not, indeed, in the whole volume of Scripture any evidence, either direct or indirect, that remission of sins was, under any age of the world, to be obtained by contrition and repentance. During the patriarchal dispensation, we read of sacrifices having been offered for the purpose, as is reasonably supposed, of appeasing the wrath of God, and of conciliating his favour; [of amicability with Him, and of continuance in His grace. —Editor.] but nowhere do we read that the efficacy of repentance was such as to be a substitute for sacrifice. In the Mosaic dispensation there was no atonement without the shedding of blood; on the contrary, it was by virtue of his oblation only, and not by his sorrow and contrition, that the pardon of the culprit was obtained, and his guilt obliterated. Nor have the prophets affirmed any thing to the prejudice of this doctrine. Their frequent calls to repentance are not to be understood of mere invitations to the people to reflect on their ways, and to be sorry for what was past; but as strenuous exhortations to the strict and punctual discharge of the ritual, as well as of the moral precepts; a considerable part of which consisted in the due and regular performance of sacrifice for sin and transgression. R. Saul Ben R. Arjeleb has attested the truth of this position in more places than one. These are his words: ‘for it is evident there is no atonement except by blood.’—Binyan Ariel, Fol. 30. Again, in another preceding column of the same work: ‘there is no ground of atonement except by blood.’ Thus we find the Jew and the Christian maintaining the same language, that by sacrifice only, and nothing else, can sin be cancelled and guilt obliterated.

“Indeed, that repentance is no ground of atonement, though highly pleasing to God, in our fallen and sinful condition, and even necessary to the right performance of every sacrifice, is demonstrable on the authority of the Talmud, which inculcates, that for all transgressions, not legally expiated by instant sacrifice, the culprit, however intense or sincere his repentance might be, could obtain no pardon till the great day of atonement; that, for certain sins of a flagrant complexion, it was wholly unavailable; and that, for others, of a trivial nature, it was absolutely unnecessary. For every violation of the Divine law, and for all sins whatever committed against God, the victims slain on the great day of atonement, together with the emissary goat, made a full and sufficient expiation of themselves, except in one or two cases, in which it would have been highly presumptuous on the part of the offender to expect any atonement, without the most unfeigned repentance accompanying the expiation; and in matters of wrong between one man and another, where, to render the atonement of any avail, restitution and satisfaction were first to be made.

“That this is a correct statement of the manner in which remission of sins was obtained under the Mosaic dispensation, is apparent from the Mishna, Masecheth, Shebnoth, Perek I. ‘Moreover, for the wilful defiling of the sanctuary and its holy things, the goat which was disposed of within, and the day of atonement, made expiation; but for the other transgressions detailed in the law, whether light or heavy; whether committed in wantonness or in ignorance; whether with the knowledge of the thing eaten, or without the knowledge of it; whether against an affirmative or negative precept; whether amounting to the penalty of excision, or of death, inflicted by the Sanhedrin; the emissary goat makes expiation.’

“In this place there is no mention of the repentance of the culprit as a condition of the atonement being accepted, much less, according to the Jews of the present age, is its efficacy asserted to be of such avail as to procure for the offender the remission of his guilt, without the medium of a sacrifice. Seeing, then, that for several gross sins repentance is denied to be of any avail; that, for others of a less enormous complexion, it is not thought necessary; and that, even in those few cases where it cannot be dispensed with, it sustains not the character of an atoning medium, but is merely the condition on which the expiatory sacrifice becomes efficacious; I am authorised,” (saith Mr. Oxlee,) “to contend, that the modern Jewish doctrine of repentance being self-sufficient for the expiation of all sin and transgression, is at variance with the Scriptures as well as with the Talmud; and has every appearance of having been dictated by the exigency of the circumstances in which the Jew is now placed, without any regard whatever to the real principles of Judaism. I cannot, therefore, but come to a very opposite conclusion with yourself on this important point: that it would imply mutability in the Supreme Being, were the Jews to expect that the most sincere contrition and repentance could now procure for them, whilst languishing under a state of punishment, the remission of sins; when they could not obtain it on such easy terms whilst living in their own land, and enjoying the privileges of the Mosaic dispensation.”

THE LABOUR OF THE YEAR.

The editor of this periodical has been asked, “Why do you not give your readers some account of your journeyings to and fro, and labours in the gospel?”—to which he has replied, that these journeyings and labours have hitherto left him no leisure to narrate them. He has now, however, at length arrived at the hibernating point, beyond which they are not likely to extend—a point of time on his annual career, whence it becomes necessary diligently to “drive the quill,” until the sun shall enter Gemini, in order to lay up in store sufficient surplus manuscript to keep the printers at work upon the Herald during his “runnings to and fro,” to diffuse a knowledge of the truth among the people.

Since my removal to New York, I have had no leisure. From December till June, of this year, I discoursed some sixty times to congregations in this city, assembling at Chelsea Hall, and Convention Hall. On arriving here, I found some seven or eight meeting in a private house, for their own edification and comfort: but doing nothing in the way of “sounding out the Word of the Lord.” Not that they were devoid of the disposition to do so; but from various circumstances, Providence had not favoured them hitherto with the ability.

Our first number of this volume, p. 18, I have related how we endeavoured to interest the people of this great Nineveh in Israel’s Hope. In our third number, I had to report, that the liberty granted to the Gentiles was converted into licentiousness, in their coming not to ascertain the sense of Scripture, but to speechify their own nonsense. They seemed unable to discern that Chelsea Hall was not rented to afford scope for every one afflicted with the very troublesome phrenal affection, cacoethes loquendi, to vex and mortify the sober minded with the thinkings of their untutored minds; but for an inquiry, or search into the system of truth revealed of God in his holy writings, which they who occupied the Hall were prepared to testify and prove. “Be swift to hear, and slow to speak,” is an apostolic rule much to be respected. James exhorted his brethren to observe it, and advised them not to become “teachers” —didaskolos—because their condemnation would be the greater. How much more necessary is it in these times of ignorance that his counsel should be received! Foolish talking is one of the greatest hindrances to the truth in modern times. People who know little or nothing about it, are generally the most forward in delivering themselves concerning it. They rejoice in the sound of their own voices, and imagine all the time that they are rejoicing in the truth. They desire to be teachers, not perceiving that they have need “that one teach them what be the first principles of the oracles of God.” Such pretenders are not only troublesome, but injurious to the best of causes, which suffers more from injudicious and unenlightened advocates than from none. The apostle indeed says, “Despise not prophesyings,” and that “all may prophesy;” but then it is necessary that the things delivered be “prophesyings,” and the “all” be competent to do it. Prophesying is speaking scripturally to the edification, and exhortation, and comfort of scripturally discerning men. A man that cannot do this must be content to learn, and confine himself to the inquiry “What is truth?”

Having got rid of this obstacle, we proceeded in the work of “declaring the testimony of God” in the midst of difficulties unnecessarily created by misdirected zeal. Still several were added to the professed adherents of the gospel of the kingdom, and the church began to assume numerical respectability, amounting, I believe, to over thirty members. It was thought that removal to a more eligible hall would be expedient. The suggestion was adopted, and our meetings were forthwith transferred to Convention Hall. We commenced operations there in May, and for the information of the people issued a placard of which the following is a copy:

REPUBLICANS HEAR YE!

AN ISRAELITISH KINGDOM,

Is to be established ere long in the HOLY LAND;

That is, at the crisis of the overthrow of the now rising

RUSSO-ASSYRIAN EMPIRE:

And furthermore,

To this kingdom of the Twelve Tribes restored to Palestine there will be attached

DOMINION OVER ALL NATIONS,

Whose allegiance will then have been transferred from all

EXISTING GOVERNMENTS,

To the equitable and glorious sceptre of their invincible conqueror,

JESUS OF NAZARETH, THE KING OF THE JEWS.”

The things concerning this kingdom constitute the only gospel set forth in the Bible, and are expounded and testified out of the Scriptures for the information of ingenuous Jews and Gentiles, at Convention Hall, 175 Wooster Street.

JOHN THOMAS,

Author of Elpis Israel, and Editor of the Herald of the Kingdom and Age to Come.

We call this our “Manifest,” by which in few words is declared the platform upon which we take our stand. We have not yet made much use of it, though where it has been exposed to view it has attracted much attention. We have kept in abeyance, until my journeyings for the season shall have ceased, as its demonstration will of necessity principally devolve on me. In July it was republished and posted about the walls of Halifax, Nova Scotia, with a call suitable to the provincial subjects of a monarchy instead of “Republicans.” The placards were not allowed to remain up long, having been torn down with a zest peculiar to all “lewd fellows of the baser sort.” We do not post them on the walls in this City, but on boards which we expose by day and withdraw at night, at various convenient points.

About the first of June, I visited Rochester, N.Y. by special invitation of the friends there. The visit was to me agreeable and laborious, and I hope profitable to all. I had visited that city some seven years before, when the things spoken were as fables to the deaf. The gospel of the kingdom then found no response in the hearts of my hearers. But I am happy now in being able to report a marked and radical change in favour of the truth. “The things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ,” or “the truth as it is in Jesus,” command the faith, love, and zeal of all who look for the scriptural appearing of “Jehovah’s Servant” in power and great glory. The gospel of the kingdom has taken root among the “Adventists,” and will doubtless grow into a fruitful tree, affording assurance and peace to all among them, who may scripturally claim to be “taught of God.”

At the time of my visit, numerous friends of progress had convened from parts remote and near to confer on the interests of the truth, and to hear what I had to say on the sure prophetic Word. I discoursed on this all important subject twice seven times during my sojourn; for, as the report of the meetings has it in the Advent Harbinger for June 18th, “the time allotted to preaching was, by common consent, or rather desire, given to Dr. Thomas, several of the ministers having come to the conference for the purpose of hearing him on the Prophecies”—which conference, it adds, “as a whole was one of the best attended and most interesting we have enjoyed. Brethren were present from nine States, and from Canada West.”

I am unable to report what “good” was “done” by my visit. This cannot be ascertained till the resurrection of those who sleep in Christ. Four individuals, intelligent in the gospel of the kingdom, became obedient to the faith, in being immersed. The hearts of all I conversed with—among whom I may mention those candid and earnest friends of truth and liberty of speech upon all, Bible questions, Bro. Marsh, the Editor of the Advent Harbinger, and Bro. J. B. Cook, who takes care of the flock in their city—were enlarged and strengthened in the assurance of the hope. I am not aware of any theoretical difference between Bro. Marsh and myself. We believe that a sinner is justified from all past sins by the one faith, which embraces “the things of the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ;” and I think he also believes, that this justification is communicated to such a believer, through the name of Jesus, at the instant of his being united to that name by immersion; and that consequently, if a sinner shall not have been the subject of the “one faith,” which infolds within it the “one hope of the calling,” previous to immersion, the immersion is “no better than a Jewish ablution,” as my friend Campbell has it, because the said sinner had not the true justifying faith as defined by Paul. If I have not accurately stated this matter he will no doubt put me right. I do not know if he would admit all the consequences which flow from this accord. The application of a principle is always a delicate affair. But that he will admit whatsoever can be proved to be the mind of God as expressed in the Word, I have no doubt. This I am satisfied is true also of my worthy friend J. B. Cook, although I have not been able to convince him that the Devil and Satan of Scripture are not the Devil of Gentile theology; and that a pre-immersional belief of “the exceeding great and precious promises,” the facts concerning Jesus, and the doctrinal mystery of those facts, is indispensably necessary to a sinner’s justification unto life. He is the intelligent advocate of the “one faith” and “one hope of the calling” now; but upon the supposition of his having attained to the understanding of them since his immersion among John’s disciples, * will his post immersional belief of the truth concerning the kingdom of God, and name of Jesus convert John’s baptism into that administered by Paul? I have not been able to convince him that it will not. Of this, however, I am satisfied, that if he come to the perception of the reality, whatever it may be, he will not only accept it, but do it with all his heart.

* The Baptists who denominate themselves after John the Baptist: and who are immersed because Jesus was immersed of John in Jordan: hence the saying, “baptised to follow Christ”—as if one could follow Christ without believing “the Gospel of the Kingdom of God,” which he preached! —Editor Herald.

Shortly after my visit to Rochester, I set out for Halifax, Nova Scotia, where I arrived the first week in July, and experienced a cordial welcome from the friends I had acquired in the gospel. My coming had been duly advertised and placarded, to the annoyance somewhat of certain of the leaders of the people, who exerted their influence to prevent the goats from straying from their folds. In this effort they were doubtless successful to some extent; for the assemblies were not so large as at my former visit. The Temperance Hall was taken as before, and occupied for three weeks, which, I think included four Lord’s days. I lectured four nights in the first week, and three nights in each of the other two, besides twice on Sundays, being in all about eighteen discourses. On Lord's days the congregations were considerable; and though much smaller in the week, all were attentive, and apparently composed of persons interested in the subjects treated of, and desirous to understand. The Prophecies expounded proved attractive to several of the superior and non-commissioned Officers of the Army and Navy on the station, and in garrison there. They originated interesting debates among the Sappers, a class of soldiers engaged upon the fortifications of the citadel. Some thought we could know nothing about the future; others believed we could: others again were surprised that the clergy never told them any thing about the things I had shown were revealed in the Bible. More of the soldiery would have attended if I could have commenced at seven o'clock instead of half past eight, as they could not be out of their quarters after nine without special leave. I regretted I could not oblige them; for if we had appointed the hour to accommodate the military, we should have inconvenienced the citizens, who were the majority, and could not leave their stores at an earlier hour.

Voices issuing from certain pulpits, advised the people not to go to the Hall. One divine said, he had read Elpis Israel, and that it was full of blasphemy and infidelity. Another of the same spiritual order on hearing this, remarked in private, that he had read the work, and that there was put little he could not say Amen to; and that the book contained neither infidelity nor blasphemy. Here were two divines “called and sent of God,” and “set for the defence of the gospel,” who could not agree upon what constituted infidelity and blasphemy! Surely in such a case

“When doctors disagree

Disciples may go free;”

This was the conclusion of some, who, following the bent of their own minds, thought it best to go and judge for themselves.

Some, who could not gainsay what was spoken, tried to close the peoples’ ears by saying that the lectures were just a money-making scheme. “The Church Times,” the National Church organ in that region, was particularly desirous of making this impression before my arrival. It was stated in the advertisement of our meetings that on the week nights four pence admission would be charged to pay the rent of the hall, “&c.” The editor of The Times expounded the “et cetera” as meaning “something for the doctor himself.” In consequence of this effort to depreciate the disinterestedness of our motives in calling the attention of the people to the signs of the times as indicating the near approach of the kingdom of God, I was requested to make a statement of the facts in the case. This I did at the conclusion of my last address, and stated from a memorandum furnished me, that enough had not been received to pay the rent of the hall by £2, 16s. 2d. It was evident from this that the “something” for myself could not be very enriching. The fact was that to the time of this statement, I knew not if any thing would be forthcoming as a compensation for the time and labour expended for their instruction and edification. When invited to a place to expound the kingdom of God and the things pertaining to it, all I stipulated for was that my travelling expenses should be paid, leaving it to the conscience of my friends, and their appreciation of the things set before them, to supply the necessities of my dependants at home, on the principle that the ox should not be muzzled that treadeth out the corn. The editor of “the Church Times” being present, I remarked, for his especial consideration, that the clergy of the Established Church were the last in “Christendom” that ought to object to a man reaping some compensation for his endeavours to enlighten the public mind. The dignitaries and pluralists of “the Church” would do nothing for the instruction of the people unless they were first assured of ample payment for their services. The Archbishop of Canterbury and Bishop of London, with all the hierarchs of their church, received thousands of pounds sterling per annum for reading stereotyped old print, with pomp and pageantry of state. Would any of them in Britain or the provinces come to New York as I had come to Halifax, and for a month nearly without fee or reward, spend and be spent for the public good? Not they! No pay with them, no preach! Yet such are they who impute mercenary motives to one, who has been teaching the people with a deficit before him of £2 16s 2d for rent incurred for the accommodation of the public. It certainly behoves them to pull the beam out of their own eyes ere they presume to extract the mote out of mine!

My labour in Halifax was apparently not in vain. Sixteen applied for immersion. Five had been members of Dr. Crawley's church, which belongs to the Baptist denomination. They could not exist longer on Acadian theology; and therefore died to the system, were buried, and rose to gospel life. Others had been immersed upon a Millerite foundation, and others not at all. One gentleman, a medical practitioner, came nearly two hundred miles to be baptised. The Bible, with the aid of Elpis Israel and the Herald, humbled him to the obedience of the faith. More might have been immersed, but upon examination they were advised to wait until, by a diligent study of the Scriptures, they had obtained a more satisfactory understanding of the word. The immersions were administered at Melville Island, a rural and beautiful spot at the head of the North Arm, upon which is situated the old French prison, well furnished with guests during the war. The use of this was obtained for us of the admiral by a sympathising friend and member of the Baptist Church. Our proceedings attracted the attention of certain relatives of the archdeacon, who became spectators of the baptising from their boats. They seemed to enjoy themselves very much at our expense. My back was towards them, so that I did not observe their folly. It is well I did not, or I might have been tempted to silence them by contrasting the expressiveness of an intelligent believer's immersion with the unmeaning and impious ceremony of baby-sprinkling. How perverse, and how hostile is human nature, though animated by the blood of an archdeacon, to the institutions of God! A conclave of hierarchs and nobles can encompass an archbishop, and with grave and solemn faces behold him sprinkle a puling scion of royalty without intelligence or faith in the name of the Holy Ones, and call it Christian baptism; but behold with scoffs and jeers the immersion of an intelligent believer into the name of the Lord Jesus.

I left Halifax early in August en route for this city by way of Annapolis, St. John's, Portland, and Boston. A dense fog oppressed us all the way from St. John's to Portland, Me. On diverging from the Bay of Fundy into Passamaquoddy Bay we got into bright sunshine for a short time; but on leaving Eastport, and passing the Bell Rock, we again drove into the fog, and saw no more of land till within about two boat' length of Richmond island, some twelve miles out of our course, about six o'clock in the morning. If it had been dark we should have certainly struck upon the rocks; for though we blew our steam whistle with the shrillest blast, no light-house bell sounded the bearings of our position. From Digby, at the mouth of the Annapolis river, to St. John's is forty miles across the Bay of Fundy. The outlet from the river is by Digby Gap, through which the tide flows with great rapidity and power. I found it very cold in crossing the bay, though early in August, when people were dying of heat in New York. I was detained a night at Annapolis, and at St. John's two nights, and a Lord's day. Knowing no one here, I was unemployed, except in making myself acquainted with the topography of the city and adjacent country. The suspension bridge across the St. John's river well deserves inspection. The gorge it spans is the fissure through which the river rushes into the harbour, and not being sufficiently wide the tide is backed up, and makes a fall. This is a great place for lumber and ship-building, and seems to be, upon the whole, a flourishing port. The climate is very changeable, and in winter very cold; and no place for one who has passed some dozen years of his existence under a southern sun.

Shortly after my return from Halifax, I visited Worcester, Mass., where I remained about a week lecturing in Warren Hall. Though a convenient room it has acquired an indifferent reputation religiously, because of the notions which find currency there. Some teach that the millennium is passed already; others, that Christ is coming in 1854; and I know not what else beside. Unhappy will it be for the timists if such be the case; for they are manifestly unprepared. If a man would be blessed, he must not only watch, but keep his garments if he have any; and if not, buy of Christ raiment that he may be clothed. Darkness reigns in Worcester. I did what I could in eight lectures to shine away a little of it. How far I may have succeeded time only can reveal. Some seemed to give heed to the things submitted to them, while others stiffened their necks against them. The past-millennialists are of this class, a stiff-necked and sceptical generation. I never met with persons claiming to be Christians who seem to have less reverence for God's testimony than those in Worcester; and should I ever visit this place again I shall seek some other place of utterance than Warren Hall, illustrated as it is by the intense foolishness of the carnal mind. There are a few names, however, in this Sardis, who believe the gospel of the kingdom and age to come. I had the pleasure of immersing three, upon whom rests the responsibility of contending for the faith, and defending it against the traditions of men.

On my return from Worcester, I directed my course to Virginia. I arrived there on the 9th of September, and remained in the State till October 11. In this interval I visited Lunenburg, King William, King and Queen, Charlottesville, Temperance in Louisa, and Webster's in Goochland. There appears to be an increasing interest in the gospel of the kingdom in these parts, owing, I think, to "the Eastern Question," concerning which I have written much in former years, and which is now coming out as I have been showing the prophets foretold it would. Finding this, people, where the Herald and Elpis Israel circulate, are beginning to think that the gospel I have delineated may have more claims upon their consideration than in former days they were willing to admit. Brother A. B. Magruder who preceded me in King William and King and Queen Counties, was much encouraged. The attendance on his appointments was good, and the attention earnest. He had also the pleasure of immersing six who had long assented to the theory of the truth, but had not obeyed it. Besides these, were two others, one of whom was a reformer, and the other previously a non-professor.

In Lunenburg the people turned out well, and some three or four were baptised. At Cool Spring two meetings were held in the week, which would have been respectable even for Sunday. I spoke at Liberty, Prince Edward, on my way to Richmond, in the week. The house was full, and no audience could pay profounder attention. It is to be hoped that what they heard will turn them from the fables preached to them in ordinary to the truth. Let them search the scriptures, and compare all things with their testimony. This meeting was on Wednesday. On Sunday following I spoke at Acquinton, and on Tuesday following at brother Norman's Meeting House, in King and Queen. The attendance here was small. His neighbours judged themselves unworthy of his anxiety for their spiritual welfare, and of our trouble in journeying twenty five miles to teach them.

At Charlottesville, I spoke three times on Lord's Day, and by accident, as it were, addressed the episcopal congregation of the town. Their Church being under repair, they had expected their clergyman, Bishop Mead's son, to read prayers with them at the Town Hall, as on previous Sundays. But we had engaged the Hall for that day, of which they were not aware. They came, but found me there expounding the Scriptures, instead of Mr. Mead. They remained, and would have had more use for Bibles than for printed prayers, if they had brought them. But the bringing of God's Word "to Church" is a custom but little honoured by the observance of the professors of the day.

Having filled my appointments at Free Union and Mount harmony, in Albemarle, I went to Louisa, and thence to Webster's. It being uncertain whether I should be at Temperance on Saturday, my audience did not exceed a dozen persons. Next day, the house was full. At Webster's it was doubtful if admission could be obtained by fair means. The house is a free one, and has been plastered and repaired by public subscription. Two ancients of the weaker sex, belonging to John's disciples, busied themselves somewhat in raising the money, a work which they imagined gave them some sort of control over the house, to let in and to keep out all whom they in their wisdom deemed to be fit or not to stand on the platform sanctified by the feet of their Mr. Smith. Being a heretic in their esteem, they had decreed that Dr. Thomas should not preach in their house. They spoke thus valiantly because they had "the power of the keys." But, the house being free, they were given to understand that it would be entered key or no key; for the people were determined to hear me. They very prudently left the door open, so that we had nothing to do but to walk in. The audience was more considerable than I expected. They listened very attentively, which is all that I can say; and after two hours' discourse I dismissed them, and departed.

I was told that the canal packet from Lynchburg to Richmond was to pass by Dover Mills about 1 A.M. on Tuesday morning. Thither I went to meet it, and arrived at the mill about midnight. I sat about an hour in the barouche with the cushions on my knees and around me to keep me warm. No packet came, and the caloric of my body was fast radiating to the freezing point. I left my retreat, and joined company with three Negroes, who were kindling a fire on the canal bank. With blocks of gypsum for seats, we hovered over the blaze, cold as frost behind, and smoked and scorched before, waiting for morning or the packet. Morning came, but not the packet. The Negroes slept over the fire more soundly than I am wont to do in bed. They swung in all directions over the blaze, which would sometimes awake their fingers to consciousness, but not their brains. Sleep refused to embrace me with the rest. Keeping up the fire, watching the East, and peering into the darkness for the packet, was the business of this weary and uncomfortable bivouac on the bank of the James River Canal. At length Aurora, daughter of the morn, began to appear, and the dying embers of our fire to return to dust. We had been labouring under a mistake. The packet did not run on Monday night; so on Tuesday morning I returned to the friend's house I had left over night, and found him putting on his harness for the business of the day. Having warmed myself thoroughly by a blazing wood fire, I went to bed, and slept soundly for three hours. Breakfasted at 9A.M., and departed for Richmond by buggy at 11. Arrived there about 4 P.M. Started by train at 9 P. M., and arrived at brother Lemmon's, in Baltimore, by 8 next morning.

were by no means sanguine, but certainly anticipated more than we realised on Thursday and Friday nights, or the Masonic Hall would not have been taken for more days than Sunday. The lectures were advertised in the papers, which brought out not more than seven, besides other seven made up from brother L's family circle and myself. If the audience were not large, however, it was, certainly, intelligent. This was an important offset to the large hall and empty benches, and encouraged me to begin and to continue to the end of the subjects advertised, which were: "The Constitution of the World for a Thousand Years to Come;" and "The Rise, Mission, and Destiny of Mohammedanism Scripturally set forth."

But great ends have generally small beginnings. Advertising in the crowded columns of newspapers in such cities as Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, is of very little use. They must be placarded if the attention of the people is to be gained. We found that something more must be done if the lectures on Sunday were to be better attended than the others. Fortunately brother Lemmon had one of my New York manifestoes, about three feet by two, of which a copy is before the reader. This was tacked on to a board, and placed in front of the Masonic Hall during Saturday. The effect was remarkable. Our expectations were small; our disappointment, therefore, most agreeable. When we arrived on Sunday morning the Hall was nearly full; and at night the assembly was larger still. The attention paid was most gratifying; and encouraged us in the belief, or rather hope, that the Lord may yet have some people to be made manifest by the gospel of his kingdom in this city. At present, like the Great King himself when preaching it, it has no place of rest in Baltimore—no doors open for its utterance—not unlocked by a golden key. Twenty five dollars opened the Masonic Hall; but unbelief closes all other places. Thus it is for the present, and perhaps will so continue to be, until the King shall come in his glory to subdue all things to himself. It is our duty, however, to persevere, and to deserve success, though we may prove unable to command it.

Such have been the labours of the year now nearly closed. Beside writing the Herald, I have spoken about 130 times, and travelled about 3,000 miles. This has been my individual contribution in the interest of the gospel of the kingdom—a small deposit laid up in Heaven for the Age to Come. Twenty seven have yielded obedience to the truth in baptism on the occasions presented. Besides these, brethren Magruder and Anderson have immersed some twelve or fifteen; and believers have multiplied in this city from seven or eight to upwards of thirty. How many of all these will attain to the inheritance none can tell but God. The reward is His; the labour to obtain it with fear and trembling, ours. The Herald is slowly, but surely I trust, upon the increase. Three years ago there were no subscribers to it in Britain and its Provinces; there are now about a hundred. It has not experienced the same increase here; but is, nevertheless, indebted to the liberality of several brethren, the amount of whose subscriptions has appeared in our "Receipts," for the ability of its Editor to carry it on without falling into arrears. It is believed, I am happy to find, that the matter of its columns is worth the price, and that I have fully and fairly redeemed all I have undertaken to do.

As to Elpis Israel, the English edition is exhausted within a dozen copies or so; and of the American not more than about 180 remain unsold. It has made itself felt, and will, no doubt, yield a product which will appear to the honour and glory of God. Have all who believe thus far done the best they are able to do? If not, let them settle the account with God and their own consciences. I judge no man. Let us all do our best; and whatever profit we may have been to one another, let us remember, that after we have done all, to God we are but "unprofitable servants."

ON THE SUPPOSED SCRIPTURAL _EXPRESSION FOR ETERNITY.

BY THOMAS DE QUINCEY.

Forty years ago (or, in all probability, a good deal more, for we have already completed thirty-seven years from Waterloo, and my remembrances upon this subject go back to a period lying much behind that great era), I used to be annoyed and irritated by the false interpretation given to the Greek word aion, and given necessarily, therefore, to the adjective aionios as its immediate derivative. It was not so much the falsehood of this interpretation, as the narrowness of that falsehood, which disturbed me. There was a glimmer of truth in it; and precisely that glimmer it was which led the way to a general and obstinate misconception of the meaning. The word is remarkably situated. It is a scriptural word, and it is also a Greek word; from which the inevitable inference is, that we must look for it only in the New Testament. Upon any question arising of deep, aboriginal, doctrinal truth we have nothing to do with translations. Those are but secondary questions, archaeological and critical, upon which we have a right to consult the Greek translation of the Hebrew Scriptures known by the name of the Septuagint.

Suffer me to pause at this point for the sake of premising an explanation needful to the unlearned reader. As the reading public and the thinking public is every year out-growing more and more notoriously the mere learned public, it becomes every year more and more the right of the former public to give the law preferably to the latter public upon all points which concern its own separate interests. In past generations, no pains, were taken to make explanations that were not called for by the learned public. All other readers were ignored. They formed a mob, for whom no provision was made. And that many difficulties should be left entirely unexplained for them, was superciliously assumed to be no fault at all. And yet any sensible man, let him be as supercilious as he may, must, on consideration, allow that among the crowd of unlearned or half learned readers, who have had neither time nor opportunities for what is called “erudition” or learned studies, there must always lurk a proportion of men that, by constitution of mind, and by the bounty of nature, are much better fitted for thinking, originally more philosophic, and are more capaciously endowed, than those who are, by accident of position, more learned. Such a natural superiority certainly takes precedency of a merely artificial superiority; and, therefore, it entitles those who possess it to a special consideration. Let there be an audience gathered about any book of 10,100 readers: it might be fair in these days to assume that 10,000 would be in a partial sense illiterate, and the remaining 100 what would be rigorously classed as “learned.” Now, on such a distribution of the readers, it would be a matter of certainty that the most powerful intellects would lie amongst the illiterate 10,000, counting, probably, to 15 to 1 as against those in the learned minority. The inference, therefore, would be, that, in all equity, the interest of the unlearned section claimed a priority of attention, not merely as the more numerous section, but also as, by a high probability, the more philosophic. And in proportion as this unlearned section widens and expands, which every year it does, in that proportion the obligation and cogency of this equity strengthens. An attention to the unlearned part of an audience, which 15 years ago might have rested upon pure courtesy, now rests upon a basis of absolute justice. I make this preliminary explanation, in order to take away the appearance of caprice from such occasional pauses as I may make for the purpose of clearing of obscurities or difficulties. Formerly, in a case of that nature, the learned reader would have told me that I was not entitled to delay him by elucidations that in his case must be supposed to be superfluous: and in such a remonstrance there would once have been some equity. The illiterate section of the readers might then be fairly assumed as present only by accident; as no abiding part of the audience; but, like the general public in the gallery of the House of Commons, as present only by sufferance; and officialty in any records of the house whatever utterly ignored as existences.

At present, half-way on our pilgrimage through the nineteenth century, I reply to such a learned remonstrant—that it gives me pain to annoy him by superfluous explanations, but that, unhappily, this infliction of tedium upon him is inseparable from what has now become a duty to others.

This being said, I now go on to inform the illiterate reader, that the earliest translation of the Hebrew Scriptures ever made was into Greek. It was undertaken on the encouragement of a learned prince Ptolemy Philadelphus, by an association of Jewish emigrants in Alexandria. It was, as the event has shown in very many instances, an advantage of a rank rising to providential, that such a cosmopolitan version of the Hebrew sacred writings should have been made at a moment when a rare occurrence of circumstances happened to make it possible; such as, for example, a king both learned in his tastes and liberal in his principles of religious toleration; a language viz., the Greek, which had already become, what for many centuries it continued to be, a common language of communication for the learned of the whole (i.e., in effect of the civilised world, viz., Greece, the shores of the Euxine, the whole of Asia Minor, Syria, Egypt, Carthage, and all the dependencies of Carthage, finally, and above all, Rome, then beginning to loom upon the western horizon), together with all the dependencies of Rome, and briefly, every state and city that adorned the imperial islands of the Mediterranean, or that glittered like gems in that vast belt of land, roundly speaking 1,000 miles in average breadth, and in circuit running up to 5,000 miles. 1,000 multiplied into 5 times 1,000, or, otherwise expressed, a thousand thousand 5 times repeated, or, otherwise a million 5 times repeated, briefly, a territory measuring 5,000,000 of square miles, or 45 times the surface of our two British islands—such was the boundless domain which this extraordinary act of Ptolemy suddenly threw open to the literature and spiritual revelation of a little obscure race, nestling in a little angle of Asia, scarcely visible as a fraction of Syria, buried in the broad shadows thrown out on one side by the great and ancient settlements on the Nile, and on the other by the vast empire that for thousands of years occupied the Tigris and the Euphrates. In the twinkling of an eye, at a sudden summons, as it were from the sounding of a trumpet, or the oriental call by the clapping of hands, gates are thrown open, which have an effect that would arise from the opening of a ship canal across the Isthmus of Darien, viz., the introduction to each other—face to face of two separate infinities. Such a canal would suddenly lay open to each other the two great oceans of our planet, the Atlantic and the Pacific; whilst the act of translating into Greek and from Hebrew, that is, transferring out of a mysterious cipher as little accessible as Sanscrit, and which never would be more accessible through any worldly attractions of alliance with power and civic grandeur or commerce, out of this darkness into the golden light of a language the most beautiful, the most honoured amongst men, and the most widely diffused through a thousand years to come, had the immeasurable effect of throwing into the great crucible of human speculation, even then beginning to ferment, to boil, to overflow—that mightiest of all elements for exalting the chemistry of philosophy—grand and, for the first time, adequate conceptions of the Deity. For, although it is true that, until Elias should come—that is, until Christianity should have applied its final revelation to the completion of this great idea—we could not possess it in its total effulgence, it is, however, certain that an immense advance was made, a prodigious usurpation across the realms of chaos, by the grand illuminations of the Hebrew discoveries. Too terrifically austere, we must presume the Hebrew idea to have been; too undeniably it had not withdrawn the veil entirely which still rested upon the Divine countenance; so much is involved in the subsequent revelations of Christianity. But still the advance made in reading aright the divine lineaments had been enormous. God was now a holy spirit that could not tolerate impurity. He was the fountain of justice, and no longer disfigured by any mode of sympathy with human caprice or infirmity. And, if a frown too awful still rested upon his face, making the approach to him too fearful for harmonising with that perfect freedom and that child-like love which God seeks in his worshippers, it was yet made evident that no step for conciliating his favour did or could lie through any but moral graces.

Three centuries after this great epoch of the publication (for such it was) secured so providentially to the Hebrew theology, two learned Jews—viz., Josephus and Philo Judaeus—had occasion to seek a cosmopolitan utterance for that burden of truth (or what they regarded as truth) which oppressed the spirit within them. Once again they found a deliverance from the very same freezing imprisonment in an unknown language, through the very same magical key, viz.—the all pervading language of Greece, which carried their communications to the four winds of heaven, and carried them precisely amongst the class of men, viz.—the enlightened and educated class—which pre-eminently, if not exclusively, their wish was to reach. About one generation after Christ it was, when the utter prostration, and, politically speaking, the destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish nation, threw these two learned Jews upon this recourse to the Greek language as their final resource, in a condition otherwise of absolute hopelessness. Pretty nearly three centuries before Christ it was (284 years, according to the common reckoning), when the first act of communication took place between the sealed-up literature of Palestine and the Greek catholic interpretation. Altogether, we may say that 320 years, or somewhere about ten generations of men, divided these memorable two acts of intercommunication. Such a space of time allows a large range of influence, and of silent, unconscious peration to the vast and potent ideas that brooded over this awful Hebrew literature. Too little weight has been allowed to the probable contagiousness, and to the preternatural shock, of such a new and strange philosophy, acting upon the jaded and exhausted intellect of the Grecian race. We must remember, that precisely this particular range of time was that in which the Greek systems of philosophy, having thoroughly completed their evolution, had suffered something of a collapse; and, having exhausted their creative energies, began to gratify the cravings for novelty by remodellings of old forms. It is remarkable, indeed, that this very city of Alexandria founded and matured this new principle of remodelling applied to poetry not less than to philosophy and criticism. And, considering the activity of this great commercial city and port, which was meant to act, and did act, as a centre of communication between the East and the West, it is probable that a far greater effect was produced by the Greek translation of the Jewish Scriptures, in the way of preparing the mind of nations for the apprehension of Christianity, than has ever been distinctly recognised. The silent destruction of books in those centuries has robbed us of all means for tracing innumerable revolutions, that nevertheless, by the evidence of results, must have existed. Taken, however, with or without this additional result the translation of the Hebrew Scriptures in their most important portions must be ranked amongst what are called “providential” events. Such a king—a king whose father had been a personal friend of Alexander, the mighty civilising conqueror, and had shared in the liberalisation connected with his vast revolutionary projects for extending a higher civilisation over the globe, such a king, conversing with such a language, having advantages so absolutely unrivalled, and again this king and this language concurring with such a treasure, so supernatural of spiritual wisdom, as the subject of their ministrations, and all three concurring with political events so auspicious—the founding of a new and mighty metropolis in Egypt, and the silent advance to supreme power amongst men of a new empire, martial beyond all precedent as regarded means, but not as regarded ends working in all things towards the unity of civilisation and the unity of law, so that any new impulse, as, for instance, impulse of a new religion, was destined to find new facilities for its own propagation, resembling electric conductors, under the unity of government and of law—concurrences like these, so many and so strange, justly impress upon this translation, the most memorable, because the most influential of all that have ever been accomplished, a character of grandeur that place it on the same level of interest as the building of the first or second temple at Jerusalem.

There is a Greek legend which openly ascribes to this translation all the characters of a miracle. But as usually happens, this vulgarising form of the miraculous is far less impressive than the plain history itself, unfolding its stages with the most unpretending historical fidelity. Even the Greek language, on which, as the natural language of the new Greek dynasty in Egypt, the duty of the translation devolved enjoyed a double advantage; 1st, as being the only language then spoken upon earth that could diffuse a book over every part of the civilised earth: 2^{dly}, as being a language of unparalleled power and compass for expressing and reproducing effectually all ideas, however alien and novel. Even the city, again, in which this translation was accomplished, had a double dowry of advantages towards such a labour, not only as enjoying a large literary society, and, in particular, a large Jewish society, together with unusual provision in the shape of libraries, on a scale probably at that time unprecedented, but also as having the most extensive machinery then known to human experience for publishing, that is, for transmitting to foreign capitals, all books in the readiest and the cheapest fashion, by means of its prodigious shipping.

Having thus indicated to the unlearned reader the particular nature of that interest which invests this earliest translation of the Hebrew Scriptures, viz., that in fact this translation was the earliest publication to the human race of a revelation which had previously been locked up in a language destined, as surely as the Welsh language or the Gaelic, to eternal obscurity amongst men, I go on to mention that the learned Jews selected for this weighty labour happened to be in number seventy-two; but, as the Jews systematically reject fractions in such cases (whence it is that always, in order to express the period of six weeks, they say forty days, and not, as strictly they should, forty-two days), popularly, the translators were called “the seventy,” for which the Latin word is septuaginta. And thus, in after ages, the translators were usually indicated as “The LXX,” or, if the work and not the workmen should be noticed, it was cited as The Septuagint. In fact, this earliest of scriptural versions, viz., into Greek, is by much the most famous; or, if any other approaches it in notoriety, it is the Latin translation by St. Jerome, which, in this one point, enjoys even a superior importance, that in the Church of Rome is the authorised translation. Evidently, in every church, it must be a matter of primary importance to assign the particular version to which that church appeals, and by which, in any controversy arising, that church consents to be governed. Now, the Jerome version fulfils this function for the Romish Church; and according, in the sense of being published (vulgata), or publicly authorised by that church, it is commonly called The Vulgate.

But, in a large polemic question, unless, like the Romish Church, we uphold a secondary inspiration as having secured a special privileged translation from the possibility of error, we cannot refuse an appeal to the Hebrew text for the Old Testament, or to the Greek text for the New. The word aeonios, as purely Grecian, could not connect itself with the Old Testament, unless it were through the Septuagint translation into Greek. Now, with that version, in any case of controversy, none of us, Protestants alike or Roman Catholics, have any thing whatever to do. Controversially, we can be concerned only with the original language of the Scriptures, with its actual verbal expressions textually produced. To be liable, therefore, to such a textual citation, any Greek word must belong to the New Testament; because, though the word might happen to occur in the Septuagint, yet since that is merely a translation, for any of us who occupy a controversial place, that is, who are bound by the responsibilities, or who claim the strict privileges of controversy, the Septuagint has no virtual existence. We should not be at liberty to allege the Septuagint as any authority, if it happened to countenance our own views; and, consequently, we could not be called on to recognise the Septuagint in any case where it should happen to be against us. I make this preliminary caveat, as not caring whether the word aeonios does or does not occur in the Septuagint. Either way, the reader understands that I disown the authority of that version as in any degree affecting myself. The word which, forty years ago, moved my disgust by its servile misinterpretation, was a word proper to the New Testament; and any sense which it may have received from an Alexandrian Jew in the third century before Christ, is no more relevant to any criticism that I am now going to suggest, than is the classical use of the word aeon familiar to the learned in Sophocles or Euripides.

The reason which gives to this word aeonian what I do not scruple to call a dreadful importance, is the same reason, and no other, which prompted the dishonesty concerned in the ordinary interpretation of this word. The word happened to connect itself—but that was no practical concern of mine; me it had not biased in the one direction, nor should it have biased any just critic in the counter direction—happened, I say, to connect itself with the ancient dispute upon the duration of future punishments. What was meant by the aeonian punishments in the next world? Was the proper sense of the word eternal, or was it not? I, for my part, meddled not, nor upon any consideration could have been tempted to meddle, with a speculation repellent alike by the horror and by the hopeless mystery which invest it. Secrets of the prison-house, so afflicting to contemplate steadily, and so hopeless of solution, there could be no proper motive for investigating, unless the investigation promised a great deal more than it could ever accomplish; and my own feeling as to all such problems is, that they vulgarise what, left to itself, would take its natural station amongst the freezing horrors that Shakespeare dismisses with so potent an _expression of awe, in a well known scene of “Measure for Measure.” I reiterate my protest against being in any way decoyed into the controversy. Perhaps I may have a strong opinion upon the subject. But, anticipating the coarse discussions into which the slightest entertainment of such a question would be every moment approaching, once for all, out of reverential regard for the dignity of human nature, I beg permission to decline the controversy altogether.

But does this declination involve any countenance to a certain argument which I began by rejecting as abominable? Most certainly not. That argument runs thus—that the ordinary construction of the term aeonian, as equivalent to everlasting, could not possibly be given up when associated with penal misery, because, in that case, and by the very same act, the idea of eternity must be abandoned as applicable to the counter-bliss of Paradise. Torment and blessedness, it was argued, punishment and beatification, stood upon the same level; the same word it was, the word aeonian, which qualified the duration of either; and, if eternity in the most rigorous acceptation fell away from the one idea, it must equally fall away from the other. Well, be it so; but that would not settle the question. It might be very painful to renounce a long-cherished anticipation; but the necessity of doing so could not be received as a sufficient reason for adhering to the old unconditional use of the word aeonian. The argument is—that we must retain the old sense of eternal, because else we lose upon one scale what we had gained upon the other. But what then would be the reasonable man's retort? We are not to accept or to reject a new construction (if otherwise the more colourable) of the word aeonian, simply because the consequences might seem such as upon the whole to displease us. We may gain nothing; for by the new interpretation our loss may balance our gain; and we may prefer the old arrangement. But how monstrous is all this! We are not summoned as to a choice of two different arrangements that may suit different tastes, but to a grave question as to what is the sense and operation of the word *aeonian. Let the limitation of the word disturb our previous estimate of Paradise; grant that it so disturbs that estimate; not the less all such consequences leave the dispute exactly where it was; and if a balance of reason can be found for limiting the extent of the word aeonian, it will not be less true because it may happen to disturb a crotchet of our own.

Meantime, all this speculation, first and last, is pure nonsense. Aeonian does not mean eternal; neither does it mean of limited duration; nor would the unsettling of aeonian in its old sense, as applied to punishment, to torment, to misery, &c., carry with it any necessary unsettling of the idea in its application to the beatitudes of Paradise. Pause, reader; and thou, my favoured and privileged reader, that boastest thyself to be unlearned, pause doubly whilst I communicate my views as to this remarkable word.

What is an aeon? In the use and acceptance of the Apocalypse, it is evidently this, viz., the duration or cycle of existence which belongs to any object, not individually for itself, but universally in right of its genus. Kant, for instance, in a little paper which I once translated, proposed and debated the question as to the age of our planet the Earth. What did he mean? Was he to be understood as asking whether the Earth were half a million, 2 millions, or 3 millions of years old? Not at all. The probabilities certainly lean, one and all, to the assignment of an antiquity greater by many thousands of times than that which we have most idly supposed ourselves to extract from Scripture, which assuredly never meant to approach a question so profoundly irrelevant to the great purposes of Scripture as any geological speculation whatsoever. But this was not within the field of Kant's inquiry. What he wished to know was simply the exact stage in the whole course of her development which the Earth at present occupies. Is she still in her infancy, for example, or in a stage corresponding to middle age, or in a stage approaching to superannuation? The idea of Kant presupposed a certain average duration as belonging to a planet of our particular system; and supposing this known, or discoverable, and that a certain assignable development belonged to a planet so circumstanced as ours, then in what particular stage of that development may we, the tenants of this respectable little planet Tellus, reasonably be conceived to stand?

Man again, has a certain aeonian life; possibly ranging somewhere about the period of 70 years assigned in the Psalms. That is, in a state as highly improved as human infirmity and the errors of the earth herself, together with the diseases incident to our atmosphere, &c., could be supposed to allow, possibly the human race might average 70 years for each individual. This period would in that case represent the “aeon” of the individual Tellurian; but the “aeon” of the Tellurian RACE would probably amount to many millions of our earthly years; and it would remain an unfathomable mystery, deriving no light at all from the septuagenarian “aeon” of the individual; though between the two aeons I have no doubt that some secret link of connection does and must subsist, however undiscoverable by human sagacity.

The crow, the deer, the eagle, &c., are all supposed to be long-lived. Some people have fancied that in their normal state they tended to a period of two centuries. [I have heard the same normal duration ascribed to the tortoise, and one case became imperfectly known to myself personally. Somewhere I may have mentioned the case in print. These, at any rate, are the facts of the case: A lady (by birth a Cowper, of the whig family, and cousin to the poet Cowper; and, equally with him, related to Dr. Madan, Bishop of Peterborough), in the early part of this century, mentioned to me that, in the palace at Peterborough, she had for years known as a pet of the household a venerable tortoise, who bore some inscription on his shell indicating that, from 1638 to 1643, he had belonged to Archbishop Laud, who (if I am not mistaken) held the bishopric of Peterborough before he was translated to London, and finally to Canterbury.] I myself know nothing certain for or against this belief; but, supposing the case to be as it is represented, then this would be the aeonian period of these animals, considered as individuals. Among trees, in like manner, the oak, the cedar, the yew, are notoriously of very slow growth, and their aeonian period is unusually long as regards the individual. What may be the aeon of the whole species is utterly unknown. Amongst birds, one species at least has become extinct in our own generation: its aeon was accomplished. So of all the fossil species in zoology, which Palaeontology has revealed. Nothing, in short, throughout universal nature, can for a moment be conceived to have been resigned to accident for its normal aeon. All periods and dates of this order belong to the certainties of nature, but also, at the same time, to the mysteries of Providence. Throughout the Prophets, we are uniformly taught that nothing is more below the grandeur of Heaven than to assign earthly dates in fixing either the revolutions or the duration of great events such as prophecy would condescend to notice. A day has a prophetic meaning, but what sort of day? A mysterious expression for a time which has no resemblance to a natural day—sometimes comprehending long successions of centuries, and altering its meaning according to the object concerned. “A time,” and “times,” or “half a time”—“an aeon,” or “aeons of aeons”—and other variations of this prophetic language (so full of dreadful meaning, but also of doubt and perplexity), are all significant. The peculiar grandeur of such expressions lies partly in the dimness of the approximation to any attempt at settling their limits, and still more in this, that the conventional character, and consequent meanness of ordinary human dates, are abandoned in the celestial chronologies. Hours and days, or lunations and months, have no true or philosophic relation to the origin, or duration, or periods of return belonging to great events, or revolutionary agencies, or vast national crimes; but the normal period and duration of all acts whatever, the time of their emergence, of their agency, or their reagency, fall into harmony with the secret proportions of a heavenly scale, when they belong by mere necessity of their own internal constitution to the vital though hidden motions that are at work in their own life and manifestation. Under the old and ordinary view of the apocalyptic aeon, which supposed it always to mean the same period of time—mysterious, indeed, and uncertain, as regards our knowledge, but fixed and rigorously certain in the secret counsels of God—it was presumed that this period, if it lost its character of infinity when applied to evil, to criminality, or to punishment, must lose it by a corresponding necessity equally when applied to happiness and the golden aspects of hope. But, on the contrary, every object whatsoever, every mode of existence, has its own separate and independent aeon. The most thoughtless person must be satisfied, on reflection, even apart from the express commentary upon this idea furnished by the Apocalypse, that every life and mode of being must have hidden within itself the secret why of its duration. It is impossible to believe of any duration whatever that it is determined capriciously. Always it rests upon some ground, ancient as light and darkness, though undiscoverable by man. This only is discoverable, as a general tendency, that the aeon, or generic period of evil, is constantly towards a fugitive duration. The aeon, it is alleged, must always express the same idea, whatever that may be; if it is less than eternity for the evil cases, then it must be less for the good ones. Doubtless the idea of an aeon is in one sense always uniform, always the same, viz., as a tenth or a twelfth is always the same. Arithmetic could not exist if any caprice or variation affected these ideas—a tenth is always more than an eleventh, always less than a ninth. But this uniformity of ratio and proportion does not hinder but that a tenth may now represent a guinea, and next moment represent a thousand guineas. The exact amount of the duration expressed by an aeon depends altogether upon the particular subject which yields the aeon. It is, as I have said, a radix; and, like an algebraic square-root or cube-root, though governed by the most rigorous laws of limitation, it must vary in obedience to the nature of the particular subject whose radix it forms.

Reader, I take my leave. I have been too loitering. I know it, and will make such efforts in future to cultivate the sternest brevity as nervous distress will allow. Meanwhile, as the upshot of my speculation, accept these three propositions: —

A. That man (which is, in effect, every man hitherto) who allows himself to infer the eternity of evil from the counter eternity of good, builds upon the mistake of assigning a stationary and mechanic value to the idea of an aeon; whereas the very purpose of Scripture in using this word was to evade such a value. The word is always varying, for the very purpose of keeping it faithful to a spiritual identity. The period or duration of every object would be an essentially variable quantity, were it not mysteriously commensurate to the inner nature of that object as laid open to the eyes of God. And thus it happens, that every thing in this world, possibly without a solitary exception, has its own separate aeon: how many entities, so many aeons.

B. But if it be an excess of blindness which can overlook the aeonian differences amongst even neutral entities, much deeper is that blindness which overlooks the separate tendencies of things evil and things good.

Naturally, all evil is fugitive and allied to death.

C. I separately, speaking for myself only, profoundly believe that the Scriptures ascribe absolute and metaphysical eternity to one sole Being, viz., to God; and derivatively to all others according to the interest which they can plead in God's favour. Having anchorage in God, innumerable entities may possibly be admitted to a participation in divine aeon. But what interest in the favour of God can belong to falsehood, to malignity, to impurity? To invest them with aeonian privileges, is in effect, and by its results, to distrust and insult the Deity. Evil would not be evil, if it had that power of self-subsistence which is imputed to it in supposing its aeonian life to be co-eternal with that which crowns and glorifies the good. —From Hogg's Instructor.

WYCLIFF'S TESTAMENT.

Within fifty years after the completion of his holy work, a copy of Wycliff's Testament is said to have cost about $150 of our money. "Those who could not give money would give a load of hay for a few favourite chapters, and this in times when the possession of such a manuscript might very probably be the means of bringing the owner to the dungeon or the stake. They were forced to hide their treasure under the floors of their houses, and sit up all night, or retire to the lonely fields or woods, to hear and read without interruption the word of the Book of Life."—Martineau.

A VOICE FROM ST. HELENA ON THE EASTERN QUESTION.

Our attention has been drawn to some remarkable passages from conversations reported to have been held by Napoleon with Mr. O'Meara, in his "Voice from St. Helena."

We do not need to make any comment upon them. What we have been writing on this question from week to week, for the last six months, amounts to little more than an enlarged commentary on these extraordinary expressions of the ex-Emperor of France, which (bating some exaggerations natural to the speaker and the time) contain the exact rationale of the Eastern question as it stands at this moment.

The conversations took place in May 1817. On the 22nd of May, says O'Meara, after leaving the bath, Napoleon spoke about Russia, and said that the European nations would yet find that he (Napoleon) had adopted the best possible policy, at the time when he intended to re-establish the kingdom of Poland. This, he observed, would have been the only effectual means of stopping the increasing power of Russia. It was putting a barrier, a dyke, to that formidable empire, which it was likely would yet overwhelm Europe. “I do not think,” he added, “that I shall live to see it, but you may. You are in the flower of your age, and may expect to live thirty-five years longer. I think that you will see that the Russians will either invade and take India, or enter Europe with four hundred thousand Cossacks and other inhabitants of the desert, and two hundred thousand Russians. When Paul was so violent against you, he sent to me for a plan to invade India. I sent him one with instructions in detail.”

The conversation was resumed on the same day. “If,” pursued Napoleon, “Alexander succeeds in incorporating Poland with Russia—that is to say, in perfectly reconciling the Poles to the Russian Government, and not merely subduing the country—he has gained the greatest step towards subduing India. My opinion is that he will attempt either the one or the other of the projects I have mentioned, and I think the last to be the most probable.” Hereupon, Mr. O’Meara observed that the distance was great, and that the Russians had not the money necessary for such a grand undertaking. “The distance is nothing,” returned Napoleon. “Supplies can be easily carried upon camels, and the Cossacks will always insure a sufficiency of them. Money they will find when they arrive there. The hope of conquest would immediately unite armies of Cossacks and Calmucks without expense.”

On a subsequent day, the 27th of the same month, Napoleon again started the subject, and made use of the singular and most impressive statements which follow. They appear to us to approach as near to the truth and warnings of prophecy, as any political speculation we have ever known.

“In the course of a few years,” said Napoleon on this latter occasion, “Russia will have Constantinople, the greatest part of Turkey, and all Greece. This I hold to be as certain as if it had already taken place. Almost all the cajoling and flattery which Alexander practised towards me, was to gain my consent to effect this object. I would not consent, foreseeing that the equilibrium of Europe would be destroyed. In the natural course of things, in a few years Turkey must fall to Russia. The greatest part of her population are Greeks, who, you may say, are Russians. The powers it would injure, and who could oppose it, are England, France, Prussia, and Austria. Now, as to Austria, it will be very easy for Russia to engage her assistance, by giving her Servia and other provinces bordering upon the Austrian dominions, reaching near to Constantinople. THE ONLY

HYPOTHESIS ON WHICH FRANCE AND ENGLAND MAY EVER BE ALLIED WITH SINCERITY, WILL BE IN ORDER TO

PREVENT THIS. But even this alliance would not avail. France, England and Prussia united cannot prevent this. Russia and Austria can at any time effect it. Once mistress of Constantinople, Russia gets all the commerce of the Mediterranean, becomes a great naval power, and God knows what may happen,” &c.

The thirty-five years which Napoleon put as the limit to test his prophecy, expired in 1852; in 1853 the question is that which agitates Europe from end to end; and the nephew of Napoleon is on the throne of France. It is possible that if the exiled Emperor could have foreseen the resuscitation of his dynasty, he might have taken a more sanguine view of the possible results of that alliance with England which he thus so remarkably predicted. At any rate, here he speaks unmistakeably to us on the question so vital to the interests of Europe, and from his grave he dictates the policy which his nephew and successor can alone pursue with respect for his authority and name. —Examiner.

CONFESSIONS OF A JEW.

“How great was my surprise,” says a converted Jew in writing to a friend, “when I read those clear and striking descriptions of the prophet concerning the person, life, sufferings, death, and resurrection of the Messiah, which I had never seen or heard before! For, you well know that Isaiah fifty-third, Daniel ninth, and many other parts of the writings of the prophets, are not included in the Haphtorth, (that is, the portions selected to be read in the Synagogue,) nor are they read by many in private.”

“I now eagerly desired to know whether all that had been foretold by the prophets had been fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth. I therefore procured a copy of the New Testament, the first I ever touched; for you remember how often we were cautioned against it, and told that ‘to touch a New Testament was as defiling as to touch a swine.’ I read the gospels twice over. All was new and unheard of before. It is impossible to describe my astonishment in reading these writings. How different is the real character of Jesus from that blasphemous account of him called Tolduth Jeshu, which we were in the habit of reading every year on the evening before Christmas day. Truly he is the chief among ten thousand, and altogether lovely, and as the poet sung,

‘All human beauties, all divine,
In my beloved meet and shine;
His worth, if all the nations knew,
Sure the whole world would love him too.’

“I was equally surprised to find the most minute predictions fulfilled in Jesus. My judgment was soon convinced that he was the promised Messiah, and I began to rejoice in the hope of glory.”

If by the “most minute predictions” is meant “all that had been foretold by the prophets,” the writer is greatly mistaken; but if he mean that all predicted concerning the Messiah in the day of his mortality was most minutely fulfilled, he is perfectly correct. Much, very much, remains to be fulfilled of what the prophets have spoken concerning him. His work is yet before him; and therefore the indispensable necessity of his reappearance on earth, not in weakness, however, but in power and great glory. —EDITOR.

THE BIBLE.

“It is a remarkable fact, that the more self-conceited, worldly-minded, and wicked people are, the more they neglect, despise, and asperse the sacred Scriptures; and, on the contrary, the more humble and holy, the more they read, admire, and value them. What the Lord said of his disciples is equally true of the Bible. ‘If it were of the world, the world would love its own; but because it is not of the world, therefore the world hateth it.’ No book, however, has had as many friends. Vast numbers of wise and good men, through many generations and distant countries, have agreed in receiving the Bible as a divine revelation. Many of them have been notable for seriousness, erudition, penetration, and impartiality in their judgment of men and things; living and dying they have recommended it to all others, as the source of hope, wisdom, and consolation. ‘Reason itself,’ says a judicious writer, ‘dictates that nothing but the plainest matter of fact could induce so many thousands of persecuted and prejudiced Jews to embrace the humbling, self-denying doctrine of the cross, which they so much despised and abhorred. Nothing but the clearest evidence arising from undoubted truth, could make multitudes of lawless, luxurious heathens, receive, follow, and transmit to posterity, the doctrines and writings of the apostles; especially at a time when the vanity of their pretensions to miracles and the gift of tongues could be so easily discovered had they been impostors, and when the profession of Christianity exposed persons of all ranks to the greatest contempt and most imminent danger.’’—FREY.

TRUTH’S SIDE.

The truth creates “sides;” the for-it side, and the against-it side; and between these two sides there is no neutral ground. He that is not for me, saith Jesus, is against me; and he styled himself “the truth.” If we are for the truth, we cannot encamp with the enemy, and cooperate with them. Being for the truth, it will place us in the minority, and identify us with those who suffer tribulation for the truth’s sake. He that runs with the hare, but holds with the hounds, will never save the fugitive from being worried to death. There were men in the days of Jesus who would preach his doctrine, and not speak lightly of him, but would also carefully avoid identification with his unsavoury name. This is referable to the pride of life, love of popularity, or to some other equally unworthy thing. It is certainly a course not prompted by a devotion to the truth, or a love of righteousness. Moses acted not thus. He renounced the throne and treasures of Egypt for the society of enslaved brickmakers. Such a course evinces indecision of character which cannot be approved of the Lord when he appears. Skykingdomism is unscriptural and wholly false; and therefore subversive, wherever it prevails, of “the gospel of the kingdom of God,” which is wholly scriptural and only and altogether true. Though I respect skykingdomism, yet, if I identify myself, without a standing protest against it, I become by example an enemy of that which I believe is true. Let these hints be ingenuously considered by those who admit the right, but still the wrong pursue. —EDITOR.

THE LABOUR OF THE YEAR.

The editor of this periodical has been asked, “Why do you not give your readers some account of your journeyings to and fro, and labours in the gospel?”—to which he has replied, that these journeyings and labours have hitherto left him no leisure to narrate them. He has now, however, at length arrived at the hibernating point, beyond which they are not likely to extend—a point of time on his annual career, whence it becomes necessary diligently to “drive the quill,” until the sun shall enter Gemini, in order to lay up in store sufficient surplus manuscript to keep the printers at work upon the Herald during his “runnings to and fro,” to diffuse a knowledge of the truth among the people.

Since my removal to New York, I have had no leisure. From December till June, of this year, I discoursed some sixty times to congregations in this city, assembling at Chelsea Hall, and Convention Hall. On arriving here, I found some seven or eight meetings in a private house, for their own edification and comfort: but doing nothing in the way of “sounding out the Word of the Lord.” Not that they were devoid of the disposition to do so; but from various circumstances, Providence had not favoured them hitherto with the ability.

Our first number of this volume, p. 18, I have related how we endeavoured to interest the people of this great Nineveh in Israel’s Hope. In our third number, I had to report, that the liberty granted to the Gentiles was converted into licentiousness, in their coming not to ascertain the sense of Scripture, but to speechify their own nonsense. They seemed unable to discern that Chelsea Hall was not rented to afford scope for every one afflicted with the very troublesome phrenal affection, cacoethes loquendi, to vex and mortify the sober minded with the thinkings of their untutored minds; but for an inquiry, or search into the system of truth revealed of God in his holy writings, which they who occupied the Hall were prepared to testify and prove. “Be swift to hear, and slow to speak,” is an apostolic rule much to be respected. James exhorted his brethren to observe it, and advised them not to become “teachers” —didaskolos—because their condemnation would be the greater. How much more necessary is it in these times of ignorance that his counsel should be received! Foolish talking is one of the greatest hindrances to the truth in modern times. People who know little or nothing about it, are generally the most forward in delivering themselves concerning it. They rejoice in the sound of their own voices, and imagine all the time that they are rejoicing in the truth. They desire to be teachers, not perceiving that they have need “that one teach them what be the first principles of the oracles of God.” Such pretenders are not only troublesome, but injurious to the best of causes, which suffers more from injudicious and unenlightened advocates than from none. The apostle indeed says, “Despise not prophesyings,” and that “all may prophesy;” but then it is necessary that the things delivered be “prophesyings,” and the “all” be competent to do it. Prophesying is speaking scripturally to the edification, and exhortation, and comfort of scripturally discerning men. A man that cannot do this must be content to learn, and confine himself to the inquiry “What is truth?”

Having got rid of this obstacle, we proceeded in the work of “declaring the testimony of God” in the midst of difficulties unnecessarily created by misdirected zeal. Still several were added to the professed adherents of the gospel of the kingdom, and the church began to assume numerical respectability, amounting, I believe, to over thirty members. It was thought that removal to a more eligible hall would be expedient. The suggestion was adopted, and our meetings were forthwith transferred to Convention Hall. We commenced operations there in May, and for the information of the people issued a placard of which the following is a copy: —

REPUBLICANS HEAR YE!

AN ISRAELITISH KINGDOM,

Is to be established ere long in the

HOLY LAND;

That is, at the crisis of the overthrow of the now rising

RUSSO-ASSYRIAN EMPIRE:

And furthermore,

To this kingdom of the Twelve Tribes restored to Palestine there will be attached

DOMINION OVER ALL NATIONS,

Whose allegiance will then have been transferred from all

EXISTING GOVERNMENTS,

To the equitable and glorious sceptre of their invincible conqueror,

JESUS OF NAZARETH, THE KING OF THE JEWS.”

The things concerning this kingdom constitute the only gospel set forth in the Bible, and are expounded and testified out of the Scriptures for the information of ingenuous Jews and Gentiles, at Convention Hall, 175 Wooster Street.

Signed, JOHN THOMAS,

Author of Elpis Israel, and Editor of the Herald of the Kingdom and Age to Come.

We call this our “Manifest,” by which in few words is declared the platform upon which we take our stand. We have not yet made much use of it, though where it has been exposed to view it has attracted much attention. We have kept in abeyance, until my journeyings for the season shall have ceased, as its demonstration will of necessity principally devolve on me. In July it was republished and posted about the walls of Halifax, Nova Scotia, with a call suitable to the provincial subjects of a monarchy instead of “Republicans.” The placards were not allowed to remain up long, having been torn down with a zest peculiar to all “lewd fellows of the baser sort.” We do not post them on the walls in this City, but on boards which we expose by day and withdraw at night, at various convenient points.

About the first of June, I visited Rochester, N.Y. by special invitation of the friends there. The visit was to me agreeable and laborious, and I hope profitable to all. I had visited that city some seven years before, when the things spoken were as fables to the deaf. The gospel of the kingdom then found no response in the hearts of my hearers. But I am happy now in being able to report a marked and radical change in favour of the truth. “The things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ,” or “the truth as it is in Jesus,” command the faith, love, and zeal of all who look for the scriptural appearing of “Jehovah’s Servant” in power and great glory. The gospel of the kingdom has taken root among the “Adventists,” and will doubtless grow into a fruitful tree, affording assurance and peace to all among them, who may scripturally claim to be “taught of God.”

At the time of my visit, numerous friends of progress had convened from parts remote and near to confer on the interests of the truth, and to hear what I had to say on the sure prophetic Word. I discoursed on this all important subject twice seven times during my sojourn; for, as the report of the meetings has it in the Advent Harbinger for June 18th, “the time allotted to preaching was, by common consent, or rather desire, given to Dr. Thomas, several of the ministers having come to the conference for the purpose of hearing him on the Prophecies”—which conference, it adds, “as a whole was one of the best attended and most interesting we have enjoyed. Brethren were present from nine States, and from Canada West.”

I am unable to report what “good” was “done” by my visit. This cannot be ascertained till the resurrection of those who sleep in Christ. Four individuals, intelligent in the gospel of the kingdom, became obedient to the faith, in being immersed. The hearts of all I conversed with—among whom I may mention those candid and earnest friends of truth and liberty of speech upon all, Bible questions, Bro. Marsh, the Editor of the Advent Harbinger, and Bro. J. B. Cook, who takes care of the flock in their city—were enlarged and strengthened in the assurance of the hope. I am not aware of any theoretical difference between Bro. Marsh and myself. We believe that a sinner is justified from all past sins by the one faith, which embraces “the things of the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ;” and I think he also believes, that this justification is communicated to such a believer, through the name of Jesus, at the instant of his being united to that name by immersion; and that consequently, if a sinner shall not have been the subject of the “one faith,” which infolds within it the “one hope of the calling,” previous to immersion, the immersion is “no better than a Jewish ablution,” as my friend Campbell has it, because the said sinner had not the true justifying faith as defined by Paul. If I have not accurately stated this matter he will no doubt put me right. I do not know if he would admit all the consequences which flow from this accord. The application of a principle is always a delicate affair. But that he will admit whatsoever can be proved to be the mind of God as expressed in the Word, I have no doubt. This I am satisfied is true also of my worthy friend J. B. Cook, although I have not been able to convince him that the Devil and Satan of Scripture are not the Devil of Gentile theology; and that a pre-immersional belief of “the exceeding great and precious promises,” the facts concerning Jesus, and the doctrinal mystery of those facts, is indispensably necessary to a sinner’s justification unto life. He is the intelligent advocate of the “one faith” and “one hope of the calling” now; but upon the supposition of his having attained to the understanding of them since his immersion among John’s disciples, * will his post immersional belief of the truth concerning the kingdom of God, and name of Jesus convert John’s baptism into that administered by Paul? I have not been able to convince him that it will not. Of this, however, I am satisfied, that if he come to the perception of the reality, whatever it may be, he will not only accept it, but do it with all his heart.

* The Baptists who denominate themselves after John the Baptist: and who are immersed because Jesus was immersed of John in Jordan: hence the saying, “baptised to follow Christ”—as if one could follow Christ without believing “the Gospel of the Kingdom of God,” which he preached! —Editor Herald.

Shortly after my visit to Rochester, I set out for Halifax, Nova Scotia, where I arrived the first week in July, and experienced a cordial welcome from the friends I had acquired in the gospel. My coming had been duly advertised and placarded, to the annoyance somewhat of certain of the leaders of the people, who exerted their influence to prevent the goats from straying from their folds. In this effort they were doubtless successful to some extent; for the assemblies were not so large as at my former visit. The Temperance Hall was taken as before, and occupied for three weeks, which, I think included four Lord's days. I lectured four nights in the first week, and three nights in each of the other two, besides twice on Sundays, being in all about eighteen discourses. On Lord's days the congregations were considerable; and though much smaller in the week, all were attentive, and apparently composed of persons interested in the subjects treated of, and desirous to understand. The Prophecies expounded proved attractive to several of the superior and non-commissioned Officers of the Army and Navy on the station, and in garrison there. They originated interesting debates among the Sappers, a class of soldiers engaged upon the fortifications of the citadel. Some thought we could know nothing about the future; others believed we could: others again were surprised that the clergy never told them any thing about the things I had shown were revealed in the Bible. More of the soldiery would have attended if I could have commenced at seven o'clock instead of half past eight, as they could not be out of their quarters after nine without special leave. I regretted I could not oblige them; for if we had appointed the hour to accommodate the military, we should have inconvenienced the citizens, who were the majority, and could not leave their stores at an earlier hour.

Voices issuing from certain pulpits, advised the people not to go to the Hall. One divine said, he had read Elpis Israel, and that it was full of blasphemy and infidelity. Another of the same spiritual order on hearing this, remarked in private, that he had read the work, and that there was put little he could not say Amen to; and that the book contained neither infidelity nor blasphemy. Here were two divines "called and sent of God," and "set for the defence of the gospel," who could not agree upon what constituted infidelity and blasphemy! Surely in such a case

Disciples may go free;"

This was the conclusion of some, who, following the bent of their own minds, thought it best to go and judge for themselves.

Some, who could not gainsay what was spoken, tried to close the peoples' ears by saying that the lectures were just a money-making scheme. "The Church Times," the National Church organ in that region, was particularly desirous of making this impression before my arrival. It was stated in the advertisement of our meetings that on the week nights four pence admission would be charged to pay the rent of the hall, "&c." The editor of The Times expounded the "et cetera" as meaning "something for the doctor himself." In consequence of this effort to depreciate the disinterestedness of our motives in calling the attention of the people to the signs of the times as indicating the near approach of the kingdom of God, I was requested to make a statement of the facts in the case. This I did at the conclusion of my last address, and stated from a memorandum furnished me, that enough had not been received to pay the rent of the hall by £2, 16s. 2d. It was evident from this that the "something" for myself could not be very enriching. The fact was that to the time of this statement, I knew not if any thing would be forthcoming as a compensation for the time and labour expended for their instruction and edification. When invited to a place to expound the kingdom of God and the things pertaining to it, all I stipulated for was that my travelling expenses should be paid, leaving it to the conscience of my friends, and their appreciation of the things set before them, to supply the necessities of my dependants at home, on the principle that the ox should not be muzzled that treadeth out the corn. The editor of "the Church Times" being present, I remarked, for his especial consideration, that the clergy of the Established Church were the last in "Christendom" that ought to object to a man reaping some compensation for his endeavours to enlighten the public mind. The dignitaries and pluralists of "the Church" would do nothing for the instruction of the people unless they were first assured of ample payment for their services. The Archbishop of Canterbury and Bishop of London, with all the hierarchs of their church, received thousands of pounds sterling per annum for reading stereotyped old print, with pomp and pageantry of state. Would any of them in Britain or the provinces come to New York as I had come to Halifax, and for a month nearly without fee or reward, spend and be spent for the public good? Not they! No pay with them, no preach! Yet such are they who impute mercenary motives to one, who has been teaching the people with a deficit before him of £2 16s 2d for rent incurred for the accommodation of the public. It certainly behoves them to pull the beam out of their own eyes ere they presume to extract the mote out of mine!

My labour in Halifax was apparently not in vain. Sixteen applied for immersion. Five had been members of Dr. Crawley's church, which belongs to the Baptist denomination. They could not exist longer on Acadian theology; and therefore died to the system, were buried, and rose to gospel life. Others had been immersed upon a Millerite foundation, and others not at all. One gentleman, a medical practitioner, came nearly two hundred miles to be baptised. The Bible, with the aid of Elpis Israel and the Herald, humbled him to the obedience of the faith. More might have been immersed, but upon examination they were advised to wait until, by a diligent study of the Scriptures, they had obtained a more satisfactory understanding of the word. The immersions were administered at Melville Island, a rural and beautiful spot at the head of the North Arm, upon which is situated the old French prison, well furnished with guests during the war. The use of this was obtained for us of the admiral by a sympathising friend and member of the Baptist Church. Our proceedings attracted the attention of certain relatives of the archdeacon, who became spectators of the baptising from their boats. They seemed to enjoy themselves very much at our expense. My back was towards them, so that I did not observe their folly. It is well I did not, or I might have been tempted to silence them by contrasting the expressiveness of an intelligent believer's immersion with the unmeaning and impious ceremony of baby-sprinkling. How perverse, and how hostile is human nature, though animated by the blood of an archdeacon, to the institutions of God! A conclave of hierarchs and nobles can encompass an archbishop, and with grave and solemn faces behold him sprinkle a puling scion of royalty without intelligence or faith in the name of the Holy Ones, and call it Christian baptism; but behold with scoffs and jeers the immersion of an intelligent believer into the name of the Lord Jesus.

I left Halifax early in August en route for this city by way of Annapolis, St. John's, Portland, and Boston. A dense fog oppressed us all the way from St. John's to Portland, Me. On diverging from the Bay of Fundy into Passamaquoddy Bay we got into bright sunshine for a short time; but on leaving Eastport, and passing the Bell Rock, we again drove into the fog, and saw no more of land till within about two boat' length of Richmond island, some twelve miles out of our course, about six o'clock in the morning. If it had been dark we should have certainly struck upon the rocks; for though we blew our steam whistle with the shrillest blast, no light-house bell sounded the bearings of our position. From Digby, at the mouth of the Annapolis river, to St. John's is forty miles across the Bay of Fundy. The outlet from the river is by Digby Gap, through which the tide flows with great rapidity and power. I found it very cold in crossing the bay, though early in August, when people were dying of heat in New York. I was detained a night at Annapolis, and at St. John's two nights, and a Lord's day. Knowing no one here, I was unemployed, except in making myself acquainted with the topography of the city and adjacent country. The suspension bridge across the St. John's river well deserves inspection. The gorge it spans is the fissure through which the river rushes into the harbour, and not being sufficiently wide the tide is backed up, and makes a fall. This is a great place for lumber and ship-building, and seems to be, upon the whole, a flourishing port. The climate is very changeable, and in winter very cold; and no place for one who has passed some dozen years of his existence under a southern sun.

Shortly after my return from Halifax, I visited Worcester, Mass., where I remained about a week lecturing in Warren Hall. Though a convenient room it has acquired an indifferent reputation religiously, because of the notions which find currency there. Some teach that the millennium is passed already; others, that Christ is coming in 1854; and I know not what else beside. Unhappy will it be for the timists if such be the case; for they are manifestly unprepared. If a man would be blessed, he must not only watch, but keep his garments if he have any; and if not, buy of Christ raiment that he may be clothed. Darkness reigns in Worcester. I did what I could in eight lectures to shine away a little of it. How far I may have succeeded time only can reveal. Some seemed to give heed to the things submitted to them, while others stiffened their necks against them. The past-millennialists are of this class, a stiff-necked and sceptical generation. I never met with persons claiming to be Christians who seem to have less reverence for God's testimony than those in Worcester; and should I ever visit this place again I shall seek some other place of utterance than Warren Hall, illustrated as it is by the intense foolishness of the carnal mind. There are a few names, however, in this Sardis, who believe the gospel of the kingdom and age to come. I had the pleasure of immersing three, upon whom rests the responsibility of contending for the faith, and defending it against the traditions of men.

On my return from Worcester, I directed my course to Virginia. I arrived there on the 9th of September, and remained in the State till October 11. In this interval I visited Lunenburg, King William, King and Queen, Charlottesville, Temperance in Louisa, and Webster's in Goochland. There appears to be an increasing interest in the gospel of the kingdom in these parts, owing, I think, to "the Eastern Question," concerning which I have written much in former years, and which is now coming out as I have been showing the prophets foretold it would. Finding this, people, where the Herald and Elpis Israel circulate, are beginning to think that the gospel I have delineated may have more claims upon their consideration than in former days they were willing to admit. Brother A. B. Magruder who preceded me in King William and King and Queen Counties, was much encouraged. The attendance on his appointments was good, and the attention earnest. He had also the pleasure of immersing six who had long assented to the theory of the truth, but had not obeyed it. Besides these, were two others, one of whom was a reformer, and the other previously a non-professor.

In Lunenburg the people turned out well, and some three or four were baptised. At Cool Spring two meetings were held in the week, which would have been respectable even for Sunday. I spoke at Liberty, Prince Edward, on my way to Richmond, in the week. The house was full, and no audience could pay profounder attention. It is to be hoped that what they heard will turn them from the fables preached to them in ordinary to the truth. Let them search the scriptures, and compare all things with their testimony. This meeting was on Wednesday. On Sunday following I spoke at Acquinton, and on Tuesday following at brother Norman's Meeting House, in King and Queen. The attendance here was small. His neighbours judged themselves unworthy of his anxiety for their spiritual welfare, and of our trouble in journeying twenty five miles to teach them.

At Charlottesville, I spoke three times on Lord's Day, and by accident, as it were, addressed the episcopal congregation of the town. Their Church being under repair, they had expected their clergyman, Bishop Mead's son, to read prayers with them at the Town Hall, as on previous Sundays. But we had engaged the Hall for that day, of which they were not aware. They came, but found me there expounding the Scriptures, instead of Mr. Mead. They remained, and would have had more use for Bibles than for printed prayers, if they had brought them. But the bringing of God's Word "to Church" is a custom but little honoured by the observance of the professors of the day.

Having filled my appointments at Free Union and Mount harmony, in Albemarle, I went to Louisa, and thence to Webster's. It being uncertain whether I should be at Temperance on Saturday, my audience did not exceed a dozen persons. Next day, the house was full. At Webster's it was doubtful if admission could be obtained by fair means. The house is a free one, and has been plastered and repaired by public subscription. Two ancients of the weaker sex, belonging to John's disciples, busied themselves somewhat in raising the money, a work which they imagined gave them some sort of control over the house, to let in and to keep out all whom they in their wisdom deemed to be fit or not to stand on the platform sanctified by the feet of their Mr. Smith. Being a heretic in their esteem, they had decreed that Dr. Thomas should not preach in their house. They spoke thus valiantly because they had "the power of the keys." But, the house being free, they were given to understand that it would be entered key or no key; for the people were determined to hear me. They very prudently left the door open, so that we had nothing to do but to walk in. The audience was more considerable than I expected. They listened very attentively, which is all that I can say; and after two hours' discourse I dismissed them, and departed.

I was told that the canal packet from Lynchburg to Richmond was to pass by Dover Mills about 1 A.M. on Tuesday morning. Thither I went to meet it, and arrived at the mill about midnight. I sat about an hour in the barouche with the cushions on my knees and around me to keep me warm. No packet came, and the caloric of my body was fast radiating to the freezing point. I left my retreat, and joined company with three Negroes, who were kindling a fire on the canal bank. With blocks of gypsum for seats, we hovered over the blaze, cold as frost behind, and smoked and scorched before, waiting for morning or the packet. Morning came, but not the packet. The Negroes slept over the fire more soundly than I am wont to do in bed. They swung in all directions over the blaze, which would sometimes awake their fingers to consciousness, but not their brains. Sleep refused to embrace me with the rest. Keeping up the fire, watching the East, and peering into the darkness for the packet, was the business of this weary and uncomfortable bivouac on the bank of the James River Canal. At length Aurora, daughter of the morn, began to appear, and the dying embers of our fire to return to dust. We had been labouring under a mistake. The packet did not run on Monday night; so on Tuesday morning I returned to the friend's house I had left over night, and found him putting on his harness for the business of the day. Having warmed myself thoroughly by a blazing wood fire, I went to bed, and slept soundly for three hours. Breakfasted at 9 A.M., and departed for Richmond by buggy at 11. Arrived there about 4 P.M. Started by train at 9 P.M., and arrived at brother Lemmon's, in Baltimore, by 8 next morning.

Anxious to afford his fellow-citizens an opportunity of hearing something of the gospel of the kingdom, in connexion with the prophetic solution of the all-absorbing question of the East, brother Lemmon had hired the Masonic Hall for two week night lectures, and two on Lord's Day. We were by no means sanguine, but certainly anticipated more than we realised on Thursday and Friday nights, or the Masonic Hall would not have been taken for more days than Sunday. The lectures were advertised in the papers, which brought out not more than seven, besides other seven made up from brother L's family circle and myself. If the audience were not large, however, it was, certainly, intelligent. This was an important offset to the large hall and empty benches, and encouraged me to begin and to continue to the end of the subjects advertised, which were: "The Constitution of the World for a Thousand Years to Come;" and "The Rise, Mission, and Destiny of Mohammedanism Scripturally set forth."

But great ends have generally small beginnings. Advertising in the crowded columns of newspapers in such cities as Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, is of very little use. They must be placarded if the attention of the people is to be gained. We found that something more must be done if the lectures on Sunday were to be better attended than the others. Fortunately brother Lemmon had one of my New York manifestoes, about three feet by two, of which a copy is before the reader. This was tacked on to a board, and placed in front of the Masonic Hall during Saturday. The effect was remarkable. Our expectations were small; our disappointment, therefore, most agreeable. When we arrived on Sunday morning the Hall was nearly full; and at night the assembly was larger still. The attention paid was most gratifying; and encouraged us in the belief, or rather hope, that the Lord may yet have some people to be made manifest by the gospel of his kingdom in this city. At present, like the Great King himself when preaching it, it has no place of rest in Baltimore—no doors open for its utterance—not unlocked by a golden key. Twenty five dollars opened the Masonic Hall; but unbelief closes all other places. Thus it is for the present, and perhaps will so continue to be, until the King shall come in his glory to subdue all things to himself. It is our duty, however, to persevere, and to deserve success, though we may prove unable to command it.

Such have been the labours of the year now nearly closed. Beside writing the Herald, I have spoken about 130 times, and travelled about 3,000 miles. This has been my individual contribution in the interest of the gospel of the kingdom—a small deposit laid up in Heaven for the Age to Come. Twenty seven have yielded obedience to the truth in baptism on the occasions presented. Besides these, brethren Magruder and Anderson have immersed some twelve or fifteen; and believers have multiplied in this city from seven or eight to upwards of thirty. How many of all these will attain to the inheritance none can tell but God. The reward is His; the labour to obtain it with fear and trembling, ours. The Herald is slowly, but surely I trust, upon the increase. Three years ago there were no subscribers to it in Britain and its Provinces; there are now about a hundred. It has not experienced the same increase here; but is, nevertheless, indebted to the liberality of several brethren, the amount of whose subscriptions has appeared in our "Receipts," for the ability of its Editor to carry it on without falling into arrears. It is believed, I am happy to find, that the matter of its columns is worth the price, and that I have fully and fairly redeemed all I have undertaken to do.

As to Elpis Israel, the English edition is exhausted within a dozen copies or so; and of the American not more than about 180 remain unsold. It has made itself felt, and will, no doubt, yield a product which will appear to the honour and glory of God. Have all who believe thus far done the best they are able to do? If not, let them settle the account with God and their own consciences. I judge no man. Let us all do our best; and whatever profit we may have been to one another, let us remember, that after we have done all, to God we are but "unprofitable servants." EDITOR.

ON THE SUPPOSED SCRIPTURAL EXPRESSION FOR ETERNITY.

BY THOMAS DE QUINCEY.

Forty years ago (or, in all probability, a good deal more, for we have already completed thirty-seven years from Waterloo, and my remembrances upon this subject go back to a period lying much behind that great era), I used to be annoyed and irritated by the false interpretation given to the Greek word aion, and given necessarily, therefore, to the adjective aionios as its immediate derivative. It was not so much the falsehood of this interpretation, as the narrowness of that falsehood, which disturbed me. There was a glimmer of truth in it; and precisely that glimmer it was which led the way to a general and obstinate misconception of the meaning. The word is remarkably situated. It is a scriptural word, and it is also a Greek word; from which the inevitable inference is, that we must look for it only in the New Testament. Upon any question arising of deep, aboriginal, doctrinal truth we have nothing to do with translations. Those are but secondary questions, archaeological and critical, upon which we have a right to consult the Greek translation of the Hebrew Scriptures known by the name of the Septuagint.

Suffer me to pause at this point for the sake of premising an explanation needful to the unlearned reader. As the reading public and the thinking public is every year out-growing more and more notoriously the mere learned public, it becomes every year more and more the right of the former public to give the law preferably to the latter public upon all points which concern its own separate interests. In past generations, no pains were taken to make explanations that were not called for by the learned public. All other readers were ignored. They formed a mob, for whom no provision was made. And that many difficulties should be left entirely unexplained for them, was superciliously assumed to be no fault at all. And yet any sensible man, let him be as supercilious as he may, must, on consideration, allow that among the crowd of unlearned or half learned readers, who have had neither time nor opportunities for what is called “erudition” or learned studies, there must always lurk a proportion of men that, by constitution of mind, and by the bounty of nature, are much better fitted for thinking, originally more philosophic, and are more capaciously endowed, than those who are, by accident of position, more learned. Such a natural superiority certainly takes precedence of a merely artificial superiority; and, therefore, it entitles those who possess it to a special consideration. Let there be an audience gathered about any book of 10,100 readers: it might be fair in these days to assume that 10,000 would be in a partial sense illiterate, and the remaining 100 what would be rigorously classed as “learned.” Now, on such a distribution of the readers, it would be a matter of certainty that the most powerful intellects would lie amongst the illiterate 10,000, counting, probably, to 15 to 1 as against those in the learned minority. The inference, therefore, would be, that, in all equity, the interest of the unlearned section claimed a priority of attention, not merely as the more numerous section, but also as, by a high probability, the more philosophic. And in proportion as this unlearned section widens and expands, which every year it does, in that proportion the obligation and cogency of this equity strengthens. An attention to the unlearned part of an audience, which 15 years ago might have rested upon pure courtesy, now rests upon a basis of absolute justice. I make this preliminary explanation, in order to take away the appearance of caprice from such occasional pauses as I may make for the purpose of clearing of obscurities or difficulties. Formerly, in a case of that nature, the learned reader would have told me that I was not entitled to delay him by elucidations that in his case must be supposed to be superfluous: and in such a remonstrance there would once have been some equity. The illiterate section of the readers might then be fairly assumed as present only by accident; as no abiding part of the audience; but, like the general public in the gallery of the House of Commons, as present only by sufferance; and officialty in any records of the house whatever utterly ignored as existences. At present, half-way on our pilgrimage through the nineteenth century, I reply to such a learned remonstrant—that it gives me pain to annoy him by superfluous explanations, but that, unhappily, this infliction of tedium upon him is inseparable from what has now become a duty to others.

This being said, I now go on to inform the illiterate reader, that the earliest translation of the Hebrew Scriptures ever made was into Greek. It was undertaken on the encouragement of a learned prince Ptolemy Philadelphus, by an association of Jewish emigrants in Alexandria. It was, as the event has shown in very many instances, an advantage of a rank rising to providential, that such a cosmopolitan version of the Hebrew sacred writings should have been made at a moment when a rare occurrence of circumstances happened to make it possible; such as, for example, a king both learned in his tastes and liberal in his principles of religious toleration; a language viz., the Greek, which had already become, what for many centuries it continued to be, a common language of communication for the learned of the whole (i.e., in effect of the civilised world, viz., Greece, the shores of the Euxine, the whole of Asia Minor, Syria, Egypt, Carthage, and all the dependencies of Carthage, finally, and above all, Rome, then beginning to loom upon the western horizon), together with all the dependencies of Rome, and briefly, every state and city that adorned the imperial islands of the Mediterranean, or that glittered like gems in that vast belt of land, roundly speaking 1,000 miles in average breadth, and in circuit running up to 5,000 miles. 1,000 multiplied into 5 times 1,000, or, otherwise expressed, a thousand thousand 5 times repeated, or, otherwise a million 5 times repeated, briefly, a territory measuring 5,000,000 of square miles, or 45 times the surface of our two British islands—such was the boundless domain which this extraordinary act of Ptolemy suddenly threw open to the literature and spiritual revelation of a little obscure race, nestling in a little angle of Asia, scarcely visible as a fraction of Syria, buried in the broad shadows thrown out on one side by the great and ancient settlements on the Nile, and on the other by the vast empire that for thousands of years occupied the Tigris and the Euphrates. In the twinkling of an eye, at a sudden summons, as it were from the sounding of a trumpet, or the oriental call by the clapping of hands, gates are thrown open, which have an effect that would arise from the opening of a ship canal across the Isthmus of Darien, viz., the introduction to each other—face to face of two separate infinities. Such a canal would suddenly lay open to each other the two great oceans of our planet, the Atlantic and the Pacific; whilst the act of translating into Greek and from Hebrew, that is, transferring out of a mysterious cipher as little accessible as Sanscrit, and which never would be more accessible through any worldly attractions of alliance with power and civic grandeur or commerce, out of this darkness into the golden light of a language the most beautiful, the most honoured amongst men, and the most widely diffused through a thousand years to come, had the immeasurable effect of throwing into the great crucible of human speculation, even then beginning to ferment, to boil, to overflow—that mightiest of all elements for exalting the chemistry of philosophy—grand and, for the first time, adequate conceptions of the Deity. For, although it is true that, until Elias should come—that is, until Christianity should have applied its final revelation to the completion of this great idea—we could not possess it in its total effulgence, it is, however, certain that an immense advance was made, a prodigious usurpation across the realms of chaos, by the grand illuminations of the Hebrew discoveries. Too terrifically austere, we must presume the Hebrew idea to have been; too undeniably it had not withdrawn the veil entirely which still rested upon the Divine countenance; so much is involved in the subsequent revelations of Christianity. But still the advance made in reading aright the divine lineaments had been enormous. God was now a holy spirit that could not tolerate impurity. He was the fountain of justice, and no longer disfigured by any mode of sympathy with human caprice or infirmity. And, if a frown too awful still rested upon his face, making the approach to him too fearful for harmonising with that perfect freedom and that child-like love which God seeks in his worshippers, it was yet made evident that no step for conciliating his favour did or could lie through any but moral graces.

Three centuries after this great epoch of the publication (for such it was) secured so providentially to the Hebrew theology, two learned Jews—viz., Josephus and Philo Judaeus—had occasion to seek a cosmopolitan utterance for that burden of truth (or what they regarded as truth) which oppressed the spirit within them. Once again they found a deliverance from the very same freezing imprisonment in an unknown language, through the very same magical key, viz.—the all pervading language of Greece, which carried their communications to the four winds of heaven, and carried them precisely amongst the class of men, viz.—the enlightened and educated class—which pre-eminently, if not exclusively, their wish was to reach. About one generation after Christ it was, when the utter prostration, and, politically speaking, the destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish nation, threw these two learned Jews upon this recourse to the Greek language as their final resource, in a condition otherwise of absolute hopelessness. Pretty nearly three centuries before Christ it was (284 years, according to the common reckoning), when the first act of communication took place between the sealed-up literature of Palestine and the Greek catholic interpretation. Altogether, we may say that 320 years, or somewhere about ten generations of men, divided these memorable two acts of intercommunication. Such a space of time allows a large range of influence, and of silent, unconscious peration to the vast and potent ideas that brooded over this awful Hebrew literature. Too little weight has been allowed to the probable contagiousness, and to the preternatural shock, of such a new and strange philosophy, acting upon the jaded and exhausted intellect of the Grecian race. We must remember, that precisely this particular range of time was that in which the Greek systems of philosophy, having thoroughly completed their evolution, had suffered something of a collapse; and, having exhausted their creative energies, began to gratify the cravings for novelty by remodellings of old forms. It is remarkable, indeed, that this very city of Alexandria founded and matured this new principle of remodelling applied to poetry not less than to philosophy and criticism. And, considering the activity of this great commercial city and port, which was meant to act, and did act, as a centre of communication between the East and the West, it is probable that a far greater effect was produced by the Greek translation of the Jewish Scriptures, in the way of preparing the mind of nations for the apprehension of Christianity, than has ever been distinctly recognised. The silent destruction of books in those centuries has robbed us of all means for tracing innumerable revolutions, that nevertheless, by the evidence of results, must have existed. Taken, however, with or without this additional result the translation of the Hebrew Scriptures in their most important portions must be ranked amongst what are called “providential” events. Such a king—a king whose father had been a personal friend of Alexander, the mighty civilising conqueror, and had shared in the liberalisation connected with his vast revolutionary projects for extending a higher civilisation over the globe, such a king, conversing with such a language, having advantages so absolutely unrivalled, and again this king and this language concurring with such a treasure, so supernatural of spiritual wisdom, as the subject of their ministrations, and all three concurring with political events so auspicious—the founding of a new and mighty metropolis in Egypt, and the silent advance to supreme power amongst men of a new empire, martial beyond all precedent as regarded means, but not as regarded ends working in all things towards the unity of civilisation and the unity of law, so that any new impulse, as, for instance, impulse of a new religion, was destined to find new facilities for its own propagation, resembling electric conductors, under the unity of government and of law—concurrences like these, so many and so strange, justly impress upon this translation, the most memorable, because the most influential of all that have ever been accomplished, a character of grandeur that place it on the same level of interest as the building of the first or second temple at Jerusalem.

There is a Greek legend which openly ascribes to this translation all the characters of a miracle. But as usually happens, this vulgarising form of the miraculous is far less impressive than the plain history itself, unfolding its stages with the most unpretending historical fidelity. Even the Greek language, on which, as the natural language of the new Greek dynasty in Egypt, the duty of the translation devolved enjoyed a double advantage; 1st, as being the only language then spoken upon earth that could diffuse a book over every part of the civilised earth: 2^{dly}, as being a language of unparalleled power and compass for expressing and reproducing effectually all ideas, however alien and novel. Even the city, again, in which this translation was accomplished, had a double dowry of advantages towards such a labour, not only as enjoying a large literary society, and, in particular, a large Jewish society, together with unusual provision in the shape of libraries, on a scale probably at that time unprecedented, but also as having the most extensive machinery then known to human experience for publishing, that is, for transmitting to foreign capitals, all books in the readiest and the cheapest fashion, by means of its prodigious shipping.

Having thus indicated to the unlearned reader the particular nature of that interest which invests this earliest translation of the Hebrew Scriptures, viz., that in fact this translation was the earliest publication to the human race of a revelation which had previously been locked up in a language destined, as surely as the Welsh language or the Gaelic, to eternal obscurity amongst men, I go on to mention that the learned Jews selected for this weighty labour happened to be in number seventy-two; but, as the Jews systematically reject fractions in such cases (whence it is that always, in order to express the period of six weeks, they say forty days, and not, as strictly they should, forty-two days), popularly, the translators were called “the seventy,” for which the Latin word is septuaginta. And thus, in after ages, the translators were usually indicated as “The LXX,” or, if the work and not the workmen should be noticed, it was cited as The Septuagint. In fact, this earliest of scriptural versions, viz., into Greek, is by much the most famous; or, if any other approaches it in notoriety, it is the Latin translation by St. Jerome, which, in this one point, enjoys even a superior importance, that in the Church of Rome is the authorised translation. Evidently, in every church, it must be a matter of primary importance to assign the particular version to which that church appeals, and by which, in any controversy arising, that church consents to be governed. Now, the Jerome version fulfils this function for the Romish Church; and according, in the sense of being published (vulgata), or publicly authorised by that church, it is commonly called The Vulgate.

But, in a large polemic question, unless, like the Romish Church, we uphold a secondary inspiration as having secured a special privileged translation from the possibility of error, we cannot refuse an appeal to the Hebrew text for the Old Testament, or to the Greek text for the New. The word aeonios, as purely Grecian, could not connect itself with the Old Testament, unless it were through the Septuagint translation into Greek. Now, with that version, in any case of controversy, none of us, Protestants alike or Roman Catholics, have any thing whatever to do. Controversially, we can be concerned only with the original language of the Scriptures, with its actual verbal expressions textually produced. To be liable, therefore, to such a textual citation, any Greek word must belong to the New Testament; because, though the word might happen to occur in the Septuagint, yet since that is merely a translation, for any of us who occupy a controversial place, that is, who are bound by the responsibilities, or who claim the strict privileges of controversy, the Septuagint has no virtual existence. We should not be at liberty to allege the Septuagint as any authority, if it happened to countenance our own views; and, consequently, we could not be called on to recognise the Septuagint in any case where it should happen to be against us. I make this preliminary caveat, as not caring whether the word aeonios does or does not occur in the Septuagint. Either way, the reader understands that I disown the authority of that version as in any degree affecting myself. The word which, forty years ago, moved my disgust by its servile misinterpretation, was a word proper to the New Testament; and any sense which it may have received from an Alexandrian Jew in the third century before Christ, is no more relevant to any criticism that I am now going to suggest, than is the classical use of the word aeon familiar to the learned in Sophocles or Euripides.

The reason which gives to this word aeonian what I do not scruple to call a dreadful importance, is the same reason, and no other, which prompted the dishonesty concerned in the ordinary interpretation of this word. The word happened to connect itself—but that was no practical concern of mine; me it had not biased in the one direction, nor should it have biased any just critic in the counter direction—happened, I say, to connect itself with the ancient dispute upon the duration of future punishments. What was meant by the aeonian punishments in the next world? Was the proper sense of the word eternal, or was it not? I, for my part, meddled not, nor upon any consideration could have been tempted to meddle, with a speculation repellent alike by the horror and by the hopeless mystery which invest it. Secrets of the prison-house, so afflicting to contemplate steadily, and so hopeless of solution, there could be no proper motive for investigating, unless the investigation promised a great deal more than it could ever accomplish; and my own feeling as to all such problems is, that they vulgarise what, left to itself, would take its natural station amongst the freezing horrors that Shakespeare dismisses with so potent an expression of awe, in a well known scene of “Measure for Measure.” I reiterate my protest against being in any way decoyed into the controversy. Perhaps I may have a strong opinion upon the subject. But, anticipating the coarse discussions into which the slightest entertainment of such a question would be every moment approaching, once for all, out of reverential regard for the dignity of human nature, I beg permission to decline the controversy altogether.

But does this declination involve any countenance to a certain argument which I began by rejecting as abominable? Most certainly not. That argument runs thus—that the ordinary construction of the term aeonian, as equivalent to everlasting, could not possibly be given up when associated with penal misery, because, in that case, and by the very same act, the idea of eternity must be abandoned as applicable to the counter-bliss of Paradise. Torment and blessedness, it was argued, punishment and beatification, stood upon the same level; the same word it was, the word aeonian, which qualified the duration of either; and, if eternity in the most rigorous acceptation fell away from the one idea, it must equally fall away from the other. Well, be it so; but that would not settle the question. It might be very painful to renounce a long-cherished anticipation; but the necessity of doing so could not be received as a sufficient reason for adhering to the old unconditional use of the word aeonian. The argument is—that we must retain the old sense of eternal, because else we lose upon one scale what we had gained upon the other. But what then would be the reasonable man’s retort? We are not to accept or to reject a new construction (if otherwise the more colourable) of the word aeonian, simply because the consequences might seem such as upon the whole to displease us. We may gain nothing; for by the new interpretation our loss may balance our gain; and we may prefer the old arrangement. But how monstrous is all this! We are not summoned as to a choice of two different arrangements that may suit different tastes, but to a grave question as to what is the sense and operation of the word aeonian. Let the limitation of the word disturb our previous estimate of Paradise; grant that it so disturbs that estimate; not the less all such consequences leave the dispute exactly where it was; and if a balance of reason can be found for limiting the extent of the word aeonian, it will not be less true because it may happen to disturb a crotchet of our own.

Meantime, all this speculation, first and last, is pure nonsense. Aeonian does not mean eternal; neither does it mean of limited duration; nor would the unsettling of aeonian in its old sense, as applied to punishment, to torment, to misery, &c., carry with it any necessary unsettling of the idea in its application to the beatitudes of Paradise. Pause, reader; and thou, my favoured and privileged reader, that boastest thyself to be unlearned, pause doubly whilst I communicate my views as to this remarkable word.

What is an aeon? In the use and acceptation of the Apocalypse, it is evidently this, viz., the duration or cycle of existence which belongs to any object, not individually for itself, but universally in right of its genus. Kant, for instance, in a little paper which I once translated, proposed and debated the question as to the age of our planet the Earth. What did he mean? Was he to be understood as asking whether the Earth were half a million, 2 millions, or 3 millions of years old? Not at all. The probabilities certainly lean, one and all, to the assignment of an antiquity greater by many thousands of times than that which we have most idly supposed ourselves to extract from Scripture, which assuredly never meant to approach a question so profoundly irrelevant to the great purposes of Scripture as any geological speculation whatsoever. But this was not within the field of Kant's inquiry. What he wished to know was simply the exact stage in the whole course of her development which the Earth at present occupies. Is she still in her infancy, for example, or in a stage corresponding to middle age, or in a stage approaching to superannuation? The idea of Kant presupposed a certain average duration as belonging to a planet of our particular system; and supposing this known, or discoverable, and that a certain assignable development belonged to a planet so circumstanced as ours, then in what particular stage of that development may we, the tenants of this respectable little planet Tellus, reasonably be conceived to stand?

Man again, has a certain aeonian life; possibly ranging somewhere about the period of 70 years assigned in the Psalms. That is, in a state as highly improved as human infirmity and the errors of the earth herself, together with the diseases incident to our atmosphere, &c., could be supposed to allow, possibly the human race might average 70 years for each individual. This period would in that case represent the "aeon" of the individual Tellurian; but the "aeon" of the Tellurian RACE would probably amount to many millions of our earthly years; and it would remain an unfathomable mystery, deriving no light at all from the septuagenarian "aeon" of the individual; though between the two aeons I have no doubt that some secret link of connection does and must subsist, however undiscoverable by human sagacity.

The crow, the deer, the eagle, &c., are all supposed to be long-lived. Some people have fancied that in their normal state they tended to a period of two centuries. [I have heard the same normal duration ascribed to the tortoise, and one case became imperfectly known to myself personally. Somewhere I may have mentioned the case in print. These, at any rate, are the facts of the case: A lady (by birth a Cowper, of the whig family, and cousin to the poet Cowper; and, equally with him, related to Dr. Madan, Bishop of Peterborough), in the early part of this century, mentioned to me that, in the palace at Peterborough, she had for years known as a pet of the household a venerable tortoise, who bore some inscription on his shell indicating that, from 1638 to 1643, he had belonged to Archbishop Laud, who (if I am not mistaken) held the bishopric of Peterborough before he was translated to London, and finally to Canterbury.] I myself know nothing certain for or against this belief; but, supposing the case to be as it is represented, then this would be the aeonian period of these animals, considered as individuals. Among trees, in like manner, the oak, the cedar, the yew, are notoriously of very slow growth, and their aeonian period is unusually long as regards the individual. What may be the aeon of the whole species is utterly unknown. Amongst birds, one species at least has become extinct in our own generation: its aeon was accomplished. So of all the fossil species in zoology, which Palaeontology has revealed. Nothing, in short, throughout universal nature, can for a moment be conceived to have been resigned to accident for its normal aeon. All periods and dates of this order belong to the certainties of nature, but also, at the same time, to the mysteries of Providence. Throughout the Prophets, we are uniformly taught that nothing is more below the grandeur of Heaven than to assign earthly dates in fixing either the revolutions or the duration of great events such as prophecy would condescend to notice. A day has a prophetic meaning, but what sort of day? A mysterious expression for a time which has no resemblance to a natural day—sometimes comprehending long successions of centuries, and altering its meaning according to the object concerned. “A time,” and “times,” or “half a time”—“an aeon,” or “aeons of aeons”—and other variations of this prophetic language (so full of dreadful meaning, but also of doubt and perplexity), are all significant. The peculiar grandeur of such expressions lies partly in the dimness of the approximation to any attempt at settling their limits, and still more in this, that the conventional character, and consequent meanness of ordinary human dates, are abandoned in the celestial chronologies. Hours and days, or lunations and months, have no true or philosophic relation to the origin, or duration, or periods of return belonging to great events, or revolutionary agencies, or vast national crimes; but the normal period and duration of all acts whatever, the time of their emergence, of their agency, or their reagency, fall into harmony with the secret proportions of a heavenly scale, when they belong by mere necessity of their own internal constitution to the vital though hidden motions that are at work in their own life and manifestation. Under the old and ordinary view of the apocalyptic aeon, which supposed it always to mean the same period of time—mysterious, indeed, and uncertain, as regards our knowledge, but fixed and rigorously certain in the secret counsels of God—it was presumed that this period, if it lost its character of infinity when applied to evil, to criminality, or to punishment, must lose it by a corresponding necessity equally when applied to happiness and the golden aspects of hope. But, on the contrary, every object whatsoever, every mode of existence, has its own separate and independent aeon. The most thoughtless person must be satisfied, on reflection, even apart from the express commentary upon this idea furnished by the Apocalypse, that every life and mode of being must have hidden within itself the secret why of its duration. It is impossible to believe of any duration whatever that it is determined capriciously. Always it rests upon some ground, ancient as light and darkness, though undiscoverable by man. This only is discoverable, as a general tendency, that the aeon, or generic period of evil, is constantly towards a fugitive duration. The aeon, it is alleged, must always express the same idea, whatever that may be; if it is less than eternity for the evil cases, then it must be less for the good ones. Doubtless the idea of an aeon is in one sense always uniform, always the same, viz., as a tenth or a twelfth is always the same. Arithmetic could not exist if any caprice or variation affected these ideas—a tenth is always more than an eleventh, always less than a ninth. But this uniformity of ratio and proportion does not hinder but that a tenth may now represent a guinea, and next moment represent a thousand guineas. The exact amount of the duration expressed by an aeon depends altogether upon the particular subject which yields the aeon. It is, as I have said, a radix; and, like an algebraic square-root or cube-root, though governed by the most rigorous laws of limitation, it must vary in obedience to the nature of the particular subject whose radix it forms.

Reader, I take my leave. I have been too loitering. I know it, and will make such efforts in future to cultivate the sternest brevity as nervous distress will allow. Meanwhile, as the upshot of my speculation, accept these three propositions: —

That man (which is, in effect, every man hitherto) who allows himself to infer the eternity of evil from the counter eternity of good, builds upon the mistake of assigning a stationary and mechanic value to the idea of an aeon; whereas the very purpose of Scripture in using this word was to evade such a value. The word is always varying, for the very purpose of keeping it faithful to a spiritual identity. The period or duration of every object would be an essentially variable quantity, were it not mysteriously commensurate to the inner nature of that object as laid open to the eyes of God. And thus it happens, that every thing in this world, possibly without a solitary exception, has its own separate aeon: how many entities, so many aeons.

But if it be an excess of blindness which can overlook the aeonian differences amongst even neutral entities, much deeper is that blindness which overlooks the separate tendencies of things evil and things good. Naturally, all evil is fugitive and allied to death.

I separately, speaking for myself only, profoundly believe that the Scriptures ascribe absolute and metaphysical eternity to one sole Being, viz., to God; and derivatively to all others according to the interest which they can plead in God's favour. Having anchorage in God, innumerable entities may possibly be admitted to a participation in divine aeon. But what interest in the favour of God can belong to falsehood, to malignity, to impurity? To invest them with aeonian privileges, is in effect, and by its results, to distrust and insult the Deity. Evil would not be evil, if it had that power of self-subsistence which is imputed to it in supposing its aeonian life to be co-eternal with that which crowns and glorifies the good. —From Hogg's Instructor.

WYCLIFF'S TESTAMENT.

Within fifty years after the completion of his holy work, a copy of Wycliff's Testament is said to have cost about $150 of our money. "Those who could not give money would give a load of hay for a few favourite chapters, and this in times when the possession of such a manuscript might very probably be the means of bringing the owner to the dungeon or the stake. They were forced to hide their treasure under the floors of their houses, and sit up all night, or retire to the lonely fields or woods, to hear and read without interruption the word of the Book of Life."—Martineau.

A VOICE FROM ST. HELENA ON THE EASTERN QUESTION.

Our attention has been drawn to some remarkable passages from conversations reported to have been held by Napoleon with Mr. O'Meara, in his "Voice from St. Helena."

We do not need to make any comment upon them. What we have been writing on this question from week to week, for the last six months, amounts to little more than an enlarged commentary on these extraordinary expressions of the ex-Emperor of France, which (bating some exaggerations natural to the speaker and the time) contain the exact rationale of the Eastern question as it stands at this moment.

The conversations took place in May 1817. On the 22nd of May, says O'Meara, after leaving the bath, Napoleon spoke about Russia, and said that the European nations would yet find that he (Napoleon) had adopted the best possible policy, at the time when he intended to re-establish the kingdom of Poland. This, he observed, would have been the only effectual means of stopping the increasing power of Russia. It was putting a barrier, a dyke, to that formidable empire, which it was likely would yet overwhelm Europe. "I do not think," he added, "that I shall live to see it, but you may. You are in the flower of your age, and may expect to live thirty-five years longer. I think that you will see that the Russians will either invade and take India, or enter Europe with four hundred thousand Cossacks and other inhabitants of the desert, and two hundred thousand Russians. When Paul was so violent against you, he sent to me for a plan to invade India. I sent him one with instructions in detail."

The conversation was resumed on the same day. "If," pursued Napoleon, "Alexander succeeds in incorporating Poland with Russia—that is to say, in perfectly reconciling the Poles to the Russian Government, and not merely subduing the country—he has gained the greatest step towards subduing India. My opinion is that he will attempt either the one or the other of the projects I have mentioned, and I think the last to be the most probable." Hereupon, Mr. O'Meara observed that the distance was great, and that the Russians had not the money necessary for such a grand undertaking. "The distance is nothing," returned Napoleon. "Supplies can be easily carried upon camels, and the Cossacks will always insure a sufficiency of them. Money they will find when they arrive there. The hope of conquest would immediately unite armies of Cossacks and Calmucks without expense."

On a subsequent day, the 27th of the same month, Napoleon again started the subject, and made use of the singular and most impressive statements which follow. They appear to us to approach as near to the truth and warnings of prophecy, as any political speculation we have ever known.

"In the course of a few years," said Napoleon on this latter occasion, "Russia will have Constantinople, the greatest part of Turkey, and all Greece. This I hold to be as certain as if it had already taken place. Almost all the cajoling and flattery which Alexander practised towards me, was to gain my consent to effect this object. I would not consent, foreseeing that the equilibrium of Europe would be destroyed. In the natural course of things, in a few years Turkey must fall to Russia. The greatest part of her population are Greeks, who, you may say, are Russians. The powers it would injure, and who could oppose it, are England, France, Prussia, and Austria. Now, as to Austria, it will be very easy for Russia to engage her assistance, by giving her Serbia and other provinces bordering upon the Austrian dominions, reaching near to Constantinople. THE ONLY HYPOTHESIS ON WHICH FRANCE AND ENGLAND MAY EVER BE ALLIED WITH SINCERITY, WILL BE IN ORDER TO PREVENT THIS. But even this alliance would not avail. France, England and Prussia united cannot prevent this. Russia and Austria can at any time effect it. Once mistress of Constantinople, Russia gets all the commerce of the Mediterranean, becomes a great naval power, and God knows what may happen," &c.

The thirty-five years which Napoleon put as the limit to test his prophecy, expired in 1852; in 1853 the question is that which agitates Europe from end to end; and the nephew of Napoleon is on the throne of France. It is possible that if the exiled Emperor could have foreseen the resuscitation of his dynasty, he might have taken a more sanguine view of the possible results of that alliance with England which he thus so remarkably predicted. At any rate, here he speaks unmistakeably to us on the question so vital to the interests of Europe, and from his grave he dictates the policy which his nephew and successor can alone pursue with respect for his authority and name. —Examiner.

THE BIBLE.

TRUTH'S SIDE.

CONFESSIONS OF A JEW.

“How great was my surprise,” says a converted Jew in writing to a friend, “when I read those clear and striking descriptions of the prophet concerning the person, life, sufferings, death, and resurrection of the Messiah, which I had never seen or heard before! For, you well know that Isaiah fifty-third, Daniel ninth, and many other parts of the writings of the prophets, are not included in the Haphtorth, (that is, the portions selected to be read in the Synagogue,) nor are they read by many in private.”

“I now eagerly desired to know whether all that had been foretold by the prophets had been fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth. I therefore procured a copy of the New Testament, the first I ever touched; for you remember how often we were cautioned against it, and told that ‘to touch a New Testament was as defiling as to touch a swine.’ I read the gospels twice over. All was new and unheard of before. It is impossible to describe my astonishment in reading these writings. How different is the real character of Jesus from that blasphemous account of him called Tolduth Jeshu, which we were in the habit of reading every year on the evening before Christmas day. Truly he is the chief among ten thousand, and altogether lovely, and as the poet sung,

‘All human beauties, all divine,

In my beloved meet and shine;

His worth, if all the nations knew,

Sure the whole world would love him too.’

“I was equally surprised to find the most minute predictions fulfilled in Jesus. My judgment was soon convinced that he was the promised Messiah, and I began to rejoice in the hope of glory.”

If by the “most minute predictions” is meant “all that had been foretold by the prophets,” the writer is greatly mistaken; but if he mean that all predicted concerning the Messiah in the day of his mortality was most minutely fulfilled, he is perfectly correct. Much, very much, remains to be fulfilled of what the prophets have spoken concerning him. His work is yet before him; and therefore the indispensable necessity of his reappearance on earth, not in weakness, however, but in power and great glory. —EDITOR.

THE BIBLE.

“It is a remarkable fact, that the more self-conceited, worldly-minded, and wicked people are, the more they neglect, despise, and asperse the sacred Scriptures; and, on the contrary, the more humble and holy, the more they read, admire, and value them. What the Lord said of his disciples is equally true of the Bible. ‘If it were of the world, the world would love its own; but because it is not of the world, therefore the world hateth it.’ No book, however, has had as many friends. Vast numbers of wise and good men, through many generations and distant countries, have agreed in receiving the Bible as a divine revelation. Many of them have been notable for seriousness, erudition, penetration, and impartiality in their judgment of men and things; living and dying they have recommended it to all others, as the source of hope, wisdom, and consolation. ‘Reason itself,’ says a judicious writer, ‘dictates that nothing but the plainest matter of fact could induce so many thousands of persecuted and prejudiced Jews to embrace the humbling, self-denying doctrine of the cross, which they so much despised and abhorred. Nothing but the clearest evidence arising from undoubted truth, could make multitudes of lawless, luxurious heathens, receive, follow, and transmit to posterity, the doctrines and writings of the apostles; especially at a time when the vanity of their pretensions to miracles and the gift of tongues could be so easily discovered had they been impostors, and when the profession of Christianity exposed persons of all ranks to the greatest contempt and most imminent danger.’”—FREY.

TRUTH'S SIDE.

The truth creates "sides;" the for-it side, and the against-it side; and between these two sides there is no neutral ground. He that is not for me, saith Jesus, is against me; and he styled himself "the truth." If we are for the truth, we cannot encamp with the enemy, and cooperate with them. Being for the truth, it will place us in the minority, and identify us with those who suffer tribulation for the truth's sake. He that runs with the hare, but holds with the hounds, will never save the fugitive from being worried to death. There were men in the days of Jesus who would preach his doctrine, and not speak lightly of him, but would also carefully avoid identification with his unsavoury name. This is referable to the pride of life, love of popularity, or to some other equally unworthy thing. It is certainly a course not prompted by a devotion to the truth, or a love of righteousness. Moses acted not thus. He renounced the throne and treasures of Egypt for the society of enslaved brickmakers. Such a course evinces indecision of character which cannot be approved of the Lord when he appears. Skykingdomism is unscriptural and wholly false; and therefore subversive, wherever it prevails, of "the gospel of the kingdom of God," which is wholly scriptural and only and altogether true. Though I respect skykingdomism, yet, if I identify myself, without a standing protest against it, I become by example an enemy of that which I believe is true. Let these hints be ingenuously considered by those who admit the right, but still the wrong pursue. —EDITOR.

MAN IN SOCIETY.

BY THE EDITOR.

Man, in the history of his race, presents himself to our notice in two states—the social and the savage. The social is his original condition; the savage, that into which he has sunk as a consequence of licentiousness. At his formation, Man, who was made male and female, was pronounced “very good;” and appointed to live in society, because it was “not good for him to be alone.” The primeval society of Eden was constituted of divine and human elements—of God, the Elohim, man and woman: of God, “whom no man hath seen;” of the Elohim, whom he hath often seen; and of man and woman, the perfection of flesh and blood. This social state was free and devoid of evil; yet was its liberty not absolute, but restrained and regulated by law. Though “very good” and undefiled by sin, man was not permitted to do as he pleased without restriction. A law was given to him by his Creator, expressive of the divine sovereignty over society, and his position in the social state. Hence, society is a divine institution, originally characterised by intelligence, goodness, law, and liberty. Woman belonged to man, because she was his own flesh and bone, and given to him of God; and they both belonged to God, because He had formed them for himself. Society, therefore, belongs to God; so that whosoever hath the honour of membership therein is free to do whatever he pleases that is not contrary to the letter and spirit of His law. This is the liberty God permits in society, which is his. Beyond this man must not go if he would continue in the divine favour. Law is the boundary line between liberty and licentiousness. He that crosses it diabolises, and takes the first step in the descent, which terminates in the anarchy of the savage state.

From the constitution of society, then, at the foundation of the world, we see that law was an essential element of the social state; and that social liberty is freedom restrained by law. Absolute liberty, or freedom unrestricted by law which defines “order” and “decency,” has no place in the divine plan. Man aimed at this. He virtually asserted, that he had a right to do what he pleased with the Tree of Knowledge as with all other trees; but experience at length proved to him that he had no unconditional rights; but a right only to do according to the law. He did as he pleased, and in consequence lost the favour of God, as will all others who pursue a similar course.

The existence of society depending upon the maintenance of law, it behoves all intelligent and wise people to cooperate to that end. If flesh were not sinful, or if all men were wise and good, the knowledge of the requirements of the divine law would be sufficient. They would know and do. But flesh is sinful, very sinful; and all men in society have not intelligence, nor faith sufficient to walk by, nor wisdom, nor a love of order, nor a sense of decency; therefore, a simple knowledge of what God requires in society, or a simple reference to what the law says, is not enough to answer the necessities of the case. Law cannot apply itself, it must, therefore, be placed in the hands of an administration, that lawlessness may be restrained, and decency and order maintained in society.

The savage state is the opposite to the social in every particular. The "philosophy" of the Gentiles, "falsely so called," teaches that the savage is the original condition of man; and that society has grown up out of it as a result of necessity. One who believes the Bible, however, discards this as mere foolishness. Divinely constituted society is the primeval state; and savage life the extreme consequence of a departure from its laws. It originated in transgression of God's law, or sin, which, before the flood, acquired such force as entirely to corrupt the way of the Lord, and to fill the whole earth with violence. Its career was similar after that catastrophe; and where it was not antagonized by divine interference, but allowed in its fleshly inworking and manifestation to acquire absolute sway in portions of the human race, it reduced them to the condition of the natives of New Holland and the Feejees. The "liberty" of these aborigines is absolute. They do what is right in their own eyes upon the principles of "liberty and equality" in the abstract. They are without law to God, and know no rule but the necessity of their own lusts. They are nature's freemen, democrats of the largest liberty, who, under the impulse of desire, edify themselves without regard to the sensibilities and wishes of the unfortunates who fall into their hands.

This is the extremity arrived at by the uncontrolled working of that principle called "sin in the flesh." Cannibalism, however, is but the extreme manifestation of that "liberty" contended for by some, which impels them to a gratification of their own selfishness and vanity at the expense of the order and decency of the social state. The latter is sin modified in its display by circumstances, which restrain it by present consequences from murder and theft; but leave it rampant in the manifestation of "hatred, variance, jealousies, wraths, strifes, divisions, sects, envyings," which, though thought little of by the carnally-minded, as effectually exclude from the Kingdom of God. —Galatians 5: 19-21.

Now, by comparing the savage and social conditions of man, it will be perceived that, in his transition from the savage to the social state, he sacrifices, as he ascends the scale of being, more and more of what the natural man calls "his liberty." The nearer his approximation to primeval excellence, the more is the liberty of the flesh restrained, and reduced to a minimum. Between society divinely constituted, and the purely savage state, there are many intermediate social conditions. Greek, Mohammedan, Papal, and Protestant Socialisms, are sin, or the flesh, variously displayed—incorporations, in other words, of "the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life," in which the works of the flesh are manifested with little rebuke. It is for this cause that they are glorified by the multitude which is religiously tolerant only of that which condemns "what they have no mind to." Still we see in these barbarisms the liberty, or rather licentiousness of the savage state considerably retrenched. Law and legal administration are recognized and obeyed; for experience has proved that without these, human society cannot exist.

The practices tolerated in the ecclesiastical organizations of the world, cannot be permitted in a society constituted of God. Variance, jealousies, strifes, envyings, and so forth, must be abstained from. No member of such a society is at liberty to indulge in these, or in any thing tending to them. The law of love that proceeds forth of Zion positively and absolutely forbids them. The savage, the barbarian, the Papist, the Protestant, are free to serve sin; but not so the Christian; he is free only to serve righteousness, as a humble and faithful servant to God, who esteems that man most highly who is the least subservient to the lusts, passions, and instincts of the flesh. Therefore it is written: "Mortify [or put to death] your members which are upon the earth;" "present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, and acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service". "Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamour, and evil speaking, be put away from you, with all malice; and be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another." "Walk circumspectly, not as fools, but as wise, redeeming the time, because the days are evil." "Be ready to every good work; speak evil of no man; be no brawlers, but gentle, showing all meekness with all men;" and "Let all things be done unto edifying."

Absolute liberty, which is licentiousness, does not belong to God's society. The members of it surrender some of their individuality for the benefit of the whole, of which each person is a very small part. This is a first principle, and there can be no society without it. Now, that portion of individuality which each foregoes, he transfers from himself to the functionaries of society in assenting to their appointment, or in applying for admission, and in being received, into a community where they exist; so that he consents that he has no right to do individually what pertains to them officially. Functionaries, then, are the acting members of the body, administering to its social requirements—its eyes, ears, mouth, hands, and feet; while the body in which they are placed itself is constituted of the generality of its constituents.

These things being understood, there will be no difficulty in comprehending those which more especially pertain to what is commonly termed "a church."

A church is a society constituted upon principles divinely revealed. It is a company of believers organized for the worship of God, the support of the truth, and their mutual benefit. Union is strength; but there must be union in fact, or association is incorporate weakness. It is not good for Christians to be alone; therefore it is a privilege and a blessing for those who are partakers of the divine nature to be together in society. They afford the truth a local standing; they give it utterance, minister to its necessities, encourage one another, and assist the poor.

Baptism organizes believers of the gospel of the kingdom into the One Body of the Lord. In the beginning, this consisted of 120 persons, with the twelve apostles as their eyes, ears, mouth, hands and feet; their eldership, in short, which comprehended all their office-bearers, who attended to the ministry of the Word, and to the serving of tables. When the 3,000 were added to this Church, they continued under the apostles' sole administration of things spiritual and temporal, until the seven assistants were added to the twelve, to relieve them of the secular concerns. Deacons, therefore, were not essential to primitive church organization, seeing that they were only added to meet the exigencies of the case which arose some time after the day of Pentecost. The apostolic eldership was infallible, having been imbued with the Spirit from on high, which guided them into all truth, and made them what they were. Their administration was, therefore, the "ministration of the Spirit," by which each of them was endowed with the "word of wisdom," "the word of knowledge," "faith," "the gifts of healing," "the working of miracles," "prophecy," "discerning of spirits," "kinds of tongues," and "the interpretations of tongues." This was the Model Church, which was of one heart and one soul, and great grace was upon them all.

The churches among the Gentiles were formed after this model; that is, with an eldership or presbytery embodying the spiritual gifts. These gifts were not common to all the baptised, but to those only which constituted the eldership; and, perhaps, the deacons, who may be indicated as the "helps." Those who had the spiritual gifts were the spiritual men, or "members" of the body "in particular." The elderships of the churches, however, differed from the Jerusalem church, in that each particular elder did not possess all the nine gifts, as did each apostle; but only some of them. The gifts were distributed among several for the profit of the whole body. These supernaturally endowed persons, by the particular gifts they had received, were constituted "apostles" of churches, "prophets," "evangelists," "pastors," and "teachers." They were all elders, but of different orders. Apostles ranked first; the prophets next; then the teachers; and after them the helps and governors; so that the ruling elders occupied the lowest rank in the eldership, and acting, therefore, under the direction of the ministers of the word; yet, though these diversities obtained, they were exhorted to have the same care one for another.

It was the function of these elderships to edify the body of Christ. In other words, the body edified itself through these "members in particular," who constituted in each society the branched candlestick of the church. The unction of the Spirit burned in them, shining as lights, holding forth the "word of truth." All these gifts worked that one and the self-same Spirit, "dividing to every man severally as He willed." The gift most to be desired was that of "prophecy," or the faculty of speaking by inspiration to the edification, exhortation, and comfort of the hearers. The eldership had a plurality of prophets, who might all prophesy in the meeting, provided they did so without confusion. The Corinthians were desirous of "spirits," that is, of spiritual gifts, by which they might be distinguished. They appeared to have desired the gift of tongues above all others; but the Apostle exhorts them to desire that of prophecy: and whatever they acquired, to seek the acquisition of it, that they might excel to the edifying of the church.

From this brief outline, it is evident that democracy had no place in the apostolic churches of the saints. The Holy Spirit constituted certain of the saints overseers, that they might feed the flock of God, and minister to all its necessities, as the pillar and support of the truth. As the prophets and teachers were ministering in the church at Antioch, the Holy Spirit said to them: "Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them. And when they had fasted and prayed, and laid their hands on them, they sent them away." In this way the rulers and instructors of the body were appointed by the Spirit, and not by the brethren at large. The Father, the Son, the Holy Spirit, the eldership, and the brethren in general, were the elements of God's society in apostolic times. The Father and the Son, by the Holy Spirit, through the eldership, was the authority established in the church. Democratic republicanism would have been subversive of this; and, if tolerated, would have produced confusion and every evil work. The authority of the people and the authority of God cannot coexist. All things of God, and as little as possible of man, is a principle characteristic of the social state originating from heaven, in Eden, in Israel, and in the church. Decency and order can only be maintained by the authority divinely appointed and sustained by the wise and good. This cooperation suppressed turbulence, and put to silence the foolish talking of the wise in their own conceits, who thought more highly of themselves than they were entitled to.

The respect and consideration that was due to the elders is clearly set forth in the Epistles. "We beseech you, brethren," says Paul, "that ye know them which labour among you, and are over you in the Lord, and admonish you; and that ye esteem them very highly in love for their work's sake." "Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honour, especially they who labour in the word and doctrine." Again: "Remember them which have the rule over you, who have spoken unto you the word of God. Obey them, and submit yourselves; for they watch for your souls, as they that must give account, that they may do it with joy, and not with grief; for that is unprofitable for you. Salute them all."

On the other hand, the elders are exhorted to "feed the flock of God, taking the oversight thereof, not by constraint but willingly; nor for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind neither as being lords over the heritage, but being ensamples to the flock. And when the Chief Shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away. Likewise, ye younger, submit yourselves unto the elder; yea, all of you be subject one to another, and be clothed with humility; for God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble."

After the manner of these exhortations were decency and order maintained in the churches of the saints; yet even with this divinely constituted authority, the heady and highminded could scarcely be restrained. It was the ministration of the Spirit, not in word only, but in power; yet evil found admission, and became "the Mystery of Iniquity, secretly working." The power could punish, and did punish, even unto the infliction of disease and death, and could also pardon and heal the penitent. It was evidently, however, not exercised to the full, but with considerable longsuffering, and forbearance; though, in many instances, it was pushed to extremities, as a terror to the evilly disposed.

Now, to this point I have endeavoured to show:

First, that the social was the original condition of man, on the principle that it is not good for him to be alone.

Second, that in this state he was free, yet subject to law, which is an essential element of society.

Third, that social liberty is defined by law, by which it is prevented from degenerating into licentiousness, which is liberty unrestrained by law.

Fourth, that as law cannot apply itself, an administration must necessarily exist.

Fifth, that man in society must needs surrender some of his natural or individual liberty for social protection from those who may be stronger than he, and for the general good.

Sixth, that office-bearers constituting the administration are representative of that portion of each member's individuality surrendered for social need.

Seventh, that these principles were incorporated in the churches of the saints established by the apostles.

Eighth, that the churches of the primitive age were constituted by the apostles and evangelists, who, having gathered the baptised believers of the kingdom's gospel into distinct societies, ordained elders in them, who being qualified for the discharge of their several duties of teaching, feeding, ruling, and serving, by spiritual gifts, were therefore constituted by the Holy Spirit.

Ninth, that the elderships were the many branched lamps in which the holy oil, or spirit, burned for the illumination and wellbeing of the generality.

Tenth, that the existence of these spiritual elderships necessarily excluded from the church what, in modern times, is styled democratic republicanism.

Eleventh, that the principle upon which all church affairs were conducted is expressed in the sayings, "let all things be done to edifying;" and, "let all things be done decently and in order;" and "let all your things be done with love," And,

Twelfth, that the churches edified themselves through their elderships, which were composed of "members in particular;" that is, of members selected from the "multitude," according to specified conditions.

One thing, then, is evident, from a review of the premises before us, and that is, that there is no ecclesiastical organization extant like that which we see existed in the apostolic age, and that of the elders who outlived the apostles. And, furthermore, that however intelligent and excellent of purpose and character certain Christian professors may be, they could not by any unanimity establish one. The reason of this is, that the gift of the Holy Spirit is a wanting: then, the Spirit called believers, and qualified them for the eldership, and through it instructed and ruled the body; but now, the Holy Spirit is neither in elderships nor people; at all events, neither of them afford any evidence of the fact, being more conspicuous for want of wisdom, and knowledge, and understanding, than for the possession of them.

But, because we cannot have the ancient order which existed in the infancy and childhood of Christianity, (for which, indeed, it was specially designed,) is that any reason why, when "a measure of an age of the fulness of Christ" has been attained, and the ancient order discontinued, believers in society should have no order at all; but that A. B. and C., however incompetent in the estimation of all but themselves, should be at unrestrained liberty to violate all the principles embodied in that ancient order, and to set all the rules of courtesy and good breeding at defiance? Certainly not. This is anarchy, and utterly disruptive and subversive of the social state. Men cannot live in society, literary, political, domestic, or Christian, where such licentiousness prevails. There must be system, and such an one, too, as shall be a restraint upon the presumptuous, and a praise to them that do well.

Seeing, then, that the divinely constituted order of things is not attainable, and some organization must be established if believers are to cooperate in society, it evidently follows, that the God of wisdom, knowledge and love, has left it to the most intelligent, wisest, and best disposed of His sons, to devise a system embodying the principles of His ancient order, through which may be carried out most effectually His benevolence to His children and the world. The case of Moses and his father-in-law establishes this. God had said nothing to Moses respecting the daily judging of the people, which all rested upon his shoulders, to the certain injury of his health. Jethro perceived this, and, though not an Israelite, suggested a division of labour, in the appointment of "able men, such as fear God, men of truth, hating covetousness," who should be rulers with him, to judge the people at all seasons. "If thou do this thing, and God command thee so, then thou shalt be able to endure." Moses took the advice; and though it is not written that God approved it, yet, as Moses was faithful in all his house as a servant, we are justified in concluding that he did; for Moses would have established nothing contrary to His will, nor, if established, would it have been permitted to continue. We are in the wilderness state, and in a somewhat similar position. God has removed the divinely constituted elderships, or branched candlesticks, and permitted his heritages to be despoiled and scattered. We are endeavoring to gather the dispersed together in divers places; but, in doing so, we find the times vastly changed. We are here and there companies, who profess to believe the same gospel as Paul preached, and, like him and his associates, to have obeyed it. We desire to be organized, but the Holy Spirit neither calls any of us to office, nor bestows on us any special gifts. If he prescribe to us no organization for modern times, and he have cut us off from access to the ancient one, it is manifest that, if we are to organize at all, we must do as Moses did at Jethro's suggestion, and organize ourselves, if God command us so; and we infer he does, as he has not told us how to organize, yet exhorts through the apostle "not to forsake the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is."

It might be objected here that this reasoning would sanctify all the ecclesiastical organizations of Christendom. But I say, no; because, in the first place, they are not organizations of Christians, their members never having obeyed the gospel, so that they are not Christian organizations; and, in the next place, the organizations do not embody the principles of the apostolic one. No organization can be acceptable to God which is not comprehensive of his children; while, on the other hand, I believe he would not be displeased at any system of rule and order they might devise promotive of their own improvement of heart and understanding and growth in faith, humbleness of mind, brotherly kindness and love; and which would enable them to support the truth, and sound it out effectively in the world; all of which premises that their system embody the principles inculcated in the Word.

Who then should initiate the organization of unassociated believers? I should answer, in view of Paul's instructions to Titus, He or they who have been instrumental in opening their eyes, and in turning them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God. It is reasonable that he who has been able to do this, is more competent to "set in order the things that are not done, and to ordain elders," than any one or all of the proselytes put together. He has in the nature of things more scriptural intelligence than they, seeing that they had been blind until he happily enabled them to see. The democratic mode of setting things in order, and ordaining elders, has been abundantly tried, and found wanting. It results in every evil work, and in all presumption and confusion. The vote of the majority puts men into office who are unqualified in every particular; and history shows that wherever this principle has rule in church or world, it invariably introduces turbulence, contempt of authority, and corruption; so that at length reaction necessarily supervenes for the prevention of the disruption of society which would otherwise certainly ensue.

The things Titus had to "set in order" were the prophets, teachers, helps, governments, &c., which "God had set in the churches" according to a certain order. See 1 Corinthians 12: 28. In doing this he constituted an eldership for the edifying of the body in love. If it were necessary that these men should have certain natural, social, domestic, logical, and doctrinal prerequisite qualifications, in addition to the gifts of the Spirit, to enable them to rule well, and to edify the body; how much more, important in the absence of those gifts, as in these times, that the office-bearers now should be men of wisdom, knowledge, holiness of life and disposition, courteous, and well bred! Timothy was ordered "not to lay hands suddenly upon any man;" and to let the deacons be tried before they were made permanent. This must be attended to now. The best men and the wisest must form the Wittenagemot of the church; which indeed ought itself to be as a whole an assembly of wise men; but experience unhappily proves that such a condition is the rare exception to the rule. If all the members of a church were intelligent, wise, disinterested, and wholly devoted to the truth, the elder, overseer, or bishop's office would be a ruling and teaching sinecure; but this was not the case in the apostles' day, and it is much farther from being the case now. Men are more knowing than wise and prudent in all ages; and in proportion to their untempered knowledge and self-esteem, disposed to glorify and exalt themselves. The folly and turbulence and conceit of this class, which abounds in all communities, makes it particularly necessary that the very best men a church can afford should be appointed to its oversight.

As all things, then, must have a beginning, it appears to me that the names of brethren of the class indicated by Paul might be unanimously inscribed on a list by the members of the church, and be handed to him who called them out of darkness, that he might acquaint himself with them, and see which of them it would be advisable to leave upon the list for election. If two elders were needed, four or more good, apostolically characterized men might be inscribed on the list presented, which might be reduced, or not, according to the judgment formed of their eligibility by the scrutator who enlightened them. He might perhaps reduce the list to three. Two pieces of paper might then be each labelled, "For Elder," and put into a receiver with a third piece which should be blank. The three brethren should then successively put in the hand, and take one, upon which they of course who drew the labels would be elected, not by the people, nor by the scrutator, but by the lot. This appears to me to be as near as we can come to a scriptural election; and I cannot but think, that "able men, such as fear God, men of truth, hating covetousness," so elected, would be approved by the Lord himself if present; and would certainly be deserving of all that respect and consideration the Scriptures claim for those who supervise the church. Brethren who would not submit to such men in the Lord should seek society elsewhere. A congregation's spiritual affairs might be safely confided to them, for all their endeavours would be to promote the welfare of their brethren, to diffuse the knowledge of the truth, to maintain order and decency, and to glorify the Father who is in heaven. But, if any better mode could be devised, all reasonable and truthful men would be ready to adopt it.

In some churches there are few that can speak; in others, there are many. As a general rule, brethren should be "swift to hear, and slow to speak;" for there are very few who can speak to the edification of any besides themselves. Some mistake talking for prophesying or speaking to edification, exhortation, and comfort. They talk at their brethren, to the greatest annoyance of those who listen to them, who, after they have done, are thankful, and feel no disposition to say, "Amen." These are "unruly talkers, whose mouths must be stopped," and it is the duty of the elders to do it; and to see that the time and patience of their brethren and the public are not unprofitably consumed by such. There is no worship in talking; and it should be remembered that a church convenes for worship and instruction, not to listen to unprofitable and random talk. James says, "be not many teachers, knowing that we shall receive a severer scrutiny. For we the whole miss many things. If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, able also to bridle the whole body." Let then those who desire to hear their own voices, read the exhortations of the apostles, and add few words, if any, of their own, unless they have prepared themselves as workmen rightly to divide the word of truth when they who rejoice in the truth will hear them gladly. He is a wise man who, with a small intellectual and scriptural capital, speaks few words; but shallow waters make a great noise; and so it too often comes to pass that they who have the least depth are the most prolific of wordiness and volubility. Speech seasoned with salt is excellent; but if it have no savour, it is fit only to be cast away as unprofitable and vain.

In a word, then, decency and order must be maintained; and, as far as I am individually concerned, I will identify myself with no organization of believers in contending for the faith once delivered to the saints that does not purge itself from the licentiousness which maintains the right of every man doing what is right in his own eyes, to the gratification of himself, at the expense of the inoffensive, and to the injury of the truth.

ADDITIONAL REMARKS.

In the preceding article I have shown, in the first place, what was the divine order of things in the heritages of God planted by the apostles, and ordained by them and the evangelists; and in the next place, how nearly this might be approximated in the Nineteenth Century. But it is much more easy to sketch out the plan of a solid, and substantial, and elegant fabric, than to build it; much depends upon the nature of the foundation, and the materials to be used. If the edifice be not laid in rock, and the materials be more effluent of the flesh than of the spirit, however admirable may be the plan, the structure will prove like the apples in Milton's hell, beautiful to the eye, but ashes between the teeth.

No organization, not even an apostolic one, can work well, that is, scripturally, which is not composed of elements more zealous for the advancement of the truth, and the promotion of the glory of its divine Author, than of their own notions and exaltation. The first necessary thing is, that the members shall have become as little children, having their old Adam subdued by faith, and Christ substituted in his place by the same principle. Without this disposition, which is "peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality and without hypocrisy," no organization could work harmoniously and efficaciously, though framed and administered by the apostles themselves. Even a bad organization with good materials would work better than a good one with a self-willed, heady, factious, and self-glorifying people. The members must all respect the apostolic teaching if they would have an organization that would be scriptural and satisfactory to all good men. This teaching says, *"By love serve one another." "Be not desirous of vainglory, provoking one another, envying one another." "Submit yourselves one to another in the fear of God." "Stand fast in one spirit, with one mind striving together for the faith of the Gospel," "Let nothing be done through strife or vainglory; but in lowliness of mind let each esteem other better than themselves. Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others. Let his mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus." "Let your moderation be known unto all men." "Put on, as the elect of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, longsuffering; forbearing one another, and forgiving one another, if any man have a complaint against any; even as Christ forgave you, so also do ye. And above all these things put on love, which is the bond of perfectness. And let the peace of God rule in your hearts, to the which (peace) also ye are called in one body; and be thankful." "Be at peace among yourselves." "Be all of one mind, having compassion one of another: love as brethren, be pitiful, be courteous." "Let love be without dissimulation. Be kindly affectioned one to another with brotherly love; in honour preferring one another." And the great teacher, even Christ, who, though the Lord of all, humbled himself and became the servant of the least, enstamps this doctrine with the seal of his authority, saying, *"He that is greatest among you shall be your servant. And whosoever shall exalt himself shall be abased; and he that shall humble himself shall be exalted."

A people imbued with such doctrine as this would make almost any organization work well; and indeed would get along peaceably together without any written constitution at all; because peace, and righteousness, and the law of the spirit of life, would be written in their hearts and minds. A people so disposed is the great want of our age—a people who not only believe the gospel of the kingdom, but manifest the fruit of it in their walk and conversation, to wit, "righteousness and peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit." It is the extreme scarcity of such that make it almost impossible to plant heritages in the land with administrations even remotely approximating to the apostolic. An association of believers is better without an eldership, than to have one made up of persons destitute of the qualifications indicated in Paul's letters to Timothy and Titus. All who have obeyed the gospel are not "blameless," "watchful," "decorous," "given to hospitality," "apt to teach," "of a well regulated mind," "judicious rulers of their own house", and of good external report. These qualifications are as necessary as faith and obedience to the gospel; and in order that their aptness to teach may be beneficially exercised, it is necessary that "the word of Christ dwell in them richly in all wisdom." Persons thus qualified would preside over an association of believers with great advantage to all concerned. These were the sort of persons the apostles exhort us to obey; but before we can do what they require in the premises, the right persons must be manifested. They do not exhort us to obey the incarnations of accident, or of majorities, or of party feeling; but only such as the Holy Spirit makes overseers—"able men, such as fear God; men of truth, hating covetousness." They should be wise, not in their own conceits; this the apostle forbids: but wise in the estimation of those that be wise, and disposed to avail themselves of their services. The greatest amount of the knowledge of divine things possessed in these days is but little at best. How very minute, then, that which is little compared with this! and how little ability is there to use this small amount aright! A little knowledge is a dangerous thing. It puffs up, and "lifts up with pride," or inordinate self-esteem. It is expedient, therefore, that a newly-formed ecclesiastical association should enter upon such an arrangement as would give expression probationally to the principles set forth; that being taught by experience they may be the better able to judge of measures and of the fitness of individuals to carry them into effect with permanence.

Now, a necessity, forced by circumstances upon certain believers of the gospel, has compelled them to initiate an organization which shall favour, as they believe, the congregational worship of God in spirit and in truth, and the dissemination of "the word of the kingdom" in the city of New York. They have entered upon this arduous enterprise without conference with flesh and blood. They have seen and felt the necessity that exists, and have responded to it in the fearlessness of faith, the love of peace, the admonition of the truth, and the fear of God. It is an olive branch to all who love the truth better than themselves, but affords no scope for the unhallowed ambitions of the flesh. Approbating the principles set forth in the article entitled "Man In Society" and these "Additional Remarks", they have agreed to the following constitution, as meeting the demands of the probational situation in which they are placed. It is published here for the benefit of all who may be interested in the subject of "Church Organization," which has been for many years a cause of much trouble to the professed friends of truth both in Britain and America. Unhappily, in modern times, about the first thing neophytes begin to do is to join battle with somebody about church government, instead of adding to their faith "goodness, and knowledge" of the divine testimony, that they may grow thereby, and become men, able to contend earnestly and valiantly for the faith once for all delivered to the saints. Infinitely more scriptural would it be for such to do this, than to consume their time and energies in striving against each other about place and power. A man thoroughly imbued with the truth would rather avoid these in this age than seek them. The least intrinsically deserving and qualified are, for the in most part, those who aspire after the petty distinction of place, being rarely capable of illustrating their position by the fruit of faith. They forget that we are placed here to learn obedience by the things we are called to suffer; not to "learn how to rule;" though to obey with a good grace is the first step to the commanding righteously the obedience of others. But, not to dilate more upon this point, which ought to be obvious to all, I proceed without further comment to lay before the reader the Continued Here

OF THE ROYAL ASSOCIATION OF BELIEVERS

1. —THE NAME OF THE ASSOCIATION.

In the age contemporary with the apostles “Christian” was a name unappropriated by any religionists, other than the true believers who were “first called Christians at Antioch.” But in the nineteenth century, this is not the case. Every ecclesiastical association in “Christendom,” from “the Mother of Harlots” to Mormonism, the most recent of her Babylonish and adulterous generation, now appropriates the once distinctive and unblemished appellation to itself. For this reason, we conclude not to attempt to distinguish our Association by a name so universally misapplied; differing also, as we do, so essentially in faith and hope from all modern “Christian” names, sects, and denominations.

The “one faith” and “hope” we confess as “the children of the kingdom,” are royal. We believe in a Messiah, even Jesus, who shall subdue unto himself, and for his brethren, a royalty, bounded only by “the uttermost parts of the earth;” in which royalty we hope to participate, when, as Micah testifies, “The first dominion shall come to the stronghold of the daughter of Zion; and the kingdom to the daughter of Jerusalem.” The apostle Peter, in writing to his Christian brethren dispersed through the provinces of Asia Minor, who also believed in this royalty, saith, “Ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a purchased people; that ye should publish the goodness of him that hath called you out of darkness into his wonderful light.” Besides this, the Apocalypse affirms that the Lord Jesus has made such “kings and priests, for God to reign upon the earth;” and adds in another place, “*They sat upon thrones, and judgment was given unto them: and they lived, * * * and they shall be the priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years.*”

Seeing then that it is fit that a society, or association, of whatever kind, should have a designation, and deprecating strongly the imposition of a name by which we should be characterized as the adherents of any person, however esteemed; we agree that the title of our confederacy shall express the great subject-matter of the gospel, i.e. ROYALTY. Our decision, therefore, is that our ecclesiastical union shall be entitled “THE ROYAL ASSOCIATION OF BELIEVERS* in New-York.

* This title is nearly equivalent to the Scripture phrase “ROYAL PRIESTHOOD,” used by Peter; that is, a Royal Order of Priests. “Royal” is a French word, from roi, a king. Anything pertaining to a king is royal. Hence an Association composed of “children of the kingdom,” who are “sons of God,” and therefore brethren of Jesus Christ, Jehovah’s first born and Israel’s King, believing also the glad tidings of the kingdom, is royal; and therefore named as in the text above.

2. —THE ASSOCIATION DEFINED.

The Association is an aggregation of persons who believe “the things” covenanted to Abraham and to David, “concerning the kingdom of God and the Name of Jesus Christ,” and have therefore been “immersed into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit.”

3. —OBJECTS OF THE ASSOCIATION.

WE, THE UNDERSIGNED, whose scriptural position is defined in No. 2, DO HEREBY confederate ourselves into a visible association, for the weekly remembrance of the Lord Jesus in the breaking of bread; for the celebration of the high praises of God; for the reading of the Scriptures; for the support and proclamation of the gospel of the kingdom; and for mutual assistance in time of need.

4. —WHO ARE INVITED TO MEMBERSHIP.

“The wisdom from above being first pure, and then peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality and without hypocrisy” —we cordially invite all immersed believers of the gospel preached to Abraham, Israel, and the Gentiles, by the Angel of Jehovah, Moses, Jesus, and the apostles, who are disposed to illustrate this “wisdom from above” in word and deed, to unite with the undersigned for the purposes set forth in No. 3.

5. —WHO HAVE THE PRIVILEGE OF CHRISTIAN WORSHIP WITHOUT MEMBERSHIP.

Being the Lord’s table, and not the table of the Association, all of good report within the city or without it, who, believing the gospel of the kingdom, have been immersed, are cordially invited to worship with us; the only privileges withheld being a participation in the direction of our affairs, and speech without previous invitation.

6. — WHO ARE INADMISSIBLE TO MEMBERSHIP.

“The kingdom of God” believed being “righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit,” we hereby disallow the membership of our Association to any immersed believers who cannot prove that they walk as becomes the kingdom of God and of Christ.

7. — ADMISSION TO MEMBERSHIP.

Immersed believers of the gospel of the kingdom are admissible to membership by the unanimous consent of the Association, the absence of any objection privately stated in the presence of the applicant, who will make his application for admission to a presiding brother, or silence, being taken for consent.

The immersion of a believer of the gospel of the kingdom by a brother of our society, appointed to administer it, of itself constitutes the baptized person a member of our Association.

8. —THE EXECUTIVE OF THE ASSOCIATION.

Our Executive is for the maintenance of decency and order in the meetings of the Association; the administration of the Supper and Baptism; attending to the admission of applicants to membership; the removal of any misunderstandings or difficulties that may arise to the hindrance of the objects of the Association; the disbursement of its contributions; and for whatever else needs to be attended to in behalf of the society.

In the heritages of God, planted by the apostles — these functions, with teaching, were distributed to “apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, teachers,” “helps and directors,” endowed with certain specified natural qualifications, and appropriate spiritual gifts, “for the perfecting of them for the work of the ministry, and the edifying of the body of Christ.” These perfected saints, or holy ones perfected for the work, were the many-branched candlestick of the heritage to which they belonged. They were, collectively, the eldership or presbytery of the association, and classified by Paul, in his letter to the Philippians, as “the bishops and deacons,” or, in another place, “members in particular.” We acknowledge the desirableness of an exactly similar institution as the Executive of the Association; and could we avail ourselves of brethren possessed of the natural qualifications, specified by Paul to Timothy and Titus, in whom “the word of Christ dwelt richly in all wisdom,” we should be disposed to submit ourselves to them as “over us in the Lord;” but, seeing that at present such are not available, we agree that the executive functions of our Association shall be discharged as follows:

Three, four, or more, as the necessity of circumstances may demand in the unanimous estimation of the brethren, shall be selected because of their scriptural intelligence, good qualities and report. These select brethren shall not be regarded as “officers,” but simply as brethren in particular, specially interested in promoting the objects and welfare of the Association. After speaking of elders, called episcopoi, or bishops, i.e., overseers—Paul then proceeds to speak of others, called —diakonoi, or deacons, i.e., overseers of the poor, and of secular affairs, almoners, &c.

Of the latter, he says: “Let these ALSO first be proved,” implying by “also” that the episcopoi, or overlookers of the flock, should be proved as well as the diakonoi, or superintendents of secular affairs. These select brethren of our Association may therefore be considered, not as “bishops and deacons,” but as probationers, who may or may not become official.

¶4. One of these brethren shall preside in rotation at the meetings of the Association for the breaking of bread and mutual edification. He will regulate the meeting for breaking of bread, according to No. 11, and will be careful to see that “all things be done decently and in order,” as there prescribed. If any applications for admission to membership, or for baptism, be made upon his day, or during the ensuing week, it will be his duty to ascertain the candidates’ fitness in the presence of one or more. He will then make report of such fitness to the Association at its ordinary session, and during the “contribution;” and, if there be no objection, admission to membership shall be expressed on the following Lord’s day, by the presiding brother extending to the accepted the right hand of fellowship for the whole. If the application be for baptism, then the subject’s fitness being ascertained, the presiding brother shall administer it, or provide for its administration. At the conclusion of the meeting, he will announce the brother whose turn it will be to preside at the next assembly.

9. —EXPOSITION OF THE WORD TO THE EDIFICATION OF THE ASSOCIATION.

In Ecclesiastes it is written, “Keep thy foot when thou goest to the house of God, and be more ready to hear than to *give the sacrifice of fools; for they consider not that they do evil. Be not rash with thy mouth, and let not thine heart be hasty to utter any thing before God; for God is in heaven and thou upon earth; therefore let thy words be few."

The Apostle James also saith: "Be swift to hear, and slow to speak, slow to wrath." Yet it was said to certain of old time "perfected for the work" by the Spirit: "*Ye may all prophesy, one by one, that all may learn, and all may be comforted." "*He that prophesieth speaketh unto men to edification, and exhortation, and comfort." Exhortation is, therefore, a part of prophesying, and, in being attempted, must be done without debate "to the edifying of the Church," or not at all. Hence, the Apostle saith, speaking to the prophesiers, "Seek that ye may excel to the edifying of the Church;" and to all members in particular, "Let all things be done unto edifying."

We understand from these and other portions of the Word, "that it inculcates much thought and few words." Exhortation is hortatory instruction of a consoling character, founded on the testimony of God. We expect therefore, that those who "exhort" will first call our attention to some portion of Scripture by reading it, then show us the interpretation of what he has read, and afterwards bring it home to us in words of kindness, for our edification and comfort. To open a masked battery upon brethren is not "exhortation," and, being neither courteous nor christian, will not be allowed, but will be the duty of the presiding brother to stop it immediately, by rising and politely inviting such offender against good manners to take a seat. "Let thy words be few." In consenting, therefore, to suffer prophesying from uninspired men of ordinary talents and information, brethren will be expected to restrict themselves to fifteen minutes at most, unless at the discretion of the brother who presides.

10. —OF DIFFICULTIES AMONG MEMBERS.

If "Christ dwell in our hearts by faith," the Spirit of Christ will be there; and "where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty," or freedom from the dominion of the flesh, which is sin. Difficulties arise from the absence of this Spirit in one or both. It is the duty of brethren not to burden others with their misunderstandings, but to settle them before sundown by themselves. But if this cannot be effected, let them invite a brother to assist them in a return to oneness of mind. If the matter can by no means be reconciled, the case may then be referred to one of the select brethren, who, alone, or assisted by the other select brethren, shall labor to restore harmony without laying it before the Association. If this cannot be effected, the case may be reported to the Church, and we agree to withdraw the privileges of our society from the party who shall be manifestly in the wrong.

11. —THE ORDER OF WORSHIP.

After the custom of those instructed by the Apostles, the Association will convene for worship on the first day of the week. The members being assembled, the brother whose turn it is to preside will take the chair, and invite us to unite with him in invoking the blessing of the "Father of Lights," and his acceptance of our spiritual sacrifices in the name of Jesus Christ, the Apostle and High Priest of our confession. After this the presiding brother will invite us to sing a portion selected from the Psalms of David or the "Paraphrases," which may be proposed by himself, or by some other of the brethren, as he may prefer. The singing being ended, Scripture-reading will commence. A portion should be read from each of these four divisions: First division, from Genesis to Job, inclusive; second, from Psalms to Malachi, inclusive; third, from Matthew to Acts, inclusive; and fourth, from Romans to Revelation, inclusive. The presiding brother may distribute the reading among the best readers, reading a portion also himself according to his discretion. The four divisions are each to be read continuously to the end, beginning with the first chapter of Genesis, the first Psalm, the first chapter of Matthew, and the first chapter of Romans. After the reading, singing as before. A contribution will then be taken up, to defray whatever expenses may be incurred in carrying out the objects of the Association. The admission of members will be attended to at this juncture, according to Nos. 7, 8, ¶4.

The presiding brother will then proceed to the breaking of bread, any brother he may call upon being the medium of its distribution. He will remind the brethren of what it celebrates—as, the love of God, the self-sacrifice of Jehovah's King for the saints, and for the world of which Abraham and He, and we with them, are all the heirs, &c. He will then give thanks for the things memorialized by the bread, or invite some other so to do. After its distribution, he will proceed in like manner with the wine.

When the wine is returned to the table, he will state how much time remains for the continuance of the session, and that it can now be occupied by expositions of the Word to edification according to No. 9. When these are finished, the meeting may be concluded with singing and prayer. This order may be succinctly stated as follows:

1. Prayer by the presiding brother.
2. Singing.
3. Scripture-Reading:
 - a. From Genesis to Job.
 - b. From Psalms to Malachi.
 - c. From Matthew to Acts.
 - d. From Romans to Revelation.
4. Singing.
5. Contribution, and Reception of Members, if any.
6. Breaking of Bread, &c.
7. Exposition of the Word to edification.
8. Singing.
9. Prayer.

FORM SUBSCRIBED BY MEMBERS ADMITTED SUBSEQUENTLY TO THE FORMATION OF THE ASSOCIATION.

We, the undersigned, having duly examined the Constitution recorded in this book, in subscribing our names do thereby attest, that the position defined in No. 2 is ours; and that we approve and accept of its provisions, and are determined to abide by them, and to use our influence in causing them to be respected.

“NOTHING BUT PEACE AND PROSPERITY.”

“Blessed are ye when men shall revile you and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you, falsely, for my sake.”—JESUS CHRIST.

In Mark, the phrase “for my sake” is associated with “and the gospel’s.” The two things, Jesus and the gospel, are inseparable. He says that he was sent of God to preach the gospel of the kingdom—Luke 4: 18, 43; Matthew 4: 23;—and Jehovah hath said concerning Jesus, “Hear ye him!”—Matthew 17: 5—and again, “Unto him ye shall hearken. And I will put my words into his mouth; and he shall speak all that I shall command him. And it shall come to pass, that whosoever shall not hearken unto my word which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him”—Deuteronomy 18: 15, 18-19. And Jesus saith, “He that rejecteth me, and receiveth not my words, (the gospel of the kingdom which he preached,) hath that that judgeth him; the word (of the kingdom)—Matthew 13: 19, 23—that I have spoken, the same shall judge him in the last day. For I have not spoken of myself; but the Father who sent me, he gave me a commandment what I should say, and what I should speak. And I know that his commandment (when observed) is life everlasting; whatsoever I speak therefore, even as the Father said unto me, so I speak.” Again he saith, “The words that I speak unto you I speak not of myself; but the Father that dwelleth in me, he doth the miracles.” “If a man love me, he will keep my words. He that loveth me not, keepeth not my sayings: and the word (of the kingdom) which ye hear is not mine, but the Father’s which sent me.” It is evident then, from these declarations, that to be subject to any thing for Christ’s sake, is to be subject to it for the sake of the gospel of the kingdom preached by him. He judgeth of men’s attachment and devotion to his person by their veneration and devotion to the gospel he preached. He associates the not receiving of his words with the rejection of himself, and tells us plainly that a man does not love him who does not keep his sayings. This intimate connection between the preacher and his doctrine is not surprising, in view of his saying that he is himself “the truth.” “I am the truth,” saith he; and says Peter, “Ye have purified your souls in the obeying of the truth.” Hence, where the truth is, Christ is; therefore, Paul says, “God grant that Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith.” He, then, that believes “the things concerning God and the name of Jesus Christ,” is the man in whose heart Christ dwells; because the truth dwells there with full assurance of faith and hope. The Bible is the truth in a book; Christ is the truth incarnate; and a Christian is the truth in his heart lovingly obeyed. It is nonsense for a man to talk of “loving the Lord Jesus” while he receives not his words. The Lord thanks no man for a mere lip-love—a love that rejoiceth not in the truth, believeth not all things, and hopeth not all things.

From what hath been said, then, the reader will see that to be spoken evil of for Christ’s sake, is to be spoken evil of on account of the gospel of the kingdom which he preached. Men will bear with you in any thing you may teach, provided you maintain nothing offensive to their self-complacency. They profess to be pious, to be zealous for God, to love the Lord Jesus, to believe the gospel, and to have obeyed it. Take care then how you define Bible things; and see that you do not come to conclusions incompatible with their piety, zeal, love, faith and practice. If you do, then farewell to your good name and standing in the estimation of those under the malevolent influence of their revilings. I speak from twenty years’ experience of the like, and therefore know truly whereof I affirm.

Now the great practical question at issue between me and my contemporaries, is “the gospel of the kingdom of God.” We have seen by our references that the Lord Jesus preached it in obedience to the command of the Father. And besides this, he declared that the gospel which he preached before he was crucified, should be preached for a testimony to all nations. His words are, “And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in the whole habitable—for a testimony to all the nations” of that region. The same gospel then that Jesus preached to the house of Judah and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, was to be preached to the nations of the then civilized world. This the apostles began to do in the name of Jesus, several years after they commenced operations in Jerusalem on Pentecost. The difference between their preaching of the gospel and that of Jesus, was that between promises unfulfilled and promises fulfilled to a very limited extent. So far as the promises were fulfilled in the death, burial, and resurrection of Jesus, as the Son and King anointed of Jehovah, the accomplished facts became the foundation or basis of the conditions, by conformity to which, Jews and Gentiles might become heirs of the promises yet largely unfulfilled. The facts and the doctrine or teaching predicated upon them, constitute “the mystery of the gospel,” or “things concerning the name of Jesus,” and therefore, “the mystery of Christ,” which are not two mysteries, but one. Jesus preached the gospel of the kingdom minus the mystery in his own name, because it was still a hidden mystery, and must have so continued until he was “perfected;” the apostles preached the same gospel with its mystery, because it was no longer hidden, but commanded to be proclaimed.

Our contemporaries do not understand this matter: they have lost sight of the gospel of the kingdom; and as a substitute for it, preach a few items of the mystery imperfectly, as the condition of the salvation of what they heathenishly style the immortal soul in kingdoms beyond the skies! Our pulpit orators, who learn their divinity in theological schools and colleges, preach every thing but the gospel of the kingdom. With respect to this, they are in heathen darkness, knowing nothing as they ought to know. Their system of Gentilism is to blame for this. The systems make them what they are, and with grateful and devoted hearts, they uphold and glorify their Alma Maters in return.

My courteous friend, the President of Bethany College, is of this class of orators and orator-makers. So ignorant of the gospel of the kingdom is he, that he can pen the following rhapsody without a blush, as a specimen of the things that play not around the head, but come to the very heart itself!

“Man,” says he, “the most sublime and awful object that man himself or angel ever saw, was predestined and created for a citizenship in the whole universe, and not for any locality in the solar or material realms. God and his whole creation is the patrimonial inheritance of man. God himself is his portion. Therefore all things are man’s, because man is Christ’s, and Christ’s is God’s Son, and the heir of all things.”

Thus, Mr. Campbell gives the lie point blank to God. I do not say he does so willfully; but in effect he does. He says, that “man is not created for any locality in the solar or material realms.” Hear then what Jehovah hath decreed concerning Christ’s inheritance, to whom, according to Mr. C., man belongs. “Thou art my Son; this day (of thy resurrection) I have begotten thee. I will give thee the nations for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession.” These are the “all things” of which Jehovah’s anointed King is “the heir”—the nations and the earth. And the saints, his brethren, being “joint heirs with him,” are heirs also of the same. Are not these material realms? “The kingdoms of the world become our Lord and his Anointed’s, and he shall reign in the ages of the ages.” If these realms are not material and located in the solar system, they must be no where!

“Jehovah,” saith the Psalmist, “built his sanctuary like the earth which he hath established for ever.” “The righteous,” saith Solomon, “shall be recompensed in the earth: much more the wicked and the sinner.” “The righteous shall never be removed; but the wicked shall not inherit the earth.” “The heaven, even the heavens are Jehovah’s: but the earth hath he given to the sons of men.” “The earth abideth ever.” “Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth.” “Thou hast redeemed us by thy blood; and hast made us kings and priests for God; and we shall reign upon the earth.” Do not these passages prove that man is created for terrestrial locality for ever, when he shall have been freed from all present evil? Mr. Campbell says he is not; the Scripture says he is: therefore let God be true, and every man a liar that approves not His sayings.

Banishing man finally from this planet to some transpolar region, Mr. Campbell of course has no great faith in God’s promise to Abraham in regard to his and his Seed’s everlasting possession of the Holy Land. He reduces all these to a deception practiced upon the Friend of God, who died in hope of rising from the dead to possess the land in which he had been a wanderer and sojourner, dwelling in tents upon it, like his descendants, the Ishmaelites, with Isaac and Jacob. Virtually denying these promises, the gospel of the kingdom is to him “an opinion,” “a fable,” “an hypothesis," "a fiction;" and therefore no bond of union or term of communion.

The issue between Mr. Campbell, the supervisor of 300,000 "disciples," and myself is the gospel. I affirm that he is in heathen darkness concerning it, and utterly devoid of faith in the promises of God. He does not even know what faith is, as appears from these words: "It is a great point gained," says he, "to know and to appreciate that faith is the belief of facts!" What a wonderful attainment in College divinity! and yet how unscriptural! But Paul denies the supervisor's definition, and says, "Faith is the assured expectation of things hoped for, the conviction of things unseen." Things hoped for are not facts, but promises. A scriptural faith is therefore the belief of promises. This was Abraham's faith, but not Mr. Campbell's: his is a belief of facts, and hence the difference between the Friend of God and him. Matter-of-fact people are the children of the flesh, who are not the children of God; "but the children of the promise are counted for the seed." The children of the promise are they who, believing the promises covenanted to Abraham, are constituted "in Isaac," by induction into Christ by baptism into his name. "In Isaac shall thy seed be called." "Now, we, brethren, as Isaac was, are the children of the promise. But as then he that was born after the flesh persecuted him that was born after the spirit, even so it is now." Hence, Messrs. Campbell and Wallis, children of the flesh, like Ishmael of old, having neither reason nor testimony to adduce in defence of their positions, avenge their chafed and troubled souls in speaking evil falsely of him who convicts them of ignorance and sin against the truth. It is only occasionally that I catch a glimpse of their periodicals; but when I do, I find them still at their old work of slaying thrice the slain! No doubt they are gratified, and their readers more strongly walled in by the prejudice they have laboured to create against me. I read their foolishness with a mingled feeling of pity and gratification. I pity the poor men for their folly; yet I am gratified that in reviling me, and saying all manner of evil of me for the gospel's sake, they are preparing for me the blessedness promised in the text.

In the British Millennial Harbinger for May are two letters republished from the American Millennial Harbinger, with a few comments by editor Wallis. One is from an acquaintance, of mine in Paisley, Scotland, named Matthew Tannehill, a member of the Baptist church in that town, to Dr. R. Richardson, of Bethany College, Virginia. The other letter is from A. Campbell to what he styles the "Church of Christ meeting in Paisley." Matthew Tannehill, if I mistake not the gentleman, is brother to the Paisley poet of that name. While I sojourned in that town, he was quite friendly and attentive, and very desirous that I should correspond with them on my return to this country. He seemed to be quite interested in my lectures, and very gracious in his behaviour. But the word preached seemed to have its usual effect of disturbing the peace of the carnally minded. Some appear to have received it, but with what degree of intelligence I cannot say. There was no division, or talk of it, while I was there; but from Matthew's testimony to his "dear brother Richardson," it would seem that trouble appeared in the camp which was not allayed until a separation ensued. Before the separation the congregation divided upon the question of the gospel, some maintaining this, others that, concerning it. The minority was in favour of its having relation to the kingdom hereafter to be established in the Holy Land. The majority, ever opposed to the truth in all ages, was unconvincingly opposed to "the gospel of the kingdom of God" in the Paisley church. The minority, finding this, could not regret their exclusion from the Baptist church, styled "the Church of Christ" by Mr. Campbell. About thirty "were separated." As a consequence of this ejection from the synagogue, all agitation about the gospel ceased. So when Paul and his disciples were cast out, the synagogues reverted to their former peaceful ignorance of the truth. The majority had it all their own way. The contention for the faith once delivered to the saints was silenced! and skykingdom glorification of disembodied ghosts resumed its undisturbed sway over Matthew Tannehill and his co-religionists. "I have been," saith he, "a member of the Paisley church fifteen years, and at no period of its history was it in a more flourishing state than at present, (January 10, 1853;) and for a considerable time past—ever since the disciples of Dr. Thomas left us, or were separated—we have had nothing but peace and prosperity. I think the church has doubled its members, if not more, since that time." Peace and prosperity evinced by a dead silence respecting the Word of the kingdom preached by Jesus and the apostles; and the consequent doubling of the numbers of the majority! Suppress the truth, Matthew, and the multitude will crowd your meeting-house, and keep the water of your "large pre-pulpit baptistery, so exceedingly convenient," in constant agitation! Evil and the foolish multitude go hand in hand.

The minority who were striving for intelligence in the "one faith" became a dispersion; and Matthew Tannehill, not understanding God's dealings with the friends of his truth, "thinks they are near their end." Had Matthew lived in the days of the apostles, when the Jerusalem mother of all apostolic churches was scattered to the four winds, leaving only the apostles in the Holy City, he would have thought that the dispersed were near their end likewise; for Matthew would have been the same Matthew then as now—doubtless as profound a thinker after the manner of men. But with all his depth, he fails to discern from the examples or the Word, that it is no part of God's plan for believers of the gospel of the kingdom to be living in peaceful and prosperous communities. When they got "rich, and increased in goods, and said they had need of nothing," or "in a flourishing state," as Matthew terms it, he put an end to their ecclesiastical prosperity and peace by scattering them abroad to preach the Word. The kingdom can only be entered through much tribulation, and not through prosperity and peace. Have peace among yourselves, but in the world ye shall have tribulation. Peace and prosperity keep tribulation from Matthew's door. He and his have found a new course to the kingdom. They have left the stormy regions for the trade-winds of peace and quietness. All sails are spread to the gentle breeze, and the crew of the Paisley bark are lazily extended on the deck, dreaming of "nothing but peace and prosperity!"

The circumstances under which the minority separated were very unfavourable to peace among themselves in the outset. If they could have had some one with them well instructed in the truth to show them at once the way in which they should walk, having the disposition to know and do the will of God, there would have been no scope for disputings. But being only in the beginning of things, and having none to help them, it was only by a mutual expression of their various convictions that the truth could be more fully brought out. This collision of views would naturally have a winnowing effect on the original thirty, so as to "sift them as wheat" till all the chaff would fly away. This sifting process, if Matthew's testimony be correct, seems to have reduced their number considerably. But there is no help for this. "Many are called" (to God's kingdom and glory,) but only the "few are chosen;" for the few alone have faith enough to be saved. The agitation so much deprecated by the lovers of "smooth things," is God's agency for the taking out of the few for the name of Christ that may be for the time being hid in the churches of the Gentiles. Where there is "nothing but peace and prosperity" there are either none of "the few" to bring out, or they have all been separated, and none but the chaff or tares remain. Let a Baptist or Campbellite, or other church, remain in "nothing but peace and prosperity" undisturbed, and there is no chance of a soul of them coming to the knowledge of the gospel preached by Jesus and his apostles. They remain perfectly shut up in unbelief—shut up to the faith once revealed, but now generally lost sight of. Their pulpiteers cannot teach them, being ignorant themselves; and if their orators, and editors, and college professors, be in outer darkness, what can the people do? Their case is hopeless. They have the Bible, indeed, but they say the prophets are unintelligible; and if these cannot be understood, it is impossible to understand the apostles; for these only "preached the gospel of God which he had promised before by his prophets in the Holy Scriptures." The parallel between the Jewish synagogue of old time, and the modern churches of the Gentiles, in regard to their being "shut up to the faith," is exact. It was only by sending a "pestilent fellow" like Paul among them to agitate their minds, that they could be brought to see into the meaning of the prophets. What he preached threw them into an uproar, turned them into debating societies, caused them to devour each other, and to proceed to the greatest extremities, so that he was himself oftentimes in jeopardy and sore afraid. He "necessarily became repellent" to the unbelieving, who resolved all his reasoning from the Scriptures into mere opinion and speculation. Still it was wisely and benevolently arranged. To agitate the synagogue by introducing new things among them, was God's plan for "opening their eyes, and turning them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God." The result of the apostle's stormy disputes was good. The honest and good hearts of the bystanders received the kingdom, and were at length separated by the apostle from the rest who blasphemed the Word and reproached the speaker. Having accomplished this, the agitation died away, and "nothing but peace and prosperity" prevailed among the unbelieving Jews, after they had expelled that "unfortunate man," Paul, and his disciples.

It is said that "History is ever reproducing itself." It seems to be so to some extent in the history of my career for a few years past. Jesus sent Paul to agitate the peaceful synagogues; I am invited by peaceful societies to come and lay before them my views. I go, and expound to them what I see written in the Scriptures. I go to speak what I believe is the truth, not to ascertain what they believe, and then repeat it. It matters not to me what the society believes; I go to tell them what the Scriptures teach. This is all that I or they need care to know. I speak it without circumlocution or apology, in an open and straightforward manner, and leave it with them for their consideration. It would be strange if the Word rightly divided in this cloudy and dark day did not agitate men's minds. It is a good sign when such an effect is produced. Where it is not, it argues a hard-hearted insensibility to "the deep things of God.” Intelligent, thoughtful minds must be agitated when they find that God’s way is not theirs. They express their views of what has been shown them. They begin to think it must be so. Their brethren are alarmed for the old creed, and become suddenly filled with zeal, and speak evil of the “new doctrine.” Finding their position unsustainable by Scripture, they resort to clamour, to reproach, to the exercise of authority, and at length to expulsion of the “perverted.” Their peace has been disturbed, indeed, but the agitation has proved a benefit—it has separated the wheat from the chaff, which having been thoroughly cleaned, is preserved until the time arrives to remove the chaff out of the way. Like the “pestilent” Paul, I have the honour to be reproached by the enemy, who naturally entertains no good will towards the disturber of his peace. He speaks “all manner of evil of me falsely,” I am happy to know, and charges me with views and practices which have no existence save in the malevolence of his own fleshly mind. The following tirade is a specimen of this sort of thing from the pen of President Campbell. It forms three paragraphs of his letter “to the Church of Christ in Paisley, with its bishops and deacons;” which appears to have been elicited by Matthew Tannehill’s epistle to Dr. Richardson; a morsel of gossip too precious not to be magnified into a more formal condemnation of myself and friends. The following are his words: —

“Doctors of theology, as such—doctors of medicine—doctors of philosophy—doctors of opinions (to which learned class Doctor Thomas belongs)—have no moral chairs or moral authority, no ecclesiastical power, no prescriptive rights over the understanding, the conscience, or the hearts of the citizens of Messiah’s spiritual empire. There is no spiritual nourishment in mere opinion, or in human science, falsely so called. These play round the head, but come not to the heart.

“Opinions and speculative views on any subject—human depravity, divine grace, election, the fall of man, the millennium, the essences of things, divine or human—flatter pride, feed the imagination, centre in self-esteem, and terminate in schism.

“The history of this unfortunate man is a monument of its fatal tendencies. With respectable talents, a medium education, a decent diction, and many good opportunities, he has only bewildered himself and a few disciples; and by his own puffing, has puffed them up into a bloated self-esteem, and a supreme contempt for all who will not do homage to the idol which he has set up. A speculative, self-confident neologist, on any subject, with some fervour and fluency, may bewilder a few unstable souls, and lead them captive at his will. But the spell soon passes away. The human mind demands a more substantial bill of fare. Ephraim became lean while he fed upon the wind, but when joined to his idols, the oracle commanded to let him alone. To reason against dogmatism, is as hopeless as to reason with a spiritual rapper of the present day, or as it was with a second Adventist in the year FORTY-SEVEN. It is a wise and benevolent arrangement, that such theorists necessarily become repellent, and like some of the pests of ancient times, devour each other and annihilate themselves.”

This extract is a sketch of the original as it appears to the limner through the haze of his own prejudices and misconceptions. All things with friend Campbell are “opinions and speculative views,” which are not comprehended in his limited matter-of-fact creed. He very carefully keeps out of sight “the gospel of the kingdom,” which is the real ground of difference between me and all others who oppose. This is not one of his “facts,” and therefore rejected as an opinion. What he calls my opinions and speculative views, I am prepared to show are the things revealed in the Word of God for faith. My full assurance of their truth, and earnest expression of it, he styles “dogmatism;” and the gospel of the kingdom, the idol I have set up for all to worship! He perceives, however, that any attempt on his part to reason successfully against the things I advocate, is hopeless. It is; for he must bring not only reason, but God’s testimony, to bear against me. This he is incompetent to do, dwelling in outer darkness as far as intelligence in the “sure word of prophecy” is concerned. “This unfortunate man,” as he styles me, “is a monument” of strong men being prostrated by God’s weakness in modern times. God has ever chosen persons despised by their contemporaries to bring to nothing the theology of the schools. He does not use the wise in their own conceit, professors and presidents of divinity establishments, to enlighten the people. He leaves them in their solemn foolishness as blind to lead the blind; and takes fishermen, and carpenters, and tentmakers, and healers of the sick, &c., to reduce their “wisdom” to absurdity, “that no flesh should glory in his presence.” This is very mortifying to the founder of Bethany College, who “desires to fit and furnish men for church and state, as well as for the physical, the intellectual, the moral, the spiritual, and the eternal universe.” But God will not accept his services in this work; for the simple reason, that he is unqualified for it. One thing thou lackest—understanding and faith in the promises of God. Without this, thy desires are vanity and vexation of soul.

When a great dog bays the moon, all the little village curs must take a turn. This is often annoying to the weary traveller, who would rather sleep than count the hours of the steeple clock. But experience teaches the expediency of letting the dogs bark until they perceive that the great dog sees no more in the moon to bay. It is no use giving chase to them with wrath. The exercise would be too fatiguing, and bootless withal; for bark they will until there is no more bark in them. Paul appears to have been a good deal annoyed by dogs; therefore he cautions all who follow his track to “beware of dogs.” I apprehend it was not the barking dogs he cared so much for, as about those sneaking, grinning, snarling curs, which Isaiah describes as “dumb dogs that cannot bark; sleeping, lying down, loving to slumber; greedy dogs that can never have enough,” and when they come upon you they would as soon “bite and devour” you, as seize upon a bone. “Give not things holy unto dogs,” saith Jesus; for “it is not fit to take the children’s meat and to throw it unto dogs.” There are no dogs in the Holy City. This is constituted of Christ’s sheep; and all “the dogs are without.”

But to return from this digression about the dogs, or “blind and ignorant watchmen,” to editor Wallis of the British Millennial Harbinger by a reference to whom I was about to conclude this article. His great exemplar, my friend the Bethanian President, having bayed “this unfortunate man,” whom he styles “moon-stricken,” to his heart’s content, the small gentleman of Peck Lane seizes the opportunity of bow-wow-ing approbation of the great growl generated by Matthew Tannehill’s piquant allusion to “Dr. Thomas’ disciples,” and echoed in the epistolary extract above recited. “Elder” James Wallis thus delivers himself in a note appended to the president-professor’s letter to the Paisley “Church of Christ.”

“Any theory of religion, or speculation of the human mind, that causes division among those who are united together in Christian fellowship, on the principles of one body, one spirit, one hope—one Lord, one faith, one immersion—one God and Father of all, who is above all, through all, and in all disciples of Christ—is not from God. The union produced by the indwelling of the Holy Spirit in the hearts of believers, is that which springs from love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, fidelity, meekness, temperance, for against such there is no law. ‘And they that are Christ’s have crucified the flesh, with the affections and lusts.’ Since, then, we are made alive by the Spirit, let us also walk in and by his directions. Let us not be vainglorious, provoking one another, envying one another, because of the different gifts and temporal blessings conferred upon any, and of which we may not ourselves be partakers. So far as our knowledge and observation extend, no novel theorist or bold materialist has caused more divisions and unfruitfulness of soul among his associates, than the celebrated Dr. Thomas, to whom the above letter refers.”

The writer of the above assumes for an acknowledged truth, what he, or any one else connected with him, has never proved, namely, that those communities he styles churches of Christ are congregations of true believers. Nothing is from God that divides a genuine Christian church; and that is an offence of which I am entirely guiltless. The things I have brought out from the prophets and apostles have divided churches of Campbellite and Millerite “disciples;” but never a church of Christ. A church of Christ is not so easily divided; because it is composed of people who have intelligently obeyed the gospel of the kingdom; and such are not to be turned about by every wind of doctrine that happens to blow. The members of such a church have “full assurance of faith and hope,” and are not to be turned from their steadfastness by “any theory of religion, or speculation of the human mind.” The divisions I am accused of making have been produced by some embracing “the testimony of God” declared. Mr. Wallis errs in stating that “those” he refers to “are united together in Christian fellowship on the principles of” the unities he quotes from Paul. The Campbellite body is not the “One Body.” It is infidel of the “One hope of the calling.” Its faith is not the “One Faith,” but a mere belief of facts; and its immersion is not the “One Baptism,” because it is not predicated on the one faith of the things hoped for and unseen. From the one faith, hope, and baptism, it is as alien as any of its sister sects. Campbellite churches profess indeed to be united together on the principle indicated; but we have learned to know that “profession is not principle” in this world of hypocrisy and sham. Paul was "bound with a chain" for the one hope, which he tells us is "Israel's hope," but one which the Campbellite "disciples" ridicule as a mere carnal and Jewish idea, beneath the regard of a Christian! There is no "indwelling of the Holy Spirit in the hearts of" such believers; for the Holy Spirit dwells not with scoffers at "that good thing which Jehovah hath promised to the house of Israel and the house of Judah:" he dwells not in hearts which are strangers to the promises; nor is he the author of Campbellite "union, love, joy, peace, &c." These result from mere partisanship, as I know by hard-earned experience. Cease to glorify the president of Bethany College; show that he and his preaching associates are now and have been for years constituting themselves transgressors by building up again the things they laboured to destroy; testify in behalf of the neglected and despised prophetic writings; plead for the gospel of the kingdom of God, &c., and you will soon hear the cry raised, "This fellow is not one of us! He is a sower of discord among brethren, a dogmatist, a schismatic, a disturber of the peace wherever he goes, a bold materialist;" with many other epithets of a like complimentary character. All their love, joy, peace, and gentleness are gone; but every evil work remains. They condemn in others what they glorify in themselves. Look at their Supervisor! He writes to the Baptist church in Paisley, styling it "the Church of Christ" there. Now, if that be a church of Christ, so are all the others of that denomination in fellowship with it. Where, I ask, is the man that has created more schisms in such churches of Christ than A. Campbell? He acknowledges them to be churches of Christ, and their members Christians; and yet has set them all by the ears, has destroyed many of them root and branch, and made them a standing jest in word and deed! Yet this is the man with his associates that speak evil of me; because, in "reasoning with the people out of the Scriptures," communities which I do not acknowledge are Christ's are agitated, and sometimes divided by the majority casting out the few who may respond to the testimony presented! But why is Mr. Campbell so changed as by his present practice to convict himself of sin, of defiling the temple of God, and therefore himself obnoxious to destruction? Why does he now condemn others for doing what he once gloried to do? In answer to the former inquiry, I reply that he has grown vainglorious in his old age. He seeks that sort of glory in which other men of the world delight—that of being the founder of a college, which, being endowed, shall place him in the estimation of posterity among the great men of their antiquity! When engaged in creating schisms among the Presbyterians and Baptists of former years, and denouncing schools and colleges, Bible and Missionary Societies, he was small in his own eyes; had not then been puffed up by the fulsome flattery of the ignorant multitude; and had not apostatised from the mottoes of his "Christian Baptist," to the imposition of his own presidential and professional authority upon a confederacy of churches from a theological throne. Having matured his sectarian and collegiate speculations, and incurred heavy responsibilities in carrying them out, the mammon of unrighteousness is greatly in demand; and more is needed than can be extracted from his own flock. He finds it necessary therefore to milk the goats; and as the Baptists were once goats and treated as such, it became necessary to propitiate them! His policy is to cajole them now, and to preach up union and communion for the sake of the loaves and fishes they may be persuaded to contribute to the carrying out of his schemes. In reply to the latter inquiry, he condemns others for being remote causes of divisions, because it disturbs his schemes. Having worked things up to their present stagnation, he deprecates all agitation of his waters, lest they should be lashed into a storm, and mar his pride of life. Foolish and blind is he! Sowing to the wind with the certainty, if he live long enough, of reaping the whirlwind. Blind, and unable to see, not afar off, but objects near at hand! He is labouring to endow a college for his sect, that shall continue for ages; and cannot see that the Judge is actually standing at the door, and exclaiming, "Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garment, that he walk not naked, and that they see not his shame!" A pretty educator of youth for the church is this! Cannot discern the signs of the times; and yet pretends to "prescriptive rights over the understanding, the conscience, and the hearts of the citizens of Messiah's spiritual empire;" of which he has no more scriptural conception than the tiara adorned prophet of "Eternal Rome!" We must look beyond the examples found in Messrs. Campbell and Wallis, for those who have "crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts." Enjoying the fat things of the present evil world, and as much of its honours and wealth as they can grasp, they are the last men who should taunt me with neglect of the Christian duty. They have been labouring for years for what this world affords, and they have obtained it. They are rich in this world's stuff. They can count up their thousands of mammon; their flocks and herds; their broad acres and coal fields; endowments and houses, and fashionable goods. But of all these things "the unfortunate man" they revile and speak evil of falsely is almost as destitute of as the Great Founder of Christianity himself. I have not laboured for these things, and therefore have not acquired them. While they have been covering themselves with fatness, I have been labouring without hire, and trusting to Providence for supplies, in the work of opening the blind eyes, and of turning men from Gentilism to the intelligent belief of the knowledge of God as revealed in the old and new Scriptures. The things set forth in these writings are doubtless "novel theories" to Mr. Wallis, whose mental vision is bounded by the horizon of the Bethanian theology. The greater part of God's word is a novelty to this: as much as perhaps the “new doctrine” introduced into Athens was to the Epicureans and Stoics of old. I must not therefore be angry with Mr. Wallis for styling me “a novel theorist;” but rather accept it as a compliment to my industry and independence of research, that notwithstanding so many thousands are professedly studying the Scriptures with all the aids that college learning can afford them, and fail to bring out any thing more than a fancied demonstration of the articles of faith bequeathed by the fathers of Protestantism; I, under no obligation to their theologies, have become celebrated for the new things I have extracted from the divine treasury, causing less of the soul-fruitfulness approved by the world’s wise men, than any other. But Mr. W. does not intend the epithet as a compliment. I will not, however, quarrel with him for this. I plead guilty to the indictment. I have theorised new things from God’s Word. That is, I have brought out God’s theory, which is new to my contemporaries. It is the divine plan or system yet subsisting only in the mind of Jehovah, revealed in the Bible—a purpose, not yet an accomplished fact, but a matter of promise, and propounded to the heirs of promise, for their faith. In bringing out this novelty to Messrs. Campbell, Wallis and Co., I have done no more than every student of the Word ought to do, though it has, indeed, been very offensive to them, who have proved themselves incompetent to do likewise. Be not angry at me, my friends, for this thing; for it is commendable before God. “Every Scribe,” saith Jesus, “instructed for the kingdom of the heavens is like to a man who is master of a house, that bringeth forth out of his treasure things new and old.” Ye style me “a novel theorist and bold materialist” for this; but Jesus, you perceive, regards the bringer-forth of new things as one “instructed for the kingdom.” How different this judgement to yours! The soul-unfruitfulness of my associates consists in their not yielding fruit agreeable to your depraved tastes. But who in their right mind would care to be approved by you, seeing that your judgment is so diverse from His who spake not as man, but as the oracle of God? Suffer ye then this word of reproof; and be ye awakened by it to the conviction, that it is high time to awake from our daydreams to the stern realities of that great and terrible day which is stealing upon the world.

OUR VISIT TO HOLLAND.

I propose in the following pages to begin the conclusion of the narrative of my visit to Europe. During my absence from America I had but little leisure for recreation, my travels generally terminating in interviews with the public, the anticipation of which necessarily prevented that unbending of the mind so essential to the free and easy, by which our constitutional energies are recruited.

Some of my friends very kindly invited me to accompany them to various notable places in their several vicinities; such as Keddleston Park, Dovedale, and Matlock, in Derbyshire; Knaresboro' Castle in Yorkshire; Newstead Abbey, the late Lord Byron's seat, in Nottinghamshire; Holyrood, the Falls of Clyde, the fine scenery of the Tay, Loch Lomond, Loch Catherine, the Trosachs, Bridge of Allan, Stirling Castle, &c., &c. The weather being fine on all these occasions, I need scarcely say, that the excursions were highly interesting and agreeable. I might say much of what I saw in all this beautiful scenery, and of the impressions made upon my mind by the sublime and picturesque; but the story has been so often told by tourists, and my feelings in the case are of so little consequence to other people, that I deem it best to dismiss the subject by saying, that I have seen enough of the surface of our globe to satisfy me, that when finished it will make a sufficiently splendid and magnificent inheritance for intelligences of the largest capacities and most scriptural aspirations. It needs only that development of which it is capable by the hand of God, to make it a heavenly world. Substitute righteousness for sin, and perfect what remains unfinished in its wastes and barrens, and no better heaven need be sought than our earth, when the Lord is there.

I saw two relics of the past, in Stirling Castle, which, it may be interesting to the reader to know, have an existence. If he be a Presbyterian and rich, he would perhaps give as much for the one as a very foolish person gave for the coal-heaver's chair; * and if a son of the old Puritan church militant, he might not fall far short of his "true blue" companion in his bid for the other. These were Oliver Cromwell's hat, and John Knox's pulpit. The hat was made of black leather, and was large, heavy, and of very ample brim. It was made to fit upon an ordinary hat; and, I should think, rendered the head and shoulders beneath them safe from sabre-cuts. If the Scotch pulpits were generally like that in Stirling Castle, they were inferior to some I could name in our American wilderness, their "whittlings" nevertheless. It is John Knox's pulpit, the narrow square box in which the disciple of John Calvin stood when he thundered forth his denunciations against the Pope and Mary, the Scottish Queen. This has sanctified the wood in the "Covenant" heart, and to this present saved it from the flames of devouring fire.

* Huntington, a hypercalvinist or Antinomian celebrity of the last century, and originally a coal-heaver, who wrote a book styled "The Bank of Faith," and used to sign himself "S.S.," or Sinner Saved. His followers were so devoted to his memory that one of them gave £300, or $1461, for his old arm-chair.

My labours in Britain having been at length brought to a close, I concluded on a visit to "the Continent" before leaving Europe for the United States. Two friends agreed to accompany me. Accordingly, on September 6th. 1850, we waited upon the Prussian Consul-General for Great Britain and Ireland to obtain permission to travel in foreign parts, or, as our facetious friend expressed it, "to visit our foreign relations." We obtained three documents called "passports," one for each, in which were noted down our ages, heights, colour of our hair, eyebrows, and eyes; shape of our noses and mouth; beard or no beard, and divers other particulars by which we might be known to the gens d'armes of Europe as true and loyal persons, upon whom constables and jailers had no legal claim. In the left corner of the pass at the foot, we signed our names under the words, "undershrift des Pass Inhabers;" and in the right, opposite the green consular seal, "B. Hebelers" signed his, not forgetting to demand of us ten shillings sterling a piece, for his "Koniglich Preussische" permission to cross the sea without being forbidden to go ashore.

Being thus royally provided, we left London on September 7th, at eleven A.M. in the steamer "Rhine" for Rotterdam, the birthplace of the renowned Erasmus. We were at sea all that day and until 10 A.M. of the next day, being a tolerably pleasant voyage of twenty-three hours. It might have been shorter; but not being able to cross “the Brille” because of the lowness of the tide, we had to make a detour of several miles to get at the city. At 4 A.M. we were off Helvoetsluys, where we “lay-to” for a short time; and by way of settling the stomach (and not being in good health, mine was very infirm) after the qualms of the preceding voyage, we occupied the time in drinking, not Holland gin, but some muddy-looking and ill-flavoured coffee. During the next six hours we passed Williamstadt, Dordrecht, and several other old-fashioned Dutch towns. The natural aspect of the country presented but few attractions. It is low and flat, and but little above the water-level, and in many parts below it. Nothing but a pressure from without could have induced its original settlers to set up their habitations in so swampy and unpicturesque a region. The fens of Lincolnshire, or the extended marsh lands of other low countries in America, are a fair representation of this part of Holland.

Rotterdam was a cheering sight after steaming six hours among these flats. On landing at the Stoomboot Maatschappij we were stopped by two gens d’armes in uniform, with swords at their sides, who in good English very courteously demanded our passports. After paying two dollars thirty-seven and a half cents apiece for them, and having use for them afar off, we were unwilling to comply. We desired to know when, where, and how, we should meet with them again. They informed us that the documents would be quite safe, and that we could obtain them next morning at the Bureau de Police in the Stadt Huis; where the “Signalement des Pass Inhabers,” or the particulars of the passports, are noted in a book, together with the name of the place to which you may be bound. Having surrendered upon this explanation, we passed on; and having no more baggage than we could conveniently carry in hand, we escaped detention by custom-house officials. Cabmen and “touters” crowded the pier, clamouring for “fares” and boarders with as much obstreperousness as in New York itself, only that the police will not allow them to rush on board as they do when steamers make fast to our piers. They rush upon you, however, as if they would “bag you” for themselves at all hazards. A traveller landing at the same place, says, “After delivering my passport, a custom-house officer cried ‘halt!’ but, on seeing my modest equipment, bade me pass on without examination. A few paces farther, at the verge of the quay, I was again arrested by a group of men who insisted upon my going to the custom-house. In vain I represented that my baggage had been ‘passed;’ whether or no, they would bar my passage. I made a feint of yielding, and doubling round a vigilante, as the cabs are named, made off towards the Berliner Hof, the hotel to which I had been commended. The party had perhaps watched my movements, for they rushed after me, and were about to renew their clamour, when a tall man came up and dispersed them, after inquiring in English if the officer had passed me. I afterwards found that the stoppage was ‘a dodge’ on the part of the cab drivers, their object being to compel their victims to escape from the difficulty by a ride.” The “touters” beset us more than the drivers, recommending their several hotels to our favourable regards. But we were deaf to their appeals, being determined on peripatetic, not being burdened with more luggage than each could conveniently carry; and on the agreeable novelty of making discoveries for ourselves in a strange city, where the language of the people was “all Dutch to us,” and therefore as unintelligible as could be wished. We pushed on, therefore, through the crowd, not knowing whither we went. After walking for some time, in directions where hotels seemed to be remarkably scarce, I asked a boy about thirteen years old, in my own tongue of course, but under the supposition that he might possibly be an Anglo-Saxon, if he could tell me where I could find a respectable hotel? Whether my barbarian speech or my beard alarmed him, I cannot say; but he stared at me with open mouth for a few moments, and then by a strong effort, as if to break the spell which bound him, he started off with the velocity of a hare, without answering me a word. Observing the effect recently of my beard upon a Negro boy in Virginia, who on catching a glimpse of me bawled out his master’s message some twenty yards off, and then retreated to the top of a fence, ready to drop over to the farther side and run at my approach; I suspect it was my appearance, and not my speech that made the miniature Dutchman increase the distance between us with all dispatch. I suppose he had never seen a beard before, for the Hollanders make their faces as much like those of boys and women as the keenness of a razor’s edge can accomplish. I was very much struck with the difference in this respect between them and their former fellow-citizens, the Belgians. The latter, as well as the Prussians and Germans, wear enormous beards, unless the fashion has changed since my visit. I attribute this to a political cause. The Belgians, who rebelled against the Dutch government in 1830, are a revolutionary population, sympathising with the progressistas of all other European countries. The Hollanders are content to follow the customs of their fathers, whose plodding industry, and sturdy assertion of their rights and freedom, has placed them, in their own esteem at least, in advance of all the world. Progress, except in the accumulation of ducats, has no charms for the Netherlander. His fathers shaved; why, then, should he forbear? But other nations groaning under the despotism of shaveling priests and royal knaves, are not so contented with their lot as he. They cease to shave, as a testimony against smooth-faced hypocrisy, which they regard as the source of all their evils. Hence the beard has become the symbol of “advanced ideas;” and consequently obnoxious to all partisans of “old opinions,” be they civil, ecclesiastical, or social. For this cause the Pope and his cardinals, bishops, priests, and deacons, “all shaven and shorn,” and the clergy of all sects in western “Christendom,” are hostile to the beard; and wherever their influence is felt, cause it to be suppressed. This is preeminently the case in Rome, where it is forbidden to be worn; and though Holland is intensely Protestant, yet, on the principles, I suppose, of anti-Belgianism or extremes meeting, the Dutch are in fellowship with the Pope in the repudiation of the beard.

Getting no information from the boy, we walked on, until at length we espied the Hotel d’Elberfeld, at the Vlasmarket Hoek and Speiger. Having introduced ourselves to “mine host” as well as we could with our English, imperfectly understood by a man who spoke a patois made up of his own Dutch and our Anglo-Saxon, we arranged to abide with him during our sojourn in Rotterdam. Having consigned our “affaires” to his care, we set out in quest of the novelties presented to foreigners in a Dutch town.

Some one has remarked, that if you would be thoroughly taken out of your own country, you should not travel to Constantinople, but to Rotterdam; which, by those who have visited the former city, is said to be true to a great extent; for in Rotterdam you see all in one, what can only be met with piece-meal elsewhere. If the streets in Philadelphia had canals running along their centres, and on each side of them paved thoroughfares for carts and “foetpaden,” anglice, footpads or passengers, and these were filled with vessels, and vehicles, and rows of trees on each side of the water-courses, the tout ensemble would present a striking resemblance to Rotterdam. The canals, however, are wider than Chestnut and Walnut streets, and, in some parts of the city, afford havens for ships of the largest size. The description of Rotterdam in Hood’s poem is very exact. He writes: —

“Tall houses with quaint gables,

Where frequent windows shine,

And quays that lead to bridges,

And trees in formal line,

And masts of spicy vessels

From western Surinam,

All tell me you’re in England,

But I’m in Rotterdam.”

Hood further styles it “a vulgar Venice;” and to a stranger the queen city of the Adriatic can hardly present a more striking appearance. Land and water are so strangely and picturesquely intermingled; the busy life that pervades both is so thoroughly in keeping with the scene, that to walk about, and look on with curious eye, is occupation enough. Turn your eye which way you will, you see a bridge, its strong pillars rising aloft, bearing the great cross-beams by which each portion is counterpoised. The whole is painted white, and the wooden floor slopes gently upwards from each side to the centre. Presently, a tall-masted vessel floats up; the two men always in attendance at the little lodge erected close by, run out; they withdraw the iron wedges from the staples, and then, with a slight pull at the chain suspended from the cross-beams, each half of the bridge begins slowly to rise: before they are at the perpendicular the schuit has passed; a push at the cross-beams sends them up again; the men spring to the centre to accelerate the descent, impatient boys scramble after them, the wedges are replaced, and the stream of traffic, which had been momentarily interrupted, resumes its course with no more delay than is caused by the issuing of a dray from one of the side streets of a crowded avenue.

A tourist visiting this city says, "My walks up and down in Rotterdam gave me the key to several matters that had puzzled me when living in New York. The American farmer drives to market with two horses at a fast trot, harnessed to a light narrow wagon, with side rails rising high behind at a sharp curve. The Dutch farmer does the same. The New York milkman goes his round in a similar wagon, supplying his customers from two bright cans placed in front of his seat. The Dutchman does the same. New York builders frequently erect whole rows of houses, side, back, and middle, leaving the entire front to be built up last. I saw the same process in Rotterdam, where many new houses were 'going up.' Here, too, was the original of the clumsy truck or dray which the carmen of New York drive about the streets by hundreds. Here, too, the reason why shopkeepers' names are so perseveringly painted on each door-post in Broadway, and other business thoroughfares. Here, too, the frequent occurrence of the announcements, Bakkerij, Bleekerij, and Hoekij, sufficiently explained why, in the over-sea city, a baker's shop was called a bakery, a bleaching-ground a bleachery, a cake-shop a cookie-store; and the exposing of groceries in open barrels, ranged in rows in the shops, also accounted for the similar practice still existing in New York. Who would have thought that the early settlers at the mouth of the Hudson, whose town-council 'met one day and smoked their pipes,' would have left such enduring traces behind them!"

The signboard literature of the Dutch Venice is highly amusing to a foreigner. Over the windows of the provision merchants, they not only tell you that they have boter and kaas, butter and cheese, but, lest you should mistakenly suppose that they distributed it gratuitously, they are careful to tell you that they have it te koop, that is, to sell. This is common in the Hoog Straat as well as in the back lanes. In this street a printed label on a basement door stated, "Hier is een kelder to huur"—Here is a cellar to let. A conveyancer could not wish for greater detail or exactness. In all the Dutch towns the houses are numbered in districts. Thus, Wyk 2. 250 signifies No. 250 in the third wyk or ward; an arrangement which in some respects is by no means convenient. It is much easier to follow the numbers in a street than over a whole quarter, where you are ignorant of the direction of their beginning or ending.

We were very much struck with the leaning of the fronts of the houses towards the streets in numerous instances. We concluded that it was the subsidence of the foundations that caused it. This is said to be a mistake. It is admitted that it may be true in a few cases; but that generally it is to be attributed to the original formation of the houses. Whole streets are said to have been originally built in a sloping position: the backs of the houses present no such deviation from the perpendicular; neither is the roof line altered. Modern builders avoid this overtopping, which, however picturesque, looks dangerous; and new houses are now erected as perpendicular as elsewhere.

The appearance of the vessels, coasters and inland traders, which crowd the havens, is very remarkable. So clean, so bright, so polished: no scratches, no bruises, no marks of rough usage. The fenders suspended from the bulwarks are curved to fit the protuberant side, and strengthened at either end by polished brass ferules; the heel of the bowsprit, the bits and windlass, the rudder head, are similarly decorated, and painted with gay colours. The little cabins are formal neatness itself, and the vrouw and her family not less clean than the most precise residents on shore. The tubs for washing clothes are so contrived as to hang over the vessel's side by means of a bracket, so that the splashings fall into the canal, and the slopping of the deck is avoided. Many of these crafts are floating shops for the sale of matting, crockery, brooms, firewood, &c., and on fine days the stock in trade is displayed partly on the quay and on the deck. When business grows slack the owners cast off their moorings, and take up a new position in another street.

MOSES AND ELIJAH.

As Jehovah “sent Moses to be a ruler and deliverer of Israel by the hand of the Angel that appeared to him in the bush,” so will he send Elijah, the restorer of all things, to deliver the same nation out of its present captivity, and to bring it “into the wilderness of the people,” by the hand of the Angel of the Abrahamic covenant—even by Jesus, whom “He hath made both Lord and Christ.”

“DURATION OF THE BEAST.”

THE AION—OF THE BEAST, 1260; OR FORTY-TWO MONTHS OF SOLAR YEARS.

The Aberdeen Herald, in a brief review of the celebrated pamphlet entitled “The Coming Struggle,” as published in Edinburgh, by a Mr. Pae near that city, says: “According to the writer’s own interpreting ‘key,’ all the political events he describes, instead of happening during the forthcoming fifteen years, ought to have happened in the fifteen years preceding 1848. In fact, the author, by an arithmetical blunder, very successfully divests his theory of its logicity; for, when dating ‘The Duration of the Beast,’ he fails to recognise the difference between solar and lunar time in his own computation, at the same time that he ridicules previous interpreters for a similar error. It is agreed that ‘the duration of the Beast’ is 1260 lunar years. The commencement of the period is generally dated A.D. 606, and the end 1866; ‘but,’ says the writer, ‘eighteen years must be subtracted, being the difference between solar and lunar time,’ the period thus ending in 1848. But our author dates the ‘civil constitution of the Beast’ from 531; and the ecclesiastical from 606, the former ending in 1791, and the latter in 1866, by solar time, instead of 1773 and 1848 by lunar time. The great battle of Armageddon should, therefore, have been fought four or five years ago; and Louis Napoleon and the author of this pamphlet ought now to be heroes of the Millennium.”

The above is a condensation of about two pages and a half of a pamphlet published in Edinburgh, entitled, “The Fallacies, Absurdities, and Presumption of ‘The Coming Struggle,’ and similar Millennarian Vaticinations.” The writer, also anonymous, seems to agree with “The Coming Struggle” that the 1260 years of the Beast’s duration are only 1242 solar years, and so to be interpreted. But, at the same time, he successfully shows that the author of “The Struggle” has sadly miscalculated in stretching out the 1242 solar years to 1791 and 1866, instead of terminating them at 1773 and 1848. Having convicted him of error, the writer of “The Fallacies” observes, “We do not merely ask, Is there any faith to be placed in him? But, Is there no indignation due towards him? I do not suppose him to be guilty of obtaining money on false pretences—procuring the sale of his pamphlet by cunningly working on the natural fears of the public through the present political aspect of the world. I rather believe him to have been himself unaware of the gross blunders and fallacious reasoning he has indulged in. But allowing him not to be a knave, one cannot help one’s anger at being impudently imposed on even by a fool; anger at oneself, anger at the impostor, and anger at all who have countenanced his unconscious imposition.”

It is evident from this that the author of “The Fallacies” imagines that he does well to be angry; and that in having demonstrated “The Struggle’s” wrong, he has proved his own position to be right, as expressed in the words of Saurin: “L’Apocalypse, quiest un des plus mortifiants ouvrages, pour un esprit avide de connaissance et de lumière, est un des plus satisfaisants pour un Coeur avide de maximes et de préceptes;” that is, The Revelation which is one of the most mortifying works for a mind desirous of knowledge and light, is one of the most satisfying for the heart desirous of maxims and precepts. The Revelation a book of maxims and precepts! A book radiant only of obscurity! Is no indignation due to such a testifier as this? If “The Struggle” is to be condemned as a fool for misconstruing its own premises, “The Fallacies” is as condemnable for a blasphemer in giving the lie to God and his truth, which declares that the Apocalypse does not withhold knowledge and light, but imparts both in revealing “the things that are, and the things that shall be hereafter.” The Apocalypse is not a dark book, but one that shines brightly on the perfect day. The darkness is in the mind of Saurin, and of those who respond to his dogma. It reveals the times with great precision; but nowhere justifies the conclusion that its 1260 years are to be reckoned as 1242.

In this conclusion, the author of “The Fallacies,” the Aberdeen Herald, and “The Coming Struggle,” are all wrong. The years of the prophets are solar years, their whole number being reduced from a solar time to a lunar time of solar years as expressed by months. If the whole number of the Beast’s duration had been represented by a solar time of solar years, the figures would have been 1277½, which would have been seventeen years and a half too long; for 365+730+182½ are equal to 1277½. Hence, to give the reader the precise number of solar years the Beast is to prevail, they are expressed in months; as, “they (the Gentiles) shall tread down the Holy City forty and two months.” This is written in Revelation 11: 2. The “Holy City” in this place represents “the saints,” who are to be trodden down so long as Jerusalem is trodden under foot of the Gentiles. These Gentiles that tread them down are represented in their political organization in Revelation 13, by “a Beast having seven heads and ten horns,” whose triumph over them is also stated at forty-two months’ duration. Now, the “Holy City” and the “saints” are of the same category as the “two witnesses,” “two olive trees,” “two candlesticks,” and “two prophets,” who were to exercise their mission in a period of war between them and the Gentile governments. The saints of the Holy City are to be prevailed against until the Ancient of Days come, when judgment against the enemy is given to them. This is at the end of the Beast’s power to make successful war upon them—that is, at the end of forty-two months, which, in Daniel, is styled “a time, times, and the dividing of times.” This is “the last end of the indignation,” when the power of the holy people, now scattered, shall be reconcentrated.

In Revelation 12, the two witnessing prophets are represented by a fugitive woman, “the remnant” of whose seed is made up of the saints of the Holy City, “who keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ.” Now, of the woman, it is said in one place, “they should feed her in the wilderness a thousand two hundred and threescore days;” and in another place, “she is nourished in the wilderness for a time, and times, and half a time.” It is clear, therefore, that 1260 days are representative of a time, times, and half a time. These were “the days of the prophecy of the witnesses” against “the powers that be;” and to which must be added their death-period, ending in their resurrection and ascension to power, by which we are brought down to a first end of the indignation. Now, forty-two months being interpreted in Daniel by “a time, times, and the dividing of times;” and this by John as significative of 1260 days, it follows, that the forty-two months are equal to the same period. “Months” are a lunar symbol; and when forty-two of them are divided into “times,” the solar years they represent are necessarily compressed into times of 360, instead of 365 solar years; for 360+720+180 are equal to 1260, and not to 1277½.

It is a mistake to suppose that the years are lunar because the “times” and “months” are lunar symbols. A lunar time of solar years is 360 years; and a month of solar years is thirty, which, multiplied by twelve, gives the “year” or, that which returns upon itself—Revelation 11: 15—a circle of 360. But 360 common days are not equivalent to a Bible or Mosaic year. This consists of 365 years, as appears from the enumeration of the days of the Deluge. The Hebrew years had eleven months of thirty days, and the twelfth of thirty-five. Three circles and a half of these years are called for by the prophecy, neither more nor less. The first and last ends of the indignation are seventy-five years apart. The “arithmetical blunder” of “The Coming Struggle,” and the “indignation” of “The Fallacy,” leave unimpaired the accuracy of the dates 1791 and 1866. The termination of the “forty-two months” will not arrive for thirteen years at least. This is my conviction from all the premises in view. It will extend to the fall of the Goliath seen of Nebuchadnezzar in his dream, smitten by the descending Stone foreshadowed in that from David’s sling. Struck by this stone in its head, the Russo-Assyrian power will fall on the plains of Syria, to rise no more for a thousand years. Thus “shall he come to his end, and none shall help him.”

A NECESSITY.

The King of the North is to “come against” “the King” “with many ships;” while the Anglo-French fleet protects the Sultan, Russia cannot do this; it is therefore necessary for something to transpire that shall leave Constantinople exposed to the operation of the Czar’s fleet in the Black Sea.

SYNOPSIS OF A LETTER ON

“The Mission of the Russian Empire at the present juncture—Its extraordinary career of Conquest and Dominion in Europe and Asia—Its ultimate Catastrophe and Extinction by the King of Israel, coming in the Clouds of Heaven and establishing his Kingdom on Earth in great Power and Glory.”

Delivered in the Town Hall, in Charlottesville, Virginia, July 24th, by

A. B. MAGRUDER.

The lecturer commenced by saying that he was not insensible to the criticism to which he exposed himself, by attempting the discussion of topics generally regarded as obscure and difficult—the solution of which had called forth the efforts of the wisest and most learned of mankind; that if he relied on his own strength or wisdom, to guide him in such an investigation, he might well shrink from the task before him; but that in truth he claimed no peculiar qualifications for the work he had undertaken over any other ordinary man in the community; that he had studied, however, with a good deal of reflection and diligence, the extraordinary revelations of the Book before him—the Bible—in reference to the portentous future on which we were about to enter; and that it was because he believed his audience, as intelligent and reflecting beings, capable of appreciating and admiring such majestic and exalted themes, that he proposed to invite their attention to the wonderful crisis at hand, and awaken, if possible, a becoming interest in the approaching solution of the great problems which involved the destiny of the race to which we belong and the planet we inhabit.

He held the Bible to be a full and complete revelation from its Author of the past, the present and the future, and that we may confide freely in its prophetic pictures of the future, because we have seen its exact truthfulness in its history of the present and the past. Dissenting in toto from the common idea that we can know nothing of the future, that the prospect ahead is designedly obscure and impenetrable, he cited many passages of Holy Writ to prove the contrary. He maintained that what is to happen in the future is plainly delineated in the writings of the prophets; that one of these—Amos 3: 7—had said, “Surely the Lord will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret to his servants, the prophets.” That David had said, Psalm 25: 14, “The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him, and he will show them his covenant.” That Isaiah said, 42: 9, “Behold, the former things are come to pass, and new things do I declare; before they spring forth, I tell you of them.” That Daniel said, in reference to events “at the time of the end,” “The wise shall understand.” That in his interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar’s dream, he showed him “the things which should come to pass hereafter in the latter days.” That the saying of Jesus, that “no man knoweth the day or the hour when the Son of man cometh,” was not contradictory to the above testimony, for no prophet has foretold and no sane man would undertake to name the day and hour of that event. That these words, however, were spoken in the present tense, and before the New Testament had been written and its revelations completed. That the Book of Revelation written afterwards is entitled, “*The Revelation which God gave to Jesus Christ, to show unto his servants things which must shortly come to pass;” and that Paul’s testimony in 1 Thessalonians 5 ought to be conclusive of all further controversy, as he says expressly of the day of the Lord’s coming, that although he should come “as a thief in the night” to the world at large, yet “ye, brethren are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief,”—a clear proof that true Christians, being “wise,” should understand and be prepared for the event—which can only be by their expecting it, and interpreting its approach by those “signs of the times” to which Christ has directed their attention, and which, if heeded, would enable them to know when it was “nigh, even at the doors.”

Conceding then that what is to happen in the future has been disclosed to the diligent student of the Scriptures, the question recurs, “What are the signs of the times?” What is the prospect before us?

It seems to be generally admitted that we are in the midst of an eventful era of the world’ history: an intense and universal excitement in reference to the social, ecclesiastical and political affairs of mankind, evidently prevails. The whole continent of Europe is a slumbering volcano: Asia too, with her untold millions of human beings, is passing through the throes and convulsions of a mighty struggle between ancient and drivelling superstition on the one hand and young and upheaving innovation on the other; and that our own America, though far removed from the scene of strife, is herself restless, ambitious, impatient of restraint, and eager to rush forward in the path of her onward destiny. The conviction that such a state of things cannot long endure, forces from every one the anxious enquiry, “What is about to happen?” The lecturer maintained that this universal excitement of the social mind was the natural result of the extraordinary posture of human affairs, especially in the old world. That the common observer no less than the practised statesman could discern nothing in the present or future aspect of human affairs but change, insecurity and revolution; that it seemed human wisdom was wholly unequal to the task of providing for the public safety and happiness. That this conviction had naturally begotten an expectation that society must pass through some mighty crisis before it could reach the desired haven of peace beyond—what that crisis was, none could presume to say—and that this vague and indefinable future naturally produced and augmented those feelings of dread and apprehension which we beheld universally prevalent.

In such a crisis as this, divine wisdom was our only refuge for light, the Bible was our only safe guide to correct conclusions: and when we turn to its pages, we learn that mankind are on the eve of that mighty revolution in human affairs which was indicated by the prophet Daniel, when he interpreted the Babylonian monarch's vision of "the things that were to come to pass in the latter days." By turning to the 2nd chapter of Daniel's prophecy, we read at the 44th verse this remarkable declaration: "And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever." The context explained to what kingdoms the prophet alluded, and showed that the kingdom to be set up by the God of heaven had never been manifested as yet. The lecturer maintained, on the testimony of ancient history, the interpretations of Bishop Newton, Sir Isaac Newton, and other commentators, as well as from the historical parts of the Holy Scriptures, that the great metal image seen by Nebuchadnezzar in his dream and interpreted by Daniel, represented four great empires, which were to have dominion successively over the nations of the world. He enumerated these empires in the order of their appearance, as the Assyrian or Babylonian empire under Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar; the Medo-Persian empire, under Darius and Cyrus; the Greco-Macedonian, under the Greeks and Alexander the Great; and the Roman empire, under the Caesars and the Popes. It was in reference to these last, to the kings or kingdoms now reigning on the continent of Europe, upon the territory of the western division of the Roman empire, which kingdoms correspond to the ten toes of the image, and represent the existing kingdoms of modern Europe, that the prophet speaks, when he declares that "in the days of these kings, the God of heaven shall set up his kingdom;" and as its mission is to "break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms," it must first subdue and suppress these and all other opposing establishments, and plant itself on their ruins. This theocracy will then become the fifth monarchy, having sway over the whole world, and then will be fulfilled the prophecy in the Bible, that "the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever." The student of English history will remember the prominence given by the Fifth Monarchy men to the times of Charles I and Cromwell. Many of the wisest of England's statesmen (John Milton among them) believed that Daniel's prophecy of the setting up of the fifth monarchy or God's kingdom was about to be fulfilled at that time.

* John Milton and his contemporaries were manifestly in error when they styled the kingdom of God the fifth monarchy in relation to the image-empires. It is properly the sixth. Their mistake arose from their not knowing what was represented by "the clay," which is the fifth element, and must take up its position upon the image domain before the kingdom of God come. The five imperial dynastic elements of the Assyrian image are, first, the Chaldean, gold; second, the Medo-Persian, silver; third, the Macedonian, brass; fourth, the Roman, iron; and fifth, the Russian, clay. Then appears the stone kingdom, which demolishes the Assyrian image; and, having ground its elements to powder, annexes its territory to the royalty of Judea. —Editor of the Herald.

The conditions of the prophecy, however, require that before "that great and terrible day of the Lord" comes, the power representing the universal empire, symbolised by the great metal image, should appear, that the image-empire should be reconstructed; # for the stone of the 34th verse of Daniel 2 must strike the image upon its feet, as a consequence of which, the "iron, the brass, the silver and the gold are broken to pieces together, and become as the dust of the summer threshing-floor"—and the stone becomes "a great mountain, and fills the whole earth." Now the question arises, Where in the latter days are we to find a dominion ruling over all the countries mainly comprehended in the limits of the successive empires of Babylon, Persia, Greece, and Rome? Such a dominion must appear in order to its destruction by the stone-power, or kingdom of God, as already declared by the prophecy. The power destined to play this conspicuous part on the theatre of human affairs is Russia. It will overrun Turkey, subdue Persia, and convert the present independent kingdoms of modern continental Europe (not England) into tributary or vassal kingdoms, just as Napoleon subdued

Spain, Italy, Holland, &c. When it shall have attained this mighty conquest, it will itself be smitten by the stone-power of the prophecy, be precipitated into the abyss, and give place to a divine government, under Christ as Abraham's seed, "in whom all the nations of the earth will be blessed."

"Reconstructed:" that is, appear as represented to Nebuchadnezzar in his dream. No image-empire has yet existed on Assyrian ground whose throne has been occupied by a fifth imperial dynasty preceded by the gold, the silver, the brass, and the iron, as shown to the King of Babylon. What he saw was representative of what is to exist in our day, that is, "in the latter days."—Editor of the Herald.

The power which is to play this conspicuous part in the world's history is described in Scripture under various names. By Daniel he is called "the king of the north"—chapter 11: 40. By Isaiah, "the Assyrian"—30: 31; 31: 8; and by Ezekiel, 38, 39, "Gog of the land of Magog." If we can identify the power symbolised under these names as the Russian, we shall be prepared to read, in the prophecies themselves, the extraordinary events which are to mark his history, and to see that his wonderful career is immediately to precede the coming of Christ, the resurrection of the dead, &c.

Now, let us inquire what power "at the time of the end" (see Daniel 11: 40) so well answers the description of "the king of the north" as the great northern autocrat, who, like a mighty Colossus, at this moment is holding the civilised world in wondering suspense, if not apprehension, as to his movements? What other "king of the north" does the world expect to undertake a campaign against "the king," (or Turkey,) "and come against him like a whirlwind, with chariots, and with horsemen, and with many ships, who shall enter (or invade) his countries, (or provinces,) and shall overflow and pass over." If any power at present exists on earth answering this description, every candid man must admit that it is only the Russian.

As "the Assyrian" of Isaiah, he will be recognised when he has conquered Turkey and thereby become the master of Assyria, at present a captured province of Turkey in Asia, and so will stand forth as the successor of Nebuchadnezzar and the representative of the "head of gold" in the vision—q.v. Ezekiel's description of him as "Gog" is very significant and striking. He styles him (Chapter 38) "Gog, the land of Magog, the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal." King James' translators give us the above translation from the Latin Vulgate, but the Greek Septuagint version renders the original Hebrew, "Gogue, of the land of Magogue, Prince of Rosse, Meshech and Tubal." The Czar is the Autocrat of all the Russias, i.e., of original Russia, or the Grand Duchy of Russia, and the separate provinces or kingdoms of Meshech, modern Moscow, or Muscovy, and of Tubal, or modern Tobolsk or Tobolski. It is known that the Russian empire is an aggregate of three grand divisions—Russia proper, Muscovy, and Siberia or Tobolski: of these, the respective capitals are St. Petersburg, Moscow, and Tobolsk. So that the description in the prophecy answers with almost literal accuracy to the present modern titles and empire of the Autocrat, Gog. The power here described is represented, as in the latter days, invading the land of Israel with a great army, and for certain objects set forth in the prophecy. Among the nations or people from whom this great host is recruited are mentioned, "Gomer and all his bands, the house of Togarmah of the north quarters, and all his bands," &c. By turning to Genesis chapter 10, we find that these were European nations; for the sons of Japheth, to whom Europe was given, are mentioned as "Gomer, and Magog, and Madai, and Javan, (or Ivan, the name of the reigning house of Russia,) and Tubal, and Meshech, and Tiras;" and among the sons of Gomer, we read the name of "Togarmah." This testimony proves these invaders of the land of Israel "in the latter years" to be of European origin; and no other kingdom or country in Europe presents the necessary points of identity with the prophecy but Russia.

If the question be asked, Why should Russia invade Palestine? the answer is, It is a necessary step to her acquisition of an empire in the East, by which alone she can hope successfully to antagonise England, and found that universal domain to which she aspires. The capture of Constantinople by Russia—an event inevitable, however it may be postponed by temporising diplomacy or a hollow truce on the part of the "Allied Powers"—will inaugurate the splendid career of Russian conquest and dominion. Napoleon truly said, of the sovereigns of Europe, "he who holds Constantinople is the real master of the world" for a time. On that account, in his conferences with Alexander at Tilsit and Erfuth, he invariably resisted with all his power the intense anxiety of the Russian monarch to obtain Constantinople.

In the coming struggle among the nations, the lecturer contended that while Britain would retain her supremacy on the ocean, Russia would be the ruler of the European continent, and having successfully subdued Turkey and Persia, would attempt to strike a decisive blow at the only exposed and vulnerable point of the British dominion, her empire in the East Indies. To effect this end, the Autocrat, crossing the Bosphorus into Asia, would lead an immense army down the shores of the Levant through Syria and Palestine, endeavouring to reach Hindostan. That by the way of interposing a barrier against the progress of the Russian arms in the East, England will invite the Jews to return to their land, to colonise, cultivate and possess it under her protectorate. That this will bring on the mightiest struggle between the most powerful nations of modern times, the scene of which will be the valley of Jehoshaphat near Jerusalem, the grand finale of which will be the coming of Jesus Christ, as the Lord of Hosts, to the Mount of Olives, whence he ascended, and whither, it is predicted, he will return. —Acts 1: 11-12; Zechariah 14: 4. That he—Christ—as Lord of Hosts, mighty in battle, will take part in the pending struggle; and that the great battle, called in Scripture the “battle of the great day of Almighty God,” will then be fought, which is to decide the destiny of the world for the millennial period of one thousand years. The series of events introductory of and consequent on this mighty conflict, is set forth in Zechariah 14; Revelation 19; Micah 4: Zechariah 8, 9, 12; Psalm 72; Joel 2 & 3; Daniel 12; Isaiah 2, 9, 11; 24; 51, 52, 55, 59-60 to end of Isaiah; Ezekiel 38-39.

In confirmation of these conclusions, besides much Scripture testimony not here adduced for want of room, the lecturer cited the historical evidence of the ancient and orthodox belief among the first Christians, that Christ, with his saints as kings under him, should reign personally on the earth, over all its inhabitants. On this point he quoted the testimony of Bishop Newton; of Gibbon, in his “Decline and Fall,” &c.; of T. B. Macaulay, and of eminent clergymen in the Scottish and English Church. He cited such familiar passages as the Lord’s prayer—“Thy kingdom come; thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven.” “Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth.” The song of the redeemed, in Revelation 5—“*Thou hast made us unto our God kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth.” “*To him that overcometh will I give power over the nations;” and many kindred passages, such as Daniel 7: 9, 13-14, 18, 21-22, 27; Revelation 4, 20; Matthew 19: 28; Luke 19: 11, 16, 18, 29-30, &c.

In support of the views advanced in relation to the present attitude and future destiny of Russia, the lecturer read and commented on the opinions of Napoleon, his conferences and correspondence with Alexander of Russia, his prediction at St. Helena as to Europe’s being either Republican or Cossack about this time. He read also, in full, a very remarkable document which has lately been published in the papers, and which he held to be supported by sufficient marks of authenticity to be received as genuine—a paper originally published in the French Courrier, in New York, purporting to be “the secret plan of European supremacy left by Peter the Great to his successors on the Russian throne,” recommending a policy which his successors have uniformly pursued, with a view to the ultimate conquest of Europe and the founding of a universal empire, the fruits of which, devised in profound sagacity and pursued with untiring energy, are now visible in the wonderful aggrandisement of Russia, and her conceded superiority over her contemporaries in Europe, in all the elements of strength, wisdom and power which, in human estimation, go to make up a nation’s grandeur.

As auxiliary to the same line of argument, the lecturer adverted to the conviction on the mind of the Russian sovereign and people, that they had a “sacred mission” to fulfil in saving Europe from the whirlpool of democratic anarchy and confusion, by the conquest of Turkey, and the capacity thence derived, to govern the world in harmony with Russian ideas of liberty. He cited the fact, also, that the Turks, who are all fatalists, looked upon themselves as doomed to be driven by the Russians out of Europe, where they are foreigners and intruders. They show the gate by which their old enemies, the Greeks, are to enter their city as conquerors in the guise and in the name of the Russians. It is under the same conviction of their coming banishment from Europe, that for years past they have been burying their dead on the eastern shores of the Hellespont in Asia. They tell an ancient prophecy too, which says that their capital is to be taken by a prince bearing the same name; and it is not the least source of their uneasiness at present that the commander of that column of the Russian army destined for the conquest of the ancient Byzantium is the Grand Duke Constantine. Whether true or false, the influence of such ideas is paralysing on an ignorant and superstitious people, and prepares them for the very destiny they dread.

The Czar, as the head of the Greek Church, is impelled, too, by certain motives of superstition and of real or supposed state necessity, to fix his capitol in the city of the Czars or Caesars. He deems himself entitled by hereditary right to succeed to the sceptre of the Caesars, and a war with Turkey at this day would be regarded by his subjects and by the ten millions of Greeks out of the fourteen millions which form the entire population of Turkey in Europe, as a holy war—a crusade of Christians against infidels, for the recovery of the holy sepulchre and of the ancient rites and institutions of the primitive church. The influence of such feelings on a bigoted, superstitious, and fanatical people, can be readily appreciated. The Turkish empire is become effete and drivelling—has been wasting away rapidly for years, and possesses no vitality for reaction. Its present condition is significantly expressed by the Scripture symbology as “the drying up of the great river Euphrates”—the country watered by the Euphrates being the original seat of the Turkish people. This drying up or extinction of the Turkish empire is declared expressly to be “that the way of the kings of the east might be prepared.”—Revelation 16: 12. For centuries past, “westward the star of empire takes its way.” But the scene is to be reversed. The original seats of civilisation, science, and the arts, are to be restored. As the “wise men from the east” came to herald the birth of the Messiah at his first advent, so, at his second appearing, it is “the kings of the east”—“The kings from the rising of the sun,” as it is better translated—who are to greet the coming of the King of kings and Lord of lords; and with loud hosannas proclaim their adoration, saying: “Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty: just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints. Who shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name? for thou only art holy: for all nations shall come and worship before thee; for thy judgments are made manifest.”—Revelation 15: 3-4.

The lecturer concluded by saying, that the signs of the times seem to indicate the rapid approach of that great crisis in human affairs long foretold in Scripture, when three great champions were about to enter the lists and strive for the government and dominion of the world. These were DESPOTISM, DEMOCRACY, and OMNIPOTENCE. The struggle between the first two would be fearful but brief—Democracy would be forced to succumb to the power of standing armies, to the force of organization which would be hurled against it; that Despotism, proud of its conquest, would fondly indulge its dream of universal sovereignty. Its delusion will be brief, and its catastrophe overwhelming, for it is not for mortal man to grasp the sceptre of universal dominion. That is an inheritance that God has reserved for his King at his right hand in the heavens. Hence it is written, “All kings shall bow down before him—all nations shall serve him—His name shall endure for ever, and men shall be blessed in him—all nations shall call him blessed,” for he is King of kings and Lord of lords—Governor of the nations upon earth, and “Prince of the kings of the earth.”—Psalm 72; Revelation 1: 5.

A COLLEGE DISPUTE IN ENGLAND ABOUT ETERNAL TORMENT.

Is the punishment of the wicked unending torment in a subterrene pit of fire and brimstone? In other words—Have they, as a constituent of their nature, undying souls, derived hereditarily from Adam, capable of post mortem disembodied existence; and are these souls precipitated into a subterranean cavern burning with fire and brimstone, to writhe there in intellectual and physical (?) anguish continuously with the years of their everlasting Creator? This is an inquiry first announced for public discussion in this country by me in the Apostolic Advocate for 1834. Some of the readers of the Herald well remember that a hue and cry was raised by the Rev. Alexander Campbell, President of Bethany College, and Professor of Sacred History, together with all, or most, of the little ambitions that looked up to him as the colossal incarnation of their opinions, against me, for even proposing such an inquiry; and that, too, before they were aware of what my real views were upon the subject. By appeals to passion, prejudice, and bigotry; by sophistry and slanderous attacks upon character; and by every meanness peculiar to “orthodoxy,” and the stereotyped littleness that breathes it, they laboured to suppress the agitation of it in the extinction of the periodical and myself. But, though this system of attack continued for years, all their efforts to extinguish the truth have proved notably abortive. Their leader and themselves, though multitudinous as the giant of Gath and his Philistines, exist as our monuments of victory and their own miserable defeat. Their contempt of “the Stripling,” as they used to style me, and their denunciations of his “speculations and untaught questions,” have resulted in their conviction of spermologism—mere retailers of the babblery of paganism.

This is the certain fate of all who, by their “learning,” stultify the truth—they make void the Word of God by their traditions, and expose themselves to open shame. No set of men are so ignorant of God’s truth as “the learned;” and as they are the leaders of the people, these are, therefore, darkness twice intensified. This theological obscurity in the brightest realms of civilisation is a great sign of the times. It marks the approaching overthrow of Gentilism in all its diversity of creed and symbol: for, as the Scriptures teach, when Jerusalem is about to “arise and shine,” “darkness covers the earth, and gross darkness the people.” This is the helpless and hopeless condition of all ecclesiastical establishments, whether for the education of priests and clergy, or for the religious instruction of the people, throughout “Christendom.” Establishments national and nonconformist, schools and colleges, principals and presidents, professors and divines, all are dense embodiments of earth’s universal fog. So that unless the Lord come, and say, “Let there be light!” chaos must reign.

President Campbell’s zeal for the fire-and-brimstone conflagration of ghosts in undying torments, has seized upon Dr. Jelf, Principal of King’s College, London. This is a Church of England institution, under the patronage of the throne and its bishops, got up by bigotry to offset the “godless and infidel” London University, which favoured no particular church, or sectarian theology. Dr. Jelf is intensely orthodox in Church of Englandism; that is, his opinions are in strict accordance with those who have the disposal of the loaves and fishes of the Church. Among the Faculty over which he presides, was a divine yclept “the Reverend” Frederick Maurice, who occupied the chair of Thirty-nine-Article Theology. Of this gentleman it is written in a London weekly, “Those who do not agree with him, respect and admire him. So subtle, so profound, so eloquent have been his expositions of divinity, that bishops are proud to acknowledge how much they owe to him. High Churchmen consider him ‘one of the most original and independent thinkers of the day.’ He is the favourite aversion of the lowest of Low Church papers—the Record.” Here, then, was High-Church divinity in a Low-Church chair, which when discovered became unendurable to the Low-Church principal. Early in the summer, Professor Maurice published a volume of “Theological Essays” addressed to Unitarians, which were originally delivered in the shape of sermons. He undertook to show them that, however erroneous on particular points, they might still regard themselves as essentially belonging to the Church of England. The central fact, however, around which is grouped divers other subsidiary ones, and against which the greatest outcry is raised is the Professor’s denial of endless torment. Dr. Jelf upholds this on the authority of certain Scripture expressions, he does not understand; and believes that “the fear of hell”—“by God’s grace—turns men from sin. Mr. Maurice does not believe this; but “professes the most absolute trust” in “the love of God”—“without any limitation;” he calls a knowledge of this “eternal life,” and the want of it “eternal death;” and says that whoever “has not the Son of God has not life;” but will not say whether all will be raised out of eternal death, “because he does not know.”

It seems that Dr. Jelf has spent the college vacation in examining into Mr. Maurice’s productions; and has discovered that they contain opinions which he deems to be contrary to the teaching of the Established Church. On the meeting of the college for the winter term, a Council was summoned, and the result is, that Mr. Maurice has been forbidden to continue his lectures to the students, on the ground that his teaching is dangerous, unsettling, and liable to misinterpretation. It is said, however, that this judgment of the Council has not been made without calling forth an emphatic protest from church dignitaries infinitely higher in rank and influence than Dr. Jelf; and out of doors, the friends of the Church who do not belong to the “Low” party deeply regret a manifestation which implies that the Church must repel from itself the services of its most eminent divines. “Here,” says the Leader, “is one of the lights of the Church, one of the foremost men practically considered an unsound teacher of youth. Here is private society already agitated with the rising tempest; here are the vindication of Mr. Maurice, and the justification of the Council, issuing from the press; here is the pugnacious Record rubbing its fat palms with glee, and predicting, more suo, ‘a fierce and lengthened controversy.’ It is not for us to prophesy; but, noting that the controversy will rage over the doctrine of eternal punishment—something to contend for—we shall stand by and look on, keeping a record of the progress of the battle, and handing it now and then to our readers.”

The British Quarterly, speaking of the treatment Professor Maurice has received at the hands of certain “religious newspapers,” such as the Record, says:

“When religious truth is not embraced to its proper end, it is not unnatural that the moral state in which it leaves men should sometimes be a worse state than that in which it found them. Mr. Maurice may feel assured that he has hardly a worse opinion than we have of irreligious spirits often to be found in what is called the religious world. It is any thing but agreeable to be obliged to observe the subtleties, the frauds, the slanders, the cruelties, to which such spirits will often commit themselves. They are good haters—and the strength of that feeling is too often, in their estimation, the best evidence of their spirituality and enlightenment. This hatred has reference to something accounted the contrary of religion, and it is therefore regarded as religious; and the zeal allied with it has reference to something accounted religious, and therefore the feeling is regarded as religious. Notions, dogmas, commonly supply their watchwords to such people. Echo these, and your praise will be upon their tongues; fail to pronounce their shibboleth, and you have to lay your account with all the possible forms of persecution. On these grounds we look with a degree of sympathy on any man who diverges from the beaten path, however much we may consider him mistaken. For we are obliged to confess, that in the case of not a few who pour their censures upon him, the great recommendation of ORTHODOXY, as of a thousand things beside, has been, that IT DOES NOT EXPOSE A MAN TO ANY SORT OF COST OR INCONVENIENCE.”

How true are these words of the British Quarterly! For nearly twenty years they have found a practical demonstration in my experience. The worst spirits are the demons of the “religious world,” falsely so called. They are good haters, breathing out curses upon all who do not echo the watchwords of their foolishness. This is all the religion they have—a zeal for the notions and dogmas of their sects and leaders, irrespective of their relation to the divine Word, which has their approbation no further than it is supposed to harmonise with them. The most zealous supporters of “orthodoxy” are always the least intelligent in the Scriptures; and always on the side of majorities and power. Hence, it is never subjected to persecution; because “on the side of the oppressor is power;” and it is only with the weak and the few that the truth abides. “Orthodoxy” never suffers; for it is rich, and makes rich with all that the flesh desires. It has no practical appreciation of the saying, “If we suffer, we shall also reign;” “all that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall be persecuted;” and, “It is through much tribulation we must enter the kingdom of God.” Suffering, persecution, and tribulation, belong only to those who are struggling to free themselves from human authority in religious matters. “Orthodoxy” has no fellowship with these; therefore, to profess it does not expose such gentlemen as the Rev. Messieurs Jelf, Campbell, and their associates, “to any sort of cost or inconvenience.”

The following remarks upon the case before us appeared in the columns of a London weekly, under the caption of

“No man can predict the end of the theological contest now raging throughout the Church respecting the eternal or everlasting punishment of the damned. Dr. Jelf and the Council of King’s College have deposed Professor Maurice, and both parties have appealed to the public. Thus an immense discussion is raised, permeating through all religious circles, and having peculiar fascinations for two classes of minds—the refined and the controversial; and thus the great dogma of utter damnation will have to bear the severest test of modern times—public examination. But although this is the central fact in the contest, there are other and subsidiary facts not less liable to damage the Church of England.

“For instance, where is lodged the authority which shall determine what is and what is not the doctrine of the Church? Has there arisen a Sorbonne in the halls of King’s College? Does Dr. Jelf play the part of Pope in this matter, and is the Council a College of Cardinals? The Bishop of London is a member of the Council, and the superior of Mr. Maurice. What is his function in the matter? He concurred in the decision of the Council; will he take away Mr. Maurice’s license, and prevent him from preaching unsound and unsettling doctrine in Lincoln’s Inn Chapel, as well as in the lecture-rooms in Somerset House? Then there is the Court of Arches. Once we saw a high dignitary of the Church compelled to go into that court and ask Sir Herbert Fust what was the doctrine of his Church on the subject of Baptismal Regeneration; and we can imagine the archbishops and bishops trooping to Sir John Dodson, imploring him to state authoritatively what the Church really predicates respecting eternal punishment. Formerly Sir Herbert Fust had to play the part of Mother Church, and the judicial committee of the Privy Council that of the hyper-church. Nobody now seems to know whether King’s College is a new tribunal of heresy; or whether Mr. Maurice can take his case into the Arches Court, or whether there is in the Church any competent authority whatever to decide the question. The fact is, there is no such authority.

“The case itself is extremely intricate. As far as we can make out, from the papers published on both sides, Dr. Jelf upholds, on the authority of the Scripture, that the damned are damned to ‘never-ending’ torments. He believes in a real substantial pit of hell, where the impenitent are 'tormented with fire and brimstone, in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb;' while 'the smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever.' He speaks of the Lord taking everlasting 'vengeance' on the wicked; and he believes that the 'fear of hell'—'by God's grace'—turns men from sin. Mr. Maurice does not believe this; what he believes we are at a loss to say. We can only make out that he professes the most absolute trust in 'the love of God'—'without any limitation;' that he calls a knowledge of this love 'eternal life,' and the want of it 'eternal death;' that whosoever 'has not the Son of God has not life;' and that he will not say whether all will be raised out of eternal death, 'because he does not know.' We have carefully read Mr. Maurice's letters, and we must honestly say that his belief is too subtle, too refined, for our comprehension. In this Dr. Jelf has an advantage over his opponent, because he sets forth a gross, an inhuman belief, in the existence of a hell of fire. Such, he says, is the doctrine of the Church of England.

“Which is right? Mr. Maurice's appeals to the formularies and the Scriptures; Dr. Jelf appeals to the same authorities; and each obtains a different interpretation!

“It may be useful here to tell a few plain truths about the Church of England. All men know that she has certain documents, articles, creeds, and what not. These form a fixed standard of belief; a fixed test of faith. Every person who subscribes to them, or accepts them, is a member of the Church. But although the standard is fixed, the interpretation is the chance of the hour! In the present case, Mr. Maurice says, This seems to me to be the interpretation; Dr. Jelf says, That seems to me to be the interpretation. Is it not obvious that, if Mr. Maurice had been Principal of King's College, and Dr. Jelf Theological Professor, Mr. Maurice might have dismissed Dr. Jelf? Again, Mr. Gorham said, I believe this to be the doctrine of baptismal regeneration; the Bishop of Exeter said, I believe that to be the doctrine. All the time the standard remains the same, and each of the gentlemen is a member of the Church of England.

“What is a creed? A provisional convention, to enable those who agree to declare their sentiments in common. The same rough definition applies to articles and formularies. Those of the Church of England were framed avowedly to comprise the largest possible number of persons. They are the results of an elaborate compromise, therefore as capable now, as when they were adopted, of different interpretations. They assume to be the _expression of the whole truth ‘revealed’ to man respecting his spiritual relations—all that is necessary to save him from the torments of that hell which Dr. Jelf believes to exist—yet, as we have shown, four men, all accepting the standard test, shall put incompatible interpretations upon the doctrines embodied in that test!

“All these conflicts show that the Church is not content with its creeds, its articles, and its formularies; and what we really behold is the strife of a sect to reconcile itself to truth. There is no unity; the Act of Uniformity is a mockery; there is no organization on the basis of belief in the Church; only an organization on the basis of property and social convenience. The sects cast away unity and consistency when they cast away the Catholic system; and these struggles are the night-mare evidences of the perturbed conscience of Protestantism.”

IMMORTAL-SOUL RELIGION.

The grand error that underlies all the speculations of “divines” is the assumption that there exists in universal man an essence they term “the immortal soul,” capable of performing all the functions of the individual when separated from the body by death; and, as “immortal” implies, of an indestructible or imperishable nature. With them, all have “immortal souls,” whether righteous or wicked; so that the one class of mankind is as immortal as the other; and being possessed as aught else is inherently possessed, and derived hereditarily from their common ancestry, immortality is not in their systems to be hoped for, or sought after: for “hope that is seen,” says Paul, “is not hope; for what a man sees (or hath) why doth he yet hope for it? But if we hope for that we see (or have) not, then do we with patience wait for it.”

It is about the destiny of this immortal essence that theologians preach and dispute. Their religion is contrived to save this thing from the pit into which they have transferred the “fire and brimstone” from the territory of the Beast and False Prophet. This is their “hell,” theologians hocus-focussed by worldly-wise men out of Scripture phrases used in prophecies foreshowing the judgments to fall on “the powers that be,” and the armies and peoples that sustain them. The “great salvation which began to be preached by the Lord and his apostles,” is not with them the deliverance, first, of the saints from the evils of the present state, and death; secondly, the salvation of the twelve tribes of Israel from all that hate them; thirdly, the emancipation of the nations from their oppressors, and their enlightenment in the glory of Jehovah; and, fourthly, the total and final abreption of sin and death from human nature, and the renovation of all things terrestrial. No, they have but little conception that such things are treated of in the gospel. The “great salvation” with them is the saving of “immortal souls” from the awful destiny that awaits the impenitent in their bottomless pit of eternally flaming brimstone, the natural element of the theological “Devil and his angels.” Their “divinity” can rise no higher than this. Its loftiest flight is to snatch disembodied essences from eternal agony by faith in their traditions, and so give them “viaticum” or a carte blanche for a passage to kingdoms beyond the skies, on the down of an angel’s wing.

This “salvation by grace,” as they style it, is not an eternal process. When the Calvinistic elect are all saved by grace, the work of human salvation will be finished; and the time will have arrived for “the wreck of matter, and the crash of worlds.” This is what they call “the consummation of things;” which being interpreted signifies, the consummation of theological foolishness.

By grace are ye saved through faith alone. This is the theological prescription for the salvation of immortal essences, familiarly styled “ghosts.” The faith which saves may be put into a nut-shell, with room to spare. A poor, ignorant sinner, who, for nearly threescore years and ten, has devoted himself to the services of Mammon, body, soul and spirit, comes at last to be stared in the face by the King of Terrors. He knows nothing of “religion” but roasting eternally in hell-fire. His horror is naturally extreme. He hears of Dr. Jelf, and sends for him, that he may administer to his soul “the consolations of religion,” as if the doctrine of Christ had any consolations for such a wretch as he! “Ye cannot serve God and Mammon.” He asks the doctor if eternal torment be true? “Verily,” quoth he, “for Professor Maurice was expelled King’s College for denying it. It is true; and God hath ordained it in terrorem for sinners.” “And is there no escape, Doctor?” “Yes, for the vilest: Jesus Christ made a complete satisfaction on the cross for the sins of the whole world. His merit is as infinite as the demerits of mankind. Believe that this is the case, and that he died for you, and you shall be saved from hell, now yawning to receive you,” “But, Doctor, how am I to believe what you say is true?” “Pray to God for faith.” “Ah, Doctor, I never prayed; do you pray for me!” Upon this Dr. Jelf, as a Church of England “divine,” taking the man’s wish as an evidence of repentance, draws forth from his pocket a splendidly bound “Book of Common Prayer,” and reading from “the Visitation of the Sick,” in the tone peculiar to Low Church piety, soothes the immortal essence of the hoary sinner, who, being thus clerically magnetised, imagines that the tranquillisation of his fears is the fruit of faith, and the Holy Spirit’s assurance of peace and joy eternal!

But what becomes of all this superstition and foolery, if they fail to prove, or if it be demonstrated, that there is no such immortal essence in man to be operated upon? It vanishes like a dream. Immortal-soulism is the foundation-corner laid in the quicksand of Gentilism. The “divines” of all Gentile “Christendom,” in one oecumenical council, could not produce an inkling of testimony from the Bible in proof of the existence of an immortal soul in human flesh. The burden of proof lies upon them; and, failing to do this, of course, their dogma of its endless torture in flames of sulphur, and all their twaddle about its intermediate state, and its translation beyond the skies—is the quintessence of absurdity. Messieurs Jelf and Maurice may “dispute, change hands, and still dispute” indefinitely about eternal punishment, and arrive at no practical result in aid of truth, until they have disposed of the question concerning immortality. If there be no immortal essence to be tortured or saved from torment, there can be no such places for its reception as “orthodoxy” provides. The truth is, their immortal essence, religion, heaven, and hell, are mere theological chimeras of brain “spoiled by philosophy and vain deceit,” unprofitable vanities having no place in the Word of God.

But while we testify these things, let it not be supposed that we deny immortality to man, or “eternal punishment” to the wicked. The regular readers of my writings are too well informed for this. Immortality is a good thing—too good for the wicked. It is defined in the Bible as incorruptibility and life, having relation to body; so that life manifested through an incorruptible body is the immortality revealed in the Bible. This immortality is a matter of promise to the righteous only; and the righteous are they who believe what God promises, and what he has done, and who do what he requires. Hence, immortality is one of the good things set before them in the gospel of the kingdom. “Glory, honour, incorruptibility, and life” in the kingdom are evangelised to them, and promised, on condition of their believing the gospel of the kingdom, being immersed, and patiently continuing in well-doing. Fulfilling this condition is styled “seeking for” them. Thus sought for, they are found at the resurrection of the just, which is termed “the adoption, the redemption of the body.” The body redeemed from death is the only immortal soul spoken of in the Bible; and stands there in contrast with the mortal soul, called “living soul” by Moses, formed from the dust. The body, redeemed from death, is, consequently, thenceforth deathless, or ever-living. It is indestructible and imperishable. Fire and brimstone as torrid as Nebuchadnezzar’s furnace cannot scorch a hair, or leave their smell upon it. It can dwell with everlasting burnings unsinged; and as secure from internal decay as from destruction by violence from without. Such is the testimony of the Bible concerning the body, which is spirit, because it is begotten of the Spirit, when born from the grave.

But when the intelligent wicked are raised from the dead, they are not redeemed from death. The destiny marked out for them by Paul is expressed in the words, "He that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." Now, as all classes of the living die and corrupt, the corruption to which he refers must be taken in a special sense—a corruption subsequently to the resurrection of such sowers to give an account of themselves to Christ at his tribunal. But death of the body precedes its corruption; parts of it may corrupt before death of the whole; but then the organization of those parts is broken down, or death-stricken, first, and corruption follows; so that the saying is unexceptionable, that death precedes corruption. When, therefore, the apostle saith that such persons shall "reap corruption," it is, in effect, saying, that he who sows to his flesh shall become flesh again at his resurrection, after which he shall die a second time, and turn into corruption, as before. Beyond the evil that is in the world on account of its introduction through sin, there is no punishment for sin till after resurrection. It is then "we must all appear before the tribunal of Christ, that every one may receive again the things of the body according to what he hath done, whether good or bad." To "receive again the things of the body," is the reason of resurrection; in other words, that a man may reap what he sows. The things we do now are the body's deeds; not the doings of an immortal essence. If they were an immortal soul's deeds, the apostle would have necessitated our appearing at Christ's tribunal that we might receive again the things of the immortal soul or mind. In this case resurrection would have been unnecessary, because, on the hypothesis of such a soul's disembodied existence, it might reap what it sows without reembodyment at all. But this piece of silliness never entered the apostle's mind when he wrote the fifth chapter of the second of Corinthians. The mortal body that does the things is responsible for what is done. It must, therefore, give an account of itself to Christ; and to do this, its dust must become body again—animal body again. The same dust, once living, then demolished, and afterwards, built up again as before, is the same person, though a thousand years may have intervened between the demolition and rebuilding. It is the same person with his old habits of thought and action revived; so that when he comes to give an account of himself, he will be like Adam before the Lord God, a faithful witness against himself; unable, however willing, to conceal the truth. “The Spirit of God shall make alive your mortal bodies,” says Paul: their immortalisation will be by transformation in the twinkling of an eye, and subsequently to their post-resurrectional appearance at Christ’s tribunal “in the air,” where the sentence of blessedness will be consequent on their presentation as “holy, unblameable, and unreprouvable in God’s sight;” otherwise, they will retain their terminable nature, and, like Cain, as exiles from the Divine presence, become “cursed from the earth; and fugitives and vagabonds” in the dominions of the Beast, and the False Prophet, and of the Kings of the earth, styled by Jesus, “the Devil and his angels.” They will be involved in the fire and brimstone, sword and pestilence, famine, hailstorm, and earthquake judgment, to be visited upon these when the Lord Jesus and the Saints shall make war upon them and overcome them.

Death having overtaken them a second time, and by these means, will they ever be redeemed from its power? The answer is, No; for it is written, “The unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God,” which is “for ever and ever.” There is no salvation out of this kingdom; and exclusion from this will be a cause of great anguish: for the King himself hath said, “There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, when ye shall see Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and all the prophets in the kingdom of God, and you yourselves cast out.” To be exiled with shame into the land of the enemy, and there to be subject to poverty, pain, vagabondism, hunger, pestilence, and death, without hope of deliverance, will doubtless extort from each one the lamentation imputed to Cain, “My punishment is greater than I can bear. Behold, thou hast driven me out this day from the face of the earth, and from thy face shall I be hid; and I shall be a fugitive and a vagabond on the earth; and it shall come to pass that every one that findeth me shall slay me.” Thus, “the wicked and the sinner shall be recompensed in the earth; but shall not inhabit it;” “the righteous shall never be removed.”

“The meek shall inherit the earth;” but “the wicked shall not inhabit

it.” This is the divine sentence upon the two classes; and as the wicked do now inhabit and possess it, it is clear that the sentence has relation to a future period of the earth’s history. When that period arrives, it will be said, “the wicked are no more.” As the whirlwind passeth, so will they—with a terrible sweep, to oppress and annoy our race no more. Their extermination from the earth will be final—“an everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power, when he shall come to be glorified in his saints,” will make their ruin complete. The destruction is aionian, rendered “everlasting.” It is a destruction pertaining to the aion of the wicked—one peculiar to their “course,” which is “the course of this world.” They are preeminently mortal, having no right to eternal life; so that destruction is to them “death unto death,” and needs no adjective to inform us that it is eternal.

This then is the “everlasting punishment” “into” which the wicked “go away.” Being mortal, they reap corruption from which they are never redeemed. This is the consummation of their punishment which endures; their consciousness of it precedes this consummation, and dates from the sentence pronounced upon them in the court of heaven till death seizes upon them the second time. How long in each individual case this consciousness may continue, depends upon “the things of the body;” for “stripes” will be “many” and “few,” according to its deeds of offence. The aion of judgment is about forty years. The punishment of great offenders will doubtless exceed in duration and intensity that inflicted upon those who have been less; for “every man shall be judged according to their works.” It is the prerogative of the Judge to enter into details as to whether A shall be subjected to death with shame and contempt in the land of the enemy for ten years previous; or B to death with twenty years of suffering preceding his final obliteration from the universe of God. These are particulars beyond our ability to define. The least amount of punishment will be agony to the condemned; for “it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God, who is a consuming fire.” Be it then ours, O reader, to believe the gospel of the kingdom, and to obey it; and by a patient continuance in well-doing, to walk worthy of that kingdom and glory to which it calls us. We need fear no punishment then; for the “terrors of the Lord” are only for them who are contentious against the truth, disobedient to its commands, and sow to themselves in gratifying their passions and lusts to the crucifixion of the truth before the world.

THOUGHTS CONCERNING ADVENTUAL AFFAIRS.

Brother Thomas: —I have just read the article styled the “Coming Struggle among the Nations of the Earth,” in its revised form, published in the Lover of Zion. Allow me to suggest a thought respecting the degree of restoration of the Jews to Palestine, predicted. Are you sure that the Scripture gives us to understand that such a degree of restoration as described in Ezekiel 38: 11-12, will be effected previous to the Advent? Are we not rather to expect, that Gog will not come against the land of Israel, but to a limited degree, before the possession of Palestine by all the saints after the Advent? If so, the destruction of all but “the sixth part” is an event of the millennial period only—chapter 39: 1-4.

I would distinguish between threatened judgments in the present dispensation, and those of the age following. One is a judgment to cause men to learn righteousness; and the other the opposite—the great battle.

I am a believer in the doctrine of God’s restored favour to the Jews, previous to the Advent; but expect that such favour is to be manifested in special efforts for their conversion principally, together with a Divine attempt only to establish them in Palestine, rather than that they will all be converted, and also be reinstated in Palestine, to the degree you and others expect, previous to the Advent. I cannot find a single instance in the whole Bible, where God has ever accomplished any purpose respecting his people’s deliverance by the destruction of his enemies, until he had first tested them, or in other words, attempted to effect that purpose by merciful and peaceable means. And as the deliverance of His people is synchronous with the termination of the times of the Gentiles, I must, in harmony with the above-mentioned truth, look for a certain degree of effort to gather his people, the Jews, to their ancient land—Romans 2: 9-10. —but to no greater degree than the gradual termination of the times of the Gentiles, which times will not fully terminate till the complete deliverance of all God’s people, at the coming of Christ. But the standing up of Michael—Daniel 12: 2—is synchronous with the termination of the Gentile times, with respect to them as nations; for an effort to deliver one people in a national point of view, argues the casting away of an opposite people as nations.

I think it can be demonstrated from Scripture, that we may consistently expect the Advent every moment. I have elsewhere shown, I think conclusively, that the advent should be expected between this time and 1860.

Yours, &c.,

H. BARRINGER.

RESTORATION OF ISREAL—“SPECIAL EFFORTS”—FIRST ANGEL PROCLAMATION.

The invasion of the Holy Land by Gog is to be “in the latter years,” which are also styled by the same prophet the “latter days”—Ezekiel 38: 8, 16; which are both preadventual and contemporary with the appearing of Jesus Christ, and continue forty years subsequently to that event. They are also premillennial; that is, they end before the thousand years period begins. The primary and partial, and the ultimate and complete, restoration of the Twelve Tribes of Israel, is effected during these latter days. The beginning of restoration, in the extent of it, is defined by the prophet in the words, “the land brought back from the sword, and gathered out of many people; and brought forth out of the nations, dwelling safely all of them,” “without walls, and having neither bars nor gates;” and therefore, styled “the land of unwallled villages,” “in the midst of the land.” This immigration and settlement is therefore not spread over the whole land; but principally confined to the midst or navel of the land; to that part, in other words, styled by Isaiah “a tenth.” His words are, “a great forsaking in the midst of the land. But yet in it a tenth, and it shall return and be eaten”—Isaiah 6: 13. By reference to this passage the reader will see that it is part of a prophecy concerning the desolation and subsequent restoration of the people and land of Israel. It predicts that in the midst of the widespread ruin a tenth part should escape utter desolation; and that the people should return and occupy it, and browse it with their cattle, which is implied by the phrase, “and shall return, and shall be eaten.” This is restoration in a limited degree—a restoration of a tenth part of the land, in the midst of it. What proportion of the nation will occupy this tenth part is not revealed; but of this we are informed, namely, that be it large or small only “one third part” will survive the calamities inflicted upon them by Gog’s invasion of the country, and siege and capture of Jerusalem: for, “thus saith Jehovah, it shall come to pass in all the land, that two parts therein shall be cut off and die; but the third shall be left therein. And I will bring the third part through the fire, and will refine them as silver is refined, and will try them as gold is tried: they shall call on my name, and I will hear them: I will say, It is my people: and they shall say, The Lord is my God”—Zechariah 13: 8—that is, Jesus, “whom Jehovah that made both Lord and Christ”—Acts 2: 36.

After Gog’s power is broken on the mountains of Israel, the work of restoring “the whole house of Jacob” begins. The destruction of the Czar’s “mighty army,” made up of the contingents, supplied from all his subject nations, is styled of God, “My slaughter that I do sacrifice for you, a great sacrifice upon the mountains of Israel.” This he terms, “My hand that is laid upon the nations.” Isaiah calls this, “The day of the great slaughter, when the towers fall”—“The day that the Lord bindeth up the breach of his people, and healeth the stroke of their wound:”—the day when he shall “cause his glorious voice to be heard, and shall show the lighting down of his arm, with the indignation of his anger, and with the flame of a devouring fire, with scattering, and tempest, and hailstones. For through the voice of the Lord shall the Assyrian (Gog) be beaten down, who smote (Israel) with a rod”—Isaiah 30: 25-26, 30-31. This will be a dreadful day upon the invaders of Israel’s land, even “the day of vengeance of their God;” but at the same time “the year of his redeemed.” When these things have come to pass, the words of Jehovah by Ezekiel will be accomplished, saying, “It is come, and It is done: this is the day (the day of Christ) whereof I have spoken”—the day of Gog, the Assyrian-Clay’s, destruction, and of the deliverance of his people Israel—the day of the “great voice” of the Seventh Vial, “issuing from the throne, saying, It is done!” Having predicted the events of this day of judgment upon Gog and his forces, in his thirty-ninth chapter, Ezekiel then says, “So the house of Israel shall know that I (Jesus) am the Lord their God from that day and forward.” This terrible overthrow of their enemy proclaims Jesus Jehovah’s servant, and their deliverer. Having smitten the Assyrian image, it remains for him to proceed in the work of “planting the heavens, and laying the foundations of the earth, and saying unto Zion, Thou art my people”—a work equivalent to “raising up the tribes of Jacob, and restoring the desolations of Israel:” and one to which Jehovah refers, when he says by Ezekiel, “Now,” after the overthrow of Gog, “will I bring again the captivity of Jacob,” which “the north” hitherto refuses to “give up,” and “the south keeps back;” “and have mercy upon the whole house of Israel; and will be jealous for my holy name.” This is the final and complete restoration of the nation, which can only be effected by the invincible prowess of the Son of God.

It is not very apparent what is meant by Gog going against Palestine “to a limited degree.” He either invades the land, or he does not. If he invades it, it is not a question of degree, but of fact. He invades it for a purpose—to take possession of the holy Places, and to convert the country into a province of his empire, then fitly represented by the image Nebuchadnezzar saw in his dream. He only accomplishes his purpose in part. He captures the Holy City; but fails to subdue the country. The post-millennial Gog aims at both, but succeeds in effecting neither.

Our correspondent does not seem to be acquainted with my views of the restoration of Israel before and after the Advent. If he read what I have written on the “Second Exodus,” in Elpis Israel, he will see that I do not teach the conversion of the Jews before they settle in the land, previous to Christ’s appearing; nor the conversion of all Israel who are gathered into “the wilderness of the people,” after the Advent. The ten thousand Jews now dwelling in Jerusalem are “unconverted,” in the Gentile sense, and have no faith in Jesus. Yet they inhabit the land, with several thousands besides having as little faith as they. Let this number be increased by British or other policy, and you have the character of the preadventual colonisation of the “tenth,” whose people are to return, and browse it with their cattle. But, before “the captivity” held in bondage by “the north” and by “the south” can get back to Palestine, they have to pass through “the wilderness of the people,” as, in the days of Moses, their fathers passed through “the wilderness of the land of Egypt.” In that wilderness Elijah will bring them to the acknowledgment of that same Jesus whom he saw in majesty on the Mount of Transfiguration, as Son of God and King of Israel; and at the same time, all the sons of Belial among them, “children in whom there is no faith,” will be purged out of the host, and be for ever excluded from Israel’s land, as unworthy of the national sabbatism promised of Jehovah in the covenant made of old with their fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.

H. B. believes that “God’s restored favour is to be manifested in special efforts for Israel’s conversion principally.” By whom? it may be asked. If it be answered, By the special efforts of pious Protestants, we lift up our hands in astonishment at any one professing intelligence in the Word of the kingdom, supposing that there would be any divine favour manifested in such special efforts! Pious Protestants to themselves need special efforts for their own conversion. To set them to work converting the Jews, is like setting a man with a beam in his eye, to pull out a mote in the eye of another; or appointing a blind man to lead another across a precipice! Protestants know not the gospel, and therefore believe it not; how then can they by special-efforting convert the Jews? The gospel of the kingdom is the power of God for the salvation of every one that believes. As, therefore, they do not believe this, God’s power for conversion cannot operate through them. None can convert Israel but God. He alone can give them a new heart and renew a right spirit within them. He has promised to do this; not through the special efforts of Gentiles, however pious, according to their sectarian standards; but through the special efforts of his Servant, and the system of means he comes in power and glory to execute.

I can, however, conceive of the possibility of a Jew being converted, through the aid of pious Gentiles. Generally speaking, there are more Jews to be found who believe the Hope of Israel, for which Paul was bound in chains, than sectarian Gentiles: now, if these Gentiles could convince such Jews that Jesus was their Messiah, and that the serpent was condemned in his flesh when he was lifted up, and that he was raised from the dead for their justification, they would be made what their Gentile teachers are not, and that is, believers of the kingdom's gospel in the name of Jesus. But in Paul's day the Jews were enemies of the gospel, which was turned by the favour of God to the advantage of the Gentiles; and so it is now, only reversed: the Gentiles are enemies of the gospel for Israel's sake. Hence, the Great Eastern Question, whose solution will result in breaking off the Gentiles, and the reingraftment of Israel into their own olive tree.

Our friend H. B. is right enough in supposing that before the destruction of all Israel's enemies, there will be an effort to effect their deliverance by merciful and peaceable means. But the institution of these means will not precede the overthrow of Gog's mighty army. This host will fall like Sennacherib's, without warning or premonition. Being in possession of "the city of the great King," he will be summarily ejected, and terribly discomfited in Edom. But the Image being shattered by the Czar's irreparable defeat, Jerusalem delivered, and Judea freed from the presence of the spoiler, the first angel proclamation after the Advent is sounded throughout the world. The Age-gospel is once more announced by divinely commissioned messengers. It is not proclaimed to be believed as the ground of forgiveness of sins, and exaltation to the possession of the kingdom in its glory, honour, power, riches, and dominion, which are eternal; but as a ground of escape from the judgment then about to be executed by Jesus of Nazareth, and the saints, upon those who rule the nations. Those in Egypt who desired to escape the plagues inflicted upon it by Moses, associated with the Israelites; and left the country with them, "a mixed multitude of men and women:" so, when the symbolic angel flies through the apocalyptic heaven, if any would escape the judgment upon Babylon, and upon the worshippers of the Beast and of his image, whose dominion-area is "spiritually," or figuratively, "called Sodom and Egypt;" which judgment is the burden of the Second and Third post-adventual proclamations, —they must "give glory to God" and "worship him:" that is, they must renounce their allegiance to “the powers that be,” and consort with Israel in their exodus, or goings out, from “the land of the enemy,” according to the commands of Jehovah’s King, then in Jerusalem, awaiting the result of the First Angelicism, before he proceeds to reduce the fragments of the shattered Image to the likeness of “the chaff of the summer threshing-floors.” For the powers that resist there is no more mercy than for Pharaoh and his army, that were swallowed up in the Red Sea. The nations inhabiting the earth to its utmost bounds are the promised inheritance of Jesus; therefore, the kings, and nobles, and judges, or rulers, of the earth, that would retain power over them, are his enemies, and doomed to destruction by fire and sword.

If by “all God’s people” is meant the Twelve Tribes of Israel, and all believers of the gospel of the kingdom, Jews and Gentiles, living and dead, H. B.’s notion of their “complete deliverance at the coming of Christ” cannot be sustained by the testimony of God. The dead in Christ will be raised, and the living saints transformed, and Jerusalem and Judea wrested from the spoiler, at his coming: their deliverance will be complete. But it will take the subsequent forty years, according to the plan revealed, to complete the deliverance of the Twelve Tribes, and mixed multitude consorting with them. The complete deliverance these will experience will be civil and ecclesiastical; but not a deliverance from mortality. In their case, this will be postponed for a thousand years. There may be multitudes of them that will never attain to that deliverance at all; as there were, doubtless, many that obtained settlement in Canaan under Joshua, who will have no part in eternal life and glory.

An expectation of the Advent every moment is doomed to disappointment every moment. There are certain events to be developed before Christ comes that cannot be accomplished in a moment. The great Roman city has to be divided into three imperial parts before the advent. This is not the work of a moment; but of many hard-fought campaigns, connected with the present war. Let those who are watching the signs of the times “examine themselves and see if they be in the faith.” Let them ascertain whether they are naked or not—if they have any garments on worth preserving; for let them remember, that the blessing is not only on the watchful, but on the watchful who keep their garments, and walk not in nakedness. The soul must be purified in the obeying of the truth, and continuance in it to the end.

For a commercial town and port, Rotterdam is remarkably clean; far superior, I think, to Amsterdam in this respect. The paving, however, is objectionable to pedestrians. The portion of the street which answers to the sidewalks of America and English towns, in the cities of Holland is generally occupied by short posts or stone pillars, with an ornamental chain stretched from one to another. Immediately outside of this is the gutter—a square drain nearly a foot in depth, covered by a hinged wooden flap, which forms part of the footway; and the latter, being on the same level as the roadway, is all alike dirty in wet weather. Rotterdam is subject to inundations; and that part of the city beyond the dam upon which the Hoog Straat is built, is overflowed by high tides ten or twelve times a year, and often axle-deep above the pavement. Notwithstanding this inconvenience, the natives say that Rotterdam is spreading itself too much over the turf—that is, too far from the river; and no true Dutchman likes to live without water at his very door. It has therefore been proposed to build a new quarter upon the low meadows beyond the Maese, and to connect it by a suspension bridge across the river.

We learned from our host that the Dutch were grievously oppressed with taxes. Every window and chimney in a house is taxed. One chimney is charged three florins a year; two five florins; three seven florins; and so on. For each maid-servant you pay nine florins yearly. Two carriage-horses are charged fifty florins a year. An impost is also placed on household furniture, varied according to style and class.

In our morning stroll we turned into “a church,” expecting to hear a sermon in Dutch; but, to our surprise, our ears were saluted with the accustomed sounds of our own vernacular. An Episcopal “predikant” was holding forth in English to a small and remarkably heavy-looking congregation. The best attribute of his discourse was its brevity. What he said, or rather read, was the commonplace ordinarily current in Protestant conventicles, parochial and non-conformist—many generalities, but nothing scripturally to the point. His darkness being very visible, I thought no harm could come of attempting his illumination: so when I returned to the Vlasmarket Hoek, I sent him a copy of the pamphlet entitled, “The Wisdom of the Clergy proved to be Folly,” through the post, directed to “Heer Mark, Engelsch Predikant, te Rotterdam.”

After dinner we renewed our walk; and finding that the Bureau de Police opened at 6 P.M., we determined to recover our passports at that hour, if possible, as we wished to set out by nine on Monday morning. Arriving at the bureau too early, I proposed a visit to the Protestant cathedral hard by. My companions, however, did not like to accompany me to these places, so I went alone. On the way thither, the boy we had seen at the police office, a sort of interpreter there, overtook me, and offered to show me the cathedral. Not being in need of his services, I declined them. He then proposed to sell me some cigars. But I did not wish to buy. Perceiving that he was a Jew, I turned his attention from trade to the subject of Messiah, by asking him if he were not an Israelite. At first he denied his nation; but when I declared my certainty that he was, he confessed it. I told him that I was also a Jew, but not in Moses, though I believed in that great prophet. This sounded strangely in his ears, and gave rise to the following conversation:

Boy. Are you not a Christian?

Editor. Yes; but neither a Protestant nor a Papist. —(Having arrived at the cathedral, I continued,)— I do not believe in cathedral religion.

Boy. But you believe in the Bible, don't you?

Editor. Yes; and for that very reason I do not believe in the religion of Europe; for neither Protestantism nor Romanism are taught there.

Boy. The Jews believe in Moses.

Editor. Not so, or they would believe in Jesus, for Moses wrote concerning him.

Boy. Ah, but we look for Messiah who will be a God. Jesus was nothing but a man, whom our people hanged. Jesus is not Christ.

Editor. Yes, Messiah must be a God in the sense of being the Son of God, and consequently more than an ordinary man. Jesus was this, and more. He was also Son of David, as your own genealogies prove, and is therefore the King of Israel. Your fathers hanged their king; but God raised him from the dead, and by this proved his claims to be just and true. He is the Messiah, and you need look for no other.

Boy. No, Jesus is not Christ. When Christ comes, he will restore Israel, and make all nations Jews. Jesus did not do this.

Editor. Simply because the time had not then come. Israel will be restored as you say, and will become the greatest of all nations. God will do this; but he will also do it by Jesus Christ, and—

Much of this conversation occurred in the cathedral while the people were collecting for their observances. On the clergyman rising to begin, the boy interrupted me by saying, “We must go, or we shall be shut in; for there he is just going to begin his liar!”—he meant “his lying.”

We returned to the police office, where I rejoined my companions. The boy led us into the bureau, in which we found a bureaucrat of not very prepossessing appearance or demeanour. He curtly demanded our names. We gave them; and from a bundle of like documents handed ours, enstamped with the words, “Gezieu en geregistreed ter directie van policie to Rotterdam den 8 Septemb. 1850—gaande naar Ruilers van wege den directeur van policie.” We were now free to go when and where we pleased in the little kingdom of Holland, none having the right to impede our way.

From the police office I returned to the cathedral. There may have been some 3,000 people there. The voorzanger, styled in Scotland the precentor, or anglice, the foresinger, gave out a hymn. The qualities of the organ came out effectively in the preliminary air, and he who heard it could never forget the burst of sound when the singing began! The whole congregation seemed to sing with a spirit and heartiness that I never heard equalled. We listened to the pealing and sonorous harmony with delight. It was sounding as the roar of many waters falling upon the ear in grand accord. It alone was well worth a voyage across the German Ocean to listen to. It was beyond all praise. During singing and prayer, hats were removed from all heads; but when the “predikant” proceeded to sermonise, many replaced them.

Bonnets seem to be a scarce article among the Hollanders. They are worn by some, though comparatively few. The generality go either bareheaded, or with broad-bordered caps nicely stiffened and fluted. The Frieslanders have a singular taste for headplates as large as the hand, and formed of gold or silver. They are worn on each side of the head, sometimes under a cap, and at others on the bare head covering the hair. They seem to be generally fond of trinkets, without being very choice respecting the quality of the gold. Caps, too, are the almost universal headgear of the men—a practice greatly to be commended, when it is considered that the alternative is a hat—that cylindrical contrivance with which civilised people afflict their heads, to please others, not themselves.

Having made ourselves sufficiently acquainted with Rotterdam, we left by rail for s’Graavenhaag, known commonly as “the Hague.” This town, also intersected by canals, is the capital of the little kingdom of Holland, and a royal residence near the North Sea, 28 miles south-west by south of Amsterdam, with 66,000 inhabitants. On landing from the cars we were beset by “commissionaires,” who importuned to carry our baggage, and to show us the lions of the place. But these favours we politely declined, having determined, on leaving London, to put “our foreign relations” to as little trouble as possible. We accordingly deposited our “affaires” at the first decent looking “tappery” we came to, and then sallied forth without incumbrance to pedestrianise the city, which is one of the most regularly and best built in Europe, and contains many handsome buildings. As I am not writing a guide-book for travellers, it is not necessary for me to transfer what has been printed a thousand times for their advantage, to these columns. I have neither time nor space to describe in detail the King’s palace, public edifices, and private mansions, were my memory retentive enough to do it. Suffice it to say, that we perambulated the streets until we were tired of all we saw, and longed for the arrival of the train to whirl us on to Amsterdam.

We arrived at this city, the chief emporium of Holland, at the usual hour. My notes remind me, that it is literally standing in the water. Water everywhere, and the canals numerous and magnificent. It is 52 miles south-south-west of Rotterdam, the second commercial emporium of the kingdom, founded in the twelfth century on the Amstel river, which here disembogues into the Y. as a branch of the Zuyder Zee is styled, and contains 225,000 people. The canal intersection of the city may be imagined from the fact of its being crossed by 290 bridges—a perfect net-work of canals, which are mostly bordered by rows of trees. The houses and streets are said to be kept remarkably clean; this, however, was not according to my experience. In my notes, it is written, “the bad smells in this Amsterdam are most offensive, and, in the warm season, well calculated to diffuse fever on every side. I was disordered here, and have no doubt it was owing to the effluvium. I felt sick at stomach, and was nearly cascading more than once.” The great canal of north Holland, extending from the Helder, terminates at Amsterdam, deep enough along its whole course to float a ship of the line. Among the numerous public edifices, the most remarkable is the King’s palace, formerly the City Hall, which was reared between 1648 and 1655, at the cost of 18,000,000 of florins. It has a frontage of 282 feet, a breadth of 285, and 116 in height, while its magnificent cupola (containing the finest chimes of bells in the Netherlands) rises 41 feet above the roof. It is built of freestone, and rests upon a foundation of 13,659 piles driven into the ground.

In the neighbourhood of the city is Zaardam, noted for upwards of 700 windmills, and docks, where the Russian emperor, Peter I, in 1697, suffered himself to be bound apprentice, in order to get a practical knowledge of ship-building. The suburbal residence of the rich, retired merchants of Amsterdam is the village of Brock in’t Waterland, and is noted for the remarkable cleanliness of its houses and streets. No stranger is allowed to enter any house there without having previously pulled off his boots and put on clean slippers.

We “footed it” all over Amsterdam, through it and round about. We liked Rotterdam and the Hague better; and concluded that it was about the last city we should ever select as a place to dwell in. The streets where no canals are for the most part are very narrow, and from the altitude of the buildings very confined. We remained in the place about sixteen hours, and then ticketed ourselves via Utrecht to Arnheim, the capital of Guelderland, on the Rhine, 57 miles from Amsterdam. The country is a level, with scarcely an undulation until you come to Utrecht, the capital of the province of the same name, situated on a branch of the Rhine. Here the country improves somewhat in appearance, but ere long is succeeded by heather, peat, pines, and sand-barrens in rapid succession as we steamed along. The traveller is glad when he arrives at Arnheim. It is a neat, clean, and beautiful town, 37 miles east-south-east of Utrecht. It is strongly fortified, has 15,000 inhabitants, and was anciently, the residence of the earls and dukes of Guelderland. The Rhine skirts it on the south. On the east and north it is surrounded by a moat filled with water. On each side walks and roads are laid out, and planted with rows of trees after the fashion of a park. On the south-west side of the town the land is high, and from the top commands a beautiful and extended prospect of the Rhine, and country beyond it. Arnheim is the terminus of the railway from Rotterdam. It abounds with hotels, which indicates that it is a place of considerable resort for tourists, for its citizens are far too few to sustain them. We put up at the Hotel de Holland, where the table d'hote was good, the lodging comfortable, and the domestics attentive and polite. After supper, a police paper was handed us to fill up with our answers to a number of impertinent questions, such as, "Where do you come from?" "Where are you going to?" "What is your business?" as though any one had any thing to do with these matters besides ourselves. Wishing, however, to leave a favourable impression upon our foreign relations, we civilly gratified their curiosity in all things. According to our custom, we occupied our time in walking about the town, which we surveyed in all its parts. The signs over the stores had not yet lost their novelty. An invitation under one was particularly amusing. It was over a "tapperij" door, where people assembled to smoke, and to drink "bier en wijn." The words were, "inde valk." Here was the classical original of what is generally regarded as a genuine Cockneyism. The costermonger English is "Valk in!" So that when a London donkey-driver says, "Valk in, an't please yer honour," he is only quoting Holland Dutch as more polished people do the classics in discourse!

LETTER FROM TEXAS.

Dear Brother: —The “Word of Truth” has but few advocates in this country. Cattle, cotton, and the various works of Mammon have a stronger hold upon their minds than the “sure word of prophecy,” to which they take but little heed.

A few honestly-disposed people appear to feel some interest, and are trying to learn; yet to the majority in this region, the subject of the gospel is as obscure as midnight. You may talk to them, and endeavour to instruct them, and even if they listen, their minds are so imbued with sectarian mystery that they do not, and seem as if they could not, comprehend it. But Elpis Israel is abroad among them. What few copies we have are all loaned out, and have been most of the time since we received them; and there is no telling what may be the result.

We feel a lively interest in “THE GREAT EASTERN QUESTION.” It does, indeed, appear as though the purpose of the Lord, as revealed in his Word, were fast maturing to its consummation in “the latter days,” and we are led to hope, that should we. Who are not past the meridian of life, live to an ordinary old age, we may yet see His face without death, and live; and “sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob,” and all those “who have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.” I never felt so desirous to live to a good old age as now.

With grateful recollection of the priceless truth we have learned of you, I subscribe myself,

Most devotedly yours, in the One Hope,

W. A. OATMAN, M.D.

Cedar Creek, Bastrop, Texas,

October 4, 1853.

THE HERALD APPROVED.

Dear Sir: —Enclosed I forward you five dollars in payment for the Herald for the past year, and for 1854; and deem three dollars little enough for a monthly magazine of the character and ability of yours. I am free to acknowledge that I believe it the truest exponent of the world's prophetic history, past and future, extant; and the only correct guide in connection with revelation for our fallen fellow-men.

I have been led to these conclusions by being somewhat conversant with your writing for the last five or six years; and the forcible evidence of your arguments and conclusions in connection with the testimony itself, leaves no room for distrust or doubt in the minds of any free from the bias of sectarian systems so characteristic of our age. That the advocate and standard bearer of the immutable principles of truth will meet with that support necessary for its continued promulgation, is the earnest wish of

Yours respectfully,

HENRY McKAY.

Joe Davis, Illinois, November 6, 1853.

“WHAT SHALL I DO?”

Dear Sir: —The usual toil of the week being ended, I sit down to pen a few lines to express my thanks for the knowledge I have received through your instrumentality. Although I feel that my view is limited, yet I thank God that notwithstanding the pressure of my worldly pursuits, which are arduous, I have turned from that state of unbelief so generally prevalent in what is called “the Church.” I used to think, with the majority of professors, that the things in the Bible might or might not be true. This was about the amount of my faith. But since I have studied your writings, I could as easily doubt my own existence as that the Bible testimony is the truth of God; and although I am at a loss in regard to details respecting the course of future events, yet the general outline I see distinctly.

I am still striving to add “to faith, goodness and knowledge,” &c., but find it a very difficult thing to do. Though I am one of the poor who appear to be most favoured by the gospel, yet I am so oppressed with the sinful nature we have all inherited, that I can hardly bring myself into subjection to all the requirements of the gospel; and even when I do, some unholy influence throws me off my guard. What shall I do? I have no stay nor support, but the little knowledge I have obtained; and am hedged in on every side by the hostility of hypocrisy and self-righteousness, which is truly fierce. I feel that solitude or the grave would be preferable to my present situation.

The news from the East is full of interest to me. I see that the Emperor of Russia is taking the track you have foreshown he would. This encourages me greatly in the hope that the work will be cut short in righteousness. I desire to see a righteous government established in the earth, with the people all enlightened and blessed.

As your columns are too valuable to be occupied with much political news, can you inform us which of all your Eastern journals will give us the earliest accounts of all that is going on in the Old World? We are in a barren land here; for although our papers are filled with news, yet it is of no interest to those who are looking afar off.

That your abilities may be preserved, and your labours abundantly prospered till Christ appears in his glory, is the prayer of your friend and brother in tribulation,

ENOS JACOBS.

Ogle, Illinois, November 12, 1853.

ANSWER.

Our correspondent's experience of his Adamic nature is that of all true believers. Paul says of that portion of the nature that went by his name, "I know that in me, that is, in my flesh, dwells no good thing; for to will is present with me; but to perform that which is good I (that is, my flesh) find not. . . .because of sin that dwelleth in me," or my flesh. Read about "the two principles," in Elpis Israel. In answer to brother Jacobs' inquiry, "What shall I do?" the advice is, "Keep your mind on the exceeding great and precious promises given in the knowledge of God and the Lord Jesus," and it will become strengthened, and a partaker of the divine nature. These are stay and support enough; for God's comforting and sustaining power is in his Word assuredly believed. "This is the victory that overcomes the world, even our faith." All surrounding discouragement just serves to put it to the proof, that, not failing, it may be perfected. —EDITOR.

EFFECTS OF THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM AS A MORAL POWER.

My dear and respected Brother: —The receipt of the December number of the Herald will allow me to procrastinate no longer in writing you; any delay being quite unnecessary.

For some time after your departure we were expecting to hear from you, which is the principal reason, I believe, that I delayed writing, and giving you any news that might be interesting.

Elpis Israel and your good self were, for several Lord's days after you left, handled without gloves by the Rev.—Gekie, of the Congregationalist body; and his exposures of the “absurdities,” “blasphemies,” &c., contained in Elpis Israel, proved quite attractive to numbers of all the isms in the city. He had “E.I” in the pulpit, and read extracts here and there, and commented thereon, showing the “perfect absurdity” of the author's views; the rank infidelity and awful blasphemies contained therein, and declaring it as his opinion that Dr. Thomas “could not be a Christian!” Your old acquaintance-of-a-night, Mr. McLean, too, from the pulpit in Granville Street Chapel, gave poor Elpis a sad time of it; according to him, it was “a combination of all the errors extant!” “according to it, there was no heaven, no hell, no Devil, and Christ was only a good man!” I regretted afterwards that I had not made it a point to attend and hear these unfortunate people, so that I might have known what they really did say, and perhaps been enabled to show them that they were ridiculing and condemning God's truth. But any portion of the Lord's day cannot be well spared for the purpose of listening to such harangues; and Mr. G. and McL. may be spared to answer in your presence for their cowardly attacks on your book, the moment your back was turned.

The Lord's day after you left, some of the brethren who had been in the habit of worshipping in the Harmonic Hall, feeling the necessity of having the church organised, and as nearly as possible upon scriptural principles, and the time being most appropriate for doing so, seeing so many had just been baptised, and others about to be, Brethren Creed, Huxtable, Jenkins, and Willoughby, met at our house in the morning, before the hour of meeting, and we all agreed that the attempt should be made, and that, if possible, the names of persons who had believed the gospel, and had been baptised, should be obtained, for the purpose of organising a church; accordingly, it was proposed; but parties wished time to think about it, and it was postponed until the next Lord's day. Next Lord's day brother Willoughby, who was to have presided over the meeting, and who had the church book, was not present; and besides, it was wet, and but few attended; so it was again postponed until the next Lord's day. On that day there was a pretty full attendance: brother Willoughby was in the chair, and I was secretary, both appointed by unanimous request of the meeting. The object we had in view was then stated, and a resolution to the following effect was moved, seconded, and passed, nem con.: "That the names of persons who had believed the gospel and been baptised, and who were desirous of forming themselves into one body for the purpose of cooperating as 'the pillar and support of the truth,' by word and deed, should give in their names for the purpose of being recorded in a book to be provided for the use of the church." On the names of parties being called for, a young brother intimated that he did not see the necessity of the church being reorganised; and brother J—, much excited, declared that an attempt was about being made to trample upon the church, and to exclude certain individuals; that the church had been organised as much as it ever could or would be; and strongly insinuated that parties had come in among them who wished to break up their body. He was met by brethren Wilson, Huxtable, Willoughby, and others, as old, and some older members than he, declaring that the church never had been organised; there were no records, no list of members; persons communed with them and belonged to the Baptists; it was not known who were members, or who were not, and, consequently, no discipline could be exercised or maintained; and it was necessary and desirable that the church should be organised, as was intended. But brother J —, most unduly impassioned, was determined it should not be done if he could help it; and a scene of strife, contention, and tumult was manifested such as I sincerely hope never to witness again. His voice could be heard outside the hall, and proved attractive to passers-by; indeed, it was most disgraceful. The names of persons favourable to the resolution were taken down, and we decided to leave the hall to brother J—and the two or three who sided with him, and endeavour to procure a room to meet in which would prevent us from being longer identified with such a disgraceful scene; and I am glad to say we succeeded in getting a nice room in Haw's Buildings, opposite the Province Building, where we have since met: and, after all, it would appear everything has turned out for the best. We number about thirty. We are organised pretty nearly as you are in New York, as appears by your printed paper, of which you kindly sent some copies; and I trust in all our proceedings we will be blessed with the favour and approbation of our Heavenly Father. Brother J's opposition, which was the cause of all the strife, was to me most unexpected. I had no idea then that he had been warning brethren against appointing me a brother deacon; I did not suspect that his pride had been wounded because I had opposed warmly his unscriptural notions that the Lord's Supper was for the remission of believers' sins, and that Matthias was not an apostle; and, indeed, any thing that I believed was erroneous. I little thought, then, that because his influence was somewhat diminished since I met with the church, (which, by the way, was mainly through his persuasions,) that he was anxious to get rid of me, and of others, whom he thought might interfere with his little ambition. However, on this head enough—too much, I fear you will say—has been said; and, as I perceive my sheet is getting filled, I will conclude by giving a list of subscribers to the Herald for '54, which you will please send under cover to me.

I remain yours affectionately,

J.R.L.

Like causes produce similar results, whether operating in Halifax, New York, or any other place. The truth is sure to disturb the schemes of little ambitions, which have ordinarily much cunning but little prudence. These set themselves in fleshly opposition, as clearly appears from their violence and virulence. Passion swamps their reason, when truth, ever calm and trusting in God, advances to its goal with firm and equal tread, dethroning high thoughts and imaginations, and plants its victorious ensigns in purity and peace. The gospel of the kingdom is a coal of fire to Diotrephes wherever he appears. —EDITOR.

APPRECIATION OF THE WORD.

Dear Brother Thomas: —I was too much indisposed to meet you at Temperance. I should be gratified if we could often see each other, especially in view of the exciting events transpiring in the East. I am informed that some are ascribing what you have published concerning the shaking of nations, to political speculation on your part, and not to your acquaintance with the prophets. This is awarding to you a very eminent position amongst the great men of the earth.

I was in Lunenburg on the fourth and fifth Lord's day in October, and the first in November. Some of the congregations were large and encouraging. Two persons were immersed. I think Lunenburg is the most inviting field of gospel labour within the range of my acquaintance.

If we be accounted worthy of the kingdom, it is a gratifying thought that we shall be associated with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob; also, with the prophets and the apostles; and most of all, it is gratifying that we shall be associated with the Messiah, and become more profoundly acquainted with God. Possessed of immortality and incorruptibility of constitution, we shall appreciate LIFE, and every good thing as the gift of God, and as developing him to his intelligent creatures. This train of thought is in harmony with what Jesus expresses as recorded in the seventeenth of John: “This is life eternal, to KNOW THEE, the only true GOD, and JESUS CHRIST, whom thou hast sent.” Surely, this is giving great importance to the said knowledge. This also agrees with what Peter says: “*Grace and peace be multiplied to you through the knowledge of God and of Jesus our Lord.” An enlarged contemplation of the Divine character, as presented in the Holy Scriptures, enables us better to understand and estimate “*The gospel of the kingdom of God.” Our appreciation of the kingdom is in the ratio of our knowledge of God, and of his only-begotten Son. The kingdom of God must be correspondent, in the scale of valuation, to the estimate we find in the divine record concerning God himself. So we may affirm, that the kingdom of God must be as far superior to the kingdoms of men, as God himself is superior to men. We may conclude, then, that all good things will be in the kingdom.

This seems in accordance with the proclamation of the kingdom by John the Baptist, by Jesus and the apostles, and with all that is taught concerning the kingdom. Surely, the kingdom is as the pearl of great price to every one that understands. Every gift of God fills the place which he designs; therefore, every gift of God is perfect in its place. Food is his gift; and how good is it to a hungry man! Water is his gift, and well suited to the thirsty man. The kingdom is his gift, and, even in prospect, presents us with every motive in the way of glory and honour and incorruptibility, etc., which we need to prompt us to action. Sometimes, in order to bring the subject home, I ask the question, What will Abraham and all those in the kingdom find themselves possessed of? Having been resurrected and reconstituted, surely they will possess the kingdom, and all it possesses in glory, honour, incorruptibility, etc., etc., etc. Well, you may say you know all this, and more besides; well I reply, This is one reason. I say it to you, believing that you appreciate the gratification of intercommunication. This social organization drinks in oceans of pleasure.

Accept my best wishes for yourself and yours, and believe me, as ever,

Yours in the gospel,

ALBERT ANDERSON.

BIGOTRY DEFEATED.

Dear Brother Thomas: —The Herald of the Kingdom and Age to Come has just come to hand, closing the volume for this important year of the times of the Gentiles. We are glad to receive it in these parts, and appreciate its visits more than those of all the papers of the day.

Your report of “The Labours of the Year” is, indeed, quite interesting. Mount Harmony and Free Union, I think, hardly received as much credit as they were entitled to for the numbers that came out to hear. The season was very busy, seeing that the frost was threatening to cut down the tobacco, if the planters did not cut it for themselves. Do you not recollect what an attentive congregation you had at Free Union, and quite a large one, too, considering it was Tuesday after court? Mount Harmony was not so large, but well-behaved, (except the children, who would be better left at home,) and attentive to what you spoke.

Bro. Magruder addressed a full house at Free Union, last Sunday. The Baptists appointed a meeting there on Tuesday, widely circulating how many preachers would be present, to induce the multitude to come. Bro. Magruder, of course, appeared and spoke, but many of the Baptists declined to enter the house, which was no disadvantage, as their bigotry enlisted the sympathy of the non-professors on our side, causing them to dispute against them. Though aided by the wild-fire of modern Methodism, they effected nothing. Their great meeting passed as a shadow, the two-edged sword in Bro. Magruder's hand having laid the spirit of the camp. How I wish you could have been there!

Your Brother in Christ,

R. J. DUKE.

THE RUSSIAN CHURCH.

[The Morning Advertiser says: “The following article, from the pen of a distinguished Russian correspondent, resident in London, will be read at the present time with much interest, as the question of the Russian Church is so often mixed up with the Eastern question, now convulsing all Europe.”]

We hear a good deal about the religious fanaticism of the Russians, which at the present is threatening the peace of Europe, which burns to re-establish its worship in the church of St. Sophia, and which summons the Christians of Eastern Europe to a new crusade against Islamism. Let us shortly examine it, and see on what it is based.

The Lower Empire was already tottering to its fall when Russia borrowed from it her religious creed, not being able to foresee that, in inoculating her people with the forms of the Greek faith, she was only warming in her bosom the serpent destined to devour her. The dissensions about images, and the empty theological disputes in which the Greek emperors played such foolish parts, together with the dissolute manners of the clergy, all went to contribute, in no slight degree, to the final fall of the Byzantine Empire. But the Greek faith sanctioned the marriage of priests and the use of wine; it spoke to the senses through the pomp of its rites; and it was for that reason, through the will of one prince, the Grand Duke Vladimir, Russia embraced the Greek religion. At the command of that prince, the idols were thrown into the Dnieper, and the whole population of Kiev plunged into the river in a body, to be baptised. The Russians repudiated their old gods, and adopted a new one, at the bidding of a prince who was not yet Czar! In Russia, idolatry of the Czar goes far beyond every other species of idolatry.

The old idols of the Russians became the images of the new faith, and they now adore their various saints, as before they worshipped their different gods. Job is their ancient Peroun, the god of thunder: Yurru, the god of fire, became St. Nicholas; the patron saint of Russia. The adoration of images is next door to idolatry among the Russians, for they embrace them on the smallest occasion, prostrate themselves before them, offer wax candles to them; or, if women, ribbons; if soldiers, military medals. Relics, however, are objects of even higher worship, and the abuse to which the practice is carried is certainly far worse than any thing to be found in the Church of Rome. The latter makes a regular trade of it; and, if she invents martyrs as she wants them for sale, retail or wholesale, to the different countries who are her customers, the worst result is, only to make the early history of Christianity a perfect martyrology of Christians. Russia, on the contrary, is poor in martyrs—excepting those slain by the Tartars or the Mongols: and so, whenever the Government stands in need of a new manufactured saint, it has to resort to a different source. Thus, to enrich the province of Voronej, as well as to renew the memory of Peter I., Nicholas has made a saint of Mitrophanes!

The Russian Patriarchs have never assumed the consequences of the Popes. Having originally been subordinate to the Patriarch of Constantinople, they would never submit to the Czars, even in temporal matters; and as the Church under their orders thus formed a species of state within the state, Peter I. abolished the Patriarchate, and replaced it by the Synod, which until the present reign was an institution of considerable importance. Nicholas, who is the soldier in every thing, has given the Synod one of his generals for a president, who conducts the proceedings as he would drill a regiment. There is not much virtue in the Russian clergy, and their convents are only refuges for the lazy and ill-disposed, which might be converted into barracks without doing much harm; but the head of the State and of the Church ought rather to purify their morals than try to coerce them by humiliation.

The instruction which the Russian priests receive in their seminaries is wholly insufficient. Latin is of no use to them, and it is only in practical life, and in intercourse with the nobles, that they ever learn anything. Even their theological studies have so little solidity, that the most superficial Voltairean can discomfit them on the most essential questions.

Their pecuniary situation is the disgrace of the Russian Church. The priests have no salaries, and their parishes have to maintain them. The rural priests receive an allotment of land, which they cultivate as well as they can. Very few landowners pay them a fixed sum. In the towns they collect what they can from the contributions of the pious, and the dues for the performance of the various holy offices—a state of things which, as may readily be imagined, gives rise to all sorts of mendicity, extortion, and petty cheating, which it would occupy us too long to detail now, but of which the reader may form an idea. Confession has become a ridiculous formality, which only serves to fill the plate always religiously placed beside the priest's chair. With the rich it is merely a bit of gossip, more or less agreeable, and in which the priest often contrives to glide in a word on behalf of his own interests, rendered the more needful, sometimes, by the cares of supporting a numerous family.

The Russian priest cannot marry a second time. St. Andrew says he is to have only one wife, and this passage has been interpreted to mean that he is forbidden to marry a widow, or to marry a second time himself.

What has been done to remedy this low state of education, and the precarious financial condition of the Russian clergy? By doing what was never done, either in the darkest or in the most dangerous times. Under Ivan the Terrible, at the time of the Polish invasion, and in 1812, the bells were taken from the churches to be cast into cannon. It was left for Nicholas to empty the treasuries of the churches! At first, as is usual in such cases, a committee was formed for the purpose of providing for the support of the clergy; from the Synod this committee passed under the presidency of General Protosoff, and the money of the Church, originally intended for the instruction and assistance of the clergy, passed into the coffers of the Czar. It served to defray the expenses of the visit of the Emperor and Empress to Sicily! As an excuse for this measure, we are told that this money was lying idle in the Church chests, without use and without interest. Does not this remind us of the arguments employed by robbers in certain cases? The money in the Turkish mosques is also lying idle, but it will not be seized for the Sultan's travelling expenses, but to be employed in defending his people against the Russians.

If the Russo-Greek Church was tolerant under Catherine II., it has ceased to be so under Nicholas. He has forced the United Greeks to separate themselves from the Pope, and to re-enter the bosom of the Russian Church. In Poland he has erected a Russian altar by the side of every Catholic altar. The Armenians of the Gregorian sect are under process of conversion. The Patriarch of Echmiadzin, by way of paying court to the Czar, has gradually obliterated, one after another, the differences that used to exist between the Greco-Russian form of worship and the Armenian. There is not a single sect, down even to the Lutheran peasants of the Esthonia, that has not been tried to be converted to the Greek faith by the bait of grants of land and enlarged privileges. This bait has led to some ridiculous results in the Caucasus among the Ossetinians, who, receiving a shirt and a silver rouble for each conversion, have managed to get the reward three or four times over, by being converted over and over again, in different localities. The consequence is, that the official list of baptisms is greater than the whole number of inhabitants, which does not, however, prevent them from still belonging to their old faith. Not a single Ossetinian has ever been seen in the Christian church of Kasbeck!

The children of mixed marriages in Russia follow the religion of the father if they are boys, of the mother if they are girls. This division continues thus in the family, unless it is set aside by some contrivance.

Prayers for the imperial family occupy two-thirds of the time in the Russian ritual, and, though the statement may seem incredible to some, the priest, when he divides the bread, blesses the offering in seven portions; the first of these is in honour of the imperial family—Christ, the Virgin Mary, and the whole saintly hierarchy follow after.

The idolatry of the Czar—and I do assert it unequivocally—is carried in Russia further than the worship of God; and if I should be tempted to define an Englishman as “a constitutional animal,” and a Frenchman as a “monarchical animal,” I should be compelled to classify a Russian as a “despotic animal.”

As regards the fanaticism of the Russian, I do not believe in it. He observes fast-days, he goes to church, where he hears a mass, but he does not believe in the priest, whose hand he finds so often in his pocket. The noble himself is a Voltairien and an unbeliever. As to the Russian soldier, he dies, pressing the cross which is suspended from his neck to his expiring lips: but he fights only because he has a taste for a military life, and therefore does not much care, when once in for it, how or when it ends; and to the priest, who says to him, “My children, you suffer here, but in another world the nobles will burn on a huge pile of fire, and you will have to throw on the faggots,” he replies—“We shall be sent a long way, then, to fetch the wood.”

In the time of Luther they believed that the Turks were about to overrun the world: now they believe that the Russians have the same destiny. The Turks are in articulo mortis, and if the Russians do not infuse more intelligence into their administration of affairs, mere fanaticism for the Czar will not suffice to subjugate the world; and unless they extend themselves by conquest, they will grow weaker and weaker.

ODOLOGY;

OR, THEOLOGICAL MESMERISM WITCHCRAFT REVIVED ANEW.

The following correspondence will serve to introduce the subject which we have styled Odology, the derivation of which we shall give hereafter, when we come to treat upon the suggestions it contains.

“Dear Sir:

“I think you have done the “spirits” too much honour in explaining their “rappings” on philosophical principles. I believe they are a set of knaves, and their “rappings” and “tappings” mere tricks of legerdemain. I have seen the “Wizard of the North” perform many more surprising.”

“E. Q. M.”

England, May 1852.

“Dear Sir:

“In the Herald,” for April, is a short notice of the remarkable phenomenon which is now attracting so much notice in the Northern States, under the name of “Spiritual Manifestations.” Your correspondent selected a very poor specimen as the subject of his communication. There are hundreds of “mediums” in this region; and most of them are persons whose character for integrity has hitherto been unimpeachable. Their answers are often surprising to all who hear; and present the strongest argument for the existence of spirit separate from matter, that I have ever seen. For instance, two gentlemen called at one of these Circles in a city where they were entire strangers; and where they stayed but a couple of hours. They went into the room where “the circle” was already “getting responses.” One of them asked if he might put questions at once, as he was going out in the next train. Permission was given; and in answer to his questions, he got in a few minutes all his past history, many circumstances of which he thought were only known to himself; and others which had been carefully limited to a small circle of his intimate friends. The other gentleman was almost equally successful; but one or two mistakes were made in their answers to him. The first gentleman had all his questions answered correctly and promptly, though some of them were asked mentally, and others by writing on a card, (taking great care to conceal what was written from every person,) and then pointing to a written question, (keeping the card out of sight,) he was at once answered, and always correctly. I might tell you a multitude of such instances, where there could be no collusion, and no dishonesty.

“And now, brother, I will give you to understand why I take the liberty of troubling you with this statement. I do not believe that these are the works of “disembodied spirits;” for I believe in no such existences. But what are they? These things are facts. How are they to be accounted for? They seem to come into direct collision with views I have for years entertained, as you well know. But I must be able to explain them, at least to myself. I have exchanged farms with a man who was a “medium,” and became crazy by it —“possessed of the Devil,” he says; and he is a very honest man. There are forty of these mediums in the village of Battle Creek near here; and there are some in this neighbourhood. Do you read any of the papers that are devoted to this subject? I wish you could read the past volumes of “The Spirit World,” published in Boston by Le Roy Sunderland. There are startling facts in it. Now, what I want to say is that this new delusion, is the most dangerous one you have ever been called upon to meet. The whole system promulgated in your writings goes down, if the claims put forth by these spirit-mongers are established. And it seems to me more important that you should attack and demolish this new opposition than that you should defend your position against any and all others. If you do not take up this subject and do it justice, you must not be surprised if your subscribers in these vicinities, where these things abound, fall away.

“And now I am upon this subject, let me propound a few questions, which have been put to me by believers in separate spirit existences:

1. How do you account for the forms seen by the disciples on the Mount of Transfiguration? It is claimed that the souls or spiritual bodies of Moses and Elijah were seen there.
2. How did the Lord’s body, after resurrection, appear suddenly, and as suddenly vanish out of sight? Will it be so with our bodies in the resurrection? And why was he never seen except by the disciples?
3. What did the young man with Elisha see? And what was done to him to enable him to see? What was that sight of the patriarchs and prophets which enabled them to see angels?

4. Where was Paul caught up to, when he says he was taken into the third heaven? Where is the heaven of angels; and could Paul's body be taken to it?
5. What does the Lord mean by his argument against the Sadducees? If Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, are already risen, the argument seems to me merely a catch, and dishonest.

“I send you some numbers of a Swedenborgian paper which is sent to me; and call your attention to some passages by pencil marks. I remain, truly your brother, in the Hope of the Kingdom and Age to Come,

“JOHN B. HOXIE.”

Professor Reichenbach, in his experiments on certain crystals, and persons, through the medium of highly sensitive individuals, has ascertained that a fluid of a blue and yellow colour, more subtile than electricity, is thrown off from the poles of the crystals, and from the ends of the fingers. It is not visible to persons in a normal state of the nervous system, which is adapted only to the perception of ordinary phenomena; but when the brain is exalted beyond what is usual, though short of actual insanity, things invisible to others are perceived, pertaining to this highly attenuated or rarified exhalation, which is probably the electro-magnetic fluid reduced to an aura by the peculiar atomic organization of the bodies from which it is given off. On this fluid Reichenbach has bestowed the name of OD; I suppose for the same reason that Dr. Faraday styles the electrical poles electrods (electrodes) from electron, amber, (by the friction of which electricity was first artificially discerned) and odos, a way—the poles being regarded merely as the doors or ways by which electricity passes. The od is the boundary of the decomposing matter in the direction of the electric current. Reichenbach's fluid passes off at the ods or poles; and as he regards it as something else than electricity, magnetism, or galvanism, he calls it by another name, even the Greco-chemical term for the extremity from which it exhales.

I have styled this article Odology (from logos a discourse and od) or discourse upon Od. Not that I am going to discuss the subject of Od reichenbachically; but believing that the phenomena referred to in the foregoing communication are Odistic, if any thing, I have chosen to denominate what I have to say upon the subject by Odology, rather than by Pneumatology, Psychology, or any other word which concedes the unproved and unprovable affirmation of the existence of supposed dead men's ghosts disembodiedly.

The electro-magnetic od is constantly passing off from the electrodes, or poles, of animal bodies and certain crystals. It is probable that our bodies are enveloped with a halo of it, for every thing has its halo according to the following testimony. "It is well known," says Mrs. Griffiths, "that around and adhering to all surfaces there is a halo of demi-transparent light, seen only, however, when the object for experiment is in a certain position with regard to the eye and the light which falls on it. This halo is not dependent on any peculiarity of colour or material, for it encompasses every object in nature, whether it belong to the animal, vegetable, or mineral kingdom; whether it be square or round, black or white, opaque or transparent, solid or fluid." (Silliman's Journal, Jan. 1st, 1840.) The halo of our bodies, it is probable, consists of Reichenbach's odic fluid the colour of which is visible to those who are highly odic, or in a state in which the od is abundantly generated. It is of a delicate blue when given off from the positive electrode, and yellow from the negative pole of crystal. From the fingertips of a male subject it exhales of a blue colour about an inch long; but from those of a female the jet is inconsiderable, imparting, as it were, a luminousness to their extremities.

From grave yards this odic exhalation is abundant. It has been seen to cover a necropolis to a depth of four feet, as a lambent blue haze. This is doubtless the fluid generated by the decomposing animal matter beneath the sod. Like phantom-ships at sea, produced by refraction of the light reflected on the firmament from real ships, phantom appearances are sometimes seen by sensitive nervous systems, produced by refraction of the odic rays in and upon the mirror formed by the magnetic halo of the earth, which emanate from the forms corrupting in the dust thereof. These phantoms (in Greek styled phantasma [Matt. 14:26; according to Griesbach, Luke 24: 37, 39, should read phantasma, not pneuma.] are called "separate," or "disembodied spirits," by the ignorant and superstitious, under the supposition that they are the real men and women, boys and girls, who used to enact life's follies in the flesh! They are, no doubt, as real as phantom-ships; and as awfully mysterious to the unphilosophical and scripturally-unenlightened, as they are to the untutored barbarians of the fore-castle. But real as the phantom-ship spectres are, who would be so crazy as to maintain that they are the souls or spirits of the ships which gave them motion over the dark blue sea! Or that they are the disembodied ghosts of the vessels caught up to the third heavens! Yet this would be just as rational, as the psychological theosophisms of the schools, pulpits, and "circles," about souls, ghosts, and spirit-worlds.

There are a few discoveries in electrical science worth knowing in connection with this subject. Professor Moser, as the result of his researches in Thermography, remarks that "all bodies radiate light even in complete darkness." Again, he says, "the rays of this light act as ordinary light;" and that "two bodies constantly impress their images on each other even in complete darkness." Thermographic experiments prove these principles, and lead him to the conclusion that there is latent light in certain vapours as well as latent heat. The ordinary condition of the human brain, and organs supplied by its nerves, is that of adaptation to the common exterior aspect of imponderable matters, such as light, heat, the grosser forms of electricity, sound, &c. But there is a more exalted or refined perception of these things which the animal organization of its own power, however intensified by inherent excitation, cannot attain to. Our perception of the latent imponderables, latent light, latent heat, latent electricity or od, latent sounds, &c., may be rendered more acute than ordinary; but it can never rise to the highest penetration which is possible, without the superaddition of something which the animal nature possesses only to a very limited degree. This something is the spirit of God without measure—John 3:34. All living animals have it in some degree; for "in God" they "live, and move, and have their being;" and if He were to "gather unto himself His spirit and His breath, all flesh shall perish together, and man shall turn again unto dust".

— Job 34:14-15. This minimum possession of God's spirit, possessed by quadrupeds and man, is just sufficient for the purposes of that peculiar constitution of things we call "this life;" but for the physical perception of things visible to beings of a more refined organization than ours, the sight of which will be vouchsafed at a future time, called "the world to come," the present amount of spirit is not sufficient. This can do for man what is proved, and what may yet be proved; but not what is randomly affirmed. He is not ordinarily in harmony with the latent imponderables; but God is intensely and completely so. Hence "the darkness and the light are both alike to him." If a man was imprisoned in darkness a thousand feet below the earth's surface, God would see him as distinctly, as we see each other above ground in the light of noonday. Men profess to believe this; but upon what principle is it that God sees thus in darkness? Because His nature, every atom of which is, as it were, condensed lightning, glowing with such an intensity, that its radiation is felt throughout the boundless universe, penetrating through all substances, and developing life and motion in all things, from the minutest animalcule to the globe of the vastest magnitude. Hence He is called "light," and "a consuming fire." The rays from His presence, called spirit, diluted with the grosser menstria of the earth's products, place Him in inner relation to the imponderables, which are but one and the same principle, variously developed by the media through which it passes into the receptacle whence it came. Thus, for instance, the most subtile principle of the earth's halo is spirit, which is called by different names, such as, electricity, magnetism, &c. This halo is its reservoir, as it were. It is diluted with atmospheric air. We breathe it. It pervades every atom of our bodies; and having enabled our organization to perform its functions, it exhales from the electrodes of our system as Od into the reservoir where we derived it by breathing. Thus a circle or circuit exists of the external atomic form changing fluid, internal transformed matter, and nervous current, closing the circuit by Od (latent light radiating in darkness) exhaling into the outer fluid.

Now this outer reservoir of fluid may be regarded as a highly polished and extremely sensitive mirror, in which can be excited latent odic spectres, which become visible sometimes to those whose brains are subjected to odic exaltation. The spectral impressions may emanate from corrupting bodies, mineral or other substances, and from living brains acting upon other living brains. Reichenbach's graveyard experiments have demonstrated the first; thermo-electrography the second; and animal magnetism, in all its varieties, the third.

We may adduce here a philosophical experiment, illustrative of what we mean by latent spectral impressions. Take a piece of polished metal, glass, or japanned tin, the temperature of which is low, and having laid upon it a wafer, coin, or any other such object, breathe upon the surface; allow the breathe entirely to disappear; then toss the object off the surface and examine it minutely; no trace of any thing is visible, yet a spectral impression exists on that surface, which may be evoked by breathing upon it. A form resembling the object at once appears, and, what is very remarkable, it may be called forth many times in succession, and even at the end of months. Other instances of the kind have been subsequently described by M. Moser. (Draper's Text Book of Chemistry, p. 97)

M. Karsten placed a coin on a piece of plate glass, which being supported by a plate of metal not insulated, and the sparks from the conductor of an electrifying machine were made to strike on the coin, thereby causing them to pass simultaneously through the coin and the metallic plate. After one hundred turns of the machine, the coin was removed; the glass plate appeared perfectly unaltered, (the ghost was invisible,) but when breathed upon, a perfect impression of the coin in its most minute details became visible.

M. Karsten says, that the impression is not produced by traces of the electric fluid remaining adherent to the glass plate; because the impression still remains with great distinctness after all traces of electricity have disappeared, after the glass has been wiped with a handkerchief. And again, these impressions are neither destroyed nor even weakened by passing a stream of the opposite electricity over them. (Fisher's Photogenic Manipulation, Part 2, p. 39, 42-46.)

From these experiments we see, that a thing may exist, and yet be invisible. Furthermore, that by breathing upon the thing impressed, things hidden may be manifested; thirdly that this can be effected at the end of months; and fourthly, that unseen, but real impressions of words and figures, can be made on surfaces by electricity, and afterwards made visible by breathing. These principles are scientific demonstrations. And pray what is science? It is knowledge. Human knowledge or science, when it is really knowledge, consists of the little men have discovered—the few general facts they have found obtaining in the universe; and more especially in this terrestrial system, in relation to the earth, its substances, and man upon it. Men know but little of the laws to which God has subjected His earth and the things belonging to it, compared with what remains to be discovered or revealed. The most scientific of men are comparatively very ignorant. Their knowledge of general facts is exceedingly limited; and their reasonings upon them, and their deductions very often, more often than otherwise, remarkably illogical, and singularly absurd. The wisest among them are free to confess this. And if the wise be fools, in science, how grossly ignorant and foolish must the multitude be, which troubles not itself with general facts, right reason, or scientific principles at all! And yet it is the ignorant who undertake to draw conclusions from data the most recondite, and pronounce the Bible a cheat, if it teach not according to what they have predetermined it ought to teach. But after all, the multitude is not so much to blame for this as their guides. Like priests, like people. The theosophist reasons out from insufficient data a crude theory which pleases his fleshly mind, and then goes to the Bible to cull sounding epithets to sanctify it; instead of allowing God's holy word to teach him as a babe, and then to prove all things by its rule. This procedure is emphatically the folly of our age. All classes are guilty of it; and in consequence, rush headlong to the adoption of theories which destroy the truth, and stultify themselves.

General facts are the laws by and through which God sustains all things and operates upon them. By these laws a relationship is established between Him and man, who is subjected to their operation in common with minerals and vegetables. Thus, electricity acts uniformly whatever the nature of the thing acted upon; the products of that action vary according to the medium through which it acts. Like electricities repel, and unlike ones attract, whether minerals, vegetables, clouds, or animal substances, be the subject of their

When God speaks to man He speaks electrically, that is, by His Spirit; for electricity is the term science has bestowed upon what the Bible styles Spirit. All physical phenomena are produced by the spirit acting according to laws peculiar to it, a very few of which are found scattered about in works of science. When the Creator wills to speak, He does it by the same spirit that shivers the sturdy oak, or rends the rocks asunder. Sometimes He communicates His mind by making direct spectral impressions on the magnetic mirror of the brain. In this case a man in his sleep sees objects and hears sounds that have no real existence; but are representative of realities past, present, or future. These are the dreams and visions of the prophets. Sometimes, He speaks mediately, but still electrically, as through Jesus Christ to his apostles, whose method we will look into briefly in connection with the principles brought out in M. Karsten and Dr. Draper's experiments.

STRIKING TRUTHS.

“It is unquestionable that political speculations are now largely turned from the dramatic, dynastic and personal interests of history to the life of the nations, the destinies of races and the ultimate prospects of mankind. Our fathers’ generation and our own have been marked by changes so vast and rapid as to strike the least imaginative minds with an anxious sense of temporal instability, and to fill the most imaginative with solemn instincts of an undeveloped providence and dim visions of a future, which no theorems of the schools and of the churches will contain.”—Edinburgh Review, 1850.

“The fear of God in the hearts of the wise, tends ever to enlarge itself, to reject school definitions and to purge the popular creed. Universal nature is but a part of God. Consider the decline of faith. Yet the progress of truth, in the church, the schools and the world, from Tertullian to Bishop Butler, from Ptolemy to Sir J. Herschell, from St. Louis to the King of Prussia! Now sectarianism is the beginning of the end of a blind reverence for human authority.”—Ibid.

Dr. Chalmers—a high orthodox divine—thus satirises the popular idea of Paradise: “The common imagination that we have of Paradise on the other side of death is that of a lofty, aerial region, where the inmates float in ether, or are mysteriously suspended upon nothing—where all warm and sensible accompaniments, which give such an expression of strength, and life and colouring to our present habitation, are attenuated into a sort of spiritual element, that is meagre and imperceptible, and utterly uninviting to the eye of mortals here below—where every vestige of materialism is done away and nothing left but unearthly scenes that have no power of allurements, and certain unearthly ecstasies with which it is felt impossible to sympathise,” &c.

“Prophetic interpretation is not a thing of rambling ingenuity, but of accurate investigation, possessing within itself a thousand corrections of error and confirmations of truth.”

OUR VISIT TO BRITAIN.

From Derby we proceeded to Lincoln, an old cathedral town. There is there a small congregation of friends to the truth, who with a disposition to benefit their contemporaries, find Satan too strong for their endeavours. Lincoln is one of the thrones of his kingdom, being the metropolis of the well-endowed See of one of the “Right Reverend Fathers in God” of the State Religion. The cathedral is a large and ancient pile, standing upon an eminence which commands an extensive view of the surrounding country. It is a work of the middle ages, and decorated with scattered emblems which illustrate the grossness and devilishness of the times that witnessed its foundation. Over one of its principal gates is a brutal representation of the Serpent tempting Eve in the garden of Eden; and upon another part of the building projecting from a parapet is a woman with the devil on her back looking over Lincoln. This must certainly be the presiding deity of the place. The temple is bedevilled and be-grimmed with sculptures of hideous grimace. The devil-worshippers of the east would certainly feel themselves at home, as in the very abiding place of this world’s god, were they transported to the episcopal area of “Old Tom of Lincoln.” They never would imagine that they beheld a house of the God of Israel, where his humble and contrite worshippers convened to worship him in spirit and in truth. Such an idea would be unsearchable, for there is nothing connected with the huge revolting structure having the remotest affinity with the truth. It was an old Romish temple of the saints well adapted to the dark superstition of the times. To the antiquarian it is interesting in an archaeological point of view; and to the Bishop and his body-guards it is useful and profitable because of the rich endowments which pertain to it; but by the people it is deserted as a place of worship, for there are no utterances there that speak to the intellect or heart of man. Strangers visit it as they visit the old Roman arch and wall, as one of the lions of the place. It is a gloomy sepulchre of the soul; an earthly habitation of the mouldering dead, where also the dead in trespasses in sins, in tones of heart-freezing monotony, drawl forth the untouching diurnal formalism of the “Common Prayer Book” as indispensable to the monopoly and enjoyment of the loaves and fishes.

The clerical influence is strong in Lincoln, because both aristocratic and wealthy; and wherever rank and riches are concentrated in a third rate town the people are servile and timid. The dissenters are not bold in Lincoln; because being of the trading and humbler classes, they fear to offend the clerical power lest their interests should perish. We obtained a tolerable hearing at first in the Council Chamber; but when our teaching was found to be subversive of the state superstition, and of nonconformist divinity, it was found impossible to bring them out. The Unitarian minister was quite captivated for a time with what he heard. He attended nearly all our lectures, and urged us to publish them for the public good. He invited us to his house, where we passed a very agreeable evening with him and his family; and also visited us at the friend's with whom we sojourned. He was quite stirred up to the study of the prophets, upon whose writings, as far as fulfilled, he delivered a course of lectures when we had departed. After we had concluded our lectures, he arose, and thanked us in a speech addressed to the audience for our labors in Lincoln. The things he had heard took such hold of his mind that he could not sleep. He said he got up one night, and sat examining the prophets for three hours on the things we had been discussing. His lectures on fulfilled prophecy were the result of this. Whether he will come to a full understanding of the truth so as to be moved to the obedience which the faith demands of all who would inherit the kingdom of God, we can only say, we hope he will. "My poverty and not my will consents" is a sentiment which doubtless explains the aberrations of a multitude from the paths of rectitude and life. They would do the truth only their necessities, or their love of popularity, or their supposed worldly interests, prevent. Thousands would embrace the truth if it involved no loss of friends, or worldly advantages; but the idea of suffering the loss of all things, or forsaking all, and following the truth through evil and good report—of taking the spoiling of their goods with joy in hope of promises to be fulfilled—the sacrifice is too great, and not to be ventured on even for the recompense of eternal life and glory! Oh, what accursed foolishness is this! For what shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world, and lose his life! Well might Jesus say, "beware of covetousness;" for he who covets the present world, and seeks its wealth and honor for himself and children, is an idolator—Ephesians 5: 5, and can as easily inherit the kingdom of God as a camel can pass through a needle's eye. "Little children keep yourselves from idols."

We spent a very pleasant time in this town in a family much attached to Mr. Wallis and devoted to the Bethanian theory. Some of them were quite opposed to our being invited to Lincoln; but when they came to hear for themselves, the tables were completely turned, and they were as unwilling for us to leave. Two were immersed while we sojourned there. We left them increased in knowledge, if not renewed. This is less easy to accomplish than to enlighten. It requires time; for the creation of the human character after the image of the invisible God is neither instantaneous nor miraculous.

While lecturing at Lincoln several members of a Bethanian congregation in Newark came over to hear us. They appear to have been much gratified at what they heard; and consequently very desirous for us to visit Newark. The whole of the active and influential members were canvassed, and a unanimous wish to hear was the result. They accordingly went to Mr. John Bell, the Manager of the Bank there, and elder of their congregation, to ascertain whether an official invitation could not be forwarded to us, "that they might have the pleasure of hearing more particularly concerning the things we testified about the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ." Prior to this visit to Mr. B. they had made arrangements for our "comfortable accommodation." Mr. Bell, however, replied that from the disorderly position we occupied in visiting England without an official recommendation, he could not sanction it; and that as he was one of the committee appointed at Chester to regulate the affairs of "evangelists" from America, he could not throw off his allegiance to said committee in officially introducing us to Newark without their consent. To this it was objected that we were not an "evangelist." He replied that he could not have fellowship with us, and so exhibit ingratitude towards his brethren at Nottingham, and towards Messrs. Campbell and Henshall for their valuable services. He consented, however, that they should have the room in which they ordinarily convened for us to lecture in. Finding they could do no better, they availed themselves of this permission in forwarding to us the following note:

Newark, August 31, 1848.

Dear Brother:

We the undersigned being members of the church of Christ here, beg most gratefully to acknowledge, and to thank you for your generous offer to come and declare unto us “the things concerning the kingdom of God.” We are very anxious you should come, but the result of an interview of the subscribed with our respected elder, Mr. Bell, causes us very much regret that the church (that is, Mr. Bell) cannot for certain reasons give you an official invitation. We, rather than incur any grievous consequences, must forego the pleasure which we had strongly and anxiously anticipated.

We beg to express our highest approval of the nature of your valuable services in the cause of truth. We are yours in the Hope of the Gospel

Very affectionately,

JAMES LUXFORD,
CHARLES TAYLOR,
JOHN HAGE,
DAVIS JOHNSON,
EVERETT ALLENBY, GEORGE DOUBLEDAY.

Things remained thus until our return to Lincoln from Scotland in November. At that time an intimation was forwarded to us that the friends at Newark would be glad to receive us, and that their room would be at our service all the week with the exception of the first day. The way being thus open we made our appearance there, and addressed the people on three or four successive nights. The room was crowded to excess, and Mr. Bell was there. His attentions were polite and friendly, notwithstanding his allegiance to the committee, and gratitude to his allies elsewhere. Having an appointment at Lincoln we left on Saturday morning. But before our departure Mr. Bell surprised us by a visit of adieu. He said he had nothing to do with bringing us there, but he was very glad we had come, and to prove that he meant what he said, begged our acceptance of a trifle towards our expenses, which must be considerable. Next time, said he, you must write to me, and I will make all necessary arrangements for your comfort, and for the accommodation of the public. When, therefore, we proposed to revisit Newark in 1849, we wrote to Mr. Bell as he requested. The following was his reply.

Newark, 28 June, 1849.

Bro. Thomas:

Dear Sir—Your letter with programme is to hand. I have applied for a more eligible building in which to hold the meetings you propose to convene. I cannot obtain an answer for this post, but may do so tomorrow. At all events our old meeting place will be available for your lectures should we be prevented from obtaining more desirable accommodation; and therefore you must stand engaged for the period named in your programme, and in a day or two when my arrangements are complete, I will write you again. At present the public will expect you to appear on Sunday, July 7.

I am, dear sir,

Very faithfully yours,

JOHN BELL.

Accordingly in two or three days we received the following note.

Newark, 1 July, 1849.

Dear Brother:

I enclose to you a bill which we have struck off announcing the lectures. I shall expect your arrival on Saturday, and have provided for you your old quarters. I do so because I think you will feel more independent, &c. At the same time you will allow me to say that my house will always be open for your reception, and for your retreat; and I hope whilst you are in Newark you will come and take your seat with me at my table whenever you are able.

I shall meet you (D. V.) on your arrival at the station; but should any unforeseen circumstance arise to prevent me, my brother will supply my lack of service.

I would just observe that our Corn Exchange, where you are to lecture, is a beautiful large room, and I trust you will not sustain any inconvenience as that experienced during your last visit to Newark.

I am, dear sir,

Very sincerely and affectionately yours,

JOHN BELL.

P. S. —I intend to strike off a small bill announcing the publication of Elpis Israel, which I shall take care to have distributed after each of the week day lectures as the people retire at the doors.

J. B.

These letters show that what Mr. Bell had heard, had produced an entire change in his views concerning us. He had evidently renounced his allegiance to the Chester committee, and ceased to be grateful to Messrs. Campbell and Henshall for their alleged “valuable services.” Unfortunately, however, we saw Mr. Bell no more, or we might have strengthened his new born zeal, and have given a different turn to his future course. He failed to meet us at the station on our arrival. He had fallen sick, and was so severely afflicted that his physician recommended that no visitors should be admitted to his room. We accordingly left the town without an interview; and to our great astonishment heard that some time after his recovery, Mr. Bell had abandoned “reformation” in despair, and had cast himself into the fascinating embraces of the Harlot Church of England!

The moment of parting is, perhaps, the first moment that we feel how useful we have been to each other. The natural reserve of the heart is broken and the moved spirit speaks as it feels.
